HILLSBOROUGH, a post and market town, formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Hillsborough, barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Belfast, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Lisburn, $3\frac{1}{2}$ north by east of Dromore, 10 south by west of Belfast, and 70 north of Dublin. Its site is the slope of one of the most conspicuous of the many hills which blend with swells and rising grounds to produce a continuous undulation and hilliness over the greater part of the county. Though its houses are neither very numerous, nor, for the most part, large or individually interesting, they are so neatly and commodiously collocated, and enjoy so exquisite a relief from the airiness of their site and the numerous embellishments of the Hillsborough demesne, as to constitute one of the most pleasant and interesting small towns in Ireland. The parish-church has three towers, and exceeds in splendour by far the greater number of the modern churches in the kingdom. The Presbyterian, Quakers', and Moravian meeting-houses, and the Roman Catholic chapel, are plain buildings. The market house and the inn are handsome structures. The mansion, garden, and lawn of the Marquis of Downshire, are situated on the west side of the town, and the demesne on the east: the mansion, though a plain-looking structure, has a fine Grecian portico; the garden and lawn are extensive and well-kept; and the demesne comprises nearly 800 Irish acres, and is embellished with artificial lakes and agreeable plantations. Hillsborough-castle, now a ruin in the demesne, was built in the reign of Charles I. by Sir A. Hill, the ancestor of the Marquis of Downshire; it was afterwards constituted a royal fort, the hereditary constablenesship of which is held by the Marquis; and, in 1690, it was occupied by William III., while his army lay encamped on a neighbouring piece of ground called Blarismoor. The improvements of the Marquis are not only conspicuous in the town and the demesne, but extend athwart his large possessions both in the vicinity and in other parts of Ireland. Criticism has remarked that the whole Downshire property, or at least that part of it which concentrates at Hillsborough, has been disposed with a view rather to the profitable results of a good estate, than to the fine decorations of a picturesque landscape, and, in particular, that the beauty of the town would have been greater if the church, with its lofty spire, had been more highly elevated above the general level of the country, and the mansion, with its picturesque home-view, had been removed a little farther from the public road. Yet whatever may be said about the demesne, the town acquires an almost aristocratic air from the proximity of the mansion, and seems as if caressed between the lawn and the park; and it enjoys the exquisite additional luxury of commanding a view of a great extent of rich and beautiful country, away even to the town and bay of Belfast.

The linen trade of Hillsborough and its neighbourhood was at one time large and very prosperous; and, after having been nearly destroyed by the introduction and temporary flourish of the cotton manufacture, it revived, and has for a series of years past been in a fair condition. An extensive distillery and a large brewery employ a portion of the inhabitants. A weekly market is held on Thursday; and fairs are held on Feb. 19, May 20, Aug. 19, and Nov. 18. Various public conveyances daily pass through between Belfast on the north and Banbridge and Dublin on the south. The Lagan canal, connecting Lough Neagh with Belfast Lough, passes within a mile of the town. The well-known race-course of the Maze is situated on the banks of the Lagan, upwards of a mile to the north: see MAZE. —Hillsborough was incorporated by charter of 14 Charles II.; and sent two members to the Irish parliament. The Marquis of Downshire is "patron" of the borough, and received the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union. The corporation was styled by charter "The Sovereign, Burgesses, and Free Commons of the Borough and Town of Hillsborough;" but they became the mere nominees and tools of the patron. The same charter which constituted the borough erected the manor of Hillsborough, and instituted three courts of the nature of a court-leet, a court-baron, and a court of record, all presided over by a seneschal. Courts of quarter-sessions and of petty-sessions are held by respectively the assistant barrister and the magistrates of the county. A district bridewell was built in 1833. The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary; and the streets are repaired by county grand jury presentment. —There are in the town a dispensary, an hospital, a fever hospital, and a loan fund. In 1839, the dispensary expended £114 10s. 1½d., and administered to 1,164 patients. The hospital contains 7 beds, admits both surgical and contagious cases, and is supported from the same funds as the dispensary. The fever hospital is strictly an institution of the kind which its title designates. In 1841, the Loan Fund had a capital of £7,103, circulated £19,745 in 3,195 loans, cleared a nett profit of £80 16s., and expended on charitable purposes £150; and from the date of its origin till the close of 1841, it circulated £47,016 in 8,220 loans, realized a nett profit of £353 18s. 1d., and expended for charitable objects £350. Area of the town, 46 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,453; in 1841, 1,328. Houses 205. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 74; in manufactures and trade, 123; in other pursuits, 64. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 20; on the directing of labour, 127; on their own manual labour, 99; on means not specified, 15.

HILL-STREET, a village, partly in the parish of Aughrim, barony of Roscommon, and partly in the parish of Kilmore, barony of North Ballintober, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Area, 12 acres, of which 9 acres are in Aughrim. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 113; of the Aughrim section, 70. Houses in the whole, 25; in the Aughrim section, 16.

HILLTOWN, a village in the parish of Clonduff, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands near the base of the Eagle mountain, and at the intersection of the mountain road from Newry to Bryansford with that from Rathfriland to Retrevor, 2 miles south of Rathfriland. A fair is held on the second Tuesday of every month. In the vicinity, the Upper Bann waters the first of the numerous bleachfields on its banks. Area of the village, 13 acres. Pop., in 1831, 170; in 1841, 335. Houses 66.

HILLTOWN, co. Monaghan. See CURREN.

HINE (THE), a rivulet of co. Roscommon, Connaught. It rises in the vicinity of Hazlebrook, traverses the demesne of Moate Park, has an easterly run of 6 or 7 miles, nearly all on the boundary between the baronies of Ballintobber and Athlone, and empties itself into nearly the middle of the west side of Lough Ree.

HINE (LOUGH), a salt water lake in the eastern division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated at the head of Barlogh bay, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles south of Skibbereen, and the same distance north-east of Baltimore. It is nearly circular, and not less than two miles in circumference; it is connected by only a very narrow channel with Burlogh bay; and it is surrounded by hills of various heights, the seaward ones of which exclude all view of the ocean. On an islet near its centre stand the ruins of a castle, which was formerly the secluded and romantic fastness of the O'Driscolls.

HODDERSFIELD, a demesne in the barony of Kerrycurrihy, 2 miles south-west of Cunden Fort, co. Cork, Munster. It is the property of Colonel Hodder. A gazebo on a rising ground near the house commands a magnificent prospect of Cork Harbour, and a great extent of coast and ocean.

HOG HEAD, a promontory, at the south side of the entrance of Ballinskelligs bay, barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster.

HOG ISLAND, an islet in the barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It lies in the Shannon, between Kilrush and Inniscattery.

HOG ISLANDS, THE SEVEN HOGS, OR THE MAGHERIES, a cluster of seven islets, in the barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. They lie at a mean distance of 3 miles north-west of Lamb Head, $3\frac{1}{4}$ south of Hog Head, and $1\frac{1}{4}$ west of the nearest part of the mainland; and, while thus situated midway between the openings of Kenmare river and Ballinskelligs bay, they cover the sheltered creek at the head of which stands the mansion of DARRYNAKE: see that article. They are encompassed with sunk rocks, and therefore can seldom be approached without danger. The two largest are called Scariff or Scarav, and the Little Hog.

HOLLYHILL, a demesne on the river Bandon, 2 miles above Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. It was remarkable, when Dr. Smith wrote, for its mansion of four regular fronts, its elegant and well-kept gardens, its wooded avenue of a mile in length, its vista to the vale of the Bandon cut through the solid rock, and its attached neat village of well-built and regularly collocated cottages for the accommodation of the labourers and the tenantry.

HOLLY ISLAND. See HOLY ISLAND.

HOLLYMOUNT, a small post-town, in the parish of Kilcommon, barony of Kilmain, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the river Robe, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Westport, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles east-north-east of Ballinrobe, 5 south-west by south of Claremorris, $11\frac{1}{4}$ north-west by west of Tuam, $14\frac{1}{4}$ south-east of Castlebar, and 111 west by north of Dublin. The country immediately around it is prevalently flat, and to a large extent boggy; yet it is so enriched with georgical improvement, good cultivation, pleasant demesne grounds, and a considerable extent of wood, as to possess a decidedly pleasing character. The demesnes of Clooncormac, Bloomfield, and Lehinch—the first and second the property of respectively James Knox Gildea, Esq., and the Rev. F. L. Rutledge—are immediately adjacent; and the demesne of Hollymount, the property of Thomas Spencer Lindsay, Esq., flings over the very streets the shadow of its masses of wood. The town itself, though small, is very neat, clean, and snug. The parish-church at the west end, is a handsome building with a spire; the new buildings at the east end, erected as schools, fix attention by their size and character; and the inn near the middle is adapted rather to the wants of the Dublin and Westport road than to those of the town itself. A dispensary here is within the Ballinrobe Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 32,755 acres, with a pop. of 13,334; and, in 1840-41, it expended £201 16s. 11d., and administered to 1,119 patients. Fairs are held May 16 and Dec. 11. Area of the town, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 454. Houses 63.

HOLLYWELL, a village in the barony of Glenawley, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands on the north road from Enniskillen to Manor-Hamilton, and near the north shore of Lower Lough Macnean, about $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-east of Belcoo Bridge, and 8 miles west by south of Enniskillen. A dispensary here is within the Enniskillen Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, its receipts amounted to £112 12s., and its expenditure to £118 10s. 11d. Immediately adjacent is the demesne of Garden-Hill. Pop. not specially returned.

HOLLYWOOD, a parish on the north border of the barony of Lower Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. It contains the town of Hollywood, and the villages of BALLYHACKMORE, NEWBRIDGE, and STRANDTOWN: see these articles. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 2; area, 8,064 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,693; in 1841, 5,045. Houses 837. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,872. Houses 491. It extends in a belt or band along the shore of Belfast Lough, from within about $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile of the town of Belfast; its inland edge or border, is a chain of high hills, extending nearly from end to end, and beautifully varied in outline, altitude, and culture; its interior is a richly diversified slope, luxuriant in vegetable dress, and profusely embellished with woods, parks, and mansions; and its seaward edge is a softly-featured shore, melting lusciously into the waters of the Lough, and carrying out the eye to a view of the magnificent chain of the county of Antrim mountains, from Mount Davis behind Belfast away to the vicinity of Black Head. The hills, though high, are for the most part tilled nearly to their summits; but the two loftiest, called Barbadoes Hill, and Standard Hill, are almost entitled to be called mountains, and the former is very steep. Conn's Brook, which traces the western boundary of the parish, and is the largest of its streams, takes its name from the celebrated Conn O'Neil, who resided at Castlereagh, and was toparch of a great extent of circumjacent country. The mineralogy and geognosy of the shore district possess considerable interest: see DOWN (COUNTY OF). A few chalybeate springs exist in the vicinity of Hollywood, Cultra, and Ballymahon. The soil of the hilly country lies on a cold, gravelly subsoil; that of the south-west end is a dead ruddy sand; and that of the remaining districts is a heavy red clay. About one-sixth of the surface is park and meadow, chiefly within demesnes; about one-sixth is disposed in pasture; and most of the remainder is in tillage. Only one bog is in the state of turbary; and the rest of the small quondam aggregate of bog is either exhausted or reclaimed. A very large amount of planted forest trees decorates demesnes and fields and the general landscape; and two continuous woods, the one of about 100 acres, and the other of about 50, enrich the Hollywood and the Cultra estates. A beautiful bed of wild roses, about an acre in extent, flourished near the road to Richmond Lodge; and, on being botanically examined, was found to be a peculiar species, and became the source of the Rosa Hibernica described in the transactions of the Dublin Society, and admitted into modern rosaries. The mansions and villas along the shore, or near the course of the Belfast and Bangor road, are Conn's Brook, $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Belfast; Ballymeehan, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Belfast; Richmond Lodge, amid well-planted and tastefully disposed grounds, 3 miles from Belfast; Clifton, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Belfast; West-brook, built for the vicar of Belfast; Hollywood-house, a formal and old-fashioned structure, about 4 miles from Belfast; Ballymena, a large and modern edifice, with very extensive attached offices, and a remarkably superb adjacent shrubbery, about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Belfast; Cultra, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Belfast [see CULTRA]; Craigavad, 6 miles from Belfast; and Rockport, a modern building, near a creek of the same name at the edge of the Lough, nearly 7 miles from Belfast. The other seats are Castlehill and Belmont, on the Newtown-Ardes road, about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Belfast; Greenville, on the Beer's Bridge road, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile from Belfast; and Bloomfield, on the Orangefield road, nearly 2 miles from Belfast. But in addition to all these, there are various lodges, small villas, cottages ornées, and good farm-houses. The principal roads through the parish are those from Belfast to respectively Bangor and Newtown-Ardes, both leading to Donaghadee. Vessels of from 40 to 100 tons can float at high water at several places on the shore near the town of Hollywood; and vessels of from 200 to 300 tons can find anchorage farther down, at Cultra, Rockport, and Ettysport. Other objects of interest will be noticed in connection with the town of Hollywood.—This parish is a perpetual inappropriate curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Endowment from the estate of Viscount Dunganmon, £36 18s. 5d.; glebe, £32 10s. Gross income, £110 3s. 11d.; nett, £107 2s. 11d. Patron, the Rev. John Davis, and his heirs. The church is one of the oldest in the diocese. Sittings 200; attendance 200. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses have each an attendance of 700; and the Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 80 to 100, and is supplied from Belfast. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 626 Churchmen, 3,627 Presbyterians, 24 other Protestant dissenters, and 518 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 70 children; and 7 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £15 from subscription, one with £10 from Mr. Turnly, and three with respectively £10, £8, and £6 from the National Board—had on their books 164 boys, and 120 girls.

HOLLYWOOD, a post-town, and small sea-port in the above parish, stands on the road from Belfast to Bangor, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Belfast, $5\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of Bangor, and $84\frac{1}{2}$ north by east of Dublin. It consists principally of one long, spacious, and very handsome street, extending parallel with the shore; but includes a considerable aggregate of other buildings, part of which stand compactly with the chief street, and part are picturesquely and airily sprinkled over the immediate vicinity. The town occupies a beautiful site; has a remarkably clean, neat, and cheerful appearance; and contains numerous good houses, which are let, during the summer months of the year, to the families of sea-bathers, and of the merchants of Belfast. The church is a curious old structure, 78 feet by 24 in the clear, and about 20 feet high, with a remodelled square tower of about 10 feet on each side. The whole structure was originally built in an early variety of the pointed style, but has been so greatly mutilated and modernized as to have become bereft of its honours before all eyes except those of peering antiquaries. A Franciscan friary or priory at one time stood in the village,—founded by nobody knows whom; and the church is believed to have been the priory chapel. One of the Presbyterian meeting-houses is a very handsome cruciform structure, completed in July 1841. A florid and vaporizing but still quotable account of it in the Presbyterian Almanack, says, with the pouting and pleonasm of a pedant, that "it is built in the perpendicular pointed Gothic style;" and adds, "The nave and transepts are occupied with pews, and that part of the building which, in other churches, is designated the chancel, contains a lobby and staircase, vestry-room, minister's room, and, in the second story, a large lecture or class room. The principal entrance leads into the basement story of a square tower, having a groined ceiling, and communicating right and left with the inner doors and the stairs to the gallery. The tower rises to the height of 70 feet, having louvre windows, octagonal buttresses, and pinnacles at the angles, and crowned with an embattled parapet. The Gothic forms are strictly observed in the external architecture and internal ornaments of the edifice. The transepts are lighted by two large windows, 8 feet wide and 18 feet high, divided into 5 lights by mullions, and having the heads of the windows filled with tracery. The other windows are similar in design, though of smaller dimensions, all being surmounted with label mouldings. The design of the pulpit is noble and striking; behind and above it is the singing gallery, supported by 5 Tudor arches, with octagonal columns, presenting a highly effective arrangement. The ceiling, which rises in the centre, and is ornamented with Gothic ribs, terminating in perforated spandrels, is in harmony with the rest of the building; and though an evident simplicity prevails in every part, yet the general effect is exceedingly pleasing." A dispensary in the town is within the Belfast Poor-law union, and serves for a district strictly identical with the parish; and, in 1839, it expended £64 6s., and administered to 1,558 patients. In 1841, the Hollywood Loan Fund had a capital of £483, circulated £2,443 in 643 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £1 17s. 10d. A small pier at the town is used by fishermen, but requires repairs and extension. Only about 14 or 16 of the inhabitants are fishermen; but a large number are mixedly agriculturists and weavers. A badly attended fair is held every three months. Area of the town, 37 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,288; in 1841, 1,532. Houses 263. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 75; in manufactures and trade, 127; in other pursuits, 119. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 33; on the directing of labour, 120; on their own manual labour, 135; on means not specified, 33.

HOLLYWOOD, a parish in the barony of West Balrothery, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by east of Naul, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, westward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,997 acres, 3 roods, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,022; in 1841, 1,022. Houses 164. The surface consists of land of average quality; and is traversed by the road from Naul to Dublin. A height on the eastern boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 471 feet; and one in the north-east corner has an altitude of 586 feet. The hamlets are Nag's Head, Naptown, and Bulrickard; and the demesnes are Damastown and Mallahow.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £68 7s. 9d.; glebe, £16. The rectorial tithes are inappropriate; and a portion of them, compounded for £29 10s., belongs to W. Dutton Pollard, Esq., while a larger portion of them, compounded for £122 4s., belongs to George Pepper, Esq., the lessee of the impropiator. The vicarages of HOLLYWOOD, NAUL, and GRALLAGH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Hollywood. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 2,016. Gross income, £136 0s. 11d.; nett, £88 12s. 2d. Patron the Marquis of Drogheda. The church is situated in Naul. Sittings 100; attendance 20. The Hollywood and the Naul Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 300 and 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Clonmethan. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 1,005; the Protestants of the union to 62, and the Roman Catholics to 1,954; and 2 pay daily schools—the one in Hollywood, and the other in Naul—had on their books 29 boys and 36 girls.

HOLLYWOOD, a parish in the barony of Lower Talbotstown, 5½ miles south by west of Blessington, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Area, 18,383 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches,—of which 13 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches are water. The King's river rises in a series of head-streams in the east, whose sources have elevations of respectively 1,045, 1,280, 1,345, 1,400, and 1,459 feet; and the channel of all the streams on to their exit, is of such height as to show the average basis of the entire parish to be at least 550 feet. About three-fourths of the surface are upland moor and bog. The chief residences are Grove and Rathattin. The census of 1831 exhibits the parish in two parts, called Hollywood-Bolies and Hollywood-Lowlands. Pop., in 1831, of the former, 1,550; of the latter, 1,300. Pop., in 1841, of both, 2,770. Houses 422. The village of Hollywood stands in Hollywood-Lowlands, 3 miles south by east of Ballymore-Eustace. Pop., in 1831, 161. This village is pronounced by the author of the Guide to Wicklow, "one of the most miserable places imaginable." Fairs are held on Feb. 1, May 3, Aug. 1, and Nov. 1. The road from the village to Ballymore-Eustace, distant 2½ miles, traverses the common of Broadley, in which are some standing stones and sepulchral tumuli.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £172 6s. 6d.; glebe, £40. Gross income, £212 6s. 6d.; nett, £198 12s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Carrigallen in the dio. of Kilmore, and the sinecure and unendowed archdeaconry of Kilmore. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is of unknown date. Sittings 100; attendance 70. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and both it and the parish-church are situated in Hollywood-Lowlands. In 1834, the Protestants of Hollywood-Bolies amounted to 131; and the Roman Catholics to 1,464; the Protestants of Hollywood-Lowlands to 83; and the Roman Catholics to 1,255; and 5 daily schools in Hollywood-Lowlands—one of which was aided with £2 a-year and school books from the rector—had on their books 141 boys and 103 girls.

HOLMPATRICK, a parish on the coast of the barony of East Balrothery, co. Dublin, Leinster. It contains the town of SKERRIES: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 2,131 acres, 36 perches,—of which 38 acres, 29 perches are islands, and 28 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches form a detached district. Pop., in 1831, 3,109; in 1841, 3,152. Houses 627. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 553; in 1841, 735. Houses 129. The surface consists in general of good tillage and pasture land. Near Skerries is Milverton, the seat of G. Woods, Esq.; and in the vicinity of Milverton is Hacketstown, formerly the seat of the proprietor of the town, J. H. Hamilton, Esq., but now the residence of his agent.

Opposite the town, but nowhere more distant from it than about ¼ of a mile, lies a group of rocky isles and islets, the chief of which are called St. Patrick's, Shenick's Red, and Colt Islands. These islets are principally of the kind called Skerries, and gave the town its name; while St. Patrick's Island seems to have given name to the parish. That island itself acquired its designation from the fancied connection of an old ecclesiastical establishment upon it with St. Patrick; and that establishment, as a matter of course, is currently exhibited by topographers as an abbey. Yet current story in this instance is not quite so gaping in its passion for connection with St. Patrick as common legend and popular tradition are, but contents itself with ascribing "the abbey" on the island to Sitrick Mac-Murchard, towards the close of the 9th century; and adds that, "the site proving inconvenient, the establishment was removed to the mainland, between 1213 and 1228, by Henry de Londres, archbishop of Dublin. A synod of 15 bishops, 200 priests, and several other clergy, is said to have been held in 1148, in the monastery on the island by Gelasius, archbishop of Armagh, assisted by Malachy O'Morgair, papal legate, and to have been removed in the same year to Armagh, and there concluded. The monastery on the mainland was, with all its appurtenances, granted, in the 20th year of Elizabeth, to Sir Thomas Fitzwilliam, of Baginbun and Thornycastle, and its ruins still exist at a short distance from the town of Skerries. Martello towers stand on Red Island and Shenick's Island.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Gross income, £92 6s. 5½d.; nett, £72 6s. 5½d. Patron, James Hans Hamilton, Esq. The tithes are wholly inappropriate in the patron. The church was built in 1719, by means of private subscription and parochial assessment. Sittings 200; attendance, from 60 to 70. The Roman Catholic chapel at Skerries is attended by 1,200, and that at Millwood, by from 80 to 90; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, they are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 148, and the Roman Catholics to 2,961; and 3 pay daily schools had an average attendance in summer of about 115 children; and 2 other pay daily schools made no report of the number attending them. In 1840, the National Board had a boys' school and a girls' school in Skerries.

HOLYCROSS, a parish in the baronies of Eliogurty and Middlethird, 3½ miles south-south-west of Thurles, co. Tipperary, Munster. The Middlethird section contains the village of Holycross. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½. Area of the Eliogurty section, 6,321 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches; of the Middlethird section, 1,816 acres, 33 perches. Pop., of the whole, in 1831, 2,935; in 1841, 3,446. Houses 539. Pop. of the Eliogurty section, in 1831, 2,224; in 1841, 2,653. Houses 417. The surface is a fertile, beautiful, and ornate part of the valley of the Suir; and is traversed by the road from Thurles to Cashel. The chief residences are Beakstown, Raheen, Farney, Prior-Lodge, Whitefort, Holycross-house, Springfield, Suir-Cottage, Suirville, and Graiguenoe.—The village of Holycross is at present a small and poor collection of houses, remarkable only for fairs on May 11, Sept. 24, and Oct. 18, and for standing in ugly juxtaposition with one of the most superb ecclesiastical ruins in the kingdom. But as the Dublin and Cashel railway will probably send off a principal branch from this village, by Tipperary, to Limerick, it is likely soon to rise into comparative importance. "As a romantic ruin, the abbey of Holycross ranks in popular esteem as one of the first in Ireland. But it is perhaps as a whole scarcely deserving of so high a character; and its effect upon the mind is greatly diminished by the cabins and other objects of a mean character by which it is nearly surrounded. Like most monastic structures of considerable importance, its general form is that of a cross, consisting of a nave, chancel, and transept, with a lofty square belfry at the intersection of the cross; but it is distinguished from other structures of the kind, in having in both of its transepts two distinct chapels beautifully groined, a feature which imparts much interest and picturesqueness to the general effect. Between two of these chapels and the south transept, there is a double row of three pointed arches, supported by twisted pillars, each distant about 2 feet 4 inches from the other, and having a similar pointed arch in front. The object of this singular feature has given rise to much conjecture; but the more rational opinion seems to be that it was designed as a resting-place for the dead bodies of the monks and other persons previously to interment in the abbey or its cemetery. In addition to this, the interior of the church has another very unique and remarkable feature, namely, that the choir arch is not placed as usual beneath the tower, but 30 feet in advance of it; thus making the choir of greater length by 14 feet than the nave, which is but 58 feet long, the entire length of the church being 130 feet. This peculiarity appears, however, to be an after-thought, and not the design of the original architect, which was evidently to limit as usual the length of the choir to the arch in front of the tower, and the second arch is unquestionably of more modern construction. The steeple rests on four beautiful groined arches, the supporters of which are connected in the centre by a great variety of ogives passing diagonally from their angles; and the roof of the choir, as well as those of the side chapels, is similarly enriched. The nave appears to have been of meaner architecture, and has lost its roof; but it has aisles formed by four pointed arches on each side, and which lead into the transepts. Of the windows of this church, we may observe generally that they are of very elegant taste of design. The east end is so thickly matted with ivy, that the great window is nearly choked up, yet admits a few dispersed rays to fall with picturesque effect upon a tomb which tradition assigns to Donald More O'Brian, King of Limerick and founder of the abbey, but which judicious criticism and historical evidence unhesitatingly assert to be commemorative of either Eleanor, the wife of the fourth Earl of Desmond, or Elizabeth, the first wife of the fourth Earl of Ormonde. This monument is exceedingly beautiful,—indeed, is regarded by many as the most beautiful in Ireland; but it was much injured about 20 or 24 years ago by a party of recruits who, while on their march through the village, battered the canopy, pillars, and arches of the monument with the butt-ends of their muskets. Several other tombs are of very elegant character. The whole of the abbey is built of hard and durable black marble, well fitted to resist the erosion of the elements; but it has sadly suffered from dilapidation, and, though somewhat protected by the cares and art of its proprietor, it continues to be accessible by idle urchins who delight to leave their scratches on its sculpture. "The broken walls," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "afford easy access to intruders, as we can ourselves testify; for, during our visit, we saw a parcel of idle boys amusing themselves by pelting stones at the carved mullions and pillars, one of which had been very recently broken by a mischievous scoundrel, who must have exerted no inconsiderable strength to deface it." The abbey was founded in 1182, for Cistercian monks, by Donald More O'Brian; and is alleged to have had both its origin and its name from the circumstance of Pope Pascal II. sending to Donough O'Brian, monarch of Ireland, and grandson of Brian Boromh, a piece of the pretended wood of the true cross, encased with gold and set with precious stones. This relic was about 2½ inches long, and half-an-inch broad, but very thin; it was deposited in a shrine of the abbey, some curious remains of which still exist; and it is said by Camden and others, to have attracted the resort of an incredible number of pilgrims and devotees of all ranks in society. The abbey was endowed with peculiar privileges; its charter was confirmed by John, Henry III., Edward III., and Richard II.; and its abbot was a peer of parliament, and bore the title of Earl of Holycross. At the dissolution, the abbey and its possessions were granted to Gerald, Earl of Ormonde, in capite, at a rent of £15 10s. 4d. The main trunk railway, as projected by the Public Commissioners, comes within a statute mile of Holycross. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 126. Houses 18.—This parish is a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Cashel. Glebe, £35. The tithes are compounded for £242 12s. 5d., and are wholly inappropriate in C. Clark and W. B. Armstrong, Esqs. The perpetual curacies of Holycross and RATHKENNAN, and the rectory of GEAL [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Holycross. Pop., in 1831, 3,877. Gross income, £250 9s. 2½d.; nett, £202 19s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1821, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, from 60 to 70. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballycahill. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 98, and the Roman Catholics to 2,994; the Protestants of the union to 114, and the Roman Catholics to 3,224; and 4 daily schools in the union—all of which were in the parish, and one was salaried with £20 from the incumbent—had on their books 184 boys and 115 girls. In 1840, the National Board had a boys' school and a girls' school at Holycross.

HOLY ISLAND, an islet, south of the mountain called the Eagle's Nest, and situated in the stream which connects the Upper and the Middle Lakes of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster.

HONEY PARK, a village in the parish of Monkstown, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. Area, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 351. Houses 71.

HOOK, or HOOK, a parish, 4½ miles south-south-west of Fethard, and at the southern extremity of the barony of Shelburne, co. Wexford, and the province of Leinster. It contains the villages of CHURCHTOWN and SLADE: which see. Length, 2 miles; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 1,000 acres, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 489; in 1841, 523. Houses 86. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 181. Houses 26. The surface consists of good land, and forms the southern part of the long and narrow peninsula which screens the east side of Waterford Harbour. On the north border is the noble seat of LOFTUS HALL: which see. At the southern extremity, on a point of land high above the ocean, and overlooking the entrance to Waterford Harbour, stands the 'conspicuous landmark and useful beacon of Hook Tower or lighthouse. Several romantic stories are locally told respecting its origin; a favourite tradition ascribes it to Rose Macrume, the fair foundress of New Ross; see vague conjectures of learnedness dispose of it as a companion to the pillar-towers of Ireland; the continuator of Grose inclines to believe that it was erected by the Danes; and the Chevalier de Montmorency contends that its uncorrupted name is the Hougue Tower, and that the structure was founded by an Anglo-Norman knight, called Florence de la Hougue, who, in 1172, attended Henry II. into Ireland. The tower has extremely thick walls; and was eventually raised to the height of 100 feet, and converted into a lighthouse. Its summit commands a brilliant view of the coast, with its numerous creeks and bays, its bold barrier of rocks, and its flanking of islets which stud the surface of the ocean. During the year 1840, the lighthouse cost £786 10s. 4d.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ferns. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £36 5s. 7½d., and the rectorial for £48 7s. 6d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Marquis of Ely. The vicarage of Hook, and the inappropriate curacy of TEMPLETOWN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Hook. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3¼. Pop., in 1831, 1,876. Gross income, £44 11s. 9½d.; nett, £9 18s. 5½d. Patron, the Marquis of Ely. The incumbent holds also the united benefices of Killcubbeen and Mackully, in the dio. of Ossory. The church and the Roman Catholic chapel are situated in Templetown. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 32, and the Roman Catholics to 457; the Protestants of the union to 85, and the Roman Catholics to 1,747.

HORE-ABBEY, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, immediately adjacent to the south-west side of Cashel, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,520 acres, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 451; in 1841, 536. Houses 86. The whole of the surface is profitable land. The chief residences are Castle-Lake Cottage, Marvile, Ballynamona, and Beerpark. The abbey whence the parish has its name, is almost immediately overhung by the Rock of Cashel, and bears the alias appellation of St. Mary's Abbey of the Rock of Cashel. It was founded, in 1272, for Cisterrians, by David MacCarvill, archbishop of Cashel, and endowed with the revenues of the Benedictines, whom he expelled from an abbey on the Rock. The ruins are in good preservation, and nearly in the same state as when they were described in the following terms by Mr. Archdall: "The steeple is large, and about 20 feet square in the inside, which is supported by a variety of ogives from each angle, some meeting in an octagon in the centre, and others at the keystones of the vault, and the structure is supported by two fine arches, about 30 feet high. The choir or chapel which adjoins the east side of the steeple is about 29 feet in length, and 24 in breadth on the inside: the east window is small and plain, and in the sidewalls are some remains of stalls, &c. The nave is 60 feet in length, 23 in breadth, and on each side was an arcade of 3 Gothic arches, the north side whereof is levelled with lateral aisles, which were about 13 feet broad. Between this and the steeple is a part, but we are equally ignorant as to its name and the use it was applied to; it is 31 feet in length, of the same breadth with the nave, and divided from the steeple by a plain wall; on each side are similar arcades of two arches only, and this opens with the west arch of the steeple. On the south side of the steeple is a small door leading into an open part, about 30 feet long and 24 broad; the side walls are much broken, and in the gable end is a long window; there is a similar division on the north side of the steeple. Here is a small, low, arched apartment which seems to have been a confessional, as there are niches in the walls, with holes," &c.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition and gross income, £166 3s.; nett, £157 11s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the perpetual curacy of Mogorban in the dio. of Cashel. A curate for Hore-Abbey receives a salary of £5 for performing the occasional duties. There is no church. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 496; and a pay daily school had on its books 55 boys and 20 girls.

HORETOWN, a parish in the barony of West Shelmalier, 2¼ miles south-west of Taghmon, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 3¼ miles; breadth, 2¼; area, 3,991 acres, 27 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,149; in 1841, 1,262. Houses 219. The land is, for the most part, of second-rate quality. The road from Taghmon to Ballyhack passes through the interior. Horetown-house, the seat of Jacob Goff, Esq., stands on an eminence, in the midst of flourishing plantations, near the village of Foulksmill; and Tottenham Green, the seat of Lord Robert Tottenham, stands on the east border, about a mile from Taghmon. The other chief residences are Raheen-duff, Dalton, Hillburn, and Cullenstown. A Carmelite monastery was founded at Little Horetown, in the 14th century, by the family of Furlong, formerly proprietors of the Horetown estate, but now extinct in the male line; and after the dissolution, this monastery was granted to Sir John Davis, and passed successively to the families of Talbot and Goff.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £213 6s. 10d. The rectories of Horetown and KILGARVAN, the vicarages of INCH and BALLYLENNAN, and the appropriate curacies of DONOWNY and BALLYINGLY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Horetown. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 2¼. Pop., in 1831, 3,599. Gross income, £483 6s. 3½d.; nett, £406 13s. 11½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also a vicar-choralship in the cathedral of Lismore. The church is of unknown date. Sitings 350; attendance 80. The Horetown Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 470; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Adamstown and Newbawn. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Kilgarvan. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 69, and the Roman Catholics to 1,089; the Protestants of the union to 168, and the Roman Catholics to 3,487; a Protestant Sunday school was attended by about 20 children; and 4 pay daily schools in the union—3 of which were in the parish—had an average attendance of 310 scholars.

HORN-HEAD, a promontory in the barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. The "horn," or protuberance whence its name is derived, screens the south side of the entrance of Sheephaven; but the entire promontory, or rather peninsula, extends 3¼ miles north-eastward between the Atlantic and Dunfanaghy Harbour, has an extreme breadth of 1¼ mile, and is connected with the mainland at the head of Dunfanaghy harbour by an isthmus of no great breadth. The whole of this peninsula, amounting to upwards of 1,000 acres, is one enormous well-stocked rabbit-warren, the property of W. Stewart, Esq., of Horn-Head House; and the precipitous cliffs of the seaward extremity are the summer resort of countless millions of the gull, the gannet, the penguin, the petrel, the albatross, and numerous other aquatic fowls that live and sleep upon the ocean. Though the highest summit has an altitude of only 833 feet above sea-level, the cliffs are such a mixture of precipices, shelving descents, and yawning caverns, and are so terrifically lashed by the long and tremendous swell of the Atlantic, as to possess very great sublimity of character. "Did Shakspeare," says the Rev. Caesar Otway, "see these enormous battlements of Ireland? No; but he could fancy what his eye had not seen. Dover cliff, of which he gives such a sublime description, is perhaps magnified in his imagery; but certainly I conceive Horn-Head comes up to his representation. One would think the muse had caught up from Stratford-upon-Avon the poet of nature, and dropped him on this mighty promontory, until he had made up in his mind's eye the whole magnificent scene. * * Nothing indeed could be more astonishing than the whole scene. There was a mist hanging over the Atlantic that gave a mysteriousness to its magnificence; like the way into the eternal world, 'shadows, clouds, and darkness rested upon it.' There was no wind, it was a perfect calm, and yet the roll of the waves and the roar of the tides, as they rushed and rolled amid the caverned cliffs, communicated an awful grandeur to the whole scene. It was as the morn of suffering endurance, under the ceaseless vexation of the Atlantic." Horn-Head House is situated outside of the peninsula, and in the vicinity of Dunfanaghy.

HORSE ISLAND, an islet at the west side of the entrance of Castlehaven Harbour, 2 miles south of Castletownsend, co. Cork, Munster. A tower has been erected on it as a landmark to vessels.

HORSE ISLAND, an islet in Roaring-Water bay, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile west-north-west of Ringrove, co. Cork, Munster. It comprises an area of upwards of 90 acres, and contains copper ores of considerable value.

HORSE ISLAND, an islet about the middle of the west side of Ballinakelligs bay, barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster.

HORSELEAP, a village. See ARDNORCHER.

HORSEPASSBRIDGE, a village, 4 miles south-south-west of Blessington, and on the western verge of the barony of Talbotstown and county of Wicklow, Leinster.

HORSE-SHOE, an insulated rock in the barony of Carlow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It lies about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile east of the nearest part of the mainland, and $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile south of Wicklow Head.

HORTLAND. See BALLYSKULLOGH.

HOSPITAL, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Small County, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 3,999 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,061; in 1841, 2,538. Houses 368. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,930; in 1841, 1,757. Houses 239. It lies on the eastern margin of the county, at the watershed between the basins of the Shannon and the Suir; yet it consists, for the most part, of good land. The village of Hospital stands on the road from Bruff to Tipperary, 4 miles east of Bruff, and 9 west of Tipperary. Fairs are held on May 10, July 9, Sept. 8, and Oct. 30, and are distinguished for their shows of horses and cattle. Though upwards of 2 miles north-east of Aney, the village is usually designated in old records the Hospital of Aney. "A commandery for Knights Hospitallers," says Archdall, "was founded here, under the invocation of St. John the Baptist, in the reign of King John, by Geoffrey de Mariscis, who was chief governor of Ireland in the year 1215. Queen Elizabeth granted this hospital and its possessions to Sir Valentine Brown, who erected a magnificent castle on the site of the same, which castle is now in ruins. The walls of the ancient church yet remain; and, in a niche on the north side of the high altar, is the tomb of a knight in alto relievo, which is said to be the tomb of the founder." Area of the village, 31 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,131; in 1841, 781. Houses 129. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 52; in manufactures and trade, 84; in other pursuits, 26. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 84; on their own manual labour, 56; on means not specified, 19.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ANEY [which see], in the dio. of Emly; but, though called a vicarage, it is wholly inappropriate, and its tithes are compounded for £395, and belong to J. D. Freeman, Esq. of Castlecor. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 3,178; and a hedge-school was usually attended by about 70 children.

HOW-STRAND, a coast-guard and a fishing station, in the barony of Courceys, between Courtmacsherry Harbour and the Old Head of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. The number of fishermen within the coast-guard district is about 290; and the fishing-craft used by them are almost exclusively row-boats.

HOWTH,

A parish in the extreme east of the barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles; breadth, 2; area, 2,609 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches. But this area includes 58 acres, 24 perches in IRLAND'S EYE: which see. Pop., in 1831, 1,707; in 1841, 1,538. Houses 282. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 910; in 1841, 846. Houses 152. It screens the outer part of the north side of Dublin bay, forms a peninsula of curious and picturesque character, and contains a village, a large artificial harbour, an old abbey, a castle, a noble demesne, and one or two other objects of prominent interest; and these we shall notice in a short series of paragraphs.—This parish is a prebend, and, though called merely a curacy, is practically a rectory, in the dio. of Dublin; and, jointly with the curacies of BALDOYLE and KILBARRACK [see these articles], it constitutes the benefice of Howth. Length, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles; breadth, 2. Pop., in 1831, 3,084. Gross income, £231 0s. 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ d.; nett, £165 17s. 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The tithes of Howth and Kilbarrack are compounded for £231 0s. 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ d., and constitute the incumbent's gross income; and the tithes of Baldoyle are in abeyance, and seem to be disputed in claim between the corporation of Dublin and the incumbent. The church was built in 1815, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d., and a gift of £738 9s. 2 $\frac{1}{4}$ d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 180; attendance, from 120 to 180. The Howth and Baldoyle Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 900 and 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Kinseely. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 297, and the Roman Catholics to 1,395; the Protestants of the union to 337, and the Roman Catholics to 2,593; 5 daily schools in the parish had on their books 173 boys and 158 girls; and these schools and 3 in Baldoyle had 243 boys and 219 girls. Each of two of the Howth schools was salaried with £20 from the National Board; and each of other two, with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and a sum not named from subscription and a charity sermon.

The Peninsula.—The peninsula of Howth is connected with the mainland in the vicinity of the village of Baldoyle, by a low sandy isthmus of about half-a-mile in breadth; and extends, in an east-south-easterly direction, to the length of $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles. The character and the breadth of the isthmus, though with a slight and progressive increase of the latter, continue for some distance along the peninsula; and then the surface expands from narrowness and heaves up from tameness, to form the bold and stupendous nodule of cliff and rock and upland called the Hill of Howth. This hill constitutes the outer and by far the broader part of the peninsula; it terminates toward the sea in a semicircular sweep of very bold and beetling coast; and it figures, in nearly every view of the bay of Dublin, as the most imposing and romantic feature of a famed and gorgeous landscape. It measures about 2 miles in length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ in breadth, 1,772 acres in area, and 563 feet in altitude; it drops nearly sheer down to the sea, on its south and east sides, in cliffs and precipices; it presents an impressive picture at a part of its rocky skirts, afterwards to be noticed, where its natural pinnacles, called the Needles, stand as sentinel-posts to its lighthouse; and it blends, on the north, with the near islands of Ireland's Eye and Lambay, the receding coast of Nethercross and Balrothery, and the far-away mountains of Mourne, to form one of the grandest coast landscapes which ever painter copied on canvass. The low parts of the peninsula consist, in general, of good and well-cultivated soil; and the Hill of Howth consists mixedly of arable grounds and moorland pasture,—the latter lying principally along the higher elevations. Quartz rock and clay slate constitute the main part of the hill; and, while they overlie one another in no fewer than twelve great and very many small alternations, they occasionally fuse into each other, so as to enclose a rock of intermediate character. A huge bed of porphyritic greenstone runs from the water's edge on the south side into the heart of the hill, and then separates into two smaller and gradually diverging veins. A bed of dolomite, accompanied by a greyish limestone, looks up near the harbour, sweeps round the base of the promontory, and reappears near Sutton, where it is quarried, and whence it was formerly exported to England for the sake of its magnesian earth; and out of this dolomite Dr. Henry of Manchester manufactured his well-known patent magnesia, so famous for the fortune it is understood to have yielded to himself, and the confiding place assigned to it among the medicines of the nursery. The Hill of Howth is believed to have been once covered with wood; and its plants possess as much interest for the botanist, as its rocks and its minerals for the geologist and the mineralogist.

The Village.—The village, or—as Irish taste and custom require it rather to be called—the town of Howth extends along the north side of the hill, 7 miles east-north-east of Dublin. It consists chiefly of one long street; and, though not long ago spruce and prosperous in appearance, it seems now half forsaken and desolate; for it became a place of great public resort and of much bustle and promise during the years of its being the place of embarkation with the packet-vessels of England; and, when Kingstown burst into favour, and attracted the steam-ships, and took firm hold of Dublin by its fine railway, Howth became neglected, and was allowed to decline suddenly from the status of the chief packet-station of the kingdom to that of little more than a mere fishing-village. Yet it continues, in connection with the romance of its situation, the striking artificial objects which adjoin it, the fascinating properties of rock and plant and surface in its neighbourhood, and the splendid views which vantage-grounds in its vicinity command of Dublin bay and the adjacent coasts, to possess strong interest for persons of taste and science. Strangers who first set foot here upon Irish soil, feel their fancy stirred and not a little stimulated, and conclude that they have entered a country altogether worthy of their zealous investigation; and even the citizens of Dublin resort frequently hither for the purposes both of feasting the imagination, and revelling in the fashionable luxuries of pleasure-excursions, horse-racings, and miscellaneous amusements. In the main street of the town are a Roman Catholic chapel and a hotel,—the latter now or lately unoccupied; at the east end is the parish-church; in the centre are the ruins of the old abbey; adjacent to the town is the large artificial harbour; and, in the near vicinity is Howth-castle, the residence of the Earl of Howth. The Howth and Baldoyle dispensary is within the North Dublin Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 3,722; and, in 1839, it expended £93 11s., and administered to 1,502 patients. Area of the village, 35 acres. Pop., in 1831, 797; in 1841, 692. Houses 130. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 25; in manufactures and trade, 85; in other pursuits, 39. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 36; on their own manual labour, 94; on means not specified, 15.

The Harbour.—Howth harbour is sheltered on the north by Ireland's Eye, distant about a mile. Its site was selected by government, in 1807, as suitable for a Packet and Asylum Harbour; and its plan was originally designed by Mr. Rennie, but subsequently carried out by Mr. Telford. The works cost, from July 1807 till January 1832, no less a sum than £420,472; and, including contingent and additional expenses, as well as the cost of preservation down to 1843, they may be estimated, in round numbers, to have gulped down half a million of money. Yet they have been practically condemned as totally useless for their intended purposes; and, regarded in even the most favourable light, they yield an utterly shabby and utterly ridiculous compensation for the enormous cost of their construction. The western pier is 2,700 feet in length; the eastern pier consists of three limbs, of respectively 1,200, 200, and 860 feet in length; and these two piers leave an entrance opening between their jetties of 320 feet, and enclose an area of 52 statute acres. The base of the western pier is 130 feet broad, and its causeway is 40 feet; and the base of the eastern pier is 200 broad, and its carriage-way 50 feet. The low water depth at the entrance is 11 feet; and the tide rises from 9 to 12 feet. The harbour does not admit vessels of great draught; yet, had it been constructed a furlong farther east, it might have given shelter and anchorage in either ebb or flood, to the largest ships of the British navy. Much expense was incurred in raising rocks from the bottom, by means of the diving-bell; but all was money thrown away; for the harbour is still encumbered with much rock, it is rapidly filling with sand, and even the entrance to it is not clear or quite safe. The best anchorage is outside of the harbour; and one-half of the space enclosed within the piers is dry at half-ebb, and two-thirds at low water. On the extremity of the east pier is a lighthouse, displaying a red light. But the great lighthouse of Howth, called that of the Bailey or Green Bailey, stands at the extremity of the peninsula, on a lofty and precipitous rock, which has the form of a frustrated cone, is almost insulated, and communicates with the mainland by a bridge. This object, as seen from almost any point of view, is very beautiful; and, particularly as seen from the mainland, through the vista between the two remarkable pinnacled rocks known to seamen as "the Needles" or "the Candlesticks," it stands so boldly among the waves, and so completely commands both the southern and the eastern iron-bound cliffs of the great promontory, and blends so finely with wave and precipice and acuminated rock in the formation of a romantic picture, as to have a most imposing effect. An ancient circular fortress or "ballium," popularly ascribed to the Danes, crowned the conoidal rock previous to the construction of the lighthouse, and bequeathed to the place the name of "the Bailey." The lighthouse was erected by the Ballast Board in 1814; the light is 110 feet above the level of the sea, and is visible in clear weather at the distance of 17 nautical miles; the illumination is produced by a set of reflectors, ground to the parabolic form, and having placed in their foci 20 large oil lamps; and around the dome is a lightly but securely railed outer-gallery. During the year 1840, the Bailey lighthouse cost £638 10s. 7d.; and the lighthouse on the pier cost £328 5s. 4d. A former lighthouse, called "the Howth Light," stood on an elevation to the north of the Bailey, at an altitude of 300 feet above sea-level; but being often involved in mist and clouds, it was abandoned.—Howth Harbour is so suitable at every state of the tide for fishing-craft, and so conveniently situated for access both to the fishing-grounds and to Dublin market, that it speedily became the rendezvous of all the boats engaged in immediate subserviency to Dublin. "The fish," says Mr. Nimmo, "are carried from hence by land-carriage to Dublin, and the boats are enabled to put to sea again without delay. Though this be not the only cause of the late great reduction in the price of fish in Dublin market, yet certainly it must have materially contributed thereto. And I think it would not be going too far to say, that this very reduction will in a few years compensate for the whole expense of Howth harbour." In 1835, the fishing-craft within the coast-guard station of Howth and Baldoyle amounted to 16 decked vessels of aggregately 574 tons with 131 men, 5 half-decked vessels of aggregately 46 tons with 28 men, and 10 row-boats with aggregately 50 men.

Ecclesiastical Antiquities.—"Howth Abbey" is a popular name loosely but conveniently applied to a cluster of ecclesiastical ruins near the middle of the village. The chief is the ruin of a collegiate church, dedicated to St. Mary, and believed to have been built during the prelacy of Archbishop Luke, who was appointed to the see of Dublin in 1228. Six pointed arches, three of which are smaller and less ancient than the other three, divide the church into two aisles; some of the windows are round-headed, and some are pointed; the principal entrance is by a circular doorway; and the steeple or belfry is ascended by a flight of steps constructed on its exterior. The most ancient sepulchral monument in the church is ornamented with a crosier and a cross-florée, and seems commemorative of an abbot; and the most interesting is an altar-tomb to the memory of the thirteenth Baron of Lowth and his lady. Adjacent to the church are some decaying walls of a monastic edifice, probably founded by the St. Laurence family, but not noticed in authentic record; and at a short distance are the vestiges of a building, locally called the College, some ruinous apartments and recesses of which were occupied not long ago as the sad and chilly homes of several poor families. These ecclesiastical ruins are encompassed by an embattled wall, with a double or graduated parapet, so as to exhibit a mixture of military and ecclesiastical character; and they occupy so conspicuous and romantic a situation, impending over the sea, as to form a principal object in the first view of Howth. In a secluded vale on the east side of the Hill of Howth are the remains of a cromlech, the covering stone of which has fallen on one side to the ground.

The Castle.—The Castle of Howth is agreeably situated at the base of the Hill of Howth, amidst a fine mass of ornamental wood, which climbs the hill till its further progress is arrested by a bold and rocky escarpment; and in front of it is a well-stocked deer-park, several points of which command sea-views of striking grandeur. The castle is an old and spacious pile, altered at different periods, and exhibiting incongruities of style, and inattention to architectural beauty; but may be described as a long battlemented structure, flanked by square towers, and approached by a large flight of steps. The interior is commodious rather than splendid; the hall of entrance extends along the whole front of the building, and is ornamented with weapons and armour of ancient days; and the saloon contains, among other works of art, a curious full-length portrait of Dean Swift, painted by Bindon in 1735, and representing Wood, the "Goliath armed in brass," abject and agonized at Swift's feet. The estate attached to the castle extends over the whole of Howth peninsula, and has been in possession of the St. Laurence family during considerably upwards of six centuries. Sir Armoricus Tristram, the founder of that family, ranked as one of the most courageous of the Anglo-Norman invaders; and, in 1177, debarked at Howth, in conjunction with Sir John de Courcey, and at the head of a body of bold followers. In an engagement which speedily took place with the natives, at the bridge of Evora, on the north side of Howth, he obtained a signal victory, lost seven near relatives, and was rewarded with the lands and the baronial title of Howth; and a two-handed sword, with which he is alleged to have hewn down his antagonists in the fight, is preserved among the old weapons in the entrance-hall of the castle. The occasion of the change of the family name to St. Laurence is not very satisfactorily ascertained; but it is usually supposed to have been the obtaining of some subsequent victory on the festival of St. Laurence. Sir Armoricus Tristram was the brother-in-law of Sir John de Courcey; and was killed, in 1189, in a battle with O'Connor, King of Connaught. His eldest son succeeded him as second Baron of Howth; and his descendant, the twenty-seventh Baron, was, in 1767, created Viscount St. Laurence and Earl of Howth.—George IV. landed at Howth on Aug. 12, 1821.

HUGGINSTOWN, a village in the parish of Aughaviller, barony of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on the eastern margin of the parish, 3 miles south-south-west of Knocktopher; and it has a Roman Catholic chapel and a constabulary station. Several cattle-fairs are held. Area, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 283; in 1841, 273. Houses 56.

HUNGRY HILL, a mountain in the barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated 2½ miles west-north-west of the head of Ardagh bay, a creek of Bantry bay, 3½ miles east-north-east of Castletown-Berehaven, and 12½ miles, in a straight line, west-north-west of Bantry. It has an altitude of 2,249 feet; it rises up, first in rocky, rugged, and steep acclivities, and then in a soaring and alpine precipice; and it is celebrated for a stupendous waterfall which it flings from a lake on its summit. The stream falls toward the east-south-east so as to place its sublime cascade right in the view of Bantry; and it afterwards courses to the south, so as to embouch at the head of Ardagh bay. The upper part of the mountain, down one-third or even more than one-third of its entire descent, is so mural, that the stream falls sheer over it, without break or obstruction; and afterwards it descends so archly and brokenly in huge projecting knolls of rock, that the stream "thunders on its impetuous course, a broad torrent of foam, and mist, and refracted sunbeams, from height to height, till it gains the declivity of the mountain base, from which it tumbles into the bay." After a heavy fall of rain, the cascade and the cataract form a noble and impressive object, even to spectators 12½ miles away at Bantry, or to persons on board of vessels sailing near the head of Bantry bay.

HULIN ROCKS, a cluster of rocks in the North Channel, 6½ miles north-east by north of Larne, and 7 miles east by south of Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster.

HUNTINGDON, a demesne in the vicinity of Clonegall, and on the west border of the barony of Scarewalsh, and co. Wexford, Leinster. The mansion is in the corrupted style of castellated architecture which prevailed in the early part of the 17th century; and was built by Sir Laurence Esmond, the second baronet of his family, and named after the seat of his ancestors in Lincolnshire. It eventually passed from the Esmonds to Sir Edward Lesley, Bart., of Tarbert; and was leased to the predecessor of its present occupant, Dr. Durdin.

HUNTLY GLEN, a dell in the basin of the Bann, a little below the town of Banbridge, district of Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. Here is a large thread-spinning factory; and at Seapatrick, in its vicinity, is an extensive establishment for weaving union cloth by machinery.

HY-BRASSIL, or HY-BRAZIL, a fictitious island, rich, fertile, and of great extent, far out in the Atlantic ocean. A belief in its existence, and a concurrence as to its name, may be traced along the whole western coast of Ireland from Hornhead in co. Donegal to Mizenhead in co. Cork. Both popular tradition and old Irish poetry describe it as "a country of perpetual sunshine, abounding in broad havens and noble rivers, in forests, mountains, and lakes; castles and palaces arise on every hill-side, or beetle above winding streams; and as far as the eye can reach, it is covered with delightful groves, and bowers embracing soft and silent glades, presenting to the happy beholder scenes and vistas of surpassing loveliness, and filling the soul with dreams of beauty and of wonder." The popular belief in such a place among the rude peasantry of "the wild and far west," while indicating in one view their enslavement to legendary absurdity, indicates as distinctly in another view the poetic tendency of their mind, and the picturesque character of the scenery around their homes. In the ancient topography of Ireland, there were two districts of the name of Hy-Brassil,—the one in the territory of Ophaly, and the other, now Clanbrassil, in Armagh.

HY-CONALL, the old name of the baronies of Upper and Lower Connello, co. Limerick, Munster.

HYDEPARK, the site of extensive print-works, 6 miles from Belfast, near the east road thence to Ballymoney, co. Antrim, Ulster. Mr. Atkinson, noticing these works, in 1823, says that they were reputed to be the most extensive in Ulster, that they could annually bleach and print 50,000 pieces of calico, and that the sum of £26,000 was said to have been expended on them, within a few years before he wrote, in buildings, machinery, and utensils.

HY-FALGIA, the old name of the baronies of Ophaly, co. Kildare, Leinster.

HY-KINSELAGH, an old territory on the coast of Leinster. It included the present barony of Gorey in co. Wexford, and part of the baronies of Shillelagh and Arklow in co. Wicklow. The family of O'Kinselagh, who ruled it as princes or toparchs, were descendants of Morough, and a younger brother of Dermot MacMorough, king of Leinster. Morough O'Kinselagh was supreme lord of the territory in 1169, and always took part with the Anglo-Norman invaders. His descendants took their designation from the district, till they were dispossessed partly at the distribution of Ireland into counties by Queen Elizabeth, and finally, in 1606, by James I.; and so totally have they been abased, that now not one individual of the legitimate line of the former princes of Leinster is to be found in a higher station than that of a petty shopkeeper, or a small farmer.

HY-MEITHTIRE, the former name of the baronies of Upper and Lower Orier, co. Armagh, Ulster.

HYNE (LOUGH). See HINE.

HY-TUIRTRE, the former name of a small territory, on the east shore of Lough-Neagh, co. Antrim, Ulster.

IBANE AND BARRYROE, an united barony on the coast of the county of Cork, Munster. It is bounded on the east, south, and south-west, by the sea, and, on other sides, by Carbery. Its greatest length west-south-westward is 10 miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 7½; and its area is 35,291 acres. It forms two peninsulæ, that of Ibane on the west between Ross Harbour and Clonakilty bay, and that of Barryroe on the east between Clonakilty bay and Courtmacsherry bay; and these peninsulæ are mutually separated even at their head by the intersection of a tongue of land containing the town of Clonakilty, and terminating at the head of Clonakilty bay. The coast is indented with many navigable creeks, and has several sandy strands, which are rich in sea-manure. The name Ibane signifies "the fair territory," and seems to have been adopted in invidious contrast to the adjoining rough country of Carbery; and this "fair territory" was originally under the sway of the Carbery princes, and, after the Conquest, was wrested from its old proprietors by Lord Arundel, and passed from him to the Barrymore family. Barryroe anciently belonged to the O'Cowigs, who were subject to the princes of Carbery, and became extinguished soon after the Conquest; and it passed to a branch of the Barry family, and took from them its present designation.—The barony of Ibane and Barryroe contains the whole of the parishes of Abbeymahon, Ardfield, Kilsillagh, Donaghmore, Lislee, and Templeomalus; and part of the parishes of Castle-Ventry, Dysert Island, Kilgariff, Kilkeranmore, Rathbarry, Kilmeen, Rosscarbery, Templequinlan, and Timoleague. The towns are Timoleague and Courtmaesherry. Pop., in 1831, 23,164; in 1841, 24,349. Houses 4,092. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,408; in manufactures and trade, 469; in other pursuits, 367. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,603; who could read but not write, 546; who could neither read nor write, 8,553. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 802; who could read but not write, 586; who could neither read nor write, 9,256.—This barony is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Bandon, Dunmanway, and Skibbereen. The total number of tenements valued is 2,020; and of these, 678 were valued under £5,—389, under £10,—281, under £15,—192, under £20,—146, under £25,—99, under £30,—102, under £40,—60, under £50,—and 73, at and above £0.

IBERCON. See IDA.

IBERIUS (ST.), a parish on the south coast of the barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. It contains the village of BROADWAY: which see. The surface lies at the head of Lough Ta, and consists in general of very good land. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 891 acres. Pop., in 1831, 543; in 1841, 528. Houses 106. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 383; in 1841, 408. Houses 81.—This parish is an impropriate curacy in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes belonging to the curate are compounded for £36 18s. 5½d., and the rectorial tithes for £22 18s. 11d.; and the latter belong to the Earl of Portsmouth. The impropriate curacies of St. Iberius and St. Mary's Island constitute the benefice of St. Iberius. See MARY'S ISLAND (ST.). Pop., in 1831, 782. Gross income, £56 18s. 5½d.; nett, £55 1s. 6½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is also stipendiary curate of the adjoining parish of Kilscoran. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in St. Mary's Island. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 86, and the Roman Catholics to 421; the Protestants of the union to 93, and the Roman Catholics to 688; and there was a daily school in St. Mary's Island.

IBERIUS (ST.), a parish in the north corner of the barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. Area, 15 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches. It forms civilly a part of the borough of Wexford, and ecclesiastically a part of the benefice of St. Patrick's of Wexford. See WEXFORD.

IBRICKANE, a barony on the coast of co. Clare, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by Corcomroe; on the east, by Inchiquin, Islands, and Clonderalaw; on the south, by Moyarta; and on the west, by the Atlantic. Its greatest length south-south-westward is 15 miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 8; and its area is 57,028 acres, 8 perches,—of which 508 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches are water. The southern part is almost all bog; and the northern part is a mixture of very deteriorated argillaceous arable land with pastoral uplands and very improveable moorish hills. On the north-east boundary is Mount Callan; and off the coast are Mutton and Enniskerry Islands. The chief marine indentation is Doonbeg bay; and while nearly all the coast is bold and iron-bound, some portions of it exhibit highly-imposing scenery.—This barony contains part of the parish of Kilmacduane, and the whole of the parishes of Kilfarboy, Killard, and Kilmurray, the town of Miltown-Malbay, and the villages of Doonbeg, Kilmurray, and Mullagh. Pop., in 1831, 20,451; in 1841, 25,166. Houses 3,912. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,411; in manufactures and trade, 608; in other pursuits, 243. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,267; who could read but not write, 864; who could neither read nor write, 6,810. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,092; who could read but not write, 885; who could neither read nor write, 8,888.—Ibrickane is partly in the Poor-law union of Ennistymon, and partly in that of Kilrush. The total number of tenements valued is 2,697; and of these, 1,397 were valued under £5,—801, under £10,—265, under £15,—94, under £20,—60, under £25,—21, under £30,—25, under £40,—12, under £50,—and 22, at and above £50.

ICANE. See ISLAND-ICANE.

IDA, IGRIN, AND IBERCON, an united barony, in the south-east of the county of Kilkenny, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Gowran; on the east, by the river Barrow, which divides it from the counties of Carlow and Wexford; on the south, by the river Suir, which divides it from the county of Waterford; and on the west, by the baronies of Iverk and Knocktopher. Its greatest length, in a direction a little west of south, is 16½ miles; its greatest breadth is 6½; and its area is 61,703 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches,—of which 1,596 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches are fresh water, and respectively 1,019 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches, 237 acres, 37 perches, and 314 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches are tideway in the Barrow, the Nore, and the Suir. Ida proper forms a district of 5½ miles by 5½ in the north, has Brandon mountain on its boundary with Gowran, and is divided from Igrin and Ibercon by the river Nore. Most of that part of the united barony which comprises the parishes of Gaulskill and Dunkit consists of excellent land on a limestone bottom; and most of the remainder consists of low and slaty hills, covered by a light, dry, argillaceous soil, rarely moorish, and generally very productive, after calcareous manure.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Jerpoint-West, Listerling, and Rossinan, and the whole of the parishes of Ballygurrin, Cluin, Dysertmoon, Dunkit, Gaulskill, Kilbride, Kilcoan, Kilcolm, Kilmakevogo, Rathpatrick, Rosshercon, Rower, and Shambo. The chief villages are Tullagher, Ballygub, Ballinamona, Ballinerea, and Rosshercon. Pop., in 1831, 18,647; in 1841, 20,869. Houses 3,108. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,552; in manufactures and trade, 365; in other pursuits, 299. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,713; who could read but not write, 1,612; who could neither read nor write, 4,616. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,044; who could read but not write, 1,859; who could neither read nor write, 6,359. Ida, Igrin, and Ibercon barony lies partly in the Poor-law union of New-Ross, and partly in that of Waterford. The total number of tenements valued is 2,377; and of these, 630 were valued under £5,—455, under £10,—401 under £15,—256, under £20,—168, under £25,—115 under £30,—135, under £40,—74, under £50,—and 143, at and above £50.

IDOUGH. See CASTLE-COMER.

IDRONE (EAST and WEST), two baronies of the county of Carlow, Leinster. They are bounded, on the north, by Queen's county and the barony of Carlow; on the north-east, by the barony of Forth; on the east, by the county of Wexford; on the south, by the barony of St. Mullins; and on the west, by the county of Kilkenny. Their greatest length, from north-west to south-east, is 15½ miles.

and their greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 8. Area of East Idrone, 52,857 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches,—of which 138 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches are in the river Barrow. Area of West Idrone, 23,066 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch,—of which 110 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches are in the river Barrow. The river Barrow, running southward, first separates West Idrone from Carlow barony and East Idrone, and then divides East Idrone from co. Kilkenny. The eastern declivities of the Castle-Comer mountains occupy the western district of West Idrone, and Mount Leinster occupies the extreme east of East Idrone; but the greater part of the remainder of the baronies consists of good and fertile land.—The barony of East Idrone contains part of the parishes of Ballyellin, Fenagh, Killinane, Myshall, Ullart, and Nurney; and the whole of the parishes of Augha, Clonegoose, Dunleckney, Kiltennell, Lorum, and Slyguff. Its towns are Borris, Bagnalstown, and part of Leighlin-bridge; and its chief villages are Ballynocken, Killedmund, and Nurney. Pop., in 1831, 19,664; in 1841, 20,765. Houses 3,492. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,754; in manufactures and trade, 711; in other pursuits, 323. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,675; who could read but not write, 1,882; who could neither read nor write, 3,300. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,202; who could read but not write, 2,972; who could neither read nor write, 4,257. This barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Carlow. The total number of tenements valued is 3,333; and of these, 1,809 were valued under £5,—514, under £10,—275, under £15,—172, under £20,—96, under £25,—62, under £30,—133, under £40,—61, under £50,—and 211, at and above £50.—The barony of West Idrone contains part of the parishes of Cloydagh, Killinane, and Wells; and the whole of the parishes of Old Leighlin and Tullowcrine. Its only town is part of Leighlin-bridge; and its chief villages are Royal Oak and Old Leighlin. Pop., in 1831, 8,081; in 1841, 8,435. Houses 1,404. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,111; in manufactures and trade, 208; in other pursuits, 146. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,594; who could read but not write, 1,028; who could neither read nor write, 1,027. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 907; who could read but not write, 1,499; who could neither read nor write, 1,350. This barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Carlow. The total number of tenements valued is 1,059; and of these, 416 were valued under £5,—209, under £10,—116, under £15,—103, under £20,—59, under £25,—45, under £30,—29, under £40,—26, under £50,—and 56, at and above £50.

IFFA AND OFFA (EAST AND WEST), two baronies in the south of co. Tipperary, Munster. They are bounded on the north by the baronies of Clanwilliam, Middlethird, and Slieveardagh; on the east, by co. Kilkenny; on the south, by co. Waterford; and on the west, by the counties of Cork and Limerick. Their length, from east to west, is 26 miles; and their breadth varies between 2½ and 12½. Area of East Iffa and Offa, 57,219 acres, 5 perches; of which 84 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches are tideway of the river Suir, and 255 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches are fresh water. Area of West Iffa and Offa, 117,175 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches; of which 257 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches are water. The western and very considerably the broader district consists, to the extent of 9 or 10 miles, of the southern declivities of the Galtie mountains, the northern declivities of the Knockmeledown mountains, and the intervening valley; and the greater part of the remainder of the baronies consists of the richest sweep, or rather series of sweeps, of "the golden vale" of the Suir. The Lingay rivulet traces the boundary with co. Kilkenny; and the Suir comes down upon the barony at the eastern termination of the Galtie mountains, runs 8 miles southward and south-south-eastward across its interior, and then makes a sudden deflection to the north, and thence, for 4 miles northward and 12½ eastward, traces the boundary with Waterford to the confluence of the Lingay. The barony of West Iffa and Offa contains part of the parish of Cahir, and the whole of the parishes of Ardfinane, Ballybacon, Derrygrath, Molough, Mortlestown, Neddins, Newcastle, Rochestown, Shanrahan, Templetenny, Tubrid, Tullaghorton, Tullamellon, and Whitechurch. Its towns are Cahir, Clogheen, and Ballyporeen; and its chief villages are Ardfinane and Newcastle. Pop., in 1831, 40,192; in 1841, 43,694. Houses 6,833. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 5,696; in manufactures and trade, 1,160; in other pursuits, 482. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 6,267; who could read but not write, 2,118; who could neither read nor write, 10,675. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,874; who could read but not write, 2,271; who could neither read nor write, 13,947. This barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Clogheen. The total number of tenements valued is 7,295; and of these, 4,782 were valued under £5,—1,068, under £10,—509, under £15,—278, under £20,—184, under £25,—117, under £30,—121, under £40,—59, under £50,—and 177 at and above £50. The barony of East Iffa and Offa contains part of the parishes of Donaghmore, Garran-Gibbon, Newtown-Lennan, Innislounoughy, Killoloan, Kilsheelan, and St. Mary's of Clonmel; and the whole of the parishes of Ballyoleraghan, Carrick, Kilgrant, Kitegan, Kilcash, Kilmurry, Lisronogh, Newchapel, Rathronan, and Temple-Etny. Its towns are Abbey, and the principal parts of Clonmel, and Carrick-on-Suir; and its chief villages are Ballyoleraghan, Toberaheena, Kilcash, and Kilsheelan. Pop., in 1831, 38,702; in 1841, 41,696. Houses 5,650. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,802; in manufactures and trade, 2,905; in other pursuits, 1,292. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 7,887; who could read but not write, 2,357; who could neither read nor write, 7,095. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,684; who could read but not write, 3,584; who could neither read nor write, 11,160. This barony is partly in the Poor-law union of Clonmel, and partly in that of Carrick-on-Suir. The total number of tenements valued, exclusive of the borough of Clonmel, is 4,059; and of these, 2,221 were valued under £5,—542, under £10,—283, under £15,—188, under £20,—130, under £25,—116, under £30,—142, under £40,—113, under £50,—and 324, at and above £50.

IGHTERMURROUGH, a parish in the barony of Imokilly, 2½ miles east-south-east of Castle-Martyr, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of LADIES'-BRIDGE, and part of the town of CASTLE-MARTYR: see these articles. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,556 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,627; in 1841, 3,092. Houses 497. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,396; in 1841, 2,349. Houses 384. The surface is watered by the Dower rivulet; and consists, for the most part, of excellent tillage land. On the west border, adjoining Castle-Martyr, is the residence of Carey's Wood.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £638 18s. 4½d.; glebe, £6 5s. Gross income, £645 3s. 4½d.; nett, £559 15s. 2½d.

Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefices of Robertstown, and Monasternenagh, in the dio. of Limerick. The church was built upwards of a century ago. Sittings 100; attendance 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 3,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Ballymacoda and Shanbally. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 102, and the Roman Catholics to 2,632; and 2 daily schools, one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, had on their books 55 boys and 30 girls.

IKEAN. See ISLAND-ICANE.

IKEATHY AND OUGHTERANY, an united barony, on the north border of co. Kildare, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by co. Meath; on the east, by the baronies of Salt; on the south, by the barony of Clane; and on the west, by the baronies of Clane and Carbery. Its length is $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its breadth is 5; and its area is 25,753 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches. The surface is flat and tame; and declines partly north-eastward toward the Liffey, and partly north-westward toward the Boyne. Mr. Rawson estimating the area at 15,747 acres, stated that 1,276 acres are bog, and 14,471 acres are arable land. The Royal Canal passes along the northern border. —This barony contains the parishes of Balraheen, Cloneurly, Scullogestown, Clonshambo, Donadea, Dunmurbill, Kilcock, and Mainham. Its only town is Kilcock. Pop., in 1831, 6,659; in 1841, 6,162. Houses 1,046. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 657; in manufactures and trade, 118; in other pursuits, 315. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,240; who could read but not write, 593; who could neither read nor write, 991. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 697; who could read but not write, 803; who could neither read nor write, 1,148. Ikeathy and Oughterany barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Celbridge. The total number of tenements valued is 901; and of these, 406 were valued under £5,—155, under £10,—57, under £15,—28, under £20,—29, under £25,—69, under £30,—38, under £40,—22, under £50,—and 150, at and above £50.

IKERRIN, a barony at the north-east extremity of co. Tipperary, Munster. It is bounded, on the north-west and north, by King's co.; on the east, by Queen's co. and co. Kilkenny; on the south, by the barony of Eliogurty; and on the west, by the barony of Lower Ormond. Its length, from north to south, is 13 miles; its greatest breadth is $8\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 69,381 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches,—of which 60 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches are water. Its southern district is deeply indented up the middle by a projection of Eliogurty; its western district consists chiefly of the northern half of the Devil-Bit mountains; its central district is the vale of the nascent Suir, which rises on the northern border, and runs southward right down the middle of the barony; and its eastern district consists, to a large extent, of bog. The lands on the Suir are generally fertile.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Borrisnafarney, Corbally, Cullenwaine, Templemore, and Templetuohy, and the whole of the parishes of Barnane, Kiltavenoge, Killea, Killoekahan, Bournay, Rathnavogue, and Templeree. The only town is Roscrea; and the chief village is Templetuohy. Ikerrin gives the title of Viscount to the Earl of Carrick. Pop., in 1831, 27,077; in 1841, 30,261. Houses 4,835. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,739; in manufactures and trade, 946; in other pursuits, 633. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,862; who could read but not write, 2,644; who could neither read nor write, 5,555. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,352; who could read but not write, 3,859; who could neither read nor write, 7,059.—Ikerrin lies partly in the Poor-law union of Roscrea, and partly in that of Thurles. The total number of tenements valued is 4,227; and of these, 2,179 were valued under £5,—894, under £10,—425, under £15,—220, under £20,—136, under £25,—107, under £30,—79, under £40,—64, under £50,—and 123, at and above £50.

ILEAGH, a quondam barony of co. Tipperary, Munster. It is now included in KILNEMASAGH: which see.

ILEN (THE), a rivulet of the district of Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It rises among the mountains, and flows about 9 miles in a southerly direction, and past the town of Skibbereen, to the head of Baltimore harbour; but its name is often popularly and even officially given to the estuary over a distance of 6 miles below Skibbereen, on to the vicinity of the town of Baltimore. It is tidal and navigable by small boats to a mile above Skibbereen; and the estuary is navigable for vessels of burden to within 3 miles of that town. The salmon fishery of the Ilen is the private property of Lieut.-Col. Townsend.

ILLUD. See ULLID.

IMLAGH, co. MEATH. See EMLAGH.

IMLAGH, a bog on the north side of Ballinskelligs bay, barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. It lies in a semicircular basin open to the sea, and is drained by a rapid rivulet of its own name, which might be turned to good account, by irrigation. Area, 3,076 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The upper part of the bog, under Killierly, is a deep red swamp; but the rest is a firm and easily reclaimable bog. The estimated cost of reclamation, jointly with 711 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres of Ballinskelligs bog, is £1,324 9s.

IMOGEELY, or MOGEELY, a parish in the barony of Inokilly, co. Cork, Munster. It contains part of the town of CASTLE-MARTYR: which see. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,430 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,047; in 1841, 3,121. Houses 482. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,217; in 1841, 2,224. Houses 352. The surface is partly hill and partly dale; and while the soil of the former is inferior, that of the latter is excelled by little or none in the barony. The chief seat is Castletown, the residence of Mr. Uniacke.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CASTLE-MARTYR [which see,] in the dio. of Cloyne. Vicarial tithe composition, £390; glebe, £16 16s. 7d. The rectorial tithes are of the same value as the vicarial, and are inappropriate in Mr. William Davis. The church of the benefice is in Imogeely, and was built about 95 years ago. Sittings 220; attendance 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Dungourney and Clonmult. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 197, and the Roman Catholics to 3,053; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the incumbent of Castle-Martyr, £5 10s. from the rector of Ightermurrough, and £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and one with £6 from the parochial Roman Catholic Clergy—had on their books 141 boys and 76 girls. In 1840, a National school at Castle-Martyr was salaried with £15 from the Board, and had on its books 228 boys.

IMOKILLY, a barony in the extreme south-east of co. Cork, Munster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by the barony of Barrymore; on the north, by the barony of Kinataloon; on the north-east, by Coshbride in co. Waterford; on the east, by Youghal Harbour, which separates it from Decies-within-Drum in co. Waterford; on the south-east and south, by the Atlantic Ocean; and, on the west, by Cork Harbour, which separates it from the baronies of Kerryourrihy and Barrymore. Its greatest length south-south-westward is 17 miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 11; and its area is 91,976 acres, of which 656 acres are tideway. This is a pleasant and fertile tract, neither encumbered with mountain nor monotonously level. The greater part of it consists of two fine valleys, the one extending from nearly the middle of the east side of Cork Harbour to the head of Ballycotton bay, and the other extending parallelly from Middleton to Youghal. The rising grounds and hills which divide and flank these valleys, are, to a great extent, scarcely less fertile than the plains; and they both compose and command numerous charming landscapes,—some close or confined to a part of one demesne, some comprehending a large amount of hill and valley, and some spreading away beyond vistas of exquisite middle-grounds to the ocean, the harbours of Cork and Youghal, and the lofty mountains of Waterford and Tipperary. The coasts and bays of the barony have been amply enough noticed in our article on Co. Cork. A limestone abounds in the valleys which is excellent, both as manure and as a building material; and in several places, it is so hard, compact, finely granular, and beautifully coloured as to constitute a very beautiful marble. A range of hills extends along the north-western boundary with Barrymore, and the northern boundary with Kinataloon.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Clonmult, Dungourney, Garranekenefick, Middleton, and Mogeesh, and the whole of the parishes of Ardagh, Aghada, Ballintemple, Corkbeg, Inch, Rostellan, Titeskin, Trabolgan, Ballyoughtera, Bohala, Clonpriest, Cloyne, Dangan, Garryroe, Imogeely, Ightermurrough, Kilcredan, Killeagh, Kilmaedonogue, Kilmahon, and St. Mary of Youghal. The Act 6 and 7 William IV. transferred one townland in Dungourney and two in Garranekenefick from Imokilly to Barrymore,—pop., in 1841, 522; and one in Titeskin, one in Aghada, and one in Corkbeg, from Barrymore to Imokilly,—pop. 810. The towns are Cloyne, Castle-Martyr, Middleton, and Youghal; and the chief villages are Aghada, Farsid, Whitegate, Gyleen, Ballymaooda, Ballinacreen, Ballycotton, Killeagh, Ladies-Bridge, and Churchtown. Pop., in 1831, 58,620; in 1841, 62,170. Houses 9,613. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 6,736; in manufactures and trade, 2,933; in other pursuits, 1,452. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 8,355; who could read but not write, 2,819; who could neither read nor write, 15,096. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,878; who could read but not write, 3,318; who could neither read nor write, 20,322.—Imokilly lies wholly in the Poor-law union of Middleton. The total number of tenements valued, exclusive of the borough of Youghal, is 5,544; and of these, 2,296 were valued under £5,—742, under £10,—537, under £15,—419, under £20,—306, under £25,—241, under £30,—283, under £40,—180, under £50,—and 540, at and above £50.

IMPER. See EMPOR.

IMPHRICK, or EMERICK, a parish, 4½ miles north-west by north of Doneraile, and partly in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, but chiefly in that of Fermoy, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½.

Area of the Fermoy section, 3,145 acres; of the Orrery and Kilmore section, 966 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,385; in 1841, 1,459. Houses 225. Pop. of the Fermoy section, in 1831, 1,175; in 1841, 1,268. Houses 199. The surface is watered by the beautiful and classic Awbeg; and within its limits is the villa of Velvetstown.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LISGOOLD [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £129 4s. 7½d.; glebe, £6 3s. 9½d. In 1834 the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 1,419.

INA, a romantic lake, a vale, and a mountain pass, in the parish of Moyrus, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. The lake is overhung by part of the Binabola mountains, receives several of the torrents which leap down from their sides, and is the most northerly of the chain of lakes which lie at their base. The vale sweeps along the east base of the mountains, and is stupendously flanked on the south by naked and almost perpendicular precipices of 1,200 feet in altitude. The pass is an alpine defile between the two great groups of Binabola, cutting these groups mutually asunder, and bearing the name of Maam Ina. At the mouth of the vale rises the insulated and lofty hill of Coolnacarton, commanding a view of the lakes of Ina, Derryclare, and Ballinahinch. See BINABOLA and COOLNACARTON.

INAGH, a parish in the barony of Inchiquin, 6 miles south-east by east of Ennistymon, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 19,887 acres, 3 roods, 9 perches,—of which 231 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches are water. Pop., in 1841, 4,192. Houses 690. The surface is, for the most part, a series of moors, bogs, and poor uplands; and its aspect is almost everywhere bleak and repulsive. Slievecallan, on the western boundary, has an altitude of 1,282 feet; and some heights in the interior have altitudes of very nearly 500 feet. The chief stream is the Brockagh. The roads from Ennistymon and Milltown-Malbay to Ennis traverse the interior.—This parish is not recognised in the ecclesiastical divisions of the Established church; yet ranks as a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Killaloe, and has chapels at Inagh and Kilnamona.

INCH, a Roman Catholic parish in co. Clare, and dio. of Killaloe, Munster. Its post-town is Ennis; and its chapels are situated at Inch, Kilmealy, and Incur.

INCH, a parish on the south coast of the barony of Imokilly, 3½ miles east of the entrance of Cork Harbour, and 4½ south by west of Cloyne, co. Cork, Munster. Length, from Castle-Mary to Poor-Heads, 5½ miles; breadth, from Inch-bridge to Shanaber, 2½; area, 3,823 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,854; in 1841, 1,617. Houses 262. The Census of 1831 includes the pop. in that of Aghada. The surface consists, for the most part, of excellent land. The chief feature of the coast is the promontory of Poor-Head; and one of the most interesting features of the interior is the demesne of CASTLE-MARY: which see.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £524 8s.; glebe, £12 14s. 6d. Gross income, £537 2s. 6d.; nett, £498 19s. 5d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent serves, without emolument, the curacy of Garranekenefick. Inch, previous to the passing of the Church Temporalities Act, formed part of the benefice of Aghada. The church was built in 1831, by means of a gift of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 270; attendance 60. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 140, and the Roman Catholics to 1,808; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 and other advantages from the Bishop of Cloyne—had on their books 28 boys and 13 girls.

INCH, an island, and a parish, in the barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. The island lies on the west side of Lough Swilly, 1 mile west of Churchtown, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Buncrana; and is separated by a deep and narrow channel from Rathmullen. It is reached by various ferries from the mainland, the shortest of which connects with Quigley's Point about a mile from Burnfoot bridge. The surface is varied and rising, but on the whole forms a sort of cone, whose summit bears the name of Inch Top, and has an altitude of 737 feet above sea-level. The land amounts to 3,100 acres, and is disposed principally in tillage and pasture. The chief artificial features are a small village, three places of worship, Mr. Kennedy's seat of Inch-house, and the fortified and garrisoned barrack, called Down Fort. Off the north side, overlooked by the fort, is a good roadstead for vessels bound to Letterkenny and Rathmeltan; and close to the shore is a valuable bed of oysters. Pop., in 1831, 1,135; in 1841, 978. Houses 172.—The parish of Inch includes also the mainland district of Barr of Inch, or MINTIAGH'S: which see.—The parish, jointly with the parishes of Burt and Muff, was formerly considered as within the parish of Templemore, the remainder of which is identical with the western Liberties of the city of Londonderry; and its tithes are appropriated to the deanery of Derry. Inch itself is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Gross and nett income, £92 6s. 8d. Patron, the Dean of Derry. The church was built about 76 years ago, by means of parochial assessment. Sittings 300; attendance, from 40 to 50. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 130 to 190, and the Roman Catholic chapel by from 150 to 200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to two chapels in the benefices of Burt and Muff. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 124 Churchmen, 452 Presbyterians, and 612 Roman Catholics; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by from 20 to 30 children; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 80 boys and 41 girls.

INCH, a parish, partly in the barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, but chiefly in the barony of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. It lies $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Arklow, on the road thence to Gorey; and contains the village of COOLGRANEY: which see. The surface is partly mountainous; yet most of its land is of a good quality. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Wicklow section, 860 acres; of the Wexford section, 5,943 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,487; in 1841, 2,006. Houses 311. Pop. of the Wicklow section, in 1841, 277. Houses 44.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £300; glebe, £28 17s. 6d. The rectory of Inch, and part of the vicarage of KILGORMAN [which see], constitute the benefice of Inch. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 2,489. Gross income, £508 17s. 6d.; nett, £476 9s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1830, by means of a loan of £1,200 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance 185. The Inch and Kilgorman Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 800 and 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 169, and the Roman Catholics to 1,347; the Protestants of the union to 206, and the Roman Catholics to 2,241; and 4 daily schools in the union and parish—one of which was aided with an annual grant from the rector—had on their books 189 boys and 134 girls.

of West Shelmalier, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by west of Taghmore, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile; area, 1,389 acres. Pop., in 1831, 407; in 1841, 526. Houses 84. The surface extends along the Corug rivulet, and consists in the aggregate of second-rate land.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of HONINGTON [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £30, and the rectorial for £40; and the latter are inappropriate in Cæsar Colclough, Esq. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

INCH, an old castle about 3 miles north-east of Athy, and in the parish of Moone, and barony of East Narragh and Rheban, co. Kildare, Leinster. It was built by De Vesey in the reign of King John, and enlarged by the 6th Earl of Kildare about the year 1420. Though only one tower now remains, yet the great extent of traceable foundation proves the castle to have been a place of considerable importance. About a furlong to the south of it is a small tumulus, rendered interesting by a popular local story of the plague in 1439. Two hillocky ridges which run parallel to each other north of the castle, and are mutually separated by an intervening marsh, form the only exception to the prevalence of a dead flat in the circumjacent country; and on these heights, in 1642, the armies of Ormonde and Mountgarret marched in sight of each other on the evening previous to the battle of Kilrush.

INCH, a peninsula in the barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It projects south-south-eastward from the main body of the barony, at a point 10 miles east by south of Dingle; and separates Dingle bay from Castlemain Harbour, leaving an entrance to the latter between its own extremity and the barony of Iveragh. Its length is $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its mean breadth, rather less than half-a-mile. It consists of one continued range of sandhills, some of which are from 30 to 40 feet high; and though plentifully covered with sedges, lady's bed-straw, sea-holly, coltsfoot, and similar sand-and-sea-loving plants, it produces very little grass. Cattle fed on it eat chiefly the lady's bed-straw, and are thriving. Considerable quantities of white pease grew at one time, and perhaps still grow, spontaneously upon its extremity; but they are conjectured to have been originally sown by the dispersion of pease in some shipwreck.

INCH, an islet at the head of Lough Allen, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It contains some vestiges of an ecclesiastical structure, which is alleged to have been built by St. Beorg; and around which is a cemetery.

INCH, co. Tipperary. See INCH-DOVEA.

INCH, or INNISCOURCEY, a parish in the barony of Lecale, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Downpatrick, co. Down, Ulster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{4}$; area, 6,494 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,857; in 1841, 2,489. Houses 418. The surface lies along the south-west arm of Lough Strangford, up to the mouth of the Quoile or Bal-linahinch river. Nearly three-fourths of it consist of land of scarcely second-rate quality; and the remainder consists of very impracticable rocky ground and cut-out bog. An embankment has been made on the Quoile to stop the tide-water. The north road from Downpatrick forks at Quoile bridge into two lines which pass through the parish toward respectively Killyleagh and Saintfield. The quay of Quoile serves the inhabitants of Inch quite as facilely as those of Downpatrick. Adjacent to the Quoile is the demesne of Finebrogue. The abbey of Inch was founded, in 1180, by Se

John de Courcey, for Cistercian monks, whom he brought from the abbey of Furness in Lancashire. Though now a very dilapidated ruin, it exhibits both evidences of great former importance, and vestiges of considerable architectural beauty. It was a cruciform structure, with a tower or lofty belfry on the south side. An arch which supported the tower still remains, and appears to have been of very elegant construction. The chancel, or east part of the church, is the chief part of the existing ruin; and it has, in its east wall, three noble lancet windows upwards of 20 feet in height, and in each of its side-walls two windows of similar form, and nearly equal grandeur. Sir John de Courcey is alleged to have founded this abbey as an amends for demolishing a previous Benedictine abbey, which had been converted by the native princes into a strong military post; and a very old ruin, of simple form and antique architectural features, stands on the verge of the parish, and claims, according to some antiquaries, to be the original abbey. Within the church was buried Sir James Melville, the supposed descendant of the famous knight, who was secretary to Mary, Queen of Scots.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £286 3s. 1d. The rectories of Inch and ARDKEEN, and the vicarage of WITTER [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Inch, and the corps of the prebend of St. Andrews. The other parishes are 9 miles distant from Inch. Pop., in 1831, 6,139. Gross income, £565 3s. 1d.; nett, £518 10s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Ballintoy in the dio. of Connor. A curate has a salary of £100. Inch church was built about the year 1730, by means of private subscription and parochial assessment. Sitings 350; attendance, from 100 to 400. Ardkeen has been erected into a perpetual curacy, and has a church of its own. The Roman Catholic chapel of Inch has an attendance of about 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Crossgar, Kilmore, and Killyleagh. In 1834, the parishioners of Inch consisted of 1,123 Churchmen, 709 Presbyterians, and 1,015 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by from 27 to 57 children; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from Mr. Maxwell, M. P., £5 from the rector, and £7 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 169 boys and 109 girls. In 1840, there was a National school at Rann.

INCHEGEELAGH. See INCHEGEELAGH.

INCHCLOYNE, an islet in Lough Ree, between Incheclorin and Inchenagh, co. Longford, Leinster.

INCHCRONANE. See INCHICRONANE.

INCH-DOVEA, an united parish in the barony of Eliogurty, 4½ miles north-west of Thurles, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,889 acres, 23 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,928; in 1841, 1,983. Houses 304. The district formerly constituted two parishes,—Inch, or Incheclorin, and Dovea. The surface is part of the west side of the basin of the Suir, but is chiefly drained southward by the Clodiagh, a small affluent of that river; and it consists in the aggregate of middle-rate land. The seats are Inch-house, George Ryan, Esq.; Dovea, John Trant, Esq.; and Bouladuff.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CLOCHER [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £160, and the rectorial for £140; and the latter are inappropriate in the Marquis of Ormonde. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 700 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Drom. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 25, and the Roman Catholics to 2,004; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 150 boys and 97 girls.

INCHEGEELAGH, or EVELEARY, a parish, partly in the western division of the barony of East Carbery, but chiefly in the barony of West Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 6. Area of the Carbery section, 5,576 acres; of the Muskerry section, 39,839 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,785; in 1841, 6,357. Houses 1,006. Pop. of the Muskerry section, in 1831, 5,172; in 1841, 5,680. Houses 902. This district contains the sources and the upper part of the course of the river Lee; it forms at once one of the most sublime, one of the most rugged, and one of the most romantic sections of the great western mountain border of the county; it is impressively featured with the lakes of Allua and Gougane-Barra, the stupendous chasm or ravine of Cooleagh, and some of the most alpine summits, and wild mountain-escarpments of the south-west of Ireland; and it abounds, on the one hand, in such historical associations and traditional legends, and, on the other, in such rare productions of mineralogy and botany, as to make the contest of attraction nearly equal to the poetic dreamer and the man of science. Most of the features of chief interest, however, have been already noticed in the articles ALLUA, COOLEAGH, and GOUGANE-BARRA: which see. Mr. Crofton Croker, speaking of the village of Inchegeelagh, thus succinctly and graphically notices the east end of the parish: "The walls of a barrack, which has been long disused, are all that speak the former consequence of Inchegeela; its church and parsonage are inconsiderable and ruinous; and, at the distance of a mile, on a small height above the river, stands the castle of Carrinacurra, now called Castle-Masters. It is backed by considerable mountains; the most prominent is Sheehy, whose blue peak,

'A doubtful object, mingling with the clouds,' towers above all the others, the chief of which are Douse, an enormous and heavy lump, and Coolnagreenane, or the mountain unknown to the sunbeams, a name highly descriptive of its general gloomy appearance; behind these, the rugged points of Carrigaprehaun, or the Raven's Rock, may be distinguished boldly eminent over Lough Lua." Though by far the greater part of the surface consists of rock and mountain, yet a large aggregate exists of arable land, and there is a sufficiency of bog for the local supply of good fuel. Many of the mountains now clothed with heath were formerly tilled; for when the heath is pulled up and burned, the ridges and furrows made by the plough are visible. Near the village, says Dr. Smith, "many pieces of a metallic substance have been found in the form of cubes, as hard as iron, and glittering with sparks, intermixed, of a pale yellow, shining like gold." The name Eveleary was given to the district now forming the parish from the O'Learys, ancient lords of the soil, and proprietors of the castles of Carrignacurragh, Carrigneneelagh, and Drumcaragh. Carrignacurragh Castle, noticed in our extract from Mr. Croker, is described by Dr. Smith as a pile upwards of 100 feet high, and was garrisoned by Cromwell, and forfeited by Conohar O'Leary in consequence of his taking part in the rebellion of 1641. The parish is traversed from east to west by the north road from Cork to Bantry,—by the road, identical here with the former, from Cork to Kenmare,—and by the projected line of railway to Castletown-Berehaven. See BEREHAVEN. The village of Inchegeelagh stands on these lines of thoroughfare, and in the Muskerry section of the parish, 7 miles west-south-west of Macroom, 27½ miles west by south of Cork, and 153½ miles south-west of Dublin. Fairs are held on May 31, Aug. 31, and Dec. 3. Area, 17 acres. Pop., in 1841, 233. Houses 38.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Vicarial tithe composition, £400; glebe, £80. Gross income, £480; nett, £433 5s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of St. Paul's in the dio. of Cork. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £125 5s. 11d., and are impropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. A curate has a salary of £18, and the use of the glebe-house and a glebe of 242 acres. The church was built in 1814, by means of a loan of £230 15s. 4½d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 30. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Inchegeelagh and Ballingarra have an attendance of respectively 1,500 and 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 54, and the Roman Catholics to 5,950; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 11 children; and 5 daily schools—each of three of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and one with £10 from the rector—had on their books 116 boys and 48 girls.

INCHENAGH, an island of Lough Ree, co. Longford, Leinster. It is situated about 3½ miles south by west of Lanesborough.

INCHGARRA, an islet of Lough Ree, co. Longford, Leinster.

INCHIANLY. See INCH-DOVEA.

INCHICRONANE, INCHRONANE, or INNISCRONAN, a parish in the barony of Upper Bunratty, 5½ miles north-east by north of Ennis, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the village of CRUSHEEN: which see. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 17,438 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches,—of which 597 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,601; in 1841, 5,118. Houses 866. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,285; in 1841, 4,924. Houses 834. Most of the surface is rough, rocky, and upland; a large proportion, especially in the east, is waste; and the aggregate of good land is very small. The highest ground appears to be a summit of 829 feet in altitude on the eastern border. The chief residences are Drumcor, Doon, Glenwilliam, Garlick-hill, Viewmount, Abbeyview, Brodagh, Derrynagullion, and Durra. The antiquities are Moyvee and Inchicronane castles, Kiltalagh and Killyakee churches, and Inchicronane abbey. The lake of Inchicronane, on the southern border, is upwards of 1½ mile in length; and on an islet in this lake Donald O'Brien, king of Munster, founded, in 1190, an abbey for Canons Regular. The road from Ennis to Gort passes close by the west side and superfluence of the lake.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILNEBOY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £133 17s. 3d. A private house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 5. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 350 and 500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 21, and the Roman Catholics to 4,922; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 256 boys and 146 girls. In 1840, the National Board granted £111 5s. toward the erection of a boys' school and a girls' school at Ballanruan.

INCHIGEELAGH. See INCHEGEELAGH.

INCHIHOLAHAN, or CASTLE-INC, a parish on the north border of the barony of Shillelogher,

2 miles south-west of Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 2,367 acres. Pop., in 1831, 472; in 1841, 492. Houses 81. The surface consists in general of pretty good land; and is traversed south-westward by the road from Kilkenny to Cork.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £197 8s. 11½d.; glebe, £49 10s. The rectories of Inchiholahan and OUTRATH, and the vicarage of TULLOHANBROGUE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Inchiholahan. Length, 5 miles. Pop., in 1831, 2,621. Gross income, £528 18s. 11½d.; nett, £459 4s. 11½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Rower in the dio. of Ossory. The church is of unknown date. Sittings 300; attendance, from 6 to 7. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Outrath. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 475, the Protestants of the union, to 37, and the Roman Catholics to 2,643; one pay daily school in the parish had on its books 43 boys and 25 girls; and 3 daily schools in the union had 143 boys and 75 girls.

INCHINABACKY, or ROXBOROUGH, a parish on the south-east border of the barony of Barrymore, 3 miles north-west of Castle-Martyr, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,475 acres. Pop., in 1831, 515; in 1841, 543. Houses 94. The surface consists in general of good land, and is drained south-westward by the Middleton rivulet.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £152 5s. 8d.; glebe, £1. Gross income, £153 5s. 8d.; nett, £144 8s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is non-resident, and holds the stipendiary curacy of a benefice in the vicinity of Cork. Inchinabacky, previous to the passing of the Church Temporalities Act, formed part of the benefice of Middleton; it has no church; and its duties are performed by the curate of an adjoining parish for a salary of £25. A private house is used as the parochial place of worship; and has an attendance of 14. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 511.

INCHIQUN, a barony of the county of Clare, Munster. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by co. Galway; on the east, by Bunratty; on the south, by Islands; on the south-west, by Ibrickane; on the west, by Corcomroe; and, on the north-west, by Burren. Its length southwards is 12½ miles; its greatest breadth is 10 miles; and its area is 88,387 acres, 3 perches,—of which 2,854 acres, 3 perches are water. The eastern part, immediately upon the Fergus, consists chiefly of flat, calcareous, rocky, light land; the west is generally moorish, with some vales of great fertility; and the part immediately adjacent to Corcomroe is highly improvable, as limestone can be very easily obtained. About Tully O'Dea, there is some excellent tillage ground. Nearly in the centre of the barony lies the beautiful lake Tedano; about a mile west of this lies Lough Inchiquin, a picturesque sheet of about 300 acres; and respectively north-north-eastward and south-south-eastward of Tedano, extend two chains of subordinate lakes. These sheets of water possess great aggregate beauty, and have all subterranean communications. Closely adjoining Lough Inchiquin stand the ruins of Inchiquin Castle, once the residence of the O'Briens, Earls of Inchiquin, and now Marquises of Thomond. The O'Briens are descendants of the famous Brian Boroiagh, monarch of Ireland. In 1543, Murrough O'Brien, brother of Conor O'Brien, king of Thomond, and usurper of the son of Conor O'Brien's rights, submitted to Henry VIII., was created Earl of Thomond, with remainder to his deposed nephew, and Baron of Inchiquin, with remainder to his own heirs-male. In 1654, William O'Brien, sixth Baron of Inchiquin, was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Inchiquin; in 1800, Murrough, fifth Earl of Inchiquin, was created Marquis of Thomond; and, in 1826, the second Marquis was made Baron Tadcaster in the peerage of Great Britain. The barony of Inchiquin was granted, in 1585, by Queen Elizabeth to Lord Inchiquin; and it then assumed its present name, but was previously called Tullagh O'Dea. Mr. Hely Dutton remarks, that "Tradition, which is often a liar, says the barony takes its title from a small island in the lake of Inchiquin, that it anciently belonged to a family of the Quins or Cuinns, and was called Innis-O'Quin, or Quin's Island, and that O'Quin was starved to death on it."

—This barony contains the parishes of Dysert, Inagh, Kilkeedy, Killneboy, Kilmaona, Rath, and Ruan. The only town is Currofin. Pop., in 1831, 18,566; in 1841, 21,231. Houses 3,393. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,089; in manufactures and trade, 334; in other pursuits, 154. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,964; who could read but not write, 1,195; who could neither read nor write, 5,145. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,183; who could read but not write, 1,186; who could neither read nor write, 6,721.—Inchiquin is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Ennis, Ennistymon, and Gort. The total number of tenements valued is 2,250; and of these, 848 are valued under £5,—619, under £10,—303, under £15,—117, under £20,—83, under £25,—72, under £30,—71, under £40,—37, under £50,—and 100, at and above £50.

INCHQUIN—anciently INCHECOIGNE—an old castle in the parish of Clonpriest, barony of Imokilly, about 3 miles south-west of Youghal, co. Cork, Munster. The manor connected with it anciently belonged to the see of Cloyne, but afterwards passed to the house of Ormonde, and formed a distinct barony in itself.

INCHQUIN, or INNISQUIN, an island at the north-west extremity of the barony of Clare, and on the north border of the county of Galway, Connaught. It lies in Lough Corrib. An abbey which stood here is alleged by Archdall, 'et hoc genus omne,' to have been originally founded by St. Brendan, and to have been presided over by his disciple St. Meldan, who died before the year 626.

INCH-ISLAND. See INCH, co. Donegal and co. Leitrim.

INCHKENNY, or INNISKENNY, a parish, 4 miles south-west of Cork, and in the baronies of Cork and East Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3. Area of the barony of Cork section, 2,900 acres; of the Muskerry section, 959 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,290; in 1841, 1,390. Houses 212. Pop. of the barony of Cork section, in 1831, 1,049; in 1841, 1,093. Houses 168. The surface consists, for the most part, of good land; and is traversed by the road from Cork to Bandon. The Muskerry section belonged, till quite recently, to the barony of Barretts.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition and gross income, £369 4s. 7½d.; nett, £343 3s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1803, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 40. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 75, and the Roman Catholics to 1,234; and a daily school was aided with £6 a-year from subscription, and had an average attendance of 18 scholars.

INCHMACNERIN, an island in Lough Key, barony of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connaught. A priory of Canons Regular which stood here is supposed to have been originally a Culdee establishment, founded in the 6th century; and by an inquisition taken in 28 Elizabeth, it was found possessed of a church, two ruinous houses, the island of Inchevickrynn, various lands, woods, and uplands on the shores of the lake, part of the Curlew mountains, and several tithes and vicarages.

INCHMORE, a hamlet in the parish of Castle-Rickard, barony of Upper Moyfenragh, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 72.

INCHMORE, an island in the barony of Kilkenny-West, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It is situated in Lough Ree, 1½ mile north of Hare Island, and 4½ miles north of Athlone.

INCHMORE, an islet in the barony of Granard, co. Longford, Leinster. It lies in Lough Gouna; contains some uninteresting ecclesiastical ruins; and is supposed to have been very early the site of a Culdean establishment.

INCHMORE, a small peninsulated tract of land on the banks of the Nore, 4 miles from Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. The highly picturesque and beautifully situated ruins of Inchmore-castle on this peninsula, consist of a strong and considerably ancient square keep, united to a very large and splendid mansion in the architectural style of the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. The mansion was one of the many baronial residences of the illustrious family of Grace [see COURTSTOWN]; and was built by Robert, Baron of Courtstown, and member of parliament for the county, who died in 1639 or 1640.

INGARD, a headland on the west shore of Balyleague bay, barony of Shelbourne, co. Wexford, Leinster. It is situated in the northern vicinity of the celebrated Bagenbon headland, in the east-south-eastern vicinity of Fethard, and about 5 miles north-north-east of Hook Tower lighthouse.

INIS- and INISH-. See INNIS-.

INNISBEG, an island in Baltimore Harbour or the estuary of the Ilan, district of Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It lies in the upper part of the estuary, 3½ miles south-south-west of Skibbereen; and measures 1½ mile in length, and ¾ of a mile in breadth.

INNISBEG, an islet in the barony of Kilma-crenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies in the Atlantic ocean, 3 miles south-south-east of Tory Island, and 5½ north-east by east of Bloody-Foreland.

INNISBEG, an islet in the barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It lies in the Atlantic ocean, about ¾ of a mile north of the Great Glasquet Island, and 1 mile west by north of Dunmore Head.

INNISBEG, a name meaning "the small island," and applied to numerous islets in Ireland, the chief of which are noticed in the three preceding articles.

INNEY. See INNY.

INNISBEGIL, an island in the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies nearly in the middle of Achill Sound; extends lengthwise from east to west; and is separated by narrow sounds from respectively the island of Achill on the west, the island of Annagh on the south, and the mainland of Erris on the east. Its length is about 2 miles, and its breadth about 1½. A powerful tide runs in the sound at the narrows, called the Bull's Mouth, between Innisbegil and Achill; and the southern part of the sound is fordable at low water. Innisbegil is a coast-guard station. See ACHILL.

INNISBOFFIN, an island in the barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies in the Atlantic ocean, about 1 mile north of the nearest part of the mainland, and 3 miles east-north-east of Bloody-Foreland. It measures about 1 mile in length, and between 3 and 4 miles in circumference. It is a coast-guard station, and has about 10 row-boats and 50 men engaged in the fisheries. "Safety harbours," says a witness quoted in the Fishery Reports, "could be constructed, and are much required, in Tory and Innisboffin islands. The want of them is a great 'pull-back' on the north-west fisheries, as there is not any convenient place of safety to which fishing-boats may run in north or north-west gales, which are always severe on this coast."

INNISBOFFIN, ENNISBOFFIN, or BOFFIN, an island and a parish in the barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,151 acres, 3 roods, 1 perch,—of which 41 acres, 2 roods, 29 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,462; in 1841, 1,612. Houses 285. It extends east and west; is divided by a narrow sound from Innishark on the south-west; and is partly encircled with a zone of isles, islets, and rocks, the chief of which is Davilín. Though politically within co. Mayo, it lies in considerably closer topographical position to co. Galway; being 9 miles west by south of the nearest part of the mainland of Mayo, and only 2½ west-north-west of Claggan Point, and 4½ west of Renvyle Point, both in the barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway. It formerly belonged to the Marquis of Clanricarde; but was exchanged a number of years ago to the Marquis of Sligo. The north coast is a precipitous cliff, indented with two wild bays or inlets; the west coast has at its upper end an interior lagoon, divided from the sea by a bench of stones; and the south coast has an excellent natural harbour, with 9 or 10 feet of depth, and well suited for fishing-vessels. This harbour faces the south-west, and is protected in that direction by some low rocks and the island of Innishark; and its upper end is landlocked, and has a bottom of soft mud. So important did this harbour appear in the time of the Commonwealth, that a blockhouse, which still exists, was built for its defence on an islet at its mouth; yet, in addition to some minor defects, it lies under the serious inconvenience of being entirely shut in southerly winds, so that sometimes, for many days in succession, any communication with the mainland is rendered altogether impracticable. Mr. Nimmo recommended the construction of a pier harbour, to cost about £1,500. An abbey is alleged to have been founded in Innisboffin, in 667, by St. Colman.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLINAKILL [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £9 12s.; glebe, £40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Ballinakill and Cuilmore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 7, and the Roman Catholics to 1,564; and 2 pay daily schools were attended on the average by 67 children.

INNISBOFFIN, or INCHBOFFIN, an island in the barony of Rathline, co. Longford, Leinster. It lies in Lough Ree. An old abbey which stood here is said to have been plundered, in 1089, by the Danes, and is alleged by Archdall and others to have been founded and presided over by St. Rioch, son of St. Darerca, the sister of St. Patrick.

INNISBOYNE, an islet in the barony of Ark-low, 4 miles south-south-east of Wicklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Archdall says that St. Baithen was abbot here.

INNISCALTHRA, a parish, partly in the barony of Upper Tulla, co. Cork, Munster, but chiefly in the barony of Leitrim, co. Galway, Connaught. It includes some isles in Lough Derg, lies mainly along the west shore of that lake, and is situated 3½ miles north-east by east of Scariff. Its Connaught section contains the village of MOUNT SHANNON: which see. Length and breadth, each 4 miles. Area of the Munster section, 684 acres, 14 perches,—of which 279½ acres are in Lough Derg; of the Connaught section, 10,599 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches,—of which 1,532 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches are in Lough Derg. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,198; in 1841, 2,378. Houses 383. Pop. of the Munster section, in 1831, 394; in 1841, 212. Houses 29. Pop. of the rural districts of the Connaught section, in 1841, 1,805. Houses 297. The surface of the mainland is a belt of low ground on Lough Derg, immediately backed by the declivities of the Slieve-Baughta mountains; and it blends with the lake and the circumjacent country in the formation of a brilliant landscape. About a mile south-west of Mount Shannon stands Woodpark, the seat of Mr. Reade. The rivulet Bora separates from each other the two sections of the parish, and at the same time forms the boundary between Connaught and Munster; and the joint road from Scariff toward respectively Portumna and Loughrea passes up the margin of the lake. The principal islands are, in the Munster section, Red Island; and, in the Connaught section, Inniscalthra, Young's Island, Basley Island, and Cribby Island.—The celebrated island of Inniscalthra, which gives name to the parish, but is itself more usually called the Holy Island, lies about half-a-mile from the shore, and 2½ miles east by north of Scariff. It is the chief of a group of three isles; and contains an area of about 20 acres, while Bushy Island and Red Island contain respectively about 7½ and 5 acres. Inniscalthra has been famous from very early ages as the site of ecclesiastical structures and the scene of superstitious observances. It has a pillar-tower 70 feet high, in good preservation, and remarkable for being one of the very few antiquities of its class which are traceable in record. The passage which relates to it occurs in the Four Masters, and has been construed into evidence in support of the theory that the turroghan or pillar-tower is of heathen origin, and was used for the worship of the sun. Inniscalthra, in common with Glendalough, Clonmacnoise, and other places, boasts also the popular fame of having "Seven Churches;" but its ecclesiastical piles, whatever was their number, seem to have been chiefly cells or oratories, and are now all prostrate ruins. The usual confusion, absurdity, and fable which compose the pretended history of similar places, are most prolific and stupid respecting everything which relates to these "Seven Churches;" and form such a melée of discrepancies as would hinder even a gaping dupe of legendary lore from acquiring any tolerable idea as to when or how they are pretended to have been constructed. Mr. and Mrs. Hall's off-hand way of gulping down such difficulties in a mouthful of the first that offers, is as harmless as any other: "The principal church is called Teampol Camín, or the chapel of St. Camín, because that saint was either the founder or patron. From the little delivered to us by the old hagiologists, we collect that Camín flourished in the first half of the 7th century, that he was of the princely house of Hy-Kinselagh, in Leinster, and half-brother of Guaire the generous king of Connaught. Betaking himself to the seclusion of Iniscalthra, he there led a life of contemplation and great austerity, the fame of which attracted to its shores numbers desirous of imitating his virtues and receiving instruction. The concourse of these disciples became at length so great that the holy man was compelled to found a place for their reception and shelter, and thus originated a monastery, which, in after times, enjoyed a far-spread reputation, and was deemed one of the asylums of Ireland. Camin died somewhat about the year 658. He wrote a Commentary on the Psalms collated with the Hebrew text, a copy of which was seen by Archbishop Usher. Of the civil history of the island, the facts are few; they may be classed under the head of Danish invasions, which succeeded each other in 834, in 908, and 946. The Irish themselves sometimes also disregarded the sanctity of this holy islet, as we find a devastation of this kind by some unscrupulous freebooter in 949, just three years after the last wasting by the northern Vikings. In 908, the heroic monarch, Brian Boru, re-edified the church of Iniscealtra. The island is much frequented by devotees, and like the island of similar character in the Donegal Lough Derg, it has its St. Patrick's Purgatory.—Inniscealtra parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £23, and the rectorial tithes are estimated to be worth £20, and are appropriated to the dean and chapter of Killaloe cathedral. The vicarages of Inniscalthra, MOYNOE, CLONRUSH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Inniscalthra. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 3; area of arable and pasture lands, 25,736 acres. But the union includes also a large tract of wild mountain, attached to each of its three parishes; and it extends from within $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile of the town of Woodford to within $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile of the town of Scariff. Gross income, £191 1s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £159 15s. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated at Mount-Shannon, and was built about the year 1785, by means of a gift of £360 from the late Board of First Fruits, and enlarged with the addition of a steeple, in 1830, by means of a loan of £400 from the Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance 400. A private dwelling, used as a Protestant Dissenters' meeting-house, has an attendance of 60. The Roman Catholic chapels of Inniscalthra and Clonrush have an attendance of 650 and 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 446, and the Roman Catholics to 1,658; the Protestants of the union to 713, and the Roman Catholics to 5,578; 2 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £10 from the Baptist Society—had on their books 44 boys and 80 girls; and 10 daily schools in the union had 385 boys and 371 girls.

INNISCARAGH, an islet in the parish of Templecroan, barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies in the Atlantic ocean, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Arran, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ west of Innisfree.

INNISCARRA, a parish formerly in the barony of Barretts, but now in that of East Muskerry, 5 miles west by south of Cork, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the villages of Lower and Upper Dripsey: see DRIPSEY. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 4; area, 10,190 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,432; in 1841, 4,407. Houses 653. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,769. Houses 575. The river Lee flows along the southern boundary; the Dripsey traces the western boundary; and the Bride, though nowhere within the parish or in contact with it, flows into the Lee opposite the parish-church, and contributes to the general beauty of the scenery. The church stands on a fine bend of the Lee, and gracefully lifts its spire out of a clump of trees.

The neat parsonage-house is in the vicinity; on a rising ground, a mile to the north, is Ardrum, the seat of the baronet family of Colthurst; and, in the vicinity of Ardrum, is the village of Cloghroe. The general surface is pleasantly diversified, and has a considerable aggregate of embellishment; and the average quality of the land is middle-rate, and worth about 20s. a-year of average rental. The ancient name of the parish was Tuainnara; and here St. Senant of Inniscattery is said to have founded a house for the reception of eight of his austere disciples.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £636 5s. 9d.; glebe, £20. The rectories of Inniscarra and MATTEHY [see that article], constitute the benefice and prebend of Inniscarra. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 7. Pop., in 1831, 5,598. Gross income, £1,178; nett, £952 5s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1820, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance 50. There is a chapel-of-ease at Kilmurry. The Roman Catholic chapels of Cloghroe, Benring, and Mattehy have an attendance of respectively 700, 1,100, and 850; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 117, and the Roman Catholics to 3,496; the Protestants of the union to 162, and the Roman Catholics to 5,700; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 20 children; and 4 daily schools in the union—3 of which were in the parish, and one of these supported by about £50 a-year from subscription—had on their books 234 boys and 106 girls. The Inniscarra dispensary is within the Cork Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 6,600; and, in 1839-40, it expended £131 11s., and administered to 1,954 patients.

INNISCARROW, a reef distinguished as a crowded retreat of seals, in Clew bay, about 8 miles from Westport, co. Mayo, Connaught.

INNISCATTERY,—popularly SCATHERY, and anciently INNISCATHAL,—an island in the barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It lies in the Shannon, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Kilrush, and $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile south of the nearest part of the mainland. It contains about 100 acres; the soil good, well stocked with cattle, and abounding with rabbits and wild fowl; but though inhabited, its population is not specially returned. It is a low-browed island, remarkable for hardly anything in its configuration or natural structure and produce; yet, when its size and physical insignificance are considered, it figures so prominently in history and archæology as to be one of the wonders of Ireland. Its sound or roadstead was early ascertained by the Vikings to be one of their most convenient harbours for making descents upon Ireland; and the island, in consequence, was for a long period a bone of contention and a scene of strife between them and the Irish. In 975, Brian Boromh, at the head of 1,200 Dalgais troops, and assisted by Domnhall, king of Toambuein, recovered the island from the Danes, by defeating their leader Tombar and his two sons in a pitched battle, and slaying in the strife 800 of the Danes who had fled to the place for protection. Owing to this and other battles, and still more perhaps to its having been for many ages a favourite burying-place, the whole island is strewed some feet deep with human bones; and in some places where the sea has worn down the shore to a mural face or mimic perpendicular cliff, a stratum of human bones is visible 6 or 7 feet from the surface. At a late and more peaceful period, the merchants of Limerick had castles and stone dwelling-houses on the island,

"with a provost or warden, who might dispend 100 marks yearly;" in the reign of Henry VIII., Edmund Sexton recommended it as a proper site for a fortress, which, with one ship of 60 guns and two or three galleys, would overawe all the territory which now forms the counties of Clare, Limerick, Kerry, and Cork; and even in our own day, it figures as strong military ground, or at least as the site of a small fort.

But Inniscattery, after all, owes its main importance to its ecclesiastical antiquities and associations. An alleged bishopric is said to have been established on it by St. Patrick, and to have been governed for a time by himself, and then transferred to St. Senanus; and this supposed bishopric is asserted to have been united in the 12th century to the see of Limerick. St. Senanus, who makes the principal figure in whatever relates to the ecclesiastical associations of the island, is nearly as phantasmagorical a personage as St. Kevin of Glendalough, and forms the subject of probably as many and as wild legendary tales; but, on the whole, he may be described, according to the pictures of him by credulous admirers, as having been so chaste a monk as never to look at a woman or suffer one to be on the island, and so zealous a propagator of monasticism as to found many monasteries in Munster. Not one of the stories, grave or gay, which are narrated respecting him, can be received without enormous abatement and alteration; and the whole of them may be handed over to the poet Moore, with whom they have found favour, or to any similar writer of imagination, as incomparably a fitter person to deal with them than a plodding matter-of-fact topographer. Eleven churches are asserted to have been built on the island by Senanus; but the remains of only seven ecclesiastical structures—including under that name hermitage, sanctuary, oratory, tomb, or whatever else comes under the comprehensive old category of "kill" or "cella"—can now be traced, and three of these evince themselves, at a glance, to have been built long after the time when Senanus is said to have flourished. The cathedral, St. Mary's church, and another of the seven structures, are in the pointed style of architecture, but possess no particular attraction; the four other structures—one of them called Semon's Own, and another Teampul-an-Eird—measure only from 12 to 24 feet in length, and were lighted each with only one or two very small windows, little superior to loopholes; and such other objects of local note as are pointed out in connection with St. Senan or his followers, have no interest for any eye but that of a vulgar and fanatical devotee. But proudly over all the ruins and all the surface of the island soars one of the finest pillar-towers in the kingdom, springing from a base of 22 feet in circumference, shooting aloft to an altitude of 120 feet, wearing still its barrad or conical cap, and, though very long ago split by lightning almost from top to bottom, still retaining its integrity and its vertical position. This turraghan at once forms an useful landmark to mariners, and combines with the surface of the island and the surrounding objects to constitute a fine landscape as seen from Revenue-Hill in the vicinity of Kilrush.—Inniscattery is, of course, a favourite place of devoteism and pilgrimage. "A holy well in the island," says Mr. Hely Dutton, "is resorted to by great numbers of devotees, who, as they term it, take their rounds about it annually on their bare knees; and it is a frequent practice for those who cannot conveniently perform this penance, to pay at this and other holy wells a trifling gratuity to some persons to perform this ceremony for them; I have known a woman to make a trade of this mummary. The common people have a great veneration for this island and its ruins; they carry pebbles taken from it as preservatives against shipwreck, and the boatmen will not navigate a boat that has not taken a round about Scattery in a course opposite the sun."—The island gives an alias name to the Roman Catholic parish of Kilrush, which is in the dio. of Killaloe, and has chapels at Kilrush, Killimey, and Meagh.

INNISCLOGHRAN, or INNISCLOTHRAN, an islet in the barony of Rathline, co. Longford, Leinster. It lies in the vicinity of Innisboffin. St. Diarmid, usually called Dhiarmuet Naoimh, a contemporary of St. Senanus, and a descendant of the illustrious house of Hy-Fiachri in Connaught, is said to have founded here, about the year 540, an establishment which became famous for its schools, and for the large numbers of learned men who studied within its walls. Some prayers and litanies ascribed to him are thought by Dr. Lanigan not to have proceeded from his pen.

INNISCOO, an islet in the barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies in the Atlantic ocean, in the vicinity of Rutland Island; and measures about half-a-mile by $\frac{1}{4}$. The narrow sound between it and Rutland forms the harbour of the latter island. Inniscoo has a pier in good order; and, a number of years ago, was made the site of a building-yard.

INNISCROONAN. See INCHICRONANE.

INNISCRONE. See ENNISCRONE.

INNISCOURCEY. See INCH, co. Down.

INNISDADROM, an island, a little south of the centre of the estuary of the Fergus, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Newmarket, co. Clare, Munster. It extends south-westward; and though proportionately narrow, is about $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile in length. The incumbent of the benefice of Latteragh in the dio. of Killaloe, reports that it is mentioned in his titles as a rectory and vicarage, but that it is not in his possession.

INNISDONEY, an islet in the barony of Tyrkenney, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It lies in Lower Lough Erne, and contains about 24 acres.

INNISDOOH, an islet in the barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies in the Atlantic $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile north-north-east of Innisboffin.

INNISDRISCOL, an island in the district of Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It lies on the east side of the lower part of Roaring-Water bay, and across the mouth of the creek of Ringcove; and is separated by a narrow sound on the south-east from Innisherkin. Its length is about $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile, and its breadth about 1.

INNISDUFF, an islet in Fintra bay, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by south of Killybegs, co. Donegal, Ulster.

INNISFALLEN, a beautiful island, nearly in the centre of the Lower Lake of Killarney, and about $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-west of the town of Killarney, Munster. It comprises an area of 16 acres, is richly wooded, and has a sinuous shore-line partly of shallows and partly of bold rocks. "The view of Innisfallen, on the approach from any side," says the Guide to Killarney, "is of a totally different character from that of any other island on the lake: it impresses the visitor with an idea of luxuriance, comfort, and tranquillity: the surface of the glebe is spread with the brightest verdure over which flourish, in rich foliage, the greatest possible varieties of trees and shrubs. Groups of lofty oaks fling their arms over the sward beneath and the intervals between them are generally occupied by various shrubs, so that only an occasional glimpse is permitted, through the woods, the lake and distant mountains; occasional openings are left, where the richest imaginable pasture is unfolded, beautified by an undulating surface, and embosomed in sylvan scenery. In walking round the island, the variety to be met with in so small compass almost exceeds belief, and delights the admirer of the soft, the beautiful, and the gentle in nature to ecstasy." The lions of the island are fine specimens of the arbutus and the sorbus, very noble specimens of various forest trees, a holly of 14 feet in girth round the stem, a large hawthorn piercing the centre of a monumental stone, a crab-tree perforated with a large oblong aperture, called 'the eye of the needle,' a projecting rock overshadowed by an aged yew, and called 'the bed of honour,' and, above all, the ruins, monuments, and associations of an ancient abbey. The name Innisfallen may mean 'the beautiful or healthy island;' and the word Innisfaithlen, of which that name is possibly a corruption, means 'the island in the beautiful lake;' but the ancient name of the place was Innis-Nessan, or Innis-mac-Nessan, 'the island of the son of Nessan;' and this latter name was suggested by the circumstances of St. Dichull, the son of Nessan, and the reputed abbot of the island in 1640, being adopted as the patron saint of the locality. The abbey of Innisfallen is usually alleged to have been founded, toward the close of the 6th century, by St. Finian the leper, son of Alild, king of Munster; but, though its celebrated 'Annals' have the reputation of being one of the earliest and most authentic of the ancient Irish histories, hardly anything is known respecting the establishment till 1180, when, according to the translation of the Annals by Walter Harris, the Irish antiquary, "This abbey of Innisfallen being ever esteemed a paradise, and a secure sanctuary, the treasure and the most valuable effects of the whole country were deposited in the hands of the clergy, notwithstanding which, we find the abbey was plundered in this year by Maolduin, son of Daniel O'Donoghue; many of the clergy were slain, and, even in their cemetery, by the Macarthy's." In the reign of Elizabeth, the extensive possessions of this abbey and those of the abbey of Mucruss, were granted to Robert Collan for ever, in fee-farm, at a rent of £72 3s. The ruins of the abbey are rude, inconsiderable, nearly level with the ground, and indicative of a much later date than that of the alleged original founding of the establishment. But an older pile, an oratory, stands on a projecting cliff at the south-east end of the island, and has a Saxon arch, with chevron mouldings, partly quite perfect and very beautiful; and this little oratory, with rather doubtful taste, has been fitted up by Lord Kenmare as a banquetting-room, and provided with a large bay window, which commands charming views of Ross, Mucruss, Mangerton, Turk, and Glenna. The Annals of Innisfallen were written by one monk down to the year 1215, and continued by another to the year 1319; so that, on any matters earlier than the eleventh century, they cannot be regarded as of much, if any, greater authority than if they had been composed by a recluse of the present day; and, though containing extracts from the Old Testament, a history of the world down to St. Patrick's arrival in Ireland, and a view of Irish civil affairs from 432 to 1319, they are so exceedingly brief and superficial as to comprise only 57 leaves of medium quarto parchment. The original work is in the Bodleian library, and copies of it are in the libraries of the Duke of Chandos, the Duke of Buckingham, and the University of Dublin.

INNISFARNARD, an islet at the north side of the entrance of Coolac bay, barony of Bere, co.

Cork, Munster. It is separated by a very narrow channel from Kilcathrine Point in Bere, and lies 4½ miles south-east by south of Lamb Head in Kerry.

INNISFREE, an islet and a bay in the barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. The islet lies 1½ mile east-north-east of Crail Island, and about the same distance west of the entrance of Guidore bay; and the bay is a small indentation on the seaward side of the peninsula which separates Guidore bay from the Atlantic.

INNISFREE, a small island in the barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It measures about 2 miles in circumference; and lies 1 mile south of Rutland Island, and midway between the village of Dunglo and the island of Arran.

INNISGLORA, a rocky islet in the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies in the Atlantic, 1½ mile west of the nearest part of the Mullet, and 4 north by east of North Inniskeen.

INNISGOULA, an islet in the barony of Burishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies in Clew bay, ¾ miles west-south-west of Newport-pratt.

INNISHAE, an islet between Mannin bay and Ardbear Harbour, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught.

INNISHANNON, a parish, partly in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, but chiefly in the barony of Kinnalea, co. Cork, Munster. The Kinnalea section contains the town of Innishannon. Length of the parish, 4 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Carbery section, 2,832; of the Kinnalea section, 4,321 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,840; in 1841, 3,615. Houses 596. Pop. of the Carbery section, in 1831, 1,104; in 1841, 1,071. Houses 176. Pop. of the rural districts of the Kinnalea section, in 1831, 2,083; in 1841, 1,919. Houses 326. The surface forms one of the finest parts of the basin of the Bandon river; and exhibits, especially on the immediate banks of the stream, a large aggregate of beautiful scenery, and of villa and plantation adornment. Some of the land is prime; most is good; and all, with trivial exceptions, is fit for tillage. The chief mansions are the well-wooded seat of Mr. Adderly, adjoining the town, and Shippool, the seat of William H. Herrick, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition and gross income, £632 6s. 1½d.; nett, £548 11s. 10½d. Patron, the Crown, during the incapacity of Cuthbert Kearney, Esq. The church was partially rebuilt in 1761, at an expense of about £184 12s. 3½d., raised by subscription. Sittings 250; attendance 200. The Methodist chapel is attended by 45, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to the chapel of Knockavilla. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 438, and the Roman Catholics to 3,348; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 35 children; and 6 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £30 from the trustees of Sir E. Smith—had on their books 304 boys and 181 girls. In 1840, a National school was salaried with £18 from the Board, and had on its books 166 boys and 104 girls.

INNISHANNON, a small post-town in the parish of Innishannon, barony of Kinnalea, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on a beautiful bend of the Bandon river, and on the road from Cork to Bandon and Skibbereen, 3½ miles north-east of Bandon, 12 south-south-west of Cork, and 138 south-west by south of Dublin. Its site is on the left bank of the river, amidst woods and brilliant land and river scenery. Dr. Smith says that it was formerly a walled town, and that it exhibited the foundations of several castles and other large buildings. But, in spite of both its quondam importance and its fine situation, it long continued to be a poor decayed village; and did not begin to revive till about the middle of last century, when Thomas Adderley, Esq., erected a range of slated houses for linen-manufacturers, and established a bleaching-yard, with accompanying conveniences. The linen manufacture appears to have obtained a flattering footing, and to have promised fair to raise the town to a flourishing condition; yet though still in existence, it seems to have been almost irretrievably stunned by the blow inflicted on the general linen trade of the kingdom. A manufactory of calico and dimity was also established, but does not appear to have experienced tolerable success. The Bandon river is here tidal, and brings up vessels of considerable burden from Kinsale. Fairs are held on May 29 and Oct. 23. A dispensary in the town is within the Bandon Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 10,336; and, in 1839-40, it expended £133 10s. 10d., and administered to 1,550 patients. In the first year of Henry V., the town and its ferry were granted by letters patent, to Philip de Barry. A good stone bridge now carries the highway across the river. Area of the town, 37 acres. Pop., in 1831, 653; in 1841, 625. Houses 94. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 36; in manufactures and trade, 59; in other pursuits, 29. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 65; on their own manual labour, 44; on means not specified, 7.

INNISHARGIE, a parish in the barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It contains the town of KIRK-CUBBIN: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 5,516 acres, 26 perches. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 3,014; of the rural districts, 2,391. Houses in the whole, 577; in the rural districts, 459. The surface is principally a part of the east sea-board of Lough Strangford; yet extends on the north to the Irish Channel. The land, on the average, is of only middle-rate quality. The chief seats are Glashy, Innishargie, Nunsquarter, and Ballybeggan.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of St. Andrews, in the dio. of Down. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £149 13s. 2d., and the rectorial for £290 6s. 4d.; and the latter are appropriated to the see of Armagh, and held under lease by F. Savage, Esq. of Glashy. The other statistics are given, in cumulo with those of Ballywalter and Ballyhalbert, under the word St. Andrews.

INNISHARK, an island in the barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is separated by a narrow sound from the south-west side of INNISHOFFIN [which see]; and is proximately of a circular form, and rather upwards of $\frac{1}{2}$ mile in diameter. It is equally near a valuable fishing-bank as Innishoffin; but has no harbour or tolerably fair landing-place. Its pop. is nearly 200.

INNISHARN, an islet in the barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies in Killery Harbour, immediately west of the contraction of that romantic marine inlet.

INNISHEGILL, a common topographical misprint for INNISHEGIL: which see.

INNISHERE, an insular parish in the barony of Arran, co. Galway, Connaught. It is the most easterly of the Arran Islands; and is separated by the South Sound from co. Clare, distant $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Length, from east to west, 2 miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$; area, 1,400 acres, 12 perches,—of which 16 acres, 2 roods, 27 perches are water in Lough More. Pop., in 1831, 442; in 1841, 456. Houses 69. The highest ground has an altitude of 202 feet. Here are ruins of two churches.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLINAKILL [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £1 1s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and the rectorial for £3 5s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Rev. John Digby and his heirs. In 1834, the inhabitants were all Roman Catholics.

INNISHERKIN, or SHERKIN, an island in the parish of Tullagh, eastern division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It extends southward down the mouth of Baltimore bay, and away seaward to within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of Cape Clear Island; and, along with islands, islets, and rocks in its vicinity, it renders Baltimore bay an intricate though mimic archipelago. Its length is $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth is $1\frac{1}{2}$; its general breadth is about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile. Pop., in 1831, 1,026. The northern extremity is called Wren Head; and the southern extremity, Sleamore Point. The east side is all a high, bold, rocky coast, yet has a cove called the Horse-shoe; and adjacent to Wren Head, is another inlet, called Coney-Cove. The land is occasionally very good, and aggregately much superior to that of Cape Clear Island. The castle of Dunelong in Innisherkin stood opposite that of Dunashad; and the two were the property of the O'Driscolls, and defended the entrance of Baltimore Harbour; and, after the defeat of the Spaniards in 1601-2, they were surrendered by their proprietor to Captain Harvey. A regular fortification was afterwards erected on the island, and was garrisoned in the time of Queen Anne; but, about the middle of last century, was dismantled. Near it, when Dr. Smith wrote, were the remains of a barrack, and some old pieces of ordnance lying on the rocks. About a mile to the south of the fortress' site, stand the ruins of a Franciscan abbey, which was founded, in 1460, by Florence O'Driscoll, and built after the model of that of Kilcrea. The pile is smaller than its model, and in tolerably good preservation; and it exhibits a low square tower, and a nave with a southern arcaded wing. In 1537, the island was ravaged, and its public buildings damaged or destroyed, by the citizens of Waterford. Dr. Smith supposes the name Innisherkin to be a corruption of Inniskieran, 'the island of St. Kieran.'

INNISHMURRY. See INNISMURRY.

INNISHONAN. See INNISHANNON.

INNISHOWEN, or ENNISHOWEN, a peninsulated barony in the extreme north-east of co. Donegal, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the Atlantic Ocean; on the east, by Lough Foyle; on the south, by the Liberties of Londonderry and the barony of Raphoe; and on the west, by Lough Swilly and the Atlantic Ocean. Its greatest length, from Innishowen Head south-westward to the vicinity of Burt on Lough Swilly, is 22 miles; and its greatest breadth, from Malin Head south-eastward to the entrance of Lough Foyle, is $16\frac{1}{2}$ miles. and its area is 197,860 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches,—of which 354 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches are water. The coast is varied, yet, over the greater part, is bold, clifly, high, fissured, and romantic, and occasionally exhibits much grandeur in the combination of precipice, cavern, and ocean-swell: but ampler notices of it belong properly to the articles DONEGAL (COUNTY OF), CULDAFF, CLONCHA, MALIN-HEAD, MAGHERGARD, FOYLE, and SWILLY: which see. The chief indentations of the sea are the open bay of Culdaff on the north, and the intricate bay of Struthbreagy on the west. The surface of both seaboard and interior is nearly all upland, wild, moorish, and pastoral, with stripes and intersections of arable land; and, regarded in the aggregate, it presents more of the sternness and deariness than of the sublimity and the occasional brilliance of a Highland region. The mountains, hills, and moors, do not possess any well-defined arrangement; but may, in a general view, be regarded as declining off on all sides from the central and monarch summit of Slieve-naught, situated a little south-east of the centre of the peninsula. A district of about 14 square miles, which stretches past the Liberties of Londonderry and along the upper part of Lough Swilly, and includes the island of Inch, has much softness and amenity of character compared to that of the rest of the barony. Innishowen whiskey was long a household word throughout all the north of Ireland; and illicit distillation is said to have been carried on to such an enormous extent as to consume most of the grain raised within the barony. In 1831, the Earl of Belfast, eldest son of the Marquis of Donegal, was made a peer of Great Britain by the title of Baron Innishowen.—This barony contains the extraparochial districts of Effishbrella, and Currohill, and Mintiaghs, and the parishes of Burt, Cloneha, Clonmany, Culdaff, Dysertegney, Donagh, Lower Fahan, Upper Fahan, Inch, Lower Moville, Upper Moville, and Muff. The towns are Buncrana and Carndonagh; and the chief villages are Malin, Ballyliffin, Muff, Moville, Ballygorman, and Cleaugh. A recent arrangement has divided the barony into the two districts of Innishowen-East and Innishowen-West. Area of Innishowen-East, according to the statement of the Poor-law documents, 123,311 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches; annual valuation, £23,098 1s. 8d.; sums levied under the grand warrants of Spring and Summer, 1841, £2,224 18s. 4d., and £1,741 10s. 9d. Area of Innishowen-West, 74,321 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches; annual valuation, £20,929 11s. 9d.; sums levied under the grand warrants of Spring and Summer, 1841, £1,829 4s. 8d., and £1,455 6s. 3d. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 55,217; in 1841, 55,462. Houses 9,688. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 7,138; in manufactures and trade, 2,526; in other pursuits, 562. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 7,283; who could read but not write, 5,690; who could neither read nor write, 10,639. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,670; who could read but not write, 7,190; who could neither read nor write, 15,062. Innishowen lies partly within the Poor-law union of Innishowen, and partly within that of Londonderry. The total number of tenements valued is 7,251; and of these, 3,819 were valued under £5,—2,165, under £10,—593, under £15,—239, under £20,—130, under £25,—65, under £30,—115, under £40,—46, under £50,—and 79, at and above £50.

The Innishowen Poor-law union ranks as the 119th, and was declared on September 18, 1840. It lies wholly in the barony of Innishowen, and comprehends an area of 159,323 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 43,238. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are Carndonagh, 2,833; Gleneganon, 1,359; Glentogher, 1,123; Whitecastle, 1,977; Redcastle, 1,661; Castle-Cary, 1,523; Moville, 2,392; Greencastle, 2,616; Turmone, 2,480; Gleneely, 1,868; Culdaff, 2,154; Carthage, 2,058; Malin, 2,026; Ardmalin, 2,851; Ballyliffin, 2,363; Straid, 2,160; Dunaff, 1,927; Dysertegney, 1,913; Mintiaghs, 1,256; Illies, 1,215; and Buncrana, 3,486. The number of elected guardians is 23, and of ex-officio guardians 6; and of the former, 2 are elected by each of the divisions of Carndonagh and Buncrana, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total number of valued tenements is 6,252; and of these, 3,533 were valued under £5,—1,917, under £10,— 457, under £15,—140, under £20,—82, under £25,—30, under £30,—48, under £40,—14, under £50,—and 31 at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £36,930; the total number of persons rated is 6,184; and of these, 375 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—797, not exceeding £2,—951, not exceeding £3,—823, not exceeding £4,—and 786, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was opened in October, 1843; it contains accommodation for 600 paupers; and on December 2, 1843, it had only 20 pauper inmates. The medical charities within the union are dispensaries at Buncrana, Clonmany, Culdaff, Donagh, and Moville; and, in 1839, they received £273 6s. 1d. from subscription, and £273 6s. 1d. from public grants, expended £353 in salaries to medical officers, £150 1s. for medicines, and £49 6s. for contingencies, and administered to 9,770 patients. Some public documents give the name Carndonagh to the Innishowen Poor-law union.

INNISHRATER, an island in Lough Corrib, co. Galway, Connaught. It is upwards of 1½ mile long; and lies 2¼ miles east-north-east of Oughterard.

INNISHRUIN, an islet in the barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies in the Atlantic, about ¼ of a mile west of Renvyle Point.

INNISHUGH, an islet in the barony of Burris-hole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies in Clew bay, 5 miles west-south-west of Newportpratt.

INNISIRRER, or INNISURRER, an island in the barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is upwards of a mile in length; and lies half-a-mile west of the nearest part of the mainland; and 3 miles south-south-west of Bloody-Foreland.

INNISKEA, two islands, and a fishing-bank, in the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. The islands are mutually distinguished by the prefixes of North and South; and they lie parallel to the southern part of the peninsula of the Mullet at the distance of from 2¼ to 4 miles, to the west, and, in their nearest parts, are 4½ miles west-north-west of Blacksod Point, and 9 north by east of Achill Head. North Inniskea is 2¼ miles long, and extends from north to south; South Inniskea is 1½ mile long, and extends from north-north-east to south-south-west; but the two practically form only one island, being mutually separated by a sound not 50 fathoms wide. Their west side is a cliff with several wild coves; and their east side, especially that of North Inniskea, is an extensive blowing sand. A tolerable anchorage occurs on the east, nearly opposite the sound; a practicable cove occurs, in the North Island, about a mile from this anchorage; and a boat-cove and landing-place, long in use, occur on the flanking islet of Rusheena, and communicate with Inniskea by a strand which is dry at half tide.—Inniskela bank extends from 5 to 8 leagues westward of the islands; is abundantly stocked with ling; and is much frequented, from May to August, by wherries with spiller and long lines.

INNISKEEL, a parish, 11 miles north of Killybegs, partly in the barony of Bannagh, and partly in that of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length, 24 miles; breadth, 8. Pop., in 1831, 11,432; in 1841, 12,606. But part of the parish is ecclesiastically included in the quoad sacra parish of ARDARA: which see. Pop. of the remaining district, or of the quoad sacra parish of Inniskeel, in 1831, 8,266. The whole parish is also politically divided into the two parishes of Upper Inniskeel and Lower Inniskeel, the former of which is in Bannagh, and the latter in Boyleagh, while the two are mutually separated by the sea-lough called Loughrusmore. Area of Upper Inniskeel, 21,627 acres, 2 roods, 27 perches,—of which 198 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,560; in 1841, 2,880. Houses 504. Area of Lower Inniskeel, 80,453 acres, 3 roods, 9 perches,—of which 730 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches are tideway of the Guibarra, and 1,671 acres, 38 perches are water in lakes. Pop., in 1831, 8,872; in 1841, 9,726. Houses 1,596. The entire district includes some islets in the Atlantic; conflicts wildly with the ocean from Gull island northward to the Guibarra estuary; and extends north-eastward from the Glen river, through the moorish, broken, and chaotic basin of the Awinea, the Stracashel, the Finn, and the Guibarra rivers, to the rugged mountainous region around Lough Muck—a lake whose elevation above sea-level is 678 feet. Though the surface presents some pendicles of good land, it pre-vaillingly riots in wilderness of bog, moor, and partially pastoral mountain. Rochrow summit in Upper Inniskeel has an altitude of 1,649 feet; and Aughta summit in Lower Inniskeel has an altitude of 1,958 feet. The chief lake in Upper Inniskeel is Nalughraman, and has an elevation of 593 feet; and the chief lakes in Lower Inniskeel are Finn, 438 feet,—Fa, Kip, Macew, Derryduff, Sheskinmore, Doon, Derkmore, Nacroaghy, Drumnalough, and Muddy. The sea-lough, called Loughrusbeg, deeply indents Upper Inniskeel. The village of GLENTIES [which see], is situated in Lower Inniskeel.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £512; glebe, £30. Gross income, £542; nett, £405 11s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £70. The church was built in 1825, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 200; attendance 125. There is a church also in the perpetual curacy of Ardara. The Wesleyan meeting-house is attended by 10, and the Glenties and Finntown Roman Catholic chapels by respectively 1,600 and 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter are mutually united. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Ardara. In 1834—exclusive of the perpetual curacy of Ardara—the inhabitants consisted of 576 Churchmen, 11 Presbyterians, and 8,039 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £11 1s. 6d. and other advantages from Robinson's Fund,* and one with £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 115 boys and 46 girls. In 1840, the National Board had a school at Killelooney, attended by 64 boys and 28 girls; and granted £111 5s. toward the erection of a boys' school and a girls' school at Glenties.

INNISKEEL, an islet in the above parish, barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies adjacent to the mainland, off the entrance of the Guibarra estuary, and about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile west of Inniskeel church.

INNISKEEN. See ENNISKEEN.

INNISKELTAIR, an alias name of INNISCALTHERA; which see.

INNISKENNY. See INCHKENNY.

INNISKERACH, an islet in the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies in the Atlantic ocean, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile south of Innisglora, and 5 miles north-north-east of North Inniskea.

INNISKERRY. See ENNISKERRY.

INNISKEY. See ENNISCOFFEY.

INNISKILLEN. See ENNISKILLEN.

INNISLACKEN, a small island at the middle of the entrance of Roundstone bay, parish of Moyrus, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It is a coast-guard station; and within the district belonging to that station, there are employed in the fisheries 100 half-decked vessels of aggregately 950 tons with 450 men, 14 open sail-boats with 60 men, and 250 row-boats with 1,000 men.

INNISLIRE, an islet of the barony of Burris-hoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies in Clew bay, $\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-west of Newportpratt.

INNISLONNAGH, or INNISLOUGH. See ABBEY.

INNISMACAINT, or ENNISMACAINT, a parish, partly in the barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, but chiefly in the barony of Magheraboy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The Donegal section contains the villages of Bundoran and Single-Street, and part of the town of BALLYSHANNON; and the Fermanagh section contains the village of DERRYCONNELLY, and a small portion of CHURCHILL: see these articles. Length of the parish, 20 miles; breadth, 4. Area of the co. Donegal section, 7,126 acres, 3 roods, 30 perches,—of which 27 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches are in the river Erne. Area of the Fermanagh section, 45,867 acres, 32 perches,—of which 886 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches are in part of Lough Melvin, 567 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches are in the river Erne and in small lakes, and 8,002 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches are in part of Lower Lough Erne. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 14,874;* in 1841, 14,693. Houses 2,585. Pop. of the Fermanagh section, in 1831, 8,254; in 1841, 9,124. Houses 1,599. Pop. of the rural districts of the Donegal section, in 1841, 3,866. Houses 690. The surface, with the exception of some insulated ground in Lower Lough Erne, consists of a belt or band of country, extending along the left bank of Lower Lough Erne and the river Erne, from a point $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles below Enniskillen, away to Lough Melvin and Donegal bay below the embouch of Ballyshannon Harbour; and, in nearly all its distinctive character, as to contour and scenery, it has already been partly noticed in the article ERNE: which see. About one-fifth is irreclaimable mountain and bog; about one-fifth is pastoral mountain; and the remainder is good land, partly pastoral and partly arable. The road from Enniskillen to Ballyshannon passes down the margin of the lake. Mr. Fraser, noticing the most interesting parts of the route along that road and within the parish, says, "Churchill is a village on the top of one of the numerous ridges which rise, summit over summit, till they blend with the more elevated and westerly hills of Shean and Glenalong. A little to the south of the village of Churchill are the small but romantically situated loughs of Carrick and Bunnahone, the sources of the Sillies river. * * From the glebe-house of Churchill to the church of Ruscar, our road continues along the shores of the lake, and discloses at every turn some new and striking combination of wood and water on the one hand, or hill and dale on the other. At two miles from the glebe, we reach the rocky dell of Phoul-a-Phouca, which forms a part of the wild and picturesquely broken acclivities of Shean-North, the most remarkable for its elevation and shape of the hills along the whole course of the Erne. As the most extensive, if not the best views of the Lower Lough, its shores, and islands, are obtained from the eminences near Phoul-a-Phouca, we would recommend the tourist, anxious to know the topography of the district, to ascend the steeps of Shean. In addition to the views of Lough Erne, its islands and boundaries, &c., the tourist will be gratified with the mountain-scenery and the numerous small glistening tarns which are scattered along the dreary mountains lying westward between the hills of Shean-North and Glenalong." The summits of Glenalong and North Shean have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 795 and 1,135 feet. The island of Innismacsaint, which gives name to the parish, is situated in Lough Erne, about half-a-mile from the shore, and 3 miles east-south-east of Churchill; and was the site of a somewhat famous abbey, which monastic writers allege to have been founded early in the 6th century by St. Nenn or Nernid of the blood royal of Ireland. "The saint's bell, ornamented with gold and silver," says Archdall, "is yet preserved here as a precious relique, and is holden in so great veneration amongst the lower class of people, that it is often judicially tendered them to swear on." The abbey-church was eventually made parochial; but was superseded, in the reign of Queen Anne, by a church on the mainland; and this, in its turn, was recently superseded, and is now in a state of ruin.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £500; glebe, £321 19s. 8½d. Gross income, £821 19s. 8½d.; nett, £685 13s. 8½d. Patron, the Marquis of Ely. Three curates have each a salary of £69 4s. 7½d., and a small amount of marriage-fees. The parish-church was built in 1831, by means of a loan of £1,384 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance 250. Two chapels-of-ease at Slavan and Finnar can each accommodate 180 persons, and have an attendance of respectively 80 and 25; but the summer attendance at Finnar, in consequence of the vicinity of the bathing-place of Bundoran, rises far beyond 25, which is the winter attendance. Two school-houses connected with the Establishment, in the districts of Churchill and Slavan, have an attendance of respectively 45 and 30. A Methodist meeting-house in Churchill is attended by 50; a Primitive Methodist meeting-house at Cosbystown, by 60; and another Primitive Methodist meeting-house, by 70. The Roman Catholic chapels of Ruscar and Knockaraven, have an attendance of respectively 650 and 850; the Roman Catholic chapels of Bundoran and Carrickbeg have each an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, each of these two pairs of chapels are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3,756, and the Roman Catholics to 10,342; 5 Sunday schools at Churchill, Bundoran, Conagher, Blacksieve, and Cosbystown, were attended, on the average, by 194 children; and 24 daily schools—three of which were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, one with the Kildare Place Society, and one with the Association for Discouraging Vice—had on their books 819 boys and 408 girls.

INNISMACKLELAN, the most southerly of the chief isles of the Blasquet group, barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It lies 2½ miles south by west of the Great Blasquet.

INNISMAGRATH, a parish in the barony of Dromahaire, 5 miles south-east of the village of Dromahaire, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It contains the village of DRUMKEERAN: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 6½; area, 27,439 acres, 12 perches, —of which 4,026 acres, 8 perches are in Lough Allen, and 54 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 7,976; in 1841, 9,603. Houses 1,089. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 9,134. Houses 1,451. A district, comprising an area of 844 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches, lies detached 1½ mile north of the north-east extremity. The surface of the whole parish declines southward and eastward to the head and the west side of Lough Allen, and is to a large extent mountainous, yet contains a considerable proportion of good arable and pasture land. Two summits, the one on the west border and the other on the southern bound-dary, have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 1,125 and 1,377 feet. The southern district is part of the chief mineral field of Connaught. See CONNAUGHT and ARIGNA. Corry Lodge, the seat of F. N. Cullen, Esq., stands on the shore of Lough Allen; and the glebe of Innismagrath is adjacent. —This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £220; glebe, £385. Gross income, £605; nett, £520 0s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The benefice, though called a vicarage, is practically a rectory; but the incumbent pays £20 a-year in lieu of appropriation to the bishop. The church was built in 1829, at the cost of £1,115 14s. 6½d., of which £923 1s. 6½d. was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £192 13s. was raised off the parish. Sittings 300; attendance 60. The Bog and Termon Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 2,500 and 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 483, and the Roman Catholics to 7,827; and 13 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £6 from subscription—had on their books 681 boys and 190 girls.

INNISMAIN. See ENNISMAIN.

INNISMAKEERA, an islet in the barony of Kilmaecrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies in the Atlantic, about 1¼ mile west of Rutland, and 1¼ south of Arran.

INNISMANAN, an islet in the barony of Kilmaecrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies in the Atlantic, about half-a-mile from the mainland, 1 mile south by east of Innisirr, and 1 north-east of Gola.

INNISMORE, an alias name of ARRANMORE: which see.

INNISMORE, an alias name of CHURCH ISLAND [which see], in Lough Gill, co. Sligo, Connaught.

INNISMORE, an islet in Upper Lough Erne, half-a-mile south of Belleisle, co. Fermanagh, Ulster.

INNISMOTT, INNISMOTH, or INNISMOUTHY, a parish on the east border of the barony of Lower Slane, and of the county of Meath, and 3 miles west-south-west of Ardee, Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,457 acres. Pop., in 1831, 405; in 1841, 481. Houses 74. The surface is diversified in contour, and declines eastward along the course of the Dee; the upland part of it is good; but a great proportion of the remainder consists of lands subject to floods, and of a boggy quality.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, and gross income, £15; nett, £12 18s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the united benefices of Painstown and Ardmulchan in the dio. of Meath. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £65; and are inappropriate in the sheriffs of Drogheda, but were lately transferred by them to the chaplain of the free church of Drogheda. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 416.

INNISMURRAY, a small island in the parish of Ahamplish, barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. It lies off the south side of the entrance of Donegal bay, 3 miles north of Gessigo Point, and 3¼ north-west of Ahamplish church. A gentleman who visited it in 1779, thus described it: "This island is a rock rising from the sea, with horrid precipices toward the ocean, but shelving gently like steps on the side opposite the mainland. It contains about 130 acres of a shallow soil, from 4 to 5 inches in depth, which serves to feed some sheep, a few cows, and 5 or 6 horses. The remainder of the island is a mere rock. The habitable part contains about 40 or 50 people, children included, who live in 5 houses, with as many barns adjoining them. They intermarry amongst each other; and, when the land is overstocked with inhabitants, they seek their fortune on the great island of Ireland. They are one community, and live by selling their fish on the mainland. They speak Irish only, one man bowed beneath the weight of years excepted; and boast their having had this island in possession upwards of 700 years." Escape from the island or access to it is sometimes rendered impossible for successive months, in consequence of the perilous and exposed character of the only boat harbour. The inhabitants were, for many years, ingloriously distinguished by the practice of illicit distillation. The islanders make a loud and lusty but ridiculous boast of the alleged sanctity of their insular home; and are aided by monkish antiquaries in asserting a pretence that an abbey was built upon it by St. Molaisse and St. Columba, and governed in the 8th century by St. Dicholla. "What is called the abbey," says Dr. MacParlan, "is an enclosure of dry stones, from 5 to 7 and 8 feet thick. It is impossible to determine whether it is round or oval: more rude, inelegant workmanship never was seen. There are a few cells under ground, which receive their light, some by a hole at the top, others by loopholes at the sides; they are dark and horrible dungeons. There are also two chapels built with mortar, and quite in a gross state, as is St. Molaisse's cell, which has a stone roof, and where the saint's statue is preserved. One of the chapels standing by itself has an extraordinary window, the arch of which is one rough crooked stone, just in its original shape. Here is an altar, called the cursing-altar, which is covered with round stones; and north-west of this stands the altar of the Trinity." The inhabitants narrate some absurd traditions respecting a rude wooden image which they have of St. Molaisse.

INNISNEBROE, an islet in the barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It is one of the Blasquet group; and lies between the Great Blasquet and Innismackelán.

INNISNEE, an island in Roundstone bay, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It, in a sense, screens the east side of Roundstone bay from Birterbuy bay, and an inlet of the latter toward the mouth of the Ballinahinch rivulet; and it extends upwards of 2 miles north and south, but is proportionally very narrow. See ROUNDSTONE.

INNISNEGANANAGH. See CANON-ISLAND.

INNISPATRICK, or PATRICK'S ISLE. See HOLMPATRICK.

INNISPOLLAN, a grange in the barony of Lower Glenarm, 1½ mile west of Cushendun, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, south-south-eastward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 7 furlongs; area, 933 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches. It descends from lofty ground, to the bottom of Cushendun glen; and is traversed by the road from Cushendun to Ballycastle. In ecclesiastical matters, it is included in the parish of Layd. Pop., in 1841, 135. Houses 19.

INNISQUIN. See INCHQUIN, co. Galway.

INNISROCHA, an islet in Lower Lough Erne, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It is alleged by monastic writers to have been the site of an abbey about the beginning of the 6th century.

INNISRUSH, a village in the parish of Tamlaght-O'Crailly, barony of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Area, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 282. Houses 38.

INNISTALLA, an islet in the barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies in the Atlantic, ½ of a mile south-east of Innisturk.

INNISTEGIL, an islet in the barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies near the mainland, on the west side of the entrance of Killery Harbour.

INNISTIOGUE, a parish, containing a town of the same name, on the south border of the barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 3½ miles; area, 9,741 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches,—of which 30 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches are in the river Nore. Pop., in 1831, 3,221; in 1841, 3,501. Houses 523. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,315; in 1841, 2,545. Houses 382. The surface extends along the right bank of the Nore; and exhibits a large aggregate of fertility, embellishment, and beauty. The Nore is here a broad and tidal stream, luxuriating among improved demesne-grounds, and between bold and wooded banks. Woodstock, the magnificent demesne of W. F. Tighe, Esq., adorns the vicinity of the town; and elsewhere are the demesnes of Firgrove, Brownsbarn, and Ballyduff. The highest ground is Skeaghanagh-hill, whose altitude above sea-level is 812 feet.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £230; glebe, £15. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £200, and are inappropriate in Caesar Sutton, Esq., co. Wexford. The vicarage of Innistogue and the rectory of CLONEAMERY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Innistogue. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 3,998. Gross income, £380; nett, £288 3s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the united benefice of Kilbescon, Rosinan, and Killaghy, in the dio. of Ossory. The church was built in 1825, at the cost of £1,384 12s. 3½d.; of which £276 18s. 5½d. was gifted by W. F. Tighe, Esq., £830 15s. 4½d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, and £276 18s. 5½d. was borrowed from that Board. Sittings 200; attendance 120. The Methodist meeting-house is attended by 70; the Roman Catholic chapel of Innistogue, by 1,700; a private house used as a Roman Catholic chapel in Innistogue, by 45; and the Roman Catholic chapel of Clodiagh in Cloneamery, by 550; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, these Roman Catholic chapels are united to the chapel of Rower. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 276, and the Roman Catholics to 3,012; the Protestants of the union to 339, and the Roman Catholics to 3,742; and 5 daily schools in the union—4 of which were in the parish—were attended, on the average, by 281 children. One of the Innistogue schools was aided with £20 a-year and a house and garden, from Lady Louisa Tighe; and one, with £25 from W. Tighe, Esq., £2 from Lady Louisa Tighe, and £2 from the rector. In 1840, a National school in Innistogue was salaried with £15, and had on its books 124 boys.

INNISTIOGUE, a small market and post town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the above parish, is situated on the west bank of the Nore, and on the road from Kilkenny to New Ross, 4½ miles south-east of Thomastown, 7½ north-north-west of New Ross, and 62½ south-south-west of Dublin. It consists principally of one square of comfortable slated houses, with rows of lime-trees planted before the doors; and is so neat and cleanly in itself, sits so warmly embowered among wood, and melts so lusciously into one landscape with the exquisite demesne of Woodstock, as almost to charm even a churlish visitor. The base and part of the shaft of a lofty stone cross stand in the centre of the square, the former sculptured with the arms of Fitzgerald impaled with those of Morres. A handsome bridge of ten equal arches, built after a design by Mr. G. Smith, and ornamented on the south side with Ionic pilasters, connects the town with the left bank of the Nore; and near it is an ancient tower or castle. The town was formerly protected with walls. Ruins exist of a priory for Augustinian canons, founded about the year 1210 by Thomas Fitz-Anthony, then seneschal of Leinster; but they do not evince the structure to have been either spacious or magnificent. The windows are of the lancet form; and two steeples remain,—the one octangular, and the other square, and somewhat like the tower of Dunbrody. A previous monastic establishment is alleged to have been founded at Innistogue so early as the year 800.

A charter of 6 James I. recites that Innistogue was an ancient borough, and had from time to time sent members to parliament; and grants that it should thenceforth be called the town and borough of Innistogue, and that it should have a corporation, consisting of a portreeve, 12 chief burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen. In 1833, the officers were a portreeve, a recorder, and bailiffs; there were but 9 burgesses and 4 freemen; and a portreeve's court was held monthly, with jurisdiction in cases not exceeding £20 Irish. There is no corporation property; and the compensation of £15,000 for loss of franchise at the Legislative Union, was awarded to William Tighe, Esq., and the portreeve and burgesses. The charter grants a weekly market on Friday, and fairs are held on June 9 and 13, and Oct. 14. In 1841, the Innistogue Loan Fund had a capital of £163, circulated £604 in 268 loans, and realized £11 7s. 11d. of nett profit. A dispensary here is within the New Ross Poor-law union, and serves for a population of 3,221; and, in 1839–40, it expended £134 3s. 11d., and made 8,493 dispensations of medicine. Area of the town, 25 acres. Pop., in 1831, 906; in 1841, 956. Houses 141. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 82; in manufactures and trade, 88; in other pursuits, 38. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 7; on the directing of labour, 82; on their own manual labour, 104; on means not specified, 15.

INNISTRAHULL. See ENNISTRAHULL.

INNISTRAVAN, an islet in the barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies in the sound which connects the heads of Kilkerran and Greatman's bays; and is $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile north by east of Littermore.

INNISTUISKAR, a small island in the barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It lies in the Atlantic, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-north-west of the Great Blasquet, and 4 west-north-west of Dunmore Head.

INNISTURK, an island in the barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies in the Atlantic, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-north-east of Innishoffin, $4\frac{1}{4}$ south-south-west of Clare Island, and 6 west of the nearest part of the mainland. Its length is $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles; its breadth is 1; and it extends in a direction south of west. It consists chiefly of slate rock. The western side is a steep cliff; but the eastern side is lower, and has several coves. The only landing-place or harbour is at one of two coves which fork from the head of a small bay, 100 fathoms broad, 50 fathoms long, and 4 fathoms deep, with a bottom of strong clay at the east end of the island. A pier was built here at an expense of £477 6s., but went to ruins; and the inhabitants, amounting to about 80 families, and chiefly dependent on the fisheries for support, became hardly able, though living in the centre of the most valuable fishery on the coast, to obtain a sufficient supply for their own support. A suitable artificial harbour was afterwards planned by Mr. Nimmo. Innisturk is a coast-guard station.

INNISURRER. See INNISRER.

INNISVACHTUIR, an islet in Lough Sheelan, barony of Demifore, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Archdall alleges that St. Carthag built an abbey here in 540.

INNY (THE), a river of the north-west of Leinster. It issues from Lough Sheelan; and flows $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile on the boundary between co. Cavan and co. Westmeath, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles on the boundary between co. Longford and co. Westmeath, 10 in the interior of co. Westmeath, $3\frac{1}{4}$ again on the boundary between co. Longford and co. Westmeath, $6\frac{1}{4}$ in the interior of co. Longford, and $1\frac{1}{4}$ partly on the southern boundary, and partly in the interior of co. Longford; and it falls into the head of the extreme easterly expansion of Lough Ree, at a point $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile east of Saints' Island. The first half of its course is southerly; and the second half is south-westerly. In its progress, it passes through the side of Lough Keinail and the head of Loughs Dereveragh and Iron, and receives numerous tributaries, all of which are small. Much of the upper part of its run is through a flat, tame, boggy country; but the lower part of its run is through a district not only rich and beautiful, but rendered classic by association with the names and writings of Oliver Goldsmith and Maria Edgeworth. The river contains salmon, trout, pike, perch, roach, tench, bream, and eels; yet, we believe, is not a good trouting stream. A proposal was long ago made to render the Inny navigable to Lough Dereveragh; and few rivers present, for such a length of way, so much facility for water-carriage.

INNY (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. It rises among the lofty mountains on the east border of the barony, and has a westerly course of about 12 miles to the head of Ballinskelligs bay. A very large aggregate of its vale, amounting to an area of not less than 16,100 acres, is bog; and this lies in nearly the proportion of 8 parts on the north side to 3 on the south. In this great tract, there is every variety of depth, from 3 to 25 feet; but the red portions of the bog are principally on the north side. The estimated expense of reclamation is £3,774 15s.

INVER, a parish on the north border of the barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,773 acres, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 953; in 1841, 1,020. Houses 169. It contains the villages of INVERBEG and INVERMORE; which see. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 580; in 1841, 612. Houses 102. Lough Larne forms the eastern boundary; and Larne river forms the northern boundary, and divides Inver from the parish and post-town of Larne. One half of the land is of a good quality; and the other half is light and poor. The coast-road from Belfast to Glenarm passes northward through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CARRICKFERGUS [which see], in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £30. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 75 Churchmen, 863 Presbyterians, 7 other Protestant dissenters, and 54 Roman Catholics; and a daily school was salaried with £8 from the National Board, and had on its books 46 boys and 26 girls.

INVER, a fishing village in the parish of Kilcommon, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the east shore of Broadhaven, immediately within the chief contraction of that great inlet, and about 6 miles north-east of Belmullet. Inver Point, adjacent to the village, was recommended by Mr. Nimmo as the most suitable site for the erection of small artificial harbour-works in Broadhaven. A recently made road runs from the village along the side of Carrowmore Lake to a junction with the central Erris road, and affords a ready communication with Castlebar, and other places in the interior; and the strands of Broadhaven above Inver are passable at low water, and serve as a road to Belmullet. Pop. returned with the parish.

INVER, a parish on the south coast of the barony of Bannagh, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Killybegs, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains the villages of PORT and MOUNT-CHARLES: which see. Length, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $6\frac{1}{2}$; area, 36,810 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches,—of which 205 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 11,785; in 1841, 12,835. Houses 2,195. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 12,098. Houses 2,071. About one-third of the surface is tolerably fair arable land; and the remainder is heathy upland pasture, and wild irreclaimable mountain. Benbawn, the principal eminence, is very extensive, 1,490 feet in altitude, and entirely barren or heathy; and it forms part of a great chain which extends from the Atlantic about 20 miles eastward, and then deflects to the south, and extends toward Lough Erne. The Inver rivulet issues from a lake on the top of a mountain at the eastern extremity of the parish, tumbles headlong over the side of the mountain in a cataract called the Grey Mare's Tail, and runs about 6 miles south-westward to the head of Inver bay. One small lake near Mount-Charles, flings up some fine and indurated specimens of white cornelian; one called Lough Tawer, near the foot of Benbawn, contains a few small pearls; and one, called Lough Braddon, on the western boundary, produces fine trout, and emits a rivulet called the Oyley. Inver bay may be regarded as entering either between Durin Point on the east and St. John's Cape on the south-west, which are 5 miles asunder, or between Durin Point and the due westward part of Dunkaneely peninsula, which are $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles asunder; and, measured from the latter entrance, it penetrates the land $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-north-eastward, and gradually diminishes in width toward the head. It forms a good fishing ground, and contains almost all the kinds of fish which are common on the west coast. The small village of Inver, situated at its head, is dependent chiefly on fishing at the bar of the Inver rivulet; and though only small boats can surmount that bar, a good number of them pass it, and take harbourage behind sand-hills within. The village of Port-of-Inver is situated on the west side of the bay, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile from Inver; and there a pier was built, by public grant, at the cost of £1,600, with a view to encourage the fishery for whales, which then frequented the coast. But "this pier," says Mr. Nimmo in the Report of his Coast Survey, "has been neglected, and is now a total ruin; nevertheless we saw 23 boats sheltered behind it; and, if repaired, it would be of great service. There is a salt-house here, to which 2 or 3 vessels of 60 tons come yearly. The pier could be repaired for about £1,200." The mansions of the parish are the Hall, a small lodge of the Marquis of Conyngham; Seaview, the summer residence of the Earl of Belmore; Salthill, Mrs. Montgomery; Bonneyglen, M. Babington, Esq.; Cloverhill, Mr. H. Montgomery; and Kilmaeredan, R. Nesbit, Esq. A small Franciscan friary was founded at Inver in the 15th century; and Archdall says that St. Natalis, who died in 563, presided over a monastic institution which probably stood on the same site. The road from Donegal to Killybegs passes westward along the coast.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £346 3s. 1d.; glebe, £232 17s. 6d. Gross income, £579 0s. 7d.; nett, £463 12s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Templecrone, in the dio. of Raphoe. A curate has a salary of £80. The church was built in 1807, at the cost of £1,384 12s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; of which £461 10s. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. was raised by private subscription, and the remainder by parochial assessment. Sittings 500; attendance 260. A room in Mount-Charles is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 70. A school-house, used as a Methodist meeting-house, is attended by 40; and the Roman Catholic chapel, by 1,400. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 2,586, and the Roman Catholics to 9,199; 4 Sunday schools were attended, on the average, by 167 children; and 17 daily schools had on their books 481 boys and 246 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £11 1s. 6d., and other advantages from Robinson's Fund; one, with £30 and other advantages from Erasmus Smith's Fund; one, with £3 from subscription, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £5 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society; and one with £26 from the Wesleyan Missionary Society. In 1840, the National Board granted £74 3s. 4d. toward the erection of a school at Drimbarren. The Inver and Mount-Charles dispensary is within the Donegal Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £85 19s. 2d., and administered to 1,888 patients.

INVERAN, a creek on the north side of Galway bay, between Costello bay and Spiddle, barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It has been improved by the proprietor, Mr. Blake; and affords shelter to small boats.

INVERBEG, a village in the parish of Inver, barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. Pop., in 1831, 133.

INVERMORE, a village in the parish of Inver, barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. Pop., in 1831, 230. The villages of Invermore and Inverbeg appear to be jointly what the Census of 1841 returns as "part of the town of Larne." Area, 30 acres. Pop., in 1841, 408. Houses 67.

IRAGHTICONNOR, a barony in the extreme north of the county of Kerry, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by the estuary of the Shannon; on the east, by the county of Limerick; on the south, by the barony of Clanmaurice; and on the west, by the barony of Clanmaurice and the estuary of the Shannon. Its greatest length, south-eastward, is 15 miles; its greatest breadth, south-westward, is 13; and its area is 102,360 acres,—of which 14,139 acres are tideway. The greater part of the soil is bog and marsh, wet in winter, but dry and affording pasturage in summer. Two knots of hilly ground lie respectively in the north-west district and on the eastern border. The coast consists partly of high sand hills, and partly of a long and noble range of cliffs, famous for their old castles, and for their caves of Ballybunion. The Gale rivulet bisects the interior into two unequal portions; and the Feale and Cashen rivers trace the whole of the boundary with Clanmaurice, so as to cut off Iraghticonnor from the rest of Kerry. Most of the barony formerly belonged to the O'Connors of Kerry; and the whole of it takes from them its topographical name.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Duagh, Dysert, and Rattoo, and the whole of the parishes of Aghavallagh, Ballyconry, Gally, Killahinny, Kilconly, Kilnaughten, Knockanure, Lisselton, Listowel, and Murhur. The towns are Tarbert, Listowel, and Ballylongford; and the chief villages are Gunsborough, Ballybunion, Lisselton, and Newtownsand. Pop., in 1831, 29,481; in 1841, 34,535. Houses 5,424. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,560; in manufactures and trade, 937; in other pursuits, 466. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,389; who could read but not write, 1,524; who could neither read nor write, 8,059. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,491; who could read but not write, 1,282; who could neither read nor write, 11,207. — Iraghticonnor lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Listowel. The total number of valued tenements is 5,310; and of these, 3,336 were valued under £5,—594, under £10,—421, under £15,—300, under £20,—218, under £25,—113, under £30,—135, under £40,—85, under £50,—and 108, at and above £50.

IRELAND. See GENERAL INTRODUCTION to this work.

IRELAND'S EYE, a rocky islet in the barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. It lies in the Irish Sea, nearly 1 mile north of the town of Howth, and nearly $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of the Portmarnock peninsula. Its surface comprises an area of 53 acres, 24 perches; soars up in the form of a pyramid; and exhibits some broken and pinnacled rocks, which, as seen from the mainland, have a castellated appearance. The islet forms a natural breakwater to Howth Harbour, produces a number of rare wild plants, and figures most romantically in a brilliant and far-spread sheet of coast and ocean landscape; but, in other respects, it is of small value, and is overrun with rabbits. On its east side is a cluster of dangerous rocks; and on its south-west shore are the ruins of an ancient chapel. Monastic writers say that St. Necessan founded an abbey on the island, about the year 570, and that the Book of the Four Gospels, commonly called the Garland of Howth, and held in very high veneration, was preserved here. Ptolemy calls the island Adri-Deserta; Pliny calls it Andros; and Richard of Cirencester calls it Edria.

IRISHTOWN, a village in the parish of Donnybrook, and barony of Dublin, and on the south side of Dublin bay, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile south-east of Ringsend, co. Dublin, Leinster. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Dublin bears the name of Irishtown and Donnybrook, and has chapels in Irishtown, Donnybrook, and Upper Baggot-street. For a further notice, see RINGSEND. Area of the village, 57 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,109. Houses 161. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 50; in manufactures and trade, 82; in other pursuits, 94. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 19; on the directing of labour, 111; on their own manual labour, 64; on means not specified, 32.

IRISHTOWN, a village in the parish of Burry, barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 149.

IRISHTOWN, a village in the parish of Ardea, barony of Portmahinch, Queen's co., Leinster. It forms a suburb of Mountmellick; and on the south side of it is the seat of Irishtown House. Area, 21 acres. Pop., in 1841, 186. Houses 25.

IRISHTOWN, the name of generally the oldest and poorest part of each of a considerable number of the old towns of Ireland. Whenever Anglo-Norman colonization was so strong as to construct a new town for the colonists, and to place a cordon round the natives, or to drive them into a corner, Anglo-Norman pride rarely failed to distinguish the two sections of what ought to have been a common town by the invidious appellations of Englishtown and Irishtown, and to fling upon the latter a similar opprobrium to that which for so many ages belonged to the 'Jews' Quarter' of many of the chief towns of Europe. The Irishtown section, centre, or suburb of the old town, is gradually wiping off its disgrace, and even discarding its very name; yet it still remains with topographical distinctness, and more or less of original characteristic poverty and opprobrium, in Kilkenny, Athlone, Limerick, Carrickfergus, and some other places.

IRON (LOUGH), a lake in the baronies of Moygoish and Corkaree, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It extends north-westward; measures $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile by half-a-mile; receives at its head the stream which flows from Lough Ouil; and is traversed across its foot by the river Inny. Sir Henry Piers mentions a tradition, "that of old here was no lake at all, but wood, meadow, and woody pastures, the low grounds being watered by a small rivulet;" and in support of the tradition, he observes that this lake is not so deep as the other lakes of Westmeath, "for it is nowhere above 16 feet in depth, whereas the shallowest of our other lakes are so many fathom and more," and that "towards the banks or margin of it are seen under water trunks and stumps of trees;" and he adds, that "he has himself found, and taken up, in shallow water near the banks, stags' horns much decayed and rotten." On the south-west bank are the demesnes of TRISTERNAGH and BARONSTOWN: see these articles. The area of the lake comprises 259 acres, 18 perches in the parish of Leney, barony of Corkaree; 7 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches in Portnashangan, barony of Corkaree; 252 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches in Kilbiny, barony of Moygoish; 134 acres, 24 perches in Rathaspick, barony of Moygoish; and 15 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches in Templeoran, barony of Moygoish. The surface elevation of the lake above sea-level is 204 feet.

IRVINESTOWN, or LOWTHERSTOWN, a post-town in the parish of Derryvullen, barony of Lurg, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands on the post-road from Enniskillen to Pettigo, 5 miles south by east of Kesh, $7\frac{1}{2}$ north of Enniskillen, and $88\frac{1}{2}$ north-west by north of Dublin. It stands nearly 2 miles to the right of the direct road from Enniskillen to Pettigo, along the right bank of Lough Erne; yet both the mail-car and the stage-coach to Pettigo pass through it. The town, though small and secluded, is an improving place. In its vicinity is Necarne, the residence of William D'Arcy, Esq., where a small but handsome castle was recently erected. A fair is held on the 8th day of every month. Area of the town 36 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,047; in 1841, 1,388. Houses 229. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 74; in manufactures and trade, 155; in other pursuits, 39. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 14; on the directing of labour, 141; on their own manual labour, 109; on means not specified, 4. A Poor-law union has its seat in the town, but bears the name of LOWTHERSTOWN: which see.

ISAINTLAURENCE. See ISERTLAURENCE.

ISERTKELLY, or DYSERTKELLY, a parish in the barony of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. It exists in two mutually detached sections, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and 6 south-west of Loughrea. Area of the whole, 1,894 acres, 6 perches; of the smaller section, 667 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 282; in 1841, 209. Houses 38. It lies on the Gurtamackin river, and near the road from Loughrea to Gort; and is adorned with the plantations of Castleboy, the seat of R. H. Persse, Esq., and with the mansions of Cranagh and Woodville.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLINANE [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £34, and the rectorial for £6; and the latter are appropriated to the diocesan. In 1834, the inhabitants were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

ISERTKERRIN, a parish in the south-east corner of the barony of Slieveardagh, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Fethard, co. Tipperary, Munster.

Length, 2 miles; breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile; area, 1,429 acres. Pop., in 1831, 416; in 1841, 341. Houses 57. The land is of very good quality. The road from Fethard to Callen passes near the north-west boundary.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILLENAULE [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £115; glebe, £10. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 424; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

ISERTLAURENCE, ISAINTLAURENCE, or INCH-ST.-LAURENCE, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 6 miles south-east of Limerick, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 2,203 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,009; in 1841, 840. Houses 120. The surface contains no waste ground; and consists wholly of dairy pasture and tillage land.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLYBROOD [which see], in the dio. of Emly. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £46 3s. 1d., and the rectorial for £92 16s. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; and the latter are appropriated to the see of Cashel. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Cahirconlish. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a daily school was salaried with £12 from the National Board, and had on its books 67 boys and 42 girls.

ISHARTMON, a parish at the south-west corner of the barony of Forth, 4 miles south-west by west of Broadway, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 965 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres,—of which 338 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches are detached. Pop., in 1831, 229; in 1841, 239. Houses 30. The surface is low but variegated and good ground on the coast.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of KILLINICK [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes belonging to the impropriate curate are compounded for £36 18s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and the rectorial for £24; and the latter belong to the Earl of Portsmouth, and Mr. Colclough. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 30, and the Roman Catholics to 203; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

ISKAHEEN, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Derry. Its post-town is Muff; and it has chapels at Iskaheen, Inch, and Burt.

ISLAND, or INCHYDONV, a parish, partly in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, and partly in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1. Area of the Carbery section, 1,367 acres; of the Ibane and Barryroe section, 1,309. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,444; in 1841, 1,436. Houses 225. Pop. of the Carbery section, in 1831, 704; in 1841, 655. Houses 98. It consists of a portion of the mainland on the shore of Clonakilty bay, and of the pleasant island of Inchydony on the bosom of that bay, and $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile south of the town of Clonakilty. On the island is the seat of the Hungerford family.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILGARIFFE [which see], and at the same time forms the corps of Island prebend, in the dio. of Ross. Tithe composition, £260. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 27, and the Roman Catholics to 1,565; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

ISLANDBAWN, an inhabited islet in Lough Strangford, co. Down, Ulster.

ISLANDBRIDGE, a village in the parish of St. James, partly in the barony of Uppercross, and partly in St. James' Ward of the city of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the river Liffey, and on the west margin of the new borough limits of Dublin, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile west of Dublin-castle. It contains many good houses, an artillery barrack, and the beautiful bridge across the Liffey, called Sarabridge. See DUBLIN. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 767; of the Uppercross section, 201.

ISLANDEADY, or ISLANDINE, a parish, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-north-west of Castlebar, partly in the barony of Carra, and partly in that of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, $13\frac{1}{4}$ miles; breadth, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Burrishoole section, 8,941 acres, 27 perches,—of which 329 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches, are water in Lough Islandeady, 310 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches are water in small lakes, and 1,825 acres, 27 perches lie detached to the south-west. Area of the Carra section, 15,998 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches,—of which 615 acres, 10 perches are water in Lough Beltra, 90 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are in Lough Lannagh, 140 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches are water in Lough Islandeady, and 108 acres, 37 perches are water in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 8,564; in 1841, 8,463. Houses 1,510. Pop. of the Burrishoole section, in 1841, 4,190. Houses 758. The surface is variously mountain, bog, lake, and good tillage ground; and the upland and the bog predominate. The arable lands, and the shores of the waters present marked evidences of fertility and pleasant features of beauty. The principal part for variety and fineness of character is a large section of the vale which is occupied by the chain of the Castlebar lakes, and traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Westport. Islandeady Lough is the highest large lake of the chain; ranks next in extent to Castlebar Lake proper, measures about $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile by 1; embosoms two wooded islands and the nearly insulated peninsula of Islandeady; and is overlooked and enriched by the demesnes of Woodville, Cloonane, and Raheens. The highest ground in the parish is Croaghmoyle, which has an altitude above sea-level of 1,412 feet.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CASTLEBAR [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £240. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Islandeady and Glan-Island have an attendance of respectively from 1,000 to 1,200 and from 600 to 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 9,164; and 5 pay daily schools had on their books 243 boys and 67 girls.

ISLAND-ICANE, or ISLAND KANE, a parish on the coast of the barony of Middlethird, and 8 miles south-south-west of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. Length and breadth, each 3 miles; area, 4,537 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch,—of which 11 acres, 2 roods are in Lough Ballyscanlan. Pop., in 1831, 1,139; in 1841, 1,504. Houses 214. A summit in the north has an altitude of 436 feet; and the cliffs on the coast have an altitude of 191 feet. Dunhill Lodge is situated on the west border. Adjacent to the coast, and separated from it only by the action of the elements, are several rocky islets, partially covered with grass, but interesting only to a mineralogist. A coast-guard station is situated within Island-Icane, and has within its district about 18 row-boats and 72 men employed in the fisheries.—This parish is part of the wholly impropriate benefice of KILBRIDE [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. The tithes belong to the economy fund of Waterford cathedral. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of not less than 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Dunhill. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school was attended by from 50 to 70 children in winter, and about 120 in summer.

ISLANDINE. See ISLANDEADY.

ISLAND-MAGEE, a parish in the barony of Lower Belfast, 6 miles north-east by north of Carrickfergus, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 7,036 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches,—of which 11 acres, 39 perches are in the Isle of Muck, and 34 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,610; in 1841, 2,782. Houses 520. The peninsula of Island-Magee gives the parish its name, forms by far the greater part of its area, and extends southward between Lough Larne and the North Channel. The extremity of the peninsula is within a mile of the town of Larne, and is connected with it by a regular ferry; and its isthmus or southern extremity is within less than $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile of Black-Head, the north screen of the entrance of Belfast Lough. The islet of Muck lies adjacent to the coast 2 miles south-east by south of the entrance of Lough Larne. The surface of the peninsula consists of excellent land, and is free from waste ground. An old and curious manuscript account of it says that, in the reign of Elizabeth, it was a naturally fertile tract adulterated into the condition of a treeless desert inhabited by the Magees from whom it derives its name, and that it was then leased by the Queen to Savage, a follower of the Earl of Essex. A cromlech near the extremity of the peninsula, consists of a triangular covering stone, 6 feet in length, resting on three supporters, and inclining to the east; and a large stone, 10 or 12 tons in weight, near high-water mark on the south shore of Brown's bay, has often been pronounced a logan or Druidical rocking-stone, but really appears, both from its position, and from the comparative difficulty of setting it in motion, to have been worked into its poised site and character simply by the action of wind and tide, and to be in considerable hazard of trundling, at no distant period, into the sea under the lash of the surge. Along the east coast, southward of Portmuck, are the stupendous basaltic cliffs of the Gobbins—celebrated for various features and associations, and especially rife in dark fame for a transaction of the year 1642. See GOBBINS. Along the shore is an excellent fishery of herrings, turbot, and blockens; and in the interior are such treasures of rock and field as might powerfully contribute to raise Larne to a high rank among the trading towns of the north. A salt spring of such a character wells up as to suggest the probability of the existence of rock salt; a bed of red ochre exists, upwards of 200 feet thick; gypsum could be raised near Portmuck; and coal is believed by the inhabitants to exist beneath the surface,—but hardly with any probability, as the substratum of the peninsula is basalt, and the chalk and lias formations successively emerge from it at the northern extremity. Down to an incredibly recent period, Island-Magee was imagined by its inhabitants to be a theatre of sorcery.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CARRICKFERGUS [which see], in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £400. The church is old. Sitzings 200; attendance 50. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses belonging to the General Assembly, the one formerly Secessional and the other of the Synod of Ulster, have an attendance of respectively 130 and 250. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 235 Churchmen, 2,367 Presbyterians, 90 other Protestant dissenters, and 48 Roman Catholics; and 10 pay daily schools had on their books 166 boys and 105 girls. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Upper Kilcoan, Lower Kilcoan, Mulloughboy, Brown's-Bay, and Mullaghdubb.

ISLANDMORE, an island in the barony of Burishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies in Clew bay, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by west of Newportpratt, and measures about a mile in length. A coastguard station here has within its district about 100 fishing-boats, chiefly row-boats, and about 370 fishermen.

ISLANDS, a barony of the county of Clare, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by Inchiquin; on the east, by Bunratty; on the south, by Clonderalaw; and on the west, by Moyarta and Ib-rickane. Its greatest length, eastward, is 11 miles; its greatest breadth is 8; and its area is 67,101 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches,—of which 3,471 acres, 1 rood are tideway of the Fergus, and 3,932 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches are water. The river and estuary of the Fergus form the whole of the eastern boundary; and the entire surface declines toward these waters. The western district is chiefly low moorish mountain; but the eastern district contains a share of the rich grazing lands called Corcasses, and is similar in soil to the barony of Bunratty.—The barony of Islands contains the parishes of Clare-Abbey, Clondegad, Dromeliffe, Killone, and Kilmealy. Its towns are Ennis and Clare. Pop., in 1831, 29,264; in 1841, 29,264. Houses 4,426. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,055; in manufactures and trade, 1,119; in other pursuits, 824. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,260; who could read but not write, 1,463; who could neither read nor write, 5,740. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,647; who could read but not write, 2,063; who could neither read nor write, 8,329.—Islands lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Ennis. The total number of tenements valued, exclusive of those in the borough of Ennis, is 2,257; and of these, 962 were valued under £5,—636, under £10,—234, under £15,—118, under £20,—101, under £25,—29, under £30,—46, under £40,—41, under £50,—and 90, at and above £50.

ITERMORROUGH. See IGHTERMURROUGH.

IVARSTOWN, a village in the parish of Kilfinaghta, barony of Lower Bunratty, co. Clare, Munster. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 259. Houses 41.

IVEAGH (LOWER), a barony of the county of Down, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north and north-west, by the county of Antrim; on the east, by the baronies of Castlereagh and Kinelearty; on the south, by the barony of Upper Iveagh; and on the west, by the county of Armagh, and a very small part, little more than a point, of Lough Neagh. Its greatest length, from east to west, is 14 miles; its greatest breadth is 9; and its area is 93,734 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches,—of which 550 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches are water. The surface fully partakes the prevailing character of the great lowland division of the county,—so constantly undulated and hilly as to be a continuous sea of soft and gentle heights; and nearly all of it, especially over the northern and western section, is fertile, well-improved, thickly inhabited, and delightfully prosperous. Both agriculture and the linen manufacture walk athwart the district in strength and beauty. The Newry Canal traces part of the western boundary; the Upper Bann passes joyously across the south-west wing, luxuriating along a vale of many amenities; the Lagan flows circuitously through the centre and the west of the interior, and traces for several miles the boundary with co. Antrim; and the Lagan navigation and the Ulster railway pass along part of the northern border. Within what now forms the barony, lay the ancient territory of Kilwarlin, whose chief or toparch, MacSwine MacRory, gave bonaght to the O'Neils of Claneboy, but submitted to Queen Elizabeth.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Aghaderg, Annahill, Blaris, Drumara, Garvaghy, Magheradroll, Magheralin, Seapatrick, and Shankhill; and the whole of the parishes of Donaghcloney, Dromore, Hillsborough, Magherally, St. Inn's of Moira, and Tullylish. Its towns are Dromore, Hillsborough, Gilford, and Moira. Pop., in 1831, 65,368; in 1841, 70,146. Houses 12,120. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 5,608; in manufactures and trade, 6,506; in other pursuits, 655. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 14,458; who could read but not write, 7,716; who could neither read nor write, 7,754. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 7,681; who could read but not write, 13,271; who could neither read nor write, 10,135.—By a recent arrangement Lower Iveagh is cut into the divisions of Lower and Upper. Area of the Lower Division, according to the statement of the Poor-law Reports, 45,402 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches. Annual valuation under the Poor-law Act, £36,477 7s. 4d. Sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £2,303 8s. 5d., and £1,896 3s. 9d. Area of the Upper Division, 47,511 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches. Annual valuation, £42,651 19s. 7d. Sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £2,672 3s. 9d., and £2,212 14s. 8d. The whole barony is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Banbridge, Lishburn, and Lurgan. The total number of tenements valued is 12,679; and of these, 7,635 were valued under £5,—2,206, under £10,—1,078, under £15,—615, under £20,—328, under £25,—181, under £30,—209, under £40,—112, under £50,—and 225, at and above £50.

IVEAGH (UPPER), a barony of the county of Down, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Lower Iveagh; on the north-east, by the barony of Kinelearty; on the east, by the Irish sea; on the south, by the barony of Mourne, the counties of Louth and Armagh, and the lordship of Newry; and on the west, by the county of Armagh. Its greatest length from east to west is 18 miles; its greatest breadth from north to south is 16½; and its area is 159,037 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches,—of which 931 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches are water. The Newry river and the upper part of Carlingford bay form the southern boundary below the lordship of Newry; the Newry Canal forms the western boundary all north of the lordship of Newry; and the river Bann runs northward and north-westward through the greater part of the interior, cutting the barony into two not very unequal sections. The Mourne mountains send over the southern border of Upper Iveagh huge and almost alpine off-shoots, the most westerly of which are whimsically called the Hen and Chickens, while the whole are more appropriately designated the Iveagh mountains. The Slievecroob group of mountains rises on the boundary with Kinelearty, and has its south-western declivities within Upper Iveagh. The rest of the surface partakes, in the aggregate, of the general character of the county. A topographical account of Down, written exactly a century ago, says, "Upper Iveagh is by much the largest barony in this county. It is an open hilly country, has but few plantations of trees and gentlemen's seats on it, with which the lower barony is well furnished; yet it is fully peopled, and, by means of marl culture, abounds in corn, chiefly oats. The whole country looks beautiful from the rising grounds in time of harvest." As this and Lecale were the specimen districts selected for affording an average view of the agriculture of the county, a glance at its present improved condition may be obtained by reference to our article on Down.

Iveagh is alleged to be a corruption of Hy-Veach, and that again of Hy-Eachach, "the country of Achaius;" and this name is pretended to have been derived from a certain Achaius, who is absurdly made to rank as grandfather of the 132d king of Ireland, and progenitor of the old Irish sept of Magennises and MacCartanes. A less incredible statement—though that too possesses no great interest—is, that both Upper and Lower Iveagh formed part of the old principality of Dalriada, and afterwards were the patrimony of the Magennises.—Upper Iveagh contains part of the parishes of Aghaderg, Drumara, Garvaghy, Kilmeigan, and Seapatrick; and the whole of the parishes of Annaghcloney, Clonduff, Clonallan, Drumballyroney, Drumgath, Drumgooland, Donaghmore, Kilbroney, Kilcoo, Maghera, and Warrenspoint. The townland of Shanaghan, in the parish of Newry, was recently transferred from the Lordship of Newry to Upper Iveagh. Pop., in 1841, 379. The towns and chief villages are Loughbrickland, Warrenspoint, Rathfriland, Maghera, Scarvaghy, Hilltown, Rosstrevor, Newcastle, Castlewellan, and Banbridge. Pop., in 1831, 83,381; in 1841, 87,349. Houses 16,232. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 9,589; in manufactures and trade, 5,930; in other pursuits, 1,237. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 15,673; who could read but not write, 9,586; who could neither read nor write, 11,212. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 7,434; who could read but not write, 15,976; who could neither read nor write, 16,544.—By a recent arrangement, Upper Iveagh is cut into the two divisions of Lower and Upper. Area of the Lower Division, 96,293 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches. Annual valuation under the Poor-law Act, £42,309 3s. 10d. Sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £2,931 13s. 9d., and £2,660 13s. 7d. Area of the Upper Division, 63,213 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches. Annual valuation under the Poor-law Act, £46,976 2s. 4d. Sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £2,517 1s. 6d., and £1,946 12s. 4d. The whole barony is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Banbridge, Downpatrick, Kilkeel, and Newry. The total number of tenements valued is 17,015; and of these, 9,759 were valued under £5,—3,967, under £10,—1,554, under £15,—668, under £20,—416, under £25,—194, under £30,—225, under £40,—89, under £50,—and 143, at and above £50.

IVELEARY. See INCHEGERLAGH.

IVERAGH, a barony on the coast of the county of Kerry, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by Dingle bay; on the east and south-east, by the barony of Dunkerron; on the south, by Ballinskelligs bay; and on the west, by the Atlantic ocean. Its greatest length, south-south-westward from Rosbegh Point on Dingle Bay to Bolus Head, at the north side of the entrance of Ballinskelligs bay, is 23½ miles; its greatest breadth, east-south-eastward from Dowlas Head, is 11½ miles; and its area is 163,248 acres. The chief streams are the Tingariff or Carra, across the north wing, the Fartin to the head of Valentia harbour, and the Inny to the head of Ballinskelligs bay. On the coast are the large island of Valentia, the small islands of Beginish and Puffin, and the skerries or rocky islets of Skelligs and Lemon. The mainland of the barony is nearly all poor and heathy mountain, overrun and intersected by enormous expanses of bog, yet enclosing some pretty valley-ground, and a few noble specimens of Highland scenery. "The mountains," says W. J. Gisborne, Esq., in his official Report, "are covered with coarse grass and heather, and are in general dry; but large tracts of soft, black peat are frequent in their hollows. Wet bogs occupy most of the lower flat grounds and valleys, and they are often many feet deep. The barony is occupied principally by farmers of a small class, tilling barely enough ground to support their cattle through the winter with straw and corn. Few keep so many as 20 head of cattle, with a few sheep; more of them have only from one to four cows. The climate is too wet and stormy to be favourable to the growth or ripening of any kind of grain, but especially of wheat. * * The cultivated land is chiefly on the dry sides of the hills, and in the flats occupied by the drier and shallower bogs. Much land in both situations is under tillage that could not profitably have been broken up where labour was dearer, or where the necessities of the occupiers had not driven them to every resource to raise potatoes for themselves, and winter fodder for their cattle. * * Extensive roads are at present making by proprietors to enable their tenants to cultivate fresh parts of their estates." An elaborate Report by Mr. Nimmo, on the geognosy, soils, bogs, resources, and geological improvement of the barony, may be seen on pp. 27—39 of the Fourth Report of the Commissioners on Irish Bogs.—This barony contains part of the parish of Killorglin, and the whole of the parishes of Cahir, Dromod, Killemlagh, Glenbeagh, Killinane, Prior, and Valentia. The only town is Cahirciveen. The Act 6 and 7 William IV. transferred 14 townlands of Glenbeagh from Dunkerron to Iveragh,—pop., in 1841, 1,375; and 18 townlands of Glenbeagh, and 15 of Killorglin, from Magonihy to Iveragh,—pop., 1,754. Pop. of the barony, in 1831, 22,444; in 1841, 28,139. Houses 4,894. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,253; in manufactures and trade, 637; in other pursuits, 239. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,215; who could read but not write, 777; who could neither read nor write, 7,996. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 797; who could read but not write, 665; who could neither read nor write, 10,716.—Iveragh lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Cahirciveen. The total number of tenements valued is 4,405; and of these, 3,000 were valued under £5,—1,042, under £10,—229, under £15,—58, under £20,—34, under £25,—14, under £30,—9, under £40,—9, under £50,—and 10, at and above £50.

IVERK, a barony at the south-west extremity of the county of Kilkenny, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the baronies of Kells and Knocktopher; on the east, by the united barony of Ida, Igrin, and Ibercon; on the south and south-west, by the county of Waterford; and, on the west, by the county of Tipperary. Its greatest length, south-south-eastward, is 12 miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 5½; and its area is 41,368 acres, 2 roods, 52 perches,—of which 840 acres, 34 perches are tideway of the river Suir. The Lingan rivulet traces the whole of the boundary with co. Tipperary; the river Suir, the whole of that with co. Waterford; and a small affluent of the Suir, the whole of that with the barony of Ida. The northern district is occupied by high grounds, with a prevailingly dry and kindly soil upon an argillaceous base; and the southern district is a fertile champaign country, increasing in goodness as it approaches the Suir, and terminating in a tract of as rich and deep land as can be found in the county.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Fiddown and Muckalie, and the whole of the parishes of Aglish, Clonmore, Arderra, Ballytarsna, Portnascully, Tibberaghny, Tubrid, Ullid, Kilmacow, Poleroan, Rathkyran, Whitechurch, and Owing; and its chief villages are Pilltown, Aglish, Leccawn, Doornane, Grange, Mooncoin, Ballygorey, Licketstown, Fiddown, Kilmacow, Old Dangan, Poleroan, and Rathkyran. Pop., in 1831, 14,482; in 1841, 15,603. Houses 2,374. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,895; in manufactures and trade, 364; in other pursuits, 230. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,513; who could read but not write, 1,290; who could neither read nor write, 2,847. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,072; who could read but not write, 1,647; who could neither read nor write, 4,398.—Iverk lies partly within the Poor-law union of Carrick-on-Suir, and partly within that of Waterford. The total number of tenements valued is £1,676; and of these, 470 were valued under £5,—267, under £10,—175, under £15,—140, under £20,—120, under £25,—102, under £30,—173, under £40,—95, under £50,—and 134, at and above £50.

IVERNOON. See JOHN'S (ST.), co. Roscommon.

IVERUS, or IVEROSSA, a parish in the north-west corner of the barony of Kenry, co. Limerick, Munster. Post-town, Askeaton. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 2,765 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,884; in 1841, 1,991. Houses 332. The surface lies immediately east of the embouchure of the Deel, and along the estuary of the Shannon, directly opposite the estuary of the Fergus. It exhibits much beauty, and is ornamented with several neat villas.—This parish is a chapelry, and part of the benefice of ASKEATON [which see], in the dio. of Limerick. The tithes belonging to the incumbent are compounded for £80, and the rectorial tithes for £160; and the latter are inappropriate in Thomas Leland, Esq., of Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Askeaton. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 135, and the Roman Catholics to 1,843.

J

JACK'S HOLE, a coast-guard station, in the barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is situated near Mizen Head, between Wicklow and Arklow, and has within its district about 12 fishing-boats, chiefly half-decked vessels, and about 70 fishermen.

JAGO, or YAGOE (ST.), or YAGOESTOWN, a parish, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by east of Kilcullen-Bridge, and on the eastern margin of the barony of South Naas, and of the county of Kildare, Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$; area, 1,520 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches,—of which 14 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches are in the Liffey. Pop., in 1831, 340; in 1841, 291. Houses 47. The surface lies along the Liffey, consists of good land, and is beautified with the demesnes of Ardenod, William Brownrigg, Esq.; Boleybeg; and Annfield. The highest ground is Moor-hill, and has an altitude of 671 feet.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLYMORE-EUSTACE [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £21, and the rectorial for £27 13s. 10d.; and the latter are appropriated to the sinecure prebend of St. Jago, in the cathedral of St. Patrick's, Dublin. In 1834, the number of Roman Catholics in the unappropriated townlands, or in the part constituting the vicarage, was 264.

JAMES' (ST.), a parish, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Fethard, and on the west border of the barony of Shelburne, and of the county of Wexford, Leinster. The ecclesiastical returns include in it the impropriate parishes of DUNBRODY and RATHROE; and the civil returns previous to the Ordnance Survey, include also the rectorial parish of KILLESK: see these articles. Area of St. James, Dunbrody, and Rathroe, 8,489 acres; area of these three parishes and Killesk, 11,309 acres. Pop. of St. James, Dunbrody, and Rathroe, in 1831, 4,122; in 1841, 3,693. Houses 622. Within the district are the villages of ARTHURSTOWN, BALLYHACK, DUNCANNON, and RAMSGRANGE: which see. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,438. Houses 399. The chief features and facts of interest will be found noticed in the articles already referred to, and in that on WATERFORD HARBOUR. The surface lies along the east shore of Waterford Harbour; and, with the exception of a very few acres of turbarry, it consists wholly of tillage-ground, most of which is excellent.—St. James' proper is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of KILLESK, in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes of St. James, Dunbrody, and Rathroe, are compounded for £400, and are wholly impropriate in Lord Templemore. The church stands on the highest part of Ballyhack, surmounting an eminence on the margin of Waterford Harbour, and was built in 1788, partly by aid from the Marquis of Donegal. Sitings 200; attendance 35. The chapel of Duncannon Fort has an attendance of about 40, exclusive of the military. The Roman Catholic chapels of Duncannon and Ramsgrange have an attendance of respectively 600 and 2,300; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Templetown in Hooke, and Poulfar in Fethard. In 1834, the Protestants of St. James, Dunbrody, and Rathroe amounted to 131, and the Roman Catholics to 4,074; and 12 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, one with £12 from local subscription, and one with £5 5s. from the rector, the curate, and P. Babbington, Esq.—were attended on the average by about 300 children.

JAMES' (ST.), co. Dublin. See DUBLIN (County of the City of).

JAMESTOWN, a village, formerly a walled town and a borough, in the parish of Kiltogher, and barony and county of Leitrim, Connaught. It is situated on the river Shannon, and on the road from Dublin to Sligo, 1 mile north by west of Drumsna, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ south by east of Carrick-on-Shannon. In 1833, it consisted of a Roman Catholic chapel, a school-house, 16 dwelling-houses of the yearly value of £10 and upwards, 6 of the yearly value of from £5 to £10, and 26 of an yearly value under £3. The remains of the old walls are still visible; and indicate the town, even in the days of its importance, to have been of small extent. Some small ruins, or rather vestiges, exist, of a castle which was built by Sir Charles Coote, in 1623, and was charmingly situated on the Shannon. In 1645, this castle was taken by the Earl of Carlingford, after the discharge of a few pieces of cannon; and, in 1689, the Enniskilleners, under the command of Colonel Lloyd, took it after sustaining a brisk fire, but were afterwards induced to abandon it, and to retreat to Sligo, at the approach of a strong Irish force under Sarsfield. A Franciscan friary, which formerly stood in the town, is remarkable as the place in which the Roman Catholic prelates assembled in Aug. 1650, and nominated commissioners to enter into treaty with any foreign power who might be ready to aid them. The Shannon at Jamestown suddenly passes from the character of a broad and deep river to that of a shallow, rapid, and unnavigable stream; and, making a bend to the north-west, winds round a tongue of land in the form of a horseshoe, and returns to the south-east at Drumsna. The whole of the peninsula thus formed lies within the county of Roscommon, and is occupied by a very beautiful demeane, part of the estate of Sir Gilbert King, Bart. The bridge of Jamestown consists of 7 arches, is 48 yards long, and 5 yards wide, and is approached at each end by an ascending road of about 15 yards in length; and it commands, immediately downward on the Shannon, a charming landscape of wooded hills, with the river flowing at their base, and gradually losing itself among the trees. The Jamestown Canal, constructed to connect the navigable stretches of the Shannon above and below the town, was in one part so narrow and ill-contrived, that even the common trade-boats of the Royal Canal could not, when laden, pass through it in low summer-water; but it was proposed by the recent Commissioners on the Shannon Navigation to be so improved as to suit steam-vessels, and to have a lock of 6 feet 2 inches in rise, with a chamber 130 feet long and 30 feet wide,—the entire improvements to cost £29,227 0s. 7d. Fairs are held on May 26, July 8, Sept. 1, and Dec. 20. The town was named Jamestown in honour of James I., and was incorporated by charter granted in the 19th year of his reign. The corporation was called "The Sovereign, Burgesses, and Free Commons of the Borough and Town of Jamestown," consisted of a sovereign, 12 burgesses, and an indefinite number of commons, and was made a guild mercatory. A borough court was created, with civil jurisdiction to the extent of £20. The power of sending two members to parliament was vested in the corporation at large, but was eventually usurped by the sovereign, the burgesses, and two branches of the patron family of King; and when the borough was disfranchised at the Legislative Union, the £15,000 of compensation was granted to the sovereign, to such burgesses as were then living, and to Gilbert King, Esq., John King, Esq., and the Rev. John King, archdeacon of Killalla. Certain lands were granted as public property, but passed long ago into private hands. Adjoining the village is Jamestown Lodge, the seat of F. O'Beirne, Esq. Area of the village, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 311; in 1841, 315. Houses 49.

JAMESTOWN, a village in the parish of Taghboy, barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Pop. not specially returned.

JAMESTOWN, a demesne on the north border of the barony of Moycashel, 4½ miles north by west of Kilbeggan, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It lies in the ancient territory of MacGeoghegan; and is now the property of Sir Richard Nagle, Bart., the descendant by the female line of the MacGeoghegan family. The mansion is a spacious and handsome pile, built by Kedagh Geoghegan, Esq., and enlarged with wings by Sir Richard Nagle, the father of the present Sir Richard. At this seat are preserved an interesting collection of portraits, many of which are family heir-looms, and a little museum of Irish antiquities, the most remarkable of which are rude military weapons used by the ancient Irish, and an oaken shaft overlaid with plates of copper, and called the baculum or crosier of St. Columb-Kill.

JENKINSTOWN, a demesne on the south border of the barony of Fassadining, midway between Castlecomer and Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It occupies the peninsula at the confluence of the Nore and the Dinane, exhibits a fine expanse of old timber, and is a striking and interesting feature in the general landscape. Its proprietor is George Bryan, Esq.

JIGGINSTOWN, an old castle in the south-west environs of the town of Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. It was commenced on an enormous scale by the unfortunate Earl of Strafford, Lord-lieutenant of Ireland in the reign of Charles I.; and its ruins now form a singular and striking object. See NAAS.

JOHN'S-PORT, a cove on the east coast of the barony of Ardes, 4½ miles south-south-east of Ballywalter, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated near Bur Island, is sheltered by a rock called the Plough, and has been provided with a good boat-quay. A few years ago, it had employed in the fisheries 3 cutters, 13 smacks, 20 wherries, 2 yawls, and several rowing-boats.

JOHN'S RIVER, a rivulet of the county of Waterford, Munster. It rises in some marshy grounds about 3 miles south of Waterford; flows northward to the Suir within the bounds of the city; and is there navigable at high water for the largest description of boats. It is crossed within the city, by two old bridges, called John's-bridge, and William-street bridge, and by one of recent erection, situated near the old abbey of St. Catherine, and called Catherine's-bridge.

JOHN'S (ST.), or IVERNOON, a parish 7½ miles north by west of Athlone, and on the east border of the barony of Athlone and of the county of Roscommon, Connaught. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 4½; area, 11,634 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches,—of which 3,616 acres, 20 perches are in Lough Ree, and 38 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches are in Lough Funcheon. Pop., in 1831, 3,136; in 1841, 2,806. Houses 551. The surface lies along Lough Ree, and consists almost wholly of profitable land, either arable or pastoral. The small peninsula of St. John's, extending south-eastward into Lough Ree, between St. John's bay and Safe Harbour, and terminating in St. John's Point, is a locality of curious and singular antiquarian interest. An ancient town appears to have stood here of the name of Rinduín, Randown, or Teacheon, and to have acquired the name of St. John's from a priory of Knights Hospitalers which was founded in it during the reign of King John; and the name St. John's eventually, though slowly, extended itself to the parish, whose designation in the Ecclesiastical Register still is Ivernoon. The chief ruins which remain are those of a remarkable round tower on the highest ground of the locality, a powerful castle near the point of the peninsula, a fortified wall across the isthmus, and a church dedicated to the Divine Trinity. The only tolerably authenticated facts respecting the place are, that the English strongly fortified the castle in 1226, that Phelim O'Connor pillaged the town in 1237, and that John de Funtayns was constable of the castle, with an annual fee of £40 sterling, in 1334. The round tower crowns a rising ground a little east of the castle; it is of different dimensions from the old ecclesiastical pillar-towers of Ireland, but equals them in obscurity of origin and purpose, and may have been either a windmill, a watch-tower, or a place of recreation; it measures about 14 feet in diameter, and is 4 feet thick in the walls; and it has an entrance and a window opposite each other, both facing the water, and the latter, surmounted by a flat rounded arch about 7 feet high, and commanding most pleasant views of the lake. The castle occupies a rocky eminence which rises abruptly from the north side of the point on the border of Safe Harbour, and was built nearly in the form of the letter P; the line represented by the stem of the P is short in proportion to the head, extends about 240 feet across the point, and is protected by a fosse of great depth and width; the part represented by the tail of the letter's stem was occupied by a spacious apartment which seems to have served either as a banqueting-hall or as a chapel; and the part represented by the head of the letter was a lofty, massive, and formidable keep upon the line represented by the stem, with a court before it, which was defended along the curve by a strong wall, with banquette and parapet, and with deep exterior ditches. The keep, as it now stands, presents a great tower of very considerable elevation, and of 50 feet in breadth next the fosse, and, as seen from either the land side or the lake, it appears a very imposing mass. The fortified wall across the isthmus measures 564 yards from water to water, and is 700 yards distant from the castle fosse; nearly in the middle of it is an arched gateway 24 feet by 21, with its defences still tolerably entire; and between this gate and each end of the wall, at unequal intervals of from 60 to 90 yards, are square towers, each about 15 feet broad, and advanced 13 feet beyond the line of the wall. These singular remains, so obscure in history, and so comparatively good in preservation, are interesting monuments of the military works of past ages. The church occupies a site in what must have been a conspicuous part of the town; but while its remains are sufficient to show that the nave measured 60 feet by 24, and the choir 33 feet by 18, they are too ruinous and rubbishy to indicate the architectural style. Over the whole space between the castle and the wall across the isthmus, not a trace can now be discovered of any other building than this church; yet on the outer side of the wall, are some rude remains of other ecclesiastical buildings which were evidently in use at a later period than the church, and connected with which is still a crowdedly frequented burying-ground. On the south side of the point is one of the most pleasantly situated modern mansions, not only on Lough Ree, but in the county.—St. John's parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLENOY [which see], in the benefice of Elphin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £62 13s. 10d., and the rectorial for £60; and the latter are inappropriate in Lord Clonbrock. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Killenvoy, Kilmain, and Rahara. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 2,829; and 2 daily schools—one of which was aided with £2 a-year from Col. Lloyd—had on their books 102 boys and 62 girls.

JOHN'S (ST.), a parish, containing the greater part of the town of Sligo, in the barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. It contains the village of MAHERARROY, and part of the town of SLIGO: see these articles. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 7,256 acres, 1 rood, 39 perches,—of which 750 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches are in Lough Gill. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 13,299; of the rural districts, 3,445. Houses in the whole, 2,100; in the rural districts, 592. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 14,021; and by the Ecclesiastical authorities at 12,982. The rural districts contain some rough lands and mountainous ground; yet consist, for the most part, of good arable lands, some of which have been highly improved. The surface exhibits much beauty, and some fine subjects for the pencil. See GILL (LOUGH) and SLIGO (town of). The chief rural seats are Prospect, Oakfield, Marino, Rathaller, Woodville, Kernsfort, Abbeyview, Carnsfoot, and Cloverhill.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Elphin. Tithe composition, £341 10s. 9d.; glebe, £46 3s. 1d. The rectories of St. John's, KILLASPICBROWN, and KILMACOEN, and the vicarage of CALRY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of St. John's. Length, 8 miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 17,501 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches, besides rough and mountainous land. Pop., in 1831, 17,090, exclusive of the inhabitants of Calry. Gross income, £945 13s. 9d.; nett, £718 6s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the vicar-generalship of the dio. of Dromore. A curate has a salary of £75 from the incumbent, and, as chaplain to the garrison, £12 from government. The parish of Calry has been erected into a perpetual curacy, and has a church and a Roman Catholic chapel. The church of St. John's was repaired and enlarged in 1821, at the cost of £4,259 17s. 1d.; of which £2,310 13s. 10d. was raised by parochial assessment, £564 10s. 11d. was borrowed from Owen Wynne, Esq., and £1,384 12s. 4d. was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 1,000; attendance 700. A private house in Kilmacoen is used as a parochial place of worship in summer, and has an attendance of 30. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 100; the Independent meeting-house, by 100; the Wesleyan meeting-house, by 500; and the Primitive Wesleyan meeting-house, by 100. The Roman Catholic chapels of St. John's and Killaspicbrown have an attendance of respectively 5,000 and 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Calry. A Conventual chapel has an attendance of 1,000, and is under the care of three friars. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 2,945 Churchmen, 150 Presbyterians, 82 other Protestant dissenters, and 9,906 Roman Catholics; and the inhabitants of the benefice, exclusive of those in Calry, consisted of 3,292 Churchmen, the same number of Presbyterians and other Protestant dissenters as the parish, and 13,167 Roman Catholics; 6 Sunday schools in the parish were attended, on the average, by about 610 children; and 26 daily schools in the benefice—24 of which were in the parish—had on their books 849 boys and 594 girls. Two of the daily schools in the parish were salaried with respectively £15 and £10 from the county; two, with £15 and £12 from the National Board, and £10 and about £8 from subscription; two, with £14 and £10 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and a gratuity from the London Hibernian Society; and three, with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society.

JOHN'S (ST.), a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Bantry, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south of Enniscorthy, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 1 mile; area, 2,206 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches. Pop., in 1831, 636; in 1841, 675. Houses 112. It lies along the river Slaney, and the rivulet Boro; consists of very good land; and is traversed by the west road from Enniscorthy to Wexford. On the north-east border is the mansion of St. John's, the seat of C. H. Hill, Esq.; on the banks of the Boro, is Borodale, the charmingly situated cottage of D. Beatty, Esq.; and in the interior are the seats of Sweetfarm and Tomnalossett.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ENNISCORTHY [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £212 10s. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 143 Churchmen, 2 Presbyterians, 10 other Protestant dissenters, and 552 Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

JOHN'S (ST.), a parish, containing part of the town of Wexford, in the barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 525 acres, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,018; in 1841, 2,954. Houses 429. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 260. The chief rural residences are Maryville, Laurelbill, Prospectview, Sallyville, Riversfield, and Richmond.—This parish is an inappropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of St. Patrick's of Wexford, in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes belonging to the incumbent are compounded for £50, and the rectorial tithes for £12; and the latter belong to Caesar Colclough, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 430, and the Roman Catholics to 2,595.

JOHN'S POINT (ST.), a cape in the barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It forms the extremity of the peninsula which separates Killough Harbour from the bay of Dundrum. "Nothing," says Mr. Nimmo, in the Report of his Coast Survey, "is a much wanted for shipping on this coast as a light-house on St. John's Point. It would be the means of preventing vessels from getting embayed in the dangerous bay of Dundrum, where frequent wrecks take place every winter, and, at the same time, direct them to the harbours of Killough and Ardglass, where alone upon this coast any shelter is to be found." The coast-guard station of St. John's Point has employed in the fisheries within its district 1 decked vessel of 22 tons with 7 men, 2 half-decked vessels of jointly 22 tons with 14 men, and 37 row-boats with 196 men.

JOHNSTON'S FEWS, a village in the district of Fews, co. Armagh, Ulster. It stands $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Newtown-Hamilton, on the road thence to Dundalk. It is a poor place; and contains some vestiges of a barrack which was erected to overawe banditti who, about 150 years ago, infested the Fews mountains. "At this place," says Sir Charles Coote, "there is a tradition that a famous battle was fought between one of the chieftains of Louth and O'Neill, the chief of Ulster, who was slain here, with many of his people. Some antiquarians have mentioned that this chieftain was also called Blackbeard; and some liberties were taken with him at a feast given on this spot by the Louth chieftain. Near to this place are yet to be seen the lines of circumvallation of an encampment above $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in circumference, where it is said the Irish army had hemmed in a large detachment of Cromwell's forces, and besieged them during an entire winter. This noted place is called Cloghameather."

JOHNSTOWN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of North Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. Area, 1,243 acres. Pop., in 1831, 192; in 1841, 192. Houses 30. Though sometimes called a vicarage, it is ecclesiastically regarded as only a townland of one of the adjoining parishes. The village stands on the rivulet Morell, and on the road from Naas to Dublin, 1 mile south-west of Kill, and 2 north-north-east of Naas. It is a neat collection of cottages, with a charity school supported by Lady Mayo, and a good and spacious inn. Closely adjacent is the demesne of Palmers-town, the residence of the Earl of Mayo; while on one side is Cardiffstown, and on another are Furness and Forenaughts, the latter two appearing as one richly-wooded demesne. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 101; in 1841, not specially returned.

JOHNSTOWN, a village in the parish of Fartagh, barony of Galmoy, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Cork, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north by east of Urlingford, $7\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Castle-Durrow, and 62 south-west by south of Dublin. It presents, in the neatness of its houses and the regularity of its street alignment, an agreeable contrast to the majority of Irish villages. On the high grounds in its vicinity is the Spa of BALLYWELLIN [which see]; and toward Urlingford are the mansions of Violet Hill, G. Hely, Esq., and Marymount, R. Neville, Esq. A dispensary in the village is within the Kilkenny Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 3,265; and, in 1839, its receipts amounted to £108 11s.; and its expenditure to £120. In 1841, the Johnstown Loan Fund had a capital of £764, circulated £3,304 in 1,298 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £5 17s. 3d. Area of the village, 82 acres. Pop., in 1831, 875; in 1841, 949. Houses 170. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 72; in manufactures and trade, 67; in other pursuits, 54. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 83; on their own manual labour, 74; on means not specified, 25.

JOHNSTOWN, barony of Carbery, co. Kildare. See JOHNSTOWN-BRIDGE.

JOHNSTOWN, or WATCH-HOUSE, a village in the parish of Moyacomb, barony of Scarewalsh, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the western verge of the county, a little above the confluence of the Derry and the Slaney, and about half-a-mile south of Clonegall. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 235; in 1841, 311. Houses 62.

JOHNSTOWN, a hamlet in the parish and barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 44.

JOHNSTOWN, a demesne in the barony of Forth, 3 miles south-west by south of Wexford, on the road thence to Duncormuck, co. Wexford, Leinster. It is the property and residence of Hamilton Knox Grogan Morgan, Esq., a descendant of the great Scottish reformer. The mansion is a spacious, modern, castellated structure, built entirely of Carlow granite, and equal in beauty and magnificence to most of the best mansions of the kingdom; and it occupies the site, and embodies one of the towers, of a very ancient structure. Immediately adjoining it is a noble artificial lake, formed at enormous expense, decorated all round by the hand of taste, and closely overlooked at the margin by several turrets of carved stone. The demesne occupies a hollow at the head of a fertile valley, and at a brief distance from the base of a picturesque mountain; yet, though acquiring little aid from the natural configuration of the ground, it is so elaborately finished off by art as to be charmingly beautiful. The circumjacent estate is extensive, highly improved, and excellently managed; and is the topic of two warmly eulogistic and rather long notices from the pen of Mrs. Hall, the one in Chambers' Journal, and the other in her own recent work on Ireland.

JOHNSTOWN AND CREGGAN, a bog in the barony of Moycarne, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 10,181 acres. It extends south-westward along the right bank of the Shannon from within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of Athlone; and is bounded on other sides than that of the river, by the ridges or high grounds of Thomastown, Johnstown, Creggan, and Clonburne. Its average depth is 32 feet; and its surface is nowhere less than 10 feet, and in many places more than 20, above the level of the Shannon. A bed of gravel which forms its bottom is so singularly and boldly undulated, as to occasion very frequent and sudden changes in the depth of the bog, and as to crop repeatedly from the surface in the formation of derries. Of the whole area, 8,966 acres are red heath bog, and 1,215 acres are black bog. The estimated cost of reclamation is £13,934 7s. 5d.

JOHNSTOWN-BRIDGE, a village in the parish of Cadamstown, barony of Carbery, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on the road from Enfield to Edenderry, 1 mile south-south-west of Enfield, and 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Castle-Carbery. Fairs are held on March 31, May 29, Oct. 13, and Dec. 21. Area, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 381; in 1841, 182. Houses 32.

JOHNSTOWN (ST.), a village, formerly a borough, in the parish of Taughboyne, barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the left bank of the Foyle, and on the road from Londonderry to Lifford, 6 miles north of Lifford, 7 south-south-west of Londonderry, and 108 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Dublin. It is now but a sorry collection of a few houses; and even long before the Legislative Union, it was known to its own inhabitants as a borough, only by a sheer proclamation ceremony on the occasion of members being sent nominally from it to parliament. It originated in letters-patent of 16 James I. to Louis, Duke of Lennox and Earl of Richmond; and was designed, partly to subserve the political purposes of 'the Plantation of Ulster,' and partly to become a place of defence for the inhabitants of the neighbouring districts; but it seems never to have acquired strength or population in any tolerable degree accordant with its legal character. The ancestor of the present Marquis of Abercorn, who is proprietor of the soil, was the original patron of the borough and nominator of its representatives in parliament; but an individual of the name of Forward gained over a majority of the burgesses; and the patronage which he in consequence acquired, passed by marriage from his family into that of the present Earl of Wicklow; so that the compensation of £15,000 for disfranchisement was awarded to Alice, Countess of Wicklow, the Right Hon. William Howard, and the Hon. Hugh Howard. A dispensary here is within the Derry Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 27,316 acres, with a pop. of 11,430; and, in 1839, it expended £130, and administered to 5,665 patients. Fairs are held on April 7, Oct. 13, and Nov. 25. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 344. Houses 61.

JOHNSTOWN (ST.), a village, formerly a borough, in the parish of Clonbroney, barony of Granard, co. Longford, Leinster. It is also called BALLINASLOE; and has already been briefly noticed under that word. It stands on the Camolin rivulet, and on the road from Granard to Longford, 6 miles west-south-west of Granard, 6 north-north-west of Edgeworthstown, and 6 north-east by east of Longford. It is a poor and miserable place,—a small daub caricature of even a rotten borough. In 1833, it contained only a new police barrack, a cottage ornée in course of erection by a gentleman who had acquired some of the burgess-freeholds, 5 houses of annual value between £5 and £10, and 40 houses of annual value less than £5. The charter which incorporated it was granted in the third year of Charles II.; assigned 88 acres of land as the site and property of the town; ordered the place, still then only in posse, to be called the Borough and Town of St. Johnstown; appointed it a corporation, consisting of a sovereign, 11 other burgesses, and an unnamed number of free commons; gave that corporation the power of sending two members to parliament; and granted a weekly market on Tuesday, and annual fairs on May 1 and 2, and Nov. 11 and 12. The Earl of Granard eventually carried the borough in his pocket, and in consequence received the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union. The landed property granted by the charter was vested, not in the corporation as a public body, but in the twelve first burgesses to descend from them by inheritance or purchase; and it now exists in plots of from 6 to 8 acres,—two of which are called the Lords Plots, and belong to the Earl of Granard, while the others bear the names of Gledstone's, Adair's, Lecky's, and Kennedy's Plots, and Furrey-Park, John's-Park, Rowley's-Hill, Galloway's-Hill, and High-Park. A grey friary, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is supposed to have stood on the site of the town; but, if it ever existed, it has become completely untraceable. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1831, 255; in 1841, 299. Houses 50.

JOHNSTOWN (ST.), co. Down. See CASTLE-BUOY.

JOHNSTOWN (ST.), or SCADDANSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 3 miles south by east of Killenaule, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,180 acres.

Pop., in 1831, 772; in 1841, 861. Houses 135. One half of the land is good; and the other half is of a light quality. The surface declines to the south; is traversed by the road from Killenaule to Fethard; and forms part of a beautiful and brilliant tract, which has been designated "the magnificent vale of St. Johnstown."—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLENAULE [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £110, and the rectorial for £36; and the latter are appropriated to the vicars-choral of Cashel. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 68 Churchmen, 10 Presbyterians, and 733 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £2 from the rector, £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and some advantages from the late Col. Pennefather—had on their books 106 boys and 93 girls.

JOHNSWELL, a village in the parish of Rathcool, barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It is situated about $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-north-east of the city of Kilkenny. Area, 7 acres. Pop., in 1831, 446; in 1841, 354. Houses 55.

JONESBOROUGH, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Upper Orier, co. Armagh, Ulster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,185 acres, 3 roods, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,598; in 1841, 1,800. Houses 337. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,424; 1841, 1,630. Houses 304. The land is of a rough, mountainous, and indifferent quality; and is immediately overlooked by the grand and rugged mountain-mass of Slievegullion. The village stands a little north-west of Flurry-Bridge, and 4 miles south-south-west of Newry, on the old road thence to Dundalk. It was burnt in 1798. A dispensary, which has branches here and at Meigh, is within the Newry Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 9,185 acres, with a pop. of 6,000; and, in 1839, it expended £44, and administered to 746 patients. Area of the village, 32 acres. Pop., in 1831, 174; in 1841, 170. Houses 33.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £155; glebe, £6 16s. 4d. Gross income, £161 16s. 4d.; nett, £150 15s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was repaired in 1812, by means of a gift of £369 4s. 7d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 180; attendance, from 40 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballymasculan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 73 Churchmen, 3 Presbyterians, and 1,621 Roman Catholics; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 67 boys and 26 girls.

JONESPOINT, a small headland, and a creek, on the south side of Dundalk bay, near the mouth of the river Dee, co. Louth, Leinster. The creek is a safe place for keeping small craft, without the labour of hauling them off the beach; and it is protected by an artificial breakwater, which, though rude, and composed of stones loosely set on edge, has stood firm against the hardest gales. The creek is capable of great improvement as a harbour for small craft.

JORISTOWN, a demesne near Killucan, in the barony of Farbill, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It is the residence of one of the branches of the family of Purdon, is well-planted, and contains, adjacent to its mansion, the hill of Knockshiban, whose summit figures conspicuously in a great expanse.

country, and commands an extensive and luxuriant prospect.

JOYCE-COUNTRY. See CUNNEMARA.

JULIANSTOWN, a parish, partly in the barony of Upper Duleek, but chiefly in that of Lower Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. The Lower Duleek section contains the village of Julianstown. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Upper Duleek section, 283 acres; of the Lower Duleek section, 2,782 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 736; in 1841, 816. Houses 130. Pop., in 1841, of the Upper Duleek section, 60; of the rural districts of the Lower Duleek section, 626. Houses in the Upper Duleek section, 11; in the rural districts of the Lower Duleek section, 99. The surface is drained eastward by the Nanny Water; consists of good land, and is traversed north-north-westward by the road from Balbriggan to Drogheda. In the eastern district is the demesne of Ninch. On the Balbriggan and Drogheda road, 3½ miles south-south-east of the latter place, is the village of Julianstown. A dispensary here is within the Drogheda Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 14,938 acres; with a pop. of 3,767; and, in 1839-40, it expended £98 4s. 3½d., and administered to 1,109 patients. Area of the village, 6 acres. Pop., in 1831, 142; in 1841, 130. Houses 20.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £70; glebe, £27 1s. 2d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £180; and are inappropriate, one half in W. D. Pollard, Esq., and the other half by purchase in the vicar of St. Peter's, Drogheda. The vicarages of Julianstown, MOORECHURCH, STAMULLEN, and CLONALVEY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Julianstown. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 4,122. Gross income, £434 14s. 7d.; nett, £394 13s. 7½d. Patron, the Marquis of Drogheda. The church was built in 1770. Sittings 130; attendance 49. There are Roman Catholic chapels at Stamullen, Kinnogue, and Clonalvey. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 57, and the Roman Catholics to 733; the Protestants of the union to 81, and the Roman Catholics to 4,200; one parochial school was in Julianstown; and 3 other daily schools were in the other parts of the union.

KANTURK, a quoad sacra parish, containing the greater part of the town of the same name, in the quoad civilia parish of Clonfert, barony of Duhallow, co. Cork, Munster. Its limits, as far as concerns clerical duty, are not distinctly defined, but may be considered as extending 2 miles from Kanturk, or to a point halfway between that town and Newmarket. Pop., in 1831, 5,356. The surface comprises the lower and the junction parts of the vales of the Allua and the Dallua, together with a portion of their hill-screens; and its arable land is good and improved. See CLONFERT.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Glebe, £20. Gross income, £158 10s.; nett, £144 1s. 2d. Patron, the incumbent of Clonfert. The church was built about the year 1792. Sittings 300; attendance, from 80 to 140. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 3,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilcorkeran. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 149, and the Roman Catholics to 5,408; and 2 classical schools, 1 ladies' boarding and day school, and 5 other daily schools, had on their books 186 boys and 61 girls.

KANTURK, a market and post town, in the parishes of Clonfert, Kilroe, and Castle-Magner, barony of Duhallow, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the road from Mallow to Newmarket, and on the rivulet Dallua, immediately above its confluence with the Allua, 3 miles above their common confluence with the Blackwater, 4 south-east by east of Newmarket, 9½ west by north of Mallow, 10 south-west by west of Buttevant, and 126 south-west of Dublin. Its uncorrupted name is Ceanntuirc, 'the Boar's Head'; and is said to have been derived from the circumstance of a boar having, after a long chase, been slain on its site by an Irish chieftain. This place was the principal residence of the toparch of Duballow, a branch of the MacCarthys, named MacDonough, and occasionally designated in old chronicles, Princes of Duhallow. In the reign of Elizabeth, a castle or large fortified mansion was built here by MacDonough; but, in consequence of the critical character of the times, and of the suggestion to Elizabeth of doubts whether such a pile would not be dangerous in the hands of an Irish subject, it was prevented by a royal mandate from being quite completed. Its plan is an oblong of 120 feet by 80, flanked at each angle with a square and embattled tower; the main building 4 stories high, the four towers 5 stories high; the windows small but numerous; and the window-cases, the coignes, and the battlements, all of hewn stone. This structure is believed to be the finest ever undertaken by an Irish chieftain; it stands a monument of the increasing taste for architectural improvement which began to be experienced by a race who formerly had been signalized by turbulence and warlike asperity; and it was not long ago repaired, and put into good condition, by its present proprietor, the Earl of Egmont. The estate of Kanturk was forfeited by MacDonough in the rebellion of 1641; it was procured by Sir Philip Perceval, to whom it had previously been mortgaged; and it descended from Sir Philip to the Earl of Egmont, who takes from it the title of Viscount Kanturk in the peerage of Ireland.

The town of Kanturk has a much finer appearance, and displays more evidences of enterprise and prosperity, than might fairly be anticipated from the remoteness and unfavourableness of its situation. Even 80 years ago, it was in a thriving condition, was acquiring new and well-built houses, and had a neat market-house; and down to the present day, it has continued to maintain a character considerably superior to that of many small Irish towns in more favourable situations. Its retail trade is comparatively important; wool-combing, serge-manufacture, porter-brewing, and boulding, are carried on; and some importance and stir are created by the vicinity of the west Munster coal-field. Fairs are held on March 17, May 4, July 4, Sept. 29, Nov. 3, and Dec. 11. Branch offices of the National Bank and the Agricultural and Commercial Bank, were established in 1835. In 1838, the public conveyances were a car to Newmarket, 2 cars to Cork, and a car in transit between Cork and Tralee. The Cork line of railway, as projected by the Public Commissioners, approaches within 18 miles of Kanturk, at a point on the Awbeg river. The district bride-well of Kanturk is kept in an orderly and very clean condition.

The Kanturk Poor-law union ranks as the 94th, and was declared on Dec. 31, 1839. It includes parts of the counties of Cork and Kerry, and comprises an area of 247,049 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 71,844. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Kanturk, 6,070; Newmarket, 8,574; Castle-Magner, 2,833; Clonmeen, 5,935; Drouentarriff, 5,926; Drishane, 7,321; Cullen, 4,383; Kilbrin, 4,292; Kilmeen, 9,367; Knocktemple, 1,928; Nohoval-Daly, 3,229; Tullylease, 2,368; Kilbolane, 4,014; and Shandrum, 5,582. The number of ex-officio guardians is 9, and of elected guardians is 29; and of the latter, 4 are chosen by each of the divisions of Kanturk and Newmarket, 1 by each of the divisions of Castle-Magner, Knocktemple, and Tullylease, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of property rated is £132,085 2s. 4d.; and the total number of persons whose holdings are valued is 6,840. The total number of tenements valued is 5,161; and of these, 1,330 are valued under £5,—156, under £6,—171, under £7,—151, under £8,—131, under £9,—122, under £10,—251, under £12,—230, under £14,—93, under £15,—122, under £16,—183, under £18,—172, under £20,—375, under £25,—304, under £30,—450, under £40,—267, under £50,—and 648 at and above £50. The workhouse was contracted for on July 25, 1840,—to occupy a site of 6 acres, which was devised by the Earl of Egmout at a nominal rent,—to cost £6,800 for building and completion, and £1,400 for fittings and contingencies,—to contain accommodation for 800 persons,—and to be completed in Oct. 1841. The medical charities within the union are a fever hospital at Newmarket, and dispensaries at Kanturk, Freemount, Mill-Street, Mill-Street and Cullen, Newmarket and Boherbue. In 1839–40, Kanturk dispensary expended £88 14s. 11½d., and administered to 2,470 patients. Area of the Clonfert section of the town, 134 acres; of the Kilroe section, 39 acres; of the Castle-Magner section, 9. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 4,388; of the Clonfert section, 2,750; of the Kilroe section, 1,493; of the Castle-Magner section, 140. Houses in the three sections, respectively 417, 226, and 29. The Census of 1831 exhibits the whole town as in Clonfert, and states the pop. at 1,349. Families in the Clonfert section, in 1841, employed chiefly in agriculture, 120; in manufactures and trade, 237; in other pursuits, 144. Families, in that section, dependent chiefly on property and professions, 24; on the directing of labour, 256; on their own manual labour, 271; on means not specified, 20. Families, in the Kilroe section, in 1841, employed chiefly in agriculture, 102; in manufactures and trade, 138; in other pursuits, 61. Families, in that section, dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 132; on their own manual labour, 162; on means not specified, 2.

KAVOGUE (THE), a rivulet which falls into the bay or inlet of Derrycunihy, in the Upper Lake of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster. A series of cascades on this stream are more numerous and better supplied than any other within the basin of the Lakes; and are embosomed among richly wooded scenery.

KEADUE, an ecclesiastical parish in the vicinity of Crossdoney, and in the basin of the river Erne, co. Cavan, Ulster. Its pop. is returned with the parishes of Kilmore and Ballintemple. Its area is 4,684½ acres; and one half of its surface is first rate land,—the other half, second and third rate.—This parish is a sinecure rectory, and part of the benefice of Kilmore, and corps of Kilmore deanery, in the dio. of Kilmore. See KILMORE.

KEADUE, a small post-town, in the parish of Kilronan, barony of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands on the road from Battle-Bridge to Ballyfarnon, 2½ miles south of the Arigna Iron Works, 2½ west by south of Drumshambo, and 6½ north by west of Carrick-on-Shannon. It is the only post-town in the county north of Boyle. In 1830, it consisted of 31 cabins, 4 two-story thatched houses, and 3 two-story slated houses; and was in the course of receiving the important accession of two large new houses and a market-house,—the latter at the private expense of the spirited proprietor of the circumjacent estate, Colonel Tenison. A market held in the village had become improved, and a cloth-shop had been opened, in consequence of the vicinity of the Arigna Works. A dispensary here is within the Boyle Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 23,010 acres, with a pop. of 11,419; and, in 1840–41, it expended £63 10s. 2d., and made 1,308 dispensations of medicine. About 2 miles from the village is CASTLE-TENISON: which see. Area of the town, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 220. Houses 34.

KEADY, a parish, partly in the barony of Turaney, but chiefly in that of Armagh, co. Armagh, Ulster. The barony of Armagh section contains the village of Keady. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Turaney section, 2,125 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches,—of which 40 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches are water. Area of the barony of Armagh section, 13,226½ acres,—of which 208 acres, 4 perches are water. Pop. of the ecclesiastical parish, in 1831, 7,027. But one townland of the civil parish is within the benefice of Derrynoose, and three townlands are within the perpetual curacy of Armaghbreague. Pop. of the civil parish, in 1831, 9,082; in 1841, 9,865. Houses 1,768. Pop. of the Turaney section, in 1831, 1,210; in 1841, 1,117. Houses 188. Pop. of the rural districts of the barony of Armagh section, in 1831, 6,976; in 1841, 7,628. Houses 1,363. About one-sixth is bog, lake, and unprofitable ground; and the remainder is partly good and partly middle-rate land. Lough Clay is the chief lake; and the Callen and a rivulet which runs north-north-westward to the Blackwater at Caledon, are the chief streams. The district is rife and prosperous with the linen manufacture; and the banks of the streams are extensively enlivened with bleach-greens. The chief manufactories are the flax spinning-mills of New Holland, the large flax spinning-mills near Linenvale, the linen manufactory of Dundrum, and the bleach-greens of Annvale, Greenmount, &c.; and among the mansions and villas may be named Glenvale, Lakeview, New Holland, Dundrum, Willowbank, Rockmount, Hermitage, Millview, Mountain-Lodge, Darkley, Linenvale, Greenmount, and Annvale. The roads from Caledon to Dundalk, and from Castle-Shane to Markethill, pass through the interior. The village of Keady stands at the intersection of these roads, and on the stream which issues from Lough Clay, 6 miles south by west of Armagh, 7 north of Castle-Blaney, and 56 north by west of Dublin. Fairs are held on April 4, Aug. 14, and Oct. 14. A dispensary here is within the Armagh Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 18,833 acres, with a pop. of 16,682; and, in 1839, it expended £163 7s., and administered to 1,416 patients. The village has a post-office. Area, 34 acres. Pop., in 1831, 896; in 1841, 1,120. Houses 217. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 63; in manufactures and trade, 143; in other pursuits, 22. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 7; on the directing of labour, 116; on their own manual labour, 102; on means not specified, 3. —Keady parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £323 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £100. Gross income, £423 1s. 6½d.; nett, £334 16s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1775, at an unknown cost; and a new tower was added in 1822, by means of a loan of £276 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance, from 200 to 400. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, the one formerly of the Synod of Ulster, and the other of the Secession Synod, have an attendance of respectively 200, and from 200 to 400. The Roman Catholic chapels of Keady and Granemore have an attendance of respectively 1,400, and from 1,100 to 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Derrynoose. In 1834, the parishioners of the quoad sacra parish consisted of 1,084 Churchmen, 1,881 Presbyterians, 5 other Protestant dissenters, and 4,322 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 200 children; 3 daily schools made no exact returns of their attendance; and 10 other daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from Mr. Fox, and £10 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, one aided by the London Hibernian Society, two connected with the Kildare-Place Society, one a female school for the higher classes, and one a proprietary school for classics and mathematics—had on their books 326 boys and 242 girls. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Keady and Carraban, and granted £73 10s. toward the erection of a second school at Keady.

KEALAVOLLANE. See KILLAVULLANE.

KEEL, a Roman Catholic parish in the barony of Corkaguiney, co. and dio. of Kerry, Munster. Post-town, Dingle. The chapels are at Keel and Ferriter.

KEEL, the principal village of Achill, 4 miles from Dugort and the Achill Missionary Settlement, barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the south coast of the island, at the head of Tramor bay, 5½ miles east of Achill Head; and a considerable lake immediately north-north-east of it, bears the name of Lough Keel, and has a surface elevation of 18 feet above sea-level.

KEENAGH. See KENAGH.

KEENAUGHT. See KENOUGHT.

KEEM, a hamlet on the south coast of Achill, 11 miles from the ferry of communication with the mainland barony of Burrishoole, and 3¼ miles west of the village of Keel, co. Mayo, Connaught. Its vicinity is remarkable at once for the boldness of its cliffs, the extensiveness of its views, and the production of some fine amethysts. See ACHILL.

KEEPER, a mountain in the barony of Owney and Arra, co. Tipperary, Munster. Its summit is situated in a straight line, 4¼ miles east-north-east of Newport-Tip., and the same distance south-south-west of Silvermines. The mountain lifts majestically to the clouds a huge dome-like outline; and is not more conspicuous by its altitude above the neighbouring hills, than remarkable for its smooth and verdant surface. Its altitude above sea-level is 2,265 feet.

KEEROES, two islets in Ballyteigue bay, barony of Bargie, co. Wexford, Leinster. They lie 2½ miles east by south of the entrance of Bannow Harbour, and 3¼ east by north of Fethard; and they are dangerous to navigation, and have occasioned several shipwrecks.

KELLISTOWN, KELLETSTOWN, or KELLYSTOWN, a parish in the baronies of Carlow and Forth, 3½ miles west by north of Carlow, co. Carlow, Leinster. It exists in two mutually detached sections; and the Carlow section lies a mile north-north-west of the Forth one. Area of the Carlow section, 2,663 acres; of the Forth section, 1,743 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 662; in 1841, 684. Houses 110. Pop. of the Forth section, in 1831, 247; in 1841, 301. Houses 44. The surface lies in the basin of the Burren rivulet, consists throughout of good land, and is traversed by the road from Tullow to Carlow. In the Carlow section is Moyle, the seat of Mr. Bunbury; and in the Forth section is Kilknock House. "The more ancient name of Kellystown, or Kelletstown," says Mr. Brewer, "is Cill-mna-ur-iosal-na-moen, 'the church of the poor mourning Munster women;' allusive to a sanguinary battle fought here in or about the year 478, in which the Momonian warriors were defeated and slaughtered by the Lagonians. We are told by the Irish annalists that this battle was fought between the men of Leinster, headed by Lughaidh, the monarch, grandson of king Niall of the nine hostages, and Eocha, king of Munster, and his forces. At Kellystown are the remains of a pillar-tower, standing in an elevated situation." This structure is formed of the grit stone of the country, and measures internally 12 feet in diameter. Near the tower are the ruins of a church; and both fabrics were dedicated to St. Patrick, who has the credit of having been their founder. The church is likewise built of grit stone; and the arches are plain and semicircular. Here is the place of sepulture of the MacCumins, or Cummins, a subordinate sept, formerly seated in this part of the country."—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £361 12s. 6d.; glebe, £61 15s. 9d. Gross income, £423 8s. 3d.; nett, £350 4s. 1½d. Patron, the Crown two turns, and the diocesan one. The incumbent holds also the prebend and vicarage of Donaghmore in the dio. of Dublin. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1808, at the cost of £784 12s. 3½d.; of which £138 9s. 3d. was raised by subscription, and respectively £553 6s. 11d. and £92 6s. 1½d. given and lent by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 86. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 95, and the Roman Catholics to 582.

* The site of the tower has an altitude of 346 feet above sea-level.

KELLS, a barony on the west side of the county of Kilkenny, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Shillelogher; on the east, by Knocktopher; on the south, by Iverk; and, on the west, by co. Tipperary. Its greatest length, from north to south, is $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth, from east to west, is $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its area is 38,376 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches. The King's river flows eastward along the northern district, and drains the greater part of the interior; and the Lingay, an affluent of the Suir, flows along a small part of the western boundary, and drains the extreme south. The vale of the King's river has a prevalently argillaceous soil; and contains many of the strongest wheat-bearing fields in the county. The south-western district is hilly; but has a dry and predominantly kindly soil.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Dunnamaggan, Kells, and Stonecarthy, and the whole of the parishes of Ballintobbin, Coologhmore, Killemerry, Kilmaganny, Kilrea, Mallardstown, and Sullahought. The chief villages are Kells, Kilmaganny, Dunnamaggan, and Windgap. Pop., in 1831, 15,461; * in 1841, 12,863. Houses 2,011. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,613; in manufactures and trade, 268; in other pursuits, 242. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,145; who could read but not write, 992; who could neither read nor write, 2,422. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 876; who could read but not write, 1,300; who could neither read nor write, 3,581.—Kells barony lies partly within the Poor-law union of Callan, and partly within that of Carrick-on-Suir. The total number of tenements valued is 2,280; and of these, 1,137 were valued under £5,—377, under £10,—228, under £15,—139, under £20,—91, under £25,—54, under £30,—86, under £40,—43, under £50,—and 125, at and above £50.

KELLS (LOWER and UPPER), two baronies on the west side of the county of Meath, Leinster. They are bounded, on the north, by the baronies of Slane and Morgallion; on the east, by the baronies of Morgallion and Navan; on the south, by the barony of Lune and the county of Westmeath; and, on the west, by the barony of Demifore and the county of Cavan. Their greatest length, south-south-westward, is $15\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and their greatest breadth in the opposite direction is 13. Area of Lower Kells, 36,171 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches,—of which 147 acres, 16 perches are water. Area of Upper Kells, 49,552 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches,—of which 61 acres, 32 perches are water. The Blackwater and Moynalty rivers run right across the baronies, and form a confluence a little before passing away to the east. The surface of the land is beautifully diversified with gentle swells; but, with one or two unimportant exceptions, is nearly all strictly champaign. The predominant soil is a rich loam extremely productive, equally suited to tillage and to grazing, and so deep that even on the tops of the rising grounds it may be unsparingly trenched 4 feet for renovation. But a dismal account is given by John Power, Esq., in an official parliamentary document, of the state of husbandry, as it existed in 1835. "Unless upon natural meadow," says he, "or where the land has been long enough in grass to form a natural sward, the hay and grass are generally injured, especially in quality, by the land being often laid down in a very foul state, and by its being sown with a great quantity of rubbish, generally the sweepings of the stables and stackyards, which, though honoured with the name of hay seeds, is often more entitled to that of weed seeds. The meadow and pasture land is also completely overrun with ragweed, thistles, and every other kind of weeds, which are suffered to vegetate in full luxuriance, and to run to seed. To see those weeds in full flower or seed standing as high and nearly as thick as a crop of corn, over hundreds if not some thousands of acres of the finest grass land, was indeed a singular and deplorable spectacle. * * * In short, Lower Kells contains some of the very worst farming which the English Assistant Commissioner recollects to have seen in any part of Great Britain, or the Continent; and one of the chief proprietors in that barony, who has also travelled much, expressed the same opinion."

Lower Kells contains part of the parishes of Enniskeen, Moybollogue, and Nobber, and the whole of the parishes of Cruicetown, Emlagh, Kilbeg, Kilmainham-Wood, Moynalty, Newtown, and Staholmog. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred from Morgallion to Lower Kells, a townland of Nobber, containing, in 1831, a pop. of 364. The chief villages are Carlostown, Kilmainham-Wood, and Moynalty. Annual valuation under the Poor-law Act, £28,902 Os. 9d.; sum levied under the grand warrant of summer 1841, £901 9s. 1d. Pop., in 1831, 13,666; in 1841, 14,627. Houses 2,473. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,109; in manufactures and trade, 319; in other pursuits, 134. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,458; who could read but not write, 1,055; who could neither read nor write, 2,877. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 776; who could read but not write, 1,163; who could neither read nor write, 4,410. This barony lies partly within the Poor-law union of Bailieborough, and partly within that of Kells. The total number of tenements is 1,609; and of these, 849 were valued under £5,—305, under £10,—152, under £15,—84, under £20,—41, under £25,—27, under £30,—34, under £40,—24, under £50,—and 93, at and above £50.

Upper Kells contains part of the parishes of Donaghpatrick, Loughan, and Rathboyne, and the whole of the parishes of Burry, Dulane, Girley, Kells, Kilskeer, and Teltown. The only town is Kells; and the chief villages are Irishtown, Scurlagstown, Springville, Curnasase, Maperath, Mahonstown, Cloncat, Fordstown, Girley, Newtown-Girley, Athglasson, Ballinlough, Crossakel, Kilskeer, Pottercha, Robinstown, Smithstown, Castle-Keiran, Derver, Loughan, and Rathindrink. Annual valuation under the Poor-law Act, £48,238 16s. 1d.; sum levied under the grand warrant of summer 1841, £1,611 17s. 1d. Pop., in 1831, 20,462; in 1841, 22,142. Houses 3,544. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,710; in manufactures and trade, 908; in other pursuits, 378. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,613; who could read but not write, 1,812; who could neither read nor write, 4,295. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,671; who could read but not write, 1,924; who could neither read nor write, 6,186. This barony is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Kells, Navan, and Oldcastle. The total number of tenements valued is 3,609; and of these, 2,317 were valued under £5,—372, under £10,—283, under £15,—138, under £20,—97, under £25,—62, under £30,—71, under £40,—45, under £50,—and 244, at and above £50.

gallion, Kells, Demifore, Lune, Navan, and Upper Moyfenragh. The other great division is DUNSHAUGHLIN: which see.

KELLS, a village in the parish of Connor, barony of Lower Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the Glenwherry river, immediately west of the village of Connor, and, in almost everything but name, is strictly a part of that village. Eight townlands adjacent to it seem to have been formerly a parish or grange under the designation of Kells or Disert; and these townlands, along with five rectories and the tithes of Templemotragh and Kildoran, belonged, at the dissolution of monasteries, to a priory of regular canons which is said to have been founded at Kells by O'Brien Carrog, previous to the Anglo-Norman invasion. Fairs are held on Jan. 8, March 1, May 27, June 10, and Sept. 12. Area of the village, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 248. Houses 44.

KELLS, a coast-guard station, on the south side of Dingle bay, several miles east of Valentia, barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. In 1836, the fishing-craft within its district were 54 open sail-boats with 432 men, and 24 row-boats with 180 men.

KELLS, a parish, partly in the barony of Shillelogher, but chiefly in that of Kells, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. The Kells section contains the village of Kells. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Shillelogher section, 589 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches,—of which 168 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches, lie detached. Area of the barony of Kells section, 3,820 acres, 27 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,658; in 1841, 1,831. Houses 301. Pop., in 1841, of the Shillelogher section, 199; of the rural districts of the Kells section, 1,290. Houses in the Shillelogher section, 27; in the rural districts of the Kells section, 217. The surface is part of the fertile vale of the King's river, consists wholly of profitable land, and contains a large proportion of prime arable grounds. The chief mansions are Garrynamanagh, Kellsborough, and Newtown.—The village of Kells stands on the King's river, and at the intersection of the road from Callan to Thomastown with that from Kilkenny to Newmarket, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Callan, $4\frac{1}{2}$ west by north of Thomastown, and $6\frac{1}{2}$ south of Kilkenny. Though now a comparatively poor and obscure place, it was formerly a town of some importance, and still attracts notice by the ruins of its old abbey. These ruins comprise the remains of several towers and walls, enclosing two large squares; and they include also the cloisters, in a state of good preservation. The abbey was founded in 1193, for regular canons of the order of St. Augustine, by Lord Geoffrey Fitz-Robert de Marisco; and it made a conspicuous figure among the monastic institutions of Ireland, had extensive possessions, and sent its abbot to the national councils as a lord of parliament. The history of the town and the barony of Kells is identical, and exhibits a blood-stained and repulsive record. Fitz-Robert de Marisco, the founder of the abbey, took the title of Baron from the barony, and threw round the town such dignity as accrued from a seat of toparchic opulence and power. On his dying without issue, in 1211, the barony devolved on his nephew, Lord Geoffrey de Montemarisco; and in 1242, it was forfeited by that magnate, and acquired by the family of De Bermingham. Various individuals and near relatives of the new owners violently quarrelled among themselves, and engaged in sanguinary feuds with one another and with the family of St. Auban; and in 1252, Lord William de Bermingham, in the course of one of these feuds, burned Kells to the ground. The barony afterwards passed into the possession of the Le Poer family; early in the 14th century, the town was walled and fortified by Sir Eustace le Poer; in 1348, Sir Eustace was hanged by the arbitrary Lord Justice D'Ufford; and after this tragedy, the barony passed to Lord Justice Sir Walter de Bermingham; but soon afterwards, and up to the dissolution of monasteries, it figured chiefly as the property of the abbot and canons of Kells. A fair is held in the village on July 13. Area, 14 acres. Pop., in 1831, 482; in 1841, 342. Houses 57.—Kells parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £99 5s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £46 4s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £196 10s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Ormonde. The vicarages of KELLS and STAMCARTHY, and the rectories of BALLYTOBBIN, KILREA, MALLARDSTOWN, EARLSTOWN, and ANNAMULT [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kells. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 5,778. Gross income, £875 3s. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £698 8s. 8d. Patron, alternately the diocesan and the Marquis of Ormonde. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Killenaule, in the dio. of Cashel. Two curates have each a salary of £75. The Kells church was built in 1843, by means of £687 13s. 10d. gifted by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £300 contributed by private parties. Sittings 200; attendance from 100 to 110. There is a church also in Ballytobbin. There are two Roman Catholic chapels in Earlstown, and one in Stamcarthy. In 1834, the Protestants of Kells parish amounted to 93, and the Roman Catholics to 1,572; the Protestants of the union to 299, and the Roman Catholics to 5,550; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 15 children; 3 daily schools in the parish—one of which was supported by the rector—had on their books 140 boys and 82 girls, and 9 daily schools in the union had on their books 295 boys and 214 girls.

KELLS, a parish containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 1; area, 8,597 acres, 32 perches,—of which 44 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,839; in 1841, 7,648. Houses 1,172. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,513; in 1841, 3,443. Houses 567. The surface is washed by the Blackwater and the Moynalty rivers; has a rich, ornate appearance; and is embellished with the demesnes of Headfort, Kells-Cottage, Rookfield, the Archdeaconry, Woodville, Sylvan-Park, and Drumbaragh. Lloyd's Pillar, about a mile west of the town, stands on an elevation of 422 feet.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £553 16s. 11d. The rectories of KELLS, BURRY, DULANE, and RATHBOYNE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kells, and corps of the archdeaconry of Meath. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 10,640. Gross income, £1,447 9s. 5d.; nett, £1,205 16s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; but these sums are exclusive of respectively £723 18s. 10d. and £687 14s. 11d. arising from rents and renewal fines of archdeaconry lands. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kilskeer, in the dio. of Meath. A curate has a salary of £100. The church was built in 1811, at the cost of £2,769 4s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., raised by the inhabitants. Sittings 500; attendance, from 400 to 500. The Kells Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 3,000 at each of two services; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Girley. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Dulane and Rathboyne. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 784, and the Roman Catholics to 6,020; the Protestants or the union to 962, and the Roman Catholics to 9,627; and 15 daily schools in the union—10 of which were in the parish, and 2 of these 10 salaried with respectively £24 from Lord Headfort, and £15 from the archdeacon—had on their books 476 boys and 324 girls.

KELLS.

A post, market, and corporate town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Kells, barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the river Blackwater, and at the intersection of the road from Kingscourt to Mullingar, with the mail-road from Dublin to Enniskillen, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Athboy, 9 east-north-east of Navan, 9 south-east by east of Virginia, and 31 north-west of Dublin.

Environs.—A chief, an extensive, and an imposing feature in the immediate environs of Kells, is the noble demesne of HEADFORT: which see. Another feature of main interest is the hill of Lloyd, rising in the corporation lands in the western environs. "It is," says Mr. Fraser, "a beautifully shaped, fertile hill, rising to an elevation of 422 feet, and bearing on its summit a handsome pillar upwards of 100 feet in height, erected by Thomas, first Earl of Bective. The ranger of the corporate grounds, who lives on the hill of Lloyd, is intrusted by the Marquis of Headfort with the key of entrance to the pillar; and from the lantern at the top, you command at your feet a view of all the country around Kells; and, in clear weather, the outlines of the vast fertile plain," which extends to the Dublin mountains, and is the largest and most important champaign tract in the kingdom, "can be traced. The hill of Lloyd itself stands at the termination on this point of the plain, and is the first remarkable eminence in the country, which, from its base to the bay of Donegal, undulates in a succession of hill and mountain of every shape and modification." "The country around the town is pleasing, highly fertile, and comparatively well-improved. The seats are numerous; and, if we except the southern suburbs of Dublin, more grown hedge-row timber is to be seen than in any other district in the kingdom. North of the town, on the road leading to the picturesque village of Moynalty, is the archdeaconry of Meath, the residence of the Hon. Thomas De Lacy; and a little beyond it, Willmount, John Radcliff, Esq., and Williamstown, the Rev. Mr. Garnett. At $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Kells, on the same road, are the demesnes of Oakly Park, and Maprath; at 3, Kingsfort, the seat of Richard Challoner, Esq., and near it Cherrymount, Philip Smyth, Esq. South of the town, on the road leading to Athboy, are Rockfield, the seat of Richard Rothwell, Esq., and Balrath, C. A. Nicholson, Esq. West, on the road leading to Crossakeale, at 2 miles from the town, is Drumbaragh, Woodward, Esq.; at 2, Sylvan Park, W. Keating, Esq.; and at 3, Newgrove, H. O'Reilly, Esq." "There is something very imposing about the entrance to Kells. The spacious and well-wooded avenues through which we pass,—the wide street adorned with venerable trees, and terminated by the church and ancient round tower,—the handsome Roman Catholic chapel and sessions-house, with their enclosures, are calculated to remind us of many scenes in England, where the village is an adjunct to the manor-house, and the lord of the soil is as careful of the interests and comforts of his villagers, as he is of the preservation of the pictures in his gallery, or the trees in his park. Such was that portion of Kells connected with Headfort, in the time of Thomas, first Earl of Bective; but it has overstripped the prescribed limits, and now joins the older parts of the town, which exhibit the narrow lanes, wretched cabins, and all the misery consequent on neglect, subletting, and unrestrained settlement."

Streets and Buildings.—Though the town is usually described as situated on the Blackwater, the part nearest to that river is upwards of $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile south of its south bank. The chief streets are one which leads $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile eastward from the church, on the thoroughfare to Dublin; one which leads 500 yards southward from the church, to the forking outlet toward respectively Athboy and Mullingar; one which goes 280 yards north-north-eastward from the middle of the latter to an intersection of the street toward Dublin, and then proceeds a considerable distance to the outlet toward Kingscourt; and a curved one of about 300 yards in length, which goes off from the northern part of the one last-mentioned, and leads out toward Cavan. Though the private houses throughout these streets possess little regularity, and though structures of the wretched cabin character occupy various adjacent lanes, yet the aggregate appearance of the town's interior is neat and agreeable.—The parish-church is a plain structure, well fitted up, and in good preservation. A conspicuous monument in it, to the memory of Sir Thomas Taylor, Bart., ancestor of the Marquis of Headfort, consists of a large sarcophagus of grey marble, resting on the claws of three eagles, and supporting an urn upon an altar of white marble, between two Corinthian pillars. A detached tower on the north side of the church exhibits on one of its fronts three busts of ecclesiastical dignitaries, with an inscription stating that the church was re-edified, in 1572, by Hugh Brady, bishop of Meath. A turrage in the vicinity of the church towards the south, measured 99 feet from the ground previous to the fall of its ancient conical capping, and presents four apertures or windows near the top to the four cardinal points; but is much inferior in appearance to many of the other pillar towers of Ireland. In the churchyard are the fragments of a richly decorated stone cross; and in a street near the site of the old castle is another stone cross, elaborately and beautifully carved with many figures and devices. A small stone-roofed cell or chapel is pointed out in the town, not only as an antique object, but as the pretended residence of St. Columba! A Culdee establishment seems to have been founded in Kells about the middle of the 6th century, and to have afterwards become an abbey for canons regular, and to have acquired great monastic celebrity. The greater part of the abbey's possessions were granted, at the dissolution, to Sir Gerald Plunket; and its buildings have been so nearly erased as to be now scarcely traceable. A friary or hospital for Crouched Friars, was founded, in the reign of Richard I., by Walter de Lacy, and dedicated to St. John the Baptist; and stood at the foot of the street still called from it St. John's-street; and, at the dissolution, its buildings and appurtenances were granted for 21 years, at the annual rent of £14 10s., to Richard Slane. The present Roman Catholic parochial chapel is a handsome structure, erected after a design by F. Johnston, Esq. A castle and town fortification were erected by Hugh de Lacy, Lord of Meath, to render Kells the key of his new dominions; and the castle is said to have occupied the site of the present market-place. But the town figured little as a military post after the 14th century, and ceased to be defensible before the civil wars in the reign of Charles I. The present sessions-house is a neat building, designed by F. Johnston, Esq. The district bridewell is a new structure; contains 2 day-rooms, yards, and 16 cells; and is kept in excellent order.

Trade.]—A small lace factory employs upwards of 100 women and girls. The corn market receives but limited supplies, and depends for them upon remote farms on the northern border of Meath and the southern border of Cavan. The general trade is inconsiderable; and, in 1838, the only article of local consumption noticed as large was whiskey. Carts laden with corn or other agricultural produce are continually rolling through the town, chiefly on the route to Drogheda; and several droves of pigs pass through almost every day. A weekly market is held on Saturday; and fairs are held on Feb. 27, May 27, July 16, Sept. 9, Oct. 16, and Nov. 17. A three-horse coach and a long car, each carrying 14 passengers, run daily to Dublin; and two stage-coaches pass through every day, and a mail-coach every night. The town is touched by the Dublin and Enniskillen railway, as projected by the Public Commissioners.

Poor-law Union.]—The Kells Poor-law union ranks as the 53d, and was declared on July 8, 1839. It includes portions of the counties of Meath, Westmeath, and Cavan; and comprehends an area of 114,528 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 41,838. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in Cavan, Mullagh, 3,847; in Westmeath, Clonmellon, 3,066; and in Meath, Kells, 6,839,—Burry, 2,298,—Girley, 1,583,—Rathmore, 2,763,—Feltown, 1,308,—Dulane, 3,614,—Kil-keer, 3,647,—Moynalty, 3,167,—Kilbeg, 2,918,—Kilmainham, 1,446,—and Nobber, 4,001. The number of ex-officio guardians is 8, and of elected guardians is 24; and of the latter, 3 are returned by Kells division, 1 by each of the divisions of Girley, Feltown, and Kilmainham, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £124,194; and the total number of persons rated is 6,384. The workhouse was contracted for on Feb. 19, 1840,—to cost £5,970 for building and completion, and £939 13s. 9d. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 8 acres, 3 roods, 9 perches, purchased for £790 6s. 3d.,—and to contain accommodation for 600 persons. Paupers began to be admitted on May 23, 1842; and the total expenditure of the union for the first half year was £1,888 6s. 1½d. The medical charities are a fever hospital at Kells, and dispensaries at Clonmellon, Kilmainham, Kells, Moynalty, and Nobber. In 1839–40, the fever hospital expended £477 6s. 3½d., and admitted 271 patients; and the Kells dispensary expended £78 13s. 1d., and administered to 800 patients. In 1841, the Kells Loan Fund had a capital of £2,524, circulated £11,796 in 2,535 loans, realized £155 3s. 6d. of nett profit, and expended £140 for charitable purposes; and from the date of its origin till the close of 1841, it circulated £21,910 in 4,921 loans, cleared a nett profit of £269 9s. 8d., and expended on charitable objects £180.

Municipal Affairs.]—Kells, as a borough, has charters of Walter de Lacy, 11 and 12 Richard II., 16 Henry IV., 4, 8, and 11 Edward IV., 3 Henry VIII., and 4 James II. The borough limits, though not marked by defined boundary-lines, are understood to extend about a mile in every direction beyond the town as built upon. The corporation, according to the two latest charters, is styled, "The Sovereign, Provosts, Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Kells;" and consists of a sovereign, 2 provosts, 24 burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen. A select body, called the common council, consists of the sovereign, the provosts, and a few of the burgesses, who are nominated by Lord Headfort, for life; but both this body and the corporation at large seem to have been reduced to very nearly an automaton existence; for "Lord Headfort being continuously sovereign," say the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations, "and having directly the nomination of one of the provosts, and probably of the council, and indirectly of all the other officers, governs the corporation at his pleasure; and although he has encountered some resistance on one or two occasions, it proceeded principally from the freemen, and his power is still uncontrolled." The number of freemen, in 1833, was 33 or 34; and only 2 of these were Roman Catholics; and even they obtained the freedom, not only after the Emancipation Act of 1829, but with great difficulty, and by the special influence of Lord Headfort. Freemen have no duty to perform; yet, if resident in the borough, are exempt from tolls and customs, and entitled to shares of "the Commons." The corporation have no exclusive jurisdiction, either civil or criminal. A court of quarter-sessions is held in the town twice a-year; and a court of petty-sessions every week. The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary, consisting of one chief constable and 15 constables. Part of the streets are kept in repair at the expense of the county; but most of them, at the private expense of Lord Headfort; and all are usually so well kept, as to produce a greater appearance of cleanliness and comfort than prevails in the majority of Irish towns. Corporate lands, lying to the west of the town, comprising 312 acres, and called "the Commons of Loyd," are shared and managed, in a manner too complex to be succinctly related, for the benefit of the members of the corporation. The income from tolls and customs used to average about £157 a-year, and was expended in lighting, watching, and cleansing the town, in providing it with water, and in maintaining a fire-engine; but about the year 1829, it began rapidly to sink to seeming annihilation, so that the public objects promoted by means of it required to be abandoned. From the reign of Elizabeth till the Legislative Union, the borough returned two members to the Irish parliament.

Statistics.]—Area of the town, 147 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,326; in 1841, 4,205. Houses 605. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 234; in manufactures and trade, 488; in other pursuits, 156. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 44; on the directing of labour, 492; on their own manual labour, 304; on means not specified, 38. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 924; who could read but not write, 286; who could neither read nor write, 593. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 599; who could read but not write, 399; who could neither read nor write, 914.

History.]—Kells was anciently called Kenlesse or Kenlis. It is first recognised in history as the site of the ecclesiastical establishment of St. Columba. A bishopric of Kells appears to have grown out of the celebrity, either of Columba's institution, or of the regular abbey which succeeded it; and in the 13th century, this bishopric was united to that of Meath. The town, previous to the 12th century, was frequently plundered and otherwise injured by the Danes, and several times destroyed by accidental fire. In 1152, a memorable synod was held at Kells, by John Paparo, cardinal of St. Laurence, and legate of the pope. At the settlement immediately succeeding the Anglo-Norman conquest, Hugh de Lacy, Lord of Meath, not only walled and fortified the town, and made it a chief military strength of his toparchy, but also threw round it much of the sort of importance which was most popular at the period, by making a considerable grant of lands to its abbey, and enabling that institution to shine with great secular splendour; and afterwards John, Earl of Morton, Lord of Ireland, and subsequently King John, confirmed De Lacy's grant, and conferred on the abbey additional benefactions. In 1315, Edward Bruce is said by several historians to have obtained near Kells a victory over the forces of Roger Mortimer, afterwards Earl of March, and to have, at the same time, burned the town.

KENAGH (THE), a rivulet of the county of Longford, Leinster. It rises in the vicinity of the village of Kenagh; runs 9 miles north-north-westward, in the baronies of Moydow and Longford, to a confluence with the Camolin; and, jointly with that river and the Shannon, forms, at their common confluence, the island of Cloondragh.

KENAGH, or KENAUGHT, a village in the parish of Kilcommock, barony of Rathcline, co. Longford, Leinster. It stands on the road from Mullingar to Strokestown, 4 miles south-east by south of Killashee, $4\frac{1}{2}$ north-west by north of Ballymahon, and $57\frac{1}{2}$ west by north of Dublin. A dispensary here is within the Longford Poor-law union, and serves for an area of 57,846 acres, with a pop. of 14,428; and, in 1839—40, it expended £112 8s. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and made 3,776 dispensations of medicine. In 1841, the Kenagh Loan Fund had a capital of £1,057, circulated £4,906 in 1,270 loans, cleared a nett profit of £89 15s. 9d., and expended for charitable purposes £101 18s. 6d. In the vicinity is Mosstown, the highly improved seat of A. J. Kingstown, Esq. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1831, 396; in 1841, 370. Houses 61.

KENAHAN, a village in the parish of Kilcar, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. Pop., in 1831, 263; in 1841, not specially returned.

KENAUGHT, a barony. See KENOUGHT.

KENBAAN, a romantic headland, and an old castle, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west by west of Ballycastle, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. The name signifies the White Head, and alludes to the snowy appearance of the promontory. "This," says the author of the Guide to the Giant's Causeway, "is one of the most interesting and extraordinary promontories in this apparently unnatural region. It is the most conspicuous object in the view, as Ballycastle is approached from the Carey mountains, from the snowy whiteness of its chalky cliffs; and a nearer survey tends to increase admiration and astonishment. A mass of chalk about 1 furlong in extent is seen in the face of the cliff, abruptly terminated, and with every demonstration of violent convulsion at both extremities. Towards the east it is both over and under lain by basalt, and, forming a sort of tongue, is at last lost and enclosed in that rock; here also the chalk, which is horizontal in most other places, is perceived to assume a curved position. Towards the west, the chalk extends into the sea, and forms a sharp, narrow, tract of land, whose highest point is 70 feet above its surface, connected to the mainland by an isthmus completely broken through; over this chasm hang abruptly the ruins of an ancient castle, the gateway of which is tolerably perfect, once the stronghold of the MacAlisters, a hardy, stubborn enemy to the Queen in the deputyship of Sir John Perrot; this site, like that of Dunluce, appears to have been selected for the narrowness of its approach, and its consequent security of defence. Beneath MacAlister's castle, on each side of the chasm, enormous whin-dykes may be distinctly traced; and in every direction the promontory appears shattered and convulsed; masses of basalt—mingled sometimes with chalky debris and flints—are seen protruding through numerous fissures." Beneath the promontory are numerous caves in the chalky cliffs, extremely curious and beautiful, perfectly dry, and used alternately for building and for storing boats, but capable of being approached only by water. A part of the massive walls of the tower or keep, is the chief existing ruin of the castle; and it both contributes a romantic feature to a singularly picturesque sweep of bold coast, and serves as a frequent and favourite retreat of pic-nic parties of summer visitors.

KENE, KANE, or INISKIN, a parish in the barony of Upper Dundalk, 3 miles north-north-west of the town of Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. Area, 750 acres. Pop., in 1831, 373; in 1841, 363. Houses 60. The surface consists principally of arable land, and is traversed by the road from Dundalk to Newtown-Hamilton. Some monastic writers exhibit a St. Dageus in the double light of "bishop of Inis-chaoín" in the beginning of the 6th century, and of smith to St. Kieran.—This parish is nominally a curacy, but practically a rectory, in the dio. of Armagh, and forms part of the benefice of BARONSTOWN: which see. Tithe composition, £72 15s. 7d. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 13 Presbyterians, and 366 Roman Catholics; and a hedge school had on its books 40 boys and 30 girls.

KENMARE, a large and far-penetrating bay, belonging partly to co. Cork, but chiefly to that of Kerry, Munster. It is sometimes, with no serious impropriety, termed an estuary; but is popularly and generally, with ludicrous inaccuracy, called Kenmare River. Its entrance has been described as $5\frac{1}{2}$ leagues in breadth, and as extending south-south-eastward from the Skelligs to the Bull, Cow, and Calf; but this includes Ballinskelligs bay, and about 8 miles of seaward coast, and cannot, but with the most reprehensible laxness of representation, be regarded as the true entrance. We can hardly state the entrance even to extend southward from the Hog Islands to Dursey Island, a stretch of $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles; but ought to regard it as situated $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles farther east, and as extending southward from Lamb's Head to the northern abutment of Cod's Head, a stretch of $5\frac{1}{2}$. The bay measured inward from this entrance, penetrates the land 16 miles east-north-eastward, and is then continued $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles farther by the small estuary of the Roughty river; it, on the whole, diminishes gradually from its entrance width of $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles to an ultimate width of less than 1; but it makes several expansions and contractions, and, at the greatest of the former, or from Castle-Cove on the north, to the head of Quolagh bay on the south, it has an extreme breadth of 8 miles. The bay, in a general view, is clean and safe for navigation, and presents hardly any of the difficulties which often encumber sea-loughs of equal or even less extent. Its chief creeks are Rosmore bay and Blackwater creek, on the north, and respectively 7 and 4 miles from Kenmare; Quolagh or Cualoc bay, immediately within Cod's Head on the south; and Ardrom and Kilmichaelogue Harbours, near the middle of the south side. Good-sized hookers can go with the tide, from the bay up the Roughty estuary, as far as to Roughty bridge. The chief islands are Farnard, at the north side of the entrance of Quolagh bay; Skerky, opposite Ardrom Harbour, but nearer the north shore than the south; Rossmore, on the east side of Rossmore bay, and alternately insular and peninsular; Ormond, 1 mile east by south of Rossmore; and Kepincosh, Dukerrin, Binish, and other islets, forming a mimic archipelago, 3 miles below Kenmare. The entire screens of the bay are rough and lofty mountains; those along the south climbing up in tiers and masses of rock to the summit-lines of Slievemiskish and Caha, and those in the north soaring aloft to the alpine summit-line of the great Dunkerrin range. The south shore, to the extent of 9 miles inward from Cod's Head, belongs to co. Cork; and all the remaining shore belongs to co. Kerry. —A deposit of metalliferous limestone, several miles in length, but nowhere more than one mile in breadth, lies alone one side of the bay. "In this limestone," says Mr. Croker, "are several appearances of mineral veins, both of lead and copper, specimens of which are easily obtained, as partial attempts have been made to work them; and it is reported that about 60 years ago, several cargoes of copper ore were shipped from one spot, where there is a considerable excavation. Amongst the rubbish on the surface, specimens of good yellow ore, containing about 20 per cent. of metal, may be picked up. A vein of lead was also worked not far from this, but the specimens now to be procured are mixed with a considerable portion of blende; yet the appearances along this line warrant farther and careful examination." Several of the islands and islets toward the head of the bay are of such fine limestone formation as to yield beautiful specimens of variegated marble, white and red in their ground colours, and clouded or spotted with yellow, green, and purple; these islands are interesting also to the botanist, and exhibit arbutus, juniper, ladies' mantle, yellow pimpernel, navelwort, sea-holly, sea-rocket, and numerous other interesting land and marine plants.

KENMARE, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Glanerought, co. Kerry, Munster. Length and breadth, each 6 miles; area, 22,400 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,963; in 1841, 5,839. Houses 871. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,891; in 1841, 4,500. Houses 716. The surface includes the lower part of the vale of the Roughty, the northern screen of the estuary part of Kenmare bay, down to the boundary with the barony of Dunkerrin, and the southern screen of the bay itself down to the boundary with the parish of Tuosist. Though its prevailing character is wildly mountainous, and though even the vale of the Roughty is predominantly moorish, various features produce existing beauty, and various others augur progressive amelioration. The banks of the Roughty are so interspersed with coppices, and with occasional stretches of verdant land, that the asperities of the bleak and lofty mountain-ranges are relieved and softened; and numerous small, compact, slated farm-houses, with their surrounding enclosures, so dot and chequer the hill-sides in the portion of the parish which belongs to the Marquis of Lansdowne, as to show that both the cultivation of the land and the condition of the tenantry are improving. Kenmare Lodge, the residence of Lord Lansdowne's agent, adjoins the town; and several other pleasant mansions and villas stand in the vicinity. "About 3 or 4 miles east of Kenmare," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "are the copper and lead mines of the 'Kenmare Mining Association'; the former at Ardtully, the royalty belonging to J. D. Croker, Esq., but the property is at present in dispute; the latter on the estate of the Marquis of Lansdowne at Shonagarry. They have been 3 years at work, but with limited success; a ship-load of 78 tons had been just sent off to Swansea;

we have not been able to ascertain the price it brought. It is a peacock ore; the principal shaft has been sunk 17 or 18 fathoms; and a steam-engine was erecting to facilitate the progress of the work. The mines give employment to about 120 persons, nearly the whole of whom are Irish. The lead mine we were satisfied to inspect only on the surface; the copper mine we descended, accompanied by the captain, Thomas. The levels extend from east to west above 60 fathoms; the vein is generally about 5 feet wide, part in a bed of limestone, and part in a stone of much softer character." Two cromlechs near the town have their incumbent or tabular stones of a red kind, which must have been brought from a distance; while their supporters are formed of the limestone of the district.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £212 6s. 2d.; glebe, £6. The rectories of Kenmare and Tuosist [see TUOSIST], constitute the benefice of Kenmare. Length, 14 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 11,333. Gross income, £449 3s. 9d.; nett, £361 8s. 10d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Ballyseedy, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. The church was built in 1814, by means of a loan of £480 from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £178 3s. 1d. raised by private subscription and by the sale of the materials of the former church. Sittings 170; attendance 80. The Kenmare Roman Catholic chapel, and the two Roman Catholic chapels of Tuosist, are attended, the former by 1,000, and the latter by 1,200 and 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Templenoe. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 265, and the Roman Catholics to 5,015; the Protestants of the union to 290, and the Roman Catholics to 11,688; 4 daily schools in the parish—each of 2 of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and £10 from Lord Lansdowne—had on their books 151 boys and 72 girls; and 7 daily schools in the union had 264 boys and 95 girls.

KENMARE, a market and post town, in the parish of Kenmare, barony of Glanerought, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands on the north side of the estuary of the Roughty or head of Kenmare bay, on the coast-road from Cork to Cahirciveen, and on the new road from Glengariff to Killarney, 16 miles west by south of Ballyvourney, 16 south by west of Killarney, 23 west of Macroom, and 163 south-west of Dublin. It was anciently called Nad-Fion, the Cave or Nest of Fion or Fingal, and is alleged to have derived that name from the circumstance of a cave still pointed out in its vicinity having been one of Fingal's retreats; and its ancient name, in the corrupted form of Neddeen, is still in use among those of the Irish who speak the Erse language. About half a century ago, Kenmare was a poor hamlet, with only 3 or 4 good houses; but now—in spite of its very sequestered and remote situation—it has the appearance and character of a rather respectable small town, and contains the parish-church with its spire, a large Roman Catholic chapel, a market-house, a petty-sessions house, a small and not very well kept bridewell, a comfortable inn and posting establishment, a news-room, and a number of good, new, two-story dwelling-houses; and while both a neat and an improving place, pleasant in appearance and pretty in situation, it enjoys the prospect of henceforth making greater and more rapid strides in prosperity than during even the recent period of its history. The new road from Glengariff to Killarney, at once exhibits so very masterly and stupendous a specimen of modern engineering, offers so desirable a route to the grand natural picture-gallery of Kerry, and commands so superb and sublime views in both its southern and its northern divisions, that it can hardly fail to render Kenmare a thoroughfare of exactly the description which most blandly stimulates the prosperity of a small town. An elegant suspension-bridge, constructed at the joint expense of the Marquis of Lansdowne and the Board of Public Works, and costing about £5,000, carries the road across the Kenmare estuary, at a contraction of it near the town, and bearing the name of the Sound. This work was commenced in 1838, is 410 feet in length, is called Lansdowne-Bridge, and has the honour of being the first structure of its class in Ireland. A daily car plies between Kenmare and Killarney; and by this conveyance, which leaves Killarney on the arrival of the Dublin mail-coach, Kenmare may be reached in 25 hours from Dublin. A commodious harbour-pier was constructed, a few years ago, at the cost of £1,263,—of which £648 was contributed by the Marquis of Lansdowne, and £615 granted by government; and has been officially noticed as of "very great use for agricultural and commercial purposes, but not of so much use to fisheries."—The Kenmare Poor-law union ranks as the 121st; and was declared on Sept. 21, 1840. It lies all in co. Kerry, and comprehends an area of 271,245 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 29,152. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Kenmare, 4,963; Kilgarvan, 3,436; Tuosist, 6,208; Bunawn, 1,157; Templeoe, 3,882; Ballybog, 4,520; and Bowrdoneen, 4,986. There are 5 ex-officio guardians, and 15 elected guardians; and of the latter, 3 are elected by Kenmare division, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The workhouse will contain accommodation for 500 persons. The medical charities within the union are the 6 dispensaries of Kenmare, Ardee, and Dowras, West Cove, Kilgarvan, Sneem, and Templeoe. The Kenmare dispensary serves for a pop. of 6,120; and, in 1839-40, it expended £119 0s. 6d., and made 1,500 dispensations of medicine. A baronet of the name of Browne, the descendant of a Lincolnshire family, and the holder by ancestral purchase of lands in Kerry and Cork which had belonged to Teige MacDermot MacCorinnac and Rory Donaghmore, was created Baron Castlerosse and Viscount Kenmare, in 1689, by James II., but lost his estates in consequence of attachment to that abdicated and infatuated monarch's cause. Though the peerage thus created was never legally acknowledged, yet Valentine, the fifth Viscount according to the unrecognised patent, was made Baron Castlerosse and Viscount Kenmare in the peerage of Ireland in 1798, and advanced to the dignity of Earl of Kenmare in 1800; and Valentine, the second Earl, was created Baron Kenmare in the peerage of Great Britain in 1841. Area of the town, 23 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,072; in 1841, 1,339. Houses 155. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 72; in manufactures and trade, 129; in other pursuits, 35. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 14; on the directing of labour, 111; on their own manual labour, 104; on means not specified, 7.

KENNAIL, a lake, partly in the barony of Clonmahon, co. Cavan, Ulster, and partly in the barony of Demifore, co. Westmeath, Leinster, but chiefly in the barony of Granard, co. Longford, Leinster. It lies 2 miles east by north of the town of Granard; extends in a direction west of south; measures $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length, and about 1 in extreme breadth; has a surface elevation of 212 feet above sea-level; and is traversed along part of its east side by the nascent river Inny. The country around it is boggy and uninteresting. The area of the lake comprises 121 acres, 5 perches in the parish of Drumlumman, co. Cavan, 74 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches in the parish of Foyran, co. Westmeath, and respectively 214 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches, and 235 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches, in the parishes of Abbeylara and Granard, co. Longford.

KENOUGHT, a barony of co. Londonderry, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the Atlantic ocean; on the north-west and west, by the half-barony of Coleraine; on the south-west, by the barony of Loughinsholin; on the south, by co. Tyrone; and on the west, by the barony of Tyrkeeran and Lough Foyle. Its greatest length, from MacGilligan's Point on the north to the summit of the Speerin mountains on the south, is $20\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth, from east to west in a line a little north of Dungiven, is $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its area is 128,692 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches,—of which 200 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches are water. It forms so central and so very large a portion of the county, and contains such an extensive variety of ground, from the bleak alpine heights to the tame sea-shore or the luxuriant alluvial plain, that to describe it would occasion an injurious anticipation of what must be said in the article LONDONDERRY. Yet we may say, in general, that it includes all the west coast of Lough Foyle, the part of the north coast situated to the east of the Faughan vale rivulet, the rich country around Newtownlimavaddy, the whole of the beautiful vale of the Roe, and a considerable number of the glens and defiles among the Derry mountains provincially called "Slacks." See FOYLE and ROE.—The civil parochial division distributes the barony into part of the parish of Banagher, and the whole of the parishes of Aughanloo, Balteagh, Bovevagh, Drumachose, Dungiven, Magilligan, and Tamlaghtfinlagan. The towns are Newtownlimavaddy and Dungiven; and the chief villages are Ballykelly, Drumsurn, Carn, Crindle, and Moys. The annual valuation, under the Poor-law Act, amounts to £42,143 5s.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, were £2,564 2s., and £2,840 2s. 11d. Pop., in 1831, 35,608; in 1841, 33,832. Houses 6,133. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,878; in manufactures and trade, 1,946; in other pursuits, 448. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 6,436; who could read but not write, 4,556; who could neither read nor write, 3,397. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,369; who could read but not write, 7,330; who could neither read nor write, 4,567. Kenought lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Newtownlimavaddy. The total number of tenements valued is 3,797; and of these, 1,057 were valued under £5,—979, under £10,—597, under £15,—314, under £20,—224, under £25,—178, under £30,—208, under £40,—94, under £50,—and 146, at and above £50.

KENRAMER, the highest summit of the island of Rathlin, co. Antrim, Ulster. Its altitude is 449 feet. See RATHLIN.

KENRY, a barony on the north border of co. Limerick, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by the estuary of the Shannon; on the east, by the river Maig, which separates it from Pobblebrien and Coshma; on the south, by Lower Connello; and on the west, by the Deel, which separates it from Connello. Its length westward is 7 miles; its greatest breadth northward is $6\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 30,908 acres,—of which 4,552 acres are tideway. The southern border is hilly; and the rest of the surface is a luxuriant part of the rich, low seaboard of the Shannon.—This barony contains part of the parish of Adare, and the whole of the parishes of Ardara, Chapel-Russell, Iveruss, Kilkorman, and Kildimo. The chief villages are Pallas-Kenry, Stonehall, and Kildimo. Pop., in 1831, 13,076; in 1841, 13,312. Houses 2,170. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,818; in manufactures and trade, 337; in other pursuits, 158. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,316; who could read but not write, 640; who could neither read nor write, 2,682. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,258; who could read but not write, 978; who could neither read nor write, 3,713. Kerry lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Rathkeale. The total number of tenements valued is 1,353; and of these, 418 were valued under £5,—301, under £10,—205, under £15,—105, under £20,—69, under £25,—58, under £30,—73, under £40,—29, under £50,—and 95, at and above £50. Kenry was anciently called Carbre-Aobdha; and was governed by a petty king. In 1165, Auliff More-O'Donoghoe, King of Kenry, was slain at Brury, by Murtagh O'Brien.

KENTSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Lower Duleek, 5½ miles south-west by west of the town of Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1½; area, 2,521 acres. Pop., in 1831, 500; in 1841, 514. Houses 84. The surface consists of four different qualities of land, all in about equal proportions; and is traversed northward by the road from Dublin to Slane.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £200; glebe, £24. The rectories of Kentstown and DANISTOWN, and the vicarage of BALLYMAGARVEY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kentstown. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 1,027. Gross income, £399 12s. 6d.; nett, £305 17s. 6d. Patron of Kentstown, Lord Dunsanny; of Danistown and Ballymagarvey, the Crown. The church was built about 86 years ago, and was subsequently enlarged at the expense of the parish; and the steeple was erected, in 1797, by Sir James Sommerville. Sittings 200; attendance 55. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Ballymagarvey. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 40, and the Roman Catholics to 456; the Protestants of the union to 70, and the Roman Catholics to 988; a free girls' school in the parish was supported by Lady Maria Sommerville, and had on its books 12 girls; and a hedge-school in Ballymagarvey was usually attended by about 20 children.

KERDIFFSTOWN. See CARDIFFSTOWN.

KERLOGUE, a parish in the barony of Forth, 1½ mile south of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length and breadth, each ¼ of a mile; area, 269 acres. Pop., in 1841, 116. Houses 22.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Patrick's of Wexford, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £12 1s. 4½d. See WEXFORD and MICHAEL'S (ST.) OF FEAGH.

KERNANSTOWN, a quondam parish on the north border of the barony and county of Carlow, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 419. It is now merged in the parishes of Carlow and Urglin.

KERRICURRIHY, a barony of co. Cork, Munster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by the Liberties of Cork; on the north and east, by Cork Harbour; on the south-east and south, by the Atlantic ocean; and on the west, by the baronies of Kinsale and Kinnalea. Its greatest length southward is 12½ miles; its greatest breadth westward is 6½; and its area is 24,237 acres,—of which 280 acres are tideway. Its east border is the brilliant west screen of Cork Harbour, all the way from Cork Head to Red Island; its seaboard or southern border is bulwarked with the bluff and toothy coast from Cork Head to Oyster Harbour; its central district is the lower and picturesque part of the fine vale of Carrigaline; and its aggregate surface is greatly diversified, and possesses a large amount of beauty. Kerri-currihy was formerly called Muskerry-Millane, and belonged successively to Richard Cogan, to the Earls of Desmond, and to Maurice the brother of the 15th of these Earls.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ballinaboy, Killanully, Carrigaline, and Kilpatrick, and the whole of the parishes of Bearnahely, Kilmoney, Liscleary, Murmullane, Templebready, and Monkstown. The towns and chief villages are Passage, Ballinassig, Loughbeg, Maulbaun, Monkstown, and Crosshaven. Pop., in 1831, 14,118; in 1841, 14,554. Houses 2,343. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,540; in manufactures and trade, 488; in other pursuits, 544. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,140; who could read but not write, 663; who could neither read nor write, 3,239. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,582; who could read but not write, 930; who could neither read nor write, 4,391. Kerri-currihy lies partly in the Poor-law union of Cork, and partly in that of Kinsale. The total number of tenements valued is 2,309; and of these, 1,264 were valued under £5,—319, under £10,—173, under £15,—101, under £20,—97, under £25,—60, under £30,—80, under £40,—66, under £50,—and 149, at and above £50.

KERRY, a diocese in the ecclesiastical province of Cashel, and civil province of Munster. It comprehends all co. Kerry, and a small part of co. Cork. The Protestant diocese has long borne the name of Ardfert and Aghadoe,—two mutually united and entirely incorporated dioceses, the former of which only was originally called Kerry; but the Roman Catholic diocese, though consisting of the same incorporated dioceses as the Protestant, continues to be known only by the name of Kerry. The Protestant diocese has already been fully noticed under the word ARDFERT; which see. The Roman Catholic diocese is divided into 42 parishes, and has 87 parochial and coadjutor clergymen. Killarney is the bishop's parish; and is served by the bishop and 3 curates. The parishes, with the sites of their respective chapels, are Killarney, with chapels at Killarney and Aghadoe; Lisselton, at Ballyunion and Lisselton; Glenbeagh, at Glenbeagh and Glencare; Ballyvoher, at Ballyvoher and Lack; Keel, at Keel and Ferriter; Castletown, at Castletown, Cahirnore, and Bere Island; Fieres, at Aglish and Ballyhar; Glenfesk, at Killagha and Barrateer; Cahirciveen, at Cahirciveen and Gillimore; Abbey O'Dorney, at Abbey O'Dorney and Kildyn; Mill-Street, at Mill-Street and Cullen; Coolelough, at Coolelough and Bohirbee; Kenmare, at Kenmare and Templenoe; Dingle, at Dingle, Ventry, and Lispoil; Kilgarvan, at Kilgarvan; Dungh, at Dungh; Castle-Gregory, at Castle-Gregory and Clahane; Newtown, at Murber and Knockanure; Killorglin, at Killorglin and Knockane; Dromid, at Dromid; Listowel, at Listowel; Tuosist, at Carks and Lohart; Tarbert, at Tarbert, Ballylongford, and Astea; Causeway, at Causeway, Ballyheigue, and Ballydree; Tralee, at Tralee and Curriheen; Valentia, at Valentia; Currans, at Currans and Curragh; Boherbee, at Dooherlea and Cascian; Lixnaw, at Ballynagerah and Irrimore; Darrynane, at Darrynane and Lohurt; Castlemaine, at Kiltalla and Boulteca; Castle-Island, at Castle-Island, Scartlagen, and Ardna-grah; Cappacloough, at Cappacloough; Prior, at Prior, Port-Magee, and Glentane; Ardfert, at Ardfert, Chapeltown, and Lerig; Ballymacelligot, at Ballymacelligot and O'Brennan; Tries, at Kilcatherine; Knockacappel, at Knockacappel, Gnieueguile, and Knockragree; Milltown, at Milltown and Listry; Glengariff, at Glengariff, Baunane, and Clanlaurence; Kilcummin, at Kilcummin; Brosna, at Brosna and Knockagashel; and Ballybog, at Thahilla and Sneem. A Franciscan friary and a Presentation monastery are at Killarney; and Presentation convents are at Killarney, Tralee, Dingle, Milltown, Mill-Street, and Cahirciveen.

KERRY,

A maritime county of the province of Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by the estuary of the Shannon; on the east, by the counties of Limerick and Cork; on the south, by co. Cork, and the lower part of the Kenmare estuary; and on the west, by the Atlantic ocean. About 16 miles of its boundary-line with Limerick and Cork, is formed by the watercourse of the nascent rivers Feale and Blackwater, here strictly mountain streams; and nearly all the remainder is carried along or very near the summit-line of lofty mountain-ranges. The county, in rather a stringent sense, is naturally fortified seaward by broad waters and bold shores, and landward by enormous mountain ramparts, over some parts of which even modern engineering has with difficulty cut a practicable path for wheeled vehicles. The outline of the county is that of a slender oblong, extending north and south, and sending westward two projections comprising about two-fifths of the whole area. The county lies between $51^{\circ} 41'$ north latitude, and between $9^{\circ} 7'$ and $10^{\circ} 30'$ longitude west of Greenwich. Its greatest length, south-south-westward from the Battery Point opposite Clanderalaw bay in co. Clare, to Lamb Head at the west side of the entrance of the Kenmare estuary, is 55 miles; its greatest breadth, exclusive of islands, and measured west-north-westward from the summit of Greenane $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Mill-Street in co. Cork to Cape Sybil at the extremity of Corkaguiney peninsula, is $41\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its area comprises 414,614 acres of arable land, 726,775 acres of uncultivated ground, 11,169 acres of compact plantations, 807 acres of towns, and 32,761 acres of fresh water,—in all, 1,186,126 acres.

Surface.—The northern district of the county, comprising the whole of the barony of Iraghticonnor, and all the western, north-western, and central parts of the barony of Clanmaurice, is open or champaign country, diversified only by a ridge of low hills along the boundary with co. Limerick, a series of undulations and hillocky groups in the interior, the hill of Doon on the peninsula terminating in Kerry Head, and the isolated hill of Knockanore, 880 feet in height, and situated $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the shore in the vicinity of Ballybunion. A large proportion of this great champaign district consists of the extensive bog-field of the basin of the Cashen: see CASHEN. A plain of about 16 square miles in extent, called the plain of Ardfert, extends from the south-west extremity of the former district, past Barra Head and along the north side of Tralee bay; and this, in a general view, is opulent in its natural character, and not a little respectable in its artificial dress. The Clanruddery mountains, a chain of about $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, and of very considerable average breadth, occupy all the eastern part of the barony of Clanmaurice, and a small portion of the north-eastern district of the barony of Trughenackmy; they are bounded on the north and east by the vale of the river Feale, and on the west by the Smealagh, one of the Feale's tributaries; and they ascend in a south-south-westerly direction, and have for their principal summits the four heights of Knockandiril, Meenskavan, Knocknaglahan, and Deumanaberg.

The Stacks mountains rise in low-browed heights, on the east side of the plain of Ardfert; occupy part of the mutual frontier of the baronies of Clanmaurice and Trughenackmy; and extend 8 miles east-south-eastward to a junction with the south end of the Clanruddery mountains in the heights of Caban and Enaghadave, at the sources of the rivulet Smealagh. But after a brief interruption immediately east of Enaghadave, the mountain-chain is resumed with increased loftiness and power, is continued east-south-eastward to the boundary with co. Cork, at the crown-lands of Pobble-O'Keefe, and sends away a compact mass of offsets to the north, which fill up the whole of the area among the southern head-waters and early affluents of the Feale. The principal summits in the direct east-south-easterly line of the chain are Knockacur, Knockanadirve, and Mount-Eagle-Loyal; and the principal ones amongst its northerly offsets are Knocknagossy, Knockmanaghan, Knockfreaghan, Knockbrack, and Knockgnagh. A broad band of champaign country, partly consisting of several narrow vales and one large dingle, but chiefly comprising a series of valleys connected by undulations and hillocks into a continuous plain, and diversified at the extremities with projecting spurs and salient sweeps of mountain, extends from near the sources of the Main, the Brown Fleak, and the Owenreagh rivers, westward to the head and sides of Castlemaine Harbour, and sends off a broad and beautiful dingle west by northward from Castle-Island to Tralee, and a spacious wing or expansion southward down the Owenreagh and the Deangan, and up the right side of the river and lake Lane to an identification with the valley of the Fleak, immediately south of the town of Killarney. This great district possesses, in the judgment of the mere agriculturist, or for direct subserviency to useful and economical purposes, about two-thirds of all the beauty and goodliness and worth of the county; nor does it rank low, or appear to be coldly coloured, in the eyes of even the painter or the poet. The Slievemish mountains rise suddenly and boldly up $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Castle-Island; they separate the great dingle of Tralee from the lower part of the valley of the Maine; and, excepting such depressions as permit the transit of public roads, they are continued westward within Trughenackmy by the mountains of Cahirconree and Bautregaun,—the latter 2,784 feet of altitude above the level of the sea. The upland and peninsular barony of Corkaguiney commences with the western declivities of Bautregaun; and may be summarily described as a great backbone of mountain, falling off in rapid lateral gradients to the sea, and terminating in soaring domes and alpine masses which frown majestically over the sublime ocean-swell of the Atlantic. See CORKAGUINEY. The principal summits in the direct line of the peninsular water-shed are Ballyvalder, Cappaclough, Binsheehy, Binbroe, Crokerdagh, Connor, and Sugarloaf,—and of these, Binsheehy has an altitude of 2,710 feet; and the principal lateral offsets are Mount-Eagle, deflecting from the Sugarloaf and overhanging the north side of the entrance of Dingle bay,—and Brandon mountain, going away in a great spreading mass to form a peninsula of its own in the north, and lifting its ambitious cap to the clouds, at the altitude of 3,126 feet above the level of the sea. The southern screen of the great champaign region of Castle-Island and Killarney, consists of a chain or rather frontier-series of mountains, beginning with the Paps and the Derrynasaggart mountains in the east, terminating in the Turk mountain in the west, and having for its principal intermediate summits Curreal, Croghar, Croagh, and the northern spurs of Mangerton. This mountain-series is cloven to a considerable distance westward by the glen of the Flesk, and chopped and dismembered into numerous lateral sections by the ravines and gorges of the Flesk's alpine affluents; it has, as to its soil and appearance, been noticed by anticipation in the article FLESK [which see]; and it constitutes, not a range, nor a chain, nor even properly a series, but strictly the abutments, the salient angles, and the frontier masses of a vast congeries of alps which, with slender exceptions, fills all the southern and south-western districts of the county. These districts are one stupendous and wonderful natural gallery of landscape,—a museum of the richest combinations which strength and beauty and romance and sublimity can produce; they contain nineteen-twentieths of the scenery which has already made Kerry so celebrated among tourists, and which, were it situated on the continent of Europe, would challenge comparison with any district except Savoy, northern Piedmont, and southern Switzerland; but they are so exactly partitioned by political geography into the three baronies of Iveragh in the west-north-west, Dunkerrin in the centre, and Glanerought in the east-south-east, that, for at least the purposes of general description, they have already been almost sufficiently noticed in the articles on these baronies. See IVERAGH, GLANERBHY, DUNKERRIN, KNOCKANE, GLANERUGHT, and KENMARE. The principal vales which intersect these districts are the Roughty to the head of the Kenmare estuary, the Inny to the head of Balmaskelligs bay, and the Fartin river to the head of Valentia Harbour; and they are all parallel to one another, and stretch down in a south-westerly direction. The mountains of the region have their culminating-point on the summit of Carran-Tual, the loftiest ground of MacGillicuddy's Reeks, situated $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Turk Lake, and possessing an altitude above sea-level of 3,404 feet. The other mountains might, by a system-maker, be represented as going off in radii, the longest of which passes through Mangerton and Monagour, and rapidly deflects round the end of the Derrynasaggart mountains to pass down the left coast of the Kenmare estuary, while the other two principal radii pass respectively south-westward to Hog's-Head, and westward to the north side of the entrance of Valentia Harbour. Very nearly the whole of the mountains, however, are really flung together in stupendous amorphous masses, so as to form, not any regular or reducible system of heights, but merely a segregation of highlands now compact and now broken,—here squeezed into a shoulder-meeting congeries, and there cloven down into total dismemberment. The principal summits in Glanerought are Mangerton (2,754 feet), Coombnie, Monagour, Cabrigeen, Shandrum, Cullibo, Glenkeagh, Knockgarran, and the Caha mountains; the principal ones in Dunkerrin are MacGillicuddy's Reeks, the Toomies, the Glens-Purple mountains, Knockaninvaan, Dreenagree, Coomenagh (2,535 feet), Skialagh, Pikeen, and Croghan; and the principal ones in Iveragh are Carragheen, Culleen (2,231 feet), Coomlancaran, Drung, Cweebane, Turin, Knockatubrid, Fermoye, Latteeve, Knockadobber, Bennetty, Knockdynahan, Kilkane, Fohill, Corrowmore, and Corrowbeg.

Our description sufficiently indicates that Kerry offers few facilities for the methodizing of a systematic geographer; and yet it is probably too minute to convey a sufficiently clear idea of the contour of the country to a general reader. We shall, therefore, subjoin two extracts well fitted to aid the comprehension. "Kerry, with a small portion of Cork, forms the south-western extremity of Ireland. The coast, which is bordered by the Atlantic, is deeply indented by the estuary of the Kenmare river, the bay of Dingle, and the bay of Tralee, the two former of which penetrate into the mainland about 30 miles, in an easterly direction. The peninsulas intercepted between these arms of the sea are occupied by the western extremities of the mountain-system which, commencing in Waterford, extends, with little interruption, across the entire south of Ireland. The mountains of Bere and Bantry, spreading from the south-western boundary of Cork across the south of Kerry, occupy the district between the river of Kenmare and the bay of Dingle. The peninsula intercepted between the bays of Dingle and Tralee, consists in like manner of a prolongation of the mountain-groups, which occupy the north-western extremity of Cork, and the south-west of Limerick; the heights connecting the extremities of this latter series of elevations, extend across the middle of the county, in a line nearly east and west. Between the above-mentioned mountain-ranges, there is a considerable plain, formed by the subsidence of the high table-land, which occupies the middle portion of the Cork boundary, and spreads with a gradual declivity towards the head of Dingle or Castlemain bay. Beyond the range of mountain which crosses the centre of the county, extends a rich and generally level country, which rises into rough land in only one direction, towards Kerry Head on the Shannon." [Art. "Kerry" in the Penny Cyclopædia.] "The geography of the mountains, &c., which constitute the more remarkable features around Killarney, and which is rendered so difficult of comprehension by the confusion of names given to the different peaks and projections, may be thus simplified:—Standing on Knockriar hill in the west demense" of Lord Kenmare, "or on any of the more elevated grounds over the town, a chain of mountains about 40 miles in length will be seen stretching from Mill-Street past Killarney towards Valentia. Beginning on the east with those more immediately connected with our present object is Crohane, a conical mountain, separated from Mangerton by a narrow glen; secondly, Mangerton, presenting an immense outline, and its northern sides broken by several crater-like hollows, the more remarkable of which are the Devil's Punch-Bowl, and the Glen-of-the-Horse; thirdly, Turk, a conical detached mountain, separated from Mangerton by the valley in which the old road to Kenmare runs, and from the Purple mountain by the flat tract of land through which the river connecting the Upper with the Lower lake flows; fourthly, the Purple range, which lengthways stretches along and forms the southern boundaries of the lower lakes, including the lofty peaks of Glens and Tomies. In its breadth it occupies the space between the Upper and Lower lakes; and the sides which bound the Upper lake on the north are called the long range. This range is separated from MacGillicuddy's Reeks by the gap of Dunloe; fifthly, the Reeks, which blend with the distant mountains running westward to Valentia." [Guide through Ireland, pp. 192, 193; Guide to Killarney, pp. 122—144.]

Coast, Bays, and Islands.—From the boundary with co. Limerick to Beal Point, the coast measures $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles in a straight line, and trends westward; from Beal Point to the mouth of the Cashen river, it measures 6 miles, and trends south by westward; from the mouth of the Cashen river to Kerry Head, it measures $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and trends south-westward; from Kerry Head to the north-east extremity of Ballyheigue bay, it measures 3 miles, and trends east-south-eastward; from the north-east extremity of Ballyheigue bay to the north side of the entrance of Tralee bay, it measures 6 miles, and trends south by westward; from the south side of the entrance of Tralee bay to Castle-Gregory, it measures $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles in a straight line, due westward, but so recedes to the maximum distance of about 13 furlongs as to describe nearly the regular segment of a circle; from Castle-Gregory to the head of Brandon bay, it measures $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and trends west-south-westward, but sends off a low and narrow peninsula $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles northward, to screen the east side of Brandon bay; from the head of Brandon bay to Brandon Head, it measures $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and trends due northward; from Brandon Head to Cape Sybil, it measures 15 miles, and trends south-westward; from Sybil Head to the north side of the entrance of Dingle bay, it measures $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and trends southward. Doulus Head screens at once the south side of the entrance of Dingle bay, and the north side of the north entrance of Valentia Harbour; and it bears 9 miles south-east of the north side of the entrance of Dingle bay. The coast of the mainland thence to the south side of the south entrance of Valentia Harbour, curves along Valentia Sound, and measures in a series of straight lines about $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles; but the really maritime coast-line passes from Doulus Head to Bray Head, at the south-west extremity of Valentia Island, measures 5 miles, and trends south-west by southward. From Bray Head to Bolus Head, the coast measures 6 miles, and trends south-south-eastward; and from Bolus Head to Lamb Head, on the Kerry side of the entrance of the Kenmare estuary, it measures 8 miles, and trends east-south-eastward, but is largely indented by Ballinaskelligs bay.

The shore of the coast from the boundary with Limerick to Beal Point, is generally low, little indented, without much scenic character, and with very little maritime facility. That from Beal Point round to the north-east extremity of Ballyheigue bay, is almost everywhere bluff and cliffy; and within the earlier or northern part of this distance, it exhibits the wonders of the Ballybunion caves. That from the north-east extremity of Ballyheigue bay round to the head of Brandon bay, is uniformly low, and generally beachy, but partially overhung by an immediate background of hill or mountain. And that from the head of Brandon, round to the boundary with Cork—exclusive, however, of considerable sweeps within the great bays and inlets—is prevailingly bold and iron-bound, and partially a series of precipitous and grand cliffs, which maintain a war of storms with the rushing surges of the Atlantic. The principal headlands and capes are Tarbert Rock, opposite the entrance of Clondarlaw bay, in Clare; Ardmore Point, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south of Tarbert Rock; Crockeen Point, 1 mile west-south-west of Ardmore Point; Carrigafoyle Point, 2 miles west by south of Crockeen Point; Beal Point, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south of Carrigafoyle Point; Kilcounty Point, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Beal Point; Kerry Head, at the south side of the entrance of the Shannon; the headlands at the north and south sides of the entrance of the harbour, or inner bay, of Tralee; the pronged or two-headed termination of the low peninsula on the east side of Brandon bay; Brandon Head, at the west side of the entrance of Brandon bay; Ballydavid Head, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Brandon Head; Dunourlin Head, 2 miles south-west of Ballydavid Head; Cape Sybil, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Dunourlin Head; Dunmore Head, 4 miles south by west of Cape Sybil; Ventry Head, Inch Point, Cromane Point, Rossbeg Point, Doogh Point, and Counglass Point, within Dingle Bay; Doulus Head and Rinadrolan Point, on respectively the north and the south sides of the north entrance of Valentia Harbour; Bray Head, at the south-west extremity of Valentia Island; Bolus Head and Hog's Head, respectively at the west and the east sides of the entrance of Ballinaskelligs bay; Lamb's Head, 4 miles south-east by east of Hog's Head; and Rossdohan Point, within the Kenmare estuary.

Tarbert bay, situated to the east of Tarbert Rock, contains excellent and nearly landlocked anchorage in 12 fathoms of water; and is the first place of tolerable shelter for ships, on the Kerry side of the Shannon, within Kerry Head. Ardmore bay, east of Ardmore Point, has 5 fathoms, but is quite open. The mouth of the Ballylongford creek or estuary lies between Crockeen Point and Carrigafoyle island; but, though approached in 6 fathoms near Carrigafoyle Point, is itself a very shallow bar harbour. The estuary of the Cashen river opens $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Beal Point, and is approached in from 4 to 7 fathoms; but is itself a bar harbour, available chiefly for subordination to the georgy of the great Cashen bog district. Ballyheigue bay has from 2 to 6 fathoms within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of the shore; but is everywhere fully exposed, not a little perilous, and totally destitute of anchoring-ground. Fenit creek, off the south-east extremity of Ballyheigue bay, affords extensive shelter in 2 fathoms. Tralee Harbour is completely landlocked, has partly from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 fathoms, and though naturally impracticable at the head, is connected with Tralee by a recently cut ship canal of sufficient depth for vessels of 300 tons. Tralee bay is open to the north, and has from 1 to 5 fathoms within a mile of the shore. Brandon bay is also open to the north, and has from 2 to 16 fathoms. Smerwick Harbour opens between Ballydavid Head, and Dunourlin Head, contains anchoring-ground in shelter from all winds except northerly, and has from 2 to 20 fathoms. Ferriter's Cove is situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Dunourlin Head, and has 27 fathoms. Ventry Harbour opens $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles within the north side of the entrance of Dingle bay, and has well-sheltered anchorage in from 2 to 4 fathoms. Dingle Harbour opens $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by north of the entrance of Ventry Harbour, and has completely landlocked anchorage in 2 fathoms. Castlemaine Haven is the prolongation eastward of the head of Dingle bay, or rather is the estuary of the Maine river connecting with that bay; it is entered by a winding and intricate channel; and it contains two entirely landlocked anchoring-grounds in from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 6 fathoms. Valentia Harbour is the semicircular sound between Valentia Island and the mainland; it possesses the two great advantages of having a double entrance and being completely landlocked, and it has a long sweep of anchoring-ground in from 1 to 5 fathoms; yet it is partially embarrassed both by its own want of sea-room, and by the narrowness of its entrances. St. Finan's bay is situated immediately north of Bolus Head, and has from 16 to 27 fathoms, but is completely exposed to the south-west and the south. Ballinaskelligs bay opens between Bolus Head and Hog's Head, is exposed to the south, has from 1 to 23 fathoms, and, though containing one anchoring-ground, is in general very unsafe. Kenmare estuary varies in depth from 34 to 2 fathoms, and is in some parts edged with a sandy beach; and, though itself too much exposed to the south-west to be regarded as a harbour, it contains a series of coves, creeks, and small sounds which present facilities for both anchoring and debarkation. The best anchoring-grounds within this estuary are in Cuolac bay and Kilmichaelogue Harbour, on the south-east side, in Sneem Harbour and Rossmore Sound, on the north-west side, and off Dunkerrin island near the head.—The principal fishery harbours or piers are Bara, in an inlet of Tralee bay; Brandon, on the west side of Brandon bay; Dingle, in Dingle Harbour; Cahirciveen, in an inlet of Valentia Harbour; Valentia, on the east side of Valentia island; Ballinaskelligs, on the west side of Ballinaskelligs bay; and Kenmare, contiguous to the town of Kenmare, at the head of the Kenmare estuary.

The principal islands—to the exclusion of various groups and sprinklings of islets and rocks—are Carrigafoyle, at the west side of the mouth of the Ballylongford estuary; Fenit, between Ballyheigue bay and Tralee bay; the Blasquet islands, off the termination of the peninsula of Corkaguiney; Valentia island, screening Valentia Harbour; Lamb island, in the north entrance of Valentia Harbour; Puffin island, screening part of the north-west side of St. Finan's bay; the Skellig rocks, west by south of Bolus Head; Hog and Scara islands, south of the entrance of Ballinaskelligs bay; Two-Head, Rossmore, and Dunkerrin islands in the Kenmare estuary.—The only lighthouses are one on Tarbert rock, two on the Skelligs rocks, and one at Valentia—the last in the course of erection in 1841. The navigation within the Shannon district of the county, however, enjoys all the advantages of the Loop Head and Kilkudrane lighthouses on the coast of Clare.

Streams and Lakes.—The Ballylongford rivulet rises on the south-east side of Knockanore, and flows eastward and northward, in Iraghticonnor, to the head of the Ballylongford estuary. The Cashen river is formed by the Geale, the Feale, and the Brick, and flows north-north-westward, between Iraghticonnor and Clanmaurice, to the sea. The Geale comes in from co. Limerick, and flows westward through Iraghticonnor. The Feale comes in from co. Cork, makes a long run north-north-westward on the boundary of Kerry, with Cork and Limerick, and then flows west-north-westward and westward between Iraghticonnor and Clanmaurice, and past the town of Listowel. The Smealcagh, the chief affluent of the Feale within Kerry, rises on the north side of Enaghadave, and runs northward, principally within Clanmaurice. The Brick rises on the north side of the Stacks mountains, and flows northward through Clanmaurice. The Tralee rivulet rises on the west side of Toylough, and makes a brief run southward and westward, in Trughenackmy, to the head of Tralee Harbour. The streams of Corkaguiney barony and peninsula are all mere rills. The Maine river rises in two head-streams on the north and south sides of Knockanadirive, and flows west-south-westward past Castle-Island and Castlemaine, and chiefly within Trughenackmy, but partly on the boundary with Magonihy, to the head of Castlemaine Harbour. The Brown Flesk rises on the south-west side of Mount-Eagle-Loyal, and flows south-westward and westward to the Maine, at a point about mid-distance between Castle-Island and Castlemaine. The Flesk comes in a mile or two from co. Cork, east of the Derrynasaggart mountains, and flows westward and west-north-westward, through the barony of Magonihy, to the Lower Lake of Killarney, opposite Ross Island. The Owenreagh rises on the north-east corner of Magonihy, and flows southward to the Flesk, at the south-west base of Curreal mountain. The Deanagh rises on the northern border of Magonihy, and runs south-westward, past the north side of the town of Killarney, to the Lower Lake of Killarney. The Lane or Laune issues from the foot of the Lower Lake of Killarney, and flows north-westward along the boundary between Magonihy and Dunkerrin to the upper part of Castlemaine Harbour. The chief affluents of the Lane are the Lishadan on the right bank, and the Giddagh and the Annagarry on the left bank. The Tingariff or Carra rises at the south-west side of Coomenagh mountain, and flows north-north-westward, through the lakes of Carra, to the lower part of Castlemaine Harbour. The Fartin or Ferta, rises between the Drung and the Coomlancaran mountains, and flows west-south-westward, through the north-west district of Iveragh, to the north-east corner of Valentia Harbour. The Inny rises a little south-west of Culleen mountains, and flows south-westward, through the central district of Iveragh, to the head of Ballinaskelligs bay. The Cununara rises on the north side of Gweebane mountain, and runs south-westward, down the south-eastern district of Iveragh, and through the lakes of Derryana and Currane, to the east side of Ballinaskelligs bay. The Sneem, the Blackwater, and the Finchy, rise among the Dunkerrin mountains, and run, at the distance of 4 miles each from the next, southward to the north-west side of the Kenmare estuary. The Roughty rises on the eastern frontier of the county within a mile of Gougane-Barra in Cork, describes a circuit of about 6 miles round Cabrigeen mountain, and then runs south-westward to the head of the Kenmare estuary,—bisecting the barony of Glanerought by its course, and imposing upon that barony the name of its own vale or “glan.” The Sheen rises between the mountains of Shandrum and Pinkeen, and runs northward down the south-east wing of Glanerought to the Kenmare estuary, opposite the village of Kenmare.

The lakes, par excellence, of Kerry and even of Ireland, are the lakes of Killarney, Upper, Middle, and Lower, shared between the baronies of Magonihy and Dunkerrin. The two lakes of Carra, on the west border of Dunkerrin, deserve more celebrity than they possess. The other principal lakes—as to either magnitude, scenery, or some remarkable property—are Currane, on the south coast of Iveragh; Derryana and Lannan, within the basin of the Cununara; Ganvan, on the coast of the district called the West Fractions; Gutane, on the south border of Magonihy; the Devil's Punch-Bowl near the summit of Mangerton; and the numerous ponds and loughlets of the Caba mountains.—The mineral springs of the county, longest known to fame, are Killarney spa, near the town of Killarney; Iveragh spa, between Portmagee and Cahirciveen, on the strand of Valentia Harbour; Fellswell, a mile east of Doon-Castle on the west coast of Iraghticonnor; Dingle spa, on the lands of Ballybeg, about a mile north-east of the town of Dingle; Castlemaine spa, on the lands of Farnass, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of the town of Castlemaine; Tralee spa, near a delightful strand, two miles from the town of Tralee; and Magherybeg-well, a little below high-water mark at Magherybeg in Corkaguiney.

Climate.—The climate is both very variable in itself, and very different in different districts. The low boggy country of the north, the sudden declivities and lofty acuminations of seaboard upon the Atlantic in the west and south-west, the warm, well-sheltered champaign country around Killarney, and from thence to Castle-Island in the centre, and the dense agglomerations of heathy and alpine moorland in the east, are great physical divisions of the county, each of which may be said to possess a climate quite distinct in character from that of the others. The first and the last sufficiently indicate the quality of their climate, by the peculiarity of their own surface and position; the second is distinguished by so drenching and almost deluging a moisture, as might occasion the district to be regarded as a natural umbrella between the rest of the county and the rains from the Atlantic; and the third is celebrated for such Italian warmth, fecundity, and lusciousness, as to nurture spontaneously, and in considerable plenty, several beautiful plants which are elsewhere indigenous in Europe only on the continent, and after an interval of many degrees of latitude to the south.

Minerals.]—Old conglomerate, with red, purple, green, and grey clay slate, occupies all the western half of Corkaguiney, and, with the exception of a stripe in the vale of the Roughty, all the district of the county south of a line drawn westward from Mill-Street in co. Cork, to the head of the Lower Lake of Killarney, down the left side of that lake, past the north base of MacGillicuddy's Reeks, and down the basin of the Lane within 2 or 3 miles of the bed of that river. The chief character of this formation is a red or grey conglomerate, or sandstone, supporting flanks of siliceous flags; and towards the west end of the Corkaguiney section, it possesses the rare property of being fossiliferous. A narrow belt of transition rocks about 10 miles in length, and consisting chiefly of greywacke and greywacke slate, lies along the south-east edge of the Corkaguiney portion of the preceding formation. Old red sandstone, and sandstone conglomerate, occupy a district of about 8 square miles at Kerry Head, a district of about 18 square miles on the south side of Dingle bay and Castlemaine Harbour, and a district comprising most of the eastern half of Corkaguiney, and a small part of Trughenackmy eastward, to within 4 miles of Castle-Island. Yellow sandstone and conglomerate, occupy a district of about 22 square miles on the coast of Clanmaurice, from the Kerry Head portion of the old red sandstone formation to very near the bed and mouth of the Cashen river. Carboniferous limestone occupies the bottom of the lower part of the vale of the Roughty, the vale of the Lane, the east side of the Lower Lake of Killarney, the lower part of the vale of the Maine, the valley or dingle from Castle-Island to Tralee Harbour, a belt on the north shore of Corkaguiney, the greater part of the plain of Ardfer, and a broad curving band of country from Ballyheigue bay, round by Listowel to the mouth of the Cashen river. The limestone of the Roughty is cream-coloured, slaty, hard, and has a vitreous fracture; that of the Maine is very distinctly stratified, yet generally compact, and is much impressed with marine fossils; that in the vicinity of Tralee is black, indurated, finely granular, and is dressed as marble; that toward Castle-Island is lighter in colour, and less indurated, and is quarried and burned for manure; and that of the broad curving belt from Ballyheigue bay to the mouth of the Cashen, is of a light smoky colour, and occasionally forms nodules, hillocks, and low crags, whence it is easily quarried. The coal formation occupies all the sea-board of the Shannon district down to near the mouth of the Cashen river, and all the eastern and central districts of the county southward to the line of the old conglomerate formation. The upper strata are chiefly lias and indurated clay, with ochreous partings, covering thin beds of culm or anthracite; and those on the eastern frontier of the county occasionally alternate with good coal blende, similar to that of Kilkenny.

The vicinity of Killarney was celebrated for its mines so early as the 9th century, and continued till the date of smelting iron-ore with coals, to be a scene of the manufacture of iron; but it has ceased, in every economical sense, to be a mineral field. A portion of Glencare was for some time distinguished by iron-works, erected by Sir William Petty; but it lost its mining character on the failure of the local supply of timber, about the year 1750. Copper-mines were occasionally worked at Muckerruss and Ross Island, in the Lower Lake of Killarney, subsequently to the middle of last century; but they have, for some time, been discontinued. Copper-works existed at one period near Castle-Island, but have been relinquished. Lead ore occurs in considerable quantity near the Lower Lake of Killarney; and copper ore is found at Ardfer and in Glanerought. Coal was formerly mined to a small extent near the Stacks mountains; but it ceased to be an object of attention, on account partly of its own poor quality, and partly of the great abundance of excellent turf. The principal mines at present in operation, are a small copper-mine at Kilerohane, near Cahirciveen, and an extensive and valuable quarry of flags and roofing-slates on the island of Valentia. A species of pipe-clay occurs on the lands of Glandaholme and Kilmacida, near Ballyheigue. A light ash-coloured clay, fit for the uses of the potter, occurs on the lands of Ballygamboon, a mile south-east of Castlemaine. A variety of fuller's earth is found on the lands of Callinaferay, in the valley of the Lane. A white friable marl, intermixed with ochreous clay, abounds on the lands of Dromin, in the parish of Killorglin. Shell marl lies at the bottom of many deep bogs, especially such as are near limestone ground. An ash-coloured marl occurs in the cliff toward the bottom of Ballinaskelligs bay. Ochre is found on the south side of Valentia Harbour, near the bottom of Ballinaskelligs bay, in several places of Glanerought, in the vicinity of Tralee and Castlemaine, and in other parts of the county. A yellowish rotten-stone, fit for polishing brass and other metals, is found plenteously on the estate of Bushfield. A kind of stone capable of being manufactured into hones for razors, and long ago used by the country-people for this purpose, is found on Mangerton, near the Devil's Punch-Bowl. The mineral formerly called Lapis Hibernicus, or Irish Slate, distinguished for its powerfully astringent or copperas taste, is found in the vicinity of Castle-Island. "The gems called Kerry stones," says Dr. Smith, "are transparent regular crystals; many of them are so hard as to cut glass, but will not, like the diamond, continue to do so long; they undergo little change in an intense heat, except that some of them appear here and there somewhat flawed by this operation, and look rather more transparent; sulphur added to them in a crucible turns them reddish. They are harder, larger, and have a better lustre than those from Bristol. The chief places of their growth in this county are among the cliffs and rocks of the sea-coast, particularly in those of Ballyheigue, in the barony of Clanmaurice, and also in the barony of Corkaguiney, near Dingle." Very fine amethysts, most of them of various shades of purple, some of a pale rose-colour, and some approaching to violet, have been found in the cliffs at Kerry Head; specimens of them were long ago in the possession of several noble families; and ear-rings, necklaces, and other trinkets, composed of them, were presented to one of the Hanoverian queens of Great Britain and Ireland. Other coloured crystals, tinged like emeralds, topazes, and sapphires, have been found in the county, particularly near the Lower Lake of Killarney; but they possess little value in the estimation of the jeweller, in consequence of their not being sufficiently indurated.

Soils.]—The soil of the arable portions of the south-western district is very generally an adhesive loam, formed out of the detritus of clay-slate, and suited to the cultivation of cereal crops. The soil of the best parts of the central champaign district is a rich loam, very fructiferous in corn, and productive of such species and quality of meadow grasses as yield prime butter. The soil of the northern arable districts, except of the tracts of reclaimed bog, is, for the most part, a stiff and retentive clay, difficult of tilth, and inclined to run to rushes. The soil around Tralee and Castlemaine, and in the valley between the former and Castle-Island, is a mixture of dark clay, vegetable mould, and a small portion of sand, and may be designated black argillaceous earth. Clays reddened by the admixture of oxides of iron, though very common in Cork, are rare in Kerry. The soil of a large proportion of the lands subjected to tillage during the last 25 years, is either a peaty gravel or a slightly calcareous bog,—the former reclaimed from natural moorlands, and the latter produced by top-dressing tillage-bogs with lime, marl, and other calcareous manures. “The low grounds of Trughenackmy,” says a recent official report, “are held by dairy farmers, who keep from two or three to a score of cows, and till a considerable portion of their farms. The soil is there a rich loam, lying on a rocky limestone or gravel, and perhaps more suitable for pasture than corn, as the wheat it bears is rarely of good quality: it will produce large crops of that grain, and also of oats and barley. After being tilled for some years, it quickly forms a rich turf, even under the bad system of having no clover or grass seeds sown.”

Agriculture.—In consequence of Trughenackmy comprising a large district of high pasture-ground where tillage has but lately been introduced, and of its containing a great expanse of rich flat land, which stretches to the sea-coast, and is interspersed with bogs, it may be selected as a very fair average specimen of the county as to both agricultural character and georgical practice. Grazier-farmers occupy nearly all the upland districts, and they keep milk cows in the vales and hollows, among the hills, and send their young cattle to the acclivities and summit-grounds, and have a small proportion of sheep mixed in the pastures with the cattle. The general system of dairy management, both among these classes and among the farmers of the plains, is considered to be very good. Some of the pastures in the champaign country have not been broken up within the memory of man; yet most of them are ploughed at the maximum interval, from former tillage, of 10 or 12 years. About the same quantity of stock is kept per acre as on the good dairy-land in the centre of England. So shamefully little attention is paid to the destroying of weeds, that the yellow ragweed which is so easily eradicated, and might be an important contribution to the dung-yard, is suffered to grow in quantities which give an almost general yellow colour in autumn to the fields.

The course of cropping practised on the low tillage-grounds is barbarous and scourging. When a grass field is broken up, a crop of potatoes is raised with a slight manuring of dung and lime, a second crop is raised without any manure, and a crop of wheat, a crop of oats, and probably a second crop of oats follow, all without stimulant or other aid than the mere stirring of the soil. Except by the large farmers, common hay seeds are hardly ever sown with the last corn crop; and the instances are not few of the ground being left in the most slovenly and reckless style to acquire a coat of turf as it best can, by the unaided operation of natural agencies. Even self-sown crops of oats were, not many years ago, frequently allowed to stand; but these disgraceful exhibitions of savage husbandry have happily ceased to be seen. The potatoe crop is in general tilled with the spade, and the ground divided into beds of from 6 to 9 feet in breadth. The manure is spread on the top of the sod; the seed is placed over the manure; the sod and the earth, from the trenches between the beds, are thrown over the seed; and, when the shoots appear above the surface, more soil out of the trenches is scattered among the stems; and for the second potatoe crop, the ground is dug just sufficiently deep to get through the sod that had been left unbroken on the former year, and the seed is dibbled in with a stick or spade. Many of the farmers indeed now plough their potatoe-fields; yet they still plant the potatoes in beds, except where they are to be grown on the stubble-ground that can be drawn into rows. The frequent digging for the potatoe-crops pulverizes the soil, and reduces it to a very fit state for the reception of the wheat-seed which is sown after them. When barley follows wheat, the land is cross-ploughed, and apparently well tilled. All the corn crops are rolled in spring; and they are not cut in autumn till they have become so assuredly ripe that the straw is beginning to break down with their weight. The state of tillage in the upland districts is still worse than in the plains. Nearly all the arable land has been recently reclaimed; and every year a considerable quantity of new ground is enclosed and broken up. Potatoes are the uniform crop for at least two seasons, and frequently for three; and then oats follow as long as the land will bear them. The first crop of potatoes is manured and limed on the sod, and trenched; the entire surface of the ground is frequently burned; and no manure is put to the after-crops of potatoes, or to any of the crops of oats. Grass seeds or clover are very rarely sown; yet the natural grasses which succeed the oats are usually well limed, and make a very sweet pasture.

“The wages for labour,” says an official report of 1836, “are 8d. a-day, without food, in most seasons of the year; in the harvest they rise a little, and the workmen are often fed in addition. There is at all other times a superabundance of men to be got at the common wages. Ploughmen are scarce, and receive 7s. a-week; and mowers often have 1s. 6d. a-day. It is intelligible why the former obtain high wages in a country where the plough has only recently come into common use; but there is a difficulty of explaining why men who can mow should be scarce at a season when many common labourers are unemployed. The agricultural implements of the better class of farmers are of a very good construction, and are slowly getting into use among the smaller tenants. A few iron Scotch ploughs are now to be found among the latter; but they have no other harrow than a clumsy single one, which does not work badly, though it is very laborious to use. They borrow rollers from their richer neighbours. The carts have small narrow wheels, and their sides are very low, but workmen manage to put on them sufficient loading of every kind for their weak horses. These narrow wheels must be injurious and troublesome in these deep soils, when the season is wet. There are a few winnowing machines among the larger farmers, but all others winnow their corn in the open air.”

Animals.—The quadrupeds which walked the wilds of Kerry previous to the exterminating processes of hunting and husbandry, were in all respects the same as those which inhabited the other mountainous districts of Ireland. A small bird, called the Irish ortelan by the English, and the gourder by the Irish, is believed to be peculiar to the Blasquet Islands. “It is somewhat larger than a sparrow; the feathers of the back are dark, and those of the belly are white; the bill is straight, short, and thick; and it is web-footed. When they are first taken, the country people affirm that they cast up about a tea-spoonful of a very fetid oil out of their bills: they are almost one lump of fat when roasted, of a most delicious taste, and are reckoned to exceed an ortolan." Wild swans, though rarely seen in Cork or Waterford, occasionally visit Kerry, particularly Corkaguiney, during hard frost. Pheasants are much more numerous in Kerry than in Cork or Waterford; and they are specially abundant in some woodlands in the vicinity of Castlemaine. Woodcocks are exceedingly numerous in the woodlands near the Shannon. Grouse, eagles, hawks, and other alpine birds, abound in the great and lofty mountain-district of the south, and in the chief uplands of the coast. Sea-fowl of all kinds abound on the coasts and islands, and are killed by the peasantry partly for food, and partly for their feathers. The gannet, though abundant along all the coasts, is believed to breed nowhere in Munster, except on the Skelligs islands.

The dairy cattle of the county are of a useful breed, and are continually improving, in consequence of increasing attention being paid to the bulls. Some English cattle of the Holderness and Devon stocks, have frequently been introduced; but the native breed have been universally preferred by the farmers, and yield a good quantity of milk, and weigh from 4 to 5 cwt. when fattened. The cattle on the mountains are less in size, and inferior in all other points; yet they are much hardier, and probably equal the dairy-cattle kept in the most hilly parts of Great Britain, though inferior in shape as feeders to the Scotch and Welsh black cattle. The common horses are light-boned, active animals, but not equal in strength to those of the neighbouring counties. The few sheep that are kept are in general strong and coarse, yet a good cross with Leicester rams is not uncommon. The pigs are exceedingly various in kind, from pretty good to very bad; but the old long-legged sort is apparently giving way to newer breeds which have sprung from crossing it with foreign pigs.

In 1841, the live-stock on holdings not exceeding one acre, consisted of 1,017 horses and mules, 1,251 asses, 3,680 cattle, 10,411 sheep, 11,754 pigs, and 79,010 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 4,492 horses and mules, 861 asses, 12,393 cattle, 20,311 sheep, 8,648 pigs, and 54,501 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 5,456 horses and mules, 604 asses, 35,801 cattle, 30,272 sheep, 14,054 pigs, and 88,006 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 3,832 horses and mules, 268 asses, 27,252 cattle, 17,547 sheep, 9,462 pigs, and 53,397 poultry; and on farms exceeding 30 acres, 3,175 horses and mules, 242 asses, 23,908 cattle, 13,736 sheep, 7,583 pigs, and 34,974 poultry. The totals of these classes, together with the estimated value of each, were 17,972 horses and mules, £143,776; 3,246 asses, £3,246; 103,034 cattle, £669,721; 98,277 sheep, £108,105; 51,501 pigs, £64,376; and 310,493 poultry, £7,762. Grand total of value, £996,986. But these statistics are exclusive of the civic districts of the county, which contained 360 horses and mules, worth £2,880; 58 asses, £58; 332 cattle, £2,158; 426 sheep, £469; 1,413 pigs, £1,766; and 4,074 poultry, £102;—total, £7,433.

Plants and Woods.—The arbutus, or strawberry-tree, so beautiful an exotic ornament to the shrubberies of England and Scotland, and nowhere else but in Kerry known to be indigenous in higher latitudes than those of the southern countries of Europe, adorns the woods of Killarney and of Bantry, with its rich evergreen foliage, and its copious red berries, and attains such perfection that a trunk has been measured of 9½ feet in circumference. The pinguicula grandiflora, or large-flowered butterwort, also elsewhere indigenous no farther north than the southern countries of Europe, is a native of Kerry. Other indigenous plants, both remarkable for beauty, and singularly indicative of the genial character of the climate and the soil, are Menziesia polifolia, or the Irish Menziesia, saxifraga umbrosa or London pride, saxifraga geum or kidney-shaped saxifrage, and arenaria ciliata or fringed sandwort. Dr. Smith presents an alphabetical list, which, in spite of its nomenclature being antiquated, we shall copy, of "such plants as are rare, and either peculiar to Kerry, or at least not commonly found in other parts of Ireland, and others which, though more common, may, for their usefulness, deserve to be mentioned." Abies mas; abrotanum campestre; adiantum album tenuifolium; adiantum nigrum; adiantum album crispum alpinum; agrifolium baccis luteis; apium petræum; arbutus; astragalus incanus; atriplex angustifolia; atriplex maritima; beta sylvestris; bistorta major; blitum minus album; burna pastoris major; cardamine pumila; caryophyllata alpina; caryophyllata montana purpurea; chamæmelum odoratissimum; chamæfilix marina anglica; ceterach; conyza foliis laciniatis; crithmum chrysanthemum; dens leonis angustifolius; ebulus; echium marinum; equisetum majus; equisetum nudum; equisetum palustre minus; erica hibernica; eryngium marinum; filix montana; filix saxatilis; filix ramosa; fœniculum vulgare; gallium luteum; geranium columbinum; geranium moschatum; geranium pusillum supinum; geranium robertianum; gnaphalium maritimum; græmen caninum maritimum; græmen montanum milia-cium minus; græmen parvum precox; herba Paris; helenium vulgare; herniaria; hypericum maximum; jacobæa pannonica; juniperus vulgaris; kali spinosum cochleatum; ledum palustre; lepidium latifolium; leucojum marinum majus; lichenastrum capitulis; lichenoides rigidum; lichenoides saxatile; lycopsis; lilium convallium; limonium; lupulus sylvestris; lychnis alpina minima; lycopodium; marrubium aquaticum; mercurialis annua; muscus capillaris; muscus clavatus; nummularia; oneanthe cicutæ facie; ophioglossum; osmunda regalis; paronychia rutaceo folio; pentaphyllum palustre; peucedanum; phyllitis multifida; pisum marinum; potamogeton millefolium; pulegium vulgare; rhamnus catharticus; rosa sylvestris inodora; rosa solis; rubus idæus spinosus; rubia sylvestris aspera; ruscus; sabina; salix pumila folio rotundo; saxifraga alpina; scrophularia scorodoniæ folio; sedum montanum; selago foliis; serpyllum vulgare; sideritis arvensis; smyrnium vulgare; sorbus; taxus; tithymalus hibernicus; tragopogon purpureum; trichomanes; valeriana græca; virga aurea montana; xanthium.

In 1841, the plantations within the county consisted of 1,621 acres of oak, 85 of ash, 18 of elm, 9 of beech, 245 of fir, 8,254 of mixed trees, and 933 of orchards; and of these there were planted previous to 1791, 807 acres of oak, 10 of ash, 6 of elm, 4 of beech, 21 of fir, 1,806 of mixed trees, and 188 of orchards. The total of plantations was 11,169 acres; but the total number of detached trees, additional to these plantations, was 298,696, equivalent to 1,867 acres; and thus the grand total of planted woods was 13,036 acres.

Fisheries.—A turbot-bank in the mouth of the Shannon lies about 1½ mile off Lick-Castle, is about 3½ miles long, extends south-westward, has a depth of from 5 to 9 fathoms at low-water, and produces turbot, haddock, red gurnet, pollock, and plaice. Tralee and Brandon bays are fished over, sometimes quite close to the shore, and sometimes at a greater distance; and they produce turbot, sole, dorset, cod, red gurnet, whiting, rag, conger, mullet, mackerel, skad, bream, herrings, and pilchards.

An extensive fishing-bank lies about 15 leagues north-west of the Blasquets; but, in consequence of the unsuitableness of their boats, it is not frequented by the fishermen of Kerry. Fishing-grounds in the Blasquet Sound, off Dunmore Head, and off the south-east and south-west parts of the Great Blasquet island about a mile from the shore, produce turbot, soles, plaice, cod, pollock, and bream. Dingle bay, at the distance of from 1 to 9 miles from the shore, and in depths of from 18 to 40 fathoms, produces cod, ling, conger, whiting, haddock, flat-fish, glassen, and hake. A bank, extending from Brea Head toward the Blasquets, bearing 14 miles north-west, 12 north, and 17 north-east, and having a depth of from 10 to 40 fathoms of water, is remarkable for cod, ling, haddock, glassen, conger, whiting, red gurnet, and flat fish. A fishing-ground, between Brea Head to Puffin Island, and extending 3 miles north and south, and 3 east and west, in about 30 fathoms of water, is very good for codling, haddock, and conger. A fishing-ground south and south-east of Puffin Island, about 6 miles by 4 in extent, and lying under from 20 to 30 fathoms of water, is remarkable for cod, ling, conger, whiting, flat-fish, and hake. A fishing-ground north and north-west of the Skelligs, and from 2 to 6 miles off shore, produces cod and haddock; and a good fishing-ground for hake, lies immediately round the Skellig rock. Ballinaskelligs bay is fished all over in from 10 to 35 fathoms. St. Finnan's bay is also fished all over, in from 12 to 40 fathoms; and is considered one of the best fishing-grounds on the coast. Ten or twelve small banks lie between Ballinaskelligs bay and the Kenmare estuary, varying in soundings from 2 to 37 fathoms, and the farthest lying upwards of a league south-west of the mainland. The whole of the Kenmare estuary, from a little below the town to the sea, is fishing-ground; and it produces turbot, soles, plaice, hake, cod, ling, haddock, whiting, gurnet, and a great variety of other fish. In 1830, the boats and men employed in the Kerry fisheries, were 1 decked vessel of 16 tons, with 3 men; 33 half-decked vessels, of aggregately 274 tons, with 165 men; 330 open sail-boats, with 2,253 men; and 214 row-boats, with 1,141 men,—in all, 3,562 men. In 1836, the boats and men amounted to 1 decked vessel of 22 tons, with 7 men; 44 half-decked vessels, of aggregately 498 tons, with 234 men; 421 open sail-boats, with 2,612 men; and 610 row-boats, with 3,458 men,—in all, 6,311 men. The coast-guard stations, together with the number of fishermen within their respective districts, in 1836, were—Beal, 57; Cashen, 69; Ballyheigue, none; Barrow, 430; Castle-Gregory, 218; Brandon, 244; Ballydavid, 156; Ferriter's Cove, 494; Ventry, 231; Dingle, 447; Minard, 210; Kells, 612; Valentia, 264; Ballinaskelligs, 288; West Cove, 1,195; and Colerries, 1,396.

Manufactures and Trade.—A simple exhibition of the results of the census of 1841, in the departments of manufactures, artificership, and trade, is incomparably the best view we can give of the classification and amount of productive industry. The number of millers was 31; brewers, 7; distillers, 2; bakers, 116; confectioners, 16; salt-manufacturers, 8; tobacco-twisters, 2; fishmongers, 20; egg-dealers, 57; fruiterers, 3; cattle-dealers, 12; horse-dealers, 3; pig-jobbers, 13; corn-dealers, 5; flour-merchants, 1; huxters, and provision-dealers, 77; butchers, 129; victuallers, 142; grocers, 18; tobacconists, 7; flax-dressers, 21; carders, 277; flax-spinners, 2,616; cotton-spinner, 1; wool-spinners, 5,185; unspecified classes of spinners, 7,416; winders and warpers, 9; wool-dressers, 6; cottonweavers, 12; linen-weavers, 90; woollen-weavers, 166; unspecified classes of weavers, 1,102; lace-manufacturers, 8; bleachers, 2; dyers, 23; clothiers, 8; cloth-finishers, 9; corduroy-cutter, 1; skinner, 1; curriers, 13; tanners, 5; brogue-makers, 225; boot and shoe makers, 1,126; tailors, 1,325; sempstresses, 641; dress-makers, 954; milliners, 58; stay-makers, 9; comb-makers, 2; knitters, 603; hatters, 65; bonnet-makers, 72; gloves, 6; button-maker, 1; hair-dressers, 3; leather-dealers, 8; haberdasher, 1; linen-drapers, 20; woollen-drapers, 20; venders of soft goods, 22; rag and bone dealers, 3; architects, 3; builders, 10; brick-makers, 5; stone-cutters, 61; lime-burner, 1; brick-layers, 2; stone-masons, 440; slaters, 89; thatchers, 32; plasterers, 19; paviors, 5; quarrymen, 63; sawyers, 95; carpenters, 869; cart-makers, 87; cabinet-makers, 48; French-polishers, 5; coopers, 230; turners, 17; millwrights, 3; wheelwrights, 40; shipwrights, 54; pump-borers, 3; lathsplitter, 1; reed-makers, 6; basket-makers, 11; brush-makers, 1; miners, 24; iron-founders, 2; blacksmiths, 744; whitesmiths, 10; nailers, 155; cutlers, 5; gunsmiths, 4; brazier and coppersmith, 1; lamp-makers, 2; tinplate-workers, 39; tinkers, 10; machine-makers, 3; watch-makers, 8; coach and car-makers, 13; saddlers, 30; harness-makers, 29; whip-makers, 6; rope-makers, 4; quill-manufacturer, 1; letter-press printers, 19; book-binders, 2; mat-maker, 1; chandlers and soap-boilers, 7; painters and glaziers, 78; fishing-tackle-makers, 2; net-makers, 25; sail-maker, 1; sieve-makers, 4; upholsterers, 3; feather-dealers, 13; delph-dealer, 1; stationers, 3; timber-merchants, 2; coal-merchant, 1; ironmongers, 2; merchants of unspecified classes, 720; shopkeepers of unspecified classes, 380; shop-assistants, 86; tradesmen of unspecified classes, 28; and ship-agent, 1. The woollen-manufacture, which bulks so much more largely than any other department of factorial industry, is diffused over the greater part of the county, and consists principally in the production of coarse fabrics for domestic use. The linen manufacture was formerly of considerable note in the town and vicinity of Dingle, and is still carried on there with some activity. The export trade of the county is conducted to so considerable an extent by means of inland carriage to the neighbouring counties of Limerick and Cork, that its amount cannot be very proximately estimated; and even the returns of 1835, which are the most minute and complete recent ones in our possession, take no notice of any other part of Kerry than Tralee,—and while exhibiting the exports there as altogether amounting in estimated value to £42,315, they show the one item of corn to have amounted to 20 parts in 21 of the whole, or to the value of £40,072. Though butter is jumbled up, in these returns, with bacon and hams, in an aggregate item of £852; it is conjectured, or rather estimated, to be sold in the markets of Tralee and Killarney, to the annual total quantity of about 100,000 firkins.

Fairs.—The principal fairs of Kerry are held at Ardfert on March 27, Whitmonday, and July 8; Ballyduff, June 1 and Dec. 20; Ballinclare, May 1 and Oct. 4; Ballylongford, May 20, July 20, Oct. 20, and Dec. 20; Beal, Sept. 21; Blackwater, May 8, July 12, Sept. 12, and Dec. 12; Blennerville, Dec. 19; Cahirciveen, Jan. 5, Feb. 8, March 22, April 22, May 10, June 12, July 12, Aug. 8, Sept. 1 and 28, Oct. 28, Nov. 13, and Dec. 13; Castlemaine, May 15, Sept. 3, Nov. 1 and 21; Castle-Island, Jan. 1, Feb. 2, March 17, April 20, Easter-Monday, May 20, June 24, Aug. 1, Sept. 8, Oct. 1, Nov. 2 and 30, and Dec. 26; Cloghercen, June 10;

Oct. 17, and Dec. 5; Cross Roads, Jan. 1, Easter-Monday, Sept. 8 and Nov. 1; Currans, May 6; Dromkeen or Causeway, April 2, May 2, July 16, and Nov. 15; Kenmare, Feb. 27, April 15, May 22, July 1, Aug. 15, Sept. 26, Nov. 20, and Dec. 15; Killarney, July 4, Aug. 8, Oct. 7, Nov. 11 and 28, and Dec. 28; Kilgobinet, Feb. 11 and Dec. 21; Killorglin, May 19, June 30, Aug. 11, and Nov. 18; Listowel, May 13, July 26, Oct. 28, and every alternate Wednesday; Milltown, April 26, June 23, Aug. 23, and Dec. 15; Molahiffe, May 26; Odorney, the first and third Tuesday after New-year's day, and Dec. 1; Scartaglin, Jan. 17, May 17, Aug. 18, Oct. 19, and Dec. 16; Sneem, March 17, May 20, June 29, Aug. 9, Sept. 24, Nov. 18, and Dec. 18; Six-mile-Bridge, April 22, June 5, Sept. 20, Nov. 18; Tarbert, Jan. 1, Easter-Monday, June 22, Aug. 12, and Dec. 11; and Tralee, May 3, Aug. 4, Oct. 9, Nov. 7, and Dec. 13.

Communications.—The roads of the south and west of Kerry, till a very recent period, were, in many instances, totally impracticable for wheeled carriages, and in others so ill-made and acclivitous as to be travelled with both difficulty and danger; and even yet the roads of a considerable part of the district situated between Kenmare and Cahirciveen are traversible only by pedestrians or well-mounted horsemen. The old road connecting the barony of Iveragh with the rest of Ireland, passed over a shoulder of Drung mountain, at an elevation of upwards of 800 feet above sea-level, and frightfully overhanging the bay of Dingle; and the old roads in the other parts of the county were, in various instances, not a little circuitous, and occasionally rose and fell with so rapid a gradient as one foot in four. In 1807, a new road was commenced by Lord Headly to connect his Iveragh estates in a comparatively facile manner with the rest of the county; and this work, when completed, immediately began to effect an economical revolution in the barony, and to elevate its condition from inertia and barbarism to activity and prosperity. One new line of road made by government is 25 miles in length, connects Listowel and the district around it with Newmarket in co. Cork, and places Listowel 22 miles nearer the city of Cork than it stood by way of previously existing roads; another new line is 20 miles in length, connects Castle-Island with Newcastle in co. Limerick, and places Killarney and all southern Kerry 23½ miles nearer the city of Limerick than by previously existing communications; another new line connects central Kerry with central Cork, by way of King-William's-Town, and has enormously increased both the facility and the amount of intercommunication by inland carriage; and a fourth new line comes in from the Bantry and Bere mountains in Cork, crosses the head of the Kenmare estuary by a magnificent suspension bridge, and spans and perforates it across the fissures and through the abutments of the Kerry mountains south of Killarney in an absolute chef-d'œuvre style of engineering. See KING-WILLIAM'S-TOWN, and KENMARE. The amount of new roads completed between the date of the county surveyor's appointment, in 1834, and the close of 1841, was 80 miles; the amount in progress at the close of 1841 was 38 miles; and the amount under the surveyor's charge at the same date was 993 miles. The roads are generally kept in repair by contract at about ninepence per perch; and though they have increased in the proportion of 9 to 5, they now cost less than before. The total amount annually expended on their repair is about £5,500; and the sum expended on new roads during a few years, ending in 1841, was about £80,000. The only one of the Public Commissioners' proposed lines of railway which directly affects Kerry, is the Shannon line; and even this, almost instantly upon entering the county, terminates at Tarbert. Another proposed line, however, the survey of which was laid before the Public Commissioners, deflects from the Dublin and Cork line at Mallow, comes up the valley of the Blackwater to the frontier of Kerry, passes down very nearly the course of the Mallow and Killarney road to the vicinity of Killarney, makes a detour round the foot of the Lower Lake of Killarney, descends westward to near the south side of the entrance of Castlemaine Harbour, and thence curves along the coast of Iveragh to Valentia Harbour at Cahirciveen.

Divisions and Towns.—Kerry is politically divided into the baronies of Iraghticonnor in the extreme north; Clanmaurice, immediately south of Iraghticonnor; Trughenackmy, immediately south of Clanmaurice; Corkaguiney, projecting peninsularly westward from Trughenackmy, and along the north side of Dingle bay; Magonihy, immediately south of Trughenackmy; Glanerought, in the extreme south-east; and Iveragh, and Dunkerrin, principally in the great peninsula between Dingle bay and the Kenmare estuary. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred 9 townlands of the parish of Kilmeen from Magonihy in Kerry to Duballow in Cork,—pop., in 1841, 1,355; two townlands of Drishane, from Magonihy in Kerry to West Muskerry in Cork,—pop. 380; the entire parish of Fennit and one townland of Ballinahaglish, from Clanmaurice to Trughenackmy,—pop. 498; 14 townlands of Glanbehy from Dunkerrin to Iveragh,—pop. 1,357; 4 townlands of Ballintea, one of Dooaghs, eleven of Killorglin, and nineteen of Glanbehy from Magonihy to Iveragh,—pop. 1,754; and one townland of Killorglin, and three townlands of Knockane, from Trughenackmy to Dunkerrin,—pop. 401. Clanmaurice now contains 11 whole parishes, and part of 4 other parishes; Corkaguiney contains 18 whole parishes, and part of another parish; Dunkerrin contains 3 whole parishes, and part of two other parishes; Glanerought contains 3 whole parishes, and part of another parish; Iraghticonnor contains 10 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; Iveragh contains 7 whole parishes, and part of another parish; Magonihy contains 8 whole parishes, and part of 6 other parishes; and Trughenackmy contains 15 whole parishes, and part of 6 other parishes. The towns and principal villages in Clanmaurice are Ardfert, Ballyheigue, Drungower, Tiersharaghban, Duagh, Finuge, Ballinageragh, Lixnaw, Kildon, Causeway, Kilmoyly, Lerrig, Abbeydorney, Ballyduff, and Drummartin; in Corkaguiney, Dingle, Owenascoul, Ballyquin, Cloghane, Milltown, Glenfinna, Cappaclough, Castle-Gregory, Killiney, Stradbally, and Ventry; in Dunkerrin, Sneem; in Glanerought, Kenmare and Kilgarvan; in Iraghticonnor, Ballylongford, Tarbert, Ahaphond, Ballybunion, Listowel, and Newtownsands; in Iveragh, Cahirciveen; in Magonihy, Killarney; and in Trughenackmy, Tralee, Blennerville, Chapelton, Castle-Island, Scartaglin, Currans, Brackhill, Milltown, Killorglin, and Castlemaine.—The county, as to ecclesiastical division, now coincides exactly with the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe; and a small district which formerly belonged to the diocese of Cloyne, and lay detached a little to the east of the main body of Kerry, constitutes the transference which we have noticed as recently made to co. Cork.

specified 70, of scholars connected with the Established Church 1,026, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 19,055, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 10; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 354, of scholars 20,369, of male scholars 14,320, of female scholars 5,419, of scholars whose sex was not specified 621, of scholars connected with the Established Church 1,052, of scholars connected with Protestant dissenters 3, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 19,179, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 135. The statistics of schools, and also those of places of worship, and of religious denominations, for 1842, are given under the word ARDFERT: which see. In Sept. 1842, the National Board had 77 schools in Kerry, attended by 7,177 males, and 6,143 females, conducted by 59 male teachers, and 32 female teachers, and aided with £930 1s. 8d. in salaries, £106 7s. in free stock, and £120 17s. 0½d. in school requisites. But, additional to these schools, were 25 which had not come into co-operation; toward the building and fitting up of which the Board had granted, in 1841 and 1842, the sum of £1,894 8s. 4d. In 1842, the number of persons committed for public offences was 817; and of these, 280 were charged with offences against the person, 51 with offences against property committed with violence, 191 with offences against property committed without violence, 25 with malicious offences against property, 6 with offences against the currency, and 336 with offences not included in the above categories; 449 were convicted, and 368 were acquitted and discharged; of those convicted, 2 were sentenced to death, 15 to transportation, 6 to imprisonment during upwards of a year, 12 to imprisonment during upwards of 6 months, 204 to imprisonment under 6 months, 21 to pay fines, and 189 were either not sentenced, or were discharged on sureties; and of the 368 who were not convicted, 186 were found not guilty on trial, 110 had no bill found against them, 62 were not prosecuted, and 10 were bailed and not tried. On Jan. 1, 1842, the constabulary force of Kerry consisted of 1 third-rate county inspector, 4 second-rate sub-inspectors, 2 third-rate sub-inspectors, 1 first-rate head-constable, 6 second-rate head-constables, 28 constables, 25 first-rate sub-constables, 15 second-rate sub-constables, and 6 mounted police. The cost of maintaining this force, during 1841, was £9,946 12s. The constabulary are distributed through 32 stations; and these stations are classified into the 6 districts of Tralee, Cahirciveen, Dingle, Killarney, Kenmare, and Listowel. Three stipendiary magistrates are stationed in the county, and have their head-quarters at Listowel, Tralee, and Kenmare. The proportion contributed by Kerry toward the erection of the district Lunatic Asylum at Limerick was £9,303 16s. 7d. The county gaol is at Tralee; and the district bridewells are at Kenmare, Killarney, Milltown, Castle-Island, Tarbert, Listowel, Dingle, and Cahirciveen. The assizes are held at Tralee; quarter-sessions, at Tralee, Cahirciveen, Dingle, Kenmare, Killarney, and Listowel; and petty-sessions, at Ballylongford, Annascalle, Cahirciveen, Castle-Gregory, Castle-Island, Causeway, Cloverfield, Coolmagort, Dingle, Gunsborough, Kenmare, Killarney, Killorglin, Kilpadder, Listowel, Milltown, O'Dorney, Portmagee, Six-mile-bridge, Sneem, Tarbert, Tralee, Valentia, and Waterville. The county infirmary is at Tralee; fever hospitals are at Tralee, Listowel, Cahirciveen, and Killarney; dispensaries are at Annascalle, Ardea, Ardfert, Aghnagarry, Ballylongford, Balyhar, Cahirciveen, Castle-Gregory, Castle-Island, Causeway, Cloghereen, Dingle, Duagh, Gunsborough, Kenmare, Kildyn, Kilgarvan, Killarney, Knockacoppel, Listowel, Milltown, Sneem, Tarbert, Templenoe, Valentia, and West Cove; savings banks, at Tralee and Killarney; and union workhouses at Tralee, Cahirciveen, Kenmare, Killarney, and Listowel. The annual amount of property valued for the poor-rate is £355,466; and the total number of tenements valued is 44,470,—of which 27,339 were valued under £5,—7,375, under £10,—3,363, under £15,—1,959, under £20,—1,344, under £30,—763, under £40,—494, under £50,—and 806, at and above £50. The amount of grand jury presentments, in 1842, was £41,753. Eight members went from Kerry to the Irish parliament,—2 from the county at large, and 2 from each of the boroughs Tralee, Dingle, and Ardfert; but the members to the imperial parliament are only two from the county and one from Tralee. In 1841, the total county constituency was 1,401; and of these, 320 were £50 freeholders, 206 were £20 freeholders, 645 were £10 freeholders, 32 were £20 leaseholders, 136 were £10 leaseholders, 16 were £50 rent-chargers, and 39 were £20 rent-chargers.

Population of Kerry in 1792, as estimated by Dr. Beaufort, 107,000; in 1813, as ascertained under the Act of 1812, 178,622; in 1821, 216,185; in 1831, 263,126; in 1841, 293,880. Houses, in 1792, 19,395; in 1813, 31,749; in 1821, 35,597; in 1831, 41,294; in 1841, 46,628. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, in 1831, 34,043; in manufactures and trade, 4,621; in other pursuits, 6,360.—The following statistics are all of 1841. Males, 147,307; females, 146,573; families, 51,593. Inhabited houses, 46,628; uninhabited complete houses, 1,434; houses in the course of erection, 169. First-class inhabited houses, 601; second-class, 4,398; third-class, 13,757; fourth-class, 27,872. Families residing in first-class houses, 754; in second-class houses, 5,748; in third-class houses, 15,361; in fourth-class houses, 29,730. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 39,985; in manufactures and trade, 7,749; in other pursuits, 3,859. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1,068; on the directing of labour, 15,136; on their own manual labour, 34,114; on means not specified, 1,225. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 67,240; to clothing, 4,112; to lodging, 3,541; to health, 94; to charity, 1; to justice, 450; to education, 403; to religion, 167; unclassified, 3,703; without any specified occupation, 7,803. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 2,842; to clothing, 16,972; to lodging, 32; to health, 135; to charity, 1; to justice, 2; to education, 92; to religion, 23; unclassified, 10,275; without any specified occupation, 58,320. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 40,452; who could read but not write, 10,000; who could neither read nor write, 76,701. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 15,906; who could read but not write, 8,819; who could neither read nor write, 102,491. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 8,939; attending superior schools, 249. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 6,431; attending superior schools, 132. Per-centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 41; married, 55; widowed, 4. Per-centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 33; married, 55; widowed, 12. School teachers, 274 males and 40 females; ushers and tutors, 112 males and 11 females; governesses, 38; teachers of music, 4 males; teachers of dancing, 13 males and 3 females; clergymen of the establishment, 42; Methodist ministers, 4; Presbyterian ministers, 2; Independent ministers, 2; Roman Catholic clergymen, 63; ministers of religion whose denominational connection was not specified, 12; monk, 1; nuns, 21; parish clerks, 26; Scripture-readers, 5; sextons, 10 males and 2 females.

Antiquities.]—The most remarkable of the ancient monuments of Kerry, are the Cyclopean stone-fortresses of Cahireonree, Cahir-Donnel, and Staigue; the sepulchral stones with Ogham inscriptions, in the vicinity of Dingle; and the stone-roofed cells or oratories of Kilmelchedor, Ventry, and Skellig. One pillar-tower occurs at Rattoo; another in an island of Lough Currane; part of another at Aghadoe; and the site of a fourth in the neighbourhood of the cathedral of Ardfert. Remains exist of 13 monastic establishments; and the most remarkable of these are the ruins or vestiges of the abbey of Ardfert, the abbey of O'Dorney, the abbey of Darrynane, the abbey of Lislaotin, the Monaster ni Oriel, and the abbey of Mucruss. Military strengths of nearly every variety, from the aboriginal earth-work to the baronial castle, and from the defensive fortress of the settled inhabitant to the hasty redoubt of Spanish or English invaders, are found within the county; the number of feudal castles alone is no fewer than 30; and the most noticeable of these are the castles of Ballingarry, Ballybeggan, Ballycarbery, Ballynalus, Castle-Drum, Castle-Gregory, Castle-Shannon, Clonmelane, Dunloe, Lick, Liscahane, Littur, and Ross.

History.]—The word Kerry is supposed by some writers to be a corruption of Carruidhe, or Cair-Reecht, which signifies 'the Kingdom of Ciar;' and the county is asserted by them to have obtained this name from Ciar, the son of Fergus, king of Ulster, and the ancestor of the O'Connors, the O'Scanlans, and other septs. But the family of the Moriarts, who anciently possessed a great part of the county, and were descended from Ciar-na-Luachra, the son of Cork, king of Munster, called it Kierrigia-Luachra; and the local monastic writers of the middle ages called it the county of St. Brandon, from the name of its patron saint. Dr. Smith adopts the obscure story of a remote Milesian colonization of Ireland, and thinks it probable that the colonists disembarked at the Kenmare estuary; and he opines also that some etymological vestiges exist around Lixnaw of the people mentioned by Strabo and Ptolemy, under the name of Luceni, and placed by the latter of these ancient writers, as Dr. Smith thinks, in the inland parts of Kerry toward the Shannon.

"A considerable part of Kerry," says the learned historian of the county, "was formerly a district county in itself, called Desmond; it consisted of that part of Kerry which lies south of the river Maine, with the barony of Bere and Bantry, in the county of Cork; and was a palatinate under the jurisdiction of the Earls of Desmond. It is true, the ancient country of Desmond, or South Munster, extended much farther, as appears by the grant of Henry II. to Robert Fitzstephens, and Milo de Cogan: its limits were from the hill of St. Brandon to the river Blackwater, near Lismore, and comprehended the county of Cork as well as of Kerry. On the first arrival of the English into these parts, they found the O'Connors possessed of the northern tract of this county, from which family that part still retains the name of Iraghticonnor. The middle part of the county was also then in the possession of the Moriarty family; and the southern parts were occupied by the O'Sullivan, the barony of Dunkerrin being then called O'Sullivan's country, of which he had the title of prince given him by the Irish: they had also large possessions in Iveragh, as had also the MacRebans, who were a branch of that family. Besides these were the O'Donoghues, distinguished into O'Donoghoe-More, and O'Donoghoe-Ross; also the O'Mahonies. Among all the Irish septs in Desmond, or South Munster, the MacCarties, before the arrival of the English, were by far the most eminent, being sovereigns of the whole country: but after their best lands were subdued by the English adventurers, the chief of this potent clan retired into Kerry, as to a place of security; the southern part of the country being then almost inaccessible, because of its mountains, woods, and fastnesses. He had not been long settled here when he was imprisoned and treated with great cruelty by his own son, Cormac O'Lebanab: to revenge which usage, he was obliged to apply for assistance to the celebrated English adventurer Raymond, surnamed Crassus or Le Grosse, who was then at Limerick. Raymond undertook the expedition, and regained Dermoid MacCarthy his country, by subduing and delivering to him his rebellious son, whom he imprisoned and beheaded soon after. He granted a considerable tract of this county as a reward to Raymond, where he settled his son Maurice, and where he became so potent, that he gave his name to the part of Kerry then called Lixnaw, from the ancient Luceni, as also to his family, the country being called Clanmaurice, and the family Fitzmaurice to this day; both of which are enjoyed by his lineal descendant, the Right Hon. the Earl of Kerry. This event happened about the year 1177, a period so distant that few families in these kingdoms can boast either of a less interrupted succession, or a more ancient settlement.

"According to Giraldus Cambrensis, Dermoid came to an agreement with Melo de Cogan, and Robert Fitzstephen, to whom Henry II. had granted the kingdom of Cork, to suffer him to hold 24 cantreds of land at a small annual rent, which contract was performed in 1179. But he did not long remain quiet, for, in 1185, he and O'Brien of Thomond, having joined the king of Connaught, wasted all the English settlements, and besieged Cork. Fitzstephen was then in the town, and in great distress, until he was relieved by Raymond le Grosse, who with great expedition arrived at Cork, bringing with him by sea, from Wexford, 100 archers and 20 knights. With this reinforcement Fitzstephen made a sally, and at the first onset routed the Irish. The succeeding year this Dermoid MacCarthy-More was slain by Theobald Walter, ancestor to the Butlers, as he was holding a conference with some other Irish chiefs near Cork. His successor, Daniel MacCarthy-More-ni-Carra, so named from the river Carra in this county, concluded a peace with the English in 1196. Their posterity were very eminent people, and great disturbers of the English, particularly the Fitzgerald family, who dispossessed them of a considerable part of their country. In these contests great numbers were slain; and at Callan, in this county, the MacCartys gained a complete victory—anno 1261—over the Fitzgeralds. But at length dissensions arising among the followers of MacCarthy, the Fitzgeralds prevailed in their turn, and kept them under for many years. However, a great regard was also paid to the chiefs of this family, who retained the title of MacCarthy-More: one of whom, named Donald, was ennobled by Queen Elizabeth, who, in 1565, created him Earl of Glencare; a tract of land in this county between the bay of Dingle and the river of Kenmare. This Earl having resigned his estate to the Queen, had it restored and regranted by letters-patent, to hold it of the crown after the English manner. She also conferred many ample privileges on him, and paid the expense of his journey into England; but by the ad-rice of O'Neil who rebelled in Ulster, MacCarty pursued his example in the south, and even assumed the title of King of Munster. These chiefs joined their forces together in 1568; but before the expiration of the year, MacCarty was forced to submit to the Lord-deputy, and crave the Queen's pardon. This Earl afterwards sat in a parliament held at Dublin, on the 26th of April, 1584, by Sir John Perrot, who from the presidency of Munster was appointed Lord-deputy of Ireland. He gave the government of the county of Desmond to this Earl of Glencare, who died soon after, leaving behind him an only daughter, Ren or Ellen, and an illegitimate son called Daniel, who assumed the title of Earl, but was dispossessed of it by Florence MacCarty, son to Sir Donough MacCarty-Reagh of Carbery, in the county of Cork; who, marrying Ellen, took possession of the estate, and assumed the title of MacCarty-More, which was confirmed to him by O'Neil, who called himself King of Ireland."

In 1280, died Thomas, the son of Maurice, the grandson of Raymond le Gros, the first person who assumed the name of Fitzmaurice, and the first lord or baron of Kerry. In 1295, Thomas, the grandson of this first lord, acted as captain of all Desmond or South Munster, claimed to be the King's sheriff, in the counties of Kerry, Cork, and Waterford, and was formally constituted Lord-justice of Ireland; and at his death, in 1298, he left two sons. John, who was the 8th Lord Ophaly, and was created Earl of Kildare,—and Maurice, who was created Earl of Desmond. In 1325, Maurice, 4th Lord of Kerry, killed the son and heir of MacCarty-More, on the bench before the judge of assize at Tralee; and he in consequence forfeited his lands in Desmond and Molahiffe. In 1329, Maurice Fitzgerald, the great-grandson of the first Lord of Kerry, was created Earl of Desmond, with a royal jurisdiction or palatinate in the country of Desmond. Kerry had been made shire-ground in 1210, by King John; and, excepting the church-lands, which still remained under the sheriff, the whole county passed under the new palatinal jurisdiction. The lords of the palatinate administered the executive by a seneschal, and had their own courts, judges, and law-officers; and, in consequence of possessing such high powers in a strong and remote country, they frequently dared to defy the royal authority, and repeatedly occasioned their county to be overrun and wasted by the King's forces. The subsequent history of the county down to near the close of the 16th century, is, with the exception of the parts outlined in our previous extract from Dr. Smith, very nearly identical with the family and public history of the Earls of Desmond, and has already been sufficiently sketched in the articles DESMOND and KILLMALLOCK: which see. The rebellion and overthrow in the reign of Elizabeth, of Gerald, the 16th Earl of Desmond, occasioned the final suppression of the Desmonds' authority, and the permanent confiscation of their estates. "The English knights and gentlemen who had grants from the Queen of the forfeited lands in the county," says the article KERRY, in the Penny Cyclopaedia, "were Sir William Herbert, 13,276 acres; Charles Herbert, Esq., 3,768 acres; Sir Valentine Brown, 6,560 acres; Sir Edward Denny, 6,000 acres; Captain Conway, 5,260 acres; John Chapman, Esq., 1,434 acres; and John Holly, Esq., 4,422 acres. On the breaking out of the rebellion of 1641, the native Irish again took arms, and laid siege to the castle of Tralee, to which a great number of English families had fled. After a siege of 6 months the place surrendered, and the Irish remained in possession of the county till 1652, when Ludlow, with an army of 4,000 foot and 200 horse, again reduced them. Extensive confiscations of the estates of the native Irish followed. Among the new proprietors was Sir William Petty, who obtained a large grant of lands in the neighbourhood of Kenmare, and commenced the smelting of iron, which was carried on with vigour while timber lasted. A colony of Protestants was planted by Sir William Petty, round the head of Kenmare river, who were attacked by the native Irish in 1688, and compelled to abandon their possessions. A detachment of King William's army, under Brigadier Levison, entered the county in 1691, and finally reduced it. The confiscations consequent on the last rebellion amounted to 90,116 acres, of an estimated total value at that time of £47,483 12s. 9d. About 1710, it was harassed by French pirates, which led to the erection of a small fort on Valentia island. The principal proprietors at present, are the Marquis of Lansdowne, in whom the Fitzmaurice and Petty estates centre; Lord Kenmare, the representative of the Brown family; Lord Headley; Lord Ventry; and the Knight of Kerry." The Marquis of Lansdowne represents the long line of the barons of Kerry, and possesses the title of Earl of Kerry; and "the Knight of Kerry," is the representative of an old branch of the Fitzgeralds, but resides within the limits of the county of Limerick. See GLIN.

KERRYCURRIHY. See KERRICURRIHY.

KERRY-HEAD, a cape in the barony of Clannaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. It screens the south side of the entrance of the estuary of the Shannon, and is situated 7½ miles south of Loop Head, which screens the north side, and has a lighthouse. Kerry Head, largely understood, is a promontorial peninsula, 3½ miles in length, 1½ in mean breadth, possessing horizontally a conical outline, and extending westward between the Shannon's estuary and Ballyheigue bay. The interior of it is high ground, called Doon Hill; and the coast is a series of lofty, broken, cavern-perforated cliffs.

KERRY-POINT, a small headland on the east coast of the barony of Ardes, 3½ miles north by east of the entrance of Lough Strangford, co. Down, Ulster.

KESH, (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Lurg, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It rises among the uplands on the border toward Tyrone, gathers the waters of numerous hill torrents and rills near its source, and runs 5 or 6 miles westward to Lower Lough Erne, below the village of Kesh.

KESH, or KIAN, a village in the parish of Magheraculmoney, barony of Lurg, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands on the rivulet Kesh, and on the road from Enniskillen to Pettigoe, half-a-mile above the rivulet's influx to Lough Erne, 4½ miles east-south-east of Pettigoe, and 11½ north by west of Enniskillen. It has a post-office, a dispensary, and a loan fund. The post-office is a branch one from Enniskillen. The dispensary is within the Lowtherstown Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £121 3s. 10d., and administered to 2,731 patients. The Loan Fund had, in 1841, a capital of £314; and, during that year, it circulated £1,234 in 767 loans, and expended £30 for charitable purposes. The district, which extends 2½ miles southward from Kesh to Castle-Archdall, is one of the most beautiful portions of the brilliantly picturesque shores of Lough Erne. Area of the village, 13 acres. Pop., in 1831, 139; in 1841, 248. Houses 46.

KESHCARRIGAN. See CASHCARRIGAN.

KESHLIN, a small lake about 3 miles from the town of Monaghan, Ulster. About 300 yards from it there was very recently discovered a highly remarkable piece of antiquity,—a curious and seemingly very ancient human dwelling. See MONAGHAN (County of).

KEVIN'S BED. See GLENDALOUGH.

KEY (LOUGH), a lake of the barony of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It receives the Boyle river at a point $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-west of the town of Boyle, and discharges its superfluent waters, under the continued or resumed name of the Boyle river, eastward to fall into the Shannon; and it was proposed by the Shannon Navigation Commissioners to be so opened and improved that all its shores should have navigable communication with the markets and ports commanded by the Shannon and by the Royal and Grand Canals. See BOYLE. Lough Arrow, separated from Lough Key by a ridge of hills, and sending its superfluent waters to an arm of Sligo bay at Ballysadere, is only 1,613 yards horizontally distant from Lough Key, and has a superior altitude of only 41 feet 8 inches. Lough Key measures about $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles in both breadth and length, has an intricate outline, is richly studded with green and sylvan islands, and exhibits scenery of gentle, soft, and almost luscious beauty, backed in the northern and western perspective by the Curlew mountains. A chief series of the lake's features, and an entire cabinet of its scenic gems, are found in the noble demesne of ROCKINGHAM: which see. The islands are not only fine objects in themselves, but appear to have been favourite retreats of the early inhabitants of the country, and, in several instances, contain ancient architectural remains. The names of several, as Church, Hermit, Stag, and Orchard Islands, sufficiently indicate their respective character; and three of them—INCHMACNERIN, CASTLE-ISLAND, and TRINITY-ISLAND—will be found noticed in their respective alphabetical places. Nearly twenty in all are laid down in the great county map. The lake is politically distributed among the parishes of Boyle, Kilbryan, and Ardcarne; and comprises 748 acres, 2 roods in the first of these, 996 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches in the second, and 553 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches in the third.

KEYDUE. See KEADUE.

KID, an islet in the parish of Kilcommon, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies at the east side of the entrance of Broadhaven, and immediately west-south-west of Benwee-Head.

KILA. See KILLA.

KILBAHA, a fishing village, and small sea-port, in the parish of Kilballyhone, barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It is situated on the estuary of the Shannon, about $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles east of Loop Head, and about 13 miles west of Kilrush; and stands on the estate of Mr. William Westby. A small open sweep of the estuary at the place is sometimes called Kilbaha bay. An artificial harbour was constructed here by means of grants of £200 from Mr. Westby, £115 7s. from the Dublin Committee, and £1,148 18s. from government; and consists of a cut right through the beach into a bog, a partially excavated basin within the bog, two retaining walls of 140 feet in length along the sides of the cut, and about 40 feet of quay-wall within the basin. "Owing to the facilities afforded by this pier for landing sea-manure," says an official report, "the country round it bears evident marks of agricultural improvement. It is also useful to the fisheries, in which about 110 persons are exclusively employed; and it is also an asylum-harbour for small craft coming in from Loop Head and other fishing-stations to the Shannon." Area of the village, 34 acres. Pop., in 1831, 460; in 1841, 531. Houses 82. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 61; in manufactures and trade, 15; in other pursuits, 26. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, none; on the directing of labour, 64; on their own manual labour, 38.

KILBALIVER, or BALLIVOR. See BALLYVOR.

KILBALLYHONE, or KILBALLYOWEN, a parish 13 miles west of Kilrush, and in the extreme south-west of the barony of Moyarta and co. Clare, Munster. It contains the villages of Kilballyhone, Cross, Kilbaha, Kiltrellig, Ross, and Tullig: see these articles. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5; area, 10,835 acres, 19 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,605; in 1841, 4,346. Houses 710. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,720. Houses 440. The surface comprises the extreme district of Moyarta peninsula, terminating in Loop Head; and consists on the average of good land, which has of late years been very much improved, and is capable of still further improvement. The chief altitudes on the Shannon coast are 386 feet at a place $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile west of Rinevella bay, and 189 feet at Kilclogher Head; and on the Atlantic coast, 232 feet at Loop Head, 274 feet near Black Rock, 146 feet near Cloghansavan-Castle, and 189 feet at Tullig Point. The antiquities are the ruins of a castle, a church, and a friary.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILRUSH [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £81 10s. 9d.; glebe, £3 3s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for the three sums of £83 1s. 6d., and £31 1s. 3d., and £69 4s. 7d., which belong respectively to the prebendary of Tomgrany, the prebendary of Inniscattery, and Lord Castlecoote. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 18, and the Roman Catholics to 3,950.

KILBANE, a village in the parish of Killo Kennedy, barony of Lower Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It stands 3 miles east of Broadford, on the road thence to Killaloe. Area, 27 acres. Pop., in 1841, 370. Houses 58.

KILBANON. See KILBENAN.

KILBARRICK, a parish in the barony of Coolock, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-east of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 740 acres. Pop., in 1831, 170; in 1841, 199. Houses 27. The land is of good quality, and lies at the isthmus which connects the mainland of the barony with the peninsula of Howth. The ruins of the church stand at the forking of the Howth and Baldoyle roads from Dublin, and are believed to be very ancient. The remaining arches are chiefly semi-circular; and the ruins show no traces of ornament, and indicate the structure to have been small and rude. Popular story and monkish legend represent the building as an abbey, and allege it to have been founded for a fraternity of monks who rendered assistance to mariners exposed to danger on the great sandbank called the North Bull. The structure, however, is known to have been simply a chapel, and to have been variously called Moore chapel, and the chapel of Cilbarrack. An unenclosed and weedy cemetery adjoining the ruins is still used as a burying-place by a few families of the poor.—This parish is nominally a curacy, but practically a rectory, in the dio. of Dublin, and forms part of the benefice of HOWTH: which see. The tithes, jointly with those of Howth curacy, are compounded for £231 0s. 5d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 45, and the Roman Catholics to 145.

KILBARRON, a parish in the barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains the chief part of the town of BALLYSHANNON: which see. Length, between 6 and 7 miles; breadth, between 3 and 4 miles; area, 23,932 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches,—of which 915 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 10,521; in 1841, 10,027. Houses 1,783. Pop. of the rural districts in 1831, 8,136; in 1841, 7,604. Houses 1,374. It extends from the vicinity of Belleek, along the river Erne, to Donegal bay; is traversed by the road from Enniskillen to Ballyshannon, and by that from Ballyshannon to Donegal; and consists, over one-third of its area, of bog and mountain, and over the remaining two-thirds, of good arable land. A little below Belleek, on the right bank of the Erne, is Col. Conolly's seat of CLIFF: which see. About a mile from Belleek, on the right of the Enniskillen and Ballyshannon road, is Camlin, the handsome seat of John Tredennick, Esq.; on the same side, but on the opposite bank of the river, is Laputa, George Johnstone, Esq.; and on the left of the road, are the seats of Cherrymount and Fortwilliam. North of Ballyshannon, on the sandy beach which sweeps round the bar of the harbour, is Wardtown, an old seat of the Ffolliott family; and on the left of the Ballyshannon and Donegal road, are the seats of Parkhill and Cavan Garden. On the bold rocky shores of Donegal bay, a little beyond the sandy beach of Ballyshannon Harbour, are the picturesque ruins of Kilbarron-castle,—an ancient fortalice of the O'Clerys, chiefs of the district. The highest ground in the parish is Breesy hill, on the east border, 852 feet in altitude.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe; but only a few townlands are liable to tithe, the remainder being all tithe-free. Vicarial tithe composition, £19; glebe, £393 15s. Gross income, £412 15s.; nett, £361 11s. 4d. Patron, Edward Conolly, Esq., of Castletown. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £26, and are impropriate in the patron. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built about the year 1740. Sittings about 1,200; attendance 500. A school-house is used as a chapel-of-ease, and has an attendance of 100. The Methodist meeting-house is attended by 100, and the Primitive Methodist meeting-house by 250. The attendance at the Presbyterian meeting-house is not reported. The Ballyshannon and Castle-Ard Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 2,700 and 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3,063, and the Roman Catholics to 8,237; 7 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 340 children; and 17 daily schools had on their books 553 boys and 336 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Fund, £5 from the rector, and £5 5s. from the parish; one, with £26 from the Wesleyan Missionary Society; one, with £10 from subscription; and four, with graduated allowances from the London Hibernian Society;—and one of the latter four received also £8 a-year from Col. Conolly; one, £7 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society; and one, £4 from that Society, and £5 from the parish. Two of the private-enterprise daily schools were also boarding-schools.

KILBARRON, a parish partly in the barony of Leitrim, co. Galway, Connaught, but chiefly in the barony of Lower Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. It lies $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Borris-o'-kane. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Galway section, 814 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches,—of which 599 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches are in Lough Derg. Area of the Tipperary section, 10,529 acres, 4 perches: of which, 2,822 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches are in Lough Derg, and 38 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches are in small lakes. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,570; in 1841, 2,853. Houses 497. Pop. of the Tipperary section in 1841, 2,756. Houses 484. The Galway section consists of the island called Ilanmore, which contains some abbey ruins; and of a circumjacent portion of Lough Derg. The surface of the Tipperary section extends along Lough Derg; consists of light limestone land; and, though nowhere bold in character, is pleasantly varied in contour. The principal seats are Curraghmore, Castle-Cambre, Springmount, Annagh-Castle, Annagh-Lodge, Long-Lane, Waterloo-Lodge, Garrane, Kilgarvan, Moon, and Broofield.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £120 8s. 7d.; glebe, £5. Gross income, £132 8s. 7d.; nett, £114 11s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £240 14s. 2d., and are impropriate in Captain Smith of Dublin, and leased by Mr. Dennis Canney. The church was built in 1823, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 490; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Finnoe and Terryglass. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 120 Churchmen, 35 Protestant dissenters, and 2,365 Roman Catholics; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 136 boys and 58 girls. In 1841, the Kilbarron Loan Fund had a capital of £430, circulated £2,148 in 695 loans, cleared £28 19s. 10d. of nett profit, and expended £40 for charitable purposes.

KILBARRY, a parish 2 miles south of the town of Waterford, and formerly within the liberties of Waterford city, but now in the barony of Gaultier, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, south-eastward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,631 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches. Pop., in 1831, 587; in 1841, 605. Houses 85. A tract of from 200 to 300 acres in the valley of Kilbarry, is described by the Rev. Mr. Ryland, the statist of the county, as under water during 8 or 9 months in the year, and as, at certain periods, sending up pestiferous vapours, but as capable of being so drained, as to "afford 70 or 80 per cent. to persons undertaking the work," and to be rendered the best land in the county. A preceptory of Knights Templars was founded at Kilbarry in the 12th century, and was afterwards given to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. The building was originally extensive, and stood on a gentle eminence adjacent to a marsh. In 1497, the rivulet which flows from Kilbarry to the Suir was dammed up by the citizens of Waterford, and made to accumulate in a chain of lakes in the valley of Kilbarry, in order to prevent the junction of the sea and the land forces of Peter Warbeck and the Earl of Desmond, collected to besiege the city.—This parish is a wholly impropriate curacy in the dio. of Waterford; and the impropriator pays to the curate of St. Patrick's, Waterford, a stipend of £5 for performing the occasional duties. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 577.

KILBARRY, a detached portion of the parish of Macloneigh, barony of West Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. It lies 3 miles south by west of Macroom; is surrounded by the parish of Kilmurry; and is principally disposed in the gardens, orchards, lawns, and deer-park of Kilbarry demesne.

KILBARRYMEADEN, a parish, formerly in the barony of Upperthird, but now in that of Decies-without-Drum, 4 miles south-east by south of Kilmacthomas, co. Waterford, Munster. It contains the village of KILL: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,263 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,416; in 1841, 3,360. Houses 519. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,022. Houses 462. The general character of the land is coarse, pastoral, and boggy. The highest ground is on the north border, and has an altitude of 541 feet. Near the village of Kill is Gardenmorris, the seat of John Power O'Shea, and nearer Waterford is Georgestown, the seat of James Barron, Esq. Dunbrattin, at the termination of a tongue of the parish which runs down to the coast, makes a slender claim to have been the landing-place of the first English invaders; but supports its pretensions on the doubtful circumstances of its having a small mound with a circular intrenchment, and of its name having the signification of "the fortification of the Britons." The parish itself takes name from a church anciently built by St. Baramedan. "The land which belonged to this church," says the Rev. Mr. Ryland, "has long been highly venerated by the common people, who attribute to it many surprising qualities. It is said that a notorious robber, whenever he passed through this place, used to wash his horse's hoofs and legs in the first water which he chanced to meet, lest his haunt should be discovered in consequence of his being guilty of sacrilege, in carrying away a portion of the holy clay. There is a well here, sacred to St. Baramedan, frequently resorted to by pilgrims, who ascribe many virtues to its waters. Marina, a sister of this saint, and equally esteemed for piety, also resided in this parish. A church, the ruins of which are still discernible, built by her near the sea, gives to the place the name of Kilmurrin. An image of this saint, rudely carved out of a rock, may be seen in a cave near Dunbrattin; the place is often resorted to by the neighbouring people."—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £100; glebe, £3 3s. Gross income, £103 3s.; nett, £95 10s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the stipendiary curacy of Kill-St.-Nicholas in the dio. of Waterford. The curate of Monkland receives a salary of £10, for performing the occasional duties of Kilbarrymeaden. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £200, and are appropriated to the precentorship of Waterford cathedral. The Roman Catholic Chapel has an attendance of 2,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 2,386; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 114 boys and 70 girls.

KILBEACON, a parish in the southern extremity of the barony of Knocktopher, and 8 miles south by east of the town of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains the village of MULLINAVAT, which see. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 3,402 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,036; in 1841, 1,362. Houses 209. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 833. Houses 122. The surface declines to the south; is traversed by the road from Knocktopher to Waterford; and consists, over two-thirds of its area, of rocky and boggy ground, and over the remaining third, of arable and pasture land. A height near the centre has an altitude of 636 feet.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ossory; vicarial tithe composition, £38; glebe, £24. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £76, and are inappropriate in the vicars choral of St. Canice cathedral. The vicarages of Kilbeacon, ROBINAN, and KILLAGHY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilbeacon. Length and breadth, each 2½ miles. Pop., in 1831, 2,878. Gross income, £186; nett, £177 19s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefices of Cloneamery and Innistiogue, in the dio. of Ossory. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1826, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 10 to 20. The Mullinavat Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600 at one service, and 1,415 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilmacow and Dunkit. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 1,053; the Protestants of the union to 20, and the Roman Catholics to 2,925; and 4 pay daily schools in the union—3 of which were in the parish—had on their books 118 boys and 63 girls.

KILBEACON, a quondam parish, adjacent to that of Toom, in the barony of Kilnemanna, co. Tipperary, Munster. It was appropriated to the mensal of the archbishop of Cashel, in whose dio. it lay; but has ceased to be regarded as a separate parish.

KILBEACONTY, or KILVECONTY, a parish in the barony of Kiltartan, 2½ miles east-north-east of Gort, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3; area, 12,473 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches,—of which 247 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches are in Lough Cooter, and 63 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 4,544; in 1841, 4,575. Houses 821. The surface consists, to a considerable extent, of the spurs and low offsets of the Slieve-Baughta mountains, and possesses but a small proportion of tolerably good land. A height on the south border has an altitude of 407 feet. The chief residences are, Forthill, Lisbrine, Russaun, Ballyturn, Chevy-Chase, and Annagh. The road from Gort to Portumna passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMACDUAGH [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. Tithe composition, £175. A portion of the tithes, compounded for £26, are appropriated to the archdeaconry of Kilmacduagh. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 800, and from 150 to 200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 4,868; and 3 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 105 children.

KILBEAGH, a parish in the barony of Costello, 8 miles west by north of Ballaghadireen, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 10½ miles; breadth, 4½; area, 33,824 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches,—of which 95 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 8,790; in 1841, 9,963. Houses 1,738. The Ecclesiastical Authorities state the area at 5,172 acres, 20 perches, and the pop., in 1831, at 181. Most of the surface is a dismal expanse of bleak and desolate bog and moor, partially relieved by isolated hills, which aspire to be locally called mountains. The declination is all to the north; and shakes down the head-waters and the main streams of the three rivulets, Owengarve, Sonnagh, and Mullaghanoo. Two heights on the southern border have altitudes of 693 and 775 feet. The roads from Ballaghadireen to Foxford, and from Ballinrobe to Tubbercurry, pass respectively westward and northward through the interior; and at their intersection, almost on the mutual boundary-line of the counties, stands the miserable village of Ballaghy; and a little east of this is Donmore, the residence of Mr. Phillips.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCONDUFF [which see], in the dio. of Achonry. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £85 5s. 8d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Viscount Dillon. Two Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners, according to the ecclesiastical returns, were all Roman Catholics, and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 164 boys and 46 girls.

KILBEG, or KILMAINHAMBE, a parish in the barony of Lower Kells, 4 miles north-north-east of the town of Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains the village of CARLANSTOWN: which see. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,184 acres, 3 roods, 30 perches,—of which 5 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,813; in 1841, 2,036. Houses 345. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,520; in 1841, 1,754. Houses 298. The Ecclesiastical Authorities state the area at 3,426 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches, and the pop., in 1831, at 1,478. The surface consists of tolerably good land, declines to the south-east, and is traversed by the road from Kells to Ardee. The chief residences are Kilbeg, Ardlonan, Marvalstown, and Horath. A Commandery for Knights of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, was founded here, in the reign of Richard I., by Walter de Lacy, Lord of Meath; and a lease of it was granted, in the year 1500, by the prior of Kilmainham, to Peter Barnwall of Stackallen. The buildings consisted of a castle, a chapel, a legate-house, and a barn, with a stone wall; but they have been almost totally erased.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of NEWTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £180; glebe, £50. The church of the benefice is situated in Kilbeg, and is a very old building. Sittings 100; attendance 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 400 to 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Stahalmoy. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 24, and the Roman Catholics to 1,502; and a daily school in Carlanstown was aided with £10 a-year from the National Board, and £5 and a house, and an acre of land from Mr. Meridyth, and had on its books 61 boys and 46 girls.

KILBEG, or KYLD, a quondam parish in the barony of Lower Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It contains the village of LACKEN: which see. Pop., in 1831, 920. This parish is now treated as only a section or denomination of BOYSTOWN: which see.

KILBEGGAN, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Moycashel, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,085 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,039; in 1841, 4,186. Houses 755. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,054; in 1841, 2,276. Houses 412. The surface is tame in character, and comprises a considerable extent of bog; yet consists, in the aggregate, of good land. The Upper Brosna effects the drainage southward; the great Connaught road from Dublin passes westward; and a branch of the Grand Canal comes up to the town from the main line on the south. The chief country-seats are Meeldrum, Loughangore, and Belmont. The highest ground is at the church, and lies only 251 feet above sea-level.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Glebe, £33 12s. 8d. Gross income, £212 16s.; nett, £92 19s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The tithes are wholly inappropriate in Sir Lambart Cromie, bart., and have been compounded for £150. The church was built in 1764, at an unknown cost, and repaired in 1818, by means of a loan of £461 10s. 9½d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 80 to 95. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Rahue. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 253 Churchmen, 15 Protestant dissenters, and 3,841 Roman Catholics; and 7 pay daily schools had on their books 142 boys and 98 girls. In 1840, a male school and a female school in the town, were salaried with respectively £12 and £8 from the National Board.

KILBEGGAN, a post and market town, and formerly a borough, in the parish of Kilbeggan, barony of Moycashel, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands on the Upper Brosna river, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Galway and Westport, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of Tyrells-Pass, $5\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Tullamore, 8 west by south of Montegrenogue, and $44\frac{1}{2}$ west of Dublin. Its environs are uninteresting; the only seats of any note are Surgeon O'Reilly's mansion of Ballard, 2 miles to the south, and Mr. Handy's mansion of Bracca, 2 miles to the west; and the Brosna is here too small and sluggish a stream to give any relief to the landscape. The town, in a general view, extends with slender breadth along the Dublin and Galway highway; and though containing a full complement of squalid cabins and hovels, presents on the whole a tolerably well-built appearance, has a fair proportion of slated houses, and boasts the important circumstances of recent improvement and promising prospects. The market-house is a neat structure; the Roman Catholic chapel is large, and comparatively elegant; and the parish-church was originally the chapel of an ancient monastery. The trade of the town is provincially important, and has been materially increased by the formation, a few years ago, of the Kilbeggan branch of the Grand Canal. The corn-trade in particular is extensive; great quantities of butter are sold at the weekly market; and manufactures are carried on in the departments of brewing, distilling, milling, and snuff-making. The weekly market is held on Saturday; and fairs are held on March 25, June 16, August 18, and October 28. A branch-boat plies from Kilbeggan in connection with the fly-boats on the Grand Canal, between Tullamore and Dublin; cars connect the branch-boat with Moate and Athlone; and a mail-car runs between Kilbeggan and Banagher. The Kilbeggan dispensary is within the Tullamore Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 15,246; and, in 1839-42, it expended £72 18s. 7d., and administered to 925 patients. In 1841, a Loan Fund in the town, which made an extravagant charge upon the issue of each loan, and which has ceased to work, had a capital of £1,211, and circulated £3,822 in 885 loans; and in the same year, another Kilbeggan Loan Fund had a capital of £898, and circulated £1,943 in 862 loans.

Kilbeggan was incorporated by charter of 10 James I. The borough limits, though established only by usage and not by charter, are well defined, and continue to be maintained; and they include the whole of the town as built upon, and an encircling band of open country about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile broad. The corporation, according to charter, is styled "The Portreeve, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Kilbeggan;" and consists of a portreeve, 12 burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen. In 1833, only 2 of the burgesses resided in the town, 7 resided near it, and 2 were Roman Catholics; and of a total of about 35 freemen, 12 were Roman Catholics, and 1 was a Protestant dissenter. All the real power of the corporation is wielded by Mr. Lambart, its patron; and even the right of sending two members to the Irish parliament was so entirely monopolized by his ancestors, that all the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union went into the private purse of the family. A civil court of record under the name of the Borough Court of Kilbeggan, is held by the portreeve, and is limited in jurisdiction by the charter to 5 marks. A court of petty-sessions is held by the county magistrates every Saturday. The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary, consisting of 8 men. There is no corporation property.

The name Kilbeggan is supposed by some antiquaries to have been derived from a cell, church, or Culdee-establishment of St. Beccan, a contemporary of St. Columba; but is regarded by others as more probably a corruption of Cil-beg-aun, "the church on the small stream." In 1200, the Anglo-Norman chieftain, D'Alton, Lord of Dungormon, founded here a Cistercian abbey, and peopled it with a colony of monks from the abbey of Mellifont. In the early part of the 17th century, the abbey lands were in the possession of Oliver Lambart, baron of Cavan; and eventually they, in common with the rest of the Kilbeggan and Emoebeg estates, passed to Michael Cromie, Esq., by his espousal of Lady Gertrude, the daughter and heiress of Ford Lambart, fifth earl of Cavan. The town was formerly the capital of the Macgeoghegan territory; and in its vicinity are numerous remains of ancient castles which belonged to the dynast family of Macgeoghegan, and to the subordinate toparch families of O'Maolbrenans, and O'Coffys. Close to the town, in June 1798, Col. Blake's regiment of Northumberland militia had a sharp engagement with a body of insurgents, defeated them, and made prisoner the rebel leader Macmanus, who was afterwards executed. Area of the town, 68 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1895; in 1841, 1,910. Houses 343. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 149; in manufactures and trade, 184; in other pursuits, 73. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 29; on the directing of labour, 168; on their own manual labour, 194; on means not specified, 15.

KILBEGNOT, a parish in the half-barony of Ballymoe, 6½ miles north of Ballinamore, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 10,867 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches,—of which 80 acres, 15 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,867; in 1841, 5,036. Houses 876. The surface extends along the river Suck, is of uninteresting character, and comprises a large aggregate of bog. The arable land is worth 38s. per plantation acre. The chief seats are Fairfield and Millford; and the villages and hamlets are Creggs, Tonamaddy, Derryhippo, Lisduff, Crosswell, Clifton, Moneen, East Moate, West Moate, Park, Gostnalaveg, Leaba, Camderry, Boggauns, Boleythomas, Tallyavanamrahert, Newtown, and Tallaghnahattana. Yet not one of these villages, except Creggs, contains 20 houses.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ATHLEAGUE [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £69 4s. 7½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Mr. Corr of Galway. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 5, and the Roman Catholics to 5,008; and 5 daily schools—one of which was aided with £10 a-year, and a house, from Mr. Dowell—had on their books 214 boys and 94 girls.

KILBEHENNY, or KILBENNY, a parish in the extreme south-east of the barony of Costlea, and co. of Limerick, Munster. It forms a small projecting wing of the county between co. Tipperary and co. Cork; and lies 4 miles east-north-east of Mitchells-town. Area, 15,376 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,507; in 1841, 4,291. Houses 684. The nascent Funcheon so circles round the parish as to trace the main part of the boundary with both co. Tipperary and co. Cork. The parochial surface consists, to a chief extent, of one of the grandest and most picturesque portions of the Galtee mountains. The Earl of Kingston's beautiful and romantic shooting-seat of Galtee-Lodge, is noticed under the word GALTEE: which see.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DUNTRILEAGUE [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £400. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,000 and 470. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 22, and the Roman Catholics to 3,631; and two hedge-schools had on their books 95 boys and 45 girls.

KILBELFAD, a parish in the barony of Tyrallowey, 4 miles south-west by south of Ballina, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 13,515 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches,—of which 5,846 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches are in Lough Conn, 407 acres, 2 roods, 35 perches are in Lough Cullen, and 161 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 3,801; in 1841, 3,681. Houses 621. The surface lies along nearly the whole of the east side of Loughs Conn and Cullen; and though looking out upon the picturesque scenery of these noble lakes, with the sublime Nephin for the immediate background, and though contributing of itself some fine features to so rich a landscape, it contains a large proportion of boggy, marshy, moorish, and waste high grounds. About a mile from Lough Conn is Mr. Jackson's demesne of Carromore; and within the lake are the islands of Annagh, Rinard, Doorish, Sandy, Cangmore, Glashy, Annaghroe, Annaghteigue, Crieve, Course, and Innislee.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILMORENOY [see that article], in the dio. of Killalla. Vicarial tithe composition, £90 3s. 2½d.; glebe, £21 12s. The rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Ballinahaglish, are compounded for £240 3s. 2d., and are inappropriate in the vicars choral of the two cathedrals of Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballinahaglish. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 90, and the Roman Catholics to 4,037; and 4 hedge-schools had on their books 195 boys and 39 girls. In 1840, a National school at Cloughans was salaried with £6 from the Board, and had on its books 87 boys and 36 girls.

KILBENNAN, or KILBANNAN, a parish in the barony of Dunmore, 2½ miles north-west by west of Tuam, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 7,655 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches,—of which 142 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches are water. Pop., in 1841, 2,844. Houses 474. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 2,849, and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 2,561. The surface comprises a considerable extent of bog; consists in the aggregate of second-rate land; has some diversities of contour, but little beauty of feature; is streaked and dappled by the stream and turloughs of the Clare river; and is traversed by the railroad from Ballinasloe to Westport. The chief residences are Fartamore, Castlegrove, Newborough, Pollacorane, and Clonkeely. The Clare at Fartamore-bridge has an elevation of 132 feet.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TUAM [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Vicarial tithe composition, £53 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £12. The rectorial tithes are of the same value as the vicarial, and are inappropriate in the vicars choral of Tuam cathedral. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 300 to 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilconla. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 34, and the Roman Catholics to 2,711; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 114 boys and 60 girls.

KILBENNY. See KILBEHENNY.

KILBERRY, a parish in the barony of West Narragh and Rheban, 2½ miles north by west of Athy, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 10,540 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,732; in 1841, 1,771. Houses 260. The surface lies on the left bank of the Barrow, and averages an annual value about 20s. per plantation acre. By far the larger part is pasturage; about 180 acres are meadow; a proportion of the pasturage is the surface of bogs; a considerable amount of turbary is in use for supplying the market of Athy; some moorish ground lies round the edges of the bogs; and the amount of tillage land is comparatively very small. The seats are Barrowford, a handsome and well-improved seat, on the Barrow, 1 mile from Athy; Belview, a well-improved seat, 1½ mile from Athy; Birt, a stately and noble residence, 2¼ miles from Athy; and Shrowlan and Geraldine, respectively 1½ mile and 2 miles from Athy. The antiquities are the ruins of an old church, and some remains of two old castles.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £120; glebe, £1 14s. Gross income, £121 14s.; nett, £68 15s. 10d. Patron, the dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £240, and are appropriated to the deanery of St. Patrick's. The church was built in 1836, at the cost of £1,200; of which £900 was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, and £300 was raised by subscription. Sittings 140; attendance 80. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 140, and the Roman Catholics to 1,666; a Sunday school had on its books 21 boys and 27 girls; and 3 daily schools—one of which was chiefly supported by Lord Downes—were usually attended by about 175 children.

KILBERRY, a parish in the barony of Morgallion, 3½ miles north of Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains the villages of Kilberry and WILKINSTOWN: see the latter. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 4,818 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,004; in 1841, 2,023. Houses 389. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,677. Houses 317. The land is, in general, very good; but some portions of bog occur at the extremities. The interior is traversed westward by the road from Slane to Kells, and northward by that from Dublin to Clones; and at the intersection of these is the poor village of Kilberry. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 128. Houses 26. Archdall says that there was a perpetual chantry of two chaplains in the parish-church of St. Mary of Kilberry.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DOXOUGH-PATRICK [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £335; glebe, £18 19s. 2½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Oristown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 2,057; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from Mr. C. Symth, and some advantages from Mr. Everard—had on their books 111 boys and 40 girls.

KILBIXY,—provincially KILBISKY,—a parish in the barony of Moygoish, 6½ miles north-west of Mullingar, co. Westmeath. It contains the village of BALLINACARGY: which see. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 6,493 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches,—of which 252 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches are in Lough Iron, and 51 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches are in the river Inny. Pop., in 1831, 2,279; in 1841, 2,246. Houses 372. Pop., of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,763. Houses 309. The surface extends between Lough Iron and the Royal Canal; and is traversed by the road from Dublin to Strokestown. Some of the land is very good; but by far the greater part is exceedingly light and very poor. The principal mansion is the splendid one of BARONSTOWN: which see. Another mansion of note is Tristernagh, the seat of Sir J. Piers, Bart., on the shore of Lough Iron. The ancient town of Kilbixy enjoyed borough privileges, was the seat of a baronial court, and made a considerable figure among the chief towns of old toparchies; but it has so completely disappeared that hardly a trace of it exists. About 1192, an hospital for lepers and a castle were built here by Sir Hugh de Lacy. The present church of Kilbixy, situated on the Baronstown estate, and within the view of Baronstown mansion, was built at the cost of £10,000, chiefly contributed by the late Lord Sunderlin, and is a very estimable specimen of the successful imitation in modern times of the florid style of pointed architecture.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Glebe, £18 15s. Gross income, £93 15s.; nett, £78 12s. 3d. Patron, debateably the diocesan or Sir J. Piers, Bart. The tithes are compounded for £110, and are wholly inappropriate in Sir J. Piers, Bart. The church was built in 1798. Sittings 300; attendance, from 90 to 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Templeoran. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 179, and the Roman Catholics to 2,142; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 from Mrs. O'Connor Malone, and one with £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £10 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, while both enjoyed some other advantages—had on their books 252 boys and 113 girls.

KILBOLANE, a parish, 5½ miles south-west by west of Charleville, and partly in the barony of Upper Connello, co. Limerick, but chiefly in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, Munster. The co. Cork section contains the village of MILLFORD: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Limerick section, 130 acres; of the Cork section, 9,885 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 4,155; of the Limerick section, 54; of the rural districts of the Cork section, 3,791. Houses in the whole, 632; in the Limerick section, 7; in the rural districts of the Cork section, 572. The Census of 1831 does not notice the Limerick section; and states the pop. of the Cork section at 4,106. The surface, though various in both contour and quality is all fit for dairy or tillage purposes; and it is drained southward by some head-rills of the river Awbeg. The castle of Kilbolane, now a ruin, is said to have been built by the Cogans shortly after the Anglo-Norman invasion; and it afterwards passed into the possession of the Earls of Desmond.—This parish is an inappropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of KNOCKTEMPLE [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. The tithes are compounded for £550, and are wholly inappropriate in the Earl of Cork, who pays a stipend of £6 3s. 1d. to the incumbent. The church was built in 1834, at the cost of £300, provided by the parish. Sittings 100; attendance, from 30 to 40. The Kilbolane and Sronepokeen Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance, of respectively 1,200 and 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Knocktemple, and a private house used as a chapel in Tullylease. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 95, and the Roman Catholics to 4,070; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 121 boys and 37 girls. In 1840, a boys' school and a girls' school at Kilbolane, were salaried with respectively £15 and £8 from the National Board, and had on their books 141 boys and 91 girls.

KILBONANE, a parish on the southern border of the barony of East Muskerry, 4½ miles north by west of Bandon, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,710 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,740; in 1841, 1,725. Houses 272. Some of the land is excellent, the greater part is pretty good, and some is of a boggy and indifferent quality. —This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £352 3s. 9d.; glebe, £9. Gross income, £361 3s. 9d.; nett, £342 5s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1834, at the cost of £150, contributed in moieties by the incumbent and by other subscribers. Sittings 80; attendance, about 40. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 53, and the Roman Catholics to 1,751.

KILBONANE, a parish on the northern border of the barony of Magonihy, 3 miles north-east by east of Milltown, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 8,668 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,305; in 1841, 3,666. Houses 609. The surface is bounded on the north by the river Maine; comprises a large aggregate of bog, and consists elsewhere of nearly equal parts of good and bad land; and is traversed southward by the east road from Tralee to Killarney.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of MOLAHIFFE [which see], in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £36 18s. 5d.; and the rectorial tithes are returned along with those of the other vicarages of the benefice, and are impropriate in Shea Lalor, Esq. A private house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 15. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Molahiffe and Kilcredane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 46, and the Roman Catholics to 3,375; 3 pay daily schools had on their books 55 boys and 17 girls; and a hedge-school made no returns.

KILBOY. See KILMORE, Upper Ormond, co. Tipperary.

KILBRACKEN, or BALLYBRACKEN, a parish in the barony of West Ophaly, 3½ miles south by east of Monastereven, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 3 miles; area, 3,057 acres, 38 perches,—of which 21 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches are in the river Barrow. Pop., in 1831, 1,284; in 1841, 1,365. Houses 221. Thirteen townlands formerly belonged to King's co.; and were transferred to co. Kildare by the Act 6 and 7 William IV. Pop. of these townlands, in 1841, 1,242. The surface consists in general of averagely good land; and is traversed southward by the road from Monastereven to Athy. The river Barrow traces the whole of the western boundary. The chief seats are Ashgrove, Riverstown, and Larch-hill.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, and gross income, £138 9s. 2½d.; nett, £130 16s. 0½d. Patron, the Marquis of Drogheda. The incumbent holds also the benefices of Monastereven, and Harristown, in the dio. of Kildare. The curate of Monastereven performs the occasional duties. There is neither church nor chapel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 57, and the Roman Catholics to 1,210; and a parochial daily school connected with the Kildare Place Society, had on its books 76 boys and 25 girls.

KILBRADRAN. See KILBRODERAN.

KILBRADY. See KILBRIDE, counties Meath and Cavan.

KILBRAGH, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 4 miles west by north of Fethard, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 1,100 acres. Pop., in 1831, 481; in 1841, 362. Houses 51. The yearly value of the land is about 30s. per plantation acre. The only noticeable residence is Lowesgreen.—This parish is a prebend and a rectory in the dio. of Cashel.

The prebend is sinecure, and without emolument; and is held by the incumbent of Templetuohy benefice, distant 15 miles. The rectory is part of the benefice of FETHARD: which see. Tithe composition, £90. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 489.

KILBREEDY or KILBRIDE, a parish on the seaboard of the barony of Tyrrawley, 7 miles north-north-west of Killalla, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 4,457½ acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,023; in 1841, 1,963. Houses 321. The surface consists to a large extent of moor and mountain; and is part of a dreary district stretching westward along the coast from Killalla bay. The coast includes the interesting promontory of DOWNPATRICK: which see.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DUNFEE [which see], in the dio. of Killalla. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £73 15s.; and the latter are appropriated to the dean and the precentor of Killalla cathedral. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 40, and the Roman Catholics to 2,130; and a hedge-school had on its books 30 boys and 4 girls.

KILBREEDY-MAJOR, a parish partly in the barony of Small County, but chiefly in that of Costlea, 2 miles west by south of Kilmallock, co. Limerick, Munster. Area of the Small County section, 21 acres; of the Costlea section, 3,363 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,136; in 1841, 1,409. Houses 207. Pop. of the Costlea section, in 1841, 1,387. Houses 205. The surface is washed by the nascent Maig, and traversed by the road from Kilmallock to Charleville.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Limerick, and forms part of the benefice of KILMALLOCK: which see. In 1834, the parishioners, with one exception, were all Roman Catholics.

KILBREEDY-MINOR, a parish in the barony of Coshma, 4 miles south-west by west of Bruff, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 2,110 acres. Pop., in 1831, 600; in 1841, 612. Houses 89. The surface is washed northward by the Maig, and consists of aggregately good and entirely profitable land.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £130; glebe, £36. Gross income, £166; nett, £156 16s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the office of surrogate of the consistorial court of Limerick. There is no church; and the vicar of Bruff receives a salary of £5 for performing the occasional duties. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

KILBRENNAN, a section or denomination of the parish of GRAYSTOWN: which see.

KILBREW, a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Ratoath; 4 miles north-east by east of Dunshaughlin, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 2,531 acres. Pop., in 1831, 351; in 1841, 275. Houses 42. The land is of prime quality, and has the reputation of being among the best in the county. The road from Dunshaughlin to Garristown passes through the interior. Kilbrew-house was formerly the residence of the Gorges, and is now the property of W. Murphy, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TRYVETT [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £179 10s.; glebe, £31. The church is a very old building; and in 1822, it was repaired, and a tower built, by means of a loan of £276 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, from 7 to 10. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 24, and the Roman Catholics to 337.

A private house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 20. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 32 Churchmen, 1,863 Presbyterians, 11 other Protestant dissenters, and 36 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 116 children; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 129 boys and 101 girls.

KILBRIDE, a parish in the barony of Newcastle, 2 miles west-south-west of Clondalkin, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, south-westward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 846 acres, 24 perches. Pop., in 1841, 63. Houses 9. Within the limits are Kilcarbery-House, Baldonnell-House, and the ruins of Kilbride-castle and church,—the last on a site of 293 feet of altitude above sea-level. On the eastern confines is a powder-mill.—This parish is a chapelry, and part of the benefice of CLONDALKIN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin.

KILBRIDE, a parish $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile west-north-west of Oldcastle, and partly in the barony of Demifore, co. Meath, Leinster, but chiefly in the barony of Clonmahon, co. Cavan, Ulster. The Cavan section contains the village of MOUNT-NUGENT: which see. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Meath section, 1,025 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches; of the Cavan section, 8,316 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches,—of which 564 acres, 31 perches are in Lough Sheelan. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,658; in 1841, 5,041. Houses 845. Pop. of the Meath section, in 1831, 292; in 1841, 294. Houses 44. Pop. of the rural districts of the Cavan section, in 1831, 4,195; in 1841, 4,585. Houses 777. The parish bears also the names of Castlecor and Kilbrady. The surface consists, in general, of very good land; and is traversed by the road from Dublin to Enniskillen. In the Meath section is Castlecor, the seat of W. Webb, Esq.; and in the Cavan section are Roebuck and Bobs-grove, the seats respectively of Mr. Lynch, and Mr. Nugent.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of OLDCASTLE [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £415 9s. 9d.; glebe, £33. The church was built in 1804, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 60 to 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killeagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 427, and the Roman Catholics to 4,077; and 6 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, £2 from the rector, and some advantages from Mr. Nugent—had on their books 223 boys and 155 girls.

KILBRIDE, a parish in the barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of New Ross, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile; area, 1,606 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 496; in 1841, 516. Houses 77. It contains the hamlets of Kilbride and Ballyfasy, and the ruins of an old church. The road from Innistogue to Waterford passes southward through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCOAN [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £45; and the latter are inappropriate in the Rev. John Digby and his heirs. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILBRIDE, a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Dunboyne, 4 miles south-east of Ratoath, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,096 acres. Pop., in 1831, 279; in 1841, 374. Houses 53. The surface consists of good arable and pasture land.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DUNBOYNE [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Both the vicarial and the rectorial tithes are returned with those of Dunboyne. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 27, and the Roman Catholics to 260; and a daily school, held in the Roman Catholic chapel, had on its books 14 boys and 15 girls.

KILBRIDE, a parish 5 miles north of Roscommon, and partly in the barony of Roscommon, but chiefly in that of South Ballintobber, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length and breadth, each 5 miles. Area of the barony of Roscommon section, 485 acres, 23 perches,—of which 4 acres, 13 perches are in Loughanrah. Area of the Ballintobber section, 18,802 acres, 18 perches,—of which 34 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 7,673; in 1841, 8,578. Houses 1,073. Pop. of the Ballintobber section, in 1831, 7,299; in 1841, 8,374. Houses 1,045. The surface comprises a considerable portion of bog, yet consists in the aggregate of good land. In the south are the seats of Durham and Hollywell; and in the east, is the seat of Drumduff. The hamlets are Newtown, Oldtown, Clogher, and Aghmanallaght; and there are three constabulary stations. The road from Roscommon to Tulsk passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ROSCOMMON [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £150 9s.; and the latter are inappropriate in Mr. Sandys. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 139, and the Roman Catholics to 7,951; and 8 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the London Hibernian Society, and £3 from the Elphin Diocesan Society—had on their books 326 boys and 121 girls.

KILBRIDE, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,801 acres. Pop., in 1831, 483; in 1841, 582. Houses 90. It contains the ruins of St. Bridget's church; and is impinged upon by the road from Waterford to Tramore, and lies near the head of Tramore bay.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate curacy, and forms part of the inappropriate benefice of ISLAND-ICANE [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had an attendance of 120 in summer, and from 50 to 70 in winter.

KILBRIDE, a parish in the barony of Scarewalsh $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by north of Ferns, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,473 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,100; in 1841, 1,054. Houses 170. The surface consists of good arable land; and is embellished with the demesnes of Ballymore and Rockspring. A wooded hill adjacent to the site of the ancient church, has an altitude of 796 feet; and bears on its side an antiquity called the Giant's Bed.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £203 1s. 6d. The rectory of Kilbride, and the vicarage of Ferns, constitute the benefice of Kilbride. See FERNS. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 5,132. Gross income, £520 9s. 11½d.; nett, £392 10s. 0½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church of the benefice is the cathedral of Ferns. The Kilbride Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 500. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 306 Churchmen, 10 Protestant dissenters, and 847 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 1,020 Churchmen, 24 Protestant dissenters, and 4,173 Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school in the parish was usually attended by about 40 children.

KILBRIDE, a parish in the barony of Arklow, 1½ mile north-north-west of the town of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 6,754 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,207; in 1841, 1,445. Houses 202. It extends along the left side of the river Ovoca to the sea; and is traversed by the road from Arklow to Rathdrum. The character of the surface may be seen by reference to the articles on ARKLOW. The arable land averages in annual value about £1 per plantation acre. The principal seats are Shelton Abbey, Woodmount, Templarney, Johnstown, Ballymoney, Sheepwalk, Kilbride, Seabank, Killiniskyduff, Snugborough, and Mount-Robert.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £184 12s. 3½d., and the rectorial for £15 13s. 10½d.; and the latter are impropriate in Messrs. Howell and Johnson. The vicarages of Kilbride and ENORELY, and the curacy of TEMPLEMICHAEL [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilbride. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3½. Pop., in 1831, 2,240. Gross income, £294 12s. 3½d.; nett, £251 9s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1830, at the private expense of the Earl of Wicklow, and cost about £1,000. Sittings 350; attendance, from 300 to 400. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Templemichael. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 510, and the Roman Catholics to 716; the Protestants of the union to 795, and the Roman Catholics to 1,518; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 100 children; and 5 daily schools in the union—4 of which were in the parish—had on their books 129 boys and 82 girls. One of the 4 Kilbride schools was supported wholly, and another chiefly, by Lady Wicklow; one was salaried with £20 and other advantages from Lord Wicklow; and the other was aided with £5 a-year from subscription.

KILBRIDE, a parish on the north border of the barony of Lower Talbotstown, and of the co. of Wicklow, 3 miles north-east of Blessington, Leinster. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 2; area, 11,641 acres, 2 roods, 27 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,207; in 1841, 1,256. Houses 422. The whole surface is characteristically mountainous, but is variegated by glens, bogs, and expanses of naked granite, arable fields, some villa-grounds, and the improvements around Kippure-Lodge, the seat of George Moore, Esq. The chief heights are Mount Butter, Dowry, and Seefingan,—respectively 1,459, 1,000, and 2,364 feet in altitude; and the chief streams are the young Liffey and, its tributary, the Brittas.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BLESSINGTON [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £40 10s. 5d.; a portion of the rectorial tithes, compounded for £22 0s. 2d., is impropriate in Lieut-Col. Luke Allen; and the remainder of the rectorial tithes are compounded for £39 18s. 5d., and are appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's cathedral. The church was built in 1833, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance not reported. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 270; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to a chapel in Rathmore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 51, and the Roman Catholics to 1,211; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 45 boys and 46 girls.

KILBRIDE, co. Mayo. See KILBREEDY.

KILBRIDE BAY. See COURTOWN.

KILBRIDE-GLINN, a parish in the barony of West Shelmalier, 2½ miles north-east of Taghmon, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 4,109 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches. Pop., in 1831, 648; in 1841, 826. Houses 148. The land of the northern and central districts is in general good; and nowhere has a higher elevation than 215 feet. The surface of the southern district is part of the Forth Mountain, and includes the Raven Rock and Carrickfoyle rock—the latter 687 feet in altitude.—This parish is nominally an impropriate curacy, but practically a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns; and forms part of the benefice of KILLURIN: which see. Tithe composition, £103 5s. 6½d. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 38 Churchmen, 4 Protestant dissenters, and 618 Roman Catholics, and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILBRIDE-LANGAN, a parish in the barony of Kilcoursey, King's co., Leinster. It contains the town of CLARA, and the village of CHARLESTOWN: which see. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 7,617 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,337; in 1841, 4,581. Houses 801. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,955; in 1841, 3,224. Houses 555. Part of the land is good; but considerably the greater part is inferior or bad. The river Brosna effects the drainage westward. The principal seats are Kilcoursey, Clara, Charlestown, Ashmount, Ballyboughlin, Woodfield, and Sallybrook.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of both the benefice of ARDNURCHEN and the perpetual curacy of CLARA [see these articles], in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £76 3s. 0½d., and the rectorial for £152 6s. 1½d., and the latter are impropriate in the Marquis of Downshire. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 230 Churchmen, 28 Protestant dissenters, and 4,193 Roman Catholics; and 8 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, £7 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, £4 4s. from subscription, and aided with other advantages—were attended by about 273 children.

KILBRIDE-PILATE, or PACE-KILBRIDE, a parish in the barony of Fartullagh, 4½ miles west by north of Kinnegad, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It contains the village of MILLTOWN: which see. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 4,031 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches,—of which 21 acres, 12 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 923; in 1841, 914. Houses 166. The surface consists, for the most part, of second-rate tillage land. Within the parish is the demesne of Gaulstown, the residence of Lord Kilmain. Sir John Brown of the Neale, in co. Mayo, was created Baron Kilmain in 1789, purchased the estate of Gaulstown from the Earl of Belvedere, and built the present mansion on the site of an ancient structure which belonged to the Chief Baron Rochfort, and is noticed by Swift. The hamlet of Kilbride, usually called Pass-of-Kilbride, is situated on the east border of the parish, and was the site of a castle of the Tyrrels, which, in 1651, made an obstinate resistance, but eventually surrendered to the parliamentary forces under Colonel Hewson. In the neighbourhood are some church ruins, and a moat or dun.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ENNISCORREY [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £100; glebe, £14 8s. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 400 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the Chapel of Clonfadforan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 900.

KILBRIDE-TULLAMORE, a parish, containing the town of Tullamore, in the barony of Ballycowen, King's co., Leinster. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 3; area, 10,152 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches. Pop., in 1831, 9,673; in 1841, 9,608. Houses 1,641. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,331; in 1841, 3,265. Houses 580. The Ecclesiastical Authorities state the area at 6,262 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches, and the pop., in 1831, at 7,626. The land adjacent to Tullamore consists of highly-manured town-parks, and is of good quality; and the remainder is second-rate in quality, and includes some boggy ground. A small portion is occupied and beautified with a section of the noble demesne of CHARLEVILLE [which see]; and other parts borrow some ornament from the residences of Springfield and Silver-Brook. Within the limits are ruins of no fewer than 6 old castles. The Grand Canal and the Silver and Clodagh rivers pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £139 0s. 8d.; glebe, £9. Gross income, £148 0s. 8d.; nett, £117 6s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. Though the benefice is called a rectory, one-half of the tithes, compounded for the same sum as those belonging to the incumbent, are inappropriate in the Earl of Norbury. A curate has a salary of £70. The church was built in 1820, at the cost of £8,030 15s. 4½d; of which £738 9s. 2½d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £2,769 4s. 7½d. was lent by that Board, and £4,523 1s. 6d. was a donation from the Earl of Charleville. Sittings 800; attendance, from 350 to 500. The Market House is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of from 150 to 200. The Quakers' Meeting-house is attended by from 20 to 30; the Wesleyan Meeting-house, by from 150 to 200; the Primitive Wesleyan, by from 50 to 150; and the Roman Catholic chapel, by 2,000;—and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the last is united to the Roman Catholic chapel of Durrow. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,236 Churchmen, 10 Protestant dissenters, and 6,415 Roman Catholics; and 20 daily schools had on their books 737 boys and 669 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £30, and other advantages, from Lady Charleville; one with £12, and other advantages, from a committee of ladies, under Lady Charleville's patronage; one, with £30 from local subscription; one, with £16 from the Baptist Society; one was connected with the National Board; and three were boarding as well as day schools.

KILBRIDE-VESTON, or KILBRIDE-VASTY, a parish in the barony of Fartullagh, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-north-east of Tyrrel's Pass, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 1,980 acres, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, 574; in 1841, 645. Houses 103. The surface adjoins the west end of Kilbride-Pilate; and is adorned with the residences of Kilbride, Whitewell, Frenchgrove, and Dunbodan Park.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £26 3s. 3½d.; nett, £24 16s. 11½d. Patrons, the representatives of Sir Duke Giffard. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £52 6s. 8d., and are inappropriate in the patrons. There is no church; the vicar is non-resident; and the Protestants attend the churches of Moliskar and Castle-Loat. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 50, and the Roman Catholics to 577.

KILBRIN, a parish in the barony of Duhallow, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Mallow, co. Cork, Munster.

Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 12,631 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,292; in 1841, 4,855. Houses 706. The land is in general tolerably good; and though various in surface, is nowhere mountainous. Castletcor, the principal mansion of the parish, and the seat of Mr. Freeman, is an edifice of hewn stone, turreted at the angles; and in its vicinity once stood an ancient fortified castle of the Barrys.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Cloyne. Vicarial tithe composition, £420; glebe, £10. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £30, and are inappropriate. The vicarages of Kilbrin and LISCARROL [which see], constitute the benefice of Kilbrin. Pop., in 1831, 6,338. Gross income, £557; nett, £524 15s. 6d. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Subalter, in the dio. of Cloyne. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built about the year 1790, by means of a gift of £520 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; attendance, from 30 to 40. The Roman Catholic chapel of Kilbrin has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the Chapel of Ballyclough. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Liscarrol. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 53, and the Roman Catholics to 4,398; the Protestants of the union to 83, and the Roman Catholics to 6,498; 3 daily schools in the parish—one of which was aided with £20 a-year, and other advantages, from Mr. Freeman, and about £1 from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 58 boys and 14 girls; and 6 daily schools in the union had 216 boys and 58 girls.

KILBRINE, or KILBRYAN, a parish in the barony of Boyle, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east by south of the town of Boyle, co. Rosecommon, Connaught. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 3,852 acres, 20 perches,—of which 974 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are in Lough Key, 6 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches are in the river Boyle, 31 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches are in small lakes, and 22 acres, 7 perches form a detached district. Pop., in 1831, 1,349; in 1841, 1,114. Houses 194. The surface lies both north and south of Lough Key, and includes a large proportion of that beautiful lake's waters, islands, and shores. But all the chief features of interest will be found noticed in the articles KEY, TRINITY-ISLAND, CASTLE-ISLAND, INCHMACNERIN, and ROCKINGHAM: which see.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Ardcarne, in the dio. of Elphin. See ARDCARNE. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £14 2s., and the rectorial for £14 10s.; and the latter are inappropriate in Mr. Plunket. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 97, and the Roman Catholics to 1,333; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £14 and other advantages, from Lord Lortin—had on their books 55 boys and 51 girls.

KILBRITAIN, or KILBRITTON, a parish $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Bandon, and on the eastern border of the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Length, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles; breadth, 1; area, 4,751 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,607; in 1841, 1,652. Houses 265. The surface extends so far southward as nearly to be washed by Courtmacsherry bay; and consists for the most part of a light and hilly soil, suited more to pasturage than to tillage. The district was formerly included in the barony of Courceys, and afterwards became a distinct cantred. The castle of Kilbritain, originally a seat of the Lords Courcey, and subsequently the property of MacCarty Reagh, was a stately building, environed with a large bawn, fortified with six turrets on the walls. Jonas Stawell, Esq., the ancestor of the present proprietor S. Stawell, Esq., pulled down the castle about a century ago, and erected on its site the large modern mansion, Kilbrittain-house, which crowns an eminence between greater hills, and almost immediately overlooks a creek or arm of Courtmacsherry bay. A privilege of fairs and markets, granted by several patents, has been transferred to the neighbouring village of Kilbrittain; and one fair held there on Nov. 22, is said to be remarkable for the sale of turkeys.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £410; glebe, £5. Gross income, £415; nett, £340 3s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. A school-house is used as the parochial place of worship; and has an attendance of 26. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 29, and the Roman Catholics to 1,583.

KILBRITAIN, or KILBRITTON, a village in the parish of Rathclarin, eastern division of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 288. Houses 43.

KILBRODERAN, a parish partly in the barony of Lower Connello, but chiefly in that of Shanid, 5 miles north-west by west of Rathkenale, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1; area of the Connello section, 117 acres; of the Shanid section, 2,784 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 829; in 1841, 869. Houses 130. Pop. of the Shanid section, in 1841, 858. Houses 129. The surface consists, for the most part, of good land; and is traversed southward by the road from Askeaton to Newcastle.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £220; glebe, £5 6s. 8d. Gross income, £225 6s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Castlane, or Whitechurch, in the dio. of Ossory. There is no church; and the vicar of Shanagolden performs the occasional duties for a salary of £5. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 24 boys and 14 girls.

KILBROGAN, a parish in the barony of Kinalmeaky, co. Cork, Munster. It contains part of the borough of BANDON: which see. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 7,578 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,711; in 1841, 5,404. Houses 851. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,584; in 1841, 2,358. Houses 361. The surface extends along the north side of the Bandon river; and is in the aggregate pleasingly varied; but consists, for the most part, of poor or indifferent land.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £650; glebe, £64. The rectory of Kilbrogan, and a sinecure part of the rectory of Aglish, constitute the benefice of Kilbrogan, and the corps of Kilbrogan prebend. Gross income, £758 2s.; nett, £589 0s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates have each a salary of £75. The church was built in 1625, at an unknown cost, and enlarged in 1829, by means of a loan of £200 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 800; attendance 900. A chapel-of-ease has an attendance of 80. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballymoodan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,477 Churchmen, 14 Presbyterians, and 4,008 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 220 children; and 12 daily schools had on their books 288 boys and 638 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one, with £40 from that Board; one, with £31 from Mr. Henry Cornwall; one, with £10 from the Duke of Devonshire, and £10 from the rector; one, with £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £27 from the rector; one, with £30 from the Duke of Devonshire, and about £25 from subscription; one, with £12 12s. from Mr. Cornwall; and one, with £20 from subscription; and two of the remaining were classical schools, and the other two ladies' schools.

KILBRONEY, a parish in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, Munster. Post town, Buttevant. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,876 acres. Pop., in 1831, 696; in 1841, 788. Houses 122. The surface consists of middle-rate pasture and tillage land.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BUTTEVANT [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £64 4s., and the rectorial for £128 8s.; and the latter are impropriate in Edmond G. Barry, Esq. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILBRONEY, a parish in the southern border of the barony of Upper Iveagh, and of co. Down, Ulster. It contains the beautiful village of ROSTREVOR: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4; area, 13,208 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,257; in 1841, 4,540. Houses 831. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,261; in 1841, 3,857. Houses 713. The surface includes a large part of the north shore of Carlingford bay, and a portion of the southern declivities of the Mourne Mountains. The landscapes strictly within the parish are exquisitely beautiful, and those commanded by its vantage-grounds, especially by Cloughmore, are among the most brilliant and extensive in Ireland. The chief features of interest will be found noticed in the articles CLOUGHMORE, GREENCASTLE, ROSTREVOR, MOURNE, and CARLINGFORD BAY. The summit of Slieve-Bane, 1½ mile east of Rostrevor, has an altitude of 1,595 feet above sea-level. "The town and land immediately adjacent to Rostrevor," says Mr. Fraser, "are part of the estate of David Ross, Esq., whose seat (the Lodge) is distinguished from the smaller villas by the extent of its grounds and plantations. Roads run around and penetrate the mountain glens in various directions; and on that leading to Castlewellsan and Rathfriland by the village of Hilltown, at a mile from Rostrevor, are the ruins of the church of Kilbroney, and a bleaching-mill of considerable extent." "As we proceed from Rostrevor to Kilkeel, we pass along the base of Slieve-Bane, and under the detached rock of Cloughmore, from whence a view of the splendid surrounding scenery is obtained. We keep the Woodhouse and Killowen Point on our left, and at 3 miles on the right pass the small straggling hamlet of Ballyneddan, near which is the beautifully situated villa of Ballyedmond."—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dromore. Vicarial tithe composition, £51 15s. 6d.; glebe, £15 10s. Gross income, £122 13s. 6d.; nett, £102 17s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £103 11s., and are appropriated to the see of Dromore. A curate has a salary of £75 from the voluntary subscriptions of the Protestant parishioners. The church was built in 1819, at the cost of £1,846 3s. 1d.; of which £1,015 7s. 8½d. was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, £92 6s. 1½d. was gifted by that Board, and £738 9s. 3d. was raised by subscription. Sittings 400; attendance 300. The Rostrevor and Killowen Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 800 and 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 650 Churchmen, 192 Presbyterians, and 3,545 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools had on their books 343 boys and 245 girls. Two of the schools were salaried each with £8 from their patrons, and £20 from subscription; one, with £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £13 6s. from subscription and public collection; one, with £5 from the Roman Catholic clergyman; one, with £20 from Mrs. Balfour; one, with £12 from subscription; and one, with £13 16s. 11d. from Mrs. Ross, and £13 from subscription and public collection. In 1840, three National schools at Rosstrevor and Killowen were aggregately salaried with £24, and had on their books 233 boys and 310 girls.

KILBROWNEY. See KILBRONEY, co. Cork.

KILBRYAN. See KILBRINE.

KILBRYNE, a quondam parish and a rivulet, on the east border of the barony of Upperthird, co. Waterford, Munster. The ruins of the old church stand on the banks of the rivulet, 8 miles from Waterford. The rivulet has a north-north-easterly course of about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the Suir, a little below the mouth of the Clodagh, and may be regarded as tracing the eastern boundary of the Marquis of Waterford's extensive and magnificent demesne of Curraghmore.

KILBURNE, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 4 miles south-west of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. Length and breadth, each $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile; area, 3,514 acres, 3 roods, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, 881; in 1841, 905. Houses 131. It contains the seats of Butlerstown-Castle, Butlerstown-house, and Evergreen-cottage.—This parish is a rectory of two parts or sections in the dio. of Waterford. The larger section of it, comprising an area of 3,303 acres, and containing, in 1831, a pop. of 736, forms part of the benefice of Trinity, and corps of the deanery of Waterford cathedral. See TRINITY. Tithe composition, £121. The smaller section is part of the corps of the precentorship of Waterford cathedral; and is held by the dean of Ossory, who resides in Kilkenny. In 1834, all the inhabitants of both sections were Roman Catholics; and a daily school was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and had on its books 86 boys and 42 girls.

KILCAR, KILCARR, or KILCHAN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the southern border of the barony of Bannagh, 5 miles west by south of Killybegs, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length and breadth, each $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; area, 18,883 acre, 1 rood, 17 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,319; in 1841, 4,960. Houses 811. Area of the village, 15 acres. Pop., in 1841, 303. Houses 45. The parochial surface is a wild part of the north seaboard of Donegal bay; it is bounded on the west by Tillen Harbour [see TILLEN], and overhung by the stupendous mountain-mass of Slievelong; and it prevalingly consists of mountainous, boggy, and rough arable and pasture land. "St. Carthach," says Archdall, "was bishop of Killen, now called Kilchartaich, about the year 540; this church was situated in Turbogaine, a territory in Tyrconnel, and is supposed to be Kilcarr."—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £125; glebe, £186 13s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Gross income, £311 13s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £276 9s. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1828, by means of a gift of £830 15s. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 55. The Roman Catholic chapel was built about 10 years ago. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 202, and the Roman Catholics to 4,298; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Fund—had on their books 96 boys and 72 girls. The Kilcar and Killybegs dispensary is within the Glenties Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 34,466 acres, with a pop. of 8,606; and, in 1839-40, it expended £73 1s. 3d., and administered to 2,204 patients.

KILCARAGH. See KILCARRAGH.

KILCARN, a parish in the barony of Skreen, 3 miles south-south-east of Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile; breadth, 1; area, 2,337 acres. Pop., in 1831, 546; in 1841, 600. Houses 94. The surface lies along the east side of the Boyne, and consists of pretty good land. The road from Dublin to Enniskillen passes through the interior; and has on the left hand extensive flour-mills, and on the right Kilcarn-lodge, the seat of William Dillon, Esq.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of SKREEN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The tithes are compounded for £120, and are wholly impropriate in Charles Barry, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 18, and the Roman Catholics to 545; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILCARR. See KILCAR.

KILCARRA, co. Wicklow. See GLENART.

KILCARRAGH, a parish on the north border of the barony of Gualtier, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. Length and breadth, each half-a-mile; area, 652 acres. Pop., in 1831, 142; in 1841, 170. Houses 28. It lies on the river Suir, and on the road from Waterford to Passage.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TRINITY [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. Tithe composition, £30 2s.; glebe, £20. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILCARRAGH, a parish in the barony of Clannaurice, 6 miles south-west of Listowel, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the village of BALLINAGERAGH and part of LIXNAW: see these articles. Length and breadth each 4 miles; area, 2,911 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,109; in 1841, 1,250. Houses 200. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 482; in 1841, 964. Houses 149. The surface is washed by the rivulet Brick, and traversed by the road from Listowel to Ardfert; and it contains about 1,000 acres of coarse pasture, but elsewhere prevalingly consists of good land.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe; and forms part of the benefice of Duagh, or rather is appropriated to the vicarage of Duagh, distant 5 miles. See DUAGH. Tithe composition, £96 18s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £42. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was no school.

KILCARRICK, a village in the parish of Dunleckny, barony of East Idrone, co. Carlow, Leinster. It stands on the left bank of the Barrow, and on the east road from Carlow to Goresbridge, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-east of Leighlin-bridge.

KILCASEY. See KILKEASY.

KILCASH, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of East Iffa and Offa, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Carrick-on-Suir, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,753 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,333; in 1841, 1,260. Houses 209. Area of the village, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 138. Houses 28. The parochial surface consists of hilly and indifferent land, is overhung on the north-west by Slievenamann, is drained by the rivulet which falls into the Suir at Carrick-on-Suir, and is traversed by the mail-road from Clonmel to Dublin. The antiquities are the ruins of a church and of a castle. A fair is held on Aug. 5.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £67 14s. 2d., and the rectorial for £46 3s. 1d.; and the latter are impropriate in the Marquis of Ormonde. The vicarages of Kilcash, KILOLOAN, KILGRANT, and TEMPLE-ETNY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilcash. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 5,106. Gross income, £289 11s. 0½d.; nett, £251 1s. 0½d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Rathgraff and the chaplaincy of Wilson's hospital in co. Westmeath; and is non-resident in Kilcash benefice. A curate has a salary of £75. The church of the benefice is in Killoloon. The Roman Catholic chapel of Kilcash has an attendance of from 1,500 to 1,700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilsheelan and Kilgrant. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish were all Roman Catholics; the Protestants of the union amounted to 66, and the Roman Catholics to 5,299; 2 National schools in the parish were salaried with £10 each from the Board, and had on their books 86 boys and 76 girls; and 6 daily schools in the union had on their books 344 boys and 196 girls.

KILCASHEL, a quondam parish on the west border of the barony of Arklow, 3 miles south of Rathdrum, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It lies on the river Ovoca, and on the road from Rathdrum to Arklow; and includes the metalliferous mountains of the Ballymurtagh mining-field.

KILCASHEL AND THOMASTOWN, a continuous bog of two denominations, in the barony of Moycarne, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It lies from 3 to 6 miles east of Ballinasloe; and has an area of 4,778 acres. It occupies a watershed and tableland; is completely surrounded by limestone hills; and is drained off in all directions by no fewer than 8 final rills, 4 of which trot off through little defiles among the hills, while the other 4 dive into subterranean channels at a short distance from the edge of the bog. The average depth of the bog is only 15 feet; the superficial extent of red heath bog is 4,163 acres, the remainder being black bog; and manuring gravel may everywhere either be raised from the bottom of the bog, or dispersed from numerous gravel hillocks with which the bog may be described as studded. Estimated cost of reclamation, £6,284 8s.

KILCASKIN, a parish partly in the barony of Glanerought, co. Kerry, but chiefly in the barony of Bere, co. Cork, 8½ miles north-east by east of Castletown-Berehaven, Munster. Length, 16 miles; breadth, 8. Area of the Kerry section, 16,386 acres; of the Cork section, 35,105 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 6,780; of the Cork section, 5,401. Houses in the whole, 1,128; in the Cork section, 920. The Census of 1831 notices only the Cork section, and states its pop. at 4,600. It comprises a large portion of the north-west shores and screens of Bantry bay, from the margin of the bay up to the alpine watershed with co. Kerry; it includes the mountains of ESK, GHOUL, and HUNGRY [see these articles]; it boasts a large participation of the picturesque magnificence of both the bay of Bantry and the lagoon of Glengarriff [see BANTRY and GLENGARRIFF]; and it may be summarily described as consisting, in an economical view, of two-thirds of moor and mountain, and one-third of intermediate patches of pasture-ground and rich arable land.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ross. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £190; nett, £130 6s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £190, and are appropriated to the archdeaconry of Ross. The church was built in 1810, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 15. The Roman Catholic chapels of Kilcaskin and Glengarriff have an attendance of respectively 700 and 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Bonane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 73, and the Roman Catholics to 4,682; and 8 pay daily schools had on their books 339 boys and 92 girls.

KILCATERN, KILCATEERN, or KILCATHIRINE, a parish in the barony of Bere, 4 miles north-north-west of Castletown-Berehaven, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the villages of CAHERKEEN, COULAGH, and EYERIES: see these articles. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 21,778 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,043; in 1841, 6,940. Houses 1,220. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 6,128. Houses 1,082. The surface lies along Coulagh or Quilogh bay and the Kenmare estuary, and forms a conspicuous part of the wild and mountainous peninsula which separates the Kenmare estuary from Bantry bay. About one-fifth of the whole area is arable ground; and all the remainder is bog or chiefly wild mountain. A chief object of interest is the mineral-field of ALLIHIES: which see.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Berehaven or Killaconenagh, in the dio. of Ross. See KILLACONENAGH, Vicarial tithe composition, £128 6s. 1½d.; glebe, £6 8s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £65, and are inappropriate. A place of meeting at the Allihies copper mines, is occasionally used as a parochial place of worship. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 3,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 2, and the Roman Catholics to 6,268; and 7 hedge-schools had on their books 354 boys and 79 girls.

KILCAVAN, or KILKEVAN, a parish on the north-west border of the barony of Bargie, 3½ mile north-east of Clonmines, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 1 mile; area, 3,205 acres. Pop., in 1831, 695; in 1841, 768. Houses 124. The land is of good quality. The highest ground occurs a little north of the centre, and has an altitude of 208 feet above sea-level. The seats are Ballongton, and Harristown; and the only other object of prominent interest is a dispensary.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £144 13s. 3½d.; glebe, £1. The rectory of Kilcavan, and the vicarage of BANNOW [see that article] constitute the benefice of Kilcavan. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1. Pop., in 1831, 2,880. Gross income, £305 4s. 7½d.; nett, £273 14s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1822, by means of a loan of £125 10s. 9½d., and a gift of £461 10s. 9½d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 160; attendance 110. The Kilcavan and Bannow Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 320 and 1,800. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 691; the Protestants of the union to 127, and the Roman Catholics to 2,711; a Sunday school in Kilcavan was attended by about 7 children; and 6 daily schools in Bannow had on their books 147 boys and 65 girls.

KILCAVAN, baronies of Gorey and Ballaghkeen. See KILKEVAN.

KILCHAR. See KILCAR.

KILCHRIST, a parish on the east border of the barony of Clonderalaw, 3 miles north-north-east of Kildyart, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the village of BALLINACALLY: which see. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 7,061 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,569; in 1841, 2,974. Houses 463. The surface forms the central part of the western sea-board of the estuary of the Fergus; consists of variously good and indifferent land, and blends with the adjacent lands and waters in producing a superb landscape. A height toward the west has an altitude of 559 feet. The village of Fort Fergus, Cornfield, Cloonakilla, and Paradise, the last the seat of Thomas Arthur, Esq., occupy beautiful sites on the east border of the parish, and command charming views of the aqueous expanse and the large fertile islands of the Fergus. The parochial area includes 444 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches of islands,—the chief of which is Deer Island; and it includes also 1 acre, 1 rood, 24 perches of tide-way in the Owenslieve river on the north border. The antiquities are the ruins of two churches and of Dangan Castle. The road from Kildysart to Ennis passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILDYSART [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £105, and the rectorial for £147 13s. 10½d.; and of the latter, the proportion of £64 12s. 3½d. is inappropriate in Bindon Scott, Esq., and that of £83 1s. 6½d. in J. Studdart, Esq., as lessee of the Earl of Egremont. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 36, and the Roman Catholics to 2,722; and 4 hedge-schools had on their books 140 boys and 102 girls. In 1839, the National Board granted £126 toward the erection of a boys' school and a girls' school at Ballinaculla.

KILCHRIST, a parish 3½ miles south-west by west of Loughrea, and in the baronies of Loughrea and Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. The Dunkellin section contains the village of Kilchrist. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Loughrea section, 2,040 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches; of the Dunkellin section, 1,378 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,703; in 1841, 1,579. Houses 268. Pop. of the Loughrea section, in 1841, 793. Houses 129. The surface of the southern district lies upon a comparatively lofty basis; and even that of the northern district lies so high as to shake down head-waters of the Gortnamackin river; yet very nearly the whole is profitable either as pasture-ground or as tillage-land, and is warmed and ornamented with a very large aggregate of wood. Ashfield-house is in the north; the hamlet of Calluregh is in the south; two old ruined castles are in the north and east; and the road from Loughrea to Gort passes through the interior. The village of Kilchrist stands at the intersection of that road with a wild cross-road from the mountain village of Toormacnevin to the town of Athenry. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 426. Houses 74.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILLENANE [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £66; glebe, £6. A portion of the tithes, compounded for £19, is appropriated to the see of Kilmacduagh; and another portion, compounded for £3, is inappropriate in the vicars choral of Christchurch, Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 400 to 500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 155, and the Roman Catholics to 1,670; and 3 daily schools—2 of which were salaried by the London Hibernian Society, and one of these two aided with £2 a-year from the rector—had on their books 105 boys and 62 girls.

KILCLEAGH, a parish in the barony of Clonlunan, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It contains the greater part of the town of MOATE: which see. Length, nearly 7 miles; breadth, from 1½ to 2½ miles; area, 15,264 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches,—of which 22½ acres are in the river Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 6,152; in 1841, 6,444. Houses 1,063. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,748; in 1841, 5,154. Houses 833. The surface is gently yet pleasingly varied, presents a well-cultivated and ornate appearance; consists for the most part of good land; and boasts about as many demonstrations of the snugness of its population as any district of equal extent in the centre of Ireland. Moate-castle, the seat of Cuthbert John Clibborn, Esq., adjoins the town of Moate; and several mansions and villas, as Castle-Daly, Hall-house, Boggaghmalone, Ballinamadda, Tubrit, Fardrum, and Riverpark, adorn other parts of the parish. The chief heights are Knockaned in the west, Brackagh in the south, and the site of the church in the east, whose respective altitudes are 304, 270, and 202 feet. Only a small wing touches the Shannon. The principal antiquities are ruins of old castles. The mail-road from Dublin to Galway and Westport passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £278 7s. 8d.; glebe, £101 5s. Gross income, £379 12s. 8d.; nett, £325 3s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The benefice, though called a vicarage, is endowed with the rectorial tithes. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was enlarged in 1817, by means of a loan of £791 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance 250. The Quakers' meeting-house has an attendance of about 40. The Moate and the Boggagh Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively from 750 to 800, and from 600 to 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. The Roman Catholic chapel of Ballinahown has an attendance of from 800 to 900, and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Lemonaghan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 646 Churchmen, 23 other Protestant Dissenters, and 5,605 Roman Catholics; and 11 daily schools—2 of which were in connection with the National Board, and 2 with the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 237 boys and 228 girls.

KILCLEEHEEN. See KILCULLINEEN.

KILCLIEF, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the east border of the barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. Length and breadth, each 2½ miles; area, 2,424 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,113; in 1841, 1,121. Houses 211. The surface lies along the west side of the entrance, or lower part of the channel, of Lough Strangford; and almost everywhere consists of good arable land. The village stands on the shore, 1½ mile north by west of Killard Point, and 2 miles south of Strangford. Pop., in 1831, 351. Adjoining the village stands Kilclief Castle, an Anglo-Irish military keep of the early part of the 14th century, in a state of fine preservation, and of a considerable size and height. Its general form is nearly a square, with the addition of two quadrangular wings in front, in the one of which is a staircase, and in the other a stack of closets: the first floor is vaulted, and the second has a stone chimney-piece, on which is carved the figure of a bird resembling a hawk. This castle, and a fine circumjacent demesne of some of the richest land in the barony, were an ancient see-house and manor of the bishops of Down. John Cely or Sely, the last bishop of Down, previous to the annexation of that see to Connor, lived here in open and infamous sin with a married woman, and seems to have plotted here various "treasons, transgressions, and other crimes," for which he was indicted, outlawed, and pardoned; but he was eventually, though not without difficulty, unmitred and unfrocked. The original church of Kilclief is alleged by monastic dreamers to have been the chapel of an abbey of regular canons, founded by St. Patrick, and presided over by two of his disciples, who were brothers, and named Eugenius and Neill. Old writers say also that, in a subsequent age, an hospital was founded here for lepers.—This parish was formerly a perpetual curacy, and part of the corps of the archdeaconry of Down, but, since 1834, has been a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. The order in Council which changed its status, politically and ecclesiastically separated from the parish its 5 detached townlands of Rincreach, Carradrossex, Commonreagh, Ross, and Rossaglass, and united to it the townlands of Upper and Lower Killard, formerly belonging to the parish of Ballyculter, and the townland of Ballywoodan, formerly belonging to the parish of Saul. Tithe composition, £217 8s. 4½d.; glebe, £20. Gross income, £237 8s. 4½d.; nett, £221 7s. 5½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built a year or two ago, by means of a contribution of £435 6s. 7d. from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £70 13s. 5d. from private parties. Sittings 100; attendance, from 35 to 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 550. The pop., in 1831, of the townlands which have constituted the parish since the change in 1834, was 1,236. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 147 Churchmen, 9 Presbyterians, and 1,046 Roman Catholics; and a daily school was aided with £2 a-year from the rector, and had on its books 50 boys and 40 girls.

KILCLISPEEN, a very ancient burying-ground, in the parish of St. Nicholas, of Carrick-on-Suir, barony of East Iffa and Offa, co. Tipperary, Munster. It is situated near the high road, and has two ancient circular-headed stone-crosses, and the stump of a third, each composed of a single block of white sandstone, and exhibiting traces of elegant and curious carving. An absurd legendary tradition prevails in the district respecting the origin of these crosses. In the vicinity is the hill of Carrick-a-duoul, or the Devil's Rock, which commands a charming view of the vale of the Suir, and of the rich and far-extending valley of the Suir, from above Clonmel all the way to Waterford.

KILCLOAN, KILCLONE, or KILCLOON, a parish on the east border of the barony of Upper Deece, co. Meath, Leinster. It is situated 4 miles north-east of Kilcock. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,717 acres. Pop., in 1831, 321; in 1841, 267. Houses 42. One moiety of the land is good; and the other moiety is middle-rate.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RADDONSTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £110 15s. 4½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 420; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Raddonstown and Butterstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 5, and the Roman Catholics to 228; and a daily school was salaried with £4 from General Vandeleur, and had on its books 50 boys and 17 girls.

KILCLOGHAN. See TEMPLETOWN.

KILCLOGHER. See CLOGHER, co. Louth.

KILCLONAGH, a parish in the barony of Eliogurty, 4 miles south-east by south of Templemore, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, ¾ of a mile; breadth, ¼; area, 759 acres. Pop., in 1831, 195; in 1841, 179. Houses 30. The surface of the parochial union in which it is included, consists of good land, and a vast quantity of bog, and is drained by the Suir.—Kilclonagh is a rectory, and part of the benefice of MOYNE [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £45. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 46 boys and 37 girls.

KILCLONFERT, a parish in the barony of Lower Philipstown, 2 miles north by west of the town of Philipstown, King's co., Leinster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3; area, 10,266 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches,—of which 3,307 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches form a detached district a little to the east. Pop., in 1831, 1,734; in 1841, 1,835. Houses 301. The surface contains some middle-rate land, includes a large extent of bog, and is touched and partly traversed westward by the Grand Canal. The highest ground is on the north border, and has an altitude of 457 feet. The mansions are Kilduff, Clonearl, and Mount-Briscoe.—This parish is a vicarage, and a rectory, in the dio. of Kildare. The vicarage is a separate benefice. Tithe composition and gross income, £83 1s. 6d.; nett, £61 11s. 5d. Patron, the crown. The church is in ruins; and the vicar resides in Philipstown. The rectory is an ecclesiastical sinecure. Tithe composition and gross income, £166 3s. 1d.; nett, £156 11s. 11d. Patrons, the representatives of the Rev. Thomas French. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 850; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Philipstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 44, and the Roman Catholics to 1,690; a Sunday-school, held in the Roman Catholic chapel, was usually attended by about 300 children; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 from the National Board—had on their books 139 boys and 76 girls.

KILCLOON. See KILCLOAN.

KILCLOONY, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Clonmacnoon, and of co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the village of CLEAGHMORE, and the greater part of the town of BALLINASLOE: see these articles. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 7,289 acres, 33 perches,—of which 88 acres, 2 roods, 35 perches are water. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 7,248; of the rural districts, 2,473. Houses in the whole, 989; in the rural districts, 397. The pop. of the whole, in 1831, is stated by the Census at 8,404, and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 7,156. The surface is bounded on the east by the river Suck; it presents gentle, hilly, and pleasing inequalities; it contains a considerable aggregate of both bog and wood, the former largely reclaimed, and the latter nearly all within demesnes; it makes a pleasing impression upon strangers, by the beauty and snugness of the environs of Ballinasloe, the neatness and number of its villas and mansions, and the great breadth and embellishment of the Earl of Clancarty's demesne of GARBALLY [which see]; it averages, in the annual value of its land, about 20s. per plantation acre; and it contains the western terminus of the Grand Canal, and is traversed by the great Connaught road from Dublin, which here forks into the lines toward respectively Galway and Westport. The highest ground is Knocknagrea, a little west of the centre; and has an altitude of 318 feet. Mackney, the villa of the Hon. Archdeacon Trench, stands on the road to Galway; and the other noticeable rural residences are Fort-Lodge, Cahir, and Sallymount.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CREAGH, in the dio. of Clonfert. See CREAGH. Tithe composition, £88 17s. 6d. But a portion of the tithes compounded for £37 0s. 1½d., is appropriated to the see and deanery of Clonfert. The church is situated in Ballinasloe, and was built about the year 1790, at an unknown cost, and enlarged in 1825, by means of a loan of £1,107 13s. 10½d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 1,000; attendance 350. The Methodist meeting-house is attended by from 30 to 100, and the Primitive Methodist meeting-house by from 70 to 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 3,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Creagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 1,233, and the Roman Catholics to 5,609; and 6 pay daily schools were attended, on the average, by 147 children.

KILCLOONY, or KILCLUNY, a parish partly in the barony of Lower Orior, but chiefly in that of Lower Fews, co. Armagh, Ulster. The Fews section contains part of the town of MARKETHILL: which see. Length, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area of the Orior section, 792 acres, 26 perches; of the Fews section, 12,041 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches, —of which 9 acres, 8 roods, 8 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 7,627; in 1841, 8,079. Houses 1,448. Pop., in 1841, of the Orior section, 459; of the rural districts of the Fews section, 6,818. Houses, in the Orior section, 80; in the rural districts of the Fews section, 1,207. The parish comprises 22 townlands, and was originally part of Mullaghbrack. About one-sixth of its surface is mountain and bog; and the remainder is, on the average, inferior land to that of circumjacent districts. Vicar's Carn-hill, on the north-west border, has an altitude of 814 feet.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Glebe, £24 15s. Gross income, £105 4s. 2d.; nett, £96 0s. 6d. Patron, the incumbent of Mullaghbrack. The church was built in 1794, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 240. The Kilcloony and Ballylane Presbyterian meeting-houses have each an attendance of 200. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Lisnadill and Armaghbreague. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,423 Churchmen, 3,700 Presbyterians, and 2,793 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools had on their books 375 boys and 23 girls; and 1 other daily school was usually attended by about 76 children. The parochial school at Glassdrummond was aided by the rector and the curate; the Markethill and Clondybeg schools were each salaried with £10 from the National Board; the Brackley school with £6 from the London Hibernian Society, £5 from Lord Charlemont, and £2 from Lord Gosford; the Enagh school with £3 10s. from Dr. Blacker; the Cloddybeg school, with £6 from the rector; and the two Derryeeghan schools, with respectively £8 from the London Hibernian Society, and £10 from Dr. Blacker and Mrs. Cope.

KILCOAN, a parish in the barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of New Ross, Leinster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,383 acres, 19 perches. Pop., in 1831, 444; in 1841, 555. Houses 84. A height, north of the middle, has an altitude of 677 feet. The hamlets are Weatherstown and Flemingstown.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £113 1s. 11d. The rectory of Kilcoan, and the vicarage of Kilbride, constitute the benefice of Kilcoan. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 937. Gross income, £158 1s. 11d.; nett, £149 12s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is non-resident. In 1834, the inhabitants of the union were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILCOAN, or KILCOWAN, a parish in the barony of Bargle, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Clonmines, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length and breadth, each $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; area, 2,082 acres. Pop., in 1831, 557; in 1841, 402. Houses 91. The surface declines to the sea-lough at the head of Ballyteigue bay, consists of good land, and is traversed by the road from Clonmines to Wexford.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of MULRANKIN [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Vicarial tithe composition, £111 18s. 3d.; glebe, £4 17s. 7d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £50 13s. 3d., and are inappropriate in the representatives of Ambrose Harvey, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 557; and a hedge-school had on its books 20 boys and 15 girls.

KILCOAN, or KILQUANE, a parish in the barony of Barrymore, 7 miles north-east of Cork, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of GOGGINSTOWN: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,047 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 1,802; of the rural districts, 1,645. Houses in the whole, 273; in the rural districts, 248. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 2,736; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 2,335.* The surface is part of the southern face of the broad-based, tumulated, and undulated mountain-ridge, on whose broad backbone Watergrasshill is perched, and over which wends, with comparative facility, the road from Cork to Dublin.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILLASPIGMULLANE [which see], in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £244 12s. 3d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 2,398; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and one with £10 Irish from a bequest by the late Rev. M. O'Keane—had on their books 186 boys and 98 girls.

KILCOANMORE. See KILCOWANMORE.

KILCOCK, a parish on the north border of the barony of Ikeathy and Oughterany, and of co. Kildare, Leinster. It contains the chief part of the town of KILCOCK: see next article. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,064 acres, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,235; in 1841, 1,974. Houses 368. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 505; in 1841, 647. Houses 120. The arable land is excellent, and in fine cultivation. The north border is traversed westward by the Royal Canal and the Dublin and Galway mail-road. The chief seats are Courtown and Laragh. The only hamlet is Clonsast.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Kildare. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £70, and the rectorial for £98; and the title to the latter is disputed. The vicarages of KILCOCK, CLONCURRY, and HORTLAND, and the rectory of DOWNINGS [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilcock. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 4,375. Gross income, £419 3s.; nett, £394 13s. 11d. Patron, the crown. The incumbent holds also the perpetual curacy of Clomantagh, in the dio. of Ossory. A stipendiary curate has a salary of £75. The church was built, a year or two ago, by means of a contribution of £698 9s. 8d. from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £100 from private parties. Sittings 200; attendance 70. The Kilcock and Cloncurry Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 800 and 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 120, and the Roman Catholics to 2,115; the Protestants of the union to 183, and the Roman Catholics to 4,192; 4 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £4 from Mr. Gannon, and one with £18 from the National Board, and £12 from subscription—were usually attended by about 210 children; and there were also 2 schools in Cloncurry.

KILCOCK, a post and market town, partly in the parish of Rodanstown, barony of Upper Dece,

* The Census of 1831 includes in this parish a small district in Condons and Claugibbon, which really belonged to another parish of the name of Kilquane, and was afterwards transferred to the barony of Fermoy. See KILQUANE.

but chiefly in the parish of Kilcock, barony of Ikenahy and Oughterany, co. Kildare. It stands on the Dublin and Galway mail-road, and on the banks of the Grand Canal, 3 miles west-north-west of Maynooth, 5½ east by south of Enfield, and 14½ west by north of Dublin. It is a poor, straggling, and unattractive place, in the midst of rich environs. The parish church, and the Roman Catholic chapel, have little architectural pretensions. The dispensary is within the Celbridge Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 20,230 acres, with a pop. of 5,379; and, in 1839-40, it expended £70 3s., and administered to 775 patients. Fairs are held on March 25, May 11, August 11, and September 29. Monastic writers allege that a monastery stood on the site of the town, under the superintendence of a St. Cocha, or Cocca, aunt of St. Patrick, and nurse of St. Kieran; and some early popular belief in the story seems to have suggested the name Kilcocca, now abbreviated into Kilcock. South of the town, though not in the parish, are the mansions of Hortland, Donadea Castle, Whitestown, and Pritchardstown—the first and second the seats of Sir Wm. Hort, Bart., and Sir G. G. Aylmer, Bart.; and to the north are Dolinstown and Waterstown, the former the seat of A. U. Gladstones, Esq. Area of the Meath section of the town, 8 acres; of the Kildare section, 43 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,730; in 1841, 1,537. Houses 291. Pop., of the Kildare section, in 1841, 1,327. Houses 248. Families, in the whole, employed chiefly in agriculture, 42; in manufactures and trade, 59; in other pursuits, 192. Families, in the whole, dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 111; on means not specified, 5.

KILCOCKAN, a parish in the barony of Coshbride and Coshmore, 6 miles east-south-east of Tallo, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,537 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,461; in 1841, 1,420. Houses 213. The surface is part of the east side of the valley of the Blackwater, and consists of light and not very good land. The highest ground is in the south, and has an altitude of 648 feet. Within the limits is Strancally Castle. See STRANCALLY. The east road from Youghal to Clonmel passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TEMPLEMICHAEL [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £97 14s. 9½d., and the rectorial for £138 9s. 3d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Duke of Devonshire, and John Keily, Esq. of Strancally. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of between 700 and 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Templemichael and Kilwaltermoy. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 22, and the Roman Catholics to 1,495.

KILCOE, a parish in the western division of the barony of West Carbery, 6 miles west by south of Skibbereen, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 5,272 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,316; in 1841, 2,339. Houses 395. The surface lies round the head and east side of Roaring-Water bay. See ROARING-WATER. Some of the land is of prime quality, some is middle-rate, and some is of a rough and rocky description; but the last of these is greatly the most predominant in extent.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ross. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £150; and one moiety of the latter is inappropriate in Lord Riversdale, and the other moiety is appropriated to the archdeaconry of Ross. The vicarages of Kilcoe and CAPE-CLEAR [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilcoe. Pop., in 1831, 3,375.

Gross income, £188 12s.; nett, £176 13s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent resides near Clonakilty, and holds also the stipendiary curacy of Kilkerramore and Castle-Ventry parishes in the dio. of Ross, and the vicarage of Tomdeely in the dio. of Limerick. A curate for Kilcoe has a salary of £60. The church was built in 1830, by means of a gift of £650, from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 90. The Kilcoe Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Abbeystowry and Aughadown. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Cape Clear Island. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 218, and the Roman Catholics to 2,158; the Protestants of the union to 234, and the Roman Catholics to 3,182; and three daily schools in the union—two of which were in the parish, and one of these two aided with £2 a-year from the vicar—were usually attended by about 140 children.

KILCOE, co. Down. See KILCOO.

KILCOLA, a parish in the barony of Frenchpark, 3½ miles north-north-west of Elphin, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 7,217 acres, 1 rood, 39 perches,—of which 1,605 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches lie detached a little to the east. Pop., in 1831, 2,363; in 1841, 2,784. Houses 475. About one-fourth of the surface is prime land; a considerable aggregate is bog; and the remainder is land of an indifferent quality. Lough Bally in the centre of the main body, lies 226 feet above sea-level, and has an area of 252 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches. In the west is Bella, the seat of Mr. French; and in the north-east is the hamlet of Ballinameen. The roads from Tulsk to Boyle, and from Frenchpark to Carrick-on-Shannon, intersect each other in the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of EASTERASOW [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £32 6s. 1d.; and the latter are appropriated to the precentorship of Elphin cathedral. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 104 boys and 41 girls.

KILCOLEMAN, a parish on the west border of the barony of Barretts, 6 miles west of Blarney, co. Cork, Munster. It is so completely incorporated with Magourney, that all its statistics, both civil and ecclesiastical, are mixed up with those of that parish. See MAGOURNEY. It is situated on the rivulet Dripsey; and is very generally confounded by topographers with the Kilcoleman of interesting associations situated 20 miles distant, in the barony of Fermoy. See KILCOLEMAN, barony of Fermoy.

KILCOLEMAN, a parish partly in the barony of Magonihy, but chiefly in that of Trughenackmy, co. Kerry, Munster. The Trughenackmy section contains the town of MILLTOWN, and the village of BRACKHILL: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area of the Magonihy section, 1,982 acres; of the Trughenackmy section, 5,776 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,970; in 1841, 4,745. Houses 829. Pop. of the Magonihy section, in 1831, 844; in 1841, 843. Houses 141. Pop. of the rural districts of the Trughenackmy section, in 1841, 2,800. Houses 516. The surface lies in the valleys of the Maine and the Lane; consists for the most part of prime land; and is traversed by the roads from Tralee to Killarney, and from Castle-Island to Cahirciveen. Near Milltown stands Kilcoleman-Abbey, formerly called Bushfield, the seat of Sir John Godfrey, Bart. The mansion is embowered among fruit and timber trees; and the estate extends nearly 6 miles along the Maine and the Lane, and has been peopled since the Restoration by an active and thriving ing tenantry, chiefly of English origin. The abbey of Killagh, situated at no great distance from Sir J. Godfrey's seat, was founded in the reign of Henry III., by Geoffrey de Mariscia, and was called the Priory of St. Mary, and occupied by canons regular of the order of St. Augustine. "The walls of the church," says Dr. Smith, "are of a great length, and very strong; these, with a noble window of Gothic architecture at the east end, still remain entire. They are built of limestone, or rather of a dark marble, as are some other curious window-frames that have hitherto resisted the injuries of time: the manner of building, besides the materials, bespeaks this structure to be much more modern than the time of the first foundation." The adjacent lands lie on the Maine, have a rich limestone soil, and, in the time of Dr. Smith, produced considerable quantities of wild hops, which he conjectured to have been introduced by the Monks. The possessions of the abbey were extensive, and were granted at the dissolution to Thomas Spring, and forfeited by him after the wars of 1641. The tithes were granted after the Restoration to L. Baltinglass; and they were sold by him to Sir Emmanuel Moore, and eventually passed to the family of Mullins.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Glebe, £20. Gross and nett income, £66 3s. 1d. Patrons, the representatives of the Earl of Glandore. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Killanear, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and that of Templebredin in the dio. of Emly. The tithes are compounded for £350 15s. 4d., and are wholly inappropriate in the Hon. and Rev. Frederick Mullins and his heirs. The church was built in 1822, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance, from 180 to 200. A private meeting-house of Methodists has an attendance of 10. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilbonane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 351, and the Roman Catholics to 4,348; and 4 daily schools—2 of which were wholly supported by Lady Godfrey—had on their books 119 boys and 68 girls. In 1839, the National Board granted £166 toward the erection of a school at Ballyoutera.

KILCOLEMAN, a parish 2½ miles south-south-east of Birr, and partly in the barony of Ballybrit, but chiefly in that of Clonlisk, King's co., Leinster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4½. Area of the Ballybrit section, 2,846 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches; of the Clonlisk section, 5,356 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,039; in 1841, 2,285. Houses 366. Pop. of the Clonlisk section, in 1831, 1,515; in 1841, 1,419. Houses 222. The surface consists of middle-rate land; and is watered by the Little Brosna along the west boundary, and by one of that river's affluents along the boundary between the baronial sections. The highest ground has an altitude of 502 feet; and the streams descend from elevations of respectively 164 and 255 feet. The chief seats are Sharavogue, Rathmore, Killeen-breaghan, and Dromoye. The principal hamlet is Black Bull. A religious establishment is said to have been founded here about the year 570, by St. Coleman, son of Ængus, king of Munster; and two sites of convents are still pointed out—the one of them called Insula Vitæ.—This parish is a rectory and a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. The rectory is a sinecure, held by the incumbent of Leekpatrick benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition and gross income, £129 4s. 7½d.; nett, £114 11s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The vicarage is part of the benefice of ETTAGH: which see. Vicarial tithe composition, £70; glebe, £10 16s. 3d. A private house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of from 40 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ettagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 280, and the Roman Catholics to 1,979; and 6 daily schools—one of which, at Mountmask, was wholly supported by Mr. Synge—had on their books 99 boys and 67 girls, and were attended by about 15 other children.

KILCOLEMAN, a parish in the barony of Shanid, 5 miles north-north-west of Newcastle, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,762 acres. Pop., in 1831, 510; in 1841, 759. Houses 115. One-fourth of the land is good, and the remainder is indifferent.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £70; glebe, £6. Gross income, £76; nett, £68 5s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent resides in Limerick; and is a vicar choral of Limerick cathedral, and stipendiary curate of St. Mary's, Limerick. There is no church in Kilcoleman; and the vicar of Shanagolden performs the occasional duties for a salary of £5. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 550; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Clounagh. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 31 boys and 13 girls.

KILCOLEMAN, a parish in the barony of Clannorris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the town of CLARE or CLAREMORRIS: which see. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 6½; area, 23,739 acres. 1 rood, 28 perches,—of which 203 acres, 37 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 8,391; in 1841, 9,451. Houses 1,629. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 7,195. Houses 1,249. The surface includes a considerable extent of bog, and consists of land of very diversified quality. Claremount, the seat of James Browne, Esq., adjoins the town of Clare; and the other noticeable residences are Cloonboy, Ballygowan, Castlegar, and Rockfield. The antiquities are ruins of a church and a castle.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £304 12s. 4d.; glebe, £36. Gross income, £340 12s. 4d.; nett, £292 7s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1828, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d., and a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 70 to 80. The Wesleyan meeting-house has an attendance of from 20 to 30. The Claremorris and Barna-Carrol Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively from 700 to 800, and from 600 to 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 182, and the Roman Catholics to 8,822; and 12 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, one with £8 from that Society and £10 from Mrs. Brown of Claremount, and one with £8 from the National Board and £4 4s. from the Roman Catholic clergyman—had on their books 390 boys and 148 girls, and were attended by about 86 other children.

KILCOLEMAN, a parish, partly in the barony of Coolavin, co. Sligo, and partly in the barony of Frenchpark, co. Roscommon, but chiefly in the barony of Costello, co. Mayo, Connaught. The Mayo section contains the town of BALLAGHADIREEN: which see. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 6. Area of the Sligo section, 5,511 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch,—of which 959 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches are in Lough Gara, and 9 acres, 11 perches are in Loughanboy.

Area of the Roscommon and of the Mayo sections, 12,581 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches,—of which 108 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches are in Lough Gara. The Roscommon section consists of the townlands of Banada and Keelbanada; comprises an area of 1,628 acres; and was transferred from Mayo by the Act 3 and 4 Victoria, c. 76. Pop., in 1841, of the whole parish, 6,655; of the Sligo section, 1,929; of the Roscommon section, 361; of the rural districts of the Mayo section, 3,023. Houses in the whole, 1,143; in the Sligo section, 358; in the Roscommon section, 66; in the rural districts of the Mayo section, 517. The pop. of the whole, in 1831, is stated by the Census at 5,427; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 5,021. The parochial surface contains a large aggregate of bog, and, on the whole, is part of a dreary and repulsive region of moors, bogs, and poor land. An official report says the land is of three different qualities, but does not state their respective proportions. Two heights in the Mayo section have altitudes of 661 and 745 feet above sea-level. The road from Longford by Frenchpark to Ballina, passes through the interior. Two miles from Ballaghaderreen, on the road to Boyle, is Edmonstown, the demesne of Mr. Costello; and on the shore of Lough Gara, is Coolavin, the seat of M. MacDermott, Esq., who claims to be the lineal descendant of the ancient chieftains of the toparchy of Coolavin.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CASTLEMORE [which see], in the dio. of Achonry. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £95; and the latter are inappropriate in Viscount Dillon. The church was built in 1798, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 40. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,500 and 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Kilmovee. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 134, and the Roman Catholics to 5,261; and 6 daily schools had on their books 358 boys and 228 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £10 from the National Board, £10 from Lord Dillon, and £1 from the vicar; two, with £8 each from the National Board; one, with £14 from Lord Dillon; and one, with about £20 from the London Hibernian Societies, and advantages worth about £3 from Mr. Holmes.

KILCOLEMAN, an old castle in the barony of Fermoy, 2 miles north of Doneraile, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on a rivulet which falls into the Awbeg at Doneraile; and, though within an easy distance of the brilliant close scenes of the Awbeg's vale, and commanding an extensive prospect of a panoramic sweep of country, it has a home-view, which, even in the days of the castle's greatest prosperity, must have been chilly and dispiriting. Blunders by topographers and tourists on the subject of the poet Spenser's Irish residence, are numerous and varied; and in no particular are they so gross as in placing Kilcoleman-castle on the immediate banks of the Awbeg, and closely surrounding it with the landscapes which have been rendered classical by the poet's verse. A great champaign country which stretches off on all sides from the castle is terminated on the east by the mountains of Waterford, on the south by the Nagle mountains, on the west by the mountains on the mutual border of Cork and Kerry, and on the north by the Ballyhours mountains, termed by Spenser the mountains of Mole;—and though the tame scenery of the great plain may have been relieved by the woods which formerly chequered and sheeted the uplands; yet Spenser must manifestly have pursued the meanders of the Awbeg in haunts at some distance from home, for objects to enrich his descriptive pages; and hence, while he lavishes the most admiring epithets upon "Mulla fair and bright," he says little concerning any pretensions to beauty in his own peculiar domain. The greater part of the castle was very long ago levelled with the ground, or strewed in comminuted fragments over the land around its site. Some remains which exist of the principal tower evince the pile to have been of considerable strength and extent; and the outlines and vestiges of several apartments are still distinctly traceable. The stairway of the tower exists, and leads to the decaying remains of a small chamber; some windows in the tower continue, but possess no other interest than that of directing the eye of a visitor to the landscape with which the illustrious author of the Fairy Queen was most familiar while composing his poem; and the ground-floor room bears marks of having been used as a hall or a kitchen, and is arched with stone. Kilcoleman was originally the property, and eventually became part of the fortified estates, of the Earls of Desmond. In 1580, the poet Spenser entered Ireland as secretary to the lord-deputy, Lord Grey of Wilton; in 1582, he returned with Lord Grey to England; in 1586, he received from Queen Elizabeth a grant of Kilcoleman-castle and 3,028 acres of land, but saddled, as in similar cases, with the condition that he should reside on the property; in 1587, he commenced his residence at Kilcoleman, and appears also to have commenced the composition of his Fairy Queen; in 1589, he received from Sir Walter Raleigh a visit, which he celebrated in his piece called, "Colin Clout's come home again;" in 1590, he accompanied Sir Walter to London, for the purpose of publishing the first three books of the Fairy Queen; in 1591, he returned to Kilcoleman, and married a woman of mean birth but substantial excellencies; during the four succeeding years he composed the fourth, fifth, and sixth books of the Fairy Queen, and luxuriated in the enjoyments of domestic life and a poet's day-dreams; in 1595, he was driven to England in consequence of the distracted state of Ireland; in 1597, he returned to Kilcoleman; and in 1598, he finally fled with his wife to England, and, in revenge of his being the holder of a portion of the forfeited estates of the Earl of Desmond, his castle was plundered and burned by the infuriated insurgents in the rebellion of Tyrone. A common but very doubtfully authenticated statement asserts that his infant child was forgotten in the hurry of the family's flight, and perished in the flames which destroyed the castle. Spenser was irretrievably injured by his expulsion from Kilcoleman; he returned to England, not like a distinguished native going back to his fatherland, but like a poor and wretched exile among foreigners; and a year after, he died in an obscure lodging in London, in extreme indigence, if not in absolute want. His acquisition of Kilcoleman virtually cost him the loss of caste in his own country, and, at the same time, failed to indemnify him by naturalization in Ireland. He clearly regarded his residence at Kilcoleman as a painful banishment; and in his 'View of the State of Ireland,' is at no pains to conceal his dislike of the people among whom his lot was cast. After the restoration of Charles II., Hugolin Spenser, a grandson of the poet, was put in possession of as much of the lands of Kilcoleman as could be proved to have been included in Queen Elizabeth's grant; but he incurred forfeiture and outlawry by adhering to the cause of James II.; and though sometime after the estate was, through the influence of Mr. Montague, afterwards Earl of Halifax, given back to a cousin of Hugolin, it has long since passed away from the Spenser family.

KILCOLEMAN, a village in the parish of Ringrone, barony of Courceya, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 122. Houses 24.

KILCOLEMANBANE, a parish, partly in the barony of Cullenagh, but chiefly in that of East Maryborough, 2½ miles south by east of the town of Maryborough, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Cullenagh section, 638 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches; of the Maryborough section, 3,054 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,223; in 1841, 962. Houses 153. Pop. of the Maryborough section, in 1841, 788. Houses 126. The surface includes a considerable extent of bog, consists in the aggregate of middle-rate land, and is traversed by the road from Maryborough to Ballinakill. The chief seats are Ballyknocken, Woodville, Rathleague, and Sheffield. —This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of MARYBOROUGH [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £160; glebe, £1 7s. 6d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 151, and the Roman Catholics to 1,093; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £4 from subscription—had on their books 54 boys and 36 girls.

KILCOLGAN, or KILCOGLAN, an old castle, 1½ mile from Ferbane, barony of Garry-castle, King's co., Leinster. It was formerly the seat of the MacCoghlan, dynasts of the territory which now constitutes Garry-castle barony and several adjoining districts. The ruins are somewhat imposing. Archdall alleges that St. Colgan founded an abbey here in 580.

KILCOLGAN, or KILCORGAN, a parish in the barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. Length and breadth, each 4½ miles; area, 5,548 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches,—of which 52 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches are water, and 988 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches form a detached district a little to the east. Pop., in 1831, 1,191; in 1841, 1,359. Houses 217. Portions of the parish belonged, till recently, to the baronies of Loughrea and Kiltartan. The parochial surface isolates on the west the parish of Drumacoo; includes some islands in Galway bay; is bounded on the west by that bay and Drumacoo, and on the north by the Carnmacart river; is traversed southward by the road from Galway to Gort and Ennis; and consists of light limestone land with a large intermixture of rocky ground. The hamlets are Cahirpeak, Kiltiernan, Ballycallo, Carraghadoo, Gorton, Ballymartin, and Mulroog. Kilcolgan or Kiloorgan Point terminates a peninsula, which runs out into Galway bay between New Harbour and Kinvarra Harbour, measures 4 miles on the former side and 5 on the latter, covers Galway roads opposite Mutton Island from south and south-east winds, and is thus noticed in the report of Mr. Nimmo's Coast Survey:—"The greater part of it is occupied by a remarkable lagoon, where the limestone rock sinks beneath the sea-level, and long narrow spits of beach have been washed across the inlet: this lagoon is too shallow to be navigated by anything but boats, and these only get through the entrance at Blackwater; small boats can go quite across the peninsula." But the peninsula, though noticed here, and taking name from Kilcolgan, belongs principally to the parishes of BALLINACOURTY and STRADBALLY, and is partly noticed also in our account of ARDFRY: see these articles. On the shore of Kinvarra Harbour, opposite Elaneddy, is Tyrone-house, the seat of A. F. St. George, Esq. The small village of Kilcolgan stands on the Galway and Gort road, 4 miles south by east of Oranmore. Fairs are held on June 18 and Sept. 18. A dispensary here is within the Galway Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 36,418 acres, with a pop. of 11,791; and, in 1840-41, it expended £142 4s., and administered to 1,042 patients. An ancient abbey stood here; and is alleged by monastic writers to have been founded about the year 580, and presided over by St. Colgan. Kilcolgan is a coast-guard station.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £52 10s., and the rectorial for £136 10s.; and the latter are appropriated to the see of Kilmacduagh, to the provostship of Kilmacduagh cathedral, and to the prebend of Kinvarra. The vicarages of Kilcolgan, KILBELY, KILLINEEN, STRADBALLY, DROMACOO, KILLEENAVARRA, KILLINEY, DURAS-KINVARRA, BULLANE, and KILCOOLY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilcolgan. Length, 20 miles; breadth, 9. Pop., in 1831, 14,157. Gross income, £357 3s. 1d.; nett, £331 12s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure provostship of Kilmacduagh cathedral, and the sinecure prebend of Kilconnel in the cathedral of Clonfert. The church is an old building, and was repaired in 1820, by means of parochial assessment. Sittings 100; attendance 30. There are 7 Roman Catholic chapels within the benefice. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 1,320; the Protestants of the union to 134, and the Roman Catholics to 5,054; and 22 daily schools in the union—none of which were in the parish—had on their books 680 boys and 274 girls.

KILCOLLUM, or KILCOLM, a parish in the barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains the village of BALLINCREA: which see. Length and breadth, each 4½ miles; area, 8,274 acres, 21 perches,—of which 15 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches are in Lough Cullen. Pop., in 1831, 2,139; in 1841, 2,407. Houses 361. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,210. Houses 335. It lies 5 miles north-north-east of Waterford, between the river Barrow and the road from Waterford to Innistigue. The land is partly arable and good, and partly pastoral and billy. The highest ground has an altitude of 445 feet. The demesnes are Rochestown and Ringville; and the hamlets are Blackneys, Davidstown, Ballyraghan, East Rochestown, West Rochestown, and Rathinure.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DUNKILL [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £160; glebe, £36 18s. 5½d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £320, and are impropriate in Mr. Digby. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; a Sunday school, supported by Lady Esmonde, was usually attended by from 90 to 100 children; and a daily school, supported by Lady Esmonde, had on its books 90 boys and 70 girls.

KILCOMACK. See KILCOMMICK.

KILCOMAN, or KILCOMIN, a parish in the barony of Clonlisk, ¾ of a mile west-south-west of Shinrone, King's co., Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 3,583 acres, 19 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,357; in 1841, 1,552. Houses 266. The surface is drained by the Little Brosna. The demesnes are Oakwood, Rutland, and Glass. The hamlet of Kilcomin had, in 1831, a pop. of 99, and had, in 1801, two very extensive distilleries, which consumed all the barley raised in the barony. St. Cumene or Cumin, who died in 668, gave name to the parish, and is alleged by monastic writers to have placed some highly venerated relics in a religious house which stood on the site of the hamlet.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of SHINRONE [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £156 18s. 5½d.; glebe, £42. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 221, and the Roman Catholics to 1,175; a Sunday school was attended by about 26 children; and a daily school was salaried with £8 from the London Hibernian Society and £5 from the rector, and had on its books 24 boys and 33 girls.

KILCOMB, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Scarewalsh, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,441 acres, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,147; in 1841, 1,170. Houses 205. The surface lies along the rivulet Bann, consists for the most part of good land, contains the large and well-wooded demesne of Camolin-park, and is traversed by the road from Gorey to Ferns.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TOMB [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £204 18s. 5½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ferns. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 220, and the Roman Catholics to 956; and 2 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 80 children.

KILCOMENA. See KILACONENAGH.

KILCOMENTY, a parish in the barony of Owney and Arra, a little north of Newport-Tip., co. Tipperary, Munster. Length and breadth, each 3 miles; area, 6,943 acres, 17 perches,—of which 51 acres, 9 perches are in the river Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 2,334; in 1841, 2,892. Houses 447. The surface is much diversified in contour; includes part of the lower skirts of the Keeper-Mountain; possesses a large amount of scenic beauty; and is traversed by the road from Birr to Limerick. One of the most interesting localities is BIRDBILL: which see. The chief residences are Cragg, Birdhill, Annaholty, and Parteen.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of NEWPORT [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilnerath and Kilvolane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 181, and the Roman Catholics to 2,275; 4 pay daily schools had on their books 199 boys and 144 girls; and a school-house had just been built, and was about to be opened in connection with the National Board.

KILCOMIN. See KILCOMAN.

KILCOMMADAN, the broad-backed and slowly ascending height, which was the scene of the celebrated battle of Aughrim, in the barony of Clonmacnoon, co. Galway, Connaught. See AUGHRIM.

KILCOMMICK, a parish in the baronies of Abbeyshruel, Moydow, and Ratheline, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Abbeymahon, co. Longford, Leinster. The Ratheline section contains the village of KENAUGHT: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Abbeyshruel section, 864 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches; of the Moydow section, 4,865 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches,—of which 19 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches are in Lough Bannow; of the Ratheline section, 6,141 acres, 3 roods, 30 perches,—of which 78 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,815; in 1841, 3,644. Houses 634. Pop. of the Abbeyshruel section, in 1831, 303; in 1841, 246. Houses 37. Pop. of the Moydow section, in 1831, 1,309; in 1841, 1,344. Houses 248. Pop. of the rural districts of the Ratheline section, in 1831, 1,807; in 1841, 1,684. Houses 288. The surface includes a great extent of bog, and has very little land above middle-rate quality. Monstown, the highly improved seat of A. J. Kingston, Esq., adjoins Kenaught. Other mansions are Lisnemurrough, Glenmore, Ledwithstown, and Lisglaspie, the last the seat of Mr. Robinson. The hamlets are Ards, Ballyknoek, Kilmakinlan, Corlea, and Kilcommick. The Royal Canal and the road from Dublin to Strokestown pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Tithe composition, £277; glebe, £230 0s. 3d. Gross income, £507 0s. 3d.; nett, £436 13s. 4½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1837, at the cost of £2,500, all defrayed by the Countess Dowager of Rosse. Sittings 500; attendance 250. A Dissenting meeting-house has an attendance of 45; the Roman Catholic chapel of 800; and a private house used as a Roman Catholic chapel, of 200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 600, and the Roman Catholics to 3,114; and 7 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £6 from the Ardagh Association, and £14 from Lady Rosse, and one with £4 from the Ardagh Association, £15 from Lady Rosse, and £5 from the rector—had on their books 221 boys and 154 girls.

KILCOMMON, a parish in the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the town of BELMULLET: which see. Length, 30 miles; breadth, $16\frac{1}{2}$; area, 203,396 acres,—of which 2,436 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches are in Lough Carrowmore, and 1,107 acres, 36 perches are in the Owenmore river, and in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 13,395; in 1841, 17,000. Houses 2,903. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 16,363. Houses 2,803. This enormous parish includes the whole of the barony of Erris, except the peninsula within the Mullet; and though multitudinous and exceedingly diversified in feature, it has already been noticed sufficiently for the purposes of general description in our article on ERRIS. The principal individual objects or particular localities of interest are noticed in the articles on the villages of BELMULLET, BANGOR, and INVER, the lake of CARROWMORE, the river OWENMORE, the great marine inlets of BROADHAVEN and BLACKSOD, the headland of BENWEE, the harbour of PORTACLOY, and the coast-scenes of PARLOUR, ARCH, and MOISTA SOUND: see these articles. The principal hills and mountains, with their respective altitudes, are Knockaduff, 692 feet; the Signal-Tower mountain, 1,002; Knocknallower, 712; Slieve-Tyagh, 1,080; Glencastle, 760; Knocknascollap, 788; Knocklattercus, 1,208; Maumykelly, 1,205; Slieve-Alp, 1,084; Corslieve, 1,785; Nephin-Beg, 2,065; and Laghtdoulybawn, 2,369.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killalla. Vicarial tithe composition, £170; glebe, £6. Gross income, £176; nett, £135 13s. Patron, the diocesan. Previous to 1833, this vicarage was united to that of Kilmore-Erris. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £170, and are appropriated to the precentorship of Killalla cathedral. The court-house of Belmullet is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 30, and service is also occasionally conducted in private houses in various parts of the parish. The Roman Catholic chapels at Glangarth, Dunkeeghan, Bangor, and Ballycroy, have an attendance of respectively 900, 700, 700, and 500. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 99 Churchmen, 7 Presbyterians, 12 other Protestant dissenters, and 14,551 Roman Catholics; and 14 pay daily schools had on their books 340 boys and 116 girls.

KILCOMMON, a parish in the barony of Kilmaine, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the post-town of HOLLYMOUNT: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 17,395 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches,—of which 76 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,507; in 1841, 7,456. Houses 1,253. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 7,002. Houses 1,190. The surface is gently diversified, and contains a considerable extent of reclaimed bog, a comparatively large extent of embellished grounds, and an aggregately large extent of fine arable land. The principal mansions are Hollymount-House, Thomas Spenser Lindsay, Esq.; Annefield; Greaghans; Carra; Millford; and Frenchgrove. The hamlets are Roundfort, Pollnalingy, Garrymore, Garrybeg, Ballyheeragh, Carras, Cooward, and Carrowkeed. The river Robe effects the drainage of the surface; and the mail-road from Dublin to Westport passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £399 13s. 10d.; glebe, £12. The rectories of Kilcommon, TAGHEEN, and ROBEEN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilcommon or Hollymount. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 12,262. Gross income, £663 0s. 1d.; nett, £554 2s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is situated in Robeen parish, yet immediately adjoins the town of Hollymount on the west; it is a rather old but quite a neat building, with a spire; and was enlarged about the year 1818, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 60 to 100. The Roundfort Roman Catholic chapel is attended by about 1,500; the Carras schoolhouse, used as a Roman Catholic chapel, by about 800; and the Robeen Roman Catholic chapel, by about 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, these three are mutually united. The Roman Catholic chapel of Tagheen is united to that of Cross-boyne. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 264 Churchmen, 16 Presbyterians, and 6,717 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 354 Churchmen, 16 Presbyterians, and 12,802 Roman Catholics; 8 daily schools in the parish had on their books 246 boys and 93 girls, and were attended by about 60 other children; and 13 daily schools in the union had on their books 437 boys and 212 girls, and were attended by about 100 other children. Two of the schools in Hollymount were wholly supported by Mr. Lindsay; an infant school in Hollymount, was wholly supported by subscriptions from ladies in the neighbourhood; another school in Hollymount was salaried with £8 from the National Board; and a fifth of the Kilcommon schools was an agricultural school, supported by the work and the annual fee of £10 of each pupil, and held in a building erected by the Mansion-House Committee for relieving distress in Ireland in 1822.

KILCOMMON, a parish in the barony of South Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It contains the town of TINAHELY: which see. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 11,209 acres, 34 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,469; in 1841, 3,479. Houses 550. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,832; in 1841, 2,839. Houses 451. The surface is boldly tumulated, and contains a considerable extent of mountainous land and turf bog. The uplands are pasturable; and the arable grounds are light, yet produce fair crops. The four chief heights have altitudes of respectively 1,304, 1,312, 1,316, and 1,416. The road from Wicklow to Newtownbarry passes through the interior. Ballybeg, the seat of Arthur Symes, Esq., is situated 2 miles north-north-east of Tinahely; and the other seats are Ballyshonog, Broomfield, and Rockingham. The hamlet of Barronbawn had, in 1831, a pop. of 62.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CROSSPATRICK, [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £456 18s. 5½d. The church is an old building, and was enlarged in 1821, by means of a loan of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance 750. There are three Roman Catholic chapels in the two parishes of Kilcommon and Crosspatrick. In 1834, the Protestants of Kilcommon amounted to 790, and the Roman Catholics to 2,587; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £6 from Lord Fitzwilliam—had on their books 100 boys and 75 girls.

KILCOMMON, a parish, 1½ mile north-east of Rathdrum, and partly in the barony of Arklow, but chiefly in that of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Arklow section, 1,431 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches; of the Newcastle section, 3,376 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 858; in 1841, 972. Houses 144. Pop. of the Newcastle section, in 1831, 561; in 1841, 692. Houses 106. The surface consists of part of the left side of the vale and screens of the Avonmore; and is traversed by the road from Rathdrum to Dublin. The highest ground has an altitude of 925 feet. Fairview Cottage is the only noticeable residence; yet much demesne-ground and woodland of three other residences is within the limits.—This parish is a chapelry, and part of the benefice of WICKLOW [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The tithe composition, jointly with that of three other chapelries in the benefice, amounts to £383 6s. 8d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 196, and the Roman Catholics to 622; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £3 from Archdeacon Magee—were usually attended by about 62 children.

KILCOMMON, co. Galway. See KILCUMMIN.

KILCOMMON, barony of Trawley, co. Mayo. See KILCUMMIN.

KILCOMMON, co. Kerry. See KILCUMMIN.

KILCOMMON, King's co. See KILCOMAN.

KILCONDUFF, a parish in the barony of Galen, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the town of SWINEFORD: which see. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 4½; area, 16,522 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches,—of which 89 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,951; in 1841, 7,072. Houses 1,249. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,138; in 1841, 6,056. Houses 1,103. Much of the surface is moorish, bare, and boggy; and the arable and pasture lands, though good, are in a sadly defective state of cultivation. Brabazon Park, the seat of Sir William Brabazon, Bart., adjoins Swineford. The road from Ballina to Ballaghadireen passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Achonry. Vicarial tithe composition, £183 0s. 9d.; glebe, £26. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £183 0s. 9d.; and are inappropriate in Walter J. Burke, Esq. The vicarages of Kilconduff, KILBEAGH, and MEELICK [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilconduff. Length, 14 miles; breadth, 7. Pop., in 1831, 9,625. Gross income, £417 13s. 8½d.; nett, £370 6s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the corps of the deanery of Killalla cathedral, and the benefice of Kilpatrick in the dio. of Ferns; but resides in Kilconduff. The church was built in 1810, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 20. The Kilconduff and Meelick Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,800 and 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. There are two Roman Catholic chapels also in Kilbeagh. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 55, and the Roman Catholics to 6,332; the Protestants of the union to 63, and the Roman Catholics to 10,267; and 11 hedge-schools in the union—7 of which were in the parish—had on their books 541 boys and 198 girls.

KILCONERAN, a parish 4½ miles north-north-west of Loughrea, and partly in the baronies of Loughrea and Athenry, but chiefly in that of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3½. Area of the Loughrea section, 161 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches; of the Athenry section, 2,496 acres, 2 roods, 27 perches; of the Dunkellin section, 2,819 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,360; in 1841, 1,552. Houses 238. Pop. of the Loughrea section, in 1831, 85; in 1841, 35. Houses 7. Pop. of the Athenry section, in 1831, 342; in 1841, 480. Houses 70.* The surface is watered by the nascent Carnamart rivulet; and consists of aggregately good pasture, meadow, and arable land. The chief residences are Moydecastle, Hollypark-house, and Tallyho-lodge.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILCONICKNY [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £119 5s. 4½d.; glebe, £29 4s. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Lickerrig. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 35, and the Roman Catholics to 1,433.

KILCONICKNY, a parish 2½ miles west north-west of Loughrea, and partly in the barony of Athenry, but chiefly in the baronies of Loughrea and Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Athenry section, 244 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches; of the Loughrea section, 5,012 acres, 29 perches; of the Dunkellin section, 3,096 acres, 28 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,664; in 1841, 2,564. Houses 426. Pop. of the Loughrea section, in 1831, 1,238; in 1841, 1,467. Houses 248. Pop. of the Dunkellin section, in 1831, 1,322; in 1841, 1,003. Houses 166.† The surface is traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Galway; and consists in the aggregate of good pasture, meadow, and arable land. The only noticeable mansion is Lurgan; yet the demesnes of Dunsandle and St. Clarens impinge on the west border. The chief antiquities are ruins of four old castles, a church, and a chapel.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Clonfert. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £27 13s. 10½d., and the rectorial for £85 16s. 11d.; and the latter are appropriated in various portions to the bishop and the dean of Clonfert, to the prebendary of Killaspicmoylan, and to the vicars choral of Dublin. The vicarages of Kilconickny and LICKERRIG, and the rectories of KILCONERAN and KILTULLAGH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilconickny. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 7. Pop., in 1831, 8,222. Gross income, £349 16s. 4½d.; nett, £294 0s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure prebend of Kilteskill in Clonfert cathedral, and the sinecure treasurership of the cathedral of Kilmacduagh. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church of the benefice is in Lickerrig. There are three parochial Roman Catholic chapels in respectively Lickerrig, Kilconeran, and Kiltullagh; and there is a friary chapel in Lickerrig. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 37, and the Roman Catholics to 2,814; the Protestants of the union to 130, and the Roman Catholics to 8,076; and there were in the union—though none of them in the parish—2 Sunday schools and 3 daily schools.

KILCONLY, a parish in the south-west corner of the barony of Dunmore, 5½ miles north-west of Tuam, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the village of RATESH: which see. Length, 4½ miles, breadth, 3½; area, 9,677 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches,—of which 132 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,855; in 1841, 3,070. Houses 542. The surface is flat and tame, includes a large extent of bog, and elsewhere consists of middle-rate land. The hamlets are Lowpark, Roogun, Beaghwell, Beagh, Ironpool, Derryglasshill, Cloonmoo-weelaun, Ballyhip, Ballyhear, Ballyhall, Highstreet, Bodaun, Cloonlyon, Gortnabishaun, Carra-baun, Cloonteen, Umoon, Ardour, Foxhall, and Urracly. The mail-road from Dublin to Westport passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TUAM [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Vicarial tithe composition, £72 5s. 3½d.; glebe, £20. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £72 5s. 3½d.; and are inappropriate in the vicars choral of Tuam cathedral. The church was built in 1831, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 35. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilbannon. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 30, and the Roman Catholics to 3,030; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board—had on their books 137 boys and 84 girls.

KILCONLY, a parish in the barony of Iveragh, 10 miles south by west of Cahirciveen, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 4; area, 5,753½ acres. Pop. not specially returned. It lies on the west side of Ballinskelligs bay, is boggy and mountainous, and contains a small village of its own name. Topography, both literary and political, very frequently treats it as only part of Killemlagh.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Killemlagh, and corps of the treasurership of Ardfert cathedral, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £83 1s. 6d. A curate performs the occasional duties for a salary of £18 9s. 2½d.

KILCONLY, a parish in the north-west corner of the barony of Iraghticonnor, 9½ miles north-west of Listowel, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 5,742 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,660; in 1841, 2,210. Houses 346. It lies on the estuary of the Shannon, opposite the bay of Carrigaholt; and presents to the tide a romantic series of cliffs and headlands. On three of the little promontories stood the old fortalices of Beal-castle, Devil's-castle, and Lock-castle. See BEAL. Beal Point, a little east of Beal-castle, and Knockamore-hill on the southern border of the parish, command magnificent views of the Shannon's estuary, and of both its Kerry and its Clare shores.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and seems to form part of the benefice of Listowel; but, though noticed by Beaufort, and reported on by the recent Commissioners of Public Instruction, it finds no place in the volumes of the Ecclesiastical Revenue Commissioners. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 1,748; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 160 boys and 73 girls.

KILCONNEL, a barony in the east of co. Galway, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by Killian; on the east, by co. Roscommon; on the south-east, by Clonmacnoo; on the south, by Athenry; and on the west, by Tyaquin. Its greatest length from north to south is 13½ miles; its greatest breadth is 11 miles; and its area is 64,819 acres, 34 perches,—of which 42 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches are water. Much of the surface is diversified with swells, rising grounds, and low hills and ridges, and a very considerable aggregate is bog, a large portion of which has been reclaimed. As this barony was selected as the specimen of the present state of agriculture throughout the county, an exact view of it may be obtained by reference to the section on Agriculture in our article on GALWAY (County of). The Suck traces the boundary with co. Roscommon; the Abascragh rivulet, an affluent of the Suck, drains most of the north-eastern district; and a head-stream of the Carnmacart drains the south-western district toward Galway bay.—This barony contains the whole of the parish of Kilconnel; and part of the parishes of Abascragh, Aughrim, Ballymacward, Fohenagh, Killian, Monivea, Grange, Kilgerril, Killalaghton, Killasolan, Killimore, and Kiltullagh. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred three townlands of Killalaghton from Glonmacnoon to Kilconnel.—pop., in 1841, 56. The chief towns and villages are Abascragh, Aughrim, and Kilconnel. Pop., in 1831, 17,079; in 1841, 17,162. Houses 2,785. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,247; in manufactures and trade, 462; in other pursuits, 206. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,010; who could read but not write, 795; who could neither read nor write, 4,662. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 972; who could read but not write, 835; who could neither read nor write, 5,797. Kilconnel barony lies in the Poor-law union of Ballinasloe and Loughrea. The total number of tenements valued is 2,741; and of these 1,438 were valued under £5,—728, under £10,—219, under £15,—83, under £20,—45, under £25,—29, under £30,—40, under £40,—24, under £50,—and 135, at and above £50.

KILCONNEL, a parish, containing a small market and post town of the same name, in the barony of Kilconnel, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,082 acres, 33 perches,—of which 29½ acres are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,910; in 1841, 1,880. Houses 323. The surface is part of a comparatively low tableau; and in an aggregate view is bare and cheerless, though neither waste nor moorish. Near the town is Carrowmanagh, the seat of Thomas Bermingham, Esq., and in other parts are the mansions and villas of Ballyglass, Hillswood, and Barnavahall. The old or north road from Ballinasloe to Galway passes through the interior. The town, or rather village, straddles along this road, on a site 3 miles west-north-west of Aughrim, 6½ west by north of Ballinasloe, and 12½ east by north of Athenry. It is a miserable and repulsive segregation of squalid cabins and other poor abodes. A short-lived religious foundation is alleged by monastic writers to have been established here by St. Conal or Connel, a contemporary of St. Patrick, and to have been one of the 350 or upwards of alleged bishoprics into which they pretend Ireland to have been divided. Legends and fables are told respecting St. Conal, which have a nightmare kind of interest to the superstitious and the visionary. A Franciscan friary or abbey was founded here about the year 1400 by William O'Kelly; and was granted, at the dissolution, to Charles Calthorpe. "The shell of the abbey," says the Rev. C. Otway, "is as picturesque a ruin as can be, where there are neither hills, rocks, lake, nor river, and but a few distant trees to improve the scenery; perhaps its ivy-mantled tower and time-tinted roofless gables, with all their salient angles, producing the happiest effects of light and shadow, are better in keeping with the waste and desolation that preside over the place, destitute as it is of any modern improvement or decoration whatsoever." A tablet on the wall of a side chapel marks the tomb of the family of Barne-wall, Lords of Trimlestown, banished from Meath to Connaught by Cromwell. Fairs are held on May 9, Aug. 4, and Nov. 11. Area of the village 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 191. Houses 39.—Kilconnel parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £64 12s. 3½d.; glebe, £74. But a portion of the tithes, compounded for £50 16s. 4½d., is appropriated to the see of Clonfert and the prebend of Kilconnel. The rectories of Kilconnel, KILLANE, and FOHENAGH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilconnel. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3½. Pop., in 1831, 6,240. Gross income, £351 5s. 4½d.; nett, £310 16s. 0½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure prebend of Droughda in Clonfert cathedral, and the sinecure prebend of Islandaddy in Kilmaedagh cathedral. A curate has a salary of £75. A house in Kilconnel, rented for £8, is used as the parochial place of worship, and is capable of accommodating 100 persons. The Roman Catholic chapel of Kilconnel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Aughrim. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Killane and Fohenagh. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 27, and the Roman Catholics to 2,019; the Protestants of the union to 76, and the Roman Catholics to 6,610; 2 pay daily schools in the parish were usually attended by about 140 children; another daily school in the parish was aided with £2 2s. a year and other advantages from Captain Donnellan, but made no report of its attendance; and there were 3 daily schools in Killane, and one in Fohenagh.

KILCONNEL, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 3 miles east of Cashel, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 2,345 acres. Pop., in 1831, 691; in 1841, 655. Houses 100. The land of the union of parishes to which Kilconnel belongs, averages about 30s. per plantation acre in yearly value.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of FETHARD [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £142 11s. 6d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 698; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILCONNY. See BELTURBET.

KILCONRY, a parish in the south-west corner of the barony of Lower Bunratty, 3½ miles south by west of Newmarket, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 2,926 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches,—of which 471 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches are in islands. Pop., in 1831, 793; in 1841, 739. Houses 104. The surface forms the extremity of the peninsula between the estuary of the Shannon and the east side of the estuary of the Fergus. The seats are Carrigerry and Stonehall.—This parish is a rectory, and a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. The rectory is part of the benefice of Traddery. Tithe composition, £70. The vicarage is part of the benefice of Kilfinaghty. Tithe composition, £35; glebe, £6. See TRADDERY and KILFINAGHTY. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Tomfinlough and Bunratty. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 832.

KILCONWAY, a barony of co. Antrim, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by Dunluce; on the east, by Glenarm; on the south, by Antrim and Toome; and on the west, by the river Bann, which separates it from co. Londonderry. Its length, from east to west, is 13½ miles; its greatest breadth, in the direction of south by east, is 9½; and its area is 68,457 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches,—of which 197 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches are water. The rivulet Main cuts the barony southward into two not very unequal sections,—the eastern one aggregately upland, and the western aggregately lowland. Much of the uplands is moorish; and a great extent of the lowlands is morass. A tolerably fair idea of the whole barony is afforded by our account of the parish of FINVOY: see that article. Kilconway proper, or the locality which gives name to the barony, is situated close to the high road, between the churches of Finvoy and Rasharkin. The name means 'Conway's church or burying-place;' and alludes to Conway Mac-Quillan, whose fortunes and family honours were ruined by Sourleboy, in the famous battle of Aura, fought in 1569. An ancient circular fort at the place has an artificial cave round its interior, and was a number years ago repaired, planted, made a sort of rural promenade, and called Glebe-Fort.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ahoghill, Ballymoney, Killagham, and Loughgeel; and the whole of the parishes of Donaghy, Dundermot, Finvoy, Newtown-Crumlin, and Rasharkin. The chief villages are Clough, Newtown-Cromolin, and Cloughmills. Pop., in 1831, 23,939; in 1841, 23,255. Houses 4,103. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,657; in manufactures and trade, 1,434; in other pursuits, 128. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,063; who could read but not write, 3,058; who could neither read nor write, 2,655. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,602; who could read but not write, 5,334; who could neither read nor write, 3,544. Kilconway lies within the Poor-law unions of Ballymena and Ballymoney. The total number of tenements valued is 3,272; and of these, 1,205 were valued under £5,—931, under £10,—558, under £15,—256, under £20,—144, under £25,—£63, under £30,—73, under £40,—21, under £50,—and 21 at and above £50. The annual value of the property rated, is £22,209 9s. 2d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, were £1,832 9s. 11d., and £1,368 13s.

KILCOO, a parish in the barony of Upper Iveagh, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Castlewellan, co. Down, Ulster. It contains the town of NEWCASTLE: which see. Length and breadth, each 6 miles; area 18,205 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches,—of which 96 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,520; in 1841, 6,563. Houses 1,231. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 5,526. Houses 1,041. The surface includes part of the sea-board of Dundrum bay, a portion of the culminating part of the Mourne mountain group, and the chief portion of the exquisitely diversified and highly picturesque tract at the north base of Slieve-Donard. Both the coast and the interior are replete with interest and power to a lover of bold and beautiful landscape. The summit of Slieve-Donard, on the southern boundary, has an altitude above sea-level of 2,449 feet. Tollymore Park, the seat of the Earl of Roden, is a chief feature: see TOLLYMORE. Donard-lodge, the bathing villa of the Earl of Annesley, and several other neat and pleasing villas, are situated in the vicinity of Newcastle. The road from Newry to Downpatrick passes through the interior, and that from Kilkeel to Killough passes along the coast.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILKEEL [which see], in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £300. The church is of unknown date; and received the addition of a tower in 1812, by means of a gift of £184 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 150. The Roman Catholic chapels of Ballymoney and Bryansford have an attendance of respectively 2,815 and 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,008 Churchmen, 718 Presbyterians, 5 other Protestant dissenters, and 4,931 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools had on their books 386 boys and 329 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £20 from Lady Roden; two, with respectively £18 and £21 from Lady Annesley; and three, with respectively £8, £10, and £12 from the National Board.

KILCOOLE, a parish on the coast, and in the north-east corner of the barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It contains the villages of KILCOOLE and DOWNS. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,476 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,359; in 1841, 2,460. Houses 383. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,992. Houses 294. The coast comprises a great extent of salt marsh, part of which, called the marsh of Cooldross, has long had the reputation of being remarkably efficacious in restoring surfeited horses. The interior, though generally poor in soil and upland in character, exhibits much beauty, both in the variety of its surface, and the embellishments of its cultivation. A chief series of interesting features is noticed under the word HERMITAGE: which see. Altadore, the seat of the Rev. Mr. Hepenstall, crowns a hill which forms one of the screens of the beautiful glen of Hermitage; Tinny Park, the seat of Mr. Jessop, is situated adjacent to the public road below the gate of Hermitage; Ballygannon, the seat of James Scott, Esq., is situated near the shore; and Kilquade and Spring farm, the villas of Messrs. O'Reilly and Hudson, are situated about a mile inland from the village of Kilcoole. Other pleasing residences are Laurel Lodge, Darraghville, Drummin Lodge, Birchhill, Ballyronan, Seaview, and Nassau Lodge. The south side of the Glen of the Downs is in the north-west corner. See DOWNS. The roads from Bray to Rathdrum and Wicklow traverse the interior. The village of Kilcoole stands on the Bray and Wicklow road, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile from the sea-beach, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Newton-Mount-Kennedy. It contains a good inn, and has fairs on Whit-Monday and September 4. A rock in front of it commands a good view of the immediately circumjacent country. Area of the village, 29 acres. Pop., in 1831, 469; in 1841, 296. Houses 59.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DELGANY [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £260 0s. 5d. The church is in ruins. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800 at one service, and 1,000 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Newcastle. In 1831, the Protestants amounted to 739, and the Roman Catholics to 1,620; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by about 250 children; and 4 daily schools—two of which were aided by Miss Daly, one by James Scott, Esq., and one by the Roman Catholic clergyman—had on their books 156 boys and 129 girls.

KILCOOLEY, a parish in the barony of Upper Navan, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-north-east of Trim, co. Meath, Leinster. Length and breadth, each $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; area, 2,455 acres. Pop., in 1831, 196; in 1841, 303. Houses 49. The surface extends along the left bank of the Boyne, at the point where that river begins to exchange its tame for its beautiful character. Rathnally, within the limits, is the seat of John Thomson, Esq.—This parish is a curacy, and part of the benefice of TRIM [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The curatual tithes are compounded for £24 18s. 5½d., and the rectorial for £23 1s. 6½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Marquis of Drogheda. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 198.

KILCOOLEY, a parish in the barony of Roscommon, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Tulsk, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,477 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,779; in 1841, 2,005. Houses 335. The general quality of the land, though not prime, is very good. In the south is the seat of Bloomfield; and in the south-west are the seats of Ardkenagh and Corbally. The road from Tulsk to Strokestown passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARDCLARE [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £56 7s. 4½d.; and the latter are appropriated to the sinecure prebend of Kilcooley, or Kilhooley, held by the incumbent of Ardclare. There is no church; and the Roman Catholic chapels within the benefice are returned in cumulo. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 1,880; and 5 hedge-schools had on their books 246 boys and 100 girls.

KILCOOLEY, a parish in the barony of Leitrim, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,616 acres. Pop., in 1841, 576. Houses 99. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 565; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 610. The surface consists of good arable and pasture land, interspersed with a considerable amount of rocky ground; and it is traversed by the road from Loughrea to Banagher.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCOLGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh; but it does not lie contiguous with the other parishes of the benefice, and is very generally misrepresented by topographers as situated within the dio. of Clonfert. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £11, and the rectorial for £27 13s. 11d.; and the latter are appropriated to the deanery of Kilmacduagh. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 400 to 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilmeen and Leitrim. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 24, and the Roman Catholics to 629; and a daily school, held in the Roman Catholic chapel, was usually attended by about 40 children.

KILCOOLEY, a parish partly in the barony of Cranagh, co. Kilkenny, Leinster, but chiefly in the baronies of Slieveardagh and Eliogurty, co. Tipperary, Munster. The Slieveardagh section contains the village of NEW BIRMINGHAM: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Cranagh section, 328 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches; of the Eliogurty section, 2,515 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches; of the Slieveardagh section, 8,664 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches. But of the last section, 2,917 acres, 27 perches form detached districts $3\frac{1}{2}$ and 5 miles to the south-west, and 10 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches are water. The Eliogurty section also lies detached $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of the main body. Pop., in 1841, of the whole parish, 4,006; of the Cranagh section, 87; of the Eliogurty section, 261; of the rural districts of the Slieveardagh section, 3,343. Houses in the whole, 594; in the Cranagh section, 15; in the Eliogurty section, 37; in the rural districts of the Slieveardagh section, 542. The pop. of the whole, in 1831, is stated by the Census at 3,844; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 3,667. One-third of the surface is billy and light land; and the other two-thirds are land of a good quality. Kilcooley Abbey, the residence of W. Ponsonby Barker, Esq., is a fine seat, in an extensively wooded demesne; and takes its name from ruins, still existing on its grounds, of a Cistercian abbey founded in 1200 or 1209, by Donough Carbragh O'Brien, and colonized from the abbey of Jerpoint. Fairs are held in the parish on April 6 and October 10. Other mansions than Kilcooley are Hillview, Sherbourne, and Waterloo; and the hamlets are Ballynonty, Grange, and Renaghmore. The Ballynonty and Kilcooley dispensary is within the Thurles Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £177 4s. 1d., and administered to 2,610 patients.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £507 13s. 10½d.; glebe, £40 12s. 3d. Gross income, £548 6s. 1½d.; nett, £428 17s. 7½d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent is non-resident, and holds the benefice of Baragh, in the dio. of Leighlin. A curate has a salary of £138 9s. 2½d. The church was built in 1829, by means of a loan of £1,846 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, between 200 and 300. The Methodist meeting-house is attended by about 100, and the Roman Catholic chapel by between 900 and 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to the chapel of Buolick. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 612, and the Roman Catholics to 3,296; and 2 daily schools—the one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board, and the other with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, £10 from Lady Harriet Barker, and £10 from W. Barker, Esq.—had on their books 159 boys and 115 girls.

KILCOONAGH, or KILCOONY, a parish in the barony of Clare, 4 miles south-south-east of Headford, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,057 acres, 30 perches,—of which 334 acres, 36 perches are in Lough Corrib. Pop., in 1831, 1,281; in 1841, 1,609. Houses 253. The surface is washed on the west by a bay of Lough Corrib, exhibits an uninteresting appearance, and is traversed by the road from Ballinrobe to Galway. Within the limits are 7 or 8 hamlets, and various cairns and old forts. An obscurely recorded religious establishment of the age of St. Columb, figures in connection with Kilcoonagh.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of HEADFORD [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £184 3s. 6½d. But a small portion of the tithes, compounded for £14 7s. 1d., is inappropriate in John Kirwan, Esq. of Castle-Hacket. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 32 boys and 14 girls.

KILCOP, a parish in the barony of Gualtier, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, south-south-eastward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 388 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches. Pop., in 1841, 141. Houses 24. It contains the seats of Kilcop and Harbour-View.—This parish is nominally a rectory, in the dio. of Waterford; yet is practically a mere sub-denomination of CROOK: which see.

KILCOR. See KILCAR.

KILCORBAN, a hamlet in the parish of Stradbally, barony of Dunkellin, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Oranmore, co. Galway, Connaught. Fairs are held on May 25, and September 13. Here are ruins of a chapel which was dedicated to St. Corban, and is alleged to have been founded in 732. The bishop of Clonfert, in 1446, granted this chapel and an adjoining tract of land to a community of Dominican friars.

KILCORCORAN, or KILCORKERAN, a parish in the barony of Duhallow, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 1,292 acres. Pop., in 1831, 506; in 1841, 532. Houses 79. It comprises the lands of Rosline and Coolevoty.—It is a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne, entirely appropriated to the economy fund of Cloyne cathedral. The tithe composition, jointly with that of the townland of Kilroe, in the parish of Kilbrin and that of certain ploughlands in the parish of Clonmeen, amounts to £69 3s. 1d. The perpetual curate of Kanturk receives a small salary from the dean and chapter for performing the occasional duties. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kanturk. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 22 boys and 13 girls.

KILCORGAN. See KILCOLGAN.

KILCORKERAN. See KILCORCORAN.

KILCORKEY, a parish in the extreme north of the barony of Connlaena, 6 miles west of Elphin, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It contains the village of BELANAGARE: which see. Length and breadth, each $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; area, 9,090 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,897; in 1841, 3,076. Houses 557. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,867. Houses 527. The surface consists, in a general view, of gentle rising grounds intermixed with bogs. The head-streams of the Breedogue rivulet effect the drainage northward; and so frequently overflow alluvial lands on their banks as to occasion what might otherwise become fine meadow grounds, to be sheets of coarse, rank verdure. The hillocky and undulated pastures are among the most celebrated in the county. The other chief features of the parish are noticed in the article BELANAGARE: which see.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARDCARNE, in the dio. of Elphin. See ARDCARNE. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £45; and the latter are appropriated to the precentorship of Elphin cathedral. There is a Roman Catholic chapel at Belanagare. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 3,058; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 from Lord Mount-Sandford, and one with £2 from the archdeacon of Elphin—had on their books 152 boys and 99 girls.

KILCORMUCK, a parish in the baronies of Gorey and Ballaghkeen, 5 miles south-east of Ferns, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Gorey section, 4,244 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches; of the Ballaghkeen section, 5,810 acres, 3 roods, 1 perch. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,490; in 1841, 2,743. Houses 481. Pop. of the Gorey section, in 1831, 1,064; in 1841, 1,170. Houses 209. The surface consists, in general, of good land, and is drained partly westward by a small affluent of the Slaney, and partly eastward to the Irish Sea by the rivulet Awin-Banna. The chief seat is Mount-George; and the hamlets are the Harrow, Boleyvogue, and Clondaw.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £526 4s. 0½d.; glebe, £48. Gross income, £574 4s. 0½d.; nett, £466 8s. 0½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built about the year 1766, partly by aid from the late Board of First Fruits; and enlarged in 1831, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d., from that Board. Sittings 350; attendance 140. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Clone. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 400, and the Roman Catholics to 2,104; a Protestant Sunday school had on its books 33 boys and 26 girls; and 4 daily schools—one of which was aided with £4 a-year from the rector—were usually attended in summer by about 242 children.

KILCORMUCK, a quondam parish in the barony of Fassadining, and vicarage in the dio. of Ossory, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It seems to have been merged into BALLYRAGGET: which see.

KILCORMUCK, King's co. See FRANKFORD.

KILCORNAN, a parish in the barony of Kenry, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Askeaton, co. Limerick, Munster. It contains the village of STONEHALL: which see. Length and breadth, each 4 miles; area, 9,346 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,839; in 1841, 3,856. Houses 629. The surface is washed on the north by the estuary of the Shannon, and drained thither by several rills and rivulets; the chief of which is called the Washpool. The land is all profitable, and is aggregately of second-rate quality. Castle-town, the seat of John Waller, Esq., and the principal mansion of the parish, is beautifully situated near the large village of Pallas-Kenry, and commands charming views of the estuary of the Shannon, and the hanging plains of co. Clare. See CASTLETOWN.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £646 3s. 1d.; glebe, £120. Gross income, £766 3s. 1d.; nett, £612 2s. 8½d. Patron, John Waller, Esq. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kilmow, or Crookhaven, in the dio. of Cork. A curate has a salary of £100, and the use of the glebe-house. The church was built in 1830, by means of a donation of £400 from John Waller, Esq., and a loan of £1,072 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, about 200. A school-house is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of from 100 to 120. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively about 700, and about 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Cappa. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 407, and the Roman Catholics to 3,608; a daily school, salaried with £10 from Mr. Waller, was attended by about 80 children in summer; and 3 other daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from subscription and about £5 from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 151 boys and 60 girls.

KILCORNAN, or KILCORAN, a parish $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by north of Tipperary, and on the western border of the barony of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,157 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches. Pop., in 1841, 631. Houses 96. The Census of 1831 does not notice the parish; and the Ecclesiastical Authorities state the pop. of that year at 153. The land seems to lie on a basis of averagely about 400 feet above sea-level. The only noticeable objects are the ruins of the old church, and the site of Loughny Castle.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £52 10s. The rectories of Kilcornan, BALLINACLOUGH, and DROMKEEN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilcornan, and corps of the archdeaconry of Emly. The parishes are not contiguous; and Dromkeen is a perpetual curacy. Pop., in 1831, 364. Gross income, £108 10s.; nett, £70 1s. 6d.; but both of these sums are exclusive of £356 19s. 1d. arising from rent of archdeaconry lands. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure and unendowed prebend of Dollardstown, and the benefices of Arbraccan, Liscarton, Rateyne, Churchtown, Martry, and Clonmacduff, in the dio. of Meath. There is no church; and the perpetual curate of Dromkeen performs the occasional duties. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish were all Roman Catholics, and the inhabitants of the union, including Dromkeen, consisted of 21 Protestants and 908 Roman Catholics.

KILCORNAN, co. Galway. See KILCOLGAN.

KILCORNANE, or KILCORNEY, a parish in the barony of Burren, 7 miles north-west by north of Corrofin, co. Clare, Munster. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,352 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches. Pop., in 1831, 335; in 1841, 330. Houses 50. The surface lies a little south of the centre of the barony, and partakes the peculiarly broken, rocky, and hilly character of Burren. Among objects of interest are caves, a cromlech, and the ruins of an old castle.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Kilfenora. Tithe composition, £20; glebe, £14. The rectories of Kilcornane, KILHENNY, and OUGHTMANNA [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilcornane, and corps of the chancellorship of Kilfenora cathedral. Pop., in 1831, 1,593. Gross income, £179; nett, £168 11s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the perpetual curacy of Newtown-Ardes, in the dio. of Down; and is non-resident in Kilcornane benefice. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapels are in Kilbenny and Oughtmanna. In 1834, the inhabitants of the union were all Roman Catholics; and 2 hedge-schools in Kilcornane and Oughtmanna had on their books 120 boys and 35 girls.

KILCORNEY, a parish in the barony of West Muskerry, 4 miles east by south of Mill-Street, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 8,836 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,257; in 1841, 1,761. Houses 296. The surface includes part of the north side of Muskerry Mountain, and contains 6 ploughlands, chiefly upland, but all capable of improvement, and in a state of cultivation. Several mountain streams unite in the interior to form the Racool rivulet, which falls into the Blackwater, 3 miles below Mill-Street. A religious house formerly stood on the site of the parochial burying-ground; and a Danish fort occurs at Dounour. No road traverses the parish; but that from Mill-Street to Mallo passes near.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £147 13s. 10d.; glebe, £15. Gross income, £162 13s. 10d.; nett, £153 4s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the stipendiary curacy of Kilbrin, and resides in Clonmeen. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Clonmeen. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and 2 hedge-schools were usually attended by about 75 children.

KILCOURSEY, a barony in the extreme north of King's co., Leinster. It is bounded, on the south-west, by the barony of Garrycastle; on the south and south-east, by the barony of Ballycowan; and on all other sides, by co. Westmeath. Its greatest length and breadth are each $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its area is 19,287 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches,—of which 7 acres, 3 roods are water. The river Brosna, flowing through the interior, meanders, for the most part, along a luxuriant plain. The surface of the barony is all champaign; most of it is nearly level ground; and a considerable proportion is bog. The castle of Kilcoursey, once a place of considerable strength, and now the property of Charles Baggott, Esq., is situated near the village of Clara. Kilcoursey barony was formerly called Fox's Country, and belonged to the tanist family of Shenagh or Fox; and it now gives the title of Viscount to the noble family of Lambart, Earls of Cavan.—This barony contains the whole of the parish of Kilbride-Langan, and part of the parishes of Ardnorcher, Kilcumreagh, and Kilmonaghan. The chief villages are Clara and Charlestown. Pop., in 1831, 8,774; in 1841, 9,204. Houses 1,644. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,063; in manufactures and trade, 437; in other pursuits, 258. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,406; who could read but not write, 747; who could neither read nor write, 1,803. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 625; who could read but not write, 1,158; who could neither read nor write, 2,321. Kilcoursey barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Tullamore. The total number of tenements valued is 1,673; and of these, 1,159 were valued under £5,—241, under £10,—96, under £15,—42, under £20,—26, under £25,—14, under £30,—23, under £40,—15, under £50,—and 57, at and above £50.

KILCOWAN. See KILCOAN.

KILCOWANMORE, a parish in the barony of Bantry, 5 miles south-south-west of Enniscorthy, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 2,760 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches. Pop., in 1831, 630; in 1841, 703. Houses 117. It lies in the basin of the Boro rivulet; and its water-level descends from 144 to 82 feet. The chief residence is Ballybrennan.—This parish is an inappropriate curacy in the dio. of Ferns, and forms part of the benefice of Owenduff, yet lies 6 miles distant from the nearest members of that benefice. See OWENDUFF. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 628; and a hedge-school was usually attended by about 40 children.

KILCREA, an interesting locality in the vale of the western Bride, on the southern border of the barony of East Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. A dreary morass which formerly occupied the centre of the Bride's vale, and was known as the bog of Kilcrea, was a dangerous fastness, rendered impervious to ordinary travellers, by matted bushes, and a wild profusion of rank and useless vegetation. In ancient times, this morass, in common with much of the lofty uplands which sheltered it, was sheeted with forest; so late as 1626, it was the haunt of wolves; and in 1705, it began to undergo draining and reclamation. The castle and the friary of Kilcrea, both built in the 15th century by Cormac Laider, Lord of Muskerry, stand on the right bank of the Bride, about $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by west of Cork, and are approached by a long and narrow bridge, which appears to be as old as themselves, and which blends with their venerable forms in producing a highly picturesque and interesting scene. The castle was a seat of the MacCarthys, Lords of Muskerry, and Earls of Clancarty, and appears, from its ruins, to have been a pile of much strength, and of considerable but rude magnificence. A staircase of dark marble—of which there are quarries in the vicinity—led from the ground floor to the summit of the structure, a height of about 70 feet; barbicans, platforms, a ditch, and other outworks, constituted the defences; and a large field or bawn on the east side was used for the recreations of the inmates of the castle by day, and the shelter of the cattle of the domain by night. The whole pile is still in a comparatively high state of preservation. About two fields to the east of it stand the ruins of the Franciscan friary. They "occupy a retired and beautiful position on the banks of the Bride. The most desirable entrance is approached through an avenue of venerable trees; and it will be readily supposed, that such a mode of advance greatly conduces towards preparing the mind for the reception of solemn impressions. It would appear, from the ruins, that the buildings were not of great extent, nor do they exhibit the traces of any architectural peculiarities. They resemble, in design and character, the remains of several other ecclesiastical structures in Ireland, known to have been erected in the 15th century; and thus assist in showing that the pointed style of that era, as regards this island, differed little from the architectural mode prevailing at the same time in Britain. From the excellence of the materials—quarries of marble being found in the vicinity—this edifice was of superior delicacy to many in less favoured parts of the country; but there are no indications of it having, even in the interior, partaken largely of embellishment. The nave and choir of the abbey church are still remaining, with pointed arches, sustained by massy columns composed of marble. An awful melancholy hangs over this place. Piled in high and wide banks, and likewise placed in various parts of the moss-grown ruins, are human skulls and bones, in number perhaps amounting to many thousands,—a ghastly scene of mortality, showing little reverence for the dead, or respect for the survivor's feelings!" [Brewer's Ireland.] In the choir are many decaying monuments; within the precincts are the ashes of five or six Lords of Muskerry, and one bishop of Ross; and all around are the sepulchral insignia, and the fattened and stenchy soil, of a popular and crowded place of burial. The friary made a conspicuous figure among the monastic institutions of the south of Ireland; and successively at the dissolution and after the war of 1641, it was given respectively to the Lords of Muskerry, and to Lord Broghill, the conqueror of Muskerry on the field of Knockiclashy. A nunnery is alleged, on obscure authority, and only on such evidence as will satisfy monastic writers, to have existed at Kilcrea so early as the 6th century, and to have been under St. Cyra or Cera as its superioress.

KILCREGAN, a parish on the coast of the barony of Imokilly, 5 miles south-east of Castle-Martyr, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,014 acres. Pop., in 1831, 573; in 1841, 620. Houses 105. The surface is washed on the south by Ballycotton bay; and consists, in general, of good land,—some of which produces excellent crops of barley and wheat. Ballycregan-castle, situated near the east end of Ballycotton strand, was an old seat of the Tynto family.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Cloyne. Vicarial tithe composition, £40; glebe, £10. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £80; and are appropriated to the precentorship of Cloyne cathedral. The vicarages of Kilcregan, GARRYVOE, and KILMACDONOUGH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilcregan. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, 3½; Pop., in 1831, 4,832. Gross income, £478 3s. 11½d.; nett, £447 15s. 2½d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built about two centuries ago; and contains two curious old sepulchral monuments. Sittings 150; attendance 17. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Kilmacdonough. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 621; the Protestants of the union to 60, and the Roman Catholics to 4,704; two daily schools in the parish—the one salaried with £25 from the vicar and other subscribers, and the other aided with donations from the Roman Catholic clergyman—were usually attended by about 72 children; and there were 3 daily schools and a Sunday school in the other parishes of the union.

KILCREGAN, an alleged parish in the barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. The majority of topographers notice it as a separate parish, and say that two-thirds of its tithes are appropriated to the benefice of Lisgoold. But the Kilcregan really connected with Lisgoold, is the sinecure rectory of Kilcregan in Imokilly, which, jointly with Lisgoold union, constitutes the corps of the precentorship of Cloyne.

KILCREGAN, a parish in the barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, Munster. Post-town, Milltown. Length and breadth, each 1 mile; area, 2,486 acres. Pop., in 1831, 782; in 1841, 764. Houses 118.

The surface of the parochial union to which it belongs, consists of nearly equal proportions of good and bad land; and a large proportion of the bad is bog.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of MOLAHIFFE [which see], in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £36 18s. 5d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Shea Lalor, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Molahiffe and Kilbonane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 826; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 57 boys and 20 girls.

KILCREGAN, a coast-guard and a fishing station, in the barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It is situated ½ of a mile south of Carrigaholt, on a small peninsula which projects into the estuary of the Shannon, and shelters the west side of Carrigaholt bay. In 1836, there were employed in the fisheries within the district of the station, 77 row-boats and 308 men.

KILCREEST, or KILCRIEST. See KILCHRIST.

KILCROAN, a parish, 1½ mile south-west of Ballymoe, and on the eastern border of the half barony of Ballymoe, and of co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the villages of TOBER and CORNAUCK-LACH: which see. Length, southward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 7,701 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches,—of which 10 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,354; in 1841, 2,178. Houses 408. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,901. Houses 349. The surface is bounded on the east by the Suck, and traversed through the interior by the road from Ballymoe to Dunmore; and it consists to a large extent of bog, but contains a considerable proportion of good land. The chief residences are Greenland Lodge, Roseberry, and Turlough; and the hamlets are Lower Kilsallagh, Upper Kilsallagh, Ballyglass, and Ballinabuck.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DONAMON [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £53 7s.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Essex. The Roman Catholic chapel at Glinsk has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilbeguet. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 2,417; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by about 30 children; and 2 daily schools—one of which was partly supported by the London Hibernian Societies—had on their books 28 boys and 31 girls.

KILCROHANE, a parish, 15 miles south-west of Kenmare, and constituting the south-western district of the barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the village of SNEEM: which see. Length, 14 miles; breadth, 6; area, 63,702 acres. Pop., in 1831, 9,481; in 1841, 10,776. Houses 1,906. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 10,559. Houses 1,860. It lies between the Kenmare estuary on the south, and the alpine summit-line between Dunkerrin and Iveragh on the north; and extends from the Blackwater rivulet on the east, to Ballinskelligs bay, Hog Head, the Hog Islands, and Lamb Head on the west. See articles DUNKERRIN, KENMARE, BLACKWATER, BALLINSKELIGS, HOG, and LAMB. "If its extent," says Dr. Smith, "was to be estimated by the number of hours it would take a person to travel through it on horseback, it would be then thought prodigious large; for in many places it is almost impassable, because of the infinite number of rocky hills and deep bogs dispersed through it." The whole surface may be succinctly described as almost a wilderness of mountain and bog. A large district of it, called Ballybog or Bally, is supereminent in at once bogs, brokenness, and boldness, and has been separately noticed: see BALLY. A small district of prime popular interest to the great majority of Irishmen, and of considerable interest also to both the antiquary and the lover of romantic landscape, contains the most noted demesne of the parish, the paternal home of Daniel O'Connell, Esq., and the ruins of Aghamore or Darrynane Abbey, and has been noticed under the word DARRYNANE: which see. Two rivulets, one of which abounds with trout and salmon, discharge themselves into the harbour of Sneem, about the middle of the coast: see SNEEM. The cell or hermitage, popularly ascribed to St. Crohane, the patron of the parish, is an artificial excavation in the solid rock on the top of a hill, about a mile from the old parochial church, and exudes stalactitic formations, which are carried off and preserved by the superstitious peasantry, as objects possessed of many virtues. Antiquaries of a certain class squabble among themselves as to whether this cave or a neighbouring grotto claims the celebrity of having been the place in which St. Kieran, native of Cape Clear, and pretended first bishop of Saigar in Ossory, composed his alleged monastic rule. An ancient circular fort, constructed of large stones 7 feet high, occurs at Cahirdonnell. The road from Kenmare by Sneem to Cahirciveen winds along the coast, and passes close to Darrynane abbey.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ardert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £258 9s. 2½d.; glebe, £30. The rectories of Kilcrohane and Templehoe [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilcrohane. Length, 20 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 13,350. Gross income, £450 15s. 3½d.; nett, £403 6s. 6½d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent is non-resident, and holds also the benefice of Desertserges, in the dio. of Cork. Two curates have salaries of respectively £60 and £69 4s. 7½d. Kilcrohane church was built in 1810, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance 40. There is a church also in Templehoe. Four Roman Catholic chapels in Kilcrohane have each an attendance of 250; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Templehoe. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 164, and the Roman Catholics to 9,990; the Protestants of the union to 271, and the Roman Catholics to 14,027; 3 daily schools in the parish had on their books 195 boys and 50 girls; and 6 daily schools in the union had 261 boys and 85 girls. One of the Kilcrohane schools was supported by a bequest of £10 from the late General O'Connell, and annual grants of £5 from Daniel O'Connell, Esq., and £5 from Mr. Hartupp; one received small annual grants from Mr. Bland and the incumbent; and the third was under the superintendence of the Roman Catholic clergyman, who paid for 30 boys attending it.

KILCROHANE, a parish in the western division of the barony of West Carbery, 13 miles south-west of Bantry, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 14,588 acres. Pop., in 1841, 4,856. Houses 801. It consists of the rugged and mountainous peninsula which separates Dunmanus bay from the bay of Bantry. See DUNMANUS and BANTRY.—This parish is ecclesiastically united to that of Durrus; and the two constitute the ecclesiastical parish of DURRUS-KILCROHANE: which see.

KILCROHANE, co. Waterford. See KILCOCKAN.

KILCRONAGHAN, a parish in the barony of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the small post-town of TUBBERMORE: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3¼; area, 7,992 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,186; in 1841, 4,345. Houses 754. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,507; in 1841, 3,820. Houses 644. The surface is watered eastward along the north, by the Moyola rivulet, and traversed northward through the interior by the road from Money-more to Dungiven. Much of the land is mountain, moor, and bog; and a large proportion has a light but productive sandy soil. The demesne of Fort-William, and the seat of the Rev. J. Spenser Knox, are on the northern border.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £350; glebe, £150. Gross income, £500; nett, £430 15s. 11½d. The incumbent is resident, and holds also the contiguous benefice of Maghera. A curate has a salary of £84, and the use of the glebe-house and 5 acres of land. The church is an ancient building, in good repair. Sittings 150; attendance, from 90 to 120. A Protestant dissenting meeting-house, not designated by any particular name, has an attendance of 400; and a meeting-house belonging to the Presbyterian General Assembly, has an attendance of from 200 to 400. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 534 Churchmen, 1,382 Presbyterians, 575 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,864 Roman Catholics; 6 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 375 children; a girls' daily school was attended on the average by 42 or 45 girls; and 6 other daily schools had on their books 327 boys and 111 girls. Three of the daily schools were salaried with respectively £8, £8, and £10 from the National Board; one with about £10 10s. from the London Hibernian Societies; one, with £5 from the rector; and one, with £3 from the rector, £1 from the curate, and some advantages from Sir James Bruce.

KILCRUMP, a locality, near which is found perfectly black marble, in the parish of Whitechurch, barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster.

KILCRUMPER, a parish, 1¼ mile south-west of Kilworth, and partly in the barony of Fermoy, but chiefly in that of Condons and Clangibbon, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Fermoy section, 1,689 acres; of the Condons and Clangibbon section, 1,827 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,408; in 1841, 1,228. Houses 183. Pop. of the Fermoy section, in 1831, 564; in 1841, 646. Houses 95. The surface comprises the beautiful peninsula immediately above the confluence of the Blackwater and the Funcheon; and is traversed southward by the road from Mitchellstown to Cork, and eastward by that from Doneraile to Lismore.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILWORTH [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. Vicarial tithe composition, £220; glebe, £70 8s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £220; and are impropriate in the Norcott family. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 35, and the Roman Catholics to 1,154; and a hedge-school had on its books 14 boys and 16 girls.

KILCULLANE. See KILKELLANE.

KILCULLEN, a small barony on the east side of co. Kildare, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by Connell; on the north-east, by South Naas; on the east, by South Naas and co. Wicklow; on the south and south-west, by Narragh and Rheban; and on the west, by Ophaly. Length, southward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 3¼; area, 8,492 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches,—of which 27 acres 25 perches are in the river Liffey. Pop., in 1831, 3,172; in 1841, 3,324. Houses 548. It contains the whole of the parish of Kilcullen, and a portion of the parish of Tully, which, in 1831, contained a pop. of 254; and it is thus very nearly identical with the former of these parishes. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 388; in manufactures and trade, 142; in other pursuits, 58. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 627; who could read but not write, 254; who could neither read nor write, 565. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 457; who could read but not write, 364; who could neither read nor write, 651. Kilcullen barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Naas. The total number of tenements valued is 611; and of these, 356 were valued under £5,—102, under £10,—52, under £15,—22, under £20,—19, under £25,—7, under £30,—14, under £40,—13, under £15,—and 26, at and above £50.

KILCULLEN, a parish in the barony of Kilcullen, co. Kildare, Leinster. It contains most of the village of KILCULLEN-BRIDGE and the whole of OLD KILCULLEN: see next two articles. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 7,344 acres, 3 roods, 35 perches,—of which 27 acres, 25 perches are in the river Liffey. Pop., in 1831, 2,918; in 1841, 3,020. Houses 497. Pop., exclusive of Kilcullen-Bridge, in 1831, 2,219; in 1841, 2,374. Houses 399. The northern district consists of a beautiful, deep, winding portion of the valley of the Liffey; and the southern district is hilly, tumulated, and of diversified character, with considerable beauty and embellishment. Near Kilcullen-Bridge, and charmingly situated on the Liffey, is Castle-Martin, the seat of W. H. Carter, Esq.; and 3 miles south of Kilcullen-Bridge, and closely adjacent to the road from Dublin to New Ross, is Halverstown, the neat and highly improved seat of Peter Purcell, Esq. Other residences are Gormanstown, Gilbinstown, Sunny-Cottage, and Halverstown-Cottage. A height in the vicinity of Gilbinstown has an altitude of 610 feet. In the valley of the Liffey, above Kilcullen-Bridge, are the ruins of NEW-ABBEY: see that article.—This parish is nominally a perpetual curacy, but practically a vicarage, in the dio. of Dublin. Curatual tithe composition, £97 13s. 11d.; glebe, £37 6s. 6d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £234 12s. 11d.; and are appropriated, in the proportions of £197 6s. 5d. and £37 6s. 6d., to respectively the chancellorship and the precentorship of Christ-church, Dublin. The perpetual curacy of Kilcullen, and the vicarages of DAVIDSTOWN and GILTOWN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilcullen. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 8. Pop., in 1831, 5,635. Gross income, £278 7s. 2½d.; nett, £247 18s. 6½d. Patron of Kilcullen, the chancellor of Christ-church, Dublin; of Davidstown, the Crown; and of Giltown, the diocesan. The church was built in 1815, by means of £134 15s. 4½d. raised by the sale of pews, and £923 1s. 6½d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits; and enlarged, in 1827, by means of a loan of £125 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 200; attendance, from 80 to 150. Calverstown school-house is also used as a parochial place of worship in summer, and has an attendance of about 100. Two Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 264, and the Roman Catholics to 2,727; the Protestants of the union to 659, and the Roman Catholics to 5,112; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended in summer by about 30 children; 6 daily schools in the parish had on their books 249 boys and 176 girls; and 9 daily schools in the union had on their books 279 boys and 221 girls, and were attended by about 18 other children. Two of the daily schools in the parish were salaried with respectively £3 and £2 from Mr. Carter; one, with £18 from Mr. Purcell; one with £20 from the National Board; one with £6 from Mr. Burrowes, and £6 from the Rev. Mr. Hardy; and one, with £8 from the Rev. Mr. Roberts.

KILCULLEN-BRIDGE, a small market and post town, partly in the parish of Carnalway and barony of South Naas, but chiefly in the parish and barony of Kilcullen, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on the river Liffey, and on the road from Dublin to Carlow, 2 miles north by east of Old Kilcullen, 5½ south by west of Naas, 8½ north by east of Ballytore, 9¼ north-east by north of Athy, and 21¼ south-south-west of Dublin. In 1319, a bridge was erected here over the Liffey, by Maurice Jakis, a canon of the church of Kildare; and occasioned both the origin and the affixual name of the present village. The place is beautiful in situation, and possesses importance as a stage on the great thoroughfare to Carlow and New Ross; but it has no manufactures, and very little trade. Fairs are held on Feb. 2, March 25, June 22, Sept. 29, Oct. 2, and Dec. 8. A fever hospital and a dispensary here are within the Naas Poor-law union. The hospital contains 23 beds, and could contain 8 more; and, in 1839-40, it expended £248 3s. 4d., and admitted 197 patients. The dispensary serves for a district of 40,295 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 10,741; and, in 1839-40, it expended £36 10s. 8d., and administered to 1,394 patients. Area of the Carnalway section of the town, 15 acres; of the Kilcullen section, 26 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 699; in 1841, 1,056. Houses 171. Pop. of the Kilcullen section, in 1841, 646. Houses 98. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 16; in manufactures and trade, 80; in other pursuits, 21. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 84; on their own manual labour, 28. Pop. of the South Naas section, in 1841, 410. Houses 73. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 32; in manufactures and trade, 32; in other pursuits, 17. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 32; on their own manual labour, 44; on means not specified, 1.

KILCULLEN (OLD), a hamlet, and formerly a walled town, in the parish and barony of Kilcullen, co. Kildare, Leinster. It now consists of only a cluster of ancient ruins, and a thin and small aspersed of poor cabins. The ruins crown a hill which rises rather abruptly, within about a mile of the south bank of the Liffey; they consist of part of an old monastery, part of an ancient pillar-tower, and many curious sculptured stones; and they are enclosed by a circular wall which zones the crest of the hill. The town appears to have been both ancient and important; and even at a comparatively recent date, it had seven gates, one of which was an arch of 10 feet span; but it sustained a blow to its prosperity by the erection of the bridge, which occasioned the erection of Kilcullen-Bridge village; it gradually lost its importance as the transition from feudal to peaceful times drew population from seats of military strength on hills to seats of easy traffic in valleys, and it has eventually bequeathed to the modern and rival village in the vicinity almost every remnant of its importance, except its ruins and its historical associations. Evidence exists in the ruin of the turraghan, and in a strong tradition respecting the erection of a church about the middle of the 5th century, that at a very early period, Kilcullen was at least a nucleus town. A territory which is early ages, was called Caëlen, Galon or Coalan, from its being almost a continuous forest, and which was bounded on the east by the Wicklow mountains, on the south and west by the river Barrow, and on the north by the Liffey and part of the bog of Allen, is supposed to have had Kilcullen for its capital, and to have given it the name Kil-Coalan,—subsequently corrupted into Kilcolyn and Kilcullen, and eventually qualified by the epithet Old. A Saint Isernin, who died in 469, is usually designated the first bishop of Kilcullen; and a Christian church of some kind may be supposed to have existed at the place about the time assigned to his pastorate. Successively in 936, 944, and 1037, the church and the town were plundered and burned; in 1115, the church was declared to be a cathedral, and the town made the seat of a bishopric, but they seem to have been soon stripped of their new character; after the Conquest, the church was granted to Christ-church, Dublin, by William the Marshal, Earl of Pembroke; during several ages, the town was the property of the powerful family of Penkoyle, and temporarily took from them the name of Penkoyle in lieu of Kilcolyn; and, in 1252, Henry de Penkoyle, for the sum of 100 shillings, released to the prior of Christ-church the advowson of the church. The part of the pillar-tower remaining at Old Kilcullen does not exceed 35 feet in height; its door faces the north, and is about 6½ feet from the ground; and only one small window or loop-hole pierces the other portions of the pile. A very fine circular arch stood till recently between the chancel and the nave of the old church, but has been destroyed. In the church is the full-length effigies of a mailed knight, probably designed to commemorate a member of the extinct family of Penkoyle. On the north of the churchyard is the pedestal of an ancient stone-cross; and east of the pillar-tower is the shaft of another old stone-cross, consisting of a single stone 10 feet high, and exhibiting, in its different compartments, very numerous figures, most of which are of unknown import. In 1798, a large party of rebels posted in the churchyard of Old Kilcullen, were menaced by Captain Erskine of the 9th dragoons and Captain Cookes of the Romneys; and observing that these gallant officers dashed forward without being duly supported by their men, they rushed down the hill, and overwhelmed and slew the captains. Animated by their success, they assembled in great numbers on the high grounds over Kilcullen-Bridge, and prepared to attack it. But General Dundas, who was stationed in the village, anticipated their movement, and "marched out 80 of the Suffolk, flanked by Captain Robert Latouche's corps of yeomen cavalry. As the general ascended the hill, a fire was commenced by the rebels, who were drawn up 10 or 12 deep. The general made the infantry reserve their fire until within 15 yards of the rebel's lines; they then poured in a volley, killing hundreds; the rebels threw away their arms, brogues, and every incumbrance, and betook to precipitate flight; in the active pursuit of Captain Latouche's corps, several hundreds were slain." In 1535, Thomas FitzEustace, afterwards Viscount Baltinglass, was created Baron of Kilcullen. Pop. of the hamlet returned with the parish.

KILCULLIHEEN, a parish 1½ mile east-north-east of the city of Waterford, and partly within the municipal boundaries of that city, partly in the barony of Gualtier, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1. Area of the city section, 100 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches; of the Gualtier section, 2,137 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,353; in 1841, 1,515. Houses 257. Pop. of the city section, in 1841, 719. Houses

122. Previous to the new arrangements under the Act 3 and 4 Victoria, the whole parish belonged to the county of the city of Waterford; and as it lies on the left bank of the Suir, which, for the most part, divides co. Waterford from co. Kilkenny, most topographers mistakingly assign it to the barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. The surface consists in general of good land; declines with a rather rapid slope to the Suir; contributes largely to the fine series of landscapes which environ the city of Waterford; and derives considerable embellishment from the demesnes of Newpark and Belmont, the residences respectively of Sir John Newport, Bart., and of H. W. Barron, Esq.; and also from the mansions and villas of Annmount, Rockland, Christendom, Sion-Hill, Suir-Lodge, Rockingham, Laurel-Hill, Mountain-View, Newrath, Riverview, Rockshire, and Mount-Misery. The villages are Ferrybank and Milepost. See FERRYBANK. A nunnery was founded at Kilculliheen, in 1151, by Dermot, son of Murchard, king of Leinster; it was a cell to the nunnery of St. Mary de Hoggis, near Dublin, and also bore the name of the nunnery de Bello Porta; and it was endowed by John Earl of Morton, afterwards King John, and by David Fitz-Milo.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £45; and the rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Macully, are compounded for £135, and are inappropriate in the corporation of the city of Waterford. The vicarages of Kilculliheen and MACULLY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilculliheen. Pop., in 1831, 1,756. Gross income, £78 6s. 8d.; nett, £71 6s. 5½d. Patron, the corporation of Waterford. The incumbent is non-resident, and holds also the benefice of Hook, and the inappropriate curacy of Templetown, in the dio. of Ferns. A curate has a salary of £50. The church was built in 1823, by means of a loan of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 115. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Rathpatrick and Kilmakevogue. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 145, and the Roman Catholics to 1,226; the Protestants of the union to 150, and the Roman Catholics to 1,652; but 10 of the Protestants of the parish were Dissenters; and in the same year, a pay daily school in the parish had on its books 40 boys and 20 girls; and there was also a pay daily school in Macully.

KILCULLY, a parish in the barony of Cork, 2½ miles north of the city of Cork, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,760 acres. Pop., in 1831, 447; in 1841, 488. Houses 67. The road from Cork to Mallow passes through the interior. The land averages in annual value, 27s. per acre.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition and gross income, £127 19s. 8d.; nett, £85 15s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. A licensed house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of from 20 to 60. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 25, and the Roman Catholics to 435.

KILCUMMER, a parish in the barony of Fermoy, 1½ mile west-north-west of Castletownroche, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1; area, 2,613 acres. Pop., in 1831, 812; in 1841, 783. Houses 131. The surface, with the exception of 647 acres of mountainous ground, consists of good land; it contains the demesnes of Kilcummer and Renny; and it is traversed by the road from Castletownroche to Doneraile. Fairs are held on April 21, July 21, Sept. 21, and Dec. 21.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, but previous to 1834 was part of the benefice of Castletownroche, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition and gross income, £133; nett, £124 11s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. There is neither church nor chapel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 813; and a pay daily school had on its books 9 boys and 6 girls.

KILCUMMIN, a parish in the barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the pleasant small post-town and military station of OUCHTERARD: which see. Length, 16½ miles; breadth, 9½; area, 108,791 acres, 6 perches,—of which 10,281 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches are in Lough Corrib, and 4,729 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 9,848; in 1841, 10,824. Houses 1,907. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 10,106. Houses 1,792. Two detached districts lie respectively on Costello bay, and at Cashel-house on the bay of Galway. The main body comprises the northern division of the district of Iar-Connaught, from Lough Corrib westward to the Atlantic, and from the boundary of Cunnamara proper southward to the centre of Moycullen. Its central parts are bog, moor, and mountain; its seaboard or western coast comprises a considerable aggregate of indifferent arable land; and its eastern border, along Lough Corrib, is, in a general view, a comparatively rich band of country, rendered fertile by its limestone substratum and soil, and considerably beautified, both by natural grace and variety of contour, and by field cultivation and demesne embellishment. See CUNNEMARA, and CORRIB (Lough). The principal heights are situated in the central district, and have altitudes of 1,138, 737, and 627 feet. Lough Lettercraffoe, on the east border, has a surface elevation of 506 feet. The chief stream is the pretty rivulet FROOH: which see. Clareville, the lodge of A. F. St. George, Esq., adjoins Oughterard on the west; and Corribdale, Robert Martin, Esq.,—Lemonfield, T. H. O'Flaherty, Esq.,—and Portacairn, Mr. Nolan,—are situated south of Oughterard, and near Lough Corrib. The road from Galway to Clifden passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory and a perpetual curacy. The rectory is part of the wardenship, peculiar jurisdiction, and united benefice of Galway. See GALWAY (County of the Town of). Tithe composition, £35. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice in the dio. of Tuam; but besides having £35 of tithe composition from its own parish, a glebe worth £13 11s. 6d., and an augmentation salary of £55 8s. out of Boulter's Fund, it is endowed with £33 6s. 8d. of tithe composition from the parish of Moycullen, £39 0s. 6d. from that of Rahoon, and £60 from that of Ballinacourty. Gross income, £236 6s. 8d.; nett, £203 7s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated in Oughterard, and was built in 1810, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitzings 70; attendance, from 20 to 30. Service is also conducted every Sabbath at the barrack, for the convenience of the military. The Oughterard and Killeen Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance, the former of from 1,300 to 1,500, and the latter of about 500; 2 private houses at Lettermullen and Kilbrickane, are also used for Roman Catholic service, and have considerable congregations; and these places, jointly with a private house at Lettermore, in the parish of Killannin, are served by 5 Roman Catholic clergymen. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 138, and the Roman Catholics to 10,359; and seven hedge-schools were attended, on the average, by about 187 children.

In 1838, the National Board granted £133 6s. 8d. toward the erection at Oughterard of a school which was expected to be attended by about 400 children.

KILCUMMIN, a parish 4 miles north-north-west of Killarney, and forming the north-east district of the barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 38,953 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches. Pop., in 1831, 6,637; in 1841, 7,360. Houses 1,134. It mainly consists of a part of the glen and a large portion of the northern screens and basin side of the river Flesk; and is, in a large degree, a region of mountains, moors, and bogs,—extensively waste, aggregately ill-peopled, but generally capable of reclamation for the purposes either of pasturage or of tillage. The road from Mill-street in co. Cork to Killarney, wends or straddles down its southern border; and is described by Mr. Fraser as "lying through an irregular boggy plain, having on the right the great western mountain-chain which connects with Killarney, in which the paps are pre-eminent, and on the left the vast, bleak, hilly tract running northwards to the Shannon." Some quarries of local note are worked amidst the moorish mountains, about 6 miles north-west of Killarney. The demesne of Shanagh lies on the east margin of the parish and the county, closely adjacent to the road to Mill-street; and the monastery of Rathmore is situated 1½ mile to the west of Shanagh.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLARNEY [which see], in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition, £221 10s. 9d.; glebe, £68 5s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £221 10s. 9d., and are impropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore. Two Roman Catholic chapels in the eastern section of the parish, have each an attendance of 1,300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. A Roman Catholic chapel in the western section has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killarney. In 1834, the parishioners, with only 2 exceptions, were all Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools—all of which were aided with annual grants from Lord Kenmare, and one salaried with £12 from the National Board—had on their books 162 boys and 125 girls. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Inch, Cliddagh, and Clashnagarrane.

KILCUMMIN, or KILCOMMON, a parish on the coast of the barony of Tyrawley, 4½ miles north of Killalla, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the village of RATHLACKEN: which see. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, ½; area, 4,195 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches,—of which 20 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,653; in 1841, 2,791. Houses 482. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,294. Houses 401. The surface lies on the west side of the lower part of Killalla bay; and includes the promontory of Kilcummin Head, which has an altitude of 92 feet, and screens the west side of the entrance of the bay. A large aggregate of the land is in tillage. Kilcummin or Lackan bay, which penetrates the land on the north-west side of Kilcummin Head, was the landing-place of the French troops of invasion in 1798.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LACKAN [which see], in the dio. of Killalla. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £67, and the rectorial for £93; and the latter are appropriated to the dean and precentor of Killalla cathedral. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 67, and the Roman Catholics to 2,766; and 3 daily schools—one of which was aided with £1 5s. a year from the vicar—had on their books 63 boys and 20 girls.

KILCUMNER. See KILCUMNER.

KILCUMNEY, or DRUMCREE, a parish in the barony of Delvin, 1½ mile north-west of Castletown.

Delvin, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It contains the villages of DRUMCREE and COLLINSTOWN: which see. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 2,921 acres, 13 perches,—of which 24 acres, 1 perch are water. Pop., in 1831, 870; in 1841, 959. Houses 162. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 528; in 1841, 806.* Houses 135. The surface, though containing a large aggregate of tillage land and improved bog, has a bleak and boggy appearance, relieved only by the almost continuous demesnes of Drumree, Robert Smyth, Esq.,—Derry-Cottage, Mrs. Berry,—and Ralphdale, Ralph Smyth, Esq. The road from Dublin to Granard passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £120; glebe, £45 7s. 8d. The rectories of Kilcumney, DYSERTALE, and KILLAGH, and the vicarage of KILWEILAGH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilcumney or Drumcree. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 2,449. Gross income, £265 12s. 9½d.; nett, £227 19s. 8½d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefices in co. Kerry, which constitute the corps of the precentorship of Ardfert cathedral. The church was built in 1812, by means of a donation of £1,338 9s. 2½d. from the late Wm. Smyth, Esq., and a loan of £784 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; attendance, about 60. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Kilweilagh. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 150, and the Roman Catholics to 783; the Protestants of the union to 206, and the Roman Catholics to 2,334; 2 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £4 from the rector, and £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 50 boys and 30 girls; and there were also 2 daily schools in Kilweilagh.

KILCUMREAGH, or KILCOMREAGH, a parish 2½ miles east-north-east of Moate-Grenogue, and partly in the barony of Kilcoursey, King's co., partly in the baronies of Moycashel and Clonlunan, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Kilcoursey section, 2,293 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches,—of which 7 acres, 3 roods are in Lough Ballinderry; of the Clonlunan section, 1,642 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches,—of which 23 acres, 12 perches are water; of the Moycashel section, 5,321 acres, 30 perches. Pop., of the whole, in 1831, 3,787; in 1841, 3,922. Houses 709. Pop. of the Clonlunan section, in 1831, 517; in 1841, 553. Houses 102. Pop. of the Moycashel section, in 1831, 1,808; in 1841, 1,976. Houses 342. Pop. of the Kilcoursey section, exclusive of the hamlet of FAHERAN [which see], in 1831, 1,302; in 1841, 1,393. Houses 265. The land averages in annual value from 30s. to 50s. per plantation acre. The mail-road from Dublin to Galway and Westport, passes through the interior; and has on the right the demesnes of Rosemount, Ballintubber, and Ballybeg.—all in Westmeath, while Primrose Lodge and Springfield are in King's co. The "Gap of the Wood" on the mail-road, and Knockastin in Westmeath, have altitudes of respectively 329 and 660 feet.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARDNURCHER [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, jointly with that of 4 other vicarages in the benefice, £496 18s. 1½d.; glebe of Kilcumreagh, £158 4s. 7½d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £147 13s. 10½d.; and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Downshire. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to Tubber chapel in Kilmanaghan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 122, and the Roman Catholics to 3,747; and 3 hedge-schools were usually attended by about 85 children.

KILCUNNY, a village in the parish of Drumlane, barony of Lower Loughie, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands on the left bank of the river Erne; is strictly a suburb of BELTURBET [which see]; and consists principally of a curving street, about ¼ of a mile in length, and extending westward from a new bridge which connects it with Belturbet. Pop., in 1841, 450. Houses 73.

KILCURFIN. See CARRIGTOHILL.

KILCURLY, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Armagh. Its post-town is Dundalk; and its chapels are at Kilcurly and Haggardstown.

KILDACOMOGUE. See KILDECAMOGUE.

KILDALKEY, a parish in the east border of the barony of Lune, 3 miles south by east of Athboy, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 10,415 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,931; in 1841, 3,055. Houses 523. The surface consists of good land, and is washed southward along the east by the Athboy rivulet. The chief artificial object of interest is MOYRATH [which see]; and the other noticeable residences are Cloonbarry, Ballaghtallon, Clonearneen, Rathcorinick, Woodtown, and Ballinadrimna. The village of Kildalkey stands 4 miles west by north, of Trim, on the road thence to Castletown-Delvin. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 115; in 1841, 179. Houses 30.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate curacy, attached to the benefice of ATHBOY [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The tithes are compounded for £380, and belong to Captain Ashe. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killacommigan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 105, and the Roman Catholics to 2,902; and 2 daily schools were salaried with respectively £6 and £8 from the National Board, and were attended on the average by about 120 children. In 1839, the National Board made a grant in aid of the erection of a third school.

KILDALLEN. See KILDALLON.

KILDALLOCK, or KILDALLAGH, a grange 1½ mile east by north of Coleraine, and partly in the barony of Dunluce, co. Antrim, partly in the Liberties of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 1,983 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 982; in 1841, 969. Houses 169. The Antrim section comprises only 23 acres, and is uninhabited. The arable land is rather light, yet produces excellent crops of oats, flax, potatoes, and clover.—This district, though nominally a grange, is practically a parish and a rectory, in the dio. of Connor, and forms part of the benefice of RASHARKIN: which see. Tithe composition, £73. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 21 Churchmen, 1,030 Presbyterians, and 5 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 70 children in summer; and a pay daily school had on its books 34 boys and 3 girls.

KILDALLON, a parish in the barony of Tullaghanoh, 3 miles north of Killeshandra, co. Cavan, Ulster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 11,989 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches,—of which 10 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches are in Lough Oughter, and 201 acres, 3 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 4,247; in 1841, 4,480. Houses 747. The surface is traversed through the interior by the road from Killeshandra to Ballyconnel; and washed on the east by Lough Oughter: see OUGHTER. Most of the land is of indifferent quality; but the best is very good. Among the seats are Aubaun, Greenville, Carn Cottage, Ardlogher Cottage, Bilberry, Berrymount, and Croaghan.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £203 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £333 0s. 10d. Gross income, £536 2s. 4½d.; nett, £447 3s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1816, and enlarged in 1827, by means of loans of respectively £923 1s. 6½d., and £400, from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 200. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 84, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 860; and the latter is united, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, to the chapel of Tomregan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 841 Churchmen, 287 Presbyterians, and 3,129 Roman Catholics; and 10 daily schools had on their books 450 boys and 276 girls. Three of the schools were salaried with respectively £30, £10 10s., and £7 from subscription; one, with £15 from subscription, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £8 from subscription, £7 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; one, with about £9 12s. from the London Hibernian Society; and one, with £10 from the National Board. In 1841, the Kildallon Loan Fund had a capital of £676; circulated £3,358, in 945 loans; realized a nett profit of £8 16s. 11d.; and expended for charitable purposes £17 2s. 11d.

KILDANGAN, a parish 4½ miles south-west by south of Kildare, and on the west border of the barony of West Ophaly and of co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 989 acres. Pop., in 1831, 121; in 1841, 115. Houses 19. The surface is part of the east side of the valley of the Barrow, and consists of light land. Kildangan-house is the seat of Dominick O'Reilly, Esq. Here was an ancient castle.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of NURNEY [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £45 19s. 1½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Nurney and Monastereven. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

KILDARE.

AN inland county of the province of Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Meath; on the east, by Dublin and Wicklow; on the south, by Carlow; and on the west, by Queen's co. and King's co. Its outline, till of late, was marred by the intrusion upon its east side of three detached districts of co. Dublin, by the intrusion upon its west side of a large detached district of King's co., and by the detachment from its north side of a small district of its own territory which lay wholly encompassed by co. Meath; but in consequence of transferences of townlands which have recently been made from county to county, and which will be noticed in our section on the Divisions and Towns, all these irregularities have been rectified. Yet even with its acquired compactness, the county describes its line of contact with the adjacent counties in a series of curvatures, salient angles, and sudden recessions, which are alike capricious in their origin and annoying in their effects. The form of the county may, in a loose sense, be called acutely triangular, with the apex pointing to the south; but the north-west angle is diagonally cut off, the south angle or apex is truncated, and the rest of the figure is both extensively and frequently modified by large projections and recessions. The river Boyne traces the western and north-western boundary over a distance of 9 miles, the rivulet Rye traces the northern boundary over 5 miles, and the river Barrow traces the western boundary over about 8½ miles; but the boundary-line almost everywhere else is capricious and artificial. The greatest length of the county, from north to south, is 32½ miles; and the greatest breadth, from east to west, is 19½ miles. But if the outline be viewed as triangular, and the measurement were extended to real points or angular terminations on the north-west and the south, the extent, in straight lines, of the north, the east, and the west sides, would be respectively 19½, 33, and 33½ miles. The area comprises 356,787 acres of arable land, 51,854 of uncultivated land, 8,288 of continuous plantations, 490 of towns, and 1,017 of water,—in all, 418,436 acres.

Surface.—The north-west district contains the sources of the river Boyne, and the springs of some of the secondary head-waters of the river Barrow; and the western half of the interior, along a belt about 9 miles distance from the extreme north, contains, in an open country and upon nearly a flat plain or tableau, the summit-level of the Grand Canal. The county, in consequence, lies upon a comparatively high geographical basis, consists to a large extent of table-land, and, but for previous knowledge of the peculiar superficial configuration of Ireland, might be inferred to possess a great aggregate altitude. Yet if a narrow and interrupted skirting of hill and mountain along part of the eastern frontier be excepted, no county, and perhaps no equal extent of continuous surface, in Ireland, lies at so low a mean superficial elevation above sea-level. A very large proportion of the surface is morass and turbary and moorish meadow lying but a few feet or even a few inches lower than the sources of the streams; and even the enormously major portion of the arable lands and artificial pastures, slope so slowly to the bottom of the river basins as to look less like valleys than reclaimed prairies, or are so slenderly and gently diversified in their interior contour as to exhibit, under the name of hills, chiefly broad-based mounds and flowing undulations. The western but chiefly the north-western division of the county, to the superficial extent of about 50,000 acres, is a main part of the Bog of Allen; it is chequered and relieved by various hillocks and derries, and specially by the large ones called the Hill and Island of Allen; and, in many places which formerly were altogether inaccessible, it has, in consequence of the drainages of the Grand Canal and of georgical improvement, experienced a recent subsidence to the depth of from 5 to 20 feet, and been rendered easily available for large supplies of turbary along the Canal to Dublin. See ALLEN (BOG OF). The expanse of bog, however, is far from being continuous; or rather it consists not of one vast sheet, but of several great divisions,—the chief of which are the bog of Timahoe in the north, the bog of Lullymore in the north-west, the bog of Mounds a little north-west of the centre, the bog of Umerus in the extreme west, and the bog of Monavullagh in the south-west. Another great feature, very nearly in the centre of the county, is the extensive downs and celebrated racing-ground of the Curragh: see CURRAGH. The declination of the grand tableau which constitutes all but a mere fraction of the entire surface, is prevailingly three-fold,—first and least, in a north-westerly direction to the nascent Boyne,—second and of medium extent, in an easterly direction to the Liffey,—and third and greatest, in westerly and southerly directions to the Barrow. The descent in the first of these directions is so trivial as to render the course of the Boyne from its source to its exit very nearly stagnant; and the descent in the other directions, or from the prevailing summit-level of the tableau to the transit surface-elevation of the streams, is not more than 100 feet. Yet mimic though the screens of the lateral streamlet-basins are, the latter, in various instances, as in that of the Griese or Grees in the south, present scenes of cultivation, luxuriance, beauty, and lusciousness, exceedingly in contrast to what the notion of a flat and boggy country would suggest to anticipation; and nearly the whole valley of the Liffey not only acquires character and power from the interrupted belt of upland on the eastern frontier of the county, and especially from the immediately adjacent groups and ranges of the mountains of Wicklow and Dublin, but possesses in itself such warmth, verdure, embellishment, and diversified contour, as to exhibit a very large aggregate of both the scenes which calmly please, and those which thrillingly excite. The hills and mountains on the east are rather spurs and offsets of the grand upland expanse of co. Wicklow than separate groups and ranges; and even the interior heights of the county are only in one instance—and even that both brief and imperfect—collocated into a range,—situated chiefly in East Ophaly and north-west of the town of Kildare, extending from north-east to south-west, and usually designated the Red or Dunmurry Hills. Greatly the majority of such heights as exist are either altogether isolated, or but slenderly connected with adjacent mounds and undulations; and, in consequence of their standing on a comparatively lofty basis, all of them figure far lower to the eye of an observer than to the computation of a topographer. The altitudes above sea-level of the principal in Carbery, or within the basin of the Boyne, are 403 and 471 feet; of the principal in Ikeathy and Oughterany, 294 and 481; of the principal in Clane, 311 and 371; of the principal in South Salt, 608 and 1,246,—the latter the summit of Cupidstown hill on the eastern frontier of the county; of a height in the south-east environs of the town of Naas, 365; of the chief height in the Bog of Mounds, 318; of the Hill of Allen, 676; of the principal summits of the Red or Dunmurry Hills, 308, 539, and 769; of the highest ground of the Curragh, 404; of a height a little south of the Curragh, 385; of Dun Ailleine at Old Kilcullen, 600; of Bishop's Hill and Slieveroe, on the east border of South Naas and of the county, 935 and 1,094; of Ardsclull Moat and the Hill of Mullaghmast, in the south-west of the parish of Moone, 389 and 563; of Bull-Hill and five other heights, in East Narragh and Rheban, and on the eastern frontier of the county, 574, 326, 489, 610, 703, and 726; and of Tinorin, Knockpatrick, Knockshannagh, and two other heights on the east border of Kilkea and Moone, and at the south-east extremity of the county, 1,023, 851, 433, 853, and 978.

Waters.—The Royal Canal is intimately connected with the whole of the northern frontier, proceeding now within Kildare and now within Meath, but chiefly within the former, and never so far within the latter as to be at an inconvenient distance from the Kildare frontier. The main line of the Grand Canal passes right across the county, through the parishes of Lyons, Clonaghlin, Whitechurch, Kill, Sherlockstown, Kerdiffstown, Bodenstown, Naas, Brideschurch, Carragh, Downings, Rathernan, Kilmeague, Kilpatrick, and Carbery. Two short branches of this canal, diverging from its south side, and situated wholly in the central division of the county, go off to Naas and Milltown; and a long and highly important branch, also diverging southward, and situated chiefly along the west border of Kildare, but partly making a detour into Queen's co., proceeds to Monastereven and Athy, and becomes connected at the latter place with the Barrow navigation to New Ross, Waterford, and the Atlantic Ocean. The river Barrow comes in from the west a little above Monastereven, and flows southward across a small wing of the county around that town, traces the western boundary-line to the northern vicinity of Rheban Castle, runs $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles across another wing of the county to the southern vicinity of Athy, and thence traces the western boundary-line to the south-western extremity of the county. The principal Kildare affluents of the Barrow are the Feagile, westward from Lullymore bog; the Blackwood, south-westward from the centre of the barony of Clane; the Finnery, westward from the northern vicinity of Narraghmore; the rivulet which runs westward to Athy; the Griese, south-westward from the southern vicinity of Dunlavin; and the Leer, south-westward through the barony of Kilkea and Moone. The river Liffey comes in from the east in the vicinity of Ballymore-Eustace, runs westward to Kilcullen-Bridge, and then flows northward and north-north-eastward to Leixlip. The principal affluents of the Liffey within Kildare are several rivulets in the vicinity of Naas; several rivulets in the vicinity of Clane; the Morrel, northward from the northern vicinity of Blessington; and the Rye, eastward from the northern boundary and border of the county. The river Boyne rises in the parish of Castle-Carbery, runs 3 miles westward to the boundary of the county, and then flows north-westward, northward, and north-north-eastward on the boundary, till it passes into Meath. Of the 1,017 acres of surface in the county which the Ordnance Survey returned as under water, 58 acres are occupied by canal reservoirs, and very nearly the whole of the remainder is in the rivers Barrow and Liffey.

Climate.—The general absence of mountain is abundantly compensated by the presence of an enormous amount of bog, in rendering Kildare the most humid inland county of Ireland. Not only are passing clouds drawn down by the county's great expanses of morass; but such fogs and dense exhalations often arise as might occasion it to be called a land of mist. The climate of the north-western division may, in a general view, be regarded as that of a region of fens; but that of the eastern district derives clarification and comparative purity from the near neighbourhood of a great attracting region of uplands, and partly also from the natural ventilation along the vale of the Liffey.

Minerals.—A wing of the great granite field of the counties of Wicklow and Carlow, extends into the south-east extremity of Kildare, and occupies an area around Castle-Dermot of about 20 square miles. A belt of schistose formation, averaging about 5 miles in breadth, extends along all the eastern border of the county, from the granite district to the vicinity of Rathcoole, or to a line $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by north of Naas. The schist of this formation, where in contact with the granite, is micaceous; but as it recedes from the granite, it first becomes argillaceous, and eventually takes the character of transition slates, and even terminates in a small patch of old red sandstone. A pendicle of the transition or greywacke series, occurs also $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Kildare, and is there partially overlaid with another patch of old red sandstone. Various kinds of trap, but particularly crystalline greenstone, and greenstone porphyry, constitute the hill of Allen, and the chief part of the Red or Dunmurry hills. The greenstone here has the peculiarity of containing large crystals of hornblende and felspar. The formation of all or very nearly all the vast remainder of the county, is the flætz limestone of central Ireland. But this rock, so valuable in all its references to at once soil, subsoil, and manure, is ingulfed in Kildare to a greater aggregate extent than elsewhere beneath broad and long expanses of very deep bog; and even where it discovers itself near the surface, in association with marls, it was long so deplorably neglected as to evince profound popular ignorance of its value. Copper ore seems to exist in Dunmurry Hill, and probably some other specimens exist of mineral treasure; yet Kildare is not very likely to claim attention for any minerals but such as compose the soils and subsoils of its land.

Soils.—The soil of the greater part of the county is a very rich loam or somewhat friable clay, 12 inches deep, decidedly tenacious of moisture, incapable of being tilled in wet weather, and suffering damage rather than acquiring benefit from dressings with such calcareous gravels as abound throughout the flint limestone formations, and are so eminently serviceable in the reclamation of bogs. The loam or clay varies in both depth and quality; and in the district called Churchtown, situated to the west of Athy, it is all a brick clay, which has been cultivated for centuries, but is much too heavy for the production of oats. Mr. Rawson, the statist of the county in 1807, indignantly remarks respecting this district: "No oats will grow in it; the wretched farming, alternately wheat and fallow, is invariable; no vegetable, no red clover, which grows here in the greatest luxuriance, and lasts good for three years; if it was introduced it would, with the assistance of sheep-stock, soon make Churchtown the best wheat country in Ireland; but the occupiers have worked themselves and their lands into poverty, and having no length of tenure, and well knowing that the more an Irish tenant improves at or near the close of his term, the more certain he is to be turned out by Captain Bidbest, he trudges on in most unprofitable inactivity."

Agriculture.—Up to 1807, the mode of husbandry which, except in a few instances, continued universally in practice, was the miserable one which disgraced the whole of last century; and consisted of one crop of wheat, as many crops of oats as were requisite to work the land to exhaustion, and as many years of fallow as were needed to let the deadened soil acquire a sward of natural grass. This savage system has receded before innovation and improvement very much at the same rate as in the average of the other counties of Leinster; and it has at length been so far exterminated as to warrant hope that Kildare husbandry may eventually become as signalized for wisdom as it once was for folly. The improved methods of agriculture were introduced, and have been promoted by the chief of the resident landowners; and they appear to be increasingly in the course of adoption by the small farmers. Oxen are generally used for both the cart and the plough. Rich fattening lands occur in the baronies of Carbery, Clane, North Salt, and South Salt; and the beautifully verdant Curragh is in use as a sheep walk. In 1841, the number of farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, was 3,104; of from 5 to 15 acres, 2,123; of from 15 to 30 acres, 991; and of upwards of 30 acres, 1,845. This statement, however, is exclusive of 71 farms in the civic districts, 40 of which were of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 24 from 5 to 15 acres, 4 from 15 to 30 acres, and 3 of upwards of 30 acres.

Live Stock.—The best English breeds of cattle and sheep have been introduced. In 1841, the live stock upon holdings or farms not exceeding 1 acre, were 1,227 horses and mules, 1,302 asses, 2,439 cattle, 4,578 sheep, 5,038 pigs, and 45,353 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 1,020 horses and mules, 682 asses, 2,002 cattle, 957 sheep, 2,092 pigs, and 24,983 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 2,012 horses and mules, 248 asses, 3,346 cattle, 2,417 sheep, 1,793 pigs, and 23,027 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 1,794 horses and mules, 113 asses, 4,012 cattle, 4,380 sheep, 1,513 pigs, and 16,923 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 7,246 horses and mules, 440 asses, 35,305 cattle, 63,074 sheep, 5,066 pigs, and 46,952 poultry. The total of these classes, together with the estimated total value of each, are 13,299 horses and mules, £106,392; 2,785 asses, £2,785; 47,104 cattle, £306,176; 75,406 sheep, £82,947; 15,502 pigs, £19,377; and 157,238 poultry, £3,931. Grand total of value, £521,008. But these statistics are exclusive of the live stock in the civic districts; and this together with the estimated value of each class, amounted to 473 horses, £3,784; 93 asses, £93; 426 cattle, £2,769; 21 sheep, £23; 842 pigs, £1,052; and 2,185 poultry, £55. Grand total of value in the civic districts, £7,776.

Woods.—In 1841, the continuous or compact plantations within the county, consisted of 320 acres of oak, 83 of ash, 14 of elm, 52 of beech, 415 of fir, 6,948 of mixed trees, and 456 of orchards; and there were planted of these, previous to the year 1791, 48 acres of oak, 13 of ash, 9 of elm, 33 of beech, 36 of fir, 1,835 of mixed trees, and 178 of orchards. In 1841, the number of detached trees was 576,470, equivalent to 3,603 acres; and thus the grand total of woods was 11,891 acres. One of the original forms of the name Kildare, contended for by etymologists and antiquaries, is Chille-Dara, 'the Wood of Oaks'; but, "except in Carbery, on the estate of Ambrose O'Farrell, Esq.," said Mr. Rawson in 1807, "the Forest of Oaks has been completely destroyed, no other natural wood within the county being worth mentioning."

Trade and Manufactures.—The corn trade of Kildare is very large, on account at once of the goodness of the soil, the excellence of the produce, the general prevalence of tillage, and the facility and cheapness of communication to at once the eastern sea at Dublin, and the southern sea at the exit of Waterford Harbour. The milling trade is extensive; and large quantities of grain, of which no statistics can be obtained, are sold by sample at the mills and corn-stores within the county, or sent along the canals, or down the navigation of the Barrow, without being previously brought to a public market. Even the returns for Kilcullen-Bridge, which is a considerable corn-market, are not within our reach. In 1833, 941 barrels of wheat were sold at Naas, 40,000 at Kilcock, 57,720 at Athy, 13,500 at Rathangan, and 1,090 at Kildare;—6,085 of oats at Naas, 12,000 at Kilcock, 19,472 at Athy, 1,152 at Kildare, and 3,000 at Robertstown;—50 of barley at Naas, 1,000 at Kilcock, 8,075 at Athy, and 3,080 at Kildare; and 1,412 of bere at Naas, 7,000 at Kilcock, and 150 at Kildare. In 1835, 750 barrels of wheat were sold at Naas, 40,000 at Kilcock, 27,811 at Athy, 14,500 at Rathangan, and 1,113 at Kildare; 12,796 of oats at Naas, 12,000 at Kilcock, 19,878 at Athy, 1,230 at Kildare, and 3,000 at Robertstown; 50 of barley at Naas, 1,000 at Kilcock, 5,787 at Athy, and 145 at Kildare; and 1,125 of bere at Naas, 7,000 at Kilcock, and 388 at Kildare.

A strenuous and elaborate attempt, still partially continued, was made to establish woollen and linen manufactories at CELBRIDGE [see that article]; and a cotton factory was, a few years ago, commenced on an extensive scale at Inchyguire, in the vicinity of Ballytore. In 1841, the number of persons employed in the various departments of productive industry and of trade—exclusive of the departments which belong to the categories of agriculture and economics—were 120 millers, 1 maltster, 3 brewers, 5 distillers, 177 bakers, 16 confectioners, 3 salters, 1 fishmonger, 36 egg-dealers, 33 cattle-dealers, 1 horse-dealer, 27 pig-jobbers, 6 corn-dealers, 3 seedsmen, 1 flour-merchant, 1 butter-merchant, 65 hucksters and provision-dealers, 142 butchers, 5 poulterers, 23 victuallers, 55 grocers, 2 tobacconists, 53 flax-dressers, 21 carders, 342 flax spinners, 17 cotton-spinners, 597 wool-spinners, 1,567 spinners of classes not specified, 214 factory-workers, 10 winders and warpers, 1 wool-dresser, 18 cotton-weavers, 60 linen-weavers, 13 woollen-weavers, 5 lace-weavers, 232 spinners of classes not specified, 1 cotton-manufacturer, 2 woollen-manufacturers, 3 dyers, 2 clothiers, 1 cloth-finisher, 1 calico-printer, 4 skimmers, 8 curriers, 2 tanners, 98 brogue-makers, 732 boot and shoe makers, 531 tailors, 415 sempstresses, 507 dressmakers, 68 milliners, 8 stay-makers, 2 comb-makers, 588 knitters, 37 hatters, 145 bonnet-makers, 33 straw-workers, 7 glovers, 2 button-makers, 4 hair-dressers, 1 leather-dealer, 6 hosiers, 10 haberdashers, 7 drapers, 2 linen-draper, 2 woollen-draper, 2 silk-merciers, 51 venders of soft goods, 16 rag and bone dealers, 3 architects, 6 builders, 9 brick-makers, 1 potter, 19 stone-cutters, 16 lime-burners, 16 bricklayers, 257 stone-masons, 87 slaters, 13 thatchers, 14 plasterers, 2 paviors, 43 sawyers, 792 carpenters, 10 cabinet-makers, 89 coopers, 4 turners, 17 mill-wrights, 7 wheel-wrights, 5 pump-borers, 9 basket-makers, 7 broom-makers, 10 iron-founders, 519 blacksmiths, 19 whitesmiths, 110 nailers, 3 cutlers, 9 sickle-makers, 1 gunsmith, 14 braziers and coppersmiths, 3 plumbers, 12 tinplate-workers, 14 tinkers, 2 machine-makers, 1 clock and watch maker, 3 watch-makers, 2 silversmiths, 8 coach and car makers, 1 carver and gilder, 44 saddlers, 52 harness-makers, 1 rope-maker, 4 letterpress printers, 4 book-binders, 4 mat-makers, 12 chandlers and soap-boilers, 2 glass-makers, 74 painters and glaziers, 1 toy-maker, 9 sieve-makers, 5 upholsterers, 3 timber-merchants, 13 delph-dealers, 5 ironmongers, 8 merchants of classes not specified, 6 brokers, 208 dealers of classes not specified, 377 shopkeepers of classes not specified, and 90 shop-assistants.

Fairs.—The fairs of the county of Kildare are held at Tully, on Jan. 1, and July 27; at Castle-Dermot, on Feb. 24, April 7, May 25, Aug. 4, and Dec. 19; at Athy, on March 17, April 25, June 9, July 25, Oct. 10, and Dec. 11; at Kilcullen-Bridge, on Feb. 2, March 25, Sept. 8 and 29, and Dec. 8; at Naas, on March 17, May 7 and 18, and Nov. 23; at Kilcock, on March 25, May 11, Aug. 11, and Sept. 29; at Red Lion, on March 25, and Sept. 8; at Monastereven, on March 28, May 19, July 31, and Dec. 7; at Narraghmore, on March 28; at Timolin, on March 30 and June 29; at Johnstown-Bridge, on March 31, May 29, Oct. 13, and Dec. 21; at Ballymany, on April 6, Aug. 21, and Nov. 2; at Clane, April 28, July 25, and Oct. 15; at Kildroughall, April 28, Sept. 8, and Nov. 7; at Calverstown, on May 1, and Sept. 21; at Kildangan, on May 1, and Sept. 29; at Kilteel, on May 1, June 24, Sept. 29, and Nov. 2; at Moone, on May 1, June 19, Aug. 13, and Oct. 28; at Churchland, on May 2; at Hortland, on May 2, and Dec. 9; at Leixlip, on May 4, and Oct. 9; at Maynooth, on May 4, Sept. 19, and Oct. 9; at Newbridge, on May 4, and Aug. 15; at Ballyownan, on May 5; at Kilgowan, on May 8, and July 20; at Rathangan, on May 19; at Kilbannernan, on May 25, Aug. 26, and Nov. 12; at Kilmage, on May 25, June 29, and Sept. 25; at Castle-Carbery, on May 26; at Kilcullen, on June 22, and Oct. 2; at Rathbride, on July 6; at Quin, on July 7, Aug. 15, and Dec. 30; at Frenchfurze, on July 27; at Ballytore, on Aug. 15, and Nov. 30; and at Russel's-Wood, on Aug. 26.

Communications.—The Royal and the Grand Canals, the branches of the latter to Naas, Milltown, and Athy, and the navigation of the Barrow, partly artificial, but chiefly natural, downward from Athy, render the county of Kildare singularly rich in water-communications, and connect it at once with Dublin, the Upper and Lower Shannon, the city and harbour of Waterford, and three grand outlets to the ocean in respectively the east, the west, and the south of the kingdom. A line of railway for which an act of parliament has been obtained, and which is designed to connect Dublin with Kilkenny, passes up the vale of the Liffey to the vicinity of Newbridge, and thence runs diagonally across the county to Athy. The main-trunk of the Munster and South Leinster lines projected by the Public Commissioners, ascends the vale of the Liffey to the vicinity of Sallins, and thence crosses the county in a west-south-westerly direction, passing a little to the south of Rathangan. The principal roads through Kildare are the mail-lines from Dublin to Galway, Limerick, Waterford, Kilkenny, and Cork. At the close of 1841, 806 miles of road were under the charge of the county surveyor; and only 6 miles of new road had been made since his appointment in 1836.

Divisions and Towns.—The county is divided into the baronies of Carbery in the north-west; Ikeathy and Oughterany, in the middle of the north; North Salt, in the north-east; South Salt, in the east, immediately south of North Salt; Clane, in the north of the interior, or immediately west of South Salt; North Naas, in the east, immediately south of South Salt; South Naas, in the east, immediately south of North Naas; Connel, in the centre, immediately west of North and South Naas; West Ophaly and East Ophaly, in the west and centre, from the northern part of the bog of Lullymore down to the centre of the bog of Monavallagh; Kilcullen, in the east, immediately south-east of East Ophaly; West Narragh and Rheban, and East Narragh and Rheban, quite across the county, immediately south of West Ophaly and Kilcullen; and Kilkea and Moone, in the extreme south. Previous to some recent changes, the number of ploughlands in Carbery was 17; in Ikeathy and Oughterany, 14; in North Salt, 18; in South Salt, 8; in Clane, 12; in North Naas, 13½; in South Naas, 11½; in Connel, 12; in West Ophaly, 12½; in East Ophaly, 13½; in Kilcullen, 5; in West Narragh and Rheban, 7; in East Narragh and Rheban, 7½; in Kilkea and Moone, 11½. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred one townland of the parish of Moone from Upper Philipstown in King's co., to East Ophaly in Kildare,—pop., in 1841, 97; thirteen townlands of Ballybracken, the whole of Harristown, nine townlands of Fontstown, and one townland of Duneany, from Upper Philipstown, in King's co., to West Ophaly in co. Kildare,—pop. 2,661; the whole of Ballybought, the whole of Ballymore-Eustace, the whole of Tipperkevin, from Uppercross, in co. Dublin, to South Naas in co. Kildare,—pop. 3,138; three townlands and part of a fourth of Castle-Rickard from Carbery in co. Kildare, to Moyfenragh in co. Meath,—pop. 138; seventeen townlands of Rathangan, and seven of Ballysax, from West Ophaly to East Ophaly,—pop. 3,207; two townlands of Rathmore, and an uninhabited part of a townland of Killashee, from South Naas to North Naas,—pop. 32; and one townland of Narraghmore, from East Narragh and Rheban to West Narragh and Rheban,—pop. 13. The barony of Carbery, as now constituted, contains the whole of 11 parishes; Clane, the whole of 7 parishes; Connel, the whole of 5 parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; Ikeathy and Oughterany, the whole of 8 parishes; Kilcullen, the whole of one parish, and part of another; Kilkea and Moone, the whole of 9 parishes, and part of 6 other parishes; North Naas, the whole of 8 parishes, and part of another parish; South Naas, the whole of 8 parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; East Narragh and Rheban, the whole of 3 parishes, and part of 4 other parishes; West Narragh and Rheban, the whole of 2 parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; East Ophaly, the whole of 9 parishes, and part of 7 other parishes; West Ophaly, the whole of 10 parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; North Salt, the whole of 8 parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; and South Salt, the whole of 9 parishes, and part of another parish. The towns and principal villages in Carbery, are Castle-Carbery and Johnstown; in Clane, Prosperous and Clane; in Connel, Newbridge, Kilmeague, and Robertstown; in Ikeathy and Oughterany, part of Kilcock; in Kilcullen, Old Kilcullen, and part of Kilcullen-Bridge; in Kilkea and Moone, Castle-Dermot and Moone; in North Naas, Naas and Salins; in South Naas, Ballymore-Eustace, and part of Kilcullen-Bridge; in East Narragh and Rheban, Timolin and Ballytore; in West Narragh and Rheban, Athy; in East Ophaly, Kildare and Rathangan; in West Ophaly, Monastereven and Nurney; in North Salt, Maynooth, Leixlip, and part of Celbridge; and in South Salt, Templeplace, Kill, Killeel, and part of Celbridge. In the ecclesiastical divisions, the major portion of the county is included in the dio. of Kildare, and the minor portion in that of Dublin. Dr. Beaufort, estimating the county to contain 236,000 acres of land, 113 parishes, and 23 churches, assigns to the dio. of Kildare 161,000 acres, 56 parishes, and 14 churches, and to the dio. of Dublin 75,000 acres, 57 parishes, and 9 churches. The territorial additions recently made to co. Kildare from King's co., are within the dio. of Kildare, and those from co. Dublin are within the dio. of Dublin.

Statistics.]—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools was 214, of scholars 8,857, of male scholars 5,118, of female scholars 3,578, of scholars whose sex was not specified 161, of scholars belonging to the Established Church 1,425, of scholars belonging to Presbyterian communities 4, of scholars belonging to other communities of Protestant dissenters 27, of scholars belonging to the Roman Catholic community 7,276, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 125; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 214, of scholars 8,864, of male scholars 5,177, of female scholars 3,608, of scholars whose sex was not specified 79, of scholars belonging to the Established Church 1,313, of scholars belonging to Presbyterian communities 9, of scholars belonging to other communities of Protestant dissenters 22, of scholars belonging to the Roman Catholic community 7,392, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 128. The statistics of schools, churches, and religious denominations for 1834, are arranged under the diocesan divisions. At the close of 1842, the National Board had in operation within the county 57 schools, attended by 3,063 males and 3,413 females, conducted by 34 male and 30 female teachers, and aided with £632 10s. in salaries, and £87 13s. 9d. in school-requisites; and during 1841 and 1842, they granted £371 1s. 8d. toward the building and fitting up of 6 other schools, which continued unopened at the close of 1842.—During 1842, the number of persons committed for public offences was 284; of these 105 were committed to Athy gaol, and 179 to Naas gaol; of the 105 in Athy gaol, 17 were charged with offences against the person, 6 with offences against property committed with violence, 63 with offences against property committed without violence, 2 with malicious offences against property, 2 with offences against the currency, and 15 with offences not included in the above categories; of the 179 in Naas gaol, 39 were charged with offences against the person, 1 with an offence against property committed with violence, 133 with offences against property committed without violence, and 6 with offences not included in the above categories; of the total of 284 committed, 154 were convicted and 130 were acquitted and discharged; of the 154 convicted, 13 were sentenced to transportation, 122 to imprisonment, 18 to pay fines, and 1 was discharged on surety; and of the 130 acquitted and discharged, 89 were found not guilty on trial, 26 had no bill found against them, and 15 were not prosecuted. The only prisons are the county gaols at Athy and Naas; and the assizes are held alternately in these towns. The general quarter-sessions are held at Athy, Maynooth, Naas, and Kildare. The district Lunatic Asylum is that of Carlow. In 1835, the amount of grand jury presentments was £19,554 18s. 4d.; and of this total, £1,221 7s. 10d. was charged on the county at large for public roads, £6,051 12s. 5d. was charged to the several baronies for public roads, £5,206 7s. 8d. was raised for the public establishments of the county, £4,713 15s. 10½d. was raised for the maintenance of the constabulary force, and £2,304 14s. 11½d. was expended in repayment of loans advanced by government. On Jan. 1, 1843, the constabulary force consisted of 1 second-rate county inspector, 3 first-rate sub-inspectors, 1 second-rate sub-inspector, 1 third-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate head constable, 5 second-rate head constables, 41 constables, 179 first-rate sub-constables, 24 second-rate sub-constables, and 6 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining this force during 1842, was £12,573 19s. 3½d. Two stipendiary magistrates are stationed at respectively Naas and Rathangan. The county sent ten members to the Irish parliament—or two from the county at large, and two from each of the boroughs of Kildare, Athy, Naas, and Harristown; but it sends to the imperial parliament only two members for the county at large,—the whole of the boroughs having been entirely disfranchised. The constituency in May, 1841, was 978; of whom 539 were registered under the £10 qualification, 129 under the £20 qualification, and 310 under the £50 qualification.

Population, in 1792, 56,000; in 1813, 85,133; in 1821, 99,065; in 1831, 108,424; in 1841, 114,488. Houses, in 1792, 11,205; in 1813, 14,564; in 1821, 16,478; in 1831, 17,155; in 1841, 18,556. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, in 1831, 11,880; in manufactures and trade, 3,315; in other pursuits, 3,576.—The following statistics are all of the year 1841. Males, 58,030; females, 56,458; families, 20,338. Inhabited houses, 18,556; uninhabited complete houses, 716; houses in the course of erection, 116. First class inhabited houses, 679; second class, 3,486; third class, 9,323; fourth class, 5,068. Families residing in first class houses, 797; in second class houses, 4,091; in third class houses, 9,905; in fourth class houses, 5,455. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 12,517; in manufactures and trade, 3,385; in other pursuits, 4,436. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 545; on the directing of labour, 6,605; on their own manual labour, 12,693; on means not specified, 494. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 25,894; to clothing, 1,820; to lodging, 2,379; to health, 50; to charity, 2; to justice, 306; to education, 167; to religion, 98; unclassified, 2,673; without any specified occupation, 3,049. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 3,058; to clothing, 4,381; to lodging, 17; to health, 44; to charity, 11; to justice, 2; to education, 111; to religion, 19; unclassified, 5,314; without any specified occupation, 23,404. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 21,396; who could read but not write, 10,356; who could neither read nor write, 19,445. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 13,268; who could read but not write, 13,772; who could neither read nor write, 23,014. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 4,228; attending superior schools, 655. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 3,898; attending superior schools, 129. Per centages of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 52; married, 48; widowed, 5. Per centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 41; married, 44; widowed, 15. School-teachers, 155 males and 88 females; ushers and tutors, 5; governesses, 23; music and dancing masters, 7. Clergymen of the Established Church, 27; Methodist ministers, 2; Roman Catholic clergymen, 49; friars, 3; ministers of religion whose denominational connection was not specified, 11; nuns, 19; sextons, 3; clerks, 2; Scripture readers, 1.

Antiquities.]—Earthen-works, both sepulchral and military, are numerous. Sepulchral mounds are sprinkled over the Curragh; and very remarkable moats or raths are the moat of Carmen or Mullaghmast near Ballytore, the moat of Ardscoil near Athy, and the rath of Knockawley about a mile west of Old Kilcullen. In the time of Giraldus Cambrensis, a stone monument, similar to that of Stonehenge, stood on the Curragh. Large existing pillar-stones occur at Harristown, Mullaghmast, Punch's-Town, Forenaughts, and Kilgowan. Pillar-towers stand at Kildare, Castle-Dermot, Old Kilcullen, Oughterard, and Taghadoo. The most remarkable of the ruins of numerous ecclesiastical and monastic piles, are those of Kildare cathedral, Castle-Dermot abbey, Newbridge Abbey, and the monasteries of Naas. Curiously sculptured old stone crosses occur at Moone, Castle-Dermot, and Old Kilcullen. The ancient castles of Leixlip, Donadea, and Kilkea, are still inhabited; and those of Castle-Dermot, Kildare, Clane, Castle-Carbery, Morristown, Lackagh, Killyberry, Rheban, Maynooth, Corrig, Timolin, Ballyteague, and Woodstock, are still standing.

History.]—A small northern portion of the county was anciently included in the kingdom of Meath; and the whole of the remainder was included in the kingdom of Leinster, and yet was distributed into portions or districts of the territories or principalities of Imaill, Hy-Failge, and Hy-Ceallen, subject to respectively the O'Tooles, the O'Connors, and the Mackellys. In the partition of Leinster among the children of William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, and his wife Isabel, only daughter and heiress of Earl Strongbow, Kildare was assigned to Sibilla, their fourth daughter. William, Earl Ferrers and Darby, became lord of Kildare by marriage with that lady; and William de Vesey, Lord-justice of Ireland, afterwards became lord of Kildare and Rathangan, by marriage with Agnes, their eldest daughter. A dispute arose between De Vesey and Fitz-Thomas Fitzgerald, lord of Ophaly, and was adjudged to settlement by single combat between the disputants; and, De Vesey fleeing to France to avoid the combat, his estates were taken from him, and bestowed upon Fitzgerald. In 1296, the territory of Kildare, which hitherto had been under the sheriff of Dublin, was erected into a separate county; and, in 1316, John Fitzmaurice Fitzgerald, sixth Lord Ophaly by creation, but seventh by tenure, was created Earl of Kildare. See KERRY. The Fitzgerald family, as they rose in power, made autocratic exactions upon the people, encroached on the administrative prerogatives of the crown, tried pleas before their own seneschals to the exclusion of the King's sheriffs, and, in consequence, provoked the jealousy and the ire of the English government. Gerald, one of the Earls, being summoned to England to answer various charges which had been brought against him of usurpation as Lord Kildare, and especially of oppression as Lord-justice of Ireland, Lord Thomas Fitzgerald, his son, a rash youth of twenty years of age, was left to act as his deputy; and, in 1534, this hot-headed novice, soon hearing a rumour that the Earl was put to death, renounced at once his deputyship and his allegiance, rushed into open and frantic rebellion against the government, and drew with him into the dreadful vortex his five uncles, brothers of the Earl. He held the castles of Rathangan, Maynooth, Athy, Portlester, Carlow, and Leix; and the first and the second of these being captured in the course of next year, he and his uncles surrendered, and were sent to England, and executed at Tyburn. Previous to their execution, the Earl had died a prisoner in the Tower of London; so that all the noble earthly hopes of the family appeared to be extinct. But Gerald, a younger brother of the rebellious Thomas, escaped to the continent of Europe, performed distinguished deeds in the service of the Knights of Malta, became master-of-the-horse to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and, in 1552, was reconciled to the English government, and restored to his ancestral possessions. In 1761, James, the twentieth Earl, was advanced to the dignity of Marquis of Kildare; and, in 1766, he was made Duke of Leinster. The family seat of his descendant, Ireland's only duke, and the representative of so long a line of the lords of Kildare, is CARTON: which see.—Of several military operations which occurred in the county during the wars consequent on the rebellion of 1641, the most remarkable was the battle of Kilrush, fought on April 15, 1642, between a Roman Catholic army of about 15,000 men under Lord Mountgarret, and a royalist army of about the same force, under the Earl of Ormond, and terminating in the signal defeat of the Roman Catholics. The Kildare family acted a prominent and favourable part in the events precurrent to the Restoration; and, with a tact which goes far to account for the great difference between the finale of their history and that of the history of other great and ancient noble families of Ireland, they were partisans of the Williamite cause in the wars of the Revolution. The lands forfeited by Jacobites amounted to 44,281 acres, valued then at £205,175; and the principal families bereft of them were those of Tyrrel, Eustace, Trant, and Lawless. In 1798, several smart skirmishes were fought within the county between parties of rebels, and parties of the King's troops; and, during a brief period, the rebels won and enjoyed an advantage at Old Kilcullen.

KILDARE, a parish, partly in the barony of Connell, but chiefly in that of East Ophaly, co. Kildare, Leinster. The Ophaly section contains the town of KILDARE: see next article. The Connell section constitutes a detached district, lying 2 miles east of the nearest part of the main body. Length of the Ophaly section, east-south-eastward, 5 miles; breadth, from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Length of the Connell section, southward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, 1. Area of the Connell section, 878 acres,—of which $7\frac{1}{2}$ acres are in the river Liffey. Area of the Ophaly section, 8,337 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches,—of which 2,744 acres, 13 perches are part of the Curragh. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,601; in 1841, 2,654. Houses 475. Pop. of the Connell section, in 1831, 60; in 1841, 56. Houses 9. Pop. of the rural districts of the Ophaly section, in 1831, 788; in 1841, 969. Houses 167. The Connell section contains the mansion of Greenhills, forms a pleasant little district upon the Liffey, and was formerly treated in the population books as a separate parish, under the name of Greenhills. The eastern district of the Ophaly section consists of the larger and more conspicuous portion of the Curragh; and contains the race-course, the stand, two of the three hare-parks, Rathbride Cottage, and Donnelly's stables. See CURRAGH. The highest ground is on the southern boundary, and has an altitude of 404 feet. The western district is exceedingly irregular in outline, isolates a portion of the parish of Tully, borrows relief and beauty from the immediate adjacency of the Dunmurry hills, and contains the demesne of Mooretown.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Kildare. The tithes of the Ophaly section, or Kildare proper, are compounded for £323 1s. 6d.; those of the Connell section, or Greenhills, are compounded for £25; and both are appropriated to the dean and chapter of Kildare cathedral. Some public ecclesiastical documents represent the parishes of Kildare, Cloncurry, Dunmurryhill, Relickstown, and Greenhills, as constituting the benefice of Kildare, and corps of the deanery of Kildare. Yet, though we shall follow this statement in exhibiting the ecclesiastical statistics, we must remark, that Cloncurry alone is the corps of the deanery, that the other parishes real and alleged, are appropriated to the economy fund of the cathedral, and that Relickstown and Greenhills are merely districts within Kildare parish. The parochial place of worship, or rather that for the parochial union, has an attendance of from 15 to 40. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel has an attendance of from 1,500 to 1,900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Rathangan. The Roman Catholic convent chapel at Kildare has an attendance of 200. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish, exclusive of the districts of Relickstown and Greenhills, amounted to 79, and the Roman Catholics to 2,521; the Protestants of the union to 133, and the Roman Catholics to 3,525; and 3 daily schools in the union—all of which were in the parish, and one supported wholly by the Presentation nuns, and one aided with £10 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 258 boys and 499 girls.

KILDARE.

A post and market town, the seat of a diocese, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Kildare, barony of East Ophaly, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on the Dublin and Limerick mail-road, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of Newbridge, 5 east-north-east of Monastereven, $5\frac{1}{2}$ south-east of Rathangan, $9\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of Naas, and $25\frac{1}{2}$ south-west by west of Dublin.

General Description.—The town's site lies 361 feet above sea-level, in the midst of an extensive, depressed, open, and bleak tableau, and about half a mile west of the nearest part of the Curragh. The seats of Mooretown, Maddenstown, Tully, Rathbride, and Rossmore, have an average distance from it of less than two miles, and are situated in such different directions as to seem like the knots of a cord; yet both they, and the inequalities of the low heights, called the Red Hills, the hill of Allen, and the chair of the Earl of Kildare, completely fail to relieve the environs from a cold, exposed, and unpicturesque appearance. The town itself, as seen from the approaches to it, sends up such a tufting of trees, and such a seeming museum of architecture, as to appear a fascinating feature in the landscape, and afford promise of interesting disclosures to the painter and the antiquary; but on being entered, it dashes to the dust the hopes which it had excited, grins ghastly derision on the enthusiasm of the literary visitor, folds round him clouds of offensive odours, and huddles itself up in so squalid and tawdry a dress of cabin-masonry, grotesquely patched with deformed and clumsy remains of pretending ancient architecture, as instantly to convince him that it owes all its interest to the tales and associations of history, and to the mind's power of abstracting its architectural monuments from connection with rubbish, and juxtaposition to the filth and crudities of a commonplace Irish village. The town, such as it is, consists of one comparatively good street, and several diverging lanes; it is neither watched, lighted, nor under any sort of efficient surveillance; it possesses not a drop of water nearer than a mile, except through one pump, or from showers of rain; and, though less haggard and less declining than formerly, and exactly situated to command the gains of the profuse periodical expenditure of money on the Curragh, it is never likely to rise to the possession of either tolerable neatness or comparative prosperity. Ancient Kildare is believed to have stood a little west of the site of the present town. Though the loftier existing buildings stand on a basis equal in elevation to the medium height of all the surrounding tableau, yet such is the peculiar configuration of the immediately circumjacent grounds, that the town is totally lost sight of, within a quarter of a mile's distance, on each of the numerous roads which radiate from it as a centre.

Public Buildings.—The pillar-tower of Kildare is said to be 132 feet high; and hence it exceeds by 3 feet Trajan's column at Rome. The entrance to it is a semicircular-arched door, 14 feet above the surface of the ground. A Gothic battlement now crowns its summit, and, almost as much in proportion as in style, is grossly out of keeping with the architecture of the shaft; but this incongruous and singular feature is known, from the following passage in Ward's Works enlarged by Harris, to be a modern addition: "The tower of Kildare having been pointed and repaired within these few years, had then a regular, neat battlement raised on it, which before was only an irregular broken wall, as appears by the scheme given thereof by Sir Thomas Molyneux, and which I myself very well remember." If, however, the incongruity of the battlement be overlooked, and the existence of loopholes only near the top be thought a sufficient semblance to the normal type of the ancient pillar-tower, the structure at Kildare is both a very perfect and very beautiful specimen of the curious antiquities of its class.—The cathedral of Kildare has long been in a ruinous condition; and, even though partially repaired and in use, appears to the eye far more a mass of ruin than an undilapidated pile. The original structure claims a comparatively very early date, and affects to have been repaired and adorned at no small charge, by Bishop Ralph of Bristol, who occupied the see of Kildare from 1223 to 1232. The pile is said to have again become ruinous, and to have been restored in the reign of Henry VII., under the auspices of Bishop Lane. Subsequent dilapidation soon commenced, and seems to have achieved its worst during the wars of the 17th century. The north side of the tower, which rose from between the choir and the nave, is levelled with the ground, and is said to have been wilfully battered down in the rebellion of 1641. The south transept remains, but is in a state of ruin. The unroofed nave also stands, and displays some arches and other architectural features in a very plain variety of the pointed style. The choir retains both walls and roof, and continues to be used as the parochial church and the nominal cathedral; but it has been much and frequently altered, is contracted in dimensions, and possesses hardly one feature of architectural interest.—Within the cathedral is the sepulchral vault of the earls of Kildare and dukes of Leinster. Immured in the exterior walls of the pile are numerous fragments of sculptured monuments. In the churchyard is the lofty pedestal of an ancient stone cross, the shaft of which is said to have been carried away, and converted into a step of the communion-table. About 30 yards west of the cathedral, and also within the churchyard, is the pillar-tower already noticed.

Nearly adjacent to the pillar-tower, is a tiny structure, locally called the Fire-house, but really consisting of a small part of a chapel, of ancient date, monastically ascribed to St. Bridget, and constituting a low and narrow stone cell, of considerable but really unknown antiquity. St. Bridget, according to monkish story, was the illegitimate daughter of an Irish chieftain, and born in the year 453; she received the veil, in the 14th year of her age, from the hand of St. Patrick, or from that of one of his immediate disciples; she soon afterwards made a pilgrimage to Glastonbury in Somersetshire; and previous to the year 484, she founded a nunnery and an abbey in Kildare, placed them both under one roof, and exercised over both the supervision of a foundress and a superior. "She founded a nunnery here before the year 484," says Archdall; "and about the same time an abbey was also founded under the same roof for monks, but separated by walls from the nunnery; it afterwards came into possession of the Regular Canons of St. Augustine. The nuns and monks had but one church in common, which they entered at different doors. St. Bridget presided as well over the monks as nuns, and, strange to tell! the abbot of this house was subject to the abbess for several years after the death of the celebrated founder, which happened in the year 523. She was interred here, but her remains were afterwards removed to the cathedral church at Down." St. Bridget, as pictured by her monastic admirers, and embodied by the mixture of fact and fiction which passes current as her history, was altogether a very unwomanly personage, and not over-scrupulous about either the source or the character of her crack-notions; and, accordingly, she is narrated by her crowds of would-be biographers to have instituted her communities of nuns on a footing of close resemblance to the vestal virgins of pagan Rome, and to have charged them with the maintenance, "for the benefit of the poor and strangers," of an inextinguishable fire. The addled and fabulous Giraldus Cambrensis, writing in the 12th century respecting her community, says, "The nuns and religious women are so careful and diligent in supplying and recruiting the fire with fuel, that from the time of St. Bridget, it hath remained always unextinguished through so many successions of years; and though so vast a quantity of wood hath been in such a length of time consumed in it, yet the ashes have never increased." This heathenish fire was extinguished in 1220, by order of Henry de Londres, archbishop of Dublin; but, when the influence of that prelate ceased, the fire was rekindled, and continued to be maintained and applauded, till for ever put out by the waters of the Reformation. The place in which popular belief supposes the fire to have been maintained, is the extant fragment of the old building called St. Bridget's chapel; and hence the popular designation assigned to it of the Fire-house. Archdall's precious and veracious "history" records, inter alia, the following particulars in the annals of St. Bridget's nunnery:—In 520, died "St." Naithfraich, "couchman" to St. Bridget; in 523, died "St." Blatha, "cook" to St. Bridget; in 997, Cormac, king of Munster, and archbishop of Cashel, bequeathed to the nunnery his horse, its splendid furniture, an ounce of gold, and an embroidered vestment; and in 1135, Diarmod MacMurrogh, king of Leinster, forcibly abducted the abbess from her cloister, compelled her to marry one of his people, and occasioned the destruction of 170 inhabitants of the nunnery and the town. The nunnery, whenever founded, and of whatever history, appears to have, for a series of centuries preceding the Reformation, made a considerable figure; and, at the dissolution of monasteries, it was granted to Anthony Deeringe, at the annual rent of £3 10s. 8d. Irish. A monastery for Franciscan friars, commonly called the Gray Abbey, and situated on the south side of the town, was founded in 1260, by Lord William de Vesey, and afterwards completed by Gerald Fitzmaurice, Lord Ophaly. Within its walls were interred the mortal remains of its completer or second founder in 1286; of Peter, Lord de Bermingham, in 1308; of Thomas Fitz-John, second earl of Kildare, in 1328; of Richard, third earl of Kildare, in 1329; and of Gerald, another of the earls of Kildare, in 1410. A monastery for Carmelites, or White friars, was founded at Kildare, in 1290, by the de Vesey family; but it figures very obscurely in even monkish narrative. At the general dissolution, the Franciscan and the Carmelite monasteries, together with their appurtenances, were granted, in capite, to Daniel Sutton, at the annual rent of 2s. 3d. Irish.

"Kildare, or Chille-darruigh, which signifies 'the church or cell under the oak,'" says a writer in the Anthologia Hibernica, "is said to have been founded by St. Conlaeth, in the beginning of the 6th century. It seems to have been one of the primitive churches of Ireland, and what is termed a mother church, numbers of which were deemed, in subsequent periods, bishoprics, though few, prior to the 10th century, were other than convents of regular canons, who resided in or near their churches, with their families and pupils or disciples, where they instructed youth in the principles of learning and religion. Under this circumstance, Kildare was one of the ancient schools or academies of Ireland during the middle ages. Of the original church and city of Kildare, there are at present no remains; both the church and other buildings being frequently plundered and destroyed by the Danes. The round tower and cathedral, whose ruins still remain, owe their origin to periods much subsequent to the time we are now speaking of. * * * Among the number of students who were in different periods educated by the monks of Kildare, several were of distinguished parts, in particular O'Buge, who flourished about the year 1320, called generally in the language of the times, the burning light, the mirror and ornament of his country; he was well skilled in divinity, philosophy, rhetoric, and the canon and civil law; and was buried in the Carmelite monastery, founded by William de Vesey, in 1290; which monastery was situated within the then town, and confounded with the ancient convent of regular canons, of which there doth not appear to have been any particular building; the cathedral was their church, and the members dwelt round it, in separate houses, constituting the ancient city."

A strong castle was built at Kildare, shortly after the English conquest; and both added much to the town's importance, and drew upon it an alternation of prosperity and disaster. This structure was an object of frequent contention during the turbulencies of intestine war; it shared the fate, common to many military strengths, of alternate demolition and restoration; it was last repaired and garrisoned during the wars of the 17th century; and it now survives in remains which, while rather bulky and massive, possess no interest for the antiquary or the artist.—The county infirmary, situated in the town, is a well-managed institution, lately enlarged, and now containing 50 beds. The building, however, is not sufficiently commodious; and many suitable applicants for admission are turned away for want of room, and compelled either to remain destitute of infirmary aid, or to seek it in the hospitals of Dublin. A portion of the building is now inhabited by the family of the surgeon, and might be made available for the reception of patients; and, in consequence of the inconvenient distance of the Naas and Kilcullen fever hospitals, the governors desiderated in 1840, the construction of two fever wards. In 1839–40, the infirmary admitted 442 intern patients; made 4,500 dispensations of medicine to extern patients; expended £183 1s. 10d. in salaries of medical officers, £40 12s. 6d. in medicines, and £738 2s. 4½d. on contingencies; and was supported with £27 6s. from subscription, £1,183 1s. 10d. from public grants, and £19 0s. 6d. from other sources.—The only other public buildings are the market-house and the Roman Catholic chapel.

Trade.—No manufacture exists; nor, in consequence of the exceeding scarcity of water, can any be expected. A weekly market is held on Thursday; chartered fairs are held on Feb. 2, Easter-Tuesday, and Sept. 8; and other fairs are held on June 29, and Oct. 29. In 1838, the public conveyances were very abundant in number and accommodation, but were all merely in transit, and consisted of a coach between Dublin and Birr, a caravan between Dublin and Mountmellick, a coach and a mail-coach between Dublin and Limerick, a coach between Dublin and Thurles, and a caravan between Dublin and Roscrea. The main trunk railway, projected by the public commissioners, passes within 5 statute miles of Kildare at Milltown; and will thence effect travelling to Dublin in 1 hour and 38 minutes.

Municipal Affairs.—A charter of 4 James II., recites that Kildare had been an ancient borough, but that its franchises, liberties, and privileges, had been seized into the King's hands by a judgment of the Court of Exchequer; and it declares that Kildare should be a free borough, extending to the same metes and bounds as at any former period; that its corporation should consist of one sovereign, two provosts, 20 burgesses, and a commonalty; and that all its inhabitants should constitute one body politic. An original charter of the borough, granted by one of the Henrys, probably the 8th, has been found in the record office of the Court of Chancery, but is so torn and obliterated as to be almost illegible. The borough grounds extended considerably beyond the town, spread away from it very unequally in different directions, were even intersected and cut into portions by other lands, and included about 3,000 acres of the Curragh, and 300 acres lying south of the town, and called the King's Bog, or Commons of Kildare. Only one Roman Catholic appears to have ever been a member of the corporation; and he was a mere freeman, admitted in 1799. The sovereign presided in the Borough Court till 1830; but, in modern times, he did not entertain suits for any higher claim than 40s. A court of petty-sessions is held by the county magistrates every Thursday; and a court of quarter-sessions is held twice a-year.

The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary. The corporation have now no income; and exercise no jurisdiction. The members of the corporation enjoy, in common with the occupiers of the surrounding lands, the right of grazing on the Curragh; and they and the inhabitants of the borough claim, and formerly enjoyed, the exclusive right of grazing on "the King's Commons;" but since the cessation of magisterial power on the part of the corporation, the commons are used by all persons who choose,—the only protection which the inhabitants possessed having passed away, of summoning before the sovereign any stranger who put cattle upon the Curragh. About 25 acres of "the King's Bog" have recently become, in a very quiet way, the enclosed property of a man who originally rented them from the corporation; and the remainder of the 700 acres are still unenclosed, and are rendered utterly valueless to the inhabitants of Kildare, in consequence of lying open to crowds of unchallenged trespassers. Tolls and customs were formerly collected, both in money and in kind; but they were resisted in 1826, and finally abolished in 1828. The borough was disfranchised at the Legislative Union; and the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement was paid to William, Duke of Leinster.

Statistics.—Area of the town, 90 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,753; in 1841, 1,629. Houses 299. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 123; in manufactures and trade, 149; in other pursuits, 49. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 18; on the directing of labour, 141; on their own manual labour, 151; on means not specified, 11. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 347; who could read but not write, 127; who could neither read nor write, 215. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 246; who could read but not write, 215; who could neither read nor write, 308.

History.—The alleged or current history of Kildare during a long period subsequent to the apparent date of the town's foundation, is manifestly in a great measure fabulous; and, in addition to other gross and general incongruities, it exhibits pretended events which produce the three-horned dilemma of representing the fine existing pillar-tower to have outstood calamities which overwhelmed every other building, or to have been erected by Danes amidst their whirling careers of devastation, or to have been founded at so late a date as at least the close of the 11th century; yet they probably contain so considerable a portion of truth, and at all events are so generally circulated as matters of assured history, that we must sketch an outline of them as they are currently exhibited.

In 638, Black Hugh, king of Leinster, abdicated his throne and became a monk of Kildare; and afterwards he was made abbot and bishop. In 770 and 774, the town and abbey were consumed by fire. In 781, a celebrated battle was fought on the Curragh. In 880, Ceallach MacBran plundered the town and abbey, and slew a number of the clergy. In 833, the Danes plundered and sacked the town. In 835, the abbot of Armagh and a number of his clergy, paid a visit to Kildare abbey; and Fethlimid, the son of Crimthan, at the head of an armed force, seized the abbey, and carried the clergy into captivity. In 836, the Danes, from two fleets which had arrived in respectively the Boyne and the Liffey, destroyed Kildare by fire and sword, and carried away rich shrines which had been erected to St. Bridget and St. Conlaeth. In 870, another king of Leinster abdicated his throne, and became abbot of Kildare. In 883, the Danes spoiled the town and abbey, and carried away the abbot and 280 of his clergy and family. In 887, 889, 895, 920, 924, 926, 927, 953, 962, 992, 998, 1012, and 1016, the Danes, from various quarters, and with various severity, plundered the town, occasionally carrying away captives as well as booty; and at one of these dates, 962, they almost totally destroyed the town, and made the greater part of the inhabitants slaves. In 1018, the whole town, with the exception of but one house, was destroyed by lightning; and in 1038, 1040, 1071, 1089, and 1099, it was destroyed by fire. "The buildings which after such frequent depredations and losses were rebuilt," remarks an annalist, "must necessarily have consisted of wattled or wicker work, yet of exceeding beauty, as Venerable Bede himself bears testimony, where he speaks of the Irish wood architecture as nationally excelling all other. They were, however, easily destroyed either by premeditated or accidental fire. In 1259, Calvagh O'Connor, when in arms against the English government, stormed the castle of Kildare, burned the rolls and tallies belonging to the manor, and wasted the adjacent country; but, subsequently, he was defeated by Lord Ophaly, and compelled to return to his own country. In 1309, a parliament was held in Kildare; but, for what purpose, or with what results, is not recorded. In 1336, the warden of the Franciscans of Kildare was sent in an embassy to the Hebrides, to treat with John, Lord of the Isles. In 1344, by mandate, reciting that the O'Tooles, O'Byrnes, MacMurroughs, and O'Nolans had risen to oppose the English, the seneschal of the liberty of Kildare was commanded to proclaim that no person should aid them with victuals, horses, or arms, that one peace or one war should prevail throughout the land, and that each adjacent county should aid any one which was invaded or harassed by Irish enemies. In the reign of Elizabeth, the town suffered so severely, that, in 1600, the houses were all in ruins, and without a single inhabitant. In 1641, the cathedral was reduced to ruin by a cannonade; but in 1643, the town was made a garrison-post under the Earl of Castlehaven, and it in consequence suddenly began to reattract inhabitants. In 1647, the town was taken upon quarter by Colonel Jones; soon after it was retaken by the Irish; and in June 1649, it was retaken by the Lord-lieutenant.

The Diocese.—The bishopric of Kildare, as we have seen, is alleged to have been founded by St. Conlaeth, with the assistance of St. Bridget. Yet so obscure is St. Conlaeth, even in monkish story, that the chief things told about him are, that he died on the third of May 519, that his body was buried near the high altar of his own church, and that his bones, 281 years afterwards, were translated into a silver gilded shrine, adorned with precious stones. The alleged annals of the diocese, during many ages after the date assigned for Conlaeth's death, consist of but a few fugitive hints and jaw-breaking Milesian names; so that, however keenly studied, they yield no information which the ecclesiastical antiquary can esteem of solid value. Evidence, in fact, is all but conclusive of at least the proximate correctness of the opinion which we quoted from the Anthologia Hibernica, that what posterity has pronounced a cathedral in Kildare, previous to the latter half of the 12th century, was originally a Culdean church, and even ultimately what is in general called a church of regular canons. The succession of bishops from the date of credible record, till the present century, is by no means unconfused or uninterrupted; yet it is tolerably complete, and may bear to be exhibited. In 1176, Malachy O'Byrne; in 1177, Nehemiah; in 1206, Cornelius MacGelan, often called Cornelius of Cloncurry; in 1223, Ralph of Bristol, the repairer and beautifier of the cathedral; in 1233, John of Taunton; in 1258, Simon of Kilkenny; from 1272 to 1279 vacant; in 1279, Nicholas Cusack; in 1299, Walter Leveele; in 1334, Richard Hulot; in 1353, Thomas Giffard; in 1365, vacant; in 1366, Robert of Aketon; in some unascertained year subsequent to the preceding date, a person of the name of George; in 1401, Henry of Wessenberch; in some unascertained year between 1401 and 1405, a person of the name of Thomas; in 1405, John Maddock; in 1432, William; in 1449, Geoffrey Hereford; in 1464, Richard Lang; in 1474, David; in 1475, James Wale; in some unascertained year subsequent to the preceding date, William Barret, but both Wale and Barret were for a long time only nominal bishops; in 1482, Edmund Lane; in 1523, Thomas Dillon; in 1531, Walter Wellesley; in 1540, William Meagh; in 1550, Thomas Lancaster, the first Protestant bishop; in 1554, Thomas Leverous; in 1559, or for 17 months, vacant; in 1560, Alexander Craik; in 1564, Robert Daly; in 1583, Daniel Neylan; in 1604, William Pilsworth; in 1635, Robert Usher, son of Archbishop Usher; in 1644, William Golbourn; in 1660, Thomas Price; in 1667, Ambrose Jones; in 1678, Anthony Dopping; in 1681, William Moreton; in 1705, Welbore Ellis; in 1731, Charles Cobb; in 1743, George Stone; in 1745, Thomas Fletcher; in 1761, Richard Robinson; in 1765, Charles Jackson; in 1790, George L. Jones; in 1804, Charles Lindsay. Bishop Lane of the 15th century, founded an institution in which the dean and chapter might live in a collegiate manner; and he was induced by the Earl of Kildare to assist at the coronation of the impostor, Lambert Simnel, but was afterwards pardoned. Bishop Leverous, of the 16th century, was expelled from the see for refusing to take the oath of supremacy; and he supported himself for some time by keeping a school at Limerick. Bishop Craik, the next occupant after Leverous, exchanged the principal estates of the bishopric for some tithes of small value. Bishop Pilsworth, the third after Craik, made farther alienations of the episcopal property; and the proceedings of these two bishops so greatly reduced the revenues, that ever since respectively 1641 and 1689, the deanery of Christ Church, Dublin, and the preceptory of Tully, have been held in commendam with the see.

The bishopric of Kildare continued to be distinct or unannexed till the passing of the Church Temporalities act in 1833; but it was then appointed to be consolidated with Dublin and Glandelough. On an average of three years, ending on 31st Dec., 1831, the gross income of the bishop was £6,451 13s. 3d., derived in the three sums of £520 3s. 2½d. from the see of Kildare, £617 4s. 1d. from the preceptory of Tully, and £5,314 5s. 11d. from the deanery of Christ Church, Dublin; and the nett income was £6,061 11s. 11d., derived in the sums of respectively £410 15s. 5½d., £553 19s. 4d., and £5,096 17s. 1½d., from the three sources of revenue. The gross amount of the corporate revenues of the dean and chapter, is £602 12s. 8d.; the nett income, divided among the members, on an average of 3 years ending in Dec. 1831, was £492 7s. 9d.; and this was divided in equal proportions among the members, except that the second and the third canons always received £2 10s. 5d. less than any of the other six members. The dignitaries, together with the corps and the gross income of each—the latter irrespective, however, of revenues derived from annexed benefices, as well as of a share in the corporate revenues—are, the dean, the rectory of Cloncurry, £131 10s. 10d.; the precentor, the sinecure precentorship of Kildare, £17 15s. 1d.; the chancellor, the sinecure chancellorship of Kildare, no revenue; the treasurer, the sinecure tressurership of Kildare, £12 12s.; and four canons, the canonries of Kildare cathedral, no revenue.

The diocese of Kildare comprehends the chief part of co. Kildare, a large part of King's co., and a considerable part of Queen's co. Dr. Beaufort, estimating the whole to comprise 331,000 acres, and 81 parishes, and to contain 28 churches, assigns to co. Kildare 161,000 acres, 56 parishes, and 14 churches; to King's co. 121,000 acres, 18 parishes, and 8 churches; and to Queen's co. 49,000 acres, 7 parishes, and 6 churches. The greatest length of the diocese from east to west, is 36 Irish or 46 English miles; its greatest breadth is 23 Irish or 29 English miles; and its area is 367,222 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 127,983. Parishes, 78; chapelries, 2; benefices, 47, of which 2 are sinecure; benefices consisting of single parishes, or of chapelries, 27. Resident incumbents, 31; non-resident incumbents, 16. Tithe composition belonging to the benefices, £11,490 9s. 3½d; glebes, £1,148 10s. 10d. Gross income, £12,872 18s. 10½d.; nett, £10,873 10s. 2d. Patron of 13 benefices, the Crown; of 17, the diocesan; of 1, the incumbent; of 11, laymen and corporations; of 5, alternate parties. Appropriate tithes, £725 15s.; impropriate tithes, £2,383 13s. 8½d. Stipendiary curates, inclusive of 4 who merely perform occasional duties, 25; aggregate salaries of stipendiary curates, £1,529 3s. 1d.; benefices having no stipendiary curate, 24. Benefices without churches, 16; benefices with churches, 31. Total of churches, and chapels-of-ease, 34; sittings 8,601. Cost of building 16, building and enlarging 1, enlarging 3, and repairing 2 of these churches, £19,182 6s.; of which £7,399 7s. 8½d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £7,500 0s. 0½d. was borrowed from that Board £144 9s. 1½d. was contributed by private donation, £184 12s. 3½d. was raised from the sale of old materials, and £3,953 16s. 9½d. was raised by parochial assessments. Other places of worship belonging to the Establishment than churches and chapels-of-ease, 4; places of worship belonging to Protestant dissenters, 17; Roman Catholic chapels, 46. In 1834, the population consisted of 13,907 churchmen, 9 Presbyterians, 384 other Protestant dissenters, and 120,056 Roman Catholics; each of four benefices contained not more than 20 persons connected with the Established Church, each of 3 not more than 50, each of 12 not more than 100, each of 4 not more than 200, each of 9 not more than 500, each of 5 not more than 1,000, each of 3 not more than 2,000, and the remaining 1 between 2,000 and 5,000. In the same year 205 daily schools made returns of their attendance, and had on their books 6,692 boys and 5,351 girls; and 10 daily schools made no returns of their attendance, but were computed to be attended by 590 children. Of the total of 215 schools, 110 were supported wholly by fees, and 105 wholly or in part by endowment or subscription; and of the latter, 44 were in connection with the National Board, 2 with the Association for Discourteuing Vice, 6 with the board of Erasmus Smith, 4 with the Kildare Place Society, and 8 with the London Hibernian Society.

The Roman Catholic Diocese.—The Roman Catholic dioceses of Kildare and Leighlin are mutually annexed and consolidated; and all their statistics are exhibited in cumulo as those of the united diocese of Kildare and Leighlin. The seat of this diocese is Carlow; the episcopal residence is Braganza House, in the vicinity of Carlow; and the bishop's parish is the parish of Carlow. The number of parochial clergy is 46, and of coadjutor clergy or curates, 73. The number of parishes is 47; and, together with the sites of the chapels in each, are as follow:—1. Carlow,—Carlow; 2. Paulstown,—Paulstown and Goresbridge; 3. Kildare,—Kildare and Rathangan; 4. Rosenallis,—Rosenallis; 5. Edenderry,—Edenderry, Rhode, and Krangham; 6. Myshall,—St. Mullins, Glynn, and Drummond; 7. Ballinakill,—Ballinakill and Knockardagur; 8. Clonegall,—Clonegall and Kildavin; 9. Stradbally,—Stradbally, Timahoe, and Escar; 10. Borris,—Borris, Ballymurphy, and Rahann; 11. Naas,—Naas; 12. Graigue,—Graigue, and Schranwasteen; 13. Allen and Milltown,—Allen and Milltown; 14. Clonbullogue,—Clonbullogue, Brackna, and the islands; 15. Carbery,—Castle-Carbery, and Dunforth; 16. Raheen,—Raheen and Springmount; 17. Ballina,—Ballina, Garrisker, and Narney; 18. Rathvilly,—Rathvilly, Trimock, and Englishtown; 19. Clonaslee,—Clonaslee; 20. Ballyadams,—Ballyadams, Lugacurrin, and Wolfhill; 21. Mountmellick,—Mountmellick and Clonahodoe; 22. Bagnalstown,—Bagnalstown, Newtown, and Ballinkillen; 35. Sanacroft,—Sanacroft; 36. St. Mullins,—Myshall and Drumfea; 37. Hacketstown,—Hacketstown, Killamote, and Knockanna; 38. Ballyfin,—Ballyfin; 39. Mountrath,—Mountrath and the Hollow; 40. Portarlinton,—Portarlinton, Killeynard, and Emo; 41. Maryborough,—Maryborough and Meath; 42. Tullow,—Tullow, Ardatten, and Kilterigg; 43. Killeshin,—Killeshin and Graigue; 44. Philipstown,—Philipstown and Kill; 45. Clonmore,—Clonmore, Kilguiggan, and Rockbalistine; 46. Clara and Downings,—Clara and Prosperous; and 47. Tinryland,—Tinryland and Benekerry. One recent official statement respecting the chapels, says, "All are clean and elegant, and generally surpass the country chapels of foreign countries;" and another says, "All are good and substantial buildings," and adds, "Witness Carlow, Kildare, Naas, Craigmanna, Johnstown, Edenderry, and Newtown, which cost from £1,300 to £13,000 each,—with many others of the same class—Maryborough, Philipstown, Ballinagar, Graigue, &c., &c." Two colleges are within the diocese,—St. Patrick's at Carlow, and the Jesuits' at Clongowes; and there is also a conventual boarding-school, St. Patrick's, at Tullow. The monasteries and convents within the diocese, are a Carmelite convent at Kildare, a Presentation convent at Kildare, a Dominican convent at Newbridge, a Dominican convent at Athy, a community of Sisters of Mercy at Naas, and a Presentation convent at Bagnalstown.

KILDAVIN, a parish in the barony of Forth, 3½ miles south-west of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 3,441 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches. Pop., in 1831, 521; in 1841, 1,069. Houses 184. The extreme north is occupied by part of the Forth mountains; but the other districts consist of low, level, and rich land. A woollen factory, and part of Johnstown-Castle demesne, are on the east. The road from Wexford to Baldwinstown passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Patrick's of Wexford, in the dio. of Ferns. See WEXFORD. Tues composition, £125. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 574; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Rathmacnee and Killeen. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 29, and the Roman Catholics to 477; and there was no school.

KILDAVIN, a village in the parish of Barragh, barony of Forth, co. Carlow, Leinster. It stands on the road from Tullow to Newtownbarry, in the pleasant vale of the Derry rivulet, near the confluence of that stream with the Slaney, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Clonegall, and 2 north by west of Newtownbarry. A considerable extent of limestone and sandstone pebble has been accumulated near the windings of the river at the village; and numerous excavations are made in a long stretch of the valley for the limestone pebble as a manure. The road from Kildavin to Newtownbarry climbs a part of the spur-hills of Mount-Leinster, and commands a fine view of the windings of the Slaney along the wooded banks of Lord Farnham's park, and of the western ramparts of the Wicklow mountains in the perspective. Pop. of the village returned with the parish.

KILDECAMOGUE, KILDACAMOGUE, or KILTACAMOGUE, a parish in the baronies of Carra and Gallen, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Castlebar, co. Mayo, Connaught. The Gallen section contains the village of BELLAVARY: which see. Three mutually detached districts constitute the parish; yet they lie so little asunder that the extreme length and breadth of the whole, exclusive of intervening grounds, is respectively $4\frac{1}{2}$ and $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Area of the Carra section, 2,896 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches,—of which 50 acres, 32 perches are water. Area of the Gallen section, 4,656 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches,—of which 3 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,542; in 1841, 3,923. Houses 689. Pop. of the Carra section, in 1831, 1,494; in 1841, 1,605. Houses 289. Pop. of the rural districts of the Gallen section, in 1841, 2,202. Houses 381. The surface lies along the valley of the Castlebar river, and around the skirts of Spullagadon Hill and Slieve-Conn; and though containing a large aggregate of bog and mountain, is officially reported as "consisting of good pasture and tillage." The hamlets are Bangor, White Village, Drumgannoch, Balloor, Moyhenna, South Arra, North Arra, and Coolshinna.—This parish is a rectory, and part of both the benefice of Castlebar and the perpetual curacy of Turlough, in the dio. of Tuam. See CASTLEBAR and TURLOUGH. Tithe composition, £129 4s. 7½d.; glebe, £7 10s. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in Turlough. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 98, and the Roman Catholics to 3,811; a pay daily school had on its books 40 boys and 20 girls, and another pay daily school had just been opened in the Roman Catholic chapel.

KILDEEMO. See KILDIMO.

KILDELLIG, or KILDELLYGLY, a parish in the barony of Clarmallagh, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east by east of Borris-in-Ossory, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1; area, 1,251 acres, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 303; in 1841, 342. Houses 56. The land is in general good. An early religious establishment is said to have existed here; and to have been presided over by St. Sillan and St. Cuanan, the latter of whom died in 721.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RATHDOWNY [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £57 10s. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 304; and a pay daily school had on its books 20 boys and 20 girls.

KILDEMOCK, or KILDERNOCK, a parish in the barony of Ardee, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-east of the town of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, east by northward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,246 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 996; in 1841, 104. Houses 202. The surface is flat, consists of good land, and is traversed by the road from Ardee to Dublin. Drakestown, within the limits, is the seat of Nath. Manning, Esq.; and the other seats are Kilpatrick and Roestown.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ARDEE [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £200; glebe, £147 16s. 8d. The Roman Catholic chapel at Drakestown has an attendance of 420; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ardee. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 53, and the Roman Catholics to 988; and 2 daily schools—the one of which was supported wholly by the rector, and the other salaried with £15 from subscription—had on their books 192 boys and 126 girls.

KILDERERY. See KILDORRERY.

KILDERRY, a parish in the barony of Gowran, 4 miles north-east of Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,192 acres. Pop., in 1831, 718; in 1841, 575. Houses 91. The land averages in yearly value 20s. per plantation acre.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of MOTHELL [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £160. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 38, and the Roman Catholics to 702; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILDERRYDADRUM. See AGHNAMADLE.

KILDIMO, or KILDEEMO, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Kenry, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by west of Adare, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,183 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,357; in 1841, 3,670. Houses 589. Area of the village, 22 acres. Pop., in 1841, 218. Houses 34. The surface comprises detached parts; consists of very good land; and is washed on the west by the river Maig. The road from Limerick to Askeaton passes through the interior. "A monastery," says the credulous and indiscriminating Archdall, "was founded here some time before the arrival of St. Patrick in Munster, by Dimma a priest, who instructed and educated St. Declan."—This parish is a rectory, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Limerick. The rectory is part of the benefice of St. Michael's, and corps of the archdeaconry of Limerick. Tithe composition, £276 18s. 5½d. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice. Glebe, £19 10s. Gross income, £148 14s. 7½d.; nett, £134 4s. 2d. Patron, the archdeacon. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kilquane in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. The church was built in 1725. Sittings 120; attendance, about 15. The Roman Catholic chapels of Kildimo and Ardeanny, have an attendance, the former of about 700, and the latter of from 1,000 to 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 39, and the Roman Catholics to 3,461; and 6 pay daily schools had on their books 130 boys and 78 girls.

KILDOLLAGH. See KILDALLOCK.

KILDORRERY, or KILDERERY, a parish, partly in the barony of Fermoy, but chiefly in that of Condons and Clangibbon, co. Cork, Munster. The Condons and Clangibbon section contains the small post-town of Kildorrery. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Fermoy section, 402 acres; of the Condons and Clangibbon section, 2,935 acres. Pop.

of the whole, in 1831, 1,986; in 1841, 1,994. Houses 296. Pop., in 1841, of the Fermoy section, 147; of the rural districts of the Condons and Clangibbon section, 1,303. Houses in these, respectively, 21 and 194. Previous to the recent alterations on the extent of baronies, the whole parish lay within Condons and Clangibbon. The surface is peninsulated between the river Funcheon on the east, and a small affluent of that stream on the west; consists, for the most part, of beautiful valley ground, arable and very fertile; and is traversed by the road from Mitchellstown to Mallow, and by the projected line of railway, as laid down by the Public Commissioners, from the Dublin Main Trunk line to Cork. The village or small town of Kildorrery stands on both the road and the proposed route of the railway, 4 miles west by south of Mitchellstown, and 6 miles east-north-east of Doneraile. Fairs are held on May 1, June 27, Sept. 3, and Nov. 27. A dispensary here is within the Fermoy Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £133 18s. 3½d., and administered to 3,721 patients. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1831, 576; in 1841, 544. Houses 81. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 45; in manufactures and trade, 45; in other pursuits, 6. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 55; on their own manual labour, 36; on means not specified, 3.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of NATHLASH [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £159 11s.; and the latter are inappropriate in John Nason, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in Molagga. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 2,049.

KILDOWNE. See KILLADOON, co. Kildare.

KILDRESS, a parish in the barony of Dunganon, 3 miles west-north-west of Cookstown, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Length, 8½ miles; breadth, 6; area, 26,251 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches,—of which 28 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 7,063; in 1841, 8,192. Houses 1,436. The western and central districts are wild moor and mountain,—a frontier portion of the great upland region of Tyrone and Londonderry; but the eastern district consists, for the most part, of good land, and is embellished with the demesnes of Oaklands and Wellbrook, the property of, respectively, W. J. Richardson, Esq., and G. Gunning, Esq. The nascent Ballinderry river effects most of the drainage in the direction of Lough Neagh.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £354; glebe, £380 2s. 8d. Gross income, £734 2s. 8d.; nett, £657 6s. 11½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1818, by means of £184 12s. 3½d. raised by parochial assessment, and £1,107 13s. 10½d. borrowed from the late board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 76 to 120. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 300. The Roman Catholic chapels of Killeenan and Dunamore have an attendance of, respectively, 712 and 641; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,401 churchmen, 1,380 Presbyterians, and 4,629 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools—3 of which were salaried with, respectively, £6, £6, and £10, from the National Board, one with £8 from the Association for Discourteasing Vice, and one with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith—had on their books 409 boys and 159 girls. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Stramaclemartin, Dunamore, Killieannan, Glenarney, Corvanaghan, and Gortnagross, and made a grant of £55 12s. 6d. toward the erection of one at Gortnagladdy.

KILDROUGHT. See CELBRIDGE.

KILDRUM, a parish in the barony of Corkaguiney, 2½ miles west of Dingle, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 2,889 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,060; in 1841, 1,217. Houses 198. The surface is part of the southern sea-board of the barony, between the harbours of Dingle and Ventry; and consists, in nearly equal proportions, of first-rate, second-rate, and third-rate land. On the west shore of Dingle harbour stands Burnham, the seat of Lord Ventry, a tall square house, overhanging the water from a lawn which is unrelieved by even a single tree, and has a bleak and desolate appearance.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition, £36 18s. 5½d.; glebe, £3. Gross income, £39 18s. 5½d.; nett, £37 13s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £73 16s. 11d., and are inappropriate in Lord Ventry. The vicar is non-resident; and a curate receives a salary of £10 for performing the occasional duties. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 24, and the Roman Catholics to 1,141; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILDRUMFERTON, or CROSSERLOUGH, a parish 6 miles south by west of Ballinanagh, and partly in the baronies of Clonmahon and Upper Loughtee, but chiefly in that of Castle-Rahan, co. Cavan, Ulster. The Castle-Rahan section contains the village of KILNALECK: which see. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 4½. Area of the Loughtee section, 261 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches; of the Clonmahon section, 4,445 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches,—of which 144 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches are water; of the Castle-Rahan section, 11,729 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches,—of which 62 acres, 3 roods are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 9,687; in 1841, 10,446. Houses 1,766. Pop. of the Upper Loughtee section, in 1831, 89; in 1841, 163. Houses 27. Pop. of the Clonmahon section, in 1831, 2,442; in 1841, 2,504. Houses 420. Pop. of the Castle-Rahan section, exclusive of the village of Kilnaleck, in 1831, 6,809; in 1841, 7,472. Houses 1,264. The surface includes the lake of Corglass, and the bleak and uninteresting country lying north of the shores of Lough Sheelin, and west of the town of Ballyjamesduff. Most of the land is of the hilly and broken character locally called mountainous; yet such portions as are arable average in yearly value from 20s. to 35s. per plantation acre. Kilnacrot, the seat of Pierce Morton, Esq., stands a mile east of the village of Mount-Nugent; Kill-House, another seat, stands near the lake of Corglass; and Drumroragh-lodge stands 2½ miles south-east of Kilnaleck. The roads from Cavan to respectively Dublin, Castle-Pollard, and Granard, pass through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Vicarial tithe composition, £400; glebe, £356. Gross income, £756 15s.; nett, £610 8s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £272; and are inappropriate in George Walsh and Richard Nugent, Esqrs. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1812, at the cost of £1,200; of which £507 13s. 10½d. was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and the remainder was raised by the parish. Sittings 200; attendance 100. The Drumkilly and Crosserlough Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,000 and 1,700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 971 Churchmen, 60 Presbyterians, and 8,684 Roman Catholics; and 11 daily schools—two of which were aided from subscription, one salaried with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and 4 acres of land from the rector, and one wholly supported by Lord Farnham—had on their books 667 boys and 306 girls.

KILDRUMSHERDAN. See KILLERSHERDINY.

KILDYSERT, or KILLADYSERT, a parish, containing a post village of the same name, on the east border of the barony of Clonderalaw, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4; area, 12,859 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches,—of which 130 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,501; in 1841, 5,130. Houses 753. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,164; in 1841, 4,526. Houses 673. The surface consists partly of islands in the estuaries of the Fergus and the Shannon, partly of a portion of the rich and beautiful western sea-board of the Fergus' estuary, and partly of a portion of the moorish frontier heights of the western uplands of the county. The land may, in an aggregate view, be pronounced partly good and partly middle-rate. The chief islands are Inishnacowney, Canon, Inishloe, Coney, and Inishtubrid; and both these islands and the sea-board at once form and command beautiful objects for the poet, and fine subjects for the painter. The post-road from Ennis to Kilrush—ill-constructed and hilly—passes along the coast, and through the village. The lakes Gortglass and Cloonsnaghta, 2½ miles from the Fergus, have an elevation of respectively 224 and 236 feet above sea-level; and a height a little south of the latter has an altitude of 425 feet. The seats are Rosshill, Crovraghan, Lanesborough, Ballyvoghane, and Ballylean; and part also of the demesne of Cahiracon, the property of John Scott, Esq., and one of the most beautiful and romantic demesnes on either the Fergus or the Shannon, lies within the southern boundary. The inhabitants of the parish enjoy the facilities of water-communication with Limerick and the ocean, and will reap some advantages from the improvements effected by the Shannon Navigation Commissioners. The village of Kildysert stands on the Ennis and Kilrush road, and on the shore of the Fergus, opposite the island of Innisherk, 12 miles south-south-west of Ennis, and 15 miles east by north of Kilrush. Fairs are held on May 22, and Aug. 27. A dispensary here is within the Kilrush Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 5,457; and in 1839-40, it expended £82 and administered to 1,121 patients. Area of the village, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 337; in 1841, 604. Houses 80. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 33; in manufactures and trade, 64; in other pursuits 17. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 59; on their own manual labour, 43; on means not specified, 3.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £150; glebe, £24. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £276 18s. 4½d.; and are inappropriate in Bindin Scott, Esq. The vicarages of Kildysert and KILCHRIST and the rectory of KILFARBOY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kildysert, yet only the two vicarages constitute the cure. Length, 9 miles. Pop., in 1831, 7,070. Gross income, £594; nett, £537 18s. 5d. Patron, the Earl of Egremont. The incumbent holds also the small stipendary curacy of Kilmurry-Ibrickane. A curate for Kildysert has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1814, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 12. The Kildysert Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Kilchrist. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 32, and the Roman Catholics to 4,802; the Protestants of the union to 68, and the Roman Catholics to 7,524; 2 hedge-schools in the parish had on their books 145 boys and 87 girls; and 6 daily schools in the union had 285 boys and 89 girls. In 1840, a boys' school and girls' school at Kildysert, were salaried with respectively £15 and £8 from the National Board, and had on their books 111 boys and 71 girls.

KILE. See KILLE.

KILFAGHNAGHBEG. See KILFAUGHNABEG.

KILFANE, a parish in the barony of Gowran, 3 miles north-east by north of Thomastown, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 3,972 acres. Pop., in 1831, 898; in 1841, 931. Houses 150. The surface comprises about 100 acres of unprofitable land, and elsewhere varies in the quality of its soil from the best to the worst. The interior is traversed by the road from Dublin to Waterford, and drained southward by a small affluent of the Nore. The mansions of Kilfane and Summerhill, are the seats of respectively Mr. Power and Mr. Davis. Mr. Archdall says that an abbey was early erected at Kilfane by St. Phian.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £274; glebe, £46. The rectory of Kilfane and the vicarages of TULLOWHERIN, and BLANCHVILLESTOWN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilfane, and the corps of the archdeaconry of Ossory. Blanchvillestown lies detached from the other two members of the union, and consists of only a denomination of the parish of Gowran. Length of Kilfane and Tullowherin, 4 miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 2,017. Gross income, £602 7s. 11d.; nett, £505 17s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Killersherdiney in the dio. of Kilmore, and the sinecure prebend of Tassagard, and the place of a vicar choral, in St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1832, by means of £300 raised by subscription, and £500 borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 30 to 40. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Tullowherin. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 30, and the Roman Catholics to 868; the Protestants of the union to 71, and the Roman Catholics to 1,946; a daily school in the parish was salaried with £10 from the rector, instructed 30 free scholars, and had on its books 58 boys and 30 girls; and 4 daily schools in the union had on their books 205 boys and 85 girls.

KILFARBOY—anciently KILFOBRICK—a parish on the coast of the barony of Ibrickane, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the town of MILTOWN-MALBAY; which see. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 13,981 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches,—of which 42 acres, 37 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,389; in 1841, 7,498. Houses 1,166. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,663; in 1841, 6,203. Houses 953. The coast is part of the bold marine rampart between the bays of Liscanor and Doonbeg, and contains the headland called Spanish Point; and the eastern border soars up to the summit of the monarch-height of Mount-Callan. The surface may be summarily described as an intermixture of bog, mountain, pasture-land, and arable ground. The boggy grounds, in consequence of the facility of obtaining sea-manure, are in progress of improvement. The coast and country immediately around Miltown-Malbay—and, of course, the parish of Kilfarboy in particular—are thus noticed by Mr. Fraser: "This part of Malbay, though presenting several ranges of lofty cliffs, is not so bold and continuous as from Dunbeg to Loop Head. It is broken into low reefs of rocks and intervening sandy coves, into which the sea heavily beats. The country around Miltown, and along the coast towards Kilkee, wears a desolate aspect—not a seat is to be seen. The land is of a very mixed quality, yet is susceptible of much improvement. The roads are bad; and the greater part of the country belongs to non-resident proprietors, who seem regardless of everything but the collection of rent." A height on the east border has an altitude of 843 feet; Knockabullaunduff, a little east of the centre, has an altitude of 661 feet; and Aballaunduff, in the vicinity of the latter height, has an elevation of 536 feet. In the vicinity of Miltown-Malbay are the mansions of Seaview and Miltown, a number of private bathing lodges, and the ruins of Moy-castle. Archdall says, that the monastery of Kilfobrick was founded in 740, and that Cormar, bishop and scribe of Kilfobrick, died in 837.—This parish is a rectory, and a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. The rectory is part of KILDYSERT; which see. Rectorial tithe composition, £315. The vicarage is united to the vicarage of KILMITHILL [which see], to constitute the benefice of Kilfarboy. Vicarial tithe composition, £238 16s. 11d.; glebe, £15 10s. Length of the benefice, 5 miles; breadth, 3½. Pop., in 1831, 10,183. Gross income, £334 11s.; nett, £292 9s. 5½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1805, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; attendance, from 60 to 150. The Kilfarboy Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmurry-Ibrickane. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Kilmithill. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 118, and the Roman Catholics to 6,637; the Protestants of the union to 130, and the Roman Catholics to 10,705; and 9 daily schools in the union—7 of which were in the parish, and one of these 7 aided with £5 a-year from the Roman Catholic clergyman—had on their books 345 boys and 146 girls.

KILFAUGHNABEG, a parish in the western division of the barony of East Carbery, 2½ miles west-south-west of Rosscarbery, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 3,127 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,461; in 1841, 2,556. Houses 434. The surface lies along the head and the east side of Glandore Harbour, and both forms and commands very beautiful scenery. See GLANDORE and LEAP. The road from Rosscarbery to Skibbereen passes along the northern border.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILMACABEA [which see], in the dio. of Ross. Vicarial tithe composition, £140; glebe, £10 1s. 6½d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £140; and are appropriated to the archdeaconry of Ross. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmacabea. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 60, and the Roman Catholics to 2,411; and 2 daily schools—the one of which was salaried with £15 from the National Board, and the other with £30 from that Board, and £11 from subscription through Miss Adams—had on their books 237 boys and 270 girls. In 1840, the National Board had two schools at Glandore, one at Leap, and one at Knockskeagh.

KILFEACLE, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 4½ miles east of Tipperary, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 6,500 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches. Pop. in 1831, 2,033; in 1841, 2,176. Houses 298. The surface declines partly to the north, but chiefly to the south; and its water-level descends from 234 to 210 feet. The land, in its aggregate quality, is good. Kilfeacle-house is the seat of James Scully, Esq. The antiquities are ruins of four castles and two churches. An obscure story is told respecting the parish having received its name from an ancient abbey called "the Church of the Tooth;" but Archdall, while ready enough to grasp at the phantasmagoria of anything like an Irish abbey in times preceding the Anglo-Norman conquest, places the alleged "Church of the Tooth" in co. Cork.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TIPPERARY [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £369 4s. 7½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Religmurry. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 2,123; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board—had on their books 86 boys and 60 girls.

KILFEARAGH. See KILPIERAGH.

KILFEAROW, or KILFERA, a parish on the east border of the barony of Shillelogher, 2½ miles south-east by south of Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 965 acres. Pop., in 1831, 58; in 1841, 218. Houses 36. It lies on the right bank of the river Nore.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of BURNCHUACU [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The tithes are compounded for £32 6s. 1d.; and are wholly impropriate in the Tynte family. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 59.

KILFEDANE, KILFIDANE, or KILFIDDANE, a parish in the south-east extremity of the barony of Clonderalaw, 4½ miles west-south-west of Kildysert, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3; area, 13,733 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches,—of which 43 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,165; in 1841, 4,661. Houses 716. The surface extends from the estuary of the Fergus, westward along the estuary of the Shannon, and into the interior, to the immediate vicinity of the head of Clonderalaw bay. Its east end partakes in variety and beautousness of character with the adjoining parish of KILDYSERT [which see]; and it also, in common with that parish, derives great embellishment from the picturesque demesne of Cahiracon, and hangs out an exquisite sheet of natural picture to observers on the Limerick side of the Shannon. The central and western districts are prevailingly upland; but possess a great advantage for the purposes of improvement in the facility with which sea-manures can be obtained. The stream, which falls into the head of Clonderalaw bay, descends, within the parish, from an elevation of 212 feet. The post-road from Ennis to Kilrush passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILMURRY-CLONDERALAW [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £101 10s. 9½d.; glebe, £4 12s. 3½d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £166 3s. 1d., and are impropriate in Bindon Scott, Esq. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of, respectively, 400 and 800. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 41, and the Roman Catholics to 4,324; and 5 daily schools—one of which was conducted under the superintendence of the Roman Catholic clergyman, and was free for a certain number of children—had on their books 212 boys and 72 girls.

KILFEIGHNEY, a parish in the barony of Clannaurice, 5½ miles south-south-west of Listowel, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 11,408 acres. Pop., in 1841, 2,388. Houses 359. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 1,968; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 1,918. But all these statistics include the parish of BALLYCONRY: which see. The surface is diversified in both outline and soil; varying from mountain and other upland to bog and arable ground. A small affluent of the river Brick effects the drainage westward. The road from Listowel to Tralee passes through the interior, and leaves the mansion of Banemore about a mile to the east.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition, £111 3s. 4d.; glebe, £12 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £111 3s. 4d., and are inappropriate in the Earl of Cork. The vicarages of Kilfeighney and Ballyconry, and a sinecure fifth of the rectory of Ardfert, constitute the benefice of Kilfeighney, and corps of the precentorship of Ardfert cathedral. Gross income, £220 2s. 6d.; nett, £171 1s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kileumney, in the dio. of Meath, and is resident there. A curate performs the occasional duties of Kilfeighney for a salary of £17. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 80, and the Roman Catholics to 1,960; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILFENNY, a parish in the barony of Upper Connello, 3 miles from Rathkeale, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 2,438 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,136; in 1841, 1,090. Houses 166. Fairs are held on the commons of Kilfenney, on May 15, July 14, Sept. 12, and Dec. 22.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LOUGHILL [which see], in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £180. There is no church; and the rector of the adjoining parish of Dredhtarsnie performs the occasional duties. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Crough. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 29, and the Roman Catholics to 1,154; and a pay daily school was usually attended in summer by about 145 children.

KILFENORA, a parish, containing a small episcopal village of the same name, on the east side of the barony of Corcomroe, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 5; area, 10,776 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches,—of which 218 acres, 2 roods, 35 perches are water. Pop., in 1841, 3,286. Houses 522. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,665. Houses 417. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 3,897; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 2,752. About one-half of the surface is prime fattening-ground; about one-fourth is excellent rearing and tillage-land; and the remainder is mountain and bog, but only to a small extent unprofitable. The land, while of good quality, is also better cultivated than that of the adjacent districts on the south. Lough Lakeen on the south has an elevation of 234 feet; and Slievebeg, immediately south of it, has an altitude of 525 feet. The principal residences are the Deanery, Ballykeale, Ballyshanny, Hollywell, and Kilcar; and the hamlets are Ballagh, North Ballagh, Knockacutteen, and Tulagh. The mountain road from Ennistymon to Burren traverses the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Kilfenora. Tithe composition, £250; glebe, £165. The rectory of Kilfenora, and the sinecure rectories of Kiltoraght and Clonney, constitute the benefice of Kilfenora, and the corps of the deanery of Kilfenora cathedral. Gross income, £647 18s. 0½d.; nett, £593 10s.

10½d. Patron, the Crown. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is the cathedral of the diocese, and is a very old building. Sittings 300; attendance 45. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kiltoraght. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 66, and the Roman Catholics to 2,920; and a hedge-school had on its books 128 boys and 82 girls. In 1839, the National Board granted £125 toward the erection of a boys' school and a girls' school at Kilfenora; and, in 1840, a National school there was salaried with £8 13s. 4d., and had on its books 154 boys and 91 girls.

KILFENORA, an episcopal village, in the parish of Kilfenora, barony of Corcomroe, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the road from Ennistymon to Burren, 4 miles north-north-east of Ennistymon, 6½ west-north-west of Corrofin, and 116 west by south of Dublin. It belongs to the same category as Emly, Clonfert, Kilmacduagh, Ardfert, Connor, Clogher, Kilmore, Ferns, and Achonry, in exhibiting a shrunk and ghastly caricature upon the practical notion of a "city;" and nothing but its episcopal name and historical associations prevent it from being regarded as a mean and shabby hamlet. It was anciently called Fenabore and Columabrach. An abbey of unknown origin is said to have been a scene of great slaughter, and to have itself been burnt, in 1055, by Murrough O'Brien. A fragment of this structure, or of what tradition affirms to have been such, still exists in the churchyard; and at its entrance are several ancient crosses. In the nave of the church are some old monuments; and in the choir is the alleged tomb of St. Fachnan, whom monastic dreamers make a disciple of St. Bar, and the founder of the see of Kilfenora. Fairs are held in the village on the Wednesday before Whitsunday, and on Oct. 9. A dispensary here is within the Ennistymon Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 10,477; and, in 1839–40, its receipts and disbursements amounted each to £99 15s. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1831, 558; in 1841, 621. Houses 105. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 57; in manufactures and trade, 49; in other pursuits, 22. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 54; on their own manual labour, 67; on means not specified, 5.

The see of KILFENORA is not alleged by any sober writer to have been founded before the 12th or 13th century; and the first bishop of it mentioned in record is Christian, who died in 1254. Thirteen successive bishops are named in history from Christian to the year 1602. Adams, bishop of Limerick, held it by dispensation from 1606 to 1617; and then it passed to Bishop Steele, who was afterwards translated to Ardfert. The see was so meagerly endowed, that Richard Betts, who was appointed to it in the reign of James I., would not accept it. Yet in spite of being both poor and small, it continued to be an unannexed see till after the Restoration; from 1660 till 1741, it was annexed to the see of Tuam; from 1741, till 1833, it was held in commendam by the bishop of Clonfert; and by the recent Church Temporalities Bill, it was incorporated with Killaloe, Clonfert, and Kilmacduagh.—The diocese comprehends only the baronies of Corcomroe and Burren, which form the north-east division of co. Clare. Length, 18 miles; breadth, 9; area, according to the estimate of Dr. Beaufort, 37,000 Irish acres. Total of parishes, 17; of benefices, 7; of resident incumbents, 4. Tithe compositions belonging to the benefices, £1,424 14s. 8½d.; glebes, £316 16s. 2½d. Gross income, £1,804 16s. 10½d.; nett, £1,666 11s. 11½d. Patron of 1 benefice, the Crown; of 5, the diocesan; of 1, the Marquis of Thomond. Amount of impropriate tithe composition, £559 19s. 6d. Number of stipendiary curates, 1; salary, £75. Number of churches, 3; sittings, 610. Number of Roman Catholic chapels, 15. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 235 Churchmen, 4 Presbyterians, and 36,166 Roman Catholics; 2 of the 7 benefices contained no member of the Established church, one contained not more than 20, one not more than 50, one not more than 100, and one not more than 200. In the same year, the total of daily schools was 28; the total of these supported wholly by fees was 27; the total of children on the books of 21 of the schools, was 1,089 boys and 586 girls; and the total of children computed to be in attendance at the remaining 7 schools was 560.—The nett amount of episcopal income connected with the see is £726 5s. 3d. The dean and chapter have no corporate revenue. The dignitaries, with the gross amount of income arising from the benefices which constitute their several corps, are the dean, £647 18s. 0½d.; the archdeacon, £393 6s. 2d.; the precentor or chanter, £97 10s.; the chancellor, £165; and the treasurer, £333.

The Roman Catholic dioceses of Kilfenora and Kilmacduagh are mutually annexed; and are suffragan alternately to Cashel and to Tuam. The dio. of Kilfenora is distributed into 8 parishes, and has 11 clergymen. The parishes, with their respective chapels, are Liscenor, at Ennistymon and Kilthomas; Tuhacles, at Ennistymon and another place; Carron, at Carron; New Quay, at New Quay; Kilfenora, at Kilfenora; Ballyvaughan at two places; Ennistymon, at Arranaw, Ivelea, and another place; and Kilshanny, at Kilshanny.

KILFENTINAN, or KILFINTINAN, a parish in the barony of Lower Bunratty, co. Clare, Munster. It contains a small part of the town of Six-Mile-Bridge. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 6,115 acres, 12 perches,—of which 16 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches are tide-way in the Ougarnee river, and 9 acres, 22 perches are in Lough Gorteen. Pop., in 1831, 2,856; in 1841, 2,633. Houses 424. Chief objects of interest are noticed under the word CRATLOE: which see. The surface extends along the Ougarnee rivulet, from Six-Mile-Bridge to the Shannon; and is traversed across the north by the road from Limerick to Ennis. One-half of the land is of the best description in the province; and the remainder is of a poor quality. The portion of Six-Mile-Bridge within the boundary contained in 1831, a pop. of 130; but is not noticed in the Census of 1841.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £70; nett, £65 3s. 4d. Patron, the Earl of Egremont. The incumbent holds the stipendiary curacy of Clondegad, in the dio. of Killaloe; and is non-resident in Kilfentinan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £197 10s., and are impropriate in the Earl of Egremont. There is no church. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively about 800, and from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 81 boys and 43 girls.

KILFERA. See KILFEAROW.

KILFERGUS, a parish in the north-west corner of the barony of Shanid, co. Limerick, Munster. It contains the town of GLIN: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 4; area, 14,207 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,790; in 1841, 5,052.

Houses 991. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,760; in 1841, 3,844. Houses 591. The surface is part of the sea-board of the estuary of the Shannon; and is traversed through Glin, and along the shore, by the road from Limerick to Tralee by way of Tarbert. The profitable land bears to the unprofitable the proportion of only one to 8 or 10, and is far from being of good quality; but owing to the facility of obtaining sea-manure, georgical improvement is ameliorating the arable grounds, and making inroads upon the waste lands. In addition to Glin-castle, and the beautiful lodge built by Mr. Kiggell, 9 or 10 very respectable looking residences are beautifully situated near the Shannon.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial tithe composition, and gross income, £112 10s.; nett, £87 17s. 6d. Patrons, the vicars choral of Limerick cathedral. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £225, and are impropriate in the patrons. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 50; attendance, from 30 to 90. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Loughill. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 132, and the Roman Catholics to 4,859; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by about 150 children; and 7 daily schools—one of which was aided with £2 a-year from the Roman Catholic clergyman—had on their books 196 boys and 124 girls.

KILFIDANE. See KILFEDANE.

KILFIERAGH, a parish 7 miles west by north of Kilrush, and on the west coast of the barony of Moyarta, and of co. Clare, Munster. It contains the town of KILKEE, and the hamlet of LISDEEN: see these articles. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 5; area, 9,870 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches,—of which 29 acres, 15 perches are water. Pop., in 1841, 7,137. Houses 1,161. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 5,656. Houses 923. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 6,594; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 6,239. The surface is washed on one side by the Atlantic, and on another by the shallow, spreading, and ramified, offset of the Shannon's estuary, called Poulmasharry bay. The Atlantic coast is clifly and bold, and is indented with the creek of Moore or Kilkee bay, immediately off which lies the little islet called Bishop's Isle. The interior is tumulated; yet aggregately consists of good pasture and tillage-land, much improved of late years, and capable of still further improvement. Two principal heights have altitudes of 177 and 339 feet. The chief residences are Curran cottage and Desmond villa. Other chief objects of interest will be noticed in the article on Kilkee.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILKEE [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £93 6s. 8d.; glebe, £4 4s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £136 13s. 4d., and are appropriated to the prebend of Imiscathery. The church is an old building, in a bad state of repair. Sittings 150; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapels of Kilkee and Lisdeen have an attendance of respectively 700 and 750. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 63, and the Roman Catholics to 6,637. In 1840, the National Board granted £149 toward the erection of a boys' school and a girls' school at Kilkee.

KILFINAGHTY, a parish on the western border of the barony of Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the village of IVANSTOWN, and the greater part of the town of SIX-MILE-BRIDGE: which see.

Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 8,109 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches,—of which 119 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,132; in 1841, 3,801. Houses 601. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,771;* in 1841, 2,694. Houses 408. About one-half of the parochial surface is mountainous ground; and the remainder is land of various quality, extensively improved and embellished. A height in the extreme south-east has an altitude of 1,010 feet; another in the east border has an altitude of 568 feet; and the Gourná rivulet descends within the parish from an elevation of 412 feet. The principal draining stream is the Ougarnee; and most of the water-area lies in Castle-Lake. Among the mansions are Mount Ivers, the seat of Mr. Ivers; and Castlecrine, the seat of Henry Butler, Esq. The road from Dublin to Ennis passes along the south.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £92 7s. 10d., and the rectorial for £85 7s. 4½d.; and the latter are impropriate in the Earl of Egremont. The vicarages of Kilfinaghty, FINEO, KILMURRYNEGAIL, BUNRATTY, CLONLOHAN, KILCONRY, and TOMFINLOE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilfinaghty. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, 5½. Pop., in 1831, 12,690. Gross income, £360 17s. 9½d.; nett, £316 17s. 11½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is of uncertain date. Sittings 400; attendance 50. The Kilfinaghty Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Kilmurrynegaul, Bunratty, Tomfinloe, and Kilconry. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 106, and the Roman Catholics to 4,331; the Protestants of the union to 337, and the Roman Catholics to 13,281; 3 hedge-schools in the parish had on their books 143 boys and 66 girls; and 10 daily schools in the union had 465 boys and 270 girls. In 1840, a boys' school and a girls' school at Six-Mile-Bridge were salaried with respectively £10 and £4 from the National Board, and had on their books 124 boys and 91 girls.

KILFINAIN. See KILFYAN.

KILFINANE, or KILFINNAN, a parish containing a village of the same name, on the southern border of the barony of Costlea, and of co. Limerick, Munster. Length and breadth, each 3 miles; area, 6,487 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,437; in 1841, 4,356. Houses 682. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,685; in 1841, 2,574. Houses 405. The southern district is part of the west end of the range of the Galtee Mountains, locally called the Castle-Oliver Hills, and nearly all capable of reclamation. The rest of the surface is variously meadow, dairy, and tillage land. Near the village is Mr. Oliver's demesne of Spa Hill; and 1½ mile to the south, are the remains of Castle-Oliver, once a fine mountain-seat of the Oliver family, who were formerly extensive landed proprietors in the vicinity, and still hold here a considerable extent of property.—The village of Kilfinane stands 5 miles south-east by south of Kilmallock, on the road thence to Fermoy. Fairs are held on May 19, Aug. 9, and Oct. 25. A fever hospital and a dispensary here are within the Kilmallock Poor-law union; and, in 1839–40, the hospital expended £242 13s. 7d., and admitted 217 patients, and the dispensary expended £226 4s. 4d., and made 7,870 dispensations of medicine. Area of the village, 66 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,752; in 1841, 1,782. Houses 277. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 116; in manufactures and trade, 181; in other pursuits, 52. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 12; on the directing of labour, 184; on their own manual labour, 146; on means not specified, 7.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial tithe composition, £165; glebe, £17. The rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Daragh, are compounded for £210; and are impropriate in the Earl of Cork and Orrery. The vicarages of Kilfinane and DARAGH [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilfinane. Length and breadth, each 3½ miles. Pop., in 1831, 6,293. Gross income, £317; nett, £286 6s. 4½d. Patron, the Earl of Cork and Orrery. The church was built in 1760, by means of parochial assessment. Sittings 400; attendance 250. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £41 10s. 2d., and the rectorial for £83 0s. 2d.; and the latter are inappropriate in J. D. Freeman, Esq. of Castlecor. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 408; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILFYAN, or KILFIAN, a parish in the barony of Tyravley, 6½ miles west of Killalla, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the village of KILCOY: which see. Length, 8½ miles; breadth, 8½; area, 28,735 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches. Pop., in 1831, 5,656; in 1841, 6,040. Houses 1,030. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 5,915. Houses 1,010. The land is for the most part light in soil and poor in cultivation; and the surface is extensively boggy, and prevalingly bleak and uninteresting. The highest ground, Croaghan, has an altitude of 789 feet. The drainage falls off to every point of the compass except the west; and is effected chiefly by the rivulets Owening, Owenmore, Cloonaghmore, Rathow, Glenelagh, and Keerglen. The chief seat is Greenwood, the property of Mr. Knox; and the other noticeable residences are Fortland, Knockglass, Woodville, Smithstown, and Ballykinlettragh. There are 5 or 6 hamlets. The road from Killalla to Crossmolina passes through the interior. Archdall says, "St. Finan, abbot of Rathene, in Tyrconnel, built an abbey here, which, according to Colgan, existed but a very short time."—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CROSSMOLINA [which see], in the dio. of Killalla. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £140; and the rectorial tithes are returned with those of the vicarages of the benefice, and are partly appropriate and partly inappropriate. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 268, and the Roman Catholics to 5,803; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the Baptist Society, about £4 from the Irish Society, and advantages worth about £2 10s. from Major Jackson—had on their books 108 boys and 43 girls.

KILGALLIGAN, a wild and lofty headland, on the east side of Broadhaven, 2 miles south of Kild Island, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. A narrow creek or arm of Broadhaven opens past its south face, and penetrates the land eastward to the extent of 3 miles.

KILGARRIFFE, or KILGARUFF, a parish partly in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, but chiefly in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. The Carbery section contains the town of CLONAKILTY: which see. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 1. Area of the Ibane and Barryroe section, 873 acres; of the Carbery section, 3,455 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 6,273; in 1841, 6,432. Houses 995. Pop. of the Ibane and Barryroe section, in 1831, 468; in 1841, 552. Houses 90. Pop. of the rural districts of the Carbery section, in 1831, 1,998; in 1841, 1,887. Houses 313. The surface is washed by the stream and the estuary of the rivulet which flows through the town of Clonakilty, and slowly expands into Clonakilty bay. The greater part of the land is very good arable and meadow ground; and the remainder is an interspersion of rocks, rocky hillocks, bogs, and strand. Many fine situations occur near Clonakilty, and command a view of the great strand, which, at high water, is an imposing object; and the sea-coast abounds with lofty and abrupt cliffs, and with intervening or adjacent nooks and hollows of much beauty and repose. Good blue slate is quarried on the north side of Clonakilty.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ross. Vicarial tithe composition, £215; glebe, £10. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £215, and are improper in Messrs. Foot and Roberts. The vicarages of Kilgariffe, and DESERT, and the rectory of ISLAND [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilgariffe. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 1½. Pop., in 1831, 8,461. Gross income, £520; nett, £433 2s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the prebend of Island. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is situated in Clonakilty, and was built in 1818, by means of £461 10s. 9½d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £997 17s. 11d. raised by subscription. Sittings 500; attendance 500. The Wesleyan meeting-house is attended by 150, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 3,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to the chapel of Templemalus. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 1,100, and the Roman Catholics to 5,277; the Protestants of the union to 1,135, and the Roman Catholics to 7,369; a Protestant Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 150 children; and 13 daily schools in the union—all of which were in the parish—had on their books 479 boys and 344 girls, and were attended by about 70 other children. Two of the daily schools were salaried with respectively £24 and £12 from subscription; one, with £12 from the vicar, and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice; one, with £20 from the National Board, and £10 from subscription; one, with £20 from the National Board, £15 from subscription, and £50 from the sale of the children's work; and one, with some advantages from Lord Shannon.

KILGARRYLANDER, a parish in the south-west corner of the barony of Trughenackmy, 3 miles west by north of Milltown, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 14,630 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,868; in 1841, 2,889. Houses 519. The surface is washed on the south by the upper part of Castlemain Harbour, and the embouchure of the river Maine; and one-half of it is arable and meadow land of inferior quality, while the other half consists of a portion of the Slievemish Mountains. The road from Killarney to Dingle passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILTALLAGH [which see], in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £216 18s. 5d.; glebe, £20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 34, and the Roman Catholics to 3,033; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 36 boys and 14 girls.

KILGARVAN, a quondam parish on the south side of Great Island, ¾ of a mile east by north of Cove, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It figures in most topographical works on Ireland as a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne; but it has long ceased to be recognised as a parish in either the civil or the ecclesiastical designations of Great Island. See GREAT ISLAND and CLONMEL, co. Cork.

KILGARVAN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Glanerought, 5 miles north-east by east of Kenmare, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 6; area, 43,631 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,436; in 1841, 3,988. Houses 670. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 157; in 1841, 143. Houses 27. A dispensary here is within the Kenmare Poor-law union, and serves strictly for the parish; and, in 1839–40, it expended £74 5s. 9d., and administered to 366 patients. The surface of the parish is roughly mountainous, and is bisected by the upper and the central parts of the picturesque glen of the Roughty rivulet. Patches of underwood, pendicles of tillage-ground, and occasional stretches of meadow or verdant pasture along the banks of the stream, produce an appearance of cultivation, and relieve the asperities of the bleak and lofty mountain-ranges. The road from Macroom to Kenmare passes down the glen; and is overlooked, at 4 miles from Kenmare, by Ardtully, the seat of Mr. Orpen. The rocks on the one side of the stream are limestone; and those on the other are common coarse grit. But a remarkable though minute exception occurs in the instance of two isolated rocks, which have changed sites, the grit to the limestone and the limestone to the grit, as if they had been tossed to each other's places in an earthquake's frolic, and one of which is called by the peasantry Clough-Bearradh, 'the stone slice.' Another and still more curious rock, situated among the mountains, near a small brook, 5 miles from the head of the Kenmare estuary, exhibits resemblances to the impressions of human feet of all sizes, from those of infants to those of adults, some naked, and some shod with brogues. Not far from Ardtully are faint traces of what tradition asserts to have been an ecclesiastical foundation, called Monaster-ni-Oriel, the abbey of Oriel; and, in the vicinity of this is the battle-field of Callan, where, in 1261, the MacCarthys achieved a total victory over the Fitzgeralds.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition, £110 15s. 4½d.; glebe, £34 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £110 15s. 4½d., and are improper in the Earl of Donoughmore. The vicarages of Kilgarvan and KILLAHA [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilgarvan. Length, 20 miles; breadth, 10. Pop., in 1831, 6,010. Gross income, £265 5s. 4½d.; nett, £206 14s. 11½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapels of Kilgarvan and Killaha have an attendance of respectively 1,000 and 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 104, and the Roman Catholics to 3,578; the Protestants of the union to 132, and the Roman Catholics to 6,295; 3 pay daily schools in the parish had on their books 93 boys and 42 girls; and there were also 3 daily schools in Killaha. In 1840, a National School in Kilgarvan was salaried with £12, and had on its books 119 boys and 56 girls.

KILGARVAN, a parish in the north-west corner of the barony of West Shelmalier, 2½ miles north-west by west of Taghmon, co. Wexford, Leinster.

KILGERRIL, a parish 4½ miles west-north-west of Ballinasloe, and partly in the barony of Kilconnel, but chiefly in that of Clonmacnoon, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1½. Area of the Kilconnel section, 476 acres; of the Clonmacnoon section, 6,357 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,432; in 1841, 1,443. Houses 242. Pop. of the Clonmacnoon section, in 1831, 1,227; in 1841, 1,299. Houses 219. The surface includes a comparatively large proportion of bog; and consists, in a general view, of light and poor land. The old road from Ballinasloe to Galway passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of AUGHRIM [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £78 9s. 2½d. A small additional portion of the tithes is appropriated to the deanery of Clonfert. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 86, and the Roman Catholics to 1,405; and a hedge-school had on its books 71 boys and 36 girls.

KILGIVOUR. See KILGAVOWER.

KILGLASS, a parish in the baronies of Ardagh, Moydow, and Abbeyshruel, 4¼ miles south-west of Edgeworthstown, co. Longford, Leinster. The parish of Ahara is returned with it in the ecclesiastical reports. Pop. of the two parishes, in 1831, 4,554. Area of the Ardagh section of the civil parish, 1,609 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches; of the Moydow section, 2,307 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches; of the Abbeyshruel section, 1,826 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 2,977; of the Ardagh section, 802; of the Moydow section, 1,210; of the Abbeyshruel section, 965. Houses in the Ardagh section, 131; in the Moydow section, 223; in the Abbeyshruel section, 172. The surface comprises a considerable extent of bog, and unprofitable upland; and, though containing some tolerably good ground, consists in general of ordinary second-rate land. The drainage is effected by the Kenagh rivulet. The highest ground is on the north border, and has an altitude of 650 feet. The hamlets are Carrickboy and Leggan. The road from Dublin to Lanesborough passes through the interior. Archdall says that an old monastery here, of which nothing farther is known, was presided over by St. Echea, sister of St. Mell.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ardagh. Tithe composition, £192 18s. 8½d.; glebe, jointly with that of Rathrea, £85 15s. The rectories of Kilglass and AHARA, and the vicarage of RATHREA [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilglass. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 5,608. Gross income, £483 15s. 2½d.; nett, £430 19s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1815, by means of £339 13s. 10d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £649 12s. 5d. raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 160; attendance 90. The Kilglass and Rathrea Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,500 and 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the inhabitants of Kilglass consisted of 359 Churchmen, 15 Presbyterians, and, 2,420 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of Ahara consisted of 106 Churchmen, and 1,157 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the whole union consisted of 574 Churchmen, 59 Presbyterians, and 4,496 Roman Catholics; a Protestant Sunday School in Kilglass was attended by about 20 children; 4 daily schools in Kilglass—one of which was salaried with £5 15s. 4½d. from the rector, and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and one with £5 from the rector, and £6 Irish with other advantages from Lady House—had on their books 214 boys and 119 girls; and 12 daily schools in the union had on their books 333 boys and 421 girls.

KILGLASS, a parish 5¼ miles east by north of Strokestown, and partly in the barony of Roscommon, but chiefly in that of North Ballintobber, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, 6 miles; breadth, nearly 4. Area of the barony of Roscommon section, 458 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches; of the Ballintobber section, 15,511 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches,—of which 1,167 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are in the Shannon, inclusive of Loughs Gillstown, Bodarig, and Boffin, 583 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches are in Lough Kilglass, and 113 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 9,118; in 1841, 10,053. Houses 1,806. Pop., in 1841, of the Ballintobber section, 9,927. Houses 1,786. A chief series of features is noticed under the word GILLSTOWN: which see. Lough Gillstown washes the north-west border; and the two lacustrine expansions of the Shannon, called Bodarig and Boffin, wash the east. Extensive but easily improveable bogs, already for the most part in coarse tillage, lie along the Shannon. Nearly all the rest of the surface is arable. The road from Strokestown to Rooskey passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £341 17s. 11½d.; glebe, £7 10s. Gross income, £349 7s. 11½d.; nett, £308 5s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £379 14s. 7d., and are inappropriate in Viscount Kingsland. The church was built in 1825, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 35. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,200 and 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 68, and the Roman Catholics to 9,153; and 14 daily schools—one of which was supported by the Elphin Diocesan Society, and one salaried with £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society—had on their books 538 boys and 210 girls.

KILGLASS, a parish 4¼ miles west by south of Easkey, and on the western border of the barony of Tyreragh, and of the county of Sligo, Connaught. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3¼; area, 12,884 acres, 2 roods, 35 perches—of which 8 acres, 11 perches are in Lough Scorrew. Pop., in 1831, 4,356; in 1841, 4,941. Houses 855. The surface lies along the west side of Killalla bay, and is drained thither by several rivulets and rills. The surface is extensively tumulated and hilly, or according to local phraseology, is mountainous; and it variously consists of good bog, good pasturable upland, and tolerably good arable grounds. The sea-board partakes the fishing and navigating advantages of Killalla bay, yet is scarcely indented by a creek. The chief residences are Kinnard, Kilglass, and Oghil; and there are 6 or 7 hamlets.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CASTLE CONNOR, [which see], in the dio. of Killalla. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £234, and the rectorial for £238; and the latter—with the exception of £2 belonging to the precentorship of Killalla cathedral—are appropriated to the see of Killalla. The church has a tower and spire, and was built in 1830, by means of £900 gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, and £350 raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 211; attendance 70. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Castle-Connor. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 340, and the Roman Catholics to 4,146; and 9 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 from a bequest by the late Rev. Mr. Valentine, and two with £12 each from the Baptist Society—had on their books 396 boys and 211 girls.

KILGLASSAN, a village in the barony of Kilmain, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands 3 miles south-east of Hollymount, on the road thence to Tuam.

KILGOBAN, a nominal parish, in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It figures in documents as a rectory, and as part of the benefice of Ballinadee, in the dio. of Cork; but its existence de facto is unknown to either the ecclesiastical or the civil authorities.

KILGOBBIN, a parish, containing a small village of the same name, in the half-barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It contains the village of STEPASIDE: which see. Length south-south-westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,257 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,149; in 1841, 1,012. Houses 182. About one-third of the surface is arable, meadow, and pasture land; and the remainder is rocky pasturage, and mountainous and heathy ground. Splendid views are obtained from its heights, and especially from the summit of the Three-Rock mountain, of the plain, and city, and bay of Dublin. The two loftiest summits within the parish, the Three-Rock mountain, and the Two-Rock mountain, are situated on the south-west border, and have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 1,479 and 1,763 feet. The seats are Jamestown-house, Jamestown-lodge, Kilgobbin-cottage, Lakefield, Elmfield, Kilgobbin-house, Fern-hill, Well-park, Ballyedmonduff-house, and Taylor's-folly. The road from Dublin through the Scalp, to Enniskerry, traverses the interior. On this road, and near the base of the Three-Rock mountain, 6 miles south by east of Dublin, stands the village of Kilgobbin, remarkable for beauty of situation, for salubrity of atmosphere, and for the mouldering ruins of a castle, which, though destitute of outworks, and exhibiting a bald and cheerless character, lifts its tall and gaunt form into such combination with surrounding objects as to produce a rather imposing effect. This building is attributed by tradition to the fabulous Gubbawn Saer, the alleged founder of many of the pillar-towers and oldest castles of Ireland; but it really was built by the family of Walsh of Carrickmaine, was forfeited by them in the reign of Charles I., and passed into the possession of the family of Loftus; and it evidently served as one of a chain of forts or fortified residences, expressly constructed to restrain the incursions of the O'Tooles or O'Macs of the Wicklow mountains. "It consists of an oblong tower without turrets or outward defences, but planted nearly in the centre of a level plain, extending from the base of the Three-Rock mountain, to the scarp of Killiney Hill, and effectually commanding all ingress or egress through the remarkable pass of the Scalp. It formed, although not remarkable for strength or solidity, a very effectual fortress, when occupied by a vigilant garrison."—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and part of the benefice of KILTERNAN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. But though nominally a perpetual curacy, it is practically a rectory, the whole of the tithes being payable to the incumbent. Tithe composition, £150. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 94, and the Roman Catholics to 1,036; and a daily school was partly supported by local subscription and an annual charity sermon, and had on its books 45 boys and 36 girls.

KILGOBBIN, a parish at the east end of the barony of Corkaguiney, 9½ miles west-south-west of Tralee, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the village of CAPPACLOUGH: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 10,416 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,378; in 1841, 2,384. Houses 379. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,107. Houses 323. The surface is washed along the north by Tralee bay; and comprises a chief part of the isthmus which connects Corkaguiney with the rest of Kerry. Cahircorney mountain and its offsets occupy a large part of the area; but the remainder of the land is in general very good for tillage. The road from Tralee to Dingle passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £421; glebe, £40. Gross income, £462; nett, £378 9s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1825, by means of a loan of £784 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance, from 45 to 55. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement is united to the chapel of Ballinvoher. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 102, and the Roman Catholics to 2,450; 2 hedge-schools had on their books 37 boys and 5 girls; and 2 other hedge-schools made no return of their attendance.

KILGOBBIN, co. Limerick. See CRECORAGH.

KILGOBINET, a parish in the barony of Decies-without-Drum, 2 miles north by east of Dungarvan, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5; area, 16,108 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches,—of which 673 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches lie detached a little to the south-east. Pop., in 1831, 2,683; in 1841, 3,136. Houses 429. The surface extends from the vicinity of Dungarvan Harbour to the Cummeragh mountains, and consists, in general, of third-rate land; but over all the north, and most of the east of the centre, it is wildly mountainous. Sea-fin, the chief summit, is on the north-east boundary, and has an altitude of 2,387 feet, and other summits have altitudes of 1,201, 1,308, 908, 1,039, 807, and 608 feet. Part of the demesne of Colligan is on the west border; and the chief seats are Balleighteragh and Woodland. The ruins of the old parish-church are situated on a hill. A saint Gohnata is alleged by monastic writers to have given name to the parish, and to have presided in the 6th century over a nunnery in the county of Cork. Fairs are held on Feb. 22, May 3, June 11, Nov. 1, and Dec. 7. —This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of MODELIGO [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £60, and the rectorial for £200; and the latter are appropriated to the prebend of Kilgobinet in Lismore cathedral. The Kilgobinet and Graunbawn Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Colligan. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools—one of which was aided with £1 a-year from Mr. Musgrave, and one with £2 from Mr. Musgrave, and £3 from Sir Leonard Holmes—had on their books 183 boys and 105 girls.

KILGOGHLIN. See BURLIN.

KILGOLAGH, a village on the southern verge of the barony of Clonmahon, and of co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands on the right bank of the Inny, opposite Finea, between Loughs Shelin and Kinnail.

KILGORMAN, a parish 6 miles north-east by north of Gorey, and in the north-east corner of the barony of Gorey, and of co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 5,164 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches,—of which 5 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches are in Lough Kilpatrick. Pop., in 1831, 1,292; in 1841, 1,321. Houses 201. The surface is part of the sea-board of the Irish sea, contains the headland called Kilmichael Point, and consists of excellent land. The coast road from Dublin to Wexford passes through the interior, and places to the left Hyde-Park, the seat of John Beauman Esq., and Castletown, the seat of H. K. G. Morgan, Esq. The other noticeable residences are Rivulet-house, Ahar, and Ashwood.—This parish is a vicarage of two parts, in the dio. of Dublin. The smaller part is a member of the benefice of ARKLOW [which see]; and the vicarial tithes of this are compounded for £46 3s. 1d., while the rectorial tithes are compounded for £13 16s. 11d., and are inappropriate in Messrs. Howell, Johnson, and Cooper. The greater part is a portion of the benefice of INCH: which see. Vicarial tithes of this part, £150; glebe, £30. The rectorial tithes are appropriated to the incumbent of Arklow. In 1834, the Protestants of the Arklow section amounted to 124, and the Roman Catholics to 347; the Protestants of the Inch section to 127, and the Roman Catholics to 894. The Roman Catholic chapel in the latter section has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Inch. Archdall says that St. Gorman was abbot of an early ecclesiastical foundation in Kilgorman.

KILGOWRAN AND TULLINADALLY, two small series of bogs, in the barony of Dunmore, 4 miles north of Tuam, co. Galway, Connaught. Area, 1,523 acres; height above the level of high-water in Galway bay, 177 feet; estimated cost of reclamation, £1,880. They lie on the left bank of the Clare or Milltown rivulet; and are firm, brown, pasturable bogs.

KILGRANT, or POWERSTOWN, a parish 1½ mile east-north-east of Clonmel, and on the southern border of the barony of East Iffa and Offa, and of co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,071 acres, 13 perches,—of which 14 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches are in the river Suir. Pop., in 1831, 1,186; in 1841, 1,133. Houses 170. The surface is part of the beautiful and fertile valley of the Suir; and is traversed, along the south, by the road from Clonmel to Waterford. The principal residences are Annerville, Powerstown, Redmonstown, Silverspring, and Anner-Park.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCASH [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £64 12s. 3d.; glebe, £7. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £129 4s. 6d., and are inappropriate in John Bagwell, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilcash and Kilsheelan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 22 Churchmen, 12 Protestant dissenters, and 1,213 Roman Catholics.

KILGRIFFIN. See KILGEEFIN.

KILGROGAN, a parish in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 231 acres. Pop., in 1841, 6. House 1.

KILGROHANBEG. See CARRIGROHANBEG.

KILGROHANMORE. See CARRIGROHANE.

KILGUANE. See KILQUANE, co. Galway.

KILGULLANE, a parish partly in the barony of Fermoy, but chiefly in that of Condons and Clangibbon, 2½ miles south-south-west of Mitchellstown, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1½. Area of the Fermoy section, 185 acres; of the Condons and Clangibbon section, 3,369 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,174; in 1841, 1,339. Houses 180. Pop. of the Condons and Clangibbon section, in 1841, 1,277. Houses 172. The surface consists in general of good land; and is traversed by the road from Mitchellstown to Castletownroche.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of GLANDWORTH [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £221 8s. 6½d.; glebe, £12. A small portion of the tithes, compounded for £7 8s., is inappropriate in Lord Donaghmore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 1,211; and a daily school was aided with the free use of 6 acres of land, and had on its books 26 boys and 14 girls.

KILHENY, KILHENNY, or KILLEANY, a parish in the barony of Burren, 4½ miles north by west of Kilfenora, co. Clare, Munster. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,306 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 465; in 1841, 520. Houses 92. The greater part of the surface is moorish and waste. The chief hamlet bears the name of Toomagherna, and is the site of the Roman Catholic chapel.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILCORNEY [which see], in the dio. of Kilfenora. Tithe composition, £25. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Oughtmanna. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

KILHOOLEY. See KILCOOLEY, co. Roscommon.

KILI. See KILLI.

KILKEA, a parish in the barony of Kilkea and Moone, 2½ miles north-west of Castle-Dermot, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 3,096 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 395; in 1841, 465. Houses 75. The surface is drained by the rivulet Griss, and traversed by the road from Castle-Dermot to Athy. The seats are Kilkea-castle, Kilkea-lodge, and Millbrook. The highest ground has an altitude of 469 feet. A village, now extinct, but formerly of some note, stood on the Griss; and is commemorated in the following well-known doggerel couplet:

"At Kilkea, a little town there was of old, Thatched with good straw to keep out cold."

A castle was built here by Hugh de Lacy, the younger, Earl of Ulster, who obtained the barony of Kilkea by marriage with the daughter of the Lord de Riddlesford. The Kildare family afterwards acquired possession of the property; and, at various periods, re-edified and repaired the castle. Great enlargements and improvements of the building were made, in particular, by John, 6th Earl of Kildare, who died in 1427; considerable alterations and repairs were effected by various subsequent members of the Kildare family; and a comparatively recent renovation was made by the late Daniel Caulfield, Esq. of Levinstown, who obtained a lease of the premises from the Duke of Leinster. The edifice is a large but irregular pile of castellated building; and, in many parts of its interior, it presents curious examples of ancient arrangement. In the 14th century, the castle was a place of comparatively high importance; and in 1356, it was the scene of the death of Sir Thomas Rokeby, Lord-justice of Ireland. Near the castle is a large conical mound, now covered with plantation; and in the vicinity are also the ruins of a church, which probably was founded by some one of the Earls of Kildare.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CASTLE-DERMOT [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £70; glebe, £6. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £140, and are inappropriate in Sir Erasmus Burrowes, Bart. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 23 Churchmen, 10 Protestant dissenters, and 385 Roman Catholics; and 2 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 34 children.

KILKEA AND MOONE, a barony at the southern extremity of co. Kildare, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Narragh and Rheban; on the east, by co. Wicklow; on the south-east and south, by co. Carlow; and on the west, by King's co. Its greatest length south-westward is 9 miles; its greatest breadth westward is 7½ miles; and its area is 46,286 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches,—of which 87 acres, 20 perches are water. The river Barrow traces the boundary with King's co.; and the rivulets Griss and Leir, affluents of the Barrow, drain nearly all the interior. The surface may be summarily described as a hanging plain, marked by inequalities chiefly in the north and north-east, and declining westward to the Barrow. A notice of the district immediately around Kilkea-castle, written in 1794, says, "The soil in this district is light, on a bed of calcareous and siliceous gravel to a great depth, which drains it of moisture; and many parts being for several ages under agriculture and badly managed, the alkaline salts are so much exhausted, that lime has no effect on it. Nothing, therefore, can restore it but manure composed of animal and vegetable exuviae, with proper management, at a considerable expense."—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Ardrea, Ballaghmoon, Belan, Dunmanogue, Graney, Grangerosnolvan, Kilkea, Castle-Dermot, and Killellan, and part of the parishes of Kinneigh, Moone, Painsdown, St. Michaels, Tankardstown, and Narraghmore. The only town is Castle-Dermot; and the chief village is Moone. Pop., in 1831, 10,830; in 1841, 11,092. Houses 1834. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,374; in manufactures and trade, 268; in other pursuits, 313. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,058; who could read but not write, 983; who could neither read nor write, 1,882. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,256; who could read but not write, 1,411; who could neither read nor write, 2,287.—Kilkea and Moone barony is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Athy, Ballyglass, and Carlow. The total number of tenements valued is 1,713; and of these, 902 are valued under £5,—210, under £10,—119, under £15,—77, under £20,—52, under £25,—47, under £30,—71, under £40,—44, under £50,—and 191, at and above £50.

KILKEARY, a parish in the barony of Upper Ormond, 4½ miles south-east by east of Nenagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, south-westward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,726 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches,—of which 992 acres, 18 perches, lie detached 3 furlongs to the east, and from a district of 1½ mile by 1. Pop., in 1831, 662; in 1841, 794. Houses 125. The surface consists of good land; and is traversed by the road from Nenagh to Thurles, and by that from Toomavara to Limerick. The principal seat is Ballinamona-house.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLINACLOUGH [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £120. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 688; and a pay daily school had on its books 41 boys and 34 girls.

KILKEASY, or KILCAREY, a parish in the barony of Knocktopher, 2½ miles south of the town of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 3,317 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,483; in 1841, 1,247. Houses 193. The Ecclesiastical Authorities state the pop. of 1831 at 612. The highest ground has an altitude of 509 feet; the chief seat is Rockhall; the hamlets are Knockmoylan, and Kilkeasy; and the principal antiquity is the ruin of Knockmoylan-castle.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KNOCKTOPHER [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £185; and the latter are inappropriate in the vicars choral of Kilkenny cathedral. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Derrynahensy, Newmarket, Higginstown, and Kells. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 612; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was attended by about 60 children; and a pay daily school was attended by 40 children in winter and 70 in summer.

KILKEE, or DOOGH, a town, watering-place, and fishing-station, in the parish of Kilfieragh, barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the shores of a beautiful little smooth circular creek of Malbay, 8 miles west-north-west of Kilrush, 28 miles south-west by west of Ennis, and 140 west-south-west of Dublin. Its site is part of the large estates of the Marquis of Conyngham; but is held under lease by J. Studdert, Esq., who has a lodge adjoining the town. Kilkee, previous to the introduction of steam-vessels into the Shannon, was scarcely known; but now it is a rising town, and a favourite sea-bathing resort of the citizens of Limerick, likely to bear comparison, at a brief period hence, with many of the watering-places of Great Britain. In 1837, the town and its neighbourhood contained no fewer than 305 lodges, some of which let for so large a sum as £30 per month. "But," says Mr. Fraser, "in the erection of the numerous little houses lately added to this attractive watering-place, no attention seems to have been paid either to comfort or arrangement. There are, however, a hotel, numerous lodging-houses, and cars which run daily to and from Kilrush, in connection with the Limerick steamers." The coast scenery in the vicinity of the town is singularly grand, romantic, and imposing, and will be partly noticed in our article on MOUREA: [which see]. But families desirous of knowing the advantages and attractions of the watering-place, may be gratified by referring to Mrs. Knott's recent little volume, entitled "Two Months at Kilkee." A church was quite recently built at the town by means of a donation of £1,184 1s. 6d., from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and a contribution of £200 from private parties; and it contains accommodation for 400 persons. The harbour consists of the creek called Moore or Kilkee bay, has a depth of from 2 to 14 fathoms, and, though unprovided with pier or quay, enjoys the shelter of a ledge of rocks which acts as a strong natural breakwater against the assaults of the Atlantic waves. In 1836, the fishing craft within the district of the coast-guard station of Kilkee, consisted of 44 row-boats, manned by 190 men. The Carrigaholt and Kilkee dispensary is within the Kilrush Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 17,730; and, in 1839-40, it expended £109 18s. 3d., and made 4,036 dispensations of medicine. Area of the town, 66 acres; in 1831, 1,051; in 1841, 1,481. Houses 238. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 104; in manufactures and trade, 118; in other pursuits, 68. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 31; on the director of labour, 107; on their own manual labour, 131, on means not specified, 19.

KILKEEDY, a parish on the north-east border of the barony of Inchiquin, 6 miles north-east of Crotin, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 18,629 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch,—of which 936 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches are water. Pop. in 1831, 3,321; in 1841, 4,192. Houses 680. The surface is for the most part rocky and rough, comprising a considerable proportion of unprofitable ground, and very little tolerably good arable land. Lough Buncah, nearly a mile in length, and several subordinate yet considerable lakes, give variety to the landscape. On the frontier toward co. Galway, are the seats of Rockvale and Derryowen; and in the western district is the seat of Rockforest. The principal hamlet is Boston. Two old castles stand on the shores of two of the lakes. The road from Corrofin to Gort passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMABOY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £120 19s. 6½d.; glebe, £9 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1793, by means of a gift of £360 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance 20. Two Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of 500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 3,550; and a hedge-school had on its books 78 boys and 35 girls.

KILKEEDY, a parish in the barony of Pubblebrien, 4½ miles south-west of Limerick, co. Limerick, Munster. It contains the greater part of the village of St. Patrick's Well: see PATRICK'S WELL (St.). Length, 5 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 8,881 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,160; in 1841, 4,109. Houses 615. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,870. Houses 570. A small district which had, in 1831, a pop. of 28, formerly belonged to the co. of the city of Limerick. The surface is a lusciously beautiful and luxuriantly productive tract of country, along the right bank of the river Maig to the estuary of the Shannon. But its chief features of interest will be found noticed under the words CARRIGOGUNNEL, MAIG, and PATRICK'S-WELL: which see. Among the seats are Elm Park, Lord Clarina; and Cooper Hill, Mr. Cooper. The road from Limerick to Askeaton passes across the interior; and that from Limerick to Adare impinges on the southern border.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £850; glebe, £132. Gross income, £982; nett, £800 9s. 6d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built in 1814, by means of a loan of £600 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and was recently enlarged by means of contributions of £40 from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £30 from private sources. Sittings, previous to the enlargement, 150; attendance, about 75. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively about 1,200 and about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 219, and the Roman Catholics to 4,114; 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 and other advantages from the rector—had on their books 122 boys and 64 girls; and 2 other daily schools were attended in summer by about 145 children.

KILKEEL, a parish, containing a town of the same name, on the south-east coast of co. Down, and strictly identical with the barony of Mourne in that co., Ulster. Length, 10½ miles; breadth, 6½; area, 47,882 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches,—of which 35 acres, 3 roods are water. Pop., in 1831, 14,806; in 1841, 16,269. Houses 2,986. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 13,767; in 1841, 15,123. Houses 2,639. The surface comprises the chief part of the great and grand mountain group of Down; but as its limits are exactly the same as those of Mourne barony, we reserve a notice of it for the article on Mourne. See MOURNE and DOWN. Particular objects of interest are noticed under the words CRANFIELD, GREENCASTLE, CARLINGFORD (LOUGH), and ANFALONG: which see. The road from Newry by Rosstrevor to Kilkeel passes from within 1 mile to 1½ mile of the coast; and its route within the parish is thus succinctly noticed by Mr. Fraser: "Passing now through a more open and cultivated tract of country, with the villas of Mount Loftus and Shannon Grove on our left, and crossing the White Water at 6 miles from Rosstrevor, we reach Mourne Park, the seat of the Earl of Kilmorey. The extended plantations of this romantically situated demesne, stretching along the base of the hills, form a remarkable feature along the remainder of our road to Kilkeel." Though the vastly greater proportion of the whole area is wild, uninhabitable mountain, and the larger part of even the low grounds has an indifferent soil, yet a considerable breadth of sea-board is cultivated, from Causeway Water on Carlingford bay all round to the steep declivities of Slieve-Donard, on the northern and maritime frontier toward Upper Iveagh.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £800; glebe, £37 10s. The rectory of Kilkeel, and the chapelries of KILCOO and KILMEGAN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilkeel. Length, 18 miles; breadth, 7. Pop., in 1831, 28,247. Gross income, £1,637 10s.; nett, £1,283 8s. 2d. Patron, alternately the Marquis of Anglesey and the Earl of Kilmorey. Three curates for the three parishes of the union have each a salary of £75. The church of Kilkeel was built in 1815, by means of £1,995 9s. 3½d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, £1,421 12s. 10½d. raised by parochial assessment, and £1,107 13s. 10½d. gifted by the Earl of Kilmorey, N. Thomson, Esq., and the Rev. Lucas Waring. Sittings 450; attendance 250. There are churches also in Kilcoo and Kilmegan. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses are attended by respectively 500 and 100, and the Moravian meeting-house by 150. The Roman Catholic chapels of Ballymaguagh, Ballymartin, and Glassdrummond, have an attendance of respectively 900, 530, and 430; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. There are also two Roman Catholic chapels in Kilcoo; and a Presbyterian meeting-house, a Methodist meeting-house, and three Roman Catholic chapels in Kilmegan. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 1,747 Churchmen, 4,160 Presbyterians, 419 other Protestant dissenters, and 8,804 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 4,384 Churchmen, 6,159 Presbyterians, 424 other Protestant dissenters, and 17,897 Roman Catholics; 6 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 585 children; 18 daily schools in the parish had on their books 734 boys and 475 girls; and 34 daily schools in the union had on their books 1,497 boys and 1,177 girls. Three of the daily schools in the parish were salaried with severally £12, £10, and £2 5s. from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society; one, with £2 from Mr. N. Thompson; one, with £31 from Lord Kilmorey, and £9 from the rector; one, with £8 from the rector; one, with £10 from Mrs. Keown; and one, with £8 from the National Board. In 1840, the National Board had a school at Moneydarra on a salary of £20; and granted £111 5s. toward the erection of a boys' school and a girls' school at Dunaran.

KILKEEL, a post and fair town, on the east coast of the above parish, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on a stream of 4½ miles in length, called the Kilkeel river, 1 mile above the stream's influx to the Irish Sea, 7½ miles east of Rosstrevor, 14½ east by south of Newry, 44 south of Belfast, and 64½ north by east of Dublin. It contains several of the places of worship noticed in the preceding article, and a few shops for the supply of the adjacent mountainous country; but it is a place of no thoroughfare, of no general trade, and not even of much interest to the tourist. An abortive attempt was made to open a small harbour for the town, by cutting through the bar across the mouth of the Kilkeel rivulet; and at present the only creek in a long range of adjacent coast where even fishing vessels can obtain shelter, is at Annalong, 5 miles north of Kilkeel. A nearer and better harbour, however, was a few years ago officially recommended to be formed at Greencastle. Fairs are held in the town on Feb. 3, May 3, Aug. 4, and Nov. 3. A car runs regularly to Newry.—The Kilkeel Poor-law union ranks as the 59th, and was declared on July 29, 1839. It lies all in the co. of Down, and comprehends an area of 81,726 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 26,833. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Kilkeel, 3,544; Mourne Park, 3,015; Greencastle, 3,514; Ballykeel, 1,952; Mullartown, 2,781; Fofanny, 3,361; Briansford, 3,159; Aostvor, 2,830; Killowen, 1,163; and Maghera, 1,514. Its ex-officio guardians are 5, and its elected guardians are 16; and of the latter, one is returned by each of the divisions of Ballykeel, Mullartown, Killowen, and Maghera, and two by each of the other divisions. The total number of tenements valued was 5,558; and of these, 3,338 were valued under £5,—423, under £6,—345, under £7,—283, under £8,—195, under £9,—151, under £10,—216, under £12,—153, under £14,—67, under £15,—43, under £16,—69, under £18,—36, under £20,—73, under £25,—32, under £30,—55, under £40,—37, under £50,—and 42, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £36,760. The workhouse was contracted for on Feb. 4, 1840,—to cost £4,050 for building and completion, and £767 12s. 6d. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 7 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches, obtained for £462 7s. 6d. of purchase money, £20 of compensation to occupying tenant, and £1 13s. 5½d. of annual rent; and to contain accommodation for 300 paupers. The admission of paupers was commenced on Sept. 1, 1841; and the total expenditure of the union during the half-year succeeding, was £846 18s. 9d.,—and during the second half-year, £687 19s. 8½d. Kilkeel dispensary is the only medical charity within the union; it serves for the barony of Mourne; and, in 1839, it expended £147, and administered to 596 patients. Area of the town, 47 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,039; in 1841, 1,146. Houses 206. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 41; in manufactures and trade, 188; in other pursuits, 29. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the direct-of labour, 157; on their own manual labour, 81; on means not specified, 11.

KILKEEL, co. Kildare. See KILTEEL.

KILKEEVAN, a parish in the barony of Castlereagh, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It contains the town of CASTLEREA: which see. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 5; area, 27,007 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches,—of which 103 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches are in Lough O'Flynn; 51 acres, 11 perches are in Lough Drumo; and 11 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches are in Lough Cottage. Pop., in 1831, 10,867; in 1841, 10,922. Houses 1,812. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 9,695; in 1841, 9,689. Houses 1,646. The eastern district has a somewhat cultivated and even ornate appearance; and is enriched with the demesnes of Castlereagh, Lord Mountsandford,—Clonallis, the O'Connor Don,—and Harristown, Owen Young, Esq.,—Willsbrook,—South Park,—Arn,—and Dalefield. But the central and western districts are a wild expanse of bogs and moors; and, though interspersed with isolated hills and ridges of pretty good land, have a cheerless and repulsive appearance. Lough Aelvyn is in the west, and the nascent Suck runs through the east.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLINTOBER [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £250; glebe, £37 5s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £200, and are inappropriate in the Earl of Essex. The church was built in 1819, by means of a loan of £2,037 13s. 10½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 450; attendance 250. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000 at one service, and 1,500 at another. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 775, and the Roman Catholics to 10,739; and 23 daily schools had on their books 1,072 boys and 644 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £14 from the National Board; one, with £8 from the National Board, and £4 from some of the parishioners; one, with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, £5 from the Elphin Diocesan Society, and £5 from a bequest by the late Lord Mountsandford; one, with £40 from Lord Mountsandford; one, with £12 from Lord Mountsandford, £15 from subscription, and allowance from the London Hibernian Society; two, with respectively £14 and £14 15s. 4d. from Lord Mountsandford, and allowances from the London Hibernian Society; four, with £10 each from Lord Mountsandford, and allowances from the London Hibernian Society; and one, with £2 from the two Roman Catholic clergymen.

KILKELLANE, KILKILLANE, or KILCULLANE, a parish in the barony of Small County, 3½ miles south-east of Six-Mile-Bridge, co. Limerick, Munster. It contains part of the village of HERBERTSTOWN: which see. Length, 1 mile; breadth, ½; area, 1,390 acres. Pop., in 1831, 679; in 1841, 1,186. Houses 195. The land is good, and is drained by the Commogue. In the parish are the walls of an old church; and also a handsome house, built by the Bouchier family.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CAHIRCORNEY [which see], in the dio. of Emly. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £45, and the rectorial for £90; and the latter are inappropriate in Mr. Freeman.

KILKELLY, a village in the parish of Kilmoree, barony of Costello, 9 miles north-north-west of Ballyhaunis, co. Mayo, Connaught. In its vicinity is a remarkable echo. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 142. Houses 29.

KILKENNY,

An inland county of Leinster, forming the extreme south-west portion of that province. It is bounded on the north, by Queen's co.; on the east, by co. Carlow and co. Wexford; on the south and south-west, by co. Waterford; and on the west, by co. Tipperary. The northern boundary-line, over more than one-third of the whole distance, is the watershed of the Slieveamary or Castlecomer hills, and over about 2½ miles at the middle, is the river Augbeg; but elsewhere it is artificial and capricious. The eastern boundary-line, over about 4 miles from the north, is a continuation of the watershed of the Castlecomer hills; over about the next 4 miles is artificial; and over all the remaining distance, down to the confluence of the Suir and the head of the estuary called Waterford Harbour, is the river Barrow. The southern boundary-line, except over 3½ miles adjoining the city of Waterford, where an artificial line includes the parish of Kilculliheen in co. Waterford, is all formed by the river Suir, and at the same time, the boundary-line between Leinster and Munster. The western boundary-line, over 5 miles to the Suir, is the rivulet Lingun; over 1½ mile northward to the vicinity of Callan, is the principal head-stream of the King's river; over 7 miles southward to a confluence with that stream is the Munster rivulet and one of its affluents; and over 4½ miles northward to the vicinity of Uricourt, is an early tributary of the Suir; but every where else, it is artificial; and, over the whole distance, it separates Leinster from Munster. A small detached district of about 2,000 acres around Castle-Durrow, originally belonged to the lordship of Ossory in Queen's co.; was, in times of turbulence, annexed to co. Kilkenny, by act of parliament, at the instance of the Earl of Ormonde; and was quite recently re-transferred to Queen's co., and made part of that county's new barony of Clarmalagh. The co. of Kilkenny, as at present constituted, is perfectly compact; and, as to its form or outline, may be regarded as a slender parallelogram, extending in the direction of south by east, and shorn of some territory at both its south-east and its south-west angles. Its greatest length, south by eastward, from the water-shed of the Slievemargy hills in the vicinity of Chatsworth, to the Suir opposite Little Island, is 35 miles; its mean breadth, over 6½ miles in the south, is about 10½ miles; its breadth, thence to the northern boundary, varies between 14 and 18½ miles; and its area comprises 470,102 acres of arable land, 21,126 acres of uncultivated land, 8,288 acres of continuous plantations, 490 acres of towns, and 3,056 acres of water—in all, 509,732 acres.

Surface.—The north-east district, constituting the barony of Fassadinin, and the northern border of the barony of Gowran, consists of the main part of a congeries of high-based hills, measuring 12 miles by 16, lying partly within co. Carlow and Queen's co., and extending from the near vicinity of the Barrow to almost the edge of the Nore. This congeries is often called indifferently the Slievemargy, or the Castle-Comer hills; but frequently, and with greater propriety, the former name is confined to the portion within Queen's co., and the latter name applied to the Kilkenny and Carlow sections. Though the portions of the congeries within Queen's co. and co. Carlow, down to the boundary-line with Kilkenny, may be regarded as continuous or ridgy; yet the portion within Kilkenny has all a southerly-declining basis, and is cut in directions converging to the south into seven distinct sections by the glens and vales of the principal streams. The basis round the frontier of the county, as indicated by the water-level of the streams from 1 to 3 miles below their source, is from 421 to 538 feet in the north, and from 519 to 662 feet in the east; and the basis, after the convergence of the glens in the south-west, is decreasingly less than 302 feet. The altitudes above sea-level of the principal summits in the north, named in an order from west to east, is 981, 998, 850, and 704; of the principal summits in the east, 899, 830, and 963; of the principal summits in the south, 603 and 1,099; and of the principal summits in the west, 613, 413, and 879. If the bases be compared with the altitudes, any reader will easily infer that, with unimportant exceptions, this great upland district is less a series of ridges or a segregation of mountains and hills, than a lofty tableau, diversified by tumulations, and intersected by prolonged dells.—The north-west district of the county, consisting of the barony of Galmoy, is partly flat but high-based bog, gliding away to the boundary with Tipperary; and partly the commencement of a rich plain along the Nore; but chiefly an expanse of upland much less in extent than that of the north-east district of the county, but considerably similar in character, and prevented from being continuous with it only by the intervention of the broad and beautiful west side of the valley of the Nore. The bases are much lower than those of the north-eastern congeries; and the principal summits are situated toward the centre, and have altitudes above sea-level of 635, 866, and 1,156 feet.—From the south-west extremity of this hilly region, eastward to the Nore, extends the valley of Freshford, containing some of the best land in the northern division of the county, but constantly varying in quality as it swells into interior undulation, or ascends the declivities of the skirting hills. The heights around the head of this valley, separating it from Tipperary on the west, and the low grounds around Urlingford on the north-west, have altitudes above sea-level of 468, 491, and 528 feet. A third series of uplands extends southward from the head and the middle of the valley of Freshford, constitutes nearly all the western and the central divisions of the barony of Cranagh, possesses to a large aggregate amount a moorish character, and is forked or cloven southward from nearly the commencement in the north by the narrow vale of the principal head-stream of the Munster river. The principal summits to the east of this dividing stream, have altitudes above sea-level of 942 and 760 feet; and the principal to the west have altitudes of 809, 1,081, 957, 971, and 619 feet.—Immediately south of this series of uplands on the west of the Nore, and of the southern offshoots of the Castle-Comer hills on the east, commences the great central plain of the county; including, on the east side, only a broad band of valley-ground along the Nore, but extending, on the west, away to the limits of the county, and even into Tipperary, and spreading southward across the basin of the King's river to the interior of the parishes of Killamery, Kilmaganny, Knocktopher, Jerpoint, and Innistiogue. This plain has a various character as to soil, yet may be pronounced aggregately rich; and it possesses quite a sufficient number and diversity of undulations, hillocks, and minor hills, to be relieved from the monotony of dead level, and worked into much beauteousness of landscape. The highest grounds of this great district in the vicinity of the Nore, have altitudes above sea-level of 442, 272, 236, 387, 211, and 222 feet. Within the limits of the plain are comprehended the whole of the quondam county of the city of Kilkenny, the southern border of Cranagh, the whole of Shillelogher, the whole of Callan, the greater part of Kells, a considerable part of Knocktopher, and the western border of Gowran.—A beautiful band of valley-ground extends down the west bank of the Barrow, forming the eastern border of Gowran and of Ida-proper, exceedingly contracted at one place by the small but lofty group of the Brandon mountains, but curving round the base of that group, and blending with the south-east corner of the great central plain of the county, immediately above the confluence of the Barrow and the Nore. The territory between the valley and the eastern edge of the great central plain, constitutes the middle district of Gowran and Ida-proper, and consists of a prolonged and uncontinuous chain of uplands, very various in height and character, and cut into three sections by respectively the easterly-running rivulet of Gowran, and an eastward and westward depression immediately north of the Brandon mountains. The principal summits of the northern section have altitudes above sea-level of 960, 895, 1,099, 710, and 464 feet; the principal summits of the central section have altitudes of 695, 783, and 1,202 feet; and the principal summits of the southern or Mount Brandon section have altitudes of 1,694, 1,304, and 1,008 feet. The south-east district of the county, or that which extends southward from the south boundary of the parish of Innistiogue, and from the confluence of the Nore and the Barrow to the Suir and Kileulliheen, and which constitutes Ida-improper, or the quondam baronies of Igrin and Ibercon, consists partly, or on the east, of the valley of the Barrow, partly, or on the south, of the luxuriant valley of the Suir, and partly, or on the south-west, of the vale of the Blackwater, but principally, or in the north, the west, and the centre, of a very diversified segregation of hilly grounds, chiefly subject to the spade or the plough, but occasionally pastoral or waste. The principal summits in this tract have altitudes above sea-level of 524, 308, 809, 677, 493, 445, and 409 feet. A district in the south-west of the county, inward from the Suir, and constituting between two-thirds and three-fourths of Iverk, is, in a general view, much the most opulent ground in the county, and consists of a wide-spread and highly ornate portion of the valley and skirting-slopes of the Suir. All the country north of this district, south of the great central plain, and west of the hilly grounds of Igrin, constituting the northern part of Iverk, the south-western part of Kells, and a large proportion of Knocktopher, is usually styled the Boley or Bualy mountains, and consists of amassments of upland, very considerably intersected with belts, patches, and hollows of arable land. The principal summits of the Boley Mountains have altitudes above sea-level of 602, 705, 458, 599, 484, 968, 588, 457, 636, 882, 760, 842, and 1,006 feet.

Waters.]—The river Barrow, approaching southward, across the west wing of co. Carlow, falls upon the boundary of co. Kilkenny, at a point 2½ miles above Goresbridge; and, measured in a straight line, it thence, to its confluence with the Suir, describes the boundary over a distance of about 25 miles. Its only tributaries within Kilkenny, are two rivulets, of each about 7 miles' course, in the barony of Gowran, the voluminous and majestic Nore, 1½ mile above New Ross, and a number of small rills in Ida, Igrin, and Ibercon. This noble river is navigable by ships of 800 tons to New Ross, and for small vessels to St. Mullins, about midway between New Ross and Graigue; it experiences the ebb and the flow of the tide to within 24 miles of Graigue; and it is afterwards aided by stretches and connecting links of artificial navigation, rendering it practicable for lighters far beyond the limits of the county, and, through the ramifications and main line of the Grand Canal, even to Dublin and the Shannon.—The Nore comes in from Queen's co., at a point almost exactly in the middle of the northern boundary of co. Kilkenny; flows in the direction of south by east, past Ballyragget and Kilkenny, to the northern vicinity of Thomastown; and then makes three stretches, successively south-eastward, southward, and eastward, to the Barrow. Except for bisecting the borough of Kilkenny, it everywhere within the county describes baronial boundaries; having on its left bank Fassadinig, Gowran, and Ida-proper, and on its right bank, Galmoy, Cranagh, Shillelogher, Knocktopher, and Igrin. From its entering the county till it reaches the vicinity of Thomastown, it has a fall of about 13 feet in a mile, and in consequence runs with rapidity,—the more so, that it is subject to floods; but from Thomastown to Innistiogue, it becomes quiescent, and is navigable by boats of 12 or 15 tons, and from Innistiogue to the Barrow, it is tidal, and has 12 feet of water in neap tides, and 15 in spring tides. Within its tidal sweep, vessels of 80 tons and upwards have been built. A canal from Thomastown to Kilkenny was commenced in 1758, and cut over a distance of four miles; but, in spite of large sums having been expended, and ardent desires being cherished, it never was completed. A canal to connect the Nore at Kilkenny with the Barrow at Goresbridge, and to pass to the latter place down the vale of the Gowran rivulet, was at one time so spiritedly projected as to figure by anticipation in some of the best maps of Ireland; but this too proved an abortive project.—The only noticeable tributaries of the Nore within Kilkenny, are the Owbeg, westward on the northern boundary; the Dinane, south-westward in Fassadinig; the Clodagh, south-westward from Brandon, and remarkable for a fall in a rocky and wooded recess at its mouth; the Freshford, eastward on the north border of Cranagh; the King's River, eastward between Shillelogher and Knocktopher; and the Argula, northward from between Knocktopher and Igrin.—The Dinane is a ramified stream; comes in from the west wing of Carlow; receives below Castlecomer the Dian, charged with the affluent waters of the Doonane, the Bruckagh, the Clohogue, and other torrents of the Slievemargy and Castlecomer mountains; afterwards receives the Cloghnagh and the Dubhglass, Douglas or Muckalee; and then rushes in a rapid current to the Nore, periodically and occasionally laden with by far the greater part of the bulky and tumultuous freshets which disturb the Nore's equanimity, and inconveniently increase its rapidity and volume. The King's River is also a ramified stream; yet it has its chief tributary within Kilkenny, the Munster river coming southward to it along the border; and it descends to the Nore in an easy and canal-like movement. The Suir begins to touch Kilkenny at a point 1½ mile below Carrick-on-Suir in Tipperary; and, measured in straight lines along its great sweeps, but without reckoning its disseverment from Waterford of the parish of Kilcullibeen, it traces the Kilkenny boundary over a distance of about 15 miles. This magnificent river is navigable for vessels of 300 tons and upwards to Waterford, and for vessels of 120 tons along the whole boundary of Kilkenny, and to the bridge of Carrick. Its principal tributaries in Kilkenny, are the Lingan, a mountain rivulet southward upon the boundary with Tipperary; the Sharah, a small rivulet southward through the demesne of Beasborough; and the Blackwater, southward along the eastern boundary of Iverk. The only lake in the county is Lough Cul-lin, containing an area of 25 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches, and politically partitioned among the parishes of Dunkilt, Gaulskill, and Kilcolumb, in the barony of Ida; and, with the exception of the area of this lake, the whole of the 3,056 acres of water exhibited by the Ordnance Survey as within the county, lie in the rivers Barrow, Nore, and Suir. Some periodical or seasonal lakes, here called loughans, and of the same kind called in Connaught turloughs, adjoin the demesne of Woodsgift in the parish of Cloghmanta.—Weak chalybeate springs occur at Ballytarsney, at Kilcullen, at Listerlin, at a place near the abbey of Jerpoint, and in several places around Castlecomer; two spas of some popular note, though of little real importance, occur in the vicinity of Kilkenny; and a spa of greater fame and more multitudinous resort than any other in Ireland, exists at BALLYSPELLIN: see that article.

Climate.]—The southerly exposure of the whole county, the generally gradual fall from north to south of between 400 and 500 feet in the medium basis or water-level, the comparative absence of bogs, marshes, or retentive soils, the prevalence of a subsoil of either limestone gravel, brittle schist, or porous argillite, and the greater attraction of the Wicklow mountains than the Kilkenny hills for the rainy clouds wafted upon the prevailing winds, all combine to render the climate of Kilkenny considerably superior to the average climate of Ireland in its influence upon both vegetation and animal health. Less rain falls in co. Kilkenny than in co. Dublin; and the crops in the former, especially upon limestone soils, are usually a week or two earlier than in the counties to the north. Yet vegetation is earlier in some districts of the county than in others, and differs very widely in any one district in different years; hence, in 1801, the oak was at the same stage of progress on April 25, at Belline in Iverk, as on May 4, in the parish of Innistiogue; and in the same year, the anemone hepatica bloomed at Woodstock on the 3d of February, while on the following year, and at the same place, it did not bloom till the 18th.

Minerals.—A small wing of the great granitic district of Carlow and Wicklow extends $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles along the Kilkenny side of the Barrow, immediately in contact with the southern extremity of co. Carlow, but has a main breadth of rather less than 2 miles; and a detached little district of granite, amounting to about 6 square miles, lies $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-south-west of the nearest part of that wing, and about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Innistiogue. —A district bounded on the north by a line drawn from the northern extremity of the Kilkenny granite past Thomastown to the exit of the Dublin and Clonmel road on the boundary with Tipperary, and occupying all the county south of that line to the Suir, with the exception of the granite districts, and of a belt of limestone $11\frac{1}{4}$ miles by 3 eastward along the valley of the Suir from the boundary with Tipperary,—this district consists largely of a formation of clay slate, greywacke, and greywacke slate, still more largely of old conglomerate with red, purple, green, and grey clay slate, and of a narrow belt along all its northern and southern margins of yellow sandstone and yellow sandstone conglomerate.—A district of about 14 square miles, in continuation of a rather smaller district within Queen's co., and occupying the northern border of Kilkenny immediately west of the Suir, and north-west of Freshford, consists of the coal formation, but contains nothing nearer actual coal than culm. Another district of about 28 or 30 square miles in area, and about 3 or $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles in mean breadth, and which comes in from co. Tipperary, extends east-north-eastward to the Nore, and approaches within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of the nearest parts of both the preceding district and the Castle-Comer coal district, also consists of the coal formation, but contains only a small proportion of actual coal, and is not worked. The Castle-Comer coal district occupies much the greater portion of the whole barony of Fassadining, and of the north border of the barony of Gowran; but it lies continuous with kindred districts within Queen's co. and co. Carlow, and, jointly with them, constitutes the great coal-field of LEINSTER: which see. The strata of the coal formations consist of shale, argillaceous ironstone, sandstone slate, and compact quartzose sandstone,—the argillaceous ironstone occurring in both layers and spheroids; and the strata of each district are arranged in the form of a great mineral basin, with the dip or inclination from the exterior edge toward the centre, so that the lowest strata appear at the edge, and the uppermost in the interior.—All the remaining parts of the county, comprising chiefly the great central plain, some diverging valleys, and the belt along the Suir, consist of part of the vast floetz limestone formation of Ireland. Most of the limestone is of a bluish gray colour; but the best for burning is blackish, and occurs near Kilkenny and Thomastown. The tracts of it which impinge upon the coal formations are so charged with silex, manganese, and iron, that they will not burn; a small tract of it near Kilkenny is indurated into fine black marble, richly variegated with impressions of madreporas and of bivalve and turbinated shells, and is extensively quarried in large blocks, sawn and dressed upon the Nore, and manufactured into tombstones, chimney-pieces, and exterior architectural decorations; and much of the tract along the Suir is decomposed into a friable, marly, manurial rubble, and heats and slacks under rain as if it had undergone the action of fire, and been charged with latent heat.

Soils.—A moorish turf, upon a bed of stiff yellow or whitish clay, covers the northern part of the barony of Fassadining, and is the most churlish and least productive soil in the county. A light soil, lying upon till and schistose rocks, covers the southern part of Fassadining, and the northern border of Gowran. A good loam of various qualities, resting upon limestone, carpets Gowran, as the surface descends from hilliness and subsides into plain; a deep brownish loam, mixed with stone, capable of any tillage, and easily productive of wheat, prevails in the parishes of Kilmacahill and Gowran; a fine blackish loam appears in some parts sloping to the Barrow; some very fine loam carpets the lower part of the vale of the Gowran rivulet; an excellent wheat-bearing clayey loam, mixed with stones, extends through the lower part of the parish of Powerstown, and across the centre of the parish of Dungarvan to the hills which extend south-westward from Mount Loftus to the Nore. A light, stony, dry, and friable earth, generally substituted on the loftier grounds by a shallow, black, moorish turf, and chiefly superincumbent on red argillite, and on argillaceous siliceous schist, covers the Brandon mountain group and its declivities and slopes, occupying the southern border of Gowran, and the greater part of Ida-proper. A good soil, dry and sometimes deep, but deteriorating in quality as it approaches the river, carpets the east side of the valley of the Nore from the vicinity of Kilkenny to that of Thomastown. A hungry, clayey loam, lying immediately upon limestone, covers the west side of the valley of the Nore, below Kilkenny; and, though ill suited to ordinary tillage-purposes, is perfectly adapted to the cultivation of sainfoin, and admirably fitted by nature to form the best description of sheep-walk. A light soil, sometimes gravelly, appears all round Kilkenny; it passes into sandy gravel to the north of the town, particularly on the eastern bank of the Nore; and it merges into slaty hills and gravelly bottoms to the west. A curious circumstance is that, over all the great central plain of the county, the soil deteriorates very nearly in the ratio of the nearness of the limestone rock to the surface. Patches and belts of alluvial or meadow ground, consisting of deep, blackish, vegetable loam, and singularly luxuriant in its crops of hay, occurs along the Nore, immediately to the north of the lands of sandy gravel; and a principal expanse of it forms the lands of Inch, not far from Freshford. Some of the best soil in the north-west of the county carpets the valley of Freshford; yet is very variable, and, as it rises up the hills, passes into a light and gravelly loam. The soil of the Galmoy hills consists chiefly of the debris of ferruginous schists, and partly of the debris of limestone; and though neither deep nor fit for tillage, is of a kindly quality, and inclined to produce a fine herbage. The soil at the skirt of these hills, where they decline into a varied plain in the parish of Eirke, improves in character, till it merges into the western bog. Most of even the low grounds in the barony of Cranagh, though inclined to grass, appear very light and poor; and the hilly grounds in its centre are moorish, but have a schistose subsoil, and are easily reclaimed, and in consequence are capable of great improvement. The soil of the central, north-western, western, and southern divisions of the great central plain of the county, is prevailingly argillaceous and calcareous, varies from a light calcareous gravel to a stiff but rich argillaceous loam, and, in some places, as in the vicinity of Kells and Callan, produces some of the greatest crops of wheat almost anywhere to be seen. The soil of the hills which bound the plain on the south lies on a subsoil of red porous argillite, and is either dry and kindly, or capable of being easily made so. Some belts and sheets of a stiff and yellowish clay occur at the back of these hills, particularly on the lands of Smithstown. A light soil on a slaty bottom covers the hills throughout the greater part of the barony of Knocktopher, and the northern border of the barony of Iverk. A fertile soil of various depths, increasing in goodness as it approaches the Suir, occupies all the low grounds of Iverk, and passes, in the parish of Portnascully, into some of the richest and deepest soil in the county. Excellent land, as far as to the limits of the field of limestone subsoil, occurs in the parishes of Gaulskill and Dunkilt in Ida-improper; and a light and dry soil, rarely moorish, containing a large proportion of argil, and producing good crops of oats, covers the low schistose hills which constitute the greater part of that barony between the Nore and the Suir.

Agriculture.—The barony of Gowran, on account at once of its extent, its central position, its diversified contour, its middle-rate subjection to urban influence, and the character and diversity of its soil, may be selected as affording a thoroughly fair specimen of the agriculture of the county; and, in common with the barony of Galmoy, it was the subject in 1836 of a special examination, and an official report, which enable us to exhibit very accurately its condition. The rent of land is lower than in the average of baronies officially reported on in Leinster. Several of the proprietors make their tenants some cash allowance, or furnish timber and slates, for new buildings; but the greater number of tenants erect new buildings without any direct aid from their landlords, and are enabled to do so by at once the moderateness of their rents, the considerable length of their leases, and the frugality and economy of their habits. The majority of the farms have now good dwelling-houses and offices; yet they are deficient in draining, in fences, in the amount of live stock, or in the number and quality of the implements of husbandry.* The occupants of farms from 70 to 100 acres have potatoes and milk, stirabout, or oaten-bread and milk for breakfast and supper, and generally potatoes and butter, but once or twice herrings or butcher-meat, for dinner. Though the inhabitants of some of the towns and villages, such as Graigue, are averagely wretched; yet the rural population, both farmers and labourers, are in a decidedly superior condition to the rural population of the majority of the other Leinster baronies which were officially examined. "The most prominent causes of this improvement," says the report, "appear to be the greater prevalence of resident proprietors, or rather the community and kindliness of feeling between them and the farmers and labourers, arising from the liberal opinions and religious and political tolerance of most of the landed proprietors in this barony, which induce the landlords to reside more constantly upon their estates, to employ more labour upon them, and to pay more attention to agriculture, and to the general improvement of their property, and of the district they reside in; next, the more than usual absence of middle-men; and, lastly, the larger size of farms, there being more of them than elsewhere above 30 or 40 acres." Though the processes of draining, fencing, irrigating and reclaiming are by no means duly attended to, or are even comparatively neglected, yet the district contains a much smaller proportion of wet land and bog, and mountain waste than most other districts. The usual rotation of crops is, first year, potatoes manured; second, wheat; third, barley or oats; fourth, clover. Many farmers finish the rotation with these four crops; others make the first crop or cut of clover into hay, and plough in the second as a preparation for wheat, in a fifth year; others allow the land to remain under the clover ley as pasture during several years, and then take a crop of oats; and the resident proprietors have generally as their rotation, first, potatoes or turnips manured; second, wheat, barley, or oats; third, clover; fourth, oats. The only variation made upon the last of these rotations—especially upon the poorer soils, or when the ground needs rest or renovation—is to let the land remain in pasture under the clover ley during from two years to upwards of ten, or until it becomes foul or mossy. Turnips and rape are cultivated by all the resident proprietors, and by a few of the large farmers; and vetches are grown to a considerable amount for horses; but mangel-wurzel and lucerne are not so extensively in favour. The only materials used for improving the soil are animal manure, lime, limestone-gravel, peat-earth, road-mud, ditch and other earth, and the ashes made by paring and burning the surface of the land. A difference of opinion prevails, however, respecting the effect of burning the sward; and the abuse is not infrequent of forcing the land with lime when it needs manure and rest instead of a stimulant. Some of the natural meadows and pastures are of excellent quality; but many of the leys are full of weeds and moss, and produce very little grass. The grazing grounds are generally used for a mixed system of dairying, and of breeding, rearing, and fattening cattle or sheep. The smaller farmers usually confine themselves to dairying, and to breeding and rearing cattle; and the resident proprietors and the larger farmers devote an extensive proportion of land to sheep and the fattening of cattle, more especially to sheep. "Dairying," says the report, "forms an important branch of the farmer's

* "The following," says the report to which we have alluded, "were the instances among the farms inspected by the English Assistant Commissioner, in which good stone and slated dwelling-houses and farm buildings had been erected by the tenants. A farm of 95 acres, held on lease of three lives at a fair rent; the house and farm-offices cost the tenant £500; he received no allowance nor assistance from his landlord. A farm of 48 acres, term of two lives, at fair rent; house and offices cost tenant £150; no allowance or assistance from landlord, although tenant asked for it; more than half the farm is perfectly drowned with land springs, but tenant cannot drain it, having spent all his money in building. A farm of 50 acres held for two lives, at fair rent, house and offices cost £130; no allowance or aid from landlord. A farm of 108 acres held for 100 years, somewhat under value; house and offices cost £200, to which the landlord contributed nothing. A small farm with a house in the adjoining village on lease of 21 years, or one life, at full rent, house and offices cost tenant £200; landlord allowed him £45. A farm of 85 acres, lease of 21 years, or one life, house and buildings cost £150; landlord allowed tenant £38 of old arrears of rent; this farm greatly needs draining, fencing, and other improvements, but the tenant pleads his want of means. Fifty acres previously held by a lease of two lives, both of which expired within a few years; full rent; building cost £150; no aid from landlord. Thirty-seven acres held for one life, at a high rent; excellent house and offices, which cost £200 to the tenant, who was obliged to borrow money and involve himself to complete them, but he has received no aid nor allowance from his landlord. One hundred acres, on lease of 21 years, at rather low rent; buildings cost £230; no assistance or allowance from landlord. Eighty acres at fair rent, for three lives or 31 years; house and office cost about £200; no allowance from landlord. Two business. Its extent varies from 2 or 3 cows among the small farmers, to 25 among the largest. The most usual practice is to skim all the milk after letting it stand 24 hours in summer, and 28 in winter, and to churn only the cream. But some farmers skim the milk in summer only, churning the whole milk in winter; others keep separate the milk first taken from the cow, because always the poorest which they skim, and churn only the cream from it, but they churn the whole of the milk which the cow gives last, on account of its greater richness. A few persons churn the whole milk at all times. The cream or milk is churned from once a-week to every day, according to the weather and to the quantity of milk which the cows give. Barrel and upright churns are the two descriptions used; they are worked by hand, except on a few of the larger farms, where a horse-mill is applied to them. The butter is more commonly put into the cask as soon as it is made. The produce of the large dairies is usually considered to be of the first quality; but among the smaller farms, the butter is frequently only of the second or third. The same difference is found with respect to the quantity of the produce, some of the smaller dairies not averaging more than one cwt. of butter per cow, while a few of the largest dairies reach $1\frac{1}{2}$ cwt." Within all the rural districts of the county in 1841, the total of farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, was 5,131; of farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 5,752; of farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 3,601; and of farms of upwards of 30 acres, 2,006;—within the city of Kilkenny, the total of farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres was 35; of farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 10; of farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 5; and of farms of upwards of 30 acres, 1;—and within the other civic districts of the county, the total of farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres was 96; of farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 30; of farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 4; and of farms of upwards of 30 acres, 6. In 1841, the number of farmers throughout the county was 11,707, of servants and labourers 39,749, of ploughmen 338, of gardeners, 136, of graziers 2, of herdsmen 396, of caretakers 41, of land-agents 10, of land-stewards 98, of gamekeepers 13, and of dairy-keepers 91.

Live Stock.—The dairy cows and the other cattle stock of most of the farmers are of the native breed. The resident proprietors and some of the largest farmers have adopted the Ayrshire and North Devon breeds, or crosses between them and the Irish cows; others prefer the Durham breed, but more for fattening stock than for the dairy. The mountain breed of sheep, whose full-grown wether weighs 17 or 18 lbs. per quarter, is still the only one kept on hilly and mountainous land; but the large old Irish breed, crossed and greatly improved by the Leicester, is usual on the lowland farms. The wether of the latter, when sold fat, weighs from 24 to 30 lbs. per quarter. Some of the resident proprietors keep the South Downs for their own consumption. The horses, especially those of the larger farmers, are generally in better condition than in several other counties of Leinster; and hence, fewer are kept in proportion to the extent of land farmed. In summer, most farmers turn out their horses to grass, while resident proprietors and the largest farmers give their vetches or clover in the stable; and from November till May or June, all allow, besides hay, from one to two stones of steamed or boiled potatoes, and from half-a-stone to a stone of oats per day, according to their work. The pigs vary greatly in quality. Some are of an excellent breed, kindly and well-shaped; and others are large-boned, coarse, and ill-made, and eat twice the value in food of the market-price of their own carcase. The old mania for very large pigs still extensively usurps the place of judicious regard to the quality of the meat, to earliness of maturity, to adipose disposition, and to the combined effects of these qualities in producing a remunerating pig for the market. Goats are kept by many cottiers and small farmers, but not in flocks; and a few are found among the dairies on the Boley or Welch hills. The rearing of fowl is an object with small farmers. Pigeons are scarcely reared for sale. Bees are less an object of attention now than at former periods.

In 1841, within all the rural districts of the county, the live stock on farms or holdings not exceeding one acre, consisted of 850 horses and mules, 494 asses, 1,081 cattle, 651 sheep, 12,598 pigs, and 57,420 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 1,275 horses and mules, 329 asses, 2,054 cattle, 749 sheep, 7,104 pigs, and 38,445 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 5,185 horses and mules, 220 asses, 9,820 cattle, 4,173 sheep, 17,593 pigs, and 66,261 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 6,055 horses and mules, 265 asses, 14,591 cattle, 7,375 sheep, 21,533 pigs, and 60,942 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 6,141 horses and mules, 394 asses, 22,916 cattle, 34,899 sheep, 17,197 pigs, and 51,983 poultry;—within the city of Kilkenny, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 272 horses and mules, 112 cattle, 2 sheep, 1,462 pigs, and 779 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 32 horses and mules, 31 cattle, 54 pigs, and 182 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 18 horses and mules, 9 cattle, 2 sheep, 11 pigs, and 65 poultry; and on farms of 15 acres and upwards, 17 horses and mules, 71 cattle, 34 sheep, 33 pigs, and 143 poultry;—and, within the other civic districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 227 horses and mules, 77 asses, 122 cattle, 17 sheep, 1,315 pigs, and 1,718 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 41 horses and mules, 5 asses, 76 cattle, 12 sheep, 127 pigs, and 376 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 15 horses and mules, 4 asses, 44 cattle, 7 sheep, 66 pigs, and 127 poultry; and on farms of 15 acres and upwards, 17 horses and mules, 1 ass, 36 cattle, 5 sheep, 27 pigs, and 61 poultry. The totals of the classes, together with their respective estimated value, were, within the rural districts of the county, 19,506 horses and mules, £156,048; 1,702 asses, £1,702; 50,462 cattle, £328,003; 47,847 sheep, £52,632; 76,025 pigs, £95,031; and 275,051 poultry, £6,876;—within the city of Kilkenny, 339 horses and mules, £2,712; 223 cattle, £1,449; 38 sheep, £42; 1,560 pigs, £1,950; and 1,169 poultry, £29;—and within the other civic districts of the county, 300 horses and mules, £2,400; 87 asses, £87; 278 cattle, £1,807; 41 sheep, £45; 1,535 pigs, £1,919; and 2,282 poultry, £57. Grand total of value of live stock within the rural districts of the county, £640,292; within the city of Kilkenny, £6,182; within the other civic districts of the county, £6,315.

Woods.—The principal plantations occur around Innistiogue, in the southern vicinity of Thomastown, in the eastern vicinity of Stoneyford, at Jenkinstown, in the northern vicinity of Castle-Comer, in the southern vicinity of Gowran, at Kilfane, at Bessborough, in the parish of Whitechurch, in the parish of Kilmaganny, in the western vicinity of Callan, in the parishes of Killaloe and Tullagham-brogue, and at Borrismore. The principal trees, shrubs, and herbaceous plants which grow as under-wood in the older plantations and in the natural woods, are salix caprea, salix fragilis, salix fusca, rosa arvensis, populus tremula, vaccinium myrtillus, viburnum opulus, poa nemoralis, agrostis nigra, bromus sylvaticus, aira cæspitosa, holcus mollis, lysichachia nemorum, sanicula europea, angelica sylvestris, scilla nutans, geum urbanum, anemone nemorosa, melampyrum pratense, hypericum androsium, hypericum pulchrum, hypericum angulare, solidago virgaurea, oxalis acetosella, equisetum sylvaticum, blechnum spicant, osmunda regalis, polypodium vulgare, filices (numerous). The only considerable nursery in 1801, was one of 14 acres. Orchards are less attended to than at a former period. A few osieries occur on the banks of the Nore; and one of 25 acres occupies an island in the Suir, opposite Fiddown. —The continuous plantations which existed in 1841, consisted of 1,840 acres of oak, 262 of ash, 22 of elm, 136 of beech, 833 of fir, 9,756 of mixed trees, and 1,050 of orchards; and previous to 1791, there were planted of these 1,734 of oak, 194 of ash, 13 of elm, 16 of beech, 103 of fir, 2,397 of mixed trees, and 332 of orchards. The number of detached trees which existed in 1841, consisted of 47,918 of oak, 203,484 of ash, 50,175 of elm, 50,224 of beech, 98,314 of fir, 195,640 of mixed trees, and 10,682 of orchard trees. Total of the continuous plantations, 13,899 acres; of detached trees, 656,437 trees, equivalent to 4,103 acres. Grand total of woods, 18,002 acres.

Manufactures and Trade.]—The manufacture of carpets, diapers, and tapestry was introduced in 1359, by the Countess of Ormonde; the manufacture of linens and woollens was encouraged and established, at a great expense, about the middle of the 17th century, by James, Duke of Ormonde; and the linen manufacture was introduced to the southern districts of the county, about the close of the same century, by the Bessborough family; but all these manufactures had a brief and fugitive existence. The manufacture of blankets was very actively carried on at Kilkenny from about 1745, till the commencement of the present century; but this also has declined. The districts of Kilkenny, Carrick, Cork, and Moate, which annually manufactured, about 22 years ago, upwards of 19,000 pieces, worth £199,100, do not now manufacture more than amounts to the value of £20,000.—In 1826, the sales of grain amounted, at Kilkenny, to 34,000 barrels of wheat of 20 stones, 1,146 barrels of barley of 16 stones, and 18,000 barrels of oats of 14 stones; at Gowran, Goresbridge, and Graigue, 20,396 barrels of wheat, 10,203 of barley, and 19,756 of oats; at Castle-Comer, Ballyragget, and Durrow, 3,262 of wheat, 1,200 of barley, and 1,060 of oats; at Thomastown, Bennets'-bridge, Ennisnag and Kells, 42,054 of wheat, 4,660 of barley, and 24,000 of oats; and at Callan, 7,460 of wheat, 1,390 of barley, and 3,260 of oats,—and, in 1836, the sales amounted, at Kilkenny, to 36,350 barrels of wheat, 1,909 of barley, and 36,800 of oats; at Gowran, Goresbridge, and Graigue, 27,746 of wheat, 10,676 of barley, and 7,646 of oats; at Castle-Comer, Ballyragget, and Durrow, 6,522 of wheat, 26 of barley, and 1,250 of oats; at Thomastown, Bennets'-bridge, Ennisnag, and Kells, 57,632 of wheat, 5,262 of barley, and 6,019 of oats; and at Callan, 11,010 of wheat, 2,090 of barley, and 5,827 of oats.

The existing state of productive industry and of trade, apart from the labours of agriculturists and professional persons, will be best shown by exhibiting the classified results of the Census of 1841. Fairs.]—The best fairs in the county are, at Kilkenny, March 28, frequented by graziers from other counties for early cattle; Kilkenny, June; Bennet's Bridge, Feb. 24, Aug. 26, Sept. 19, and Dec. 21; Callan, May 4, June 12, July 10, Aug. 21, Oct. 10, Nov. 4, and Dec. 14; Castle-Morris, May 12, Aug. 12, and Nov. 12; Kells, July 13; Newbridge, April 13, June 15, Aug. 1, and Oct. 15; Rathbeath, May 1, June 11, Nov. 2, and Dec. 7; Templemartin, Nov. 10 and 23. Fairs of secondary note, yet well frequented for cattle and pigs, are at Fiddown, April 25, June 10, Sept. 29, and Nov. 30; Ballyragget, Feb. 20, April 20, June 22, Sept. 4, Oct. 20, and Dec. 10; Knockmoylan, Aug. 5; Ballycalhan, Feb. 12; Rosbercon, April 19, May 4, June 7, Aug. 10, and Oct. 19; Granny, April 12, May 14, Sept. 4, and Dec. 11; Freshford, Aug. 5, and Dec. 17; Ullingford, May 12, Aug. 15, and Oct. 12; St. Canice, Oct. 22; Thomastown, May 25; Graigue, June 22, and Nov. 4; Mullinavat, April 20, and Oct. 3; Imistogue, June 9, and Dec. 14; Castle-Comer, May 4, Aug. 21, and Sept. 25; and Bawn, May 27, Sept. 8, and Oct. 29. Fairs are allowed by patent at some other places, as Kilmurry, Kilmaganny, Knocktopher, Powerstown, Stroan, Ballylinch, Burnchurch, Gowran, Churchland, Ballyhibbuck, and Ballyhale; but they are either not held, or are scenes of a very trivial amount of business.

Communications.]—The Kilkenny line of railway, as laid down by the Public Commissioners, leaves the Main Trunk line at the summit on Ross bog, 2 or 3 statute miles south-west of Maryborough, and 52½ from Dublin, that point being 345 feet above high-water level in Dublin bay. The line, for the most part, proceeds nearly due south, passing Mr. Lawler's demesne, and close to Corbally, leaving Ballyroan 2 miles to the east, then passes close to the town of Abbeyleix, and over Abbeyleix bog to the cross-roads at Branra-gate, about midway between Durrow and Ballinakill, thence by Grenan Church to Ballyragget, and along the left bank of the Nore, arriving in the city of Kilkenny at the barracks, 79 miles from Dublin, and 169 feet above the level of high water in Dublin bay. Its route is through a country presenting very few obstacles to the formation of a railway; and approaches within a very few miles of the Castle-Comer and Killenaule collieries. From the summit-level and connecting point with the Main Trunk on Ross bog to Abbeyleix, the distance is 7 miles and 57 chains, and the fall is 1 in 1,023; from Abbeyleix to Clonking, the distance is 2 miles and 32 chains, and the line is horizontal; from Clonking to Ballyragget, the distance is 5 miles and 51 chains, and the fall is 1 in 419; from Ballyragget to the river Dinane, the distance is 6 miles and 33 chains, and the fall is 1 in 647; from the river Dinane to Dunmore, the distance is 1 mile and 65 chains, and the line is horizontal; and from Dunmore to the terminus in Kilkenny, the distance is 2 miles and 47 chains, and the fall is 1 in 1,056. The estimated cost of construction is £212,000; the estimated annual income, £13,712 10s.; the estimated annual expenditure, £9,581 5s.; and the estimated annual surplus or nett profit, £4,131 5s., equivalent to a dividend of only 2 per cent.—Another projected Kilkenny railway, for which an act of parliament has been obtained, proceeds in the direction of east by south from the city of Kilkenny, suddenly curves at a distance of about 1½ mile north-west of Gowran, proceeds in the direction of north by east to the eastern vicinity of Leighlin-Brigge, in co. Carlow, ascends northward thence to Athy, proceeds north-north-eastward to the route of the Commissioners' main trunk line at a point 3½ miles north-north-east of Sallens, and then follows that route along its sinuosities to the city of Dublin.—We have already, in the section upon the waters of the county, noticed by anticipation the communications which exist in the form of navigations.—At the close of 1841, the county surveyor had under his charge 816 miles of road; and, from the date of his appointment in May, 1834, he had superintended the formation of 44 miles of new road. The principal roads through or within the county, are the mail-lines from Dublin to Cork and Waterford, and the various lines which radiate from the city of Kilkenny.

Divisions and Towns.—The co. of Kilkenny is politically divided into the baronies of Fassadining in the north-east, Gowran in the northern part of the middle of the east, Ida-proper in the southern part of the middle of the east, Ida-improper or Igrin and Ibercon in the south-east, Iverk in the south-west, Kells in the south of the middle of the west, Callan and Shillelogher in the middle of the west, Cranagh to the north of the middle of the west, Galmoy in the north-west, Knocktopher between Gowran and Ida on the east, and Iverk and Kells on the west, and the city of Kilkenny between Gowran on the east, Shillelogher on the south-west, and Cranagh on the west. The act 3 and 4 Victoria, c. 108 and 109, transferred 21 whole townlands and parts of 6 other townlands of the parish of St. Canice from the quondam co. of the city of Kilkenny to the barony of Cranagh,—pop., in 1841, 1,373; 31 whole townlands and part of 4 other townlands of the parish of St. John's, and one whole townland and part of another townland of the parish of St. Maul, from the co. of the city of Kilkenny to the barony of Gowran,—pop. 1,885; 2 whole townlands and part of 5 other townlands of St. Canice, 32 whole townlands and part of another townland of St. Patrick's, and part of a townland of St. John's, from the co. of the city of Kilkenny to the barony of Shillelogher,—pop. 1,296;—and the act 6 and 7 William IV. c. 84, transferred 7 townlands of Durrow from Galmoy, co. Kilkenny, to Clarnmallagh, Queen's co.,—pop. 1,954; 3 townlands of Dunmore, from Gowran to Fassadining,—pop. 392; 1 whole townland and part of another of Treadingstown, from Shillelogher to Gowran,—pop. 107; one uninhabited townland of Killaloe, from Shillelogher to Callan; and an uninhabited part of a townland of Dunnamaggin, from Kells to Knocktopher. According to the present constitution of the districts, the city of Kilkenny contains one whole parish, and part of 4 other parishes; the barony of Callan contains one whole parish, and part of another parish; Cranagh contains 11 whole parishes, and part of 8 other parishes; Fassadining contains 10 whole parishes, and part of 9 other parishes; Galmoy contains 5 whole parishes, and part of 7 other parishes; Gowran contains 27 whole parishes, and part of 8 other parishes; the united barony of Ida, Igrin, and Ibercon, contains 13 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; Iverk contains 13 whole parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; Kells contains 7 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; Knocktopher contains 8 whole parishes, and part of 8 other parishes; and Shillelogher contains 10 whole parishes, and part of 9 other parishes.—Dr. Beaufort, estimating the total of parishes and churches in the county at respectively 127 and 31, assigns 121 parishes and 29 churches to the dio. of Ossory, 6 parishes and 2 churches to the dio. of Leighlin, and a very small part of 1 parish to the dio. of Cashel.

The towns and principal villages are, in Callan, Callan; in Cranagh, Freshford and Kilmanagh; in Fassadining, Castle-Comer, Clough, and Ballyragget; in Galmoy, Lisdowney, Johnstown, and Urlingford; in Gowran, Thomastown, Dunbell, Gowran, Graignemanagh, Goresbridge, Bawnskeaha, Paulstown, Johnswell, and part of Bennet's-Bridge; in Ida, New Ballygub, Ballinamona, Tullagher, Ballinorea, and Rosbercon; in Iverk, Fiddown, Lecawn, Pilltown, Dangan, Kilmacow, Doornane, Grange, Mooncoin, Pollrone, Ballygorey, and Licketstown; in Kells, Dunnamaggin, Kells, Windgap and Kilmaganny; in Knocktopher, Hugginstown, Boolyglass, Ballyhale, Stoneyford, Mullinavat, and Knocktopher; and in Shillelogher, part of Bennet's-Bridge.

Statistics.—In 1834, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in the county was 384, of scholars 19,672, of male scholars 12,398, of female scholars 7,000, of scholars whose sex was not specified 274, of scholars connected with the Established Church 1,376, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 2, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 11, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 18,164, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 119; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 384, of scholars 20,206, of male scholars 12,684, of female scholars 7,392, of scholars whose sex was not specified 130, of scholars connected with the Established Church 1,467, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 2, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 11, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 18,674, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 52. The statistics of education and of ecclesiastical matters for 1834, are given under the diocesan divisions; and may be very proximately estimated for co. Kilkenny, by reference to the article Ossory: which see. At the close of 1842, the National Board had in full operation within the county 77 schools, conducted by 56 male and 32 female teachers, attended by 6,212 male and 4,963 female scholars, and aided with aggregately £862 in annual salaries, and £120 3s. 9d. in school-requisites; and during that year they made grants of £149 toward the building and fitting up of other schools.—During 1843, the number of persons committed for public offences in the county, but exclusive of the city of Kilkenny, was 347; and of these, 55 were charged with offences against the person, 4 with offences against property committed with violence, 112 with offences against property committed without violence, 5 with malicious offences against property, 2 with offences against the currency, and 169 with offences not included in the above categories. Of 213 who were convicted, 20 were sentenced to transportation, 167 to imprisonment, 1 to pay a fine, and 25 were either discharged on sureties or were not sentenced; and of 134 who were acquitted and discharged, 107 were found not guilty on trial, 25 had no bill found against them, and 2 were not prosecuted.—The constabulary force of the county, exclusive of the city of Kilkenny, consisted, on Jan. 1, 1843, of 1 second-rate county inspector, 1 first-rate sub-inspector, 3 second-rate sub-inspectors, 4 third-rate sub-inspectors, 1 first-rate head constable, 8 second-rate head constables, 67 constables, 272 first-rate sub-constables, 42 second-rate sub-constables, and 10 mounted police. The cost of maintaining this force during 1842, was £18,568 10s. 5½d. Two stipendiary magistrates are stationed at respectively Kilkenny and Castle-Comer.—In 1835, the total levy by grand-jury presentment was £29,793 14s. 8½d.; and of this, £2,603 11s. 6d. were applied to the public roads of the county at large, £5,907 19s. 1d. to the public roads of the several baronies, £7,609 19s. 1d. to the public establishments and salaries, £11,284 18s. 3½d. to the maintenance of the constabulary force, and £238 6s. 9d. to the repayment of loans advanced by government.—Fourteen members were sent from the county and its boroughs, or two each from the county itself, from Kilkenny, from Callan, from Gowran, from Innistiogue, from Thomastown, and from Knocktopher, to the Irish parliament; but only three members in all, or two from the county at large, and one from the city, are sent to the imperial parliament. The constituency of the county on May 1, 1841, amounted to 1,530; and of these, 279 were £50 freeholders, 83 were £20 freeholders, 928 were £10 freeholders, 3 were £50 leaseholders, 20 were £20 leaseholders, 206 were £10 leaseholders, 2 were £50 rent-chargers, and 90 were £20 rent-chargers.

Pop. of the county in 1792, 97,500; in 1813, 134,664; in 1821, 158,716; in 1831, 169,945; in 1841, 183,349. Families in 1831, 28,823; employed chiefly in agriculture, 19,727; in manufactures and trade, 4,271; in other pursuits, 4,825.—The following statistics all belong to 1841: Males, 90,349; females, 93,000; families, 30,874. Inhabited houses, 29,090; uninhabited, built houses, 801; houses in the course of erection, 90. First-class houses, 600; second-class, 8,065; third-class, 12,587; fourth-class, 7,778. Families inhabiting first-class houses, 745; inhabiting second-class houses, 8,585; inhabiting third-class houses, 13,263; inhabiting fourth-class houses, 8,281. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 22,696; in manufactures and trade, 5,021; in other pursuits, 3,157. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 576; on the directing of labour, 11,585; on their own manual labour, 17,724; on means not specified, 969. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 40,148; to clothing, 2,431; to lodging, 4,085; to health, 42; to justice, 441; to education, 272; to religion, 130; unclassified, 9,959; without any specified occupations, 6,235. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 11,193; to clothing, 3,463; to lodging, 11; to health 92; to education, 101; to religion, 5; unclassified, 6,219; without any specified occupations, 39,889. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 29,825; who could read but not write, 14,637; who could neither read nor write, 34,458. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 13,366; who could read but not write, 20,638; who could neither read nor write, 48,006. Males of 4 years of age and upwards attending primary schools, 7,814; attending superior schools, 35. Females of 4 years of age and upwards attending primary schools, 5,679; attending superior schools, 16. Per-centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 49; married, 47; widowed, 5. Per-centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 49; married, 44; widowed 13. Physicians, 14; surgeons, 17; apothecaries, 11; druggists, 2; midwives, 17; nurse-tenders, 73. School-teachers, 209 males and 67 females; ushers and tutors, 36 males and 2 females; governesses, 32; music and dancing masters, 7. Clergymen of the Establishment, 35; Roman Catholic clergymen, 67; ministers of religion whose denominational connection was not specified, 14; scripture-reader, 1; parish clerks, 8.

Antiquities.—Remains of a curious Druidical circle, of disputed character, exist on the summit of Tory-hill, Slieve-Grian, or the hill of the Sun. A circular heap of stones, 87 paces in circumference, and encompassed by a circular fence of stones, which encloses two or three acres, and is distant about 95 yards from the nearest part of the heap, occurs on the summit of the hill of Cloghmanta, and commands an extensive and magnificent view of the circumjacent country. A large and otherwise remarkable cromlech occurs at Kilmogue, in the barony of Knocktopher; and smaller cromlechs—most of them thrown partially prostrate or in other respects seriously damaged—occur at Ballyhenberry in Iverk, on the hill of Owney in Iverk, at Tubrid in Iverk, at Kilnerry near Castletown, at Raheen above Bessborough, at Boleyglass in the parish of Aghaviller, at a place between Castle-Morres and Kilmacoliver, and within the demesne of Marymount in the barony of Galmoy. Remarkable standing or altar stones occur on the lands of Ballyspellin and at Ballinasleigh near Durrow; and stone enclosures, of various character but seemingly very ancient, occur at Ballinasleigh, at Garryduff in Fiddown, and at Ballinony in Kilbeacon. Rathes are very numerous, particularly in Galmoy, and near the Nore. Twenty circular ones of various sizes occur in the small parish of Cloghmanta, and 12 or 14—some of them very large, and with high banks—may be seen near the Nore, between Kilkenny and Ballylinch-bridge. Most of the rathes have one fence, some two, some three concentric enclosures; and one is elliptical, one is square, a few are angular, and the great majority are circular. Flagged chambers, in some instances double, occur beneath some of the rathes; but elsewhere, as at Rathard near Tory-hill, Kilmanahera near Bessborough, and Graigue near Castletown, they exist unaccompanied with rathes, and are roofed with flags. Large mounds exist at Callan and near Kilkenny; and smaller ones at Dungarvan, Knocktopher, Tybrachny, Innistiogue, Powerstown, a variety near Graigue, and at Rathheath on the Nore. Pillartowers exist beside the cathedral church of St. Canice, beside the church of Tulloherin, beside the church of Kilree, and beside the church of Fartagh; and the stump of a fifth occurs at Aghaviller. Cul-dee establishments are thought to have existed at Fartagh, Fiddown, Killaghy, Killamery, Kilfane, Kilmanagh, Callan, Kells, and Innistiogue; and Augustinian abbeys succeeded the Culdean establishments at the last three of these places, and now survive in considerable architectural remains. Two celebrated Cistercian abbeys survive in large and interesting remains at Jerpoint and Graigue. Three ruined abbeys at Kilkenny are beautiful specimens of Gothic architecture; and were called St. John's abbey, the Franciscan abbey, and the Black or Dominican abbey. Inconsiderable remains exist of a nunnery at Kilculliheen, a Carmelite monastery at Thomastown, and an abbey, probably a Dominican one, at Rosbercon. A singular cell, built over a spring at Clontubrid, is popularly called the Druid's Well, and may have been the habitation of a monkish hermit. Very many castles were built by the first English settlers, and a few by other parties; and though several have been destroyed, and some agglomerated with modern houses, yet a very large number still remain,—almost all, however, consisting of a single tower, which constituted the keep or place of strength, and to which smaller buildings were formerly attached. The castles of Grandison, Balleen, Ballyragget, and Coolkill, are said to have been either built, or chiefly used, by Margaret Fitzgerald, the great Countess of Ormonde; and, in addition to these, the castles of Kilkenny, Knocktopher, Gowran, Dunfert, Poolstown, Nehom, Callan, Ballycallan, Dunnagh, Kilmanagh, Urlingford, and several others, belonged to the family of the Butlers. The castles of Drumroe, Barrowmount, and Low Grange, belonged to Lord Galmoy. The castle of Tybrachny was built by King John. The castles of Stroan, Kilfane, Clofouke, Conahy, Ballyfoyle, and Cloranke, belonged to the Purcells; the castle of Cowan, to the Brennans; Cantwell's castle at Sandford's court, to the Cantwells; the castles of Castle-Morres, Freynestown, Foulks-trath, and Foulks-court, to the families whose names they bear; the castles of Bishops' Lough, and Kilbline, to the family of Curry; the castles of Clomantagh, Kilrush, Tubrid, Killeshewan, and Balief, to the Shortalls; the castles of Brownsfort and Clonamery, to a subordinate branch of the Fitzgeralds; the castle of Gaulstown, to a branch of the De Burgos; the castle of Grennan, to the family of Den; that of Dysett, to the family of Bishop Berkeley, and is remarkable as that prelate's birth-place; the castles of Inchicarin, Castle-Hoyle, Earlstrath, Munshalls-court, Ballinony, Ballinlea, Ballybokan, Corbally, Castle-Gannin, Newcastle, Ballybrushin, Knockmeelan, Lismatiogue, Ballybregan, Bally-coolycey, and some others, to the Walshes; the castle of Clone, in modern times, to the Caulfields; and the castles of Courtstown, Ballylinch, and some others, to the Graces. Not a few castles, additional to all these, can still be traced, either in their partial remains, or in their well-known sites.

History.—At the partition of Leinster, in 1247, among the daughters of William, Earl of Pembroke, the central and greater part of Kilkenny was apportioned to Isabella, his third daughter, and the wife of Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester and Hertford; it afterwards passed from her to her daughter Eleanor, the wife of Hugh le Despenser; and, in 1301, the portion of it which constituted the manor of Kilkenny was sold by Thomas le Spenser, the grandson of Eleanor, to James Butler, the third Earl of Ormonde. The district of Grace's country, which comprehended the barony of Cranagh in Kilkenny, and extended into Queen's co., belonged to the family of Grace, and was originally given to their ancestor, Raymond Le Gros, one of the most distinguished of the Anglo-Norman invaders; and the great upland district of the south-west, constituting the region of the Boley or Walsh mountains, belonged to the Walshes or Welsches, originally emigrants from Wales, afterwards companions of Earl Strongbow, and eventually seneschals of the palatinate of Leinster, under the De Clares. The family of Ormonde were involved in so many and such fierce feuds with the houses of Desmond and Kildare, that, in 1494, an act of parliament was passed to abolish their war-cry and that of their antagonists, "Butler-aboo," and "Crom-aboo." The Graces also were engaged in very frequent hostilities with the Kavanaghs, the Fitzpatrick's, and other Irish families. At the rebellion of 1641, Lord Mount-Garret, a powerful member of the Butler family, backed by many others of the Butlers, headed the insurgents against government, and grasped and wielded so sudden and great a power as easily to place the most of the county on the side of the rebellion. James, Earl of Ormonde, and feudal head of the Butlers, however, adopted the royalist cause, conducted it throughout the war with statesmanlike and military skill, preserved the greater part of the vast possessions of the Butlers from confiscation, and, subsequently to the Restoration, was raised to ducal dignity, and thrice made Lord-lieutenant of Ireland. At the period of the Revolution, the adherence to the Jacobite cause was very general; and the forfeitures under the new government amounted to no less than 30,152 acres of profitable land, then estimated in value at £68,161 5s. 6d. The principal proprietors attainted were Lord Galmoy, and the families of Grace, Walsh, Fitzgerald, Archer, Rothe, Dalton, Shee, Purcell, and Lawless. The chief landowners of the present day are the Marquises of Ormonde and Lansdown, the Earls of Ossory, Carrick, Bessborough, and Courtown, Viscounts Clifden, Mount-morres, and Ashbrook, Lord Callan, Sir Edward Loftus, Bart., Sir J. Cuffe, Bart., Sir William Morres, and the families of Flood, St. George, Tighe, Bryan, Murphy, Bunbury, Walsh, Aylward, and Rothe. The proprietors of estates supposed not to exceed £2,000 in annual value, are very numerous, and form a valuable class of resident gentry.

KILKENNY,

A quondam county of a city and district of peculiar jurisdiction, usually called the Liberties of the City of Kilkenny, and situated a little north of the centre of the county of Kilkenny, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Fassauning; on the east, by Gowran; on the south, by Shillelogher; and on the west and north-west, by Cranagh. Its length, westward, is 5 miles; its breadth varies from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its area is 17,012 acres, 35 perches,—of which 102 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches are in the river Nore. The surface forms part of the north-eastern border of the great central plain of the county; and is cut into two unequal parts, first south-south-eastward, and next south-eastward, by the river Nore. The two highest grounds are both in the north, but on opposite sides of the river; and that on the east has an altitude of 387 feet above sea-level, while that on the west has an altitude of 442 feet. The limits of the county of the city were allowed by the Boundary Act to continue to be the limits of the parliamentary borough of Kilkenny; but they were reduced by the Act 3 and 4 Victoria, c. 108 and 109, to an area of only 921 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch, situated in the centre, and occupied by the actual town and immediate outskirts of Kilkenny; and the remainder, or great bulk of the district, was distributed among the baronies of Gowran, Shillelogher, and Cranagh. For greater convenience we shall, on the one hand, reserve all the statistics of the parliamentary borough to be exhibited in the article on the city, and shall, on the other hand, exhibit in successive paragraphs of the present article, all the quondam county of the city's strictly parochial topography and statistics. The parishes comprehended in the district, are those of St. Canice, St. John, St. Mary, St. Maul, and St. Patrick; and the whole of these, with the exception of St. Mary's, were dismembered by the late act. Pop. of the county of the city, in 1792, 16,000; in 1821, 23,230; in 1831, 23,741. Houses, in 1831, 4,785. Families, in 1831, employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,501; in manufactures and trade, 1,918; in other pursuits, 1,366.

Parish of St. Canice.—This parish lies partly in the municipal borough of Kilkenny, and partly in the baronies of Cranagh and Shillelogher. The borough and the Cranagh sections form the main body; and the Shillelogher section forms a detached district, situated a mile south of the nearest part of the main body, and constituting a small projecting wing of the quondam county of the city. Length of the main body south-eastward $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from half-a-mile to $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Area of the borough section, 458 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches,—of which 4 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches are in the Nore. Area of the Cranagh section, 6,003 acres, 8 perches,—of which 28 acres are in the Nore. Area of the Shillelogher section, 454 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 8,805; in 1841, 8,453. Houses 1,469. Pop., in 1841, of the borough section, 7,006; of the Cranagh section, 1,375; of the Shillelogher section, 74. Houses, in 1841, in the borough section, 1,243; in the Cranagh section, 213; in the Shillelogher section, 13. The surface lies along the west bank of the Nore, and is bounded by that river till it enters the town, and then it considerably recedes. The mean breadth of the main body, over $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile at the south end, or from a little below the northern extremity of the town, southward, is only about half-a-mile. A height on the north-west boundary has an altitude of 342 feet above sea-level; and another on the north border, near the Nore, has an altitude of 442 feet. The soil and geognosy of the lower grounds have been sufficiently noticed in the article on the county. The principal rural residences are Bonnetstown, Pansey Lodge, Richmond, St. Canice Lodge, and Rosehill; the principal hamlet is Thornback; the principal rural antiquities are the ruins of three castles and one church; and the principal objects of interest in the borough district are the county gaol, the pillar-tower, and the cathedral of St. Canice.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition very variously reported. The rectories of St. Canice, St. Maul, Ballybur, and St. Martin, constitute the benefice of St. Canice. St. Maul's adjoins the east side of St. Canice on the northern outskirts of the town; and St. Martin's and Ballybur lie respectively $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile east of the south-eastern extremity, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of the southern extremity of St. Canice. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 10,391. The benefice is entirely inappropriate in the vicars choral of St. Canice cathedral. The tithe composition is stated at £450; but the total gross income of the vicars choral, even including the tithes of Dunmore, the rents of some houses, and £45 of "duties paid to the vicars choral, by absent prebendaries, for discharging their turns of preaching," is returned in the recent report for Ecclesiastical Revenues and Patronage, at £245 1s. 10d., and the nett income at £185 1s. 10d.; yet the Commissioners remark, "that a greater income may be expected in future, especially in regard to the renewal fines, inasmuch as the tithes of the parish, held by lease under the vicars choral, are reported to have been compounded for the gross sum of £1,205 4s. 9d., although the total amount of the rent reserved on these tithes is only £135." The church of the benefice is the cathedral of the diocese, and will be noticed in next article. Attendance 180. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 5,000; and is under the care of 3 officiates. In 1834, the Protestants of the benefice amounted to 353, the Roman Catholics of the parish to 8,479, and the Roman Catholics of the benefice to 10,041; a Sunday school, held in the cathedral, was usually attended by about 60 children; a Sunday school, held in the Roman Catholic chapel, was usually attended by about 500 children; 2 pay daily schools in the parish had an average attendance of 98 children; and 6 other pay daily schools in the union and parish had on their books 239 boys and 141 girls.

Parish of St. John.—This parish is partly in the municipal borough of Kilkenny, and partly in the baronies of Gowran and Shillelogher. Length, south-south-eastward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the borough section, 262 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches,—of which 16 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches are in the river Nore. Area of the Gowran section, 5,259 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches,—of which 29 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches are in the Nore. Area of the Shillelogher section, 9 acres, 4 perches,—of which 2 roods, 2 perches are in the Nore. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,804; in 1841, 5,448. Houses 887. Pop., in 1841, of the borough section, 3,793; of the Gowran section, 1,655; of the Shillelogher section, none. Houses in the borough section, 620; in the Gowran section, 267. The surface extends chiefly along the east bank of the Nore; but is intercepted from the river, over half-a-mile by the parish of St. Maul, and passes over to the west bank of the river at the town. The highest ground is in the north, and has an altitude of 387 feet. The principal rural residences are Dunmore, Richview, Heborn, Altamont, Hermitage, Zion, and Inch; the principal hamlet is Longgate, situated in the north; the principal objects of interest in the rural districts are the ruins of two churches, Bonfadada grave-yard, a free-school, and Dunmore woollen factory; and the principal objects of interest in the town and its immediate outskirts, are a woollen factory, the union workhouse, the infantry barrack, the abbey, the parish-church, and the castle of Kilkenny.—St. John's is a vicarage in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £203 1s. 6d.; minister's money, £14. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £373 0s. 6d., and are inappropriate in the corporation of the city. The vicarages of St. John and Clarah [see CLARAH], constitute the benefice of St. John. Clarah lies to the east of St. John, and is separated from it by the intervention, to the mean breadth of about half-a-mile, of Blackrath. Pop. of the union, in 1831, 6,461. Gross income, £331 1s. 6d.; nett, £200 5s. 9d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built in 1813, at the cost of £1,246 3s. 1d.; of which £369 4s. 7½d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits; £53 16s. 11d. was lent by that Board, and £323 1s. 6½d. was contributed by private subscription. Sittings 250, attendance, about 100. The Roman Catholic chapel at Dunmore, on the north border, and in Maullin-street, in the town, have an attendance of respectively 500 and 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Rathcoole. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Clarah. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and union amounted to 314, the Roman Catholics of the parish to 5,482, and the Roman Catholics of the union to 6,153; and 14 daily schools in the union—12 of which were in the parish—had on their books 458 boys and 197 girls. One of the schools in the parish was founded by the duke of Ormonde in 1684, and receives from the Ormonde family an annuity of £140; another is a factory boarding-school, endowed with lands by Bishop Pococke; and another was an infant school, supported by church collections and an annual charity sermon. In 1840, a National school was salaried with £20, and had on its books 84 boys.

Parish of St. Mary.—This parish lies wholly in the municipal borough of Kilkenny. Length, 2 furlongs; breadth, 1 furlong; area, 65 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches,—of which 2 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches are in the river Nore. Pop., in 1831, 5,000; in 1841, 5,116. Houses 652. The surface lies on the west bank of the Nore; and is entirely urban, consisting wholly of a section of the town of Kilkenny. —St. Mary's is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Minister's money, £190 9s. 1d. Gross income, £195 9s. 1d.; nett, £149 17s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Odogh, in the dio. of Ossory, but resides in Kilkenny. An assistant curate has a salary of £75. There is no rectory or tithe composition. The church was enlarged and reslated in 1819, and received the addition of a tower and spire in 1828, by means of a loan of £1,107 13s. 10½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and of an unspecified amount of voluntary subscriptions. Sittings 700; attendance, from 250 to 500. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel has an attendance of 10,000; and is under the care of the bishop, three curates, and three assistant curates,—some of whom, however, attend also to the Convent chapel in the vicinity, and to the Clarah parochial chapel. The Convent and the Friary chapels have an attendance of respectively 100, and 2,000; and the latter is under the care of two friars. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 706 Churchmen, 7 Protestant Dissenters, and 4,706 Roman Catholics; and 12 daily schools—one of which was supported with £18 a-year from the National Board, and £50 from annual contributions, one with £100 a-year from Evans' bequest, £88 from the bishop and the dean, and £50 from annual contributions, and one by the ladies of the convent—had on their books 757 boys and 674 girls. In 1840 there were two National schools,—the one situated in Chapel-lane, attended by 214 boys, and salaried with £18,—and the other attached to the Presentation convent, attended by 60 girls, and salaried with £30.

Parish of St. Maul.—This parish lies partly in the municipal borough of Kilkenny, and partly in the barony of Gowran. Length, west by southward, 1 mile; extreme breadth, 3½ furlongs. Area of the borough section, 68 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches; of the Gowran section, 243 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,335; in 1841, 1,496. Houses 299. The west end is bounded by the Nore; and the south-west corner is the section within the borough. The only objects of interest are Newpark-lodge and a factory.—St. Maul's is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Canice, in the dio. of Ossory. [See section of this article on Parish of St. Canice.] In 1831, the Protestants amounted to 32, and the Roman Catholics to 1,303.

Parish of St. Patrick.—This parish lies partly in the municipal borough of Kilkenny, but chiefly in the barony of Shillelogher. Length, westward, 4 miles; breadth, from 5 furlongs to 2¼ miles. Area of the borough section, 65 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches; of the Shillelogher section, 4,121 acres, 14 perches,—of which 20 acres, 3 roods, 14 perches are in the Nore. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,743; in 1841, 3,112. Houses 481. Pop., in 1841, of the borough section, 1,890; of the Shillelogher section, 1,222. Houses in the two sections, respectively, 286 and 195. The Nore traces the eastern boundary, from a point about 5 furlongs below the town. The parochial surface is all low and aggregately fine. The chief rural residences are Orchardon, Clonmoran, Kilcreen-house, Kilcreen-cottage, Castle-Blunden, Seville-lodge, Castleview, Danville, Archersgrove, and Birchfield; and the principal rural antiquities are ruins of two castles.—St. Patrick's is a rectory, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £500; glebe, £45 4s. 8d. The rectories of St. Patrick and Urlingford constitute the benefice of St. Patrick, but Urlingford lies 10 miles distant, and is included in the perpetual curacy of Clomantagh [see URLINGFORD and CLOMANTAGH], and the benefice is united to the sinecure rectories of Aghavoe, Offerlane, and Rathdowney, to form the corps of the deanery of St. Canice cathedral; while the incumbent holds also the vicarage, with cure of Offerlane, and the sinecure precentorship of Waterford cathedral. Gross income of the benefice, £698 1s. 2d.; nett, £579 9s. 1d.;—but these sums are exclusive of, respectively, £1,816 3s. 11d., and £1,725 7s. 9d., arising from the sinecure rectories and from rents of lands demised as dean. A curate has a salary of £40. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 800 at one service, and from 1,100 to 1,200 at another. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 219, and the Roman Catholics to 2,540; and three pay daily schools had on their books 123 boys and 49 girls.

KILKENNY,

A post and market town, a municipal and parliamentary borough, a city, the capital of the county of Kilkenny, and the seat of the diocese of Ossory, stands on the river Nore, 5½ miles north by west of the centre of co. Kilkenny, 7½ south-east by south of Freshford, 8 north-north-east of Callan, 10 south-south-west of Castle-Comer, 10 north of Knocktopher, 19 north-north-east of Carrick-on-Suir, 23 south-south-west of Athy, 23½ north by west of Waterford, and 56½ south-west by south of Dublin.

Environs.—The country on all sides, at a little distance from the city, rarely assumes a superior character to mere prettiness, and very generally presents an appearance so commonplace as to excite neither pleasant emotions nor the opposite. The strictly urban landscape, however—or the blending of the city's own features with the scenery of its immediate outskirts and the vale and windings of the Nore—possesses great picturesqueness and a high degree of gentle beauty. "A cultivated but not an interesting country," says Mr. Inglis, "lies between Thomastown and Kilkenny; but a mile or two before entering the city, the country improves, and exhibits the appearances which usually indicate the approach to a place of some consequence. The entrance to Kilkenny is extremely imposing: one traverses no miserable suburb; but passes at once into a broad street, by a still broader highway, adorned by a double row of lofty trees, over which appear the towers of Kilkenny-castle, the residence of the Ormonde family." Both a rising ground on the south-west, on the road leading to Clonmel, and the comparatively lofty eastern bank of the Nore around Mount Brilliant, or immediately above the town, command striking and grand views of the city's superficial outline, its ruined monasteries, some of its towers, its cathedral, and its castle. "From the turrets of the castle" itself, to adopt the words of Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "there is a striking view of Kilkenny, and a magnificent prospect of the winding Nore, and the fertile valley through which it passes. One is instantly startled by the singular effect, to be witnessed nowhere else in the world, of a large assemblage of houses, with the usual chimneys, from which no smoke issues;—one of the marvels attributed to the city in the old rhyme, "Fire without smoke, earth without bog,

Water without mud, air without fog,
And streets paved with marble."

The Kilkenny coal gives no smoke; there are few bogs in the vicinity; the streets are literally paved with a black marble raised in the immediate neighbourhood; fogs are, we believe, very rare; and although the Nore is here as muddy as the Thames at Bankside, a vast number of small streams run into it that are as clear as crystal." The Nore, though in most other places running athwart meadows and other low and flat grounds, rolls beneath the shade and power of comparatively high banks as it approaches the city, maintains decided natural picturesqueness while washing the walls, and rejoices beneath bold and occasionally steep banks after it has passed away to the south. An eminence called the Eagle Rock, situated on the river about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of the city, commands an extensive and brilliant prospect of an undulated and cultivated plain, sinuously traversed by the Dinane and the Nore, richly tufted and gemmed with woods and demesnes, and finely bounded in the distance by a various perspective of hills; and immediately north of this vantage-ground are the curious and singularly interesting caves of DUNMORE: see that article.

The Interior of the City.—The Nore, while in contact with the city, and till nearly opposite the castle, flows in the direction of south by east, and then it makes a sudden bend, runs off to the east to wash a south-easterly projection of the eastern suburb, and speedily curves round to the direction of south-east. The rivulet Bregah runs about a statute mile along the south-western and western boundary-line of the municipal borough; and then suddenly deflects, and runs eastward to the Nore. The city all stands on the right bank of the Nore, and is cut by the Bregah rivulet into the two great sections of Irishtown and Englishtown, or of the more ancient and the less ancient Kilkenny; but a large suburb, fully equal in length to the whole city, yet scattered, irregular, and generally incompact, occupies the east bank of the Nore, and is connected with the city by two bridges. Irishtown on the north of the Bregah, and Englishtown on the south, though formerly regarded as distinct towns, and even possessing separate charters and corporations, are now both topographically and politically fused into each other, so as to form in the strictest sense one town; and except that each possesses remains of its originally distinctive character, and boasts as a pre-eminent feature its peculiar metropolitan edifice, the former in St. Canice cathedral on a hill or rising ground in the north, and the latter in Kilkenny-castle on a hill or rising ground in the south-east, they could not possibly be suspected by even a dabbler in Irish antiquities, who should happen to be ignorant of their particular history, to have ever been in any manner mutually distinct. The city, treated as strictly one, extends from north to south, about 1,430 yards; and, over rather more than two-thirds of that distance, measured from the northern extremity southward, it goes everywhere down to the margin of the Nore, and has a nearly uniform breadth of about 470 yards; but afterwards it is dis severed from the Nore by the small home-ground demesne of Kilkenny-castle, and thence it somewhat regularly contracts toward the south, till it terminates in a point. Exterior to the city, and forming ugly and erratic suburbs, rather than properly component parts, are 6 or 7 single and double rows of poor houses, principally cabins, wandering away upon the public roads, and pursuing totally different directions, just as if they had been expelled in lines from the various urban outlets. One great line of street traverses the interior of the city from the extreme north to the extreme south; it has various names, widths, alignments, and architectural features; yet it makes no very bold curve or salient deflection from the straight line; it constitutes, on the whole, a somewhat straight, a tolerably spacious, and a rather respectably edified thoroughfare; it attracts and enjoys by far the greater portion of the business and bustle of the city; and it bears, in successive order from north to south, the names of Vicar-street, Bull-alley, Watergate, Coal-market, High-street, Patrick-street, and Upper Patrick-street. Four principal transverse streets, straight and spacious, come down upon this great central one rectangularly from the west; and three, uncontinuous with the former, go off from it to the river,—two of these three to the bridges. The other streets and lanes of the city, though numerous, are very irregularly grouped and aligned; and, though in some instances airy and comparatively handsome, possess in general, an obscure, dingy, alley character. The eastern suburb possesses compactness only in the vicinity of the lower bridge, and over an area of about 550 yards by 130; and it everywhere else surprisingly combines dispersion and unconnectedness of parts with meanness, poverty, and even filth of construction.

Many of the domestic buildings within the compact or really urban part of the city are spacious and ornamental; and the great majority are either neat or at least respectable. The best lines of edifices, and the principal results of modern improvement, occur in Englishtown; and such of them as form the southern and south-eastern outskirts, borrow not a little consequence from the proximity of the Castle. Most of the houses are built of stone, and whitened or rough-cast; so that they compensate by cheerfulness of combined effect, for their comparative want of architectural elegance. The city and the suburbs, however, exhibit an affecting contrast. "I found the city of Kilkenny," says Mr. Inglis, "a large, well-built, beautifully-situated, and very interesting town. In fact, I scarcely know any town more interesting or more picturesque. There are many streets in Kilkenny, though only one principal one, where the best shops are situated; and although Kilkenny is not what it has been, it is still a little capital for this part of Ireland, and supplies both the surrounding gentry and the country-dealers. * * The suburbs I found more wretched than any I had yet seen in any town; pigs were by no means an universal possession; and the chief wealth of the poor seemed to be dung-heaps before their door. I do not speak in jest—the dung-heap insures a certain quantum of subsistence in this way. The con-acre system prevails; and it is usual for the possessor of the land to let it out in small patches, rent free for one season, on condition of the patch being manured by the person who takes it. The a poor man may insure to his family the produce, for a season, of as much land as he is able to put a sufficiency of manure into; so that I had now advanced a step farther, and was not only gratified by seeing a pig in a cabin, but also by the spectacle of a large dung-heap close to the door."

The Cathedral.—The cathedral church of St. Canice stands near the northern extremity of Irish-town, on a gentle eminence which commands fine views over the city and along the winding banks of the Nore. The structure is cruciform; and measures, in the clear, from east to west, 226 feet, and from north to south 123 feet. The feature of greatest antiquity belongs to the early part of the 13th century, and consists of the lancet-shaped arch, as employed in windows, and as accompanied with its usual arrangement and character of connected particulars; and the features of later date, whether produced in completing or in altering the edifice, are free from elaboration and splendour, yet combine with the pristine feature to exhibit a respectable specimen of the pointed style of architecture, and an impressive and solemn ecclesiastical fabric. The tower which rises from the intersection of the nave and transepts, is a low structure of about 37 feet square; it is sustained by four massive columns; and its floor is supported by groins, springing from the columns as from a single point, spreading out in many strings or beads, until they all meet in the centre, forming a very strong and beautiful arch. The choir, including the chancel, is 77 feet in length; the bishop's throne, the seats, and the gallery, are of varnished oak, simply sedate in character; and the great eastern window is very lofty, and is divided into three lights of the lancet form exteriorly, but each compartment finishing interiorly with a trefoil head; and it was at one time filled with such beautiful stained glass as was estimated, in the money-value of the 17th century, at £700. The nave is divided into a centre and two lateral aisles; the divisions communicating by pointed arches, which spring from plain marble pillars, abominably vulgarized by lime-wash. The side-aisles are lighted by pointed windows; and the upper part of the central division by quatrefoil windows, each placed in a clerestory. In the side-aisles and between the pillars are such numerous altar-monuments, adding strongly to the impressive effect of the architecture and lights of the nave, that a judicious writer who described most of the cathedrals and abbey churches of Britain, confesses to "have rarely seen the interior of an ecclesiastical building" which at the same time was so little indebted to architectural effort, and possessed so imperative a sway over the feelings. In the north transept are a chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, and long used as the parish-church; and the remains of a fixed stone seat, locally called the chair of St. Kieran. Many of the numerous monuments are curious as works of ancient art in various ages; but more arrest attention by the high station in life or the celebrity in society of the deceased persons whom they commemorate. The most remarkable are in the chancel, choir, and nave, are monuments of various kinds, to Richard, third Viscount Mountgarret,—to Ann Cox, grand-daughter of the Earl of Inchiquin, and wife of Michael Cox, bishop of Ossory in the 18th century,—to Dr. Pococke, bishop of Ossory, and afterwards bishop of Meath,—and to Thomas Otway, bishop of Ossory, who died in 1622-23; in the north transept and aisle, to Peter Butler, 8th Earl of Ormonde, and Margaret Fitzgerald, his countess,—and to Ellena Butler, daughter of Peter, Earl of Ormonde, and wife of Donald, Earl of Thomond; and in the south transept and aisle, to David Roth, titular bishop of Ossory in 1641,—to the first Viscount Mountgarret,—to John Grace, Baron of Courtstown, and his wife Onorina Walsh, who died in 1568,—and to Nicholas Walshe, bishop of Ossory, who died in 1585.

A current but unauthentic statement asserts that the cathedral was founded by Felix O'Dullany, bishop of Ossory, in 1180; that its choir or eastern end was consecrated by the same prelate about the year 1200; that seven successive prelates slowly added to it after O'Dullany's death in 1202; and that the last of these seven, Bishop Geoffrey St. Leger, completed the whole pile in 1280. But as no ancient documents throw light on the history of the structure, and the features and component parts of the architecture itself really constitute the only evidence, judicious artistic antiquaries refuse to allow even the oldest portions of the pile a higher date than the early part of the 14th century. Bishop Ledred, soon after the year 1318, expended large sums in embellishing the cathedral, and particularly in filling its windows with stained glass; he repaired and beautified the entire edifice, new-modelled as well as glazed all the windows, and filled the great eastern window with the costly stained-glass which we already noticed. David Hacket, who was bishop of Ossory about 200 years after Ledred, built the arch of the steeple. Oliver Cantwell, a Dominican, who succeeded to the see ten years after, considerably promoted the interests of the cathedral. John Parry, who was bishop of Ossory in 1672, furnished the steeple with a chime of six bells. Dr. Pococke, who was promoted to the see in 1756, undertook to restore the cathedral in some measure to its pristine grandeur; he repaired the entire edifice; he collected, repaired, and set up again in order, the ancient tombs and monuments that lay scattered and defaced; he new-modelled and elegantly finished the choir; and he discovered a portion of the stained-glass which once filled the great eastern window, and which had been demolished by the soldiers of Cromwell, and placed it over the western door. In 1795, the dean and chapter, by means of an advance of money which they obtained, put an entirely new roof on the great western aisle, then almost totally decayed, and executed on other parts of the building some repairs which delapidation or decay had rendered indispensable. The present dean and chapter have new-roofed the transepts, and display much care in preserving the whole pile in a state of excellent repair. The eminence on which the cathedral stands is approached from the town by a flight of black marble steps; the cemetery around it is planted; and a handsome terrace-walk on the west side commands a fine prospect of the rich circumjacent country.—We reserve an account of the diocese of Ossory to its proper alphabetical place under the word OSSORY: which see.

The Round Tower.—At the distance of 6½ feet from the end wall of the south transept of the cathedral, stands one of the unique pillar-towers of Ireland, a perfect, an interesting, and a partially peculiar specimen of its class of antiquities. "It is in a good state of preservation. Its height is 108 feet, and its circumference at the base 47 feet. The entrance facing the south, narrow and inconvenient, is 8 feet from the ground; and there still remain, firmly imbedded in the large stones that form the doorway, the remains of two strong iron hinges, very much eaten away by rust. Exclusive of this opening, there are five small apertures, rising obliquely round the wall, at regular distances from the entrance to the upper extremity of the pillar, in which are six openings of the same kind, each opposite to the other; and the circumference at top is exactly filled up by an arch, which to the eye beneath presents the appearance of a large millstone; on the margin of this a small hole has recently appeared—the effect of time. The column is surrounded by a low battlement, which seems to have been the finishing originally intended for the head. The wall at the entrance is $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet in thickness; and there are six offsets from the bottom to the top, equidistant and completely circular, each being 4 to 5 inches in depth,—so that the thickness at the top is between 12 and 18 inches. In the upper part some corbels appear, probably intended for scaffolding for the purpose of turning the arch forming the cover. The apertures at the top do not correspond with the four cardinal points, but seem principally intended to give free passage to the wind, which, thus meeting with little resistance, becomes less dangerous to the edifice at such a point of elevation."

Churches and Monasteries.]—The church of St. Mary, though a spacious building, possesses hardly one feature of architectural interest. Its predecessor exceeded it in extent, and occupied the same site.—The church of St. John, situated in St. John's-street, is simply the restored and altered church of St. John's abbey. This abbey, or rather hospital, was founded about the year 1211 or 1220, by William Marshall the Elder, Earl of Pembroke, and was well endowed by him, for the relief of indigent poor. It subsisted in considerable repute till the 31st year of Henry VIII.; and its buildings and appurtenances were then granted to the mayor and citizens of Kilkenny, to be held in mortmain. The church, as it was originally constructed, exhibited such a rapid succession of tall and slender windows as to render the intervals between them mere mullions; so that it was a continuous tissue of lights and stone framework, and obtained the rather satirical than complimentary name of the Lanthorn of Kilkenny. "For about 54 feet of the south side of the choir," says Grose, "it seems to be almost one window;" and "the eastern window is about 16 feet wide and 30 feet high, and is divided by delicate stone mullions." This curious fabric was long a mere ruin, picturesque, but dilapidated and neglected; and the greater part of the hospital and monastic buildings connected with it was demolished to make room for an infantry barrack. In 1817, the ruin of the church was renovated, and adapted to the purposes of a parochial place of worship, under the direction of Mr. Robertson, a native architect. But though the ancient walls and windows are partly worked into the renovated fabric, the delicacy of the original has unavoidably been deteriorated, and a large proportion of the windows is necessarily blocked up with stone. Connected with this church are some rude, yet highly interesting specimens of sepulchral monuments, erected in the 14th and 15th centuries, and belonging to the families of Purcel, Grace, and Butler.—The Dominican, or Black Abbey, situated in Irishtown, was founded in 1225, by William Marshall the Younger, Earl of Pembroke. It received, as a burying-place, the mortal remains of its founder, of his brother Richard, who was fatally wounded on the Curragh of Kildare, and of Bishops Hugh and Cantwell, occupants of the see of Ossory; it was the meeting-place of general chapters of the Dominican order, in 1281, 1302, 1306, and 1346; and it was given at the general dissolution, to the sovereign and citizens of Kilkenny, and was subsequently used for some time as a shire-house. The church still remains, possesses much architectural interest, and was not long ago restored, and made a Roman Catholic chapel. The structure is cruciform; and sends up, from the intersection of its limbs, a well-preserved square tower. A graduated parapet, deeply indented into the side walls, surmounts the tower, and sends aloft from its angles plain but aspiring turrets or pinnacles. The nave and the south transept consist of as beautiful pointed architecture as is any where to be seen among the old edifices of Ireland. The windows are in the graceful modification of the pointed style which prevailed in the 14th century, and are embellished round their heads with elaborate ramifications and tracery; and an end window rises from within a foot of the ground to nearly the summit of the building, and is divided by stone mullions into five compartments. Though the restoration of the church, in order to its being occupied as a Roman Catholic chapel, was designed to be so conducted that "the whole, when completed, promised to be ornamental to the city, and would, at the same time, act as a striking monument of the good feeling and liberality of the age;" yet the actual execution is so flippant and tinelly, that, to adopt the summary account of it given by Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "the gaudiness and glittering 'finery' of modern taste, are oddly and painfully mingled with the solemn grandeur of ancient state."

—The Franciscan friary, situated on the banks of the Nore, is a picturesque and beautiful ruin, easily capable of restoration. It is supposed to have been founded by Richard Marshall, Earl of Pembroke; it appears to have acquired a large amount of wealth and importance; it was the meeting-place, in 1267, of a provincial chapter of the Franciscan order; it obtained some celebrity in connection with two of its friars, John Clynm who was a curious annalist, and Thomas Fleming who was advanced to the bishopric of Leighlin; it was the scene, in 1650, of some military operations of the besieging army of Cromwell; and, at the general dissolution, it was given to the corporation of Kilkenny. The church still remains; but is unroofed, and has long been used as a tennis-court. A lofty window at the east end consists of seven narrow lights, the three of which on each side progressively increase in altitude toward the central and most aspiring compartment. A tower of light and pleasing proportions, supported by an archway with well-groined vaulting, rises from the centre of the pile, and is pierced with pointed and mullioned windows. The choir of the church seems to have been completed only in 1321, and the tower to have been built soon after 1347. Gardens, a distillery, and horse-barracks, now occupy most of the ground which constituted the friary demesne. An exquisitely limpid fountain, near the margin of the river, figures in thaumaturgic legend, and still bears the name of St. Francis' Well.

Minor Antiquities.]—"There is, perhaps, no city in Ireland," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "so full of striking, interesting, and—notwithstanding the unseemly localities in which they are, for the most part, situated—picturesque ruins, as Kilkenny. Our way was guided through numerous alleys and byelanes, to examine relics of the olden time; we found wretched hovels propped up by carved pillars; and, in several instances, discovered Gothic doorways converted into entrances to pig-sties." We cannot notice in detail any of the carved fragments of Gothic buildings to which Mr. and Mrs. Hall refer: yet we must notice, as distinctly interesting, three minor antiquities,—the present Butts cross, the quondam market cross, and the ancient city walls. The Butts cross is a small, low, rude, clumsy, antique object, surmounting a pedestal so very disproportionately large as to be better designated a piece of coarse tabular mason-work. But the ancient Butts, whose site the cross occupies, is famous as the spot at which the citizens were obliged, by statute-law, to exercise themselves at the long bow

The bull-ring, the scene of a wild and semi-barbarous sport, once famous among the Anglo-Irish, was situated near the Butts. The urban district immediately around the present cross is the most ancient part of Irishtown, and has a very crazy, care-worn, and cadaverous appearance.—The quondam market cross was erected in 1300, and was condemned by a barbarous taste, and ignominiously removed from its public site in 1771. A graduated quadrangular pedestal of five regularly decreasing stages rested on the surface of the ground, and terminated in a platform; four slender and comparatively lofty pillars rose from the angles of the platform, and a pillar of more massive proportions from its centre, and bore aloft an open cruciform pavilion; and a beautiful and soaring pillar of two stages ascended from the intersection or centre of the pavilion, and was surmounted by a Latin cross. The structure, as a whole, was light and graceful; and, had it been allowed to stand, would long have been an ornament to the city.—The wall which formerly encompassed and protected the city was commenced in 1400, by Robert Talbot, nephew of the Earl of Ormonde; and, according to Dr. Ledwich, “it began at the Earl’s old stables, not far from the Castle gate; and, making a semicircular sweep, or nearly so, ran across the end of the Coal Market, and took in the Franciscan abbey; the river Nore secured the place to the northward; so that the new town was quite enclosed.”

The Castle.—Kilkenny Castle, the seat of the Marquis of Ormonde, is delightfully situated at the south-east extremity of the compact part of English-town, and immediately adjoining the margin of the Nore. It consists of portions of an ancient fortified structure, agglomerated with buildings erected in the latter part of the 17th century; and, though abounding in incongruities, and presenting few features which are particularly worthy of detailed examination, it, on the whole, possesses a picturesque appearance, and impresses the mind with ideas of dignity and baronial splendour. Such recent and total repairs have been made upon it, too, that the traces of age are altogether lost, and the vestiges of military character totally effaced. A fortress is believed to have, in 1172, been built upon the site of the present castle, by Earl Strongbow, and to have, next year, been destroyed by Donald O’Brien, king of Limerick. In 1195, the fortress was rebuilt by William Marshall, earl of Pembroke; and, in two or three subsequent generations, it is supposed to have both received additions and retained in a thorough manner its military character. Dr. Ledwich, speaking of it as re-edified by the Earl of Pembroke, says, “The situation, in a military view, was most eligible; the ground was originally a conoid; the elliptical side abrupt and precipitous, with the rapid Nore running at its base; there the natural rampart was faced with a wall of solid masonry, 40 feet high; the other parts were defended by bastions, courtins, towers, and outworks; and on the summit, the castle was erected. The area thus enclosed, besides furnishing accommodation for the Earl and his domestics, contained caserns for a strong garrison, with their equipments.” The castle, as it now exists, occupies two sides of a quadrangle, retains three round towers of the ancient pile, and consists principally of spacious additions made by the first Duke of Ormonde, in the heavy style of architecture which prevailed on the continent of Europe at the middle of the 17th century. The last Duke of Ormonde intended to construct two sides of building, so as to render the castle a complete quadrangle; but he was hindered from his design by the series of errors and calamities which drove him from his country, and from the most splendid dignities, power, and fortune, enjoyed by any subject of the British crown. A garden spreads away from the chief front, and formerly contained a fountain and other decorations, in a style suited to the warm and steady climate of the centre or south of Italy. The apartments of the castle are very numerous, but inconvenient, and ill-adapted to the modern uses of a noble family; they rarely possess symmetry or beauty; and they are so deficient in capacity and adaptation for dignified entertainment, that one wonders how they could have accommodated two hundred guests, as they are recorded to have done, in the time of the first Duke of Ormonde. The principal state apartment, called the Presence Chamber, has a dais, or slightly raised section, on which the first Duke often sat in state. Good tapestry, most of which is believed to have been brought from the continent by the second Duke, lines several of the rooms, and has, as its principal subjects, a series of remarkable passages in the history of Decius, and allegorical representations of the four elements, with numerous accompanying objects and figures. The picture gallery is about 180 feet in length; but, in consequence of having been designed for parade and the dance more than for the judicious display of pictures, it is very disproportionate in width. The collection of paintings, particularly of portraits of the Ormonde family and of the royal race of Stuart, has long constituted one of the chief attractions of the castle; and, though somewhat impoverished by the removal of some paintings of general interest, it still challenges attentive and admiring examination. The windows of the gallery, and of several other principal apartments, command fascinating views of the city and of a great extent of the rich circumjacent country; and they happen to look out upon Kilkenny in such felicitous groupings, that the meaner parts of the town are concealed, and the finer parts, together with the picturesque public buildings, are both prominent and well combined. “The subjacent town,” says the author of the Philosophical Survey, “looks as if it had been built merely to be looked at;” and he adds: “Not Eton’s spires, not Cooper’s classic hill, not Clifden’s gay alcove, or Gloster’s gayer lodge, can furnish such a lavish variety to the landscape painter as these Hibernian scenes. There Nature has painted with her most correct pencil; here she has dashed with a more careless hand. This is the fanciful and fiery sketch of a great master; that the touched and finished work of a studious composer.” In consequence of the home-grounds of the castle being much limited by their close proximity to the city, the demesne of Dunmore, formerly a residence of the noble family of Butler, and celebrated for its connection with the Dunmore caves, is now the castle’s outfarm and deer-park. See DUNMORE.

Theobald Walter, one of the followers of Henry II., received from his master a large grant of Irish territory, and an appointment to the hereditary office of chief-butler of Ireland; and he founded the illustrious house of Ormonde, and transmitted to it as its family name his appellation of office, Boteler, Botiller, Le Botiller, or Butler. In 1315, Edmund le Botiller, in guerdon of services in opposing a Scottish invasion, was created Earl of Carrick. In 1323, James le Botiller, the son of Edmund, having married the cousin-german of Edward III., was made Earl of Ormonde; and, in 1328, obtained from the king all the rights of a palatine in the county of Tipperary,—rights which at first were intended to be personal to himself, but which afterwards were declared the property also of his heirs. James, the second Earl of Ormonde, earned from the people of Ireland the complimentary title of "James the Chaste;" and, during several years commencing with 1359, he held the office of Lord-justice of Ireland. James, the third Earl, was Lord-justice of Ireland in 1392, and at his death; and he reduced the powerful sept of the Byrnes to the condition of liegemen or federators. James, the fourth Earl, was thrice made Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, met and defeated the insurgent Irish in several smart skirmishes, and was held in such estimation by the king, that a charge of high treason brought against him by the Talbotts, was dismissed without examination, and forbidden to be renewed under pain of the royal indignation. The fifth Earl was a partisan of the House of Lancaster, and lost his head in its cause. The sixth Earl was restored to the Ormonde estates by Edward IV., and died on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. The seventh Earl died without male issue; and Sir Piers Botiller, a remote cousin, succeeded to his Irish estates,—was dislodged from them and their accompanying titles, in favour of Sir Thomas Bullen, a favourite of Henry VIII., who had married one of the daughters of the sixth Earl,—was created Earl of Ossory, after being driven from the Ormonde estates,—and was, by act of parliament, restored to these estates soon after the death of Sir Thomas Bullen. James, the ninth Earl, directed for many years the public treasury of Ireland; and, being summoned to England in consequence of a dispute with the Lord-deputy about raising a new tax, he was, with sixteen of his servants, poisoned at an entertainment at Ely House. Thomas, the tenth Earl, conducted the government of Ireland under Elizabeth, and was continued in the commission of Lieutenant-general of the army by James I.; and he was the great rival of the Earl of Leicester, and the celebrated opponent of the house of Desmond. Walter, the eleventh Earl, was only the nephew of the tenth. James, the twelfth Earl and the first and "great" Duke of Ormonde, was made a privy councillor at 25 years of age, and ran so distinguished a course that his biography fills three large volumes of Carte, and is to a very great extent identical with half a century's history of his country. James, the second Duke, received many honours and distinctions from William III. and Anne; but, being unworthily impeached in 1715 of a design to aid an attempt for restoring the Stuart dynasty, he indignantly refused to confront his accusers, retired to France, joined the party of the Pretender, suffered attainder and forfeiture, and died in exile and comparative poverty at Avignon. The Earl of Arran, the Duke's brother, was authorized, by an act of 1721, to purchase the Irish estates of his family, with the exception of the extinct palatinate of Tipperary; and, as a public decision was afterwards adopted annulling all proceedings of the English legislature against Irish dignities, he was really, yet never assumed to be, the fourteenth Earl and the third Duke of Ormonde. On his dying without male issue, the titles became legally as well as de facto extinct. In 1791, John Butler, Esq. of Garryricken, was restored by the Irish House of Lords to the earldom of Ormonde. In 1816, Walter, the second Earl of the restored patent, or the eighteenth by descent from the institution of the peerage, was created Marquis of Ormonde. In 1820, James, the brother of this Marquis, succeeded to the earldom; and, in 1825, he was advanced to the dignity of Marquis of Ormonde in the peerage of Ireland. In 1838, the second Marquis by the new patent succeeded to the dignities and estates.

"Immense possessions of this princely house," observe Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "have been, from time to time, wrested from them; although they are still very considerable. When its representative was attainted in 1715, he was distinguished by the following titles: 'The Most High, Puissant, and Noble Prince, James Butler, Duke of Ormonde, Earl of Brecknock, and Baron of Lanthony and Moore Park in England, Duke, Marquis, and Earl of Ormonde, Earl of Ossory and Carrick, Viscount Thurles, and Baron of Dingle and Arklow in Ireland, Baron of Dingwall in Scotland, hereditary lord of the regalities and governor of the county-palatine of Tipperary, and of the city, town, and county of Kilkenny, hereditary Lord Chief Butler of Ireland, Lord High Constable of England, Lord Warden and Admiral of the Cinque Ports, and Constable of Dover Castle, Lord Lieutenant of the County of Somerset, Lord Lieutenant and custos rotulorum of the County of Norfolk, High Steward of the Cities of Exeter, Bristol, and Westminster, Chancellor of the Universities of Oxford and Dublin, Colonel of the first regiment of foot-guards, and of the first regiment of horse-guards, Captain-General and Commander-in-chief of all his Majesty's forces by sea and land throughout the British dominions, or acting in conjunction with the allied powers, one of her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council in England and Ireland, Knight-Companion of the most noble order of the Garter, and Lord Lieutenant General and Governor-General of the Kingdom of Ireland.' The revenue of this great nobleman, and the estates forfeited by him in England and Ireland, have been estimated at £80,000 a-year. And in further illustration of the princely possessions of his family, it may be added, on the authority of undoubted evidence adduced by the historian Carte, that his grandfather 'the first duke's losses by the troubles of Ireland, in 1641, amounted to £868,500 16s. 9d., beyond all official profits, and every other description of remuneration afterwards received.'

The Court-house and Gaols.—The court-house occupies part of the site of Grace's Castle, contains the court-rooms, and connected offices for both the city and the county, and is a capacious handsome modern structure, designed by the architect Mr. Robertson. The castle which this pile has partly supplanted, and which belonged to the ancient and powerful family of Grace, is supposed to have been erected, previous to the year 1210, by William le Gras. "Grace's Castle," says a writer of 30 or 35 years ago, "was situated between the Marshall's Castle and the Abbey of St. Francis. It presented a front of 130 feet, and its massive outworks extended to the river Nore, where some well-cemented fragments of them are still visible." William le Gras is supposed to have erected also "the ancient tower and gateway, commonly called Grace's Gate, or Grace's Pass or Way, which formerly flanked the city walls on the west." For some notices of the family of Grace, and of their connection with the city and county, see articles COURTSTOWN, ABLES, and TULLAROAN. The City Gaol, or Tboisel, is a spacious building, but occupies a bad site, and makes no pretensions to tasteful architecture; and its capacities and adaptations for the purposes of improved prison discipline are so meagre and unimproveable, that a recent proposal was made for its affairs being merged in those of the County Gaol. In 1842 its cells were 16, its beds in other rooms 3, its average number of prisoners 25, its maximum number of prisoners 36, its total number of prisoners including debtors 220, and its total expenditure £594 5s. 6d. Even the county gaol was officially reported, in 1842, to labour under insurmountable defects of structure and accommodation, and to be so incompetent as sometimes to occasion three prisoners to be confined together in one cell, and, though unimpeachable in regularity and cleanliness, to be disgustingly and noxiously defective in ventilation. At the date of the report, however, the Grand Jury had presented for a sum abundantly sufficient so to enlarge and remodel the prison as to render it in every respect competent and unobjectionable. On the day of the public inspector's visit, the House of Correction department contained 10 prisoners, and a department assigned to lunatics contained 10 of these unhappy sufferers, who could not be accommodated in the District Asylum. In 1842, the number of cells in the gaol was 48, the number of beds in 7 other rooms 26, the average number of prisoners 90, the maximum number of prisoners 127, the total number of prisoners including debtors 553, the number of recommitals 8, and the total expenditure £1,680 18s. 2d. The Kilkenny Lunatic Asylum is supported jointly by the city and the county. The official report for 1842 says, "I cannot speak too strongly in condemnation of this institution. It would be quite impossible to maintain any proper sanatory system, or to apply any effective moral or medical treatment in such a place. There were 49 patients (25 males and 24 females) in the establishment on my inspection; of these, 21 are deemed curable, and 18 incurable; 2 are idiots, and 8 epileptic. But in a place of this description, the mild and the violent, the ferocious and the inoffensive, must be all indiscriminately mixed up together."

The College.]—The Grammar-school of Kilkenny is called by courtesy the college, and not only is a distinguished ornament and advantage to the south of Ireland, but ranks in the first class of the public schools of the empire. The present edifice was built on the site of the original one, by means of parliamentary grants to the amount of £5,064; and is a substantial modern structure of three stories, situated on low ground near the river, surrounded by a park or meadow of about three acres, and capable of accommodating 80 boarders in single beds. "A grammar-school," says Stanishurst, "was founded in the west of the church-yard by Pierce or Peter Butler, Erle of Ormond and Ossory, and his wife, the Lady Margaret Fitzgerald." In 1684, the Duke of Ormonde granted a new charter to the Grammar-school, transferred to it a school-house in John-street, with the adjacent park, endowed it with some tithes and rectories, and subjected it to a regular code of statutes. The visitors are the bishop of Ossory, Leighlin, and Ferns, and the provost of Trinity College, Dublin. In the reign of James II., the institution was made a royal college, consisting of a rector, 8 professors, and 2 scholars, and was placed under new rules, drawn up by Dr. Phelan, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Ossory; but, after the Revolution, it returned to its original character of a grammar-school, and after the attainder of the second duke of Ormonde, the right of nominating its master, which had ever previously belonged to the Ormonde family, passed to the provost and fellows of Trinity College, Dublin. Among distinguished masters of the institution may be named Dr. Edward Jones, afterwards bishop of Cloyne, and Dr. Henry Ryder, afterwards bishop of Killaloe; and among its distinguished pupils may be mentioned Swift, Congreve, Farquhar, Harris, Provost Baldwin, and Dr. Berkeley.

Other Public Buildings.]—The episcopal palace, situated in the vicinity of the cathedral, is a comparatively plain, yet a respectable and commodious residence. The original building was erected in the reign of Edward III., under the auspices of Bishop Ledrid, but is said to have been of very moderate dimensions; and it was much improved by Bishop Parry, and received its most important additions and its modern renovation from Bishop Este.—The market-house is simply the lower area of the city gaol.—The Theatre is a neat but small edifice, erected by private subscription.—St. James' Asylum is a charitable institution, founded and endowed in 1803, by Mr. James Switzer, for affording a habitation and £20 a-year to each of 12 Protestant and 8 Roman Catholic reduced widows; and, as to its accommodations, it consists of an eligible range of buildings situated in an airy and pleasant part of the suburbs. In the area before it stands an ill-executed statue of the founder.—The city possesses several private charitable foundations, chiefly of a limited kind, and some humane associations for the aid of the embarrassed and the aged.—The medical charities will be noticed in the paragraph on the Poor-law Union.—We may here point out, though not a "building," a very agreeable public promenade of the citizens: it is called "the Duke's Walk;" it extends about a mile along the banks of a canal, commenced many years ago, but never completed; it is lined with thriving and ornamental trees; and it forms a continuation of a walk, called the Mall, and conducted along the banks of the Nore, and past the base of the castle.

Trade.]—"The population of Kilkenny," says Mr. Inglis, "is about 25,000; and I am enabled to state, after the most anxious inquiry and close personal observation, that there were, at the time I visited Kilkenny, upwards of 2,000 persons totally without employment. * * The principal of the woollen factories used to support 200 men with their families; it was at 11 o'clock, a fair working hour, that I visited these mills, and how many men did I find at work? One man! And how many of the eleven wheels did I find going?—one; and that one not for the purpose of driving machinery, but to prevent it from rotting. In place of finding men occupied, I saw them in scores, like spectres, walking about, and lying about the mill. I saw immense piles of goods completed; but for which there was no sale;—I saw piles of cloth at 2s. a yard, with which a man might clothe himself from head to foot for 10s.; but there were no buyers: the poor of Kilkenny are clothed from Monmouth-street.—I saw heaps of blankets, enough to furnish every cabin in the county, and I saw every loom idle. As for the carpets which had excited the jealousy and fears of Kidderminster, not one had been made for 7 months; it was but an experiment, and had utterly failed: and just to convey some idea of the destitution of these people—when an order recently arrived for the manufacture of as many blankets for the police as would have kept the men at work a few weeks, bonfires were lighted about the country—not bonfires to communicate insurrection, but to evince joy, that a few starving men were about to earn bread to support their families." The manufacture of woollens, blankets, and coarse linens, though low and deplorably declined, is still carried on; and milling, malting, brewing, distilling, tanning, and especially the provision trade, are prominent. The principal craftsmen and traders in 1841, were 16 millers, 5 brewers, 5 distillers, 54 bakers, 18 confectioners, 3 saltsters, 9 tobacco twistlers, 7 fruiterers, 13 pig-jobbers, 3 corn-dealers, 1 seedsman, 1 butter-merchant, 14 huxters and provision dealers, 60 butchers, 39 victuallers, 23 grocers, 9 tobacconists, 1 wine-merchant, 2 wine-coopers, 9 flax-dressers, 7 carders, 1 flax-spinner, 29 wool-spinners, 40 spinners of unspecified classes, 5 factory workers, 7 winders and warpers, 15 wool-dressers, 2 cotton-weavers, 16 linen-weavers, 48 woollen weavers, 2 silk-weavers, 116 weavers of unspecified fabrics, 11 woollen manufacturers, 2 lace-manufacturers, 10 dyers, 9 clothiers, 22 cloth-finishers, 14 skimmers, 11 curriers, 5 tanners, 5 leather dressers, 104 brogue-makers, 433 boot and shoe makers, 213 tailors, 70 sempstresses, 303 dress-makers, 27 milliners, 11 staymakers, 4 combmakers, 42 knitters, 35 hatters, 57 straw-hatters, 1 cap-maker, 18 glovers, 2 wig-makers, 9 hair-dressers and barbers, 1 umbrella-maker, 1 blacking-maker, 7 hosiers, 7 haberdashers, 17 linen-draper, 16 woollen-draper, 1 silk-mercer, 15 venders of soft goods, 2 dealers in old clothes, 3 rag and bone dealers, 2 architects, 5 builders, 5 brickmakers, 33 stone-cutters, 4 bricklayers, 66 stone-masons, 52 slaters, 2 thatchers, 7 plasterers, 3 paviors, 2 quarrymen, 37 sawyers, 154 carpenters, 1 cartmaker, 27 cabinet-makers, 3 French polishers, 49 coopers, 9 turners, 13 millwrights, 4 wheelwrights, 1 pump-borer, 3 lath-splitters, 2 reed-makers, 7 card-makers, 6 brush-makers, 5 basket-makers, 5 iron-founders, 59 blacksmiths, 1 farrier, 19 whitesmiths, 41 nailers, 10 cutlers, 2 sickle-makers, 4 gunsmiths, 27 braziers and coppersmiths, 7 wire-workers, 1 bell-hanger, 3 coach-smiths, 1 japanner, 6 plumbers, 5 tinplate-workers, 1 tinker, 2 machine-makers, 7 watch-makers, 10 coach and car makers, 1 carver and gilder, 16 saddlers, 16 harness-makers, 3 whip-makers, 19 rope-makers, 15 letter-press printers, 6 bookbinders, 1 paper-stainer, 1 mat-maker, 18 chandlers and soap-boilers, 12 starch-manufacturers, 1 glue and size-maker, 2 blue-makers, 38 painters and glaziers, 4 sieve-makers, 5 upholsterers, 4 bel-lows-makers, 6 glass and china dealers, 6 booksellers and stationers, 5 coal merchants, 6 ironmongers, 11 merchants of unspecified classes, 12 brokers, 313 dealers of unspecified classes, 68 shopkeepers of unspecified classes, 96 shop assistants, and 2 tradesmen of unspecified classes. Fairs are held on Feb. 15, March 28, May 8 and 11, June 18, Aug. 17, Sept. 12 and 23, and Nov. 9. The fair in March is for cattle; and the fairs on Sept. 12 and in Nov. are for frieze. A branch of the Provincial Bank was established in 1827; branches of the Bank of Ireland, and the Agricultural and Commercial Bank, in 1835; and a branch of the National Bank, in 1836. In 1838, the public conveyances were a car to Carrick-on-Suir, a car to Castle-Comer, a car to Clonmel, a car to Cork, 3 coaches and a mail-coach to Dublin, a car to Goresbridge, a mail-car to Mount-mellick, a car to Thomastown, a mail-car to Thurles, 2 cars to Urlingford, a coach to Waterford, a coach in transit between Dublin and Clonmel, and a mail-coach in transit between Dublin and Cork. Projected railway and canal conveyances will be found noticed in the section of our article on the county entitled "Communications."

The Poor-law Union.—The Poor-law union of Kilkenny ranks as the 52d; and was declared on July 1, 1839. It all lies in co. Kilkenny; and comprehends an area of 275,825 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 114,735. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Kilkenny, 23,741; Gowran, 5,907; Shankill, 5,384; Dysert, 4,432; Castle-Comer, 14,446; Ballyragget, 5,242; Kilmadum, 3,405; Coolchraheen, 2,401; Freshford, 5,725; Aharney, 2,572; Balleen, 1,629; Urlingford, 6,925; Eirke, 3,802; Clomantagh, 3,092; Tullaroan, 3,183; Ballycallen, 1,807; Castle-Inch, 2,238; Danesfort, 2,205; Jerpoint, 2,577; Thomastown, 6,608; Blackrath, 2,663; and Powerstown, 4,030. The number of ex officio and of elected guardians is respectively 15 and 47; and of the latter, 9 are elected by Kilkenny division, 4 by Castle-Comer division, 3 by each of the divisions of Ballyragget, Urlingford, and Thomastown, 2 by each of the divisions of Gowran, Shankill, Dysert, Freshford, Eirke, Clomantagh, Jerpoint, and Powerstown, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of property rated is £242,817 5s. 9½d.; the total number of persons rated is 16,560; and of these, 1,401 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,813, not exceeding £2,—1,173, not exceeding £3,—813, not exceeding £4,—and 636, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on April 13, 1840,—to be completed on Sept. 29, 1841,—to cost £9,700 for building and completion, and £2,050 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 9 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches, purchased for £1,650,—and to contain accommodation for 1,300 persons. The date of the first admission of paupers was April 21, 1842; the total expenditure thence, till Feb. 6, 1843, was £5,105 6s. 10½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,450 3s. 7d. The medical charities within the union are an infirmary at Kilkenny; fever-hospitals at Castle-Comer, Freshford, Kilkenny and Stoneyford; and dispensaries at Kilkenny, Stoneyford, Ballyragget, Castle-Comer, Freshford, Gowran, Johnstown, Thomastown, Urlingford, and Whitegate. In 1839, the aggregate and total income of these charities consisted of £748 10s. from subscription, £1,843 4s. 10d. from public grants, and £350 18s. 2½d. from other sources,—in all, £2,942 13s. 0½d.; and their aggregate and total expenditure consisted of £1,192 19s. 11d. in salaries to medical officers, £378 5s. 11d. for medicines, and £1,661 7s. 4½d. for contingencies,—in all, £3,232 13s. 2½d. The Kilkenny infirmary is a well-managed institution, and possesses sufficient accommodation for the wants of the union; and, in 1839, it received £597 12s. 2½d., expended £770 17s. 2½d., admitted 450 intern patients, and administered to 843 extern patients. The Kilkenny fever-hospital is also a well-managed institution, and is quite sufficient for the wants of its district; and, in 1839, it received £683 6s. 7½d., expended £810 6d. 10½d., and admitted 1,203 patients. The Kilkenny dispensary is intended only for the city and liberties; and, in 1839, it received £243 1s. 2d., and expended £186 16s. 11½d. In 1842, a Loan Fund—the capital of which chiefly belonged to Christ's Hospital, and was then withdrawn to be invested in building—circulated £1,891 in 600 loans; and from the date of its foundation till that of the withdrawal of its capital, it circulated £22,905 in 7,335 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £30, which it expended for charitable purposes. In 1842, another Loan Fund had a capital of £2,462, circulated £4,471 in 1,650 loans, cleared a nett profit of £77 14s. 7d., and expended for charitable purposes £20; and from the date of its foundation, it circulated £6,936 in 2,681 loans, cleared a nett profit of £124 6s. 7d., and expended for charitable purposes £20.

Municipal Affairs.—Kilkenny has two charters of William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, in the reign of Henry III.; it has also royal charters, or affiliated documents, of 3, 8, and 49 Edward III., 4, 5, and 7 Richard II., 2 Henry IV., 7 Henry V., 5 and 19 Henry VI., 10 Henry VII., 5, 6, and 7 James I., 15 Charles I., 4 James II., and 4 George I.; and it is one of the boroughs which became affected by the 'New Rules' of 25 Charles II. The ancient borough limits, and also the existing limits of the parliamentary borough, are identical with those of the quondam county of the city; but the limits of the new municipal borough enclose an extreme space from north to south of 2,600 yards, and from east to west of 2,400 yards. The corporation, according to charter, is styled "The Mayor and Citizens of the City of Kilkenny;" it consists of a mayor, 18 aldermen, and a commonalty; it was ruled, for many years preceding municipal reform, by a select body, of whom the mayor, 6 aldermen, and 9 common councilmen constituted a quorum; and it had as its chartered officers, the mayor, a recorder, two sheriffs, two coroners, a clerk of the tholsel, 3, 4, or 5 serjeants-at-mace, a gaoler, a clerk of the peace, an indefinite number of justices of the peace, a custos rotulorum, an escheater, and an assay-master. The new municipal arrangement, while repressing the borough within the narrowed limits already stated, divides it into St. Canice Ward, including all the area north of Watkins-street, and west of the great central line of city thoroughfare, —St. Mary's Ward, including the area north of Rose Inn-street, west of the Nore, and east of the great central thoroughfare, —and East Ward, including all the city south of Watkins and Rose Inn streets, and all the suburb on the east bank of the Nore. Previous to 1825, the corporation was, in the fullest sense, a close corporation; but subsequently to 1825, it has admitted freemen in right of birth, of servitude, and of marriage; and, in 1833, the number of freemen was between 400 and 500. A court of quarter-sessions for the county of the city was regularly held before the mayor, the recorder, and the justices of the peace of the borough, and exercised a criminal jurisdiction. A court of record, called the Tholsel Court, or Court of Record of the City, was also held for the county of the city, and exercised jurisdiction to any amount. The courts of assize are held twice a-year for both the city and the county of Kilkenny. The property of the corporation was at one time extensive, but has been largely alienated in grants and leases to members of the corporation; and among ignominious leases on the rental, are twelve for ever, and three for 999 years. A considerable property in tithes arises from the parishes of Jerpoint, Tubrid, St. John's, Muckalee, Kilmodum, Skeirke, Danesfort, Clarah, Jenkins-town, and New Ross; but, in 1833, and for some time previous, this was greatly reduced in amount by default of payment. The other sources of public income are houses and customs. The total revenue from houses and lands is £830 17s. 9½d.; from tithes, £987 13s. 9½d.; and from customs, something less than £200. The expenditure in 1832, consisted of £865 18s. 2½d. of salaries, £150 10s. 6d. of rents, £72 of interest, and £243 16s. 6½d. of incidental expenses,—in all, £1,332 5s. 2½d.

Statistics.—In 1842, the number of persons committed for public offences within the county of the city, was 62; and of these, 3 were charged with offences against the person, 45 with offences against property committed without violence, and 14 with miscellaneous offences. The number convicted was 38; and of these, 7 were sentenced to transportation, 30 to imprisonment, and 1 to pay a fine. The number acquitted was 24; and of these, 14 were found not guilty on trial, 7 had no bill found against them, and 3 were not prosecuted. —On Jan. 1, 1843, the constabulary force consisted of 1 second-rate head-constable, 4 constables, 23 first-rate sub-constables, and 2 second-rate sub-constables; and the cost of maintaining this force during 1842, amounted to £1,008 1s. 2d.—The parliamentary constituency amounted, in 1835, to 657, and in Feb. 1841, to 580; and the latter consisted of 46 freeholders of £20 and upwards, 1 £10 freeholder, 55 £2 freeholders, 12 £10 and £20 leaseholders, 120 freemen, 345 householders, and 1 rent-charger.—Pop., in 1792, 16,000; in 1821, 23,230; in 1831, 23,741; in 1841, 19,071.* The following

History.—Kilkenny is fondly supposed by some antiquaries, but without any good or even tolerable reason, to have been the Iernis of Ptolemy, and the Ibernica of Richard of Cirencester. Even Dr. Ledwich becomes enthusiastic and visionary on the subject of the city's antiquity, and says, "The natives at present call Irishtown, Bally-gael-loch, or the town of the Gael on the lake. The first settlement of the Gael was along the margin of the Nore; the higher land, extending from the site of the cathedral to the castle, was covered with wood, and from this circumstance had a Celtic name Coil or Kyle-ken-ui, or the wooded head, or hill, near the river, and by the natives Cilcanuigh or Kilkenny." Yet any person contented to receive an etymology or an old fact without any fanfaronade or mystification, may easily see that the name Kil-Kenny means simply the cell or church of St. Canice or St. Kenny, and will have small difficulty in identifying the real rise of the town with the founding of its first great church, or even probably with the founding of its castle. The place was at the very outset of the English possession so strongly favoured by Earl Strongbow, and was afterwards so richly and stimulatingly encouraged by its successive, early lords, that it rapidly became one of the most important inland cities of the kingdom, and was repeatedly selected as the safest and most suitable meeting-place of parliaments and other great assemblies. Among other great and national meetings of which it was the scene, were, in 1294, an assembly of the lords of the pale, usually ranked as a parliament; in 1309, a considerably important parliament, the acts of which occur in the several editions of the Statutes of Ireland; in 1317, a meeting of Lord Roger Mortimer and the Irish nobility, to consider measures for transferred to the adjacent baronies. Pop. of these districts, in 1841, 4,354.

defeating the invasion of Edward Bruce; in 1326, a parliament; in 1327, a parliament, held by the Earl of Kildare as Lord Justice; in 1330, a parliament; in 1331, a parliament; in 1341, a parliament, memorable for the displays it afforded of prevailing jealousies between the English by birth, and the English by blood; in 1347, a parliament; in 1356, a parliament; in 1365, a parliament; in 1367, the famous parliament which was held with great splendour in the presence of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, and which enacted the celebrated Statute of Kilkenny; in 1370, a parliament; in 1374, a meeting at which Sir W. Windsor was sworn into the office of Lord-lieutenant of Ireland; in 1376, a parliament; in 1408, a parliament; in 1536, a parliament which was adjourned to Cashel; in 1601, court meetings held by the Lord-president Mountjoy; and, in 1636, assemblies on occasion of the visit of Lord-deputy Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford.

"Kilkenny," says Mr. Brewer, "participated largely in the civil wars of the 17th century. It is not practicable for us to follow the entire course of the alternate scenes of consultation and tumult which occurred here, in those disastrous years. Amongst several great assemblies then held at Kilkenny, perhaps the most important was that attended by Roman Catholic deputies from the whole of the provinces, which met in 1642. 'This assembly,' says Leland, following Carte in his Life of Ormonde, 'was formed on the plan of a parliament consisting of two houses; one composed of temporal peers and prelates, the other of representatives deputed by counties and cities. Both sat in the same chamber. Patrick Dorcey, an eminent lawyer, already distinguished by his activity in parliament, took his place bareheaded on a stool, as a substitute to the judges. Nicholas Plunket, another distinguished partisan of the recusant faction, was appointed speaker of the assembly. The lords had their place of retirement for private consultation; and Dorcey communicated their resolutions to the commons. Those of the clergy who were not admitted to sit among the lords formed a convocation.'*" In 1650, Oliver Cromwell invested Kilkenny with a considerable army. The garrison was much reduced by the ravages of the plague; but, however thin their numbers, a gallant spirit animated the defendants. Cromwell appeared before the place on the side of the Black Quarry, upon the 23d of March. Sir Walter Butler had been appointed governor of the city by Lord Castlehaven; and, on the evening of that day, he sent as his reply to Cromwell's written summons to surrender, the spirited message, 'Your letter I have received, and, in answer thereof, I am commanded to maintain this city for His Majesty, which, by the power of God, I am resolved to do.' On the following day, the assailants endeavoured to gain possession of Irish-town, but were repulsed; and, early on the morning of the 25th, their cannon opened on the castle. A breach was effected about mid-day, but the besiegers were twice beaten off, on attempting to profit by that opportunity, and the breach was quickly repaired. It is said that Cromwell, apprehending a longer resistance than suited the expedition necessary in his military plans, was on the point of quitting the place, when he received overtures from the mayor and townsmen, who offered to admit him into the city. He accordingly took possession of Irishtown, and, 'on the 27th,' writes Dr. Ledwich, 'began to break the wall of the Franciscan abbey with pick-axes, to make way for his horse and foot to enter. That post being guarded by townsmen only, they began to forsake it, when the governor gave orders to a party of horse to alight, and, leading them on, beat off the enemy, and killed most of those that were near the wall, and put an end to their efforts there; at the same time, an attempt was made to burn the gate on St. John's-bridge, but there the enemy were likewise repulsed, with the loss of many officers and soldiers. Next day Cromwell was joined by Ireton with 1,500 fresh men, and Sir Walter Butler, considering the weakness of the garrison, few in number, and those worn out for want of rest by continual watching, and hopeless of relief, determined to execute Lord Castlehaven's orders; which were, that if they were not relieved by 7 o'clock the day before, he should not for any punctilio of honour, expose the townsmen to be massacred, but make as good conditions as he could, by a timely surrender. A parley was beaten, and a cessation agreed on at 12 o'clock the next day, when the town and castle were delivered up. The articles of capitulation were highly creditable to the garrison, and it is recorded that Sir Walter Butler and his officers, when they marched out, were complimented by Cromwell, who said that they were gallant fellows, that he had lost more men in storming that place than he had in taking Drogheda, and that he should have gone without it, had it not been for the treachery of the townsmen. The first of Cromwell's high courts of justice met at Kilkenny, on the 4th of Oct., 1652; and it is a curious fact, that this court occupied the identical chambers used by the Supreme Catholic Council in 1642.'"

KILKENNY-WEST, a barony on the western border of co. Westmeath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by co. Longford; on the east, by the barony of Rathconrath; on the south, by the baronies of Clonlunan and Brawney; and on the west, by Lough Ree, which separates it from Connacht. Length, from east to west, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 37,626 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches,—of which 6,916 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches are water. The surface is generally low and fertile, and exhibits various soft, calm, and luscious scenes; and it includes several isles in Lough Ree, and there assumes a character of marked though gentle beauty.—This barony contains part of the parish of Noughaval, and the whole of the parishes of Benowen, Drumreany, and Kilkenny-West. The chief villages are Glasson and Auburn. Pop., in 1831, 11,159; in 1841, 11,272. Houses 1,983. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,624; in manufactures and trade, 303; in other pursuits, 129. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,591; who could read but not write, 910; who could neither read nor write, 2,430. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 593; who could read but not write, 1,280; who could neither read nor write, 3,137. Kilkenny-West barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Athlone. The total number of tenements valued is 1,738; and of these, 908 were valued under £5,—352, under £10,—169, under £15,—80, under £25,—45, under £25,—37, under £30,—39, under £40,—30, under £50,—and 78, at and above £50.

* * For further particulars concerning this assembly, we refer to Carte's Life of Ormonde, and to Leland's History of Ireland, vol. iii. p. 182, et seq. Concerning the building in which the assembly was held, the following particulars are derived from Mr. Tighe's Statistical Survey, and Dr. Ledwich's Essay towards a History of Kilkenny. The meeting was at the house of Mr. Robert Shee, son of Sir Richard Shee, situated in the Coal Market, and lately inhabited by Mr. Langford. The lords, prelates, and commons, sat in one room, but the lords had an upper room which served them as a place of recess for private consultation. The chamber of meeting consisted of one large hall, 49 feet by 47, with a dungeon underneath, 20 feet square, with which the hall communicated by a trap door and stone stairs. Part of the benches with high backs, and the carved oak frame of a table remain. An iron door formerly led out of the dungeon into the yard; the windows have iron bars, and are small, high, and arched. This hall is now subdivided into a kitchen, shop, and three or four rooms. The upper floor is low, with large beams, and above is a modern building."

KILKENNY-WEST, a parish in the barony of Kilkenny-West, 6 miles north-north-east of Athlone, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 10,047 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches,—of which 535 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches are in Lough Ree, and 254 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches are in Lough Makeegan and small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 3,600; in 1841, 3,489. Houses 612. The land consists of a light soil on a bed of limestone gravel. The road from Athlone to Ballymahon traverses the interior. Within the limits is the village of GLASSAN, and close on the northern boundary is the village of AUBURN: see these articles. Adjacent to the latter village is Auburn-house, the seat of Mr. Logan; and elsewhere are the mansions and villas of Waterstown, Easthill, Rosanna, Bagshot, Lakeview, Ashbrook, Harmony, Lowpark, and Little-town. Some religious establishment, of which little is known, was founded in Kilkenny-West at a very early period; and on its decay, in the 13th century, a priory or hospital for Crouched Friars was erected by the family of Dillon. The Rev. Henry Goldsmith, brother of the poet Oliver Goldsmith, was curate of Kilkenny-West. This place gives the subordinate title of Baron to the family of Dillon, Earls of Roscommon.—Kilkenny-West is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £276 18s. 5½d.; glebe, £33 8s. Gross income, £310 6s. 5½d.; nett, £235 11s. 5½d. Patron, Robert Bryan, Esq. The church is an old monastic building, altered and repaired by means of vestry assessments. Sittings 100; attendance, about 20. The Wesleyan meeting-house has an attendance of about 25. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tangin Noughaval. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 173, and the Roman Catholics to 3,436; 3 pay daily schools produced no lists of their scholars; and 3 other pay daily schools had on their books 53 boys and 25 girls. In 1838, the National Board granted £253 10s. toward the erection at Tubberclare of a school which was expected to be attended by about 700 children.

KILKERRAN BAY, the largest and most intricate of the marine waters which indent the coast of co. Galway, Connaught. It might be understood as consisting only of the long aqueous belt which extends north-north-eastward between the mainland of the barony of Ballinahinch, and the archipelago of the Moycullen islands, commencing with Lettermore; but it is usually described as embracing all that archipelago, and as therefore extending from the boundary between Ballinahinch and Moycullen on the north-west to Casleh or Costello bay on the south-east. Mr. Nimmo, in the following accurate and interesting manner, describes the basin in which it lies: "To the west of the Sillermore is a circular basin of about 10 Irish miles, penetrated in various directions by the sea, forming Kilkerran bay, and the shallow inlet of Commas, Greatman's bay or sound, Costello bay, Casheen bay or sound, &c.; and on the east, the low valley of the Costello river, which passes round to the head of the inlet of Commas. In this basin there are, exclusive of upland moor, about 14,000 acres of red bog, and about 100 lakes. The hollow appears bounded on the west by the ridge called the Knoekmordon, or the Great Brown Hill, which descends with little interruption to the shore of Kilkerran bay. The Urid group appears on the north; and on the north-east are the hills of Glentrasna, Fermeel, &c., forming the western elevated side of the Sillermore. These hills, and the whole basin, are granitic. Within the basin, the only remarkable elevations are the two lesser hills in the island of Lettermore, and the hill of Commas, south of Screeb. None of these exceeds 500 feet. The flatness of the basin may be readily perceived by attending to the singular way in which it is penetrated by the sea, though great part of these inlets are very shoal water; during the ebb, one may walk from Bealandangan into the isle of Anaghvane, and thence successively into Lettermore and Garomna. These strands are rocky, but an useful road could easily be made across them into the isles. Again, although the tide rises in springs only 12 feet, and in neaps 6 or 7, it flows up the head of Commas inlet into Lough Screeb, and even into the next above, and to the south of Commas up towards Lettermuccoo, into a lake separated only by about ¼ a mile of bog from the head of Costello bay. The inlets on both sides of Rossewack are nearly dry at spring ebbs, so that a great extent of rocky ground happens to be within limits of level very near each other. The numerous rocks and islets on the coast show that this flat granitic tract extends a considerable way. In considering the means of improving this tract, one cannot but be struck with the great extent of its navigation; from the eastern side of Costello bay to the western side of Kilkerran, only 8 miles in direct distance, there are 100 miles of sea-shore, exclusive of uninhabited islands." The inhabitants of the islands amount to about 2,500, and are chiefly employed in making kelp, and in preparing turf, for the markets of Galway and co. Clare. Important improvements have lately been effected by the Board of Works in the navigation of the pass of BEALDANGAN: see that article. Within the district of the coast-guard station of Kilkerran there are about 3,450 fishermen, who possess 130 open sail-boats, and 700 row-boats.

KILKERRANMORE, a parish, partly in the western division of East Carbery, but chiefly in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, 2½ miles south by east of Clonakilty, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 1½. Area of the Carbery section, 652 acres; of the Ibane and Barryroe section, 5,475 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1841, 2,996. Houses 484. Pop. of the Ibane and Barryroe section, in 1841, 2,679. Houses 434. The Census of 1831 places the whole parish in Ibane and Barryroe, and states the pop. at 2,575. The surface extends along the west side of Clonakilty bay, and consists in general of very good land. The coast is not only beautiful in itself, but commands fine views.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ross. Vicarial tithe composition, £262 0s. 2d.; glebe, £7 10s. The greater part of the rectorial tithes is compounded for £262 0s. 2d., and is inappropriate in Messrs. Foot and Roberts; and the lesser part is compounded for £61 6s. 5d., and is appropriate. The vicarages of Kilkerranmore and CASTLE-VENTRY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilkerranmore. Pop., in 1831, 5,049. Gross income, £399 10s. 2d.; nett, £369 16s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Carrigaline, in the dio. of Cork. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is in Castle-Ventry. The Kilkerranmore Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ross. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Castle-Ventry. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 108, and the Roman Catholics to 2,436; the Protestants of the union to 171, and the Roman Catholics to 4,894; 4 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £2 10s. from the vicar—were usually attended by about 216 children; and there were also two daily schools in Castle-Ventry.

KILKERRIL, or KILCURL, an ecclesiastical parish in the barony of Knocktopher, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of the town of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 588 acres, 1 rood, $8\frac{1}{2}$ perches. Pop., in 1831, 150. It contains the ruins of a church and of an old castle; but is now included, quoad civilia, in the parish of Knocktopher.—Kilkerril is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KNOCKTOPHER [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £25. In 1834, all the inhabitants were Roman Catholics.

KILKERRIN, a parish in the north of the barony of Tyaquin, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Newtown-Bellew, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4; area, 20,246 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches,—of which 281 acres, 12 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,022; in 1841, 5,466. Houses 968. A large amount of the surface is bog; and the remainder is for the most part light but good tillage land. The road from Ballinamore to Dunmore passes through the interior. The hamlets are East Scregg, West Scregg, Derreen, East Shankhill, West Shankhill, Milltown, Ballaghbawn, Curraghmore, Meelick, Kiltullagh, and Creggaunbeg; and the principal seats are Cappagh, Carrowleena, and Newforest,—the last the residence of James D'Arcy, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £325; glebe, £55 7s. 9d. The rectory of Kilkerrin, and the vicarages of BOYANNAGH and CLONBERN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilkerrin. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 12,247. Gross income, £485 7s. 9d.; nett, £389 4s. 6½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built about the year 1784, partly by means of a gift of £360 from the late Board of First Fruits; but, in 1837, it was so dilapidated that it could not be used. A school-house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of from 45 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapels at Kilkerrin, Mahanagh, and Larkin, have an attendance of respectively from 1,000 to 1,500, from 700 to 800, and about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also at Glanamadda in Boyannagh. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 81, and the Roman Catholics to 5,326; the Protestants of the union to 97, and the Roman Catholics to 12,891; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 25 children; 5 daily schools in the parish—one of which was supported by £40 a-year, and other advantages, from the rector—had on their books 255 boys and 97 girls; and 11 daily schools in the union had on their books 745 boys and 196 girls.

KILKEVAN, a parish, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west by north of Gorey, and partly in the barony of Ballaghkeen, but chiefly in that of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Ballaghkeen section, 641 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches; of the Gorey section, 8,887 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 2,873; of the Gorey section, 2,515. Houses in the whole, 491; in the Gorey section, 424. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 2,593; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 2,726. Tara hill occupies the south-east corner, and has an altitude of 826 feet. The rest of the surface is champaign, and declines slowly to the Irish sea. The principal hamlet is Limerick; and the chief seats are Ramsfort, Woodlands, Borleagh, and Ballinastra,—the last the residence of Sir Thomas Esmonde, Bart. The road from Dublin to Wexford passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of GOREY [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £369 4s. 7½d.; glebe, £18 9s. 3d. A small district is included in the perpetual curacy of KILNEHUR: which see. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Ballyfad and Kilmichaelogue. In 1834, the Protestants of the Kilnehue section amounted to 21, and the Roman Catholics to 73; the Protestants of the rest of the parish amounted to 184, and the Roman Catholics to 2,587; and a daily school was salaried with £25 from the National Board and £20 from subscription, and had on its books 120 boys and 80 girls.

The village of Kill stands on the road from Dublin to Carlow, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Rathcool; and is an improving place. Area, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 626; in 1841, 408. Houses 67. The north border of the South Salt section is touched by the Grand Canal.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Kildare. Vicarial tithe composition, £391 13s. 6d.; glebe, £17 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £305, and are inappropriate in the Earl of Mayo. The vicarages of Kill and WHITECHURCH, and the rectory of LYONS [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kill. Pop., in 1831, 2,930. Gross income, £563; nett, £450 17s. 1d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also three sinecure rectories in the dio. of Killaloe, the benefices which form the corps of the precentorship of Limerick cathedral, and the place of a vicar choral in the cathedrals of both Cork and Cloyne. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1822, by means of a loan of £1,846 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 80. The Roman Catholic chapels of Kill and Lyons have an attendance of respectively 800 and 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 196, and the Roman Catholics to 2,348; the Protestants of the union to 242, and the Roman Catholics to 2,771; and 7 daily schools in the union—5 of which were in the parish—had on their books 138 boys and 122 girls. One of the Kill schools was salaried with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one with £20 from subscription; and one, with £10 and a free house from the parish.

KILL, or KILL OF THE GRANGE, a parish in the half-barony of Rathdown, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Kingstown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It contains the villages of KILLINEY, and GALLOPING-GREEN: see these articles. Length, east-south-eastward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,702 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,305; in 1841, 1,912. Houses 297. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,602. Houses 241. The surface is part of the southern sea-board of Dublin bay; and it is rich in soil, beautiful in culture, powdered with villas, and exultant in scenic, vantage-grounds. The road from Dublin to Bray passes through the interior. The ruins exist of a very ancient church. The principal seats are Claremount, Clareview, Marlfield, Johnstown-house, Stoneville, Graniterald, Woodpark, Burnfield, Somerton-lodge, Belleville, Grange-house, Ruby-hall, Carrigley, Ashgrove, Bloomsbury, Holyville, Newpark, Eversham, Newtownpark, Ferney, and Walterstown.—This parish is nominally in part a grange and in part a perpetual curacy; but practically it is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of MONKSTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £99 7s. 7d.; glebe, £10 9s. 5d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £114 10s. $1\frac{1}{2}$ d., and are appropriated to the deanery of Christ-church, Dublin. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 281 Churchmen, 8 Protestant dissenters, and 1,016 Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILL, a village in the parish of Kilbarrymeaden, barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on the road from Ballylaneen to Waterford, 3 miles north-north-east of Bonmahon. KILLAGAN, a parish, partly in the barony of Upper Dunluce, but chiefly in that of Kilconway, co. Antrim, Ulster. The Kilconway section contains part of the village of CLOUGHMILLS: which see. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Dunluce section, 1,406 acres, 24 perches; of the Kilconway section, 2,431 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,451; in 1841, 1,404. Houses 246. Pop. of the Dunluce section, in 1831, 417; in 1841, 461. Houses 78. Pop. of the rural districts of the Kilconway section, in 1831, 933; in 1841, 872. Houses 154. The surface consists of part of the vales and hill-screens of the nascent river Main, and the rivulet Cloughmills; it comprises a considerable extent of bog and pasturage; and it is traversed by the road from Ballymena to Coleraine.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CONNOR [which see], in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £115. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 35 Churchmen, 808 Presbyterians, and 679 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was attended by about 100 children; and 2 daily schools were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and had on their books 73 boys and 32 girls.

KILLAGH, KILLEAGH, or MOYNENE, a parish, 2½ miles west of Oldcastle, and on the north-west border of the barony of Demifore, and of co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, from 1 to 2; area, 8,094 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches,—of which 1,161 acres, 26 perches are in Lough Sheelan, and 14 acres, 2 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 2,221; in 1841, 2,231. Houses 309. The two townlands of Crossdrum and Ross, amounting to 1,133 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches, consist of excellent land; but the other districts have almost everywhere a light soil. Crossdrum-house is the handsome seat of E. Rotherham, Esq.; and Ross, the only other mansion, stands on the shore of Lough Sheelan. The interior is watered thither by a small rivulet; and is traversed westward by the road from Oldcastle to Finea.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £203; glebe, £10. Gross income, £227 5s. 8d.; nett, £191 6s. 11d. Patron, the Crown. Previous to July 1834, the rectory formed part of the benefice of Loughcrew. The church was built in 1806, by means of a gift of £400 10s. 9d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 40 to 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 800 to 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilbride. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 98, and the Roman Catholics to 2,123; and 2 daily schools had on their books 103 boys and 52 girls.

KILLAGH, KILLOUGH, or KILLIAGH, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Delvin, 2½ miles south of Castletown-Delvin, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, ¼ of a mile; area, 2,010 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 264; in 1841, 304. Houses 51. The surface includes a considerable aggregate of bog, and elsewhere consists of arable and pasture land; and it is drained southward by an affluent of the Boyne. In the south-west corner is the mansion of Dardiestown—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILCUMNEY [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £40; glebe, £20. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILLAGHEE, a medicinal spa, in the barony of Ardes, 3 miles west of Donaghadee, co. Down, Ulster. It was in repute so far back as a century ago; but it seems never to have acquired the fame or importance of a modern watering-place.

KILLAGHIN, or KILLAHAN, a parish in the barony of Clanmaurice, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by north of Ardfer, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 4,545 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,098; in 1841, 1,876. Houses 267. The surface has a bleak appearance, and much of it is moorish or boggy. The incipient Brick effects the drainage northward; and the road from Ardfer to Listowel passes along the east.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILFLYN [which see], in the dio. of Ardfer and Aghadoe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £42, and the rectorial for £84; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Cork. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 1,170; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILLAGHTEE, KILLAGHTY, or KILLATEE, a parish on the south coast of the barony of Bannagh, 3 miles east-south-east of Killybegs, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains the village of DUNKINEELY: which see. Length, 10 miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 13,368 acres,—of which 72 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,760; in 1841, 5,803. Houses 1,039. The surface comprises the long narrow peninsula between the bays of MACSWINE and INVER [which see]; it thence climbs northward, into the highlands of Donegal, up the west side of the basin of the Inver rivulet; it consists, in the aggregate, of two-thirds of good arable and pasture land, and one-third of wild and irreclaimable mountain; and it is crossed near the middle by the road from Donegal to Killybegs. Several local objects of some interest are noticed under the word BRUCKLESS: which see. A considerable number of the parishioners are employed in the fisheries.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £260; glebe, £285 12s. Gross income, £554 12s.; nett, £474 4s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1827, by means of a loan of £1,000 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance 370. Three school-houses in different districts are also used in rotation as winter places of worship. The Wesleyan meeting-house has an attendance of 80. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killybegs. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 1,971, and the Roman Catholics to 2,884; and 7 daily schools had on their books 218 boys and 173 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £8 from subscription; one, with £2 from the rector, and £11 1s. 6d. and other advantages from Robinson's Fund; one, with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; and three, with each £8 from the London

Ladies' Hibernian Society, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society.

KILLAGHTON, or KILLALAGHTON, a parish 3 miles south-west of Aughrim, and partly in the barony of Clonmacnoon, but chiefly in that of Kilconnel, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Clonmacnoon section, 2,771 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches; of the Kilconnel section, 9,097 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,882; in 1841, 2,757. Houses 439. Pop. of the Kilconnel section, in 1841, 2,140. Houses 343. The surface consists chiefly of grazing lands, of a light and indifferent quality; it contains part of the low tableau summit-line between the basin of the Shannon and that of Galway bay; and its east end is traversed by the mail-road from Ballinasloe to Galway. The seats are Killagh, Sprucehill, Woodberry, Eastwell, and Cartron; and the hamlets are Old-Street, Loughaunnavagg, Newtown, Peak, Slihaunmore, and Cappataggle.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of AUGHRIM [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 550; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilrickill. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 51, and the Roman Catholics to 3,056; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 147 boys and 71 girls. In 1840, a National School at Cappataggle was salaried with £8, and had on its books 82 boys and 30 girls.

KILLAGHTY. See KILLAGHTEE.

KILLAGHY, a parish 4 miles south-west of Freshford, and on the western border of the barony of Cranagh, and of co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,584 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches. Pop., in 1841, 353. Houses 49. The only objects of interest are Killaghy-castle, and the ruins of the old church.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory in the dio. of Ossory. The tithes belong to J. B. Stopford, Esq. Monastic writers say that an abbey was founded here in 548, and that it was the burial-place of St. Sinchell the elder, who died at the advanced age of 130.

KILLAGHY, or KILLAHY, a parish in the barony of Knocktopher, 6 miles south of the town of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,804 acres. Pop., in 1831, 712; in 1841, 792. Houses 107. The surface consists partly of boggy and rocky ground, but chiefly of arable and pasture land. The highest ground is in the north, and has an altitude of 457 feet. The hamlets are Killaghy and Ballyhunnin. The interior is traversed by the road from Kilkenny to Waterford.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILBEACON [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £57, and the rectorial for £114; and the latter are inappropriate in the vicars choral of St. Canice cathedral. In 1834, the inhabitants of the ecclesiastical parish were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 25 boys and 5 girls.

KILLAGHY, KILLOUGHY, or KILLAGHEY, a parish $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Ballyboy, and on the southern border of the barony of Ballyboy, and of King's co., Leinster. It contains the village of MOUNTBOLUS: which see. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 18,132 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches,—of which 111 acres, 29 perches are in Lough Annagh, and 82 acres, 2 roods, 29 perches are in Lough Pallas. Pop., in 1831, 4,019; in 1841, 4,421. Houses 756. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,855; in 1841, 4,235. Houses 716. The land is very various in quality, yet all profitable. The highest ground has an altitude of 435 feet. The lake of ANNAGH [which see], lies on the southern border; and the small lake of Pallas lies between the demesne of Mountpleasant, the property of Mr. O'Connor, and the demesne of Pallas, the property of Mr. Malone. On the southern border is Annaghmore, the seat of Mr. Fox; and other seats are Rathrobin, Killooly, and Derrymore. There are three old castles. The interior of the parish is traversed by the road from Dublin to Birr.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of FIRCAL [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £66 9s. 2½d.; glebe, £627 4s. 7d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £119 19s. 11½d., and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Downshire. The church was built about the year 1818, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance, from 50 to 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,200 to 1,400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballyboy. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 204, and the Roman Catholics to 3,926; 2 pay daily schools had on their books 52 boys and 33 girls; and 3 hedge-schools produced no lists of their attendance.

KILLAGHY, co. Down. See KILLAGHEE.

KILLAHA, or KILLAGH, a parish on the south side of the barony of Magonihy, 5 miles east-south-east of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 5; area, 35,260 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,567; in 1841, 2,660. Houses 391. The surface comprises part of Glenflesk, and of the rough and lofty mountainous country, thence to the southern boundary-line of the barony. By far the greater part of it is unreclaimed bog and mountain; yet even the wild parts possess interest for at once the sportsman, the painter, and the poet. See GLENFLESK. An abbey of Killagh, assigned by some topographers to this parish, really stands in KILCOLEMAN: which see.—Killaha is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Kilgarvan, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £120, and the rectorial for £100; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilgarvan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 2,717; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and a sum not named from subscription—had on their books 147 boys and 56 girls.

KILLAHURLER, a hamlet in the parish and barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 82.

KILLAHURLER, or KILMAIN, a parish 4½ miles west of Arklow, and on the southern border of the barony of Arklow, and of co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,735 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches. Pop., in 1831, 493; in 1841, 705. Houses 116. The land is light, yet tolerably good; and mountainous ground in the south sends up summits to the altitudes of 778, 1,126, and 1,356 feet.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARKLOW [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £27 13s. 10½d., and the rectorial for £55 7s. 8½d.; and the latter are appropriated to the deanery of Christ-church. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 85, and the Roman Catholics to 414.

KILLALDRIFF, or KILLARDRY, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 2½ miles north-west of Cahir, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 5,623 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches,—of which 550 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches lie detached 3½ miles to the north-west. Pop., in 1831, 1,901; in 1841, 2,182. Houses 333. The surface lies at the entrance or expansion of the vale of the Aharlow, where the rivulet Aharlow, hitherto romantically picturesque, receives its voluminous affluent from the north, and moves away, in common-place style, to the Suir. The land, with the exception of a small portion, is of inferior quality. The chief objects of interest are Maguire's-castle, Tourven-house, and Kilmoyler-house,—the last the seat of S. O'Meagher, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CLONBRO [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £270. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Galbally. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 1,960; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 92 boys and 53 girls.

KILLALIATHAN, or KILLOLOLIHANE, a parish in the barony of Glenquin, 7½ miles south-south-east of Newcastle, and on the southern border of co. Limerick, Munster. It contains the village of BROADFORD: which see. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 4,847 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,590; in 1841, 1,903. Houses 318. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,664. Houses 271. The land is in general of an inferior quality. On the north border, 6 miles from Newcastle, stands Springfield-castle, the seat of Lord Muskerry. Near the eastern boundary passes the road from Newcastle to Mallow.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial tithe composition, £40. Gross income, £104 12s.; nett, £81 13s. 11d. Patrons, the representatives of the late John Fitzmaurice, Esq. of Springfield. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £80, and are inappropriate in John and Francis Sullivan, Esqrs. The church was built in 1812, by means of a gift of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 60; attendance, about 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Drumeckloher. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 1,640; and a pay daily school had on its books 51 boys and 16 girls.

KILLALIATHAN, baronies of Coshma and Pobblebrien. See KILLELONEHAN.

KILLALLA, a parish containing an episcopal town, on the eastern border of the barony of Tyrone, and of co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,634 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches,—of which 16 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,875; in 1841, 3,253. Houses 339. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,750; in 1841, 1,807. Houses 295. It lies upon the west side of the upper part of Killalla bay; and consists, on the whole, of pretty good land. Castlereagh, the handsome seat of John Knox, Esq., is situated in the vicinity of the town; Farmhill, the seat of Major Gardiner, is situated about 2 miles to the west; and Summerhill, the seat of Thomas Palmer, Esq., is situated about 3 miles to the north. The wretched hamlet of Palmerstown stands 2 miles north of the town, on the banks of the pretty rivulet Rathfran or Owenmore, which discharges into Rathfran creek or bay the waters of a wild, boggy district immediately west of the parish; and adjacent to the hamlet, are the ruins of Palmerstown-house, destroyed in 1798, and belonging to an extensive proprietor.

country around Killalla, Sir W. H. Palmer, Bart. of Kenmure-park, near Rush. The road from Killalla to Ballycastle and Rathlacken passes northward along the coast. Opposite the town is the island of BARTRAGH: which see.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killalla. Tithe composition and gross income, £132 0s. 10d.; nett, £121 4s. 8d. Patron, the Crown. But a portion of the tithes, compounded for £22 12s. 11d., is appropriated to the see of Killalla. The benefice of Killalla and certain sinecure rectories, constitute the corps of the deanery of Killalla cathedral. Gross income, £792 4s. 11d.; nett, £746 8s. 6½d. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kilconduff, in the dio. of Achonry, and that of Kilpatrick, in the dio. of Ferns. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is the cathedral of the diocese, and was completely repaired in 1817, by means of a loan of £1,153 16s. 11½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 120. The Wesleyan meeting-house is attended by 70, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 1,000. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 430 Churchmen, 26 Presbyterians, and 3,699 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 36 children; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £30 and other advantages worth £10 from the Board of Erasmus Smith—had on their books 207 boys and 93 girls. In 1839, the National Board granted £74 3s. 4d. toward the erection of a school which was expected to be attended by about 350 children.

KILLALLA, a post, market, and episcopal town, on the coast of the above parish, barony of Tyrrawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on gently tumulated ground, 5½ miles south of Rathlacken, 8 south-south-east of Ballycastle, 6½ north of Ballina, and 132½ north-west by west of Dublin. It exhibits at a little distance, or even in its near vicinity, a picturesque appearance, and blends with venerable groves, luxuriant meadows, fertile corn-fields, and the brilliant bay, to produce emotions which soothe and images which delight; but in its interior—though once rather neat and pleasing—it presents such an ascendancy of disorder, squalidness, and filth, as tramples down the idea of a city among thoughts of fumigations and manures. It never was a town of much business character; and it has suffered an almost total loss of such consequence as it possessed by the commercial rise and prosperity of Ballina, and by the consolidation of the see of Killalla with that of Tuam. The centre of the town is a flat-headed eminence, crowned with the cathedral and an ancient pillar-tower; and from this three streets diverge in the form of a sportsman's turn-screw,—one going southerly toward "the Acres," one westerly toward Palmerstown, and one easterly, wending by the churchyard wall, on a steep declivity to the castle, and toward Ballina. The cathedral is a small, plain structure. The pillar-tower is one of the most conspicuous of its unique class of erections. The quondam episcopal palace, and the small demesne around it are now occupied by W. J. Bourke, Esq. The only other noticeable buildings are the commodious Roman Catholic chapel, the small Methodist meeting-house, the school-house of Erasmus Smith's fund, and a few neat villas in the environs. The dispensary is within the Ballina Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 91,971 acres, with a pop of 24,584; and, in 1839-40, it expended £256 4s. 8½d., and administered to 2,050 patients. A material improvement was, a few years ago, effected in the harbour, by the construction of a dam to increase the backwater, and by opening a direct cut through the strand below, so as to increase the depth of the water at the pier. Though the export and import trade have greatly declined in favour of Ballina, they are still of importance to so poor and secluded a district as Tyrrawley. In 1835, the exports consisted of 3,901 tons of corn and meal, and 1,588 cwts. of provisions, jointly estimated at £26,396 in value; and the imports consisted principally of seeds, flax, fish, salt, coals, iron, glass, and earthenware, and were estimated in value at £3,188. During the fishing season the harbour is much frequented by fishing-boats; and about 300 persons in the town and neighbourhood are employed in the fisheries. Several shops have a tolerable retail trade in the supply of the town, and of a limited circumjacent district. Fairs are held on May 6, Aug. 17, and Nov. 8. A mail-car runs daily to Ballina. Area of the town, 39 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,125; in 1841, 1,446. Houses 244. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 113; in manufactures and trade, 122; in other pursuits, 37. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 14; on the directing of labour, 127; on their own manual labour, 128; on means not specified, 3.

On Aug. 22, 1798, the French force of 1,100 men, who were led by General Humbert, and had just debarked at Kilcummin on the west side of Killalla bay, marched with promptitude and vigour upon the town of Killalla. The garrison of the place consisted of only 50 yeomen and fencibles of the Prince of Wales' regiment; and after making a vain attempt to oppose the entrance of the French vanguard, nearly one-half, including all the officers, were made prisoners, two were shot, and the remainder died. The French were joined by so many of the Irish that they distributed in Killalla 5,500 muskets, and might have distributed many more had they possessed them; a detachment marched on Aug. 23 to BALLINA [which see]; all the French, with the exception of three officers, were concentrated in a march toward Sligo after the battle of Castlebar [see CASTLEBAR]; and the three officers who remained at Killalla, kept possession of it, with the aid of a garrison of native insurgents, till after the final defeat of General Humbert at BALLINAMUCK: see that article. On Sept. 23, a body of royal troops, 1,200 strong, advanced, with 5 pieces of artillery, to recapture the town. The rebel-garrison, about 800 or 900 strong, took post on a rising ground on the road to Ballina, under low stone walls on both sides close to the town, in such a manner as to enable them with great advantage to take aim at the assailants. They levelled their muskets, and fired with deliberation, yet killed only one man, and wounded another. Soon driven from their ill-defended post by a flanking fire; they fled in various directions, and met death on every side, furiously pursued through the town by the cavalry, intercepted at the opposite end by the Kerry militia, and exposed to the range of a cannon when they ran to the shore. About 400 were slain; the remainder were captured or dispersed; and the town was completely recovered. Dr. Stock, bishop of Killalla, his family, and the rest of the loyal inhabitants, were in the power of the French from Aug. 22 to Sept. 23; but they found the officers in the highest degree polite and generous; and the bishop afterwards wrote a narrative of the transactions, which is not less interesting for the calm and philosophical spirit of its story, than for its eulogy upon the intelligence, activity, temperance, and orderly habits of the invaders.

The bishopric of Killalla is one of those which are alleged to have been founded by St. Patrick, and respecting which tales are told of a kind too ill authenticated to be believed by any but the credulous.

St. Muredach, the alleged first bishop, is said to have been appointed about the year 440; and Kellach, the alleged second bishop, is said to have been murdered near Addergoole by his own foresters, who afterwards were torn in pieces by wild horses. Among the bishops, alleged and real, who followed, were individuals who bore the Milesian and outlandish names of O'Maelfogamair, Imar O'Ruadan, Donat O'Beoghda, Corinac O'Tarpaid, Donat O'Flagherty, and Manus Fitz-Fulagh O'Dowda. During nearly 15 years succeeding 1607, the celebrated Myler Magrath, afterwards archbishop of Cashel, held the see of Achonry in commendam with that of Killalla; and thenceforth the two sees became permanently united. Dr. John Maxwell, previously bishop of Ross in Scotland, and a conspicuous figure in the public events of his age and country, held the sees from 1640 to 1645, and was then translated to Tuam. The three sees of Tuam, Killalla, and Achonry were provisionally consolidated into one another by the Act of 3 and 4 William IV.; and they became actually consolidated in 1833, at the death of Dr. Verschoyle, the last bishop of Killalla and Achonry.

The gross amount of the episcopal income of Killalla, on an average of three years ending in 1831, was £2,600 11s. 10d.; and the nett amount was £2,046 12s. 5½d. The dignitaries, with the gross amount of income connected with their several dignities, are the dean, £772; the precentor, £417 6s. 4d.; the archdeacon, £2 10s. 1d.; the prebendary of Killanley, no emolument; the prebendary of Errew, £18 2s. 10d.; the prebendary of Ardagh, £16; the prebendary of Lacken, £4; and the prebendary of Ronsarkbeg, £3 2s. 3½d. The greatest length of the diocese from east to west, is 45 miles; its greatest breadth is 21 miles; and its area is 384,884 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches. Pop., in 1831, 135,644. Dr. Beaufort, estimating the area at 314,300 Irish acres, assigns 271,200 to the county of Mayo, and 43,100 acres to the county of Sligo. The total number of parishes is 27; of benefices, 13; of resident incumbents, 11. Tithe compositions belonging to the benefices, £4,604 8s. 8½d.; glebes, £437 3s. 4½d. Gross income, £5,041 12s. 1d.; nett, £4,349 17s. 11½d. Patron of 12 benefices, the diocesan; of 1, the Crown. Amount of appropriate tithes, £2,012 14s. 11d.; amount of inappropriate tithes, £1,487 8s. 5d. Number of stipendiary curates, 5; gross amount of their salaries, £375. Number of churches 13; sittings 4,153. Cost of building 9, enlarging 2, and repairing 1 of these churches, £13,328 9s. 3d.; of which £1,730 15s. 4½d. were gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £9,920 6s. 2d. were lent by that Board, and £1,677 7s. 8½d. were raised by parochial assessments. Number of Presbyterian meeting houses, 1; of meeting houses belonging to other bodies of Protestant dissenters, 8; of Roman Catholic chapels, 30. In 1834, the population consisted of 7,729 Churchmen, 38 Presbyterians, 139 other Protestant dissenters, and 136,383 Roman Catholics;—one benefice contained not more than 100 Churchmen, 2 not more than 200 each, 2 not more than 500 each, 6 not more than 1,000 each, and 2 not more than 2,000 each; 129 daily schools had on their books 4,690 boys and 2,696 girls, and were computed to be attended by 57 other children; 81 of the schools were supported wholly by fees, and 48 wholly or partly by endowment or subscription; and of the latter, 4 were in connection with the National Board, 1 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 3 with the Fund of Erasmus Smith, 1 with the Kildare Street Society, and 9 with the London Hibernian Society.

The Roman Catholic diocese of Killalla continues

unannexed. The number of its parishes is 23; of its parochial clergy, 21; and of its coadjutor clergy, 16. The bishop's parishes are Kilmoremoy and Backs; and the other parishes are Belmullet, Ardagh, Adragoole, Ballycrov, Ballisakerry, Castle-Connor, Crossmolina, Dumfeeny and Ballycastle, Drimard, Easkey, Glenhest and Kenagh, Kibbiam, Kilmore-Erris, Kilglass, Kilcommon-Erris, Killalla, Kilmaeshalgan, Lacken, Skreen, Moygarnoch, and Templeboy.

KILLALLA BAY, a spacious marine inlet, between the counties of Mayo and Sligo, Connaught. It enters between Kilcummin Head on the west, and Kennisharroch Point on the east; penetrates the land southward to the extent of 5½ miles; diminishes in width from 5½ to 3½ miles; and is continued 4 miles southward to mere river breadth by the narrow estuary of the Moy,—the bay and the estuary being mutually separated by the island of Bartragh and a concatenated series of sand-hills. "Killalla Bay," says Mr. Nimmo, "is nearly a square of 5 miles each way. The east side is a low water limestone shore; the west more varied and elevated, with cliffs of sandstone alternately with limestone, and has various inlets on that side of the bay. There are also several extensive rocky shoals. The bottom is a broad shallow strand, cut off by a range of sand-hills from an interior lagoon, mostly dry at low water, between Killalla and the Moy river. There are two openings across this range of sand-hills, viz. the bars of Killalla and of the Moy. The former has four feet at ordinary ebb, and on the whole is considered the safest, being protected in the west winds by the land to the westward and the rock of Carrickpadrig, &c. The bar of the Moy, after great floods, has deep water; but being more liable to shift, is not to be depended on; and in droughts of summer is often fordable. * * Most of the bay is a good turbot bank, especially between the bars; also of Trakel about August, following the sand eels which abound in those strands. Rock-fish are found at Carrickpadrig and the shoals near Rathfran; cod and ling abound under Kilcummin and the deep cliffs to the westward." The Moy, which enters the head of the bay, is navigable to within a mile of Ballina; and was a number of years ago proposed to be connected by inland navigations with the bays of Westport, Galway, and Dublin, and the estuary of the Shannon. See BALLINA and CONNAUGHT.

KILLALLON, a parish in the barony of Demesfore, 2 miles south-south-west of Crossakeel, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 7,614 acres, 24 perches,—of which 5 acres, 21 perches are in Lough Newtown. Pop., in 1831, 1,835; in 1841, 1,853. Houses 312. The surface consists of light and middle-rate limestone land; and is traversed by the road from Crossakeel to Mullingar. The demesne of Laketield lies ¾ miles south-west of Crossakeel.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £323 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £54. The rectory of Killallon and the vicarage of KILLUA [see that article], constitute the benefice of Clonallon. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 4,033. Gross income, £426 11s. 6½d.; nett, £354 18s. 4½d. Patron, the Marquis of Drogheda once, and the diocesan thrice, in every four turns. The incumbent holds also the sinecure rectory and the prebend of Lockeen, in the dio. of Killaloe. A curate has a salary of £75, and an additional allowance of £15. The church is in Killua. The Killallon and Clonmellon Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 800 and about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. L 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 67, and the Roman Catholics to 1,760; the Protestants of the union to 354, and the Roman Catholics to 3,604; a pay daily school in the parish had on its books 73 boys and 26 girls, and there were 6 daily schools in Killua.

KILLALOAN, or KILLOLOAN, a parish 2½ miles east by north of Clonmel, and partly in the barony of East Iffa and Offa, co. Tipperary, partly in the barony of Upperthird, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, southward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2. Area of the Tipperary section, 1,178 acres, 3 roods, 35 perches,—of which 24 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches are in the river Suir. Area of the Waterford section, 2,029 acres, 1 rood,—of which 19 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches are in the Suir. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 970; of the Tipperary section, 384. Houses in the whole, 133; in the Tipperary section, 51. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 950; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 1,150. Most of the surface is a fertile, beautiful, and ornate portion of the valley of the Suir; but the southern half of the Waterford section is mountainous, and contains three summits of respectively 875, 981, and 1,225 feet of altitude above sea-level. The Tipperary section contains the seats of Newtown-Nenner, and the Cottage; and the Waterford section contains the ruins of Kincor and Derryshane Castles. The road from Waterford to Clonmel passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCASH [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £37 16s. 11d.; glebe, £19 16s. 11d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £64 12s. 3d., and are impropriate in Lord Lismore. The church was built in 1827, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 45 to 80. In 1814, the Protestants amounted to 21, and the Roman Catholics to 1,182; and three daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and one with £10 and other advantages from Lady Osborne—had on their books 153 boys and 73 girls.

KILLALOE, a parish on the east border of the barony of Lower Tulla, and of co. Clare, Munster. It contains the town of Killaloe: see next article. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 10,707 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches,—of which 571 acres are in Lough Derg, and 158 acres, 31 perches are in the river Shannon. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 4,957; of the rural districts, 2,948. Houses in the whole, 722; in the rural districts, 440. Both the Census of 1831 and the Ecclesiastical Authorities include in Killaloe the parish of O'BRIEN'S-BRIDGE: which see. The parochial surface is at once varied in outline, ornate in dress, and mixedly beautiful, romantic, and powerful in character; and it consists of land which aggregately has an annual value of 26s. per plantation acre. Mr. Fraser thus succinctly notices the chief objects of local interest: "About a mile below Lough Derg, the most splendid enlargement of the Upper Shannon, and where its broad waters again assume the river character, and dash over the rapids, stands the ancient and thriving little town of Killaloe. * * In the interesting and highly picturesque vicinity, a little below the town, is Clarisford-house, the diocesan seat of the Bishops of Killaloe; and opposite to it, on the Tipperary side, Fort-Henry, Mr. White; and near it Briensfort. Above the town is Ballyvally, Mr. Parker; and opposite, Derry-castle, Mr. Head. These two seats occupy prominent and beautiful situations on the bold banks which here bound the lake. Above Derry-castle, on the slopes of the hills which skirt the shores of the lower reach of the lake from Nenagh to Killaloe are the slate quarries which have been so long and successfully worked; and on the margin of Lough Derg, about 2 miles above Derry-castle, is Castleclough, Mr. Parker. The beautiful line of road lately made by the Board of Works from Killaloe to Scariff, between the shores of Lough Derg and Slieveberagh, and round the point of Agnish, while it shows how much the pleasures, comforts, and business of the country are promoted by the application of science and practical skill to road-making, displays some of the most interesting mountain and lake scenery in this district of the island." Though some of the objects noticed in this extract are not within the parish, all blend with either its scenery or its economics. The western district of the parish is mountainous and pastoral; and sends up two heights to the altitude of, respectively, 1,353 and 1,746 feet.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Glebe, £12 7s. 6d. Gross income, £103 4s.; nett, £98 15s. 2d. Patrons, the dean and chapter of Killaloe cathedral. The tithes are compounded for £369 4s. 7½d.; and the greater portion, amounting to £295 7s. 9d., are appropriated to the economy fund of Killaloe cathedral, while the remainder, amounting to £73 16s. 11d., are appropriated as mensal tithes to the diocesan. The church of the benefice is the cathedral of the diocese. Sittings 400; attendance 200. A church, with an attached perpetual curacy, exists also at O'Brien's-Bridge. Glebe, £4 10s. Gross income, £73 15s. 1d.; nett, £71 18s. 1d. Patrons, the dean and chapter of Killaloe cathedral. The church was built in 1820, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 95. The Presbyterian meeting-house at Killaloe has an attendance of from 8 to 15. The Roman Catholic chapels at Killaloe, Garinbeg, Bridgetown, and Trough, have an attendance of, respectively, 780, 640, 960, and 300. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 405 Churchmen, 8 Presbyterians, 7 other Protestant dissenters, and 8,802 Roman Catholics; and 8 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £50 from the National Board—had on their books 299 boys and 203 girls.

KILLALOE,

A post, market, and episcopal town, in the parish of Killaloe, barony of Lower Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the right bank of the Shannon, and at the intersection of the road from Limerick to Scariff with the north road from Dublin to Ennis, 4½ miles north-north-east of O'Brien's-Bridge, 7½ south-south-east of Scariff, 12 north-north-east of Limerick, and 85½ west-south-west of Dublin.

General Description.—The town stands on a hill-side, tufted with wood, and surrounded by beautifully shaped mountains; but in itself it has an old, poor, irregular, appearance. A bridge of 19 arches connects it with the suburb of BALLINA: which see. The bridge had formerly a greater number of arches, but was deprived of some at the construction of the canal-works to connect Lough Derg with Limerick; and, while some of its existing arches are ancient, three or four in the centre, and of ample span, were built in 1825. The long lines of cabins which mainly constitute the town, are disposed partly along the higher slopes of the hill, and partly towards the new pier. Bridge-street extends 60 yards on a line with the bridge; High-street goes across the upper end of Bridge-street, and extends 210 or 220 yards somewhat parallel with the river; the Green, a spacious triangular area of about 150 yards on each side, and edified over all its outline, is situated at the head of High-street; Fish-lane, a street, or rather row of dwellings, extends 170 yards from a corner of the Green, so as to be nearly on a line with High-street, and nearly parallel with the river; the hotel, the cathedral, and the barrack, are situated within a space of about 500 square yards, chiefly unedified, and lying immediately west of the river, and south of Bridge-street and the foot of High-street; Back-lane, a line of cabins 340 or 350 yards in length, extends westward from the barrack; the Marble-mills, the Graving-dock, the Slate-yard, and the Limerick-packet station, are situated south-east of the cathedral, and from 170 to 360 yards below the bridge; and the commencement of the Lough Derg and Limerick canal, the city of Dublin steam company's station, and that company's pier, dock, graving-dock, and marl-dock, are situated 700 yards above the bridge. The Killaloe rapids of the Shannon occur partly above the bridge, and partly on its site, but chiefly below it; and they achieve a fall of 21 feet within the distance of a mile, and produce at the site of the bridge the only natural ford upon the river, between Athlone and the ocean. The stream above the bridge is partitioned and segmented by numerous eel and salmon wiers; but below the bridge, it rolls over a ledge of rocks, and, in the time of floods, exhibits all the magnificence of a grandly voluminous cataract. The canal keeps close to the river over the whole distance of its vicinity to the town; and is spanned opposite the bridge, by a single arch. Two ruinous castlets of the ante-Tudor era, occupy two small islets at the ends of the bridge, and formed the ancient defences of so important a pass across the river. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated in the centre of 'the Green;' and is a new and incomplete structure, in a very plain pointed style. The cathedral, and other old ecclesiastical buildings of Killaloe, we shall notice in the words of Mr. and Mrs. Hall, and under the sectional title of Architectural Antiquities.]—"The old cathedral is a cruciform building, surmounted in the centre by a low massive tower. The style of this structure is of a mixed character; that predominant in it is the early Gothic, but portions of it in the Romanesque indicate a higher antiquity. The history of this building informs us that it was founded (it should be, reconstructed) in 1160, by Donald O'Brien, king of Thomond; but we also find amongst the few peaceable acts of his predecessor, Brian Boromh, that he caused the church of Killaloe to be repaired—that was 146 years earlier. These statements are verified by the present appearance of the building; portions of the old church of Brian may be found in the nave, where a highly ornamented Romanesque door remains closed up—ignorantly called by some Boromh's tomb. The lancet style of the rest of the building is at once referable to the age of Donald. The whole is about 200 feet in length, the span of the roof being 50 feet. The windows are narrow lancets, splayed inwards. That of the chancel consists of three lights, the centre being round-headed; those at each side are pointed; they are surmounted by a weather cornice; at the east end angles are two straight pilaster-like buttresses. The nave is a large, void, and naked-looking space, not used for service. The north transept has been converted into a school-house, under the stair in which lay, thrown from its pedestal, the old floridly ornamented font.—In the same enclosure with the cathedral stands a still more ancient stone-roofed church. It is considerably decayed, and sadly wants the friendly assistance of the renovator. Its high-pitched roof is covered with mosses, small ferns, and shrubs, which have inserted their roots between the interstices of the stones. The dimensions of this building are not large. At the west end is a round-headed door, now walled up. The arch, which is deeply moulded, rests upon two short columns, on the capitals of which are carved figures resembling those of a baboon and an elephant. Over this, near the apex of the gable, is a small round-headed window, narrower at the arch-spring than at the base. The eastern wall also possessed an opening, as if into some lesser internal building once annexed to it; but a Gothic pointed arch, now closed up, shows that it was not of the same antiquity as the rest of the building; above this, corresponding to the round-headed window of the western wall, is one of those ancient Pelasgic lancet windows found only in the round towers, and their immediate successors—the small, early, damlings or stone churches.—On an island below the bridge, and in front of the episcopal grounds, is another stone-roofed church, which bears all the characteristics of a still higher antiquity. The stones with which it is constructed are of large size, fitted to each other in the cyclopic or polygonal manner. The door is framed of great stones, and covered in by a single lintel. It is broader at the base than at the head. To the antiquary, this building possesses, in its architectural details, a greater interest than the old church near the cathedral. It is considered to prove that, with the change of religion from paganism to Christianity, there was no change of architectural style."

Shannon Improvements.]—Killaloe is the connecting-link between the natural navigation of Lough Derg and the Upper Shannon, and the artificial navigation to the tidal and the estuarial Shannon at Limerick. The Shannon Navigation Commissioners' estimate for improvements over a distance of 85 miles above Killaloe, including costs of dredging machinery and of bridges at Banagher and Athlone, is £192,507; and their estimate for works at Killaloe itself amounted to £27,000. The chief of these works are the reduction of four arches at the Ballina end of the bridge; the substitution of these arches by three wider ones; the raising of the level of the bridge's parapet; the raising of the elevation of the road leading from the east end of the bridge; the reclamation from liability to inundation of bishop's lands lying between the river and the road to Scariff; and, chief of all, the construction of a wier, respecting which the Commissioners say: "At Killaloe, we propose to erect a wier across the river for the regulation of the waters as far as Meelick. A constant and regular water-power will thus be created, to which extensive and powerful machinery may be applied. In winter, or times of heavy rains, there will be an overflow adequate to the discharge of the superfluous waters, so as to prevent the evils arising from the overflowing of vast tracts of land adjoining the river and lake, which are inundated during the whole of the winter months, and frequently during the autumn. The wier at Killaloe, according to calculation, will be of sufficient extent to prevent these heavy floods, and to keep the waters of the river from rising over its natural banks, though there may still be short periods when very high winds, blowing in certain directions over so large an expanse of water as Lough Derg, combined with a full river, may partially impede the discharge of the waters; but the extent of the evil, and its duration, will, even under those circumstances, be much reduced, and the greater part of the lands adjoining the river will be considerably improved."

pany have their head-quarters at Killaloe; and they have recently fitted up a spacious hotel, and built new quays and extensive stores. The navigation hence to Limerick includes 29,160 feet of river and 45,764 feet of canal; its truckway is 15 British miles in length; and the number of its locks is 8 single and 3 double. In 1836, the total of passengers was 14,600; and the amount of tonnage and tolls of goods was respectively 36,018 tons and £1,514 2s. Two packet-boats for passengers ply daily; the one occupying 3½ hours and the other 2½. The former leaves Killaloe every morning at 7 o'clock for Limerick, and returns the same evening; and the latter leaves Limerick for Killaloe every morning at 6 o'clock, and returns every evening immediately on the arrival of the steamer at Killaloe. Passengers up the Shannon, either from Limerick or embarking at Killaloe, are conveyed by steam-vessels to the Grand Canal at Shannon harbour, and may proceed thence by the canal packets to Dublin. The slate quarries employ from 350 to 400 men, and annually produce from 7,000 to 10,000 tons of slates, worth £1 10s. per ton. The slates are conveyed on cars for co. Tipperary, Queen's co., and King's co.; and by boats on the Shannon Navigation and Grand and Royal Canals, for the markets respectively of Limerick and Clare, and of the centre of Ireland and the city of Dublin. Marble, brought from various places near and distant, by the Shannon Navigation, is sawed at an extensive mill, and forms an important article of trade. Manufactures of stuffs, camlets, and serges, formerly existed, but have become extinct. The wool trade is of comparatively noticeable extent; and the salmon and eel fisheries are valuable. Fairs are held on April 12, May 31, Sept. 3, and Oct. 20. A coach and a car run to Limerick; and a caravan and a mail-car run to Ennistymond and Milltown-Malbay. A dispensary in the town is within the Scariff Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 11,580; and, in 1839-40, its receipts and expenditure amounted to respectively £95 12s. and £107 18s. Area of the town, 6 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,411; in 1841, 2,009. Houses 282. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 128; in manufactures and trade, 183; in other pursuits, 78. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 17; on the directing of labour, 180; on their own manual labour, 162; on means not specified, 30.

History.—Killaloe is proved by its architectural monuments to be a town of high antiquity; and it may, with fair probability, be regarded as one of the most ancient in Ireland. Yet the recorded incidents of its history are few and meagre; and those of an early date and ecclesiastical character, are ill-authenticated or even positively fabulous. An abbey is usually said to have been founded here about the end of the 6th century by a St. Lua, whom sober writers have no hesitation in pronouncing a fictitious personage. The name Kill-lua, so far from implying the existence of such a saint, means the church or oratory upon the water, and seems to refer to the ancient ecclesiastical pile on the islet in the Shannon. The alleged original bishopric of Killaloe is pretended to have been founded by St. Lua, and to have been first occupied by a St. Flannan, who figures, in monastic story, as the son of a king, and as a subject of consecration at Rome by Pope John IV. Other alleged bishops who followed figure under the names of Carmacan O'Muilcassel, O'Gernididar, Teig O'Teigs, and other uncouth sounds, which look as if they had been invented with the sole view of sporting an incontestably Milesian origin. The sees of Roscrea and Luniscattery, for which also an early foundation is claimed, are said to have been incorporated with the see of Killaloe toward the close of the 12th century. Terence O'Brien, the alleged 28th bishop in succession from St. Flannan, was, in 1460, murdered by Brien O'Brien. In 1752, the bishopric received the annexation of the see of Kilfenora; and by the act of 3 and 4 William IV., it received the annexation of the sees of Kilmacduagh and Clonfert. The civil history of the town is little more than a record of its various destructions and re-edifications; and successively, in 1061, 1080, 1116, 1154, and 1155, the town was burned. Yet Killaloe possesses great celebrity, in consequence of having been the virtual capital of the ancient royal O'Briens, and of having had in its vicinity the residence of the famous Brian Boromh and of many of both his ancestors and successors. See KINCORA. In 1054, a bridge was erected across the Shannon at the town by Turlogh O'Brien. "We ascertain the materials of this bridge," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "from a mention of it in the Four Masters, at 1170, where it is called the 'Clar droichet Cilledalua,' the timber bridge of Killaloe. This did not outlast two centuries, as, in the beginning of the 14th century, the passage was only known by its ford, then called Clarisford, from Thomas de Clare, who had obtained possessions in the east of Clare from one of the princes of Thomond. The power of the De Clares, however, was but temporary; for about 40 years afterwards, the victorious Morrogh O'Brien 'of the Ferns,' resumed his authority over the place, and Killaloe became known again by its former denomination." The town continued till a late date to be an important military pass; and here, in 1691, Sarsfield intercepted the artillery of King William, on its way to aid the siege of Limerick.

The Diocese.—The diocese of Killaloe comprises part of no fewer than six counties,—Clare, Tipperary, King's, Galway, Limerick, and Queen's. Dr. Beaufort, who estimated the entire area of the diocese at 628,500 Irish acres, assigned 426,700 acres to co. Clare, 134,500 to co. Tipperary, 50,000 to King's co., 8,800 to co. Galway, 5,300 to co. Limerick, and 3,200 to Queen's co. The length of the diocese is 100 English miles; its breadth varies from 9 to 32 miles; and its area is 691,447 acres, 1 rood, 37½ perches. Pop., in 1831, 341,385. Number of parishes, 109; of benefices, 66; of benefices consisting of single parishes, 34; of resident incumbents, 48. Tithe compositions connected with the benefices, £20,273 3s. 9½d.; glebes, £1,297 17s. 11½d. Gross income, £22,366 12s. 10d.; nett, £19,012 1s. 11½d. Patron of 1 benefice, the Crown; of 50, the diocesan; of 4, incumbents; of 11, laymen and corporations. Appropriate tithes, £1,895 0s. 2½d.; inappropriate tithes, £3,976. Number of stipendiary curates, 27; amount of their salaries, £1,773 16s. 11½d., exclusive of additional advantages enjoyed by six. Number of churches, 57; sittings 13,770. Cost of building 40, building and repairing 3, and enlarging 5, of the churches, £47,398 8s. 1½d.,—of which £18,087 13s. 9d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £25,046 3s. 1d. was lent by that Board, £276 18s. 5½d. was raised by private donation, and £3,987 13s. 10½d. was raised by parochial assessment. Number of Protestant dissenting places of worship, 21; of Roman Catholic chapels, 111. In 1834, the population consisted of 19,149 Churchmen, 16 Presbyterians, 326 other Protestant dissenters, and 359,585 Roman Catholics;—one benefice contained not more than 20 Churchmen, 3 not more than 50 each, 8 not more than 100 each, 14 not more than 200 each, 16 not more than 500 each, 6 not more than 1,000 each, and 5 not more than 2,000 each;—332 daily schools had on their books 13,679 boys, 8,491 girls, and 143 children whose sex was not specified, and 17 other daily schools were computed to be attended by 1,139 children; 252 of the schools were supported wholly by fees, and 97 wholly or partly by endowment or subscription; and of the latter, 13 were in connection with the National Board, 5 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 3 with the Fund of Erasmus Smith, 9 with the Kildare-street Society, and 14 with the London Hibernian Society.—The gross amount of episcopal revenue, upon an average of 3 years ending in 1831, was £3,739 2s. 1d.; and the nett amount was £3,240 4s. 8d. The dignitaries, with the gross amount of income attached to their several dignities, are the dean, £399 4s. 7½d.,—the precentor, £169 14s. 9d.,—the chancellor, £235 5s.,—the treasurer, £208 5s. 3d.,—and the archdeacon, £1,035 7s. 8d.

The Roman Catholic dio. of Killaloe has no annexation. It is divided into 49 parishes, and has 48 parochial and 71 coadjutor clergymen. Its seat at a recent period was Birr, but is now Bunratty; and the bishop's residence is Deer Park, in the vicinity of Six-Mile-Bridge. The parishes, with their respective chapels, are Birr, with chapels at Birr and Carrig; Bournna, with three old chapels at places not named, and a new one at Cearagunee; Borris-o'-Kane, at Borris-o'-Kane; Killarron, at Borris-o'-Kane, Ballingarry, and Eglish; Coolderm, at Coolderm; Six-Mile-Bridge, at Six-Mile-Bridge and Kilmermy; O'Gonello, at O'Gonello; Doonbeg, at Kildee, Lisdeen, and Doonbeg; Quin, at Quin and Clooney; Inagh, at Inagh and Kilnamona; Dysert, at Dysert and Ruan; Broadford, at Broadford, Glanamara, and Kilmore; Mountsea, at Mountsea and another locality; Tulla, at Tulla and Drunchary; Cloghardon, at Cloghardon and two other places; Carrigaholt, at Carrigaholt, Cross, and Donaha; Newmarket, at Newmarket, Kilmadeery, and Bunratty; Clonrush, at Clonrush and Mountstamon; Shirrone, at Shirrone and Bresna; Kilnichael, at Kilnichael and Coonclare; Killeen, at Killeen and Otway; Kilrush, at Kilrush, Killiny, and Mea; Kilmealy, at Inch, Kilmealy, and Incur; Doonas, at Doonas and Inragh; Toomavara, at Toomavara and Grenagetown; Doorra, at Doorra and Kilrachtish; Crusheen, at Crusheen and Meelick; Newport, at Portroe; Feacle, at Feacle, Fluginvant, and two other places; Silvermines, at Silvermines; Milltown-Malbay, at Milltown and Mullagh; Dunkerrin, at Moneygall, Dunkerrin, and another place; Kilkeady, at Kilkeady and Tubbar; Nenagh, at Nenagh; Clare, at Clare and Ballyca; Ballinacally, at Ballinacally and Kilchrist; Roscrea, at Roscrea and another place; Ennis, at Ennis; Scariff, at Scariff and another place; Kilmurry-Macmahon, at Kilmurry—Macmahon, and Rhine; Doorharra, at Youghal and Bruges; Castleconnel, at Castleconnel and Ahane; Kildysert, at Kildysert, Coolmeen, and another place; Lorrha, at Lorrha and Rathcavan; Toomgreary, at Toomgreary and Boedicke; Kilkissen, at Kilkissen, Oatfield, and O'Callaghan's Mills; Kenetty, at Kenetty, Layford, and another place; Killaloe, at Killaloe, Garronboy, and Bridgetown; and Corrofin, at Corrofin, Kilnaboy, and Rath.

KILLALOE, or GRANGOOLY, a parish, partly in the baronies of Callan and Cranagh, but chiefly in that of Shillelogher, 2 miles north of Callan, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 3½ miles. Area of the Callan section, 19 acres, 9 perches; of the Cranagh section, 489 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches; of the Shillelogher section, 4,926 acres, 32 perches. The Callan section is uninhabited. Pop., in 1841, of the Cranagh section, 114; of the Shillelogher section, 1,310. Houses in the Cranagh section, 17; in the Shillelogher section, 197. The Census of 1831 places the whole parish in Shillelogher, and states the pop. at 1,274. The surface is watered by the King's River; consists in general of very good land, and is embellished with the mansion-grounds of Whitehouse and Sootborough, and part of the demesne of Desert-Court.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CALLAN [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £374 9s. 10d.; glebe, £11. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Ballycallan and Kilmanagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 56, and the Roman Catholics to 1,258; a Sunday-school was usually attended by about 55 children; and 2 daily schools—one of which received 20 free scholars, and was salaried with £15 from the Countess of Dysert and the Rev. Mr. Morris—had on their books 157 boys and 100 girls.

KILLALOGUE, or ST. DOOLOGUE, a small parish in the barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. It lies in the town of Wexford, and has an area of only 4 acres. Pop., in 1841, 248. Houses 47.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Patrick of Wexford, in the dio. of Ferns. It is tithe-free. A small glebe, now built upon, and belonging to the parishes of Killalogue, St. Mary, and St. Selskar, is valued at £19 14s. 9d. a-year.

KILLALONE. See KILLALOAN.

KILLAMEEN. See KILMEEN.

KILLAMERY, a parish in the barony of Kells, 4½ miles south-south-west of Callan, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains the village of WINDGAR; which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,525 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,837; in 1841, 1,965. Houses 209. The surface consists for the most part of indifferent land; and is traversed by the Dublin and Cork mail-road. Credulous story-tellers say that St. Gebban presided over 1,000 monks in Killamery.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £280; glebe, £3 19s. Gross income, £283 19s.; nett, £232 10s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 100; attendance 17. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tullabought. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 66, and the Roman Catholics to 1,968; and 3 daily schools—two of which received small aids from respectively Lord Ormond and the rector—had on their books 99 boys and 71 girls. In 1841, the Killamery Loan Fund had a capital of £110, and circulated £305 in 226 loans.

KILLAN, a parish in the north corner of the barony of Bantry, and on the west border of county Wexford, 7 miles west of Enniscorthy, Leinster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4; area, 11,424 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,837; in 1841, 3,193. Houses 507. The surface is prevalingly mountainous, and is drained eastward by the incipient rivulet Boro. Some of the land is let at 9s. per acre; and the whole averages 18s. The Blackstairs mountains send up summits on the western border to the altitude of 1,320 and 2,400 feet. The road from Newtownbarry to New Ross traverses the interior, and passes the hamlet of Killan at 2½ miles from Killyteely. Near this road, and within the parish, are Mr. Blacker's seat of Woodbrook, and Mr. Richard's seat of Grange.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £447 3s. 7d.; glebe, £37. Gross income, £484 3s. 7d.; nett, £412 13s. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7d. The church was built in 1832, at the cost of £1,330; of which £1,200 was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 140. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Cloughbown in the parish of Chapel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 408, and the Roman Catholics to 2,491; and 6 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £21 from subscription—were usually attended by about 307 children.

KILLAN, a village in the barony of Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands 8 miles north by east of Kesh, on the road from Enniskillen to Londonderry.

KILLAN, co. Cavan. See SHERCOCK.

KILLANCOOLY, a parish on the coast of the barony of Ballaghkeen, 3½ miles east-north-east of Oulart, co. Wexford, Leinster. It contains part of the village of FOND: which see. Area, 4,430 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,204; in 1841, 1,293. Houses 221. It consists of 4 mutually detached districts, two of which lie east of the main body, and one lies south-east and on the coast. The main body is adorned with the demesne of Wells.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Six townlands, which contained, in 1834, the whole of the Protestant population, are united to Kilnemanagh, for church rates, under 4 Geo. IV., c. 36, s. 5; and the spiritual duties of these townlands are gratuitously performed by the rector of Kilnemanagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 121, and the Roman Catholics to 1,107; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILLANE, KILLAN, or KILLIANE, a parish partly in the barony of Loughrea, but chiefly in that of Kilconnel, 4 miles south-west of the town of Kilconnel, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Loughrea section, 1,466 acres, 12 perches; of the Kilconnel section, 6,400 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,317; in 1841, 1,318. Houses 221. Pop. of the Kilconnel section, in 1841, 1,239. Houses 209. The ecclesiastical parish is much more extensive than the civil one, and had, in 1831, a pop. of 2,302. The surface is drained westward by the nascent river Carnamart, and traversed in the same direction by the old road from Ballinasloe to Galway. On the north side of that road, at 3 miles from Kilconnel, is Woodlawn, the well-wooded demesne of John Trench, Esq.; and elsewhere are the residences of Ashbrook, Rathglass, and Killane. Archdall, with ludicrous credulity, says that St. Maccetus of the church of Killane, anciently Killoebhain, was smith to St. Patrick, and made the famous relic called Finnfaidheach.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILCONNEL [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £68 6s. 1½d.; glebe, £6. But the greater part of the tithes, compounded for £81 15s. 3½d., are appropriated to the diocesan and the sacrist of Clonfert, and to the vicar choral of Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Bullane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 2,519; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and £26 from Lord Ash-town—were attended on the average by 133 children. The Killane dispensary is within the Ballinasloe Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 4,611 acres, with a pop. of 11,087; and, in 1839—

40, it expended £144 13s. 7d., and administered to 1,509 patients.

KILLANEAR, or KILNANARE, a parish in the barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, Munster. It adjoins KILCOLEMAN: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,138 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,766; in 1841, 1,745. Houses 295. The land is for the most part arable.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £92 6s. 1½d.; nett, £87 8s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kilcoleman, in the dio. of Ardfert, and that of Templebredin, in the dio. of Emly. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £92 6s. 1½d., and are appropriated to the deanery of Ardfert. There is neither church nor chapel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 1,862; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with from £10 to £15 from subscription—had on their books 95 boys and 30 girls.

KILLANEY, or KILLEANY, a village, a bay, and a harbour, near the east end of the island of Arranmore, barony of Arran, co. Galway, Connaught. The inhabitants of the village are wretchedly poor. The bay is only spacious enough to be called a cove, and opens almost immediately north-west of Gregory's Sound. The harbour consists of a landing quay 360 feet in length, and a pier 245 feet in length. Mr. Donnell said, respecting the harbour, in 1826, "Exclusive of immediate accommodation to the islanders, who are nearly all fishermen, its position in the centre of the mouth of Galway bay renders it of first-rate importance for promoting the great fishery of that district; and the only question now is, whether the work will be found sufficiently extensive to afford shelter to the numerous craft resorting thither from all parts of the opposite coasts, in addition to the craft of the island." In 1833, the harbour was frequented by 39 hookers, which gave employment exclusively in fishing to about 350 persons; and it was a shipping place for large quantities of sea-manure for the seaboard of Clare and Galway. Killaney is a coast-guard station. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 604. Houses 121. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 36; in manufactures and trade, 86; in other pursuits, 11. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1; on the directing of labour, 6; on their own manual labour, 117; on means not specified, 9.

KILLANEY, a parish partly in the barony of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster, but chiefly in the barony of Farney, co. Monaghan, Ulster. It is situated 2½ miles east-north-east of Carrickmacross, and 4 west of Louth. Length and breadth, each 3 miles. Area of the Leinster section, 1,939 acres, 27 perches,—of which 167 acres, 3 roods lie detached in Essexford townland. Area of the Ulster section, 5,188 acres, 19 perches,—of which 106 acres, 20 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,823; in 1841, 4,896. Houses 848. Pop. of the Ulster section, in 1831, 3,399; in 1841, 3,512. Houses 607. The surface consists variously of arable grounds, meadows, pasture-lands, and bogs; and is drained south-eastward by the nascent Glyde, and a small affluent of the Fane. The Ulster section contains a large tract of bog to the south and east, twelve small lakes, and part of one large lake, which contracts at the centre, so as to be spanned by a bridge on the old road to Ardee. The principal seats are Monalty, Ballymacknay, and Aghafad,—the first, the residence of Mr. Gartland; and near Monalty are Ballymacknay house and village, and the site of the parish-church. The Rev. Sir Harcour Lees, Bart., the well-known political writer, was inducted into the incumbency of Killaney in 1800, and thenceforth continued to hold it.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £461 10s. 9½d.; glebe, £182 14s. 4d. Gross income, £644 5s. 1½d.; nett, £573 18s. 5½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £90. The church was partially rebuilt and entirely new-roofed in 1789. Sittings 80; attendance 27. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 800 and 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 56, and the Roman Catholics to 4,911; a Protestant Sunday school was attended by about 6 children; and 5 hedge-schools had on their books 172 boys and 97 girls.

KILLANEY, or KILLENEY, a parish in the barony of Upper Castlereagh, 4 miles west of Saintfield, co. Down, Ulster. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 2,859 acres, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,298; in 1841, 1,236. Houses 219. The surface consists of prime land; and is traversed by the road from Lisburn to Ballinahinch.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £85; nett, £59 13s. Patron, the Marquis of Downshire. The rectorial tithes are believed to have merged in the rent payable to Lord Downshire, as proprietor of the soil. A school-house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 30; and the Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 852. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 70 Churchmen, 33 Presbyterians, and 1,222 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 100 children; and 3 daily schools—one of which was in connection with the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 75 boys and 67 girls.

KILLANIN, a parish in the barony of Moycullen, 8½ miles north-west of Galway, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 18 miles; breadth, 9; area, 71,463 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches,—of which 4,307 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches are in Lough Corrib, and 2,875 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 8,967; in 1841, 11,278. Houses 1,920. A district of it, called Carringtonagh, contains eight villages which, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Keerawn, 249; Keerawn-Beg, 116; Keerawn-More, 132; Bauraderra, 75; Curryglass, 27; Glanavada, 77; Point, 98; and Clynagh, 254. The surface extends westward from Lough Corrib to the Atlantic; and comprises all the central or middle part of Iar-Connaught, with the islands of Garomna and Lettermore, and a large portion of the intricate basin of Kilkerran. See CUNNEMARA and KILKERRAN. The land inward from Kilkerran basin, and eastward to the limestone district of Lough Corrib, is nearly all a wilderness of hilly moors and bogs, bleak, repulsive, and unprofitable; but the land in the east, though much broken and tossed by protrusions of naked rock, is aggregately fertile, and exhibits pleasing scenes of beauty, and even of romance. Ross, the handsomely wooded and well-kept demesne of James Martin, Esq., is situated in the east, and derives a charming and remarkable feature from the lake of Ross, which lies detached from Lough Corrib. The road from Galway to Clifden passes near Ross, and generally along the east.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLINAKILL [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £45; and the latter are inappropriate in Thomas Martin, Esq., of Ballinahinch. Killanin is separated from the other mainland members of Ballinakill benefice, by the sea at Moyrus and by the parish of Kilcommon. The Roman Catholic chapel at Clynagh is attended by from 300 to 800; that at Ross, by from 400 to 800; and that at Tully, by from 200 to 800,—and private houses are used as Roman Catholic chapels in Rossmuck, Lettermore, and Lettermullin. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 94, and the Roman Catholics to 9,528; and 4 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 143 children.

KILLANLEY, a prebend in the cathedral of Killalla, and see-lands in the parish of Castle-Connor and barony of Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. The prebend takes name from the see-lands, but is altogether honorary, having neither duty nor emolument.

KILLANULLY, or KILLINGLEY, a parish 5 miles south-south-east of Cork, and partly in the barony of Cork, but chiefly in that of Kerrycurrihy, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the barony of Cork section, 951 acres; of the Kerrycurrihy section, 1,105 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 631; in 1841, 577. Houses 89. Pop. of the Kerrycurrihy section, in 1831, 359; in 1841, 352. Houses 52. The surface is part of the north side of the vale of the Annabuoy river; and consists, for the most part, of prime land.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £170; glebe, £7 10s. Gross income, £177 10s.; nett, £126 14s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. A school-house, built by W. H. Newcomen, Esq., of Coolmore, is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 70. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 36, and the Roman Catholics to 614; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 20 children; and a daily school was salaried with £20 from Mr. Newnham, and had on its books 36 boys and 13 girls.

KILLANUMERY. See KILLENUMERY.

KILLANY. See KILLANEY.

KILLARAGHT, a parish at the southern extremity of the barony of Coolavin, and of co. Sligo, Connaught. It lies along the east side of Lough Gara, 4 miles south-west of Boyle. Length and breadth, each 5 miles; area, 9,331 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches,—of which 2,429 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches are in Lough Gara, and 7 acres, 1 rood, 27 perches are in Loughanboy. Pop., in 1831, 1,986; in 1841, 2,229. Houses 379. The arable land is excellent. The scenic character of the surface is noticed in the article GARA: which see. “St. Patrick,” says the dreaming Archdall, “built a nunnery here for St. Athratta, sister to St. Coeman; she received the veil from the hands of St. Patrick, A. D. 470.”—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Achery. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £93 10s. 8½d., and the rectorial for £56 9s. 3½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Lord Lorton. The vicarages of Killaraght, KILFREE, and KILSHALVEE [see these articles], constitute the benefice and prebend of Killaraght. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 9,123. Gross income, £406 5s. 8d.; nett, £373 9s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is situated in Kilfree. The Killaraght Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300; and there are Roman Catholic chapels also in Kilfree and Kilshalvee. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 34, and the Roman Catholics to 2,062; the Protestants of the union to 272, and the Roman Catholics to 9,312; a hedge-school in the parish had on its books 64 boys and 24 girls; and 11 daily schools in the union had 434 boys and 218 girls.

KILLARARAN, KILLERORUX, or KILBORAN, a parish 2½ miles north-east of Ballinamore, and on the eastern border of the barony of Killian, and of the county of Galway, Connaught. It contains the village of BALLYGAR: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3; area, 12,595 acres, 3 perches,—of which 51 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,777; in 1841, 5,162. Houses 828. The surface comprises a large aggregate of bog, but elsewhere consists of tillage-land, worth on the average about 30s. per plantation acre per annum; and it is washed on the east by the river Suck, and chiefly drained thither by the rivulet Shiven. The road from Ballinamore passes through the interior. Within the northern boundary is part of Castle-Kelly, the extensive demesne of the Rev. Armstrong Kelly; and on the banks of the Shiven are Riversdale, the seat of James Kelly, Esq., and Ballinamore-house, the seat of the Hon. Martin Ffrench.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLIAN [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £74 1s. 1½d., and the rectorial for £74; and the latter are inappropriate in the Incorporated Society. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killian. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 18, and the Roman Catholics to 5,085; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 110 boys and 20 girls.

KILLARD, a parish 5 miles north-north-east of Kilkee, and on the coast of the barony of Ibrickane, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the village of DOONBEG: which see. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 2; area, 17,022 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch,—of which 183 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,629; in 1841, 6,941. Houses 1,094. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,416; in 1841, 6,625. Houses 1,042. The coast extends southward from Lough Donnel to Farrihy bay; includes Doonbeg bay, Carronmore Point, Donegal Point, and Baltard or Ballard Point; is bold and precipitous, and partakes the grandly picturesque character which distinguishes the environs of KILKEE. A great proportion of the surface is unreclaimed and exceedingly wild bog, almost all of a kind quite capable of reclamation; and the rest consists for the most part of arable and pasture land, and, owing to the proximity of sea-manure, has, within the last few years, been greatly improved. The road from Kilkee to Ennistymon passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £101 10s. 9½d.; nett, £91 7s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. The chief portion of the rectorial tithes is compounded for £79 2s. 3½d., and is inappropriate in Lord Castlecoote; and the remainder is compounded for £2 19s. 7½d., and is inappropriate in Richard Stackpoole, Esq. The church was built in 1833, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitzings 250; attendance 45. The Doonbeg and Baltard Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 800 and 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Lisdeen and Kilkee. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 104, and the Roman Catholics to 5,982; and 6 daily schools—one of which was aided with £2 a-year from the Roman Catholic clergyman—had on their books 250 boys and 160 girls.

KILLARD POINT, a headland in the barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated 1½ mile south-south-west of Ballyquintin Point, and screens the south side of the entrance of Lough Strangford.

KILLARDRY. See KILLALDRIF.

KILLARE, a parish in the barony of Rathconrath, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It contains part of the town of BALLYMORE: which see. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 11,281 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches,—of which 49 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches are in Lough Sunderlin. Pop., in 1831, 3,849; in 1841, 4,000. Houses 673. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,696; in 1841, 3,819. Houses 644. The present hamlet or decayed village of Killare was formerly a place of considerable importance, and was supposed by some topographers to stand in the exact centre of Ireland. Mr. Harris supposes its name to be derived from Irish words which signify the 'church of the navel, or middle,' and to allude to the central position of the village; but Camden supposes Killare to be the ancient Laberus of Ptolemy, and the Chevalier de Montmorency observes, that, as it is situated near the celebrated hill of Usenach, on which as frequent provincial assemblies were held as on the Hill of Tara, it may, without improbability, be regarded as a seat of population to which merchants resorted as early as the days of Ptolemy, and in which the Irish nobility found accommodation during the seasons of assembly at Usenach. Monastic writers say that a monastery was founded at Killare in the 6th century, and dedicated to St. Aid and St. Brigid, and that there were connected with it three churches, one of which was parochial. In 1181, a strong castle was erected here by Sir Hugh de Lacy; in after ages, it was possessed by the Mac-Geoghegans, dynasts of Moycashel; and eventually, till the extinction of their male line, it belonged to the family of Shaen. The interior of the parish is traversed westward by the road from Mullingar to Athlone, and southward by that from Longford to Kilbeggan. The principal seats are Killare, Moss-town, and Ballinacor; and the hamlets are Macans, Clare, Rathskeagh, Clonnalyhagh, and Ballydavid.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory, in the dio. of Meath; but is attached to the perpetual curacy of Ballymore, or St. Owen's of Loughsendy. See BALLYMORE. Tithes payable to the perpetual curate, £11 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £4 12s. 3½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 700 to 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballymore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 67, and the Roman Catholics to 3,854; and 4 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 138 children.

KILLARGLIN. See KILLORGLIN.

KILLARGEY, a parish in the barony of Dromahaire, 4½ miles south-south-west of Manor-Hamilton, co. Leitrim, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 14,893 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches,—of which 345 acres are in Lough Belhavel, and 43 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 4,409; in 1841, 4,873. Houses 812. The limits include the whole of Lough Belhavel, part of the vale of the Bonnet river, and part of the Bardaldie range of mountains; yet the surface, in spite of occasional dashes of scenic character, is prevailingly a bleak and forbidding congeries of upland country. Some of the land is good; but a large proportion is poor and moorish. A summit on the north border has an altitude of 1,448 feet. The road from Manor-Hamilton to Carrick-on-Shannon passes through the interior; and the village of Killargey stands on this road a little north of the junction of the branch-line from Dromahaire. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 110; in 1841, not specially returned.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Vicarial tithe composition, £25; glebe, £400. Gross income, £425; nett, £358 14s. 5d.

Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £40, and are appropriated to the see of Kilmore. The church was built in 1830, at the cost of £997 17s. 6d., of which £831 5s. was lent by the late Board of First Fruits, £100 was lent by the Rev. C. L. Montgomery, and the remainder was raised by assessment and the sale of pews. Sittings 200; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 275. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 395, and the Roman Catholics to 4,015; and 8 daily schools—4 of which were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and one was aided with £4 a-year from subscription—had on their books 364 boys and 282 girls.

KILLARNEY, a parish on the west border of the barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the chief part of the town of KILLARNEY: see next article. Length, westward, 6½ miles; extreme breadth, 4; area, 38,151 acre,—of which 3,362 acres are water. Pop., in 1831, 11,333; in 1841, 10,476. Houses 1,447. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,473; * in 1841, 4,512. Houses 722. All the western district is identified with the waters, isles, shores, and multitudinous beauties of the central and upper parts of the Lower Lake of Killarney; the middle district is variously rich low ground, arable slope, pastoral declivity, and either morass or turbary; and the eastern district is pre-eminently a portion of the coarse uplands which screen the north side of Glensfesk. Nearly all the rural objects of particular interest are succinctly and consecutively noticed, in the following terms, by Mr. Fraser: "Surrounding the town is the extensive demesne of the noble proprietor, the Earl of Kenmare. Below the town, the home and pleasure-grounds reach to the shore; above it, the deer park occupies the surrounding heights. The mansion is a plain old building, close to the town; and the pleasure-grounds attached furnish a good specimen of the old style of gardening. Adjoining the high grounds above the town, is Park, the residence of Daniel Cronin, Esq. The environs extend for a considerable distance on either side of the town. Proceeding by the Kenmare road, at one mile, we cross the Flesk, on the right bank of which is Flesk Priory, the villa of J. Stewart Coxon, Esq.; and on the left, on the heights, Coltsman's Castle," Flesk Castle, "J. Coltsman, Esq., forms a conspicuous feature. Beyond the Flesk, on the lake side, is Cabernane, the beautifully wooded seat of — Herbert, Esq.; and close to it, Castle-Shine, the residence of Denis Shine Lalor, Esq. Among the numerous villas on the left hand of the road, are South-bill, John Leaby; and Danesfort, — Colthurst, Esq. About two miles from Killarney is the hamlet and demesne of Muckruss, the seat of Henry A. Herbert, Esq. The far-famed abbey of Muckruss, founded in 1440, and re-edified in 1602, is in this demesne. * * The demesne of Muckruss, embracing the peninsula which separates the Lower and Middle Lakes, stretches along the eastern shores of the latter, containing part of Turk mountain and waterfall. A commodious plain cottage is the only residence yet erected. As regards situation, this seat is the first around Killarney; the ground presenting such natural features and capabilities as are nowhere else to be met with. A little beyond Muckruss is the hamlet of Cloghereen, in which a comfortable inn has lately been fitted up, and where boats and ponies can be obtained. Situated close to the shores of the Middle Lake, near the base of Mangerton, and not far from Turk waterfall, this inn is very conveniently situated for visitors. At four miles, we reach Turk waterfall, close to the road on the left; and on the opposite side of the road is Turk Cottage, the residence of H. A. Herbert, Esq." See KENMARE, MUCKRUSS, TURK, FLESK, MANGERTON, ROSS, and KILLARNEY (LAKES OF). The western or lacustrine district of the parish was at one time considerably celebrated for its mines. See KERRY.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition, £240; rents of houses in the town, £120. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £240, and are impropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore. The vicarages of Killarney and Kilcummin [see KILCUMMIN], constitute the benefice of Killarney. Pop., in 1831, 17,970. Gross income, £649 15s. 9d.; nett, £595 13s. 4d. Patron, the Earl of Kenmare. A curate has a salary of £70. The church is of unknown date. Sittings 300; attendance 200. The Killarney Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 3,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of West Kilcummin. Two other Roman Catholic chapels stand within the benefice, and are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 346, and the Roman Catholics to 11,382; the Protestants of the union to 348, and the Roman Catholics to 18,252; 3 daily schools in the parish had on their books 474 males, and nearly 454 females; and there were also 3 daily schools in Kilcummin. One of the Killarney daily schools was supported wholly by subscription, conducted under the superintendence of the vicar, and attended by 44 boys and 34 girls; and another was supported by an annual grant of £60 and some other advantages, conducted under the superintendence of the Roman Catholic clergyman, and attended by 400 boys and nearly as many girls. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Killarney, Gourtnagulane, and Tiernaboul, salaried on respectively £40, £12, and £15; and, in the same year, they granted £104 1s. 5d. toward the erection of a school at Carhooreigh.

KILLARNEY,

A market and post town, the capital of southern Kerry, and the vestibule to the gorgeous and far-famed scenery of the Killarney lakes, is situated partly in the parish of Aghadoe, but chiefly in that of Killarney, barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands on low ground about 1½ mile east of the Lower Lake, 7 miles south-east of Milltown, 11 south by west of Castle-Island, 16 south-south-east of Tralee, 16 north by east of Kenmare, 17½ west of Mill-street, 29 west by south of Mallow, 44 west by north of Cork, 53 south-west by south of Limerick, and 147 south-west of Dublin.

The Town.—Killarney consists of two good lines of street, and a number of poor lanes and alleys. The High-street, which bisects the town lengthwise, and extends from north to south, is an airy, well-edified, respectable thoroughfare; and expands, at its south end, into Kenmare-place, the best built portion of the town. Yet the dingy lanes and putrid alleys are so predominant in the aggregate interior view, that the town cannot be fairly regarded as very pretty. Though situated, too, in the midst of a rich and sumptuous tract of low country, and on almost the margin of one of the most magnificent groupings of natural landscape in the British empire, it is very far from possessing any claims to the picturesque; for it stands so low in relation to the general basin of the lakes as to be quite destitute of vantage-ground for observation, and it is so completely walled out from the scenic side of the country by the enclosures of Lord Kenmare's demesne, as to have no view even across the plain to the edge of the Lower Lake.—Both its physical and its social appearance is motley; the latter caused chiefly by the incidental attraction which the multitudinous resort of wealthy strangers presents to paupers and idlers, or “by the charm which precarious employment possesses in the estimation of many, over the more certain but more moderate wages of labour.” Lord Kenmare, the proprietor of the town, is unhappily prevented from attempting its physical improvement, in consequence of all the appotments of its site being held under leases for ever; but he materially and constantly abates its social and moral evils, both by a benign management of his extensive circumjacent estates, and by furnishing a comparatively large amount of employment to the poor.

Buildings and Institutions.—The parish-church, situated on the east side of the south end of High-street, is clumsily adorned with a low tower and slate-covered spire, erected in 1802; and it contains several mural monumental tablets, and the sepulchral vault of the Earls of Kenmare.—The Roman Catholic chapel, situated in New-street, or the thoroughfare leading out toward Milltown, contains within its transept the tomb of Lieutenant-colonel Barry, of the Irish brigade, who died in 1819; and its adjacent burying-ground contains a monument to the Right Rev. Dr. Gerald Toran, who died in 1777. This chapel serves as the cathedral of the Roman Catholic diocese of Kerry.—The Market-house, situated on the east side of High-street, some distance north of the parish-church, is an old building, chiefly used for the sale of linen; but its upper part serves as an assembly-room, and is often used for balls.—The district court-house is a substantial stone building; and attached to it is a district bridewell, ill-contrived, badly-ventilated, and utterly incompetent in accommodation, containing only 5 sleeping cells, and yet having often 30 prisoners at quarter-sessions.—The other noticeable buildings and institutions are a Poor-law union workhouse, a fever hospital, a dispensary, two charity schools, almshouses for aged women supported by Lady Kenmare, two reading-rooms, a club-house, and more than one spacious, elegant, English-looking hotel. Sir Walter Scott, Miss Edgeworth, and other distinguished literary persons, sojourned at the Kenmare Arms Hotel, during a visit to the lakes in 1825; and Mr. Crofton Croker had his head-quarters at the Hibernia Hotel, when preparing his ‘Legends of the Lakes,’ in 1828. These hotels, and the King’s Arms in High-street, and several hotels within the rural parts of the basin of the lakes, as well as toward Lough Carra, furnish boats, ponies, guides, and all other requisites for fully visiting the lakes and the circumjacent country; and most of them have Visitors’ Books, designed only as registries of names, but also containing much stale wit and eccentric sentiment.

Trade.—Killarney conducts a comparatively extensive trade in dairy produce; and makes a prominent figure in exchanging colonial goods and British manufactures for the farm produce of a large area of circumjacent country. Some work is done, yet of trifling amount, in the manufacture of linen and coarse woollen; and there are two breweries and an extensive flour-mill and stores. The grand support of the town, in methods both direct and indirect, and severally honourable, doubtful, and despicable, depends on the multitudinous resort of wealthy strangers to visit the scenery of the lakes. In summer and autumn, therefore, the place has a bustling, prosperous, and even gay appearance; while in winter and spring, it is the very impersonation of dul-

ness and inertia. Swarms of beggars used to frequent the streets, and besiege the equipages of new arrivals, in a style of clamour and voracity, to show that they had professionally been called into existence, or at least attracted to Killarney, simply by its character of the chief-key-post to the scenery of the lakes; and these beggars are either indignantly denounced, or lugubriously described, or most merily depicted, by almost all the clever tourists who have published their opinions of Killarney; but speedily—with all their nuisances of filth, obstreperousness, coarse humour, hypocritical wailing, and wild oburgation—they will, more happily for themselves than even for the relieved visitors, be in a great measure drawn away by the operation of the Poor-law act. Yet all those classes of semi-idlers and concealed paupers, such as guides, gillies, runners, drivers, boatmen, and persons-of-all-work, who contrive to coax as much money at intervals from strangers as they could earn by the steady pursuit of a regular but humble avocation, will of course remain as numerous as ever, and even possibly become more expert and annoying in consequence of being freed from the competition of beggars. The ‘Sportsman in Ireland,’ describing the conduct of these classes jointly with the beggars, is too flurried and indignant to be impartial; yet, though seriously over-colouring their seeming spirit and motives, he may be quoted as affording a full glimpse at their real character. “All,” says he, “seemed bent on one determined purpose,—that of robbing the unfortunate traveller, some by prayers for long life to him, others by offers of assistance to see the lakes, others by the display of the most tawdry specimens of shells, little boxes made of the arbutus tree which abounds on the islands, the offer of flies, &c. It is their object to appear as poor and destitute as possible. They fully expect you to open your purse the moment you look into their cabin, and have no notion but that every visitor’s business is to give something to them. If you ask a wretched Killarney man to hold your horse for five minutes, he expects you will throw him at least a sovereign for the trouble, and looks with wonder at a few halfpence. Every man of this class expects in the smallest service most enormous gains.” We must in justice to the poor natives, however, express a strong opinion that their voracity, so far as it exists, has been mainly produced by the vanity and prodigality of numerous strangers who wished to be praised by them as “rascals and gentlemen,”—that their disposition to prey upon wealthy visitors will probably be found, if fairly examined, to be only less refined and at the same time less strong than that of the harpy multitude in places of fashionable resort in England,—and that they generally evince a desire to give a quid pro quo so far as they are able, and are then most pathetic and eloquent in their gratitude for such portions of largesses as they have not fully earned. A weekly market is held on Saturday; and fairs are held on July 6, Aug. 10, Oct. 7, Nov. 11 and 30, and Dec. 28. Branch offices of the National bank and the Agricultural and Commercial bank were established in 1835. The public conveyances, in 1838, were a car to Cork, a car to Kenmare, a car to Killorglin, a car to Limerick, a coach and a car to Tralee, and a mail-coach in transit between Tralee and Cork. The nearest points of projected railway are the Mallow station of the Cork line, the Glengarriff station of the Berehaven line, and the Tarbert terminus of the Shannon line. The first of these is 40 statute miles distant from Killarney; and travelling will be effected from it to Dublin in 10 hours and 19 minutes.

Statistics.—Area of the parish of Killarney section of the town, 77 acres; of the Aghadoe section, 21 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 7,910; in 1841, 7,127. Pop. of the parish of Killarney section, in 1831, 6,715; in 1841, 5,904. Houses 725. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 346; in manufactures and trade, 605; in other pursuits, 305. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 54; on the directing of labour, 623; on their own manual labour, 488; on means not specified, 91. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 994; who could read but not write, 131; who could neither read nor write, 1,314. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 529; who could read but not write, 225; who could neither read nor write, 2,104. Pop. of the Aghadoe-section, in 1831, 1,195; in 1841, 1,163. Houses 136. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 81; in manufactures and trade, 68; in other pursuits, 103. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 25; on the directing of labour, 74; on their own manual labour, 109; on means not specified, 44. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 177; who could read but not write, 36; who could neither read nor write, 195. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 199; who could read but not write, 40; who could neither read nor write, 413.

Poor-law Union.—The Killarney Poor-law union ranks as the 118th, and was declared on Sept. 18, 1840. It lies all in co. Kerry, and comprehends an area of 253,269 acres; which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 56,227. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are, Killarney, 11,333; Aghadoe, 4,183; Kilcummin, 3,381; Nohoval, 4,622; Killaha, 2,567; Killorglin, 6,635; Kilbonane, 3,305; Molahiffe, 3,260; Currana, 2,531; Knockane, 5,200; Killeenteran, 3,210; and Killecoleman, 4,970. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 9 and 27; and of the latter, 4 are elected by Killarney division, 3 by Killorglin, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The expenditure of the union up to Feb. 6, 1843, amounted to £628 1s. 1½d. The workhouse is to contain accommodation for 800 paupers; but the latest parliamentary papers in our possession do not state either its date of contract, its projected cost, or the date fixed for its completion. The Board of Guardians meets every Saturday. The medical charities are a fever hospital at Killarney, and dispensaries at Cloghereen, Killarney, Dunkerrin, Knockacoppa, Milltown, and Molahiffe. In 1839-40, these institutions received £490 7s. 3½d from subscription, £418 17s. 3½d. from public grants, and £110 12s. 10½d. from other sources,—in all, £1,019 17s. 5½d.; and they expended £404 5s. in salaries of medical officers, £138 10s. 6½d. for medicines, and £311 10s. 7d. for contingencies,—in all, £794 5s. 1½d. The Killarney fever-hospital and dispensary includes an infirmary department, contains 50 beds, enjoys the care of two physicians and an apothecary, and is a well-managed institution; and, in 1839-40, it received £601 5s. 9½d., expended £504 13s. 10d., admitted 121 infirmary intern patients, admitted 529 fever-hospital intern patients, and made 5,850 dispensations of medicine to extern patients.

History.—Killarney owed its origin to the commencement of iron-works on the east shore of the Lower Lake, by Sir William Petty, ancestor of the Marquis of Lansdowne; but it did not rise above village importance till the middle of the 18th century, when it speedily became an influential small town, in consequence of Thomas, fourth titular Viscount Kenmare, and father of the first Earl of Kenmare, inducing several respectable inhabitants to settle in it, and erecting some houses for linen manufacture in its vicinity. Four great new roads were made to connect it with respectively Castle-Island, Castlemain, Kenmare, and Cork; its High-street and its first commodious inn were erected; and strangers began to be numerous attracted to it on visits to the scenery of the lakes. The working of the copper mines at Muckross and Ross contributed to its prosperity; but the iron-works and the linen manufacture eventually failed it; and the taste and fashion of making tours to the lakes, have for a considerable series of years been the chief prop of its maintenance.

KILLARNEY (THE LAKES OF),

Three richly picturesque and highly celebrated lakes in the baronies of Magonihy and Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. A line drawn along or through the centre of the lakes, is 6 miles in length, describes the segment of a circle with the convexity facing the east, and commences and terminates respectively 4½ miles south-south-west, and 2½ west-north-west of the town of Killarney. The Upper Lake extends in the direction of south-west by south; measures ¾ of a mile in length; and though connected with the Middle Lake only by a circuitous stream, is geographically within 1 mile of that lake, the latter being situated to the north-north-east. The Middle lake extends west-north-westward; measures 1 mile and 3 furlongs in length; and is connected with the Lower Lake by a very brief run of stream. The Lower Lake may be variously regarded as extending either north-north-westward or in the direction of north-west by north; and it measures, in extreme length and breadth, respectively 3½ and 2 miles. Not only readers of any of the numerous glowing and general descriptions of the lakes, but many tourists who have sailed upon the lakes' bosom, and explored their extent from commencement to termination, may probably think our measurements understated; but the former class of persons ought to allow for the great exaggeration both of their own fancy and of the fancy of their author, and the latter have not duly adverted to the illusion produced upon them, as to extent of area, by their having threaded mazy channels, and winded and circled among islands and straits, and round peninsula and mountains. The isles, islets, and rocks in the Upper Lake, are Rossburkie or Oak Island, Arbutus Island, Eagle's Island, Knight of Kerry's Island, Macarthy's Island, Ronau's Island, Duck Island, Stag Island, &c.; in the Middle Lake, the Devil's Island; and in the Lower Lake, Ross Island, O'Donoghoe's Prison, Cherry Island, Innisfallen, Mouse Island, Heron Island, Lamb Island, Rabbit Island, Rough Island, Yew Island, Cow Island, Jackdaw Island, Ospray Island, Drinking-Horse, Pigeon Island, Crow Island, O'Donoghoe's Table, Alexander's Rock, Friar's Island, Tom Cole's Rock, Curragahocca Rock, Oak Island, Gunnet Rock, Gun Rock, Darby's Garden, Burnt Island, Briceen Island, Denes Island, Miss Plumber's Island, the Three Friends, Sugar Island, Coarse Island, and Ash Island. The parish of Knockane extends from head to foot of the west side of the lakes; and the parishes of Killaha, Killarney, and Aghadoe, successively flank the east side.

The natural or geographical basin of the lakes, including 3½ miles of the course of the river Laune, by which they send their superfluous waters to the sea, extends 21 miles westward from the watershed of the Derrynasaggart mountains, 1 mile within the county of Cork, to the summit of Carran-Tuail, the monarch mountain of Ireland, 7½ miles due west of the foot of the Middle Lake; and it extends from north to south 11 miles in a line drawn nearly through Knockacapple, 8½ miles drawn through the centre of the lakes themselves, and 7½ miles in a line drawn through a point 2½ miles east of the summit of Carran-Tual. To attempt a geographical description of this great basin, constituting so large a portion of the county, would only be to repeat what we wrote in the article "Kerry," and in the section entitled "The Surface." See KERRY. The only stream of considerable size which, with its affluents, drains the basin, is the FLESK [see that article]; and the river which is formed by the superfluent waters of the lakes, and by the effluxing streams which tumble or trot or glide into them, is the Laune,—issuing from the north-west extremity of the Lower Lake, and flowing north-westward to the south side of the head of Castlemaine Harbour. But many of the streams, though in some instances so small as to be mere torrents or mountain-rills, are singularly rich in rapids, cataracts, cascades, pools, sinuosities, gorgy dives, and other bold features of water-scenery; though the particularly admired waterfall, in the vicinity of the lakes are only six in numbers O'Sullivan's cascade, Comme-Dhuv Falls, Filadaune cascade, Turk waterfall, Esknamucky cascade, and Derryeunehy cascade. The immediate basin or rather the bed of the lakes, is, in a general view, one great, sinuous, profound, gorgy, many-featured mountain-glen; but over the lower half of its east side, or along the eastern flank of the Lower Lake, this glen is flattened down into a rich, undulated, and comparatively broad plain, which lies like a wide band of wood and swell and verdure between the margin of the lake and the base of a far-spreading system of pastoral or moorish mountains. The portion of uplands which presses round the Upper Lake is densely amassed and of alpine character; and, besides the grand ravine which contains the lake itself, it presents for inspection the Comme-Dhuv or Black Valley, the unique scenery of the Derryeunehy mountain and waterfall, the tunnelled and masterly specimen of engineering in the new highway to Kenmare, and the sinuous and powerfully characterized defile along which the superfluent waters of the Upper Lake are sent downward to the Middle Lake. The secondary screen of the chief glen, 3 miles east by south of the Upper Lake, and 2½ miles south-east of the Middle Lake, is Mangerton mountain,—famed for the Devil's Punch Bowl near its summit, and the glen of the Horse on its north side. The immediate south-eastern and eastern screen of the Middle Lake, is Turk mountain, noted for its waterfall. The eastern and northern mountain-boundaries of the Lower Lake, are not properly screens, but strictly perspectives, and may be regarded as culminating in Crohane mountain, 5½ miles east-south-east, the Paps 8½ miles due east, and Slievemish 9 miles north by west. The whole of the western screen of the entire glen of the three lakes, is a grandly and picturesquely agglomerated congeries of mountains, one of the most powerfully scenic in the United Kingdom, and so disposed as to be both an immediate flank and a receding perspective to the lakes. The portion of this congeries situated within the geographical basin of the lakes, or eastward of the summit of Carran-Tual, is cut northward and southward into sections by the long, deep, stupendous defile called the Gap of Dunloe. The section between this defile and the lakes consists of the Toomies, Glens, and Purple mountains; and the section to the west of the defile, consists of the celebrated MacGillicuddy's Reeks, culminating in the summit of Carran-Tual. The elevations or altitudes above sea-level of the chief of the objects we have thus noticed, are the Lower

Lake, 50 feet; Mangerton, 2,550; Turk mountain, 1,900; Crohane, 2,175; the Paps, 2,280; Slievemish, 2,200; Dunlo Heads, or the summits at the south entrance of the Gap of Dunloe, 1,100; Toomies, 2,150; Glens, 2,090; Purple mountain, 2,280; and Carran-Tual, 3,410.

Either the lakes or the town of Killarney may be approached by any of six roads, through respectively Kenmare, Macroom, Mill-street, King-William's-Town, Castle-Island, or Tralee. Only the first of these roads, however—that northward to the lakes and town from Kenmare—commands either a large, a specimen, or a tolerable view of the lakes' immediate basin; and this commands a view so continuous, so minute, and so exquisitely grouped as to have been pronounced, by a judge of no small competency, decidedly equal to the entire aggregate of views obtained by boating over the lakes' surface, and exploring the ramifications of their glen. "The new road I have just spoken of," says the Rev. Cesar Otway, "winds broad and smooth through the magnificent hills that divide Kenmare river from the lakes; the whole way is grand, before you the Reeks of MacGillicuddy, and to the right the massive mountain of Mangerton. The state of the atmosphere had quite changed since I left the Esk mountains; the morning, which had been sometimes sunny, and again showery, had settled in a cold, clear, steady evening; a cumulo stratum of cloud covered the whole sky, and, like a curtain a little let down, it enveloped the tops of Mangerton and the Reeks at a straight and regular defined elevation; thus you could perceive that these hills were an immense height, but were left to guess how high their tops reached, and as they now appeared, they put you in mind of the massive Egyptian columns supporting the flat-roofed temples of Thebes or Tentyra. Below the stratum of clouds, the atmosphere was very clear, and all the gorges and chasms and sweeping indentures of the mountains were as distinct as possible; and thus, if you could be content to take the Reeks with their nightcaps on, you had an opportunity to enjoy in full perfection all the beauties of their lower regions. In this way, turning my body on this side and then on that side of my gig, in order to catch a view of the ever-varying scene through which I was passing, at length at a turn of the road, I came full upon the Upper Lake of Killarney; and, my good reader, I beg here to be excused from giving a description of what has been described in tours, travels, and guides, a thousand times over. If you are a rich reader, questionless you have spent some of your superfluous cash in seeing all this magnificent picture with your own eyes; if you are poor, you have nothing better to do than send to a circulating library for 'Weld's Travels,' or any other writer on Killarney that you fancy. One secret I will be good-natured enough to make you master of, I am told it is very expensive, very troublesome, and sometimes attended with infinite discomfort, taking a boat on those lakes: now, I verily believe that if, on horseback or in a jaunting-car or gig, you take an excursion from Killarney town for ten miles along this new road toward Kenmare, which I travelled, you will see Upper, Middle, and Lower Lake more to your satisfaction than if you went into a boat. I remained but one day in Killarney—business, not pleasure, brought me. To be sure, when business was done, I was not such a dull dolt as not to make the most of my time, and see Mucruss, and Turk mountain, and Mangerton, and the Devil's Punch Bowl. In a word, Mr. Reader, even suppose you were at the lakes,—even suppose you are young and active, and made the most of your time, yet I am bold to say, that I saw as much in four hours as you could, or ever will do, in the same space of time." But as few tourists are likely to be influenced by the opinion of this writer—replete with common sense and judiciousness though it be—we would strongly recommend all persons intending to visit the lakes, to acquaint themselves beforehand, by means of map and description, with the plain, unpoetic, matter-of-fact topography of the Lakes' basin,—to shun or forget the twaddle and rhapsody of the herd of scribbling tourists in their affected depicting of the scenery,—to form a vigorous resolution, of deaf-and-dumb indifference to the marvellous stories of waiters, ostlers, fiddlers, buglemen, boatmen, and guides,—and, on arrival at Killarney, to commence and prosecute the tour of the lakes with the simple appliances of boat, poney, and bugle. Whoever goes thus rationally to work will see Killarney as it really exists, and carry away such correct images of it as might be transferred to canvass; but whoever adopts the contrary and too common method, will see the place in a day-dream, and obtain nearly as many and bewildering reminiscences of it as if he were to gaze all the while upon a phantasmagoria. The Irish Killarney, the English Derwentwater, and the Scottish Loch Katrine, have all, though in different degrees, suffered gross vulgarization by having been "written into fame;" and the consequence is, that even an educated person of considerable taste, is in some danger, if he be not on his guard, of following the rush and acclamations of the mob, instead of treading the calm path of his own observations and reflection.

Almost every reader will infer at a glance, that, owing to the structure and method of our work, we must necessarily dispose piecemeal, or in separate articles in their respective alphabetical places, of all objects, either surrounding the lakes or embosomed in them, which afford any scope for description. We cannot, therefore, without wasteful repetition, attempt to sketch here even an outline of the consecutive scenery of the lakes; and must, in lieu of description,—first, refer to the articles which contain that description in detail,—second, drop a hint as to the most eligible plans of tours of various lengths within the basin of the lakes,—and, third, copy the short and singularly judicious account of the lakes given in the work of Mr. Inglis.—The principal articles, then, which more or less fully notice the scenery of the lakes and their basin, are AGHADOE, KNOCKANE, KERRY, DUNKERRIN, MAGONIHY, BED-OF-HONOUR, CARRAN-TUAL, CLOGHERKEN, COLEMAN'S-LEAP, COMME-DHUV, DERRYCUNEHY, DEVIL'S ISLAND, DEVIL'S PUNCH BOWL, DINIS, DUNLOE, EAGLE'S NEST, GLEN-OF-THE HORSE, GLENA, GLENFLESK, HAG'S GLEN, INMIS-FALLEN, KAVOGE, KNUCKRIAR, MACGILLICUDDY'S REEKS, MANGERTON, MUCRUSS, O'DONOGHUE'S PRISON, O'SULLIVAN'S CASCADE, PURPLE MOUNTAIN, ROSSBURKIE, and TURK.—A tour of one day ought to be a descent of the entire glen of the lakes from the head of the Upper Lake to the foot of the Lower Lake, and should be preceded by a ride from Killarney round the foot of the Lower Lake and up the Gap of Dunlo; but it necessarily omits attention to the waterfalls of Derrycunehy and Turk, and the ascent of Mangerton and other mountains, or at best permits a very slender attention to objects not situated immediately in the lake's glen. The first of a tour of two days should be devoted to the descent of the whole glen of the lakes; and the second to the ascent of Mangerton, the examination of Turk and Derrycunehy waterfalls, and the survey of the abbey and demesne of Mucruass. The first of a tour of three days should be devoted to the Lower and the Middle Lakes; the second, to the Gap of Dunlo, and the Upper Lake; and the third, to the ascent of Mangerton, and the examination of the scenery on the road toward Kenmare. The first, second, and third of a tour of four days, may be employed as in the preceding, and the fourth devoted to a tour to the lakes of Carragh; and, should any one have inclination to prolong his stay to seven days of excursions, he can devote the fifth to the ascent of Carran-Tual, and the sixth and seventh to the examination of numerous close scenes situated within the range of his early days' tours.

"To obtain any correct notion of the beauty of the Killarney lakes," says Mr. Inglis, "it is necessary to embark at the head of the upper lake, and to descend the chain—a distance of about 15 miles. The best way of accomplishing this, which may be accomplished in one day, is to go from the town round the lower part of the lower lake, and by the Gap of Dunloe. By this rout one passes some fine seats,—particularly that of Lord Headly, and another, the residence of one of the O'Connell family. The mountain views too are fine, particularly the views of MacGillicuddy's Reeks, and of another mountain, Carran-Tual, which is now admitted to be the highest of the Irish mountains. This chain always carries some little interest with it; and Mangerton,—always an ugly mountain,—divested as it now is of its claim to being the highest, has become almost insignificant. The height of Mangerton is 2,550 feet; while that of Carran-Tual is 3,410.

"The Gap of Dunloe did not seem to me to be worthy of its reputation; it is merely a deep valley; but the rocks which flank the valley, are neither very lofty nor very remarkable in their form: and although, therefore, the gap presents many features of the picturesque, its approaches to sublimity are very distant. I was more struck by the view after passing the gap, up what is called 'the dark valley,' a wide and desolate hollow, surmounted by the finest peaks of this mountain range. After passing the Gap of Dunloe, and descending the steep on the south side, I embarked at the head of the upper lake, and descending the chain of lakes, through many varied and most enchanting scenes, I saw Killarney to every advantage; for I was favoured by one of those warm days of sunshine and shade, which are particularly calculated for the enjoyment of mountain and lake scenery,—a sky, warm enough to give richness to the landscape, and yet without the haziness which accompanies heat; and air, just enough to vary the effects of light and shade on lake and mountain, without disturbing that tranquillity which is the peculiar charm of lake scenery. I had likewise the advantage of Lord Kenmare's boat and rowers, and of the particular instructions which they had received from his lordship.—If the traveller visit Killarney without those exaggerated notions which are apt to be conveyed by a guide-book, he will certainly be satisfied and delighted. There is nothing of the sublime about Killarney, but there is all of that kind of beauty which depends upon the combinations of form and colour. The mountain outlines can scarcely be finer than they are; and in the variety of colour produced by the variety of foliage, from the beautiful bright green of the arbutus to the brown mountain heath, Killarney is eminently distinguished.

"To my mind the upper lake is the most attractive,—the mountains are nearest to it,—it has not one tame feature; and it is more studded with islands than either of the other lakes. I landed upon several of the islands, and was delighted with the luxuriant vegetation; and above all, with the arbutus, which is here a great tree, and whose fresh tints contrast with the gray rocks among which it grows. There is a sweet secluded cottage on the shore of this lake, usually called Hyde's cottage, but which is now the property of the Earl of Kenmare. The narrow passage, or channel, between the upper and the other lakes, is at least five miles in length, and offers a charming variety of scenery. Indeed, I doubt whether any thing about Killarney surpasses the scene around Dinas Island. It is a perfect specimen of close river scenery; nor have I any recollection of having seen its equal on the banks of any of the many Continental rivers which are familiar to me. Turk lake, which is reached after passing through the channel, is not, at the first glance, so attractive as either of the other lakes; but if the traveller do not coast round Turk lake, he will lose much. It has numerous tiny bays and coves,—beautiful in form,—and offering to the eye of the painter the most exquisite combination of colour; arising from the union of rock and foliage, and from the infinite variety of fern, lichen, and mosses, that overspread its banks. The lower lake is preferred by some to the two others; and although I do not coincide in this opinion, I willingly concede to it merits of a very high order. Its chief character is beauty; and certainly a spot of more loveliness than Glenna, it would be difficult to find. It is a little cove at the head of the lower lake; and here Lady Kenmare has built her pleasure-house, on a gentle swell, with the freshest of verdure and the sweetest of shrubs and flowers around; and set like an emerald in the bosom of deep towering woods. Another cottage, at a little distance, has been erected by Lord Kenmare, for the use of strangers; and although I am rather inclined to look upon a picnic as a good dinner spoiled, yet, in such a spot as this, the calamity might be endured.

“One of the most beautiful islands on any of the lakes, or, I might perhaps say, on any lake, is Innisfallen. Never saw I such ash trees as are here, never such magnificent hollies. A walk round this little paradise well repays one. Although the island contains scarcely 20 acres, it offers a wonderful variety of scenery; little emerald lawns,—groves, bowers, and thickets of evergreens, and flowering shrubs,—and magnificent single trees worthy of a primeval forest. There is an old ruin too on the island, and a banqueting-house erected for the accommodation of strangers; and, when I saw it, it was prepared for a banquet. Lord Kenmare is the owner of Innisfallen, and also of Ross island, another large and beautiful island on the lower lake. In speaking of Killarney, I must not forget its echoes. I had the advantage of having in my boat the prince of Killarney buglemen, and I had also a cannon of a larger calibre than the public boats carry; and, in the course of our voyage, we often woke the echoes of the hills, and I never heard echoes in greater perfection. There is, certainly, something bordering on the sublime, in the oft-repeated echoes of the mountains, even when these are awake, not by the deep-mouthed thunder, but by the sonorous bugle. The hills seem, alike, to call to each other; and, although it would have puzzled Burke to trace the emotion of sublimity to terror, it may be traced to its truer origin, power; for when we hear the call repeated and answered, from mountain to mountain—sometimes loud, and without interval, and then fainter and fainter—and, after solemn pause, again rising as if from some far distant glen, our imagination endues the mountain with life; and to their attributes of magnitude, and silence, and solitude, we for a moment add the power of listening, and a voice.

“It will not be irrelevant to say a few words in this place of the comparative merits of the English and the Irish lakes. Although the lakes of Killarney are three in number, yet they are all contained in one mountain hollow; and, certainly, there is not within the same compass anything in England presenting the same concentrations of charms. There is infinitely greater variety at Killarney. In form, and in the outline of its mountain-boundaries, the lower lake of Killarney is decidedly superior to Winandermere; and although the head of Ulleswater presents a bolder outline than is anywhere to be found at Killarney, yet it is upon this outline alone that the reputation of Ulleswater depends. Elsewhere than at Paterdale, the lake-scenery is tame; and the same may be said of Winandermere, which, towards its lower extremity, is almost devoid of attraction. On the contrary, throughout the whole chain of lakes, there is a variety at Killarney; tameness is nowhere to be found; and I cannot think that the somewhat nearer approach to sublimity which is to be found at the head of Ulleswater, can weigh in the balance against the far greater variety in the picturesque and the beautiful which Killarney affords. It would be unfair to compare the lakes of Killarney with Winandermere, Keswick, and Ulleswater, for these are spread over a great extent of country; whereas, the lakes of Killarney are all contained within a smaller circumference than Winandermere; but even if such a comparison were to be admitted, Killarney would outvie the English lakes in one charm, in which they are essentially deficient,—I mean the exuberance and variety of foliage which adorns both the banks and the islands of the Killarney lakes. Such islands as Ronan's island, Oak island, Dinas island, and Innisfallen, covered with magnificent timber and gigantic evergreens, are nowhere to be found amongst the English lakes.”

KILLARNEY, a parish on the west border of the barony of Gowran, 2½ miles south of Bennett's bridge, co. Kilkenny, Leinster.—Area, 155 acres. Pop., in 1841, 75. Houses 11. This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ossory. The tithes, jointly with those of Treadingstown, are compounded for £100, and are wholly appropriated to the economy fund of St. Canice cathedral.

KILLARVEY, or KILLARY. See KILLEARY.

KILLASCOBE, or KILLOSCOBE, a parish in the barony of Tynaquin, 4½ miles west of Castle-Blakeney, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 8,208 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,448; in 1841, 2,446. Houses 423. The surface contains little good land, but comprises a great extent of bog, and of poor ground, and it is drained southward by the nascent rivulet Moyne, and traversed westward by the south but ill-frequented road from Castle-Blakeney to Westport. The highest ground has an altitude of 362 feet. The chief seat is Vermont, the residence of James Blake, Esq.; and the other seats are Cross, Waterloo, Cloverfield, Carrownacregg, and Corgerry.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ANNAGHDOWN [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Vicarial tithe composition, £157 10s.; glebe, £6. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £157 10s., and are inappropriate in the vicars choral of Christ-church, Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to three chapels in the parish of Moylough. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 2,607; and 4 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 106 children.

KILLASHANDRA. See KILLESHANDRA.

KILLASHEE, a parish partly in the barony of Longford, but chiefly in that of Moydow, co. Longford, Leinster. The Longford section contains the village of CLOONDARA: which see. The Moydow section contains the village of Killashee. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Longford section, 3,701 acres, 7 perches,—of which 207 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches are in the river Shannon. Area of the Moydow section, 10,726 acres, 20 perches,—of which 49 acres, 29 perches are in the Shannon. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,134; in 1841, 4,491. Houses 753. Pop. of the barony of Longford section, in 1831, 1,089; in 1841, 1,407. Houses 240. Pop. of the rural districts of the Moydow section, in 1831, 2,480; in 1841, 2,725. Houses 456. These statistics include also the parish of Clonedonnell, its boundaries being so much obliterated by consolidation with Killashee as to be no longer traceable. The land, as to general quality, is either middle-rate or indifferent. The surface is to a vast extent boggy, and very generally tame or repulsive. The interior is traversed by the Royal Canal, the Camlin river, and the road from Dublin to Strokestown. The chief seat is Fairview. The village of Killashee stands on that road and on the canal, 3½ miles south-south-east of Tarmonbarry, 4 north-west by north of Keenagh, and 6½ west-north-west of Dublin. It is a station on the canal, and a place of shipment for dairy and agricultural produce sold in the markets of Lanesborough. Fairs are held on the 2d Monday of March, May 24, Sept. 29, and 1st Wednesday of December. In 1841, the Killashee Loan Fund had a capital of £995, circulated £5,222 in 1708 loans, and realized of nett profit, as well as expended for charitable purposes, £77 9s. 3d. Area of the village, 30 acres. Pop., in 1831, 351; in 1841, 359. Houses 57.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ardagh. Tithe composition, £148 9s. 10d.; glebe, £266 4s. 1d. The rectories of Killashee and Clonedonnell constitute the benefice of Killashee. Gross income, £517 12s. 6½d.; nett, £419 9s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was quite recently erected, by means of contributions of £767 3s. 4d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £824 16s. 8d. from private sources. Sitings 400; attendance, from 60 to 200. A school-house, at the extremity of the union, is also occasionally used as a parochial place of worship. A Protestant dissenters' meeting-house has an attendance of 30; and two Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 532, and the Roman Catholics to 3,428; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 120 children; and 6 daily schools—two of which were salaried with respectively £18 15s. and £20 from the rector, and one with £20 from the Board of Erasmus Smith—had on their books 332 boys and 303 girls.

KILLASHEE, co. Kildare. See KILLISHEE.

KILLASHER. See KILLESHER.

KILLASNET, a parish in the barony of Ross-clogher, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It contains the village of LURGANBOY and part of the town of MANOR-HAMILTON: see these articles. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 26,918 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches,—of which 396 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,743; in 1841, 6,286. Houses 1,076. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,164; in 1841, 5,607. Houses 968. The ecclesiastical parish of Killasnet is exclusive of the quoad sacra parish of Glenlough; and had, in 1831, a pop. of 4,219. The surface comprises some good limestone soil, but consists principally of marshy and mountainous pasture; and it contains the vale and lake of Glenlough, the vale and lake of Glenade, and various scenes of high interest to the naturalist and strong attraction to the painter. The chief objects of interest happen to be consecutively noticed in the following passage of Mr. Fraser's 'Guide': "Adjoining the town of Manor-Hamilton is Skreeny, the beautifully-situated residence of Colonel Cullen, and Rockwood, H. F. Cullen, Esq.; at 1½ mile, on the road to Sligo, is the hamlet and demesne of Lurganboy, romantically situated at the base of Benbo, the most remarkable mountain in this district, watered by the Bonnet river, and surrounded by a considerable extent of fine wood, and where the principal proprietor, Mr. Wynne, of Hazlewood, has a small cottage. Four miles from the town, and in the centre of Glenade, one of the finest of all our mountain glens, is Glenade-house, the residence of C. T. Cullen, Esq. It is situated on the banks of Lough Glenade, the source of the Bonnet river; and commands an extensive view of the glen and its mountain boundaries. The new road from Manorhamilton to Bundoran and Ballyshannon runs through Glenade, and affords many beautiful views of the glen and of the bay of Donegal." The principal summits in the east and north have an altitude of respectively 1,228 and 1,575 feet.—Killasnet is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Manor-Hamilton, in the dio. of Ardagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £205; and the rectorial tithes are practically paid to the incumbent, who gives a small sum in lieu or acknowledgment of them to the diocesan, to whom they belong. The Glencar and Mullys Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 791, and the Roman Catholics to 3,096; two Sunday schools were usually attended by about 136 children; and 8 daily schools—2 of which were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and 3 were salaried with respectively £6, £12, and £15, from subscription—had on their books 296 boys and 328 girls.

KILLASOLAN. See CASTLE-BLAKENEY.

KILLASPICBROWN, a parish in the barony of Carbery, 4½ miles west of Sligo, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 5,623 acres, 3 roods, 1 perch. Pop., in 1841, 2,265. Houses 368. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 3,516; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 1,812. One portion of the surface is blowing sand; another portion is rough ground and mountain; and the remainder is chiefly well-improved tillage and pasture land, and lies along the south side of Sligo bay. The highest ground has an altitude of 1,078 feet. The seats are Strandhill, Rockville, Cullenamore, Glen, Rathcarriek, and Cumming,—the last the residence of Thomas Ormsby, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. John's of Sligo, in the dio. of Elphin. See SLIGO. Tithe composition, £185 1s. 9d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Calry and St. John's. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 160, and the Roman Catholics to 1,652; and a daily school was aided by the Elphin Diocesan Society, and had on its books 15 boys and 6 girls.

KILLASPIGMULLANE, a benefice or parochial union, in the dio. of Cork, and partly in the barony of Condons and Clangibbon, but chiefly in that of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It comprises the parishes of TEMPLESUKE, KILCOAK, BALLYDELOHAR, BALLINAULTIG, and BALLYVINTY: see these articles. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 6,639. Gross income, £1,127 6s. 11d.; nett, £1,028 4s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. This benefice and the vicarage rectory of CANNAWAY [which see], form the corpus of Killaspigmullane prebend in the cathedral of Cork. Gross income of the prebend, additional to that of the benefice, £46 3s. 1d.; nett, £43 16s. 11d. The incumbent holds also the five entire rectories, and the sinecure part-rectory, which constitute the corps of the archdeaconry of Cork. A curate for Killaspigullane has a salary of £75. The church is in Ballydelohar, and has an attendance of 60; and the Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 186, and the Roman Catholics to 6,696; and 9 daily schools—6 of which were supported wholly by fees—had on their books 312 boys and 251 girls.

KILLASPUGLENANE, a parish in the barony of Corcomroe, 2½ miles north-west of Ennistymon, co. Clare, Munster. Length and breadth, each 2½ miles; area, 3,547 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,454; in 1841, 1,824. Houses 297. The surface extends northward from the upper part of Liscanor bay, comprises a series of pastoral uplands, and consists of what is locally called cold-stone or grit ground, with hardly any rocky surface. The chief residences are Moymore, Sunmerville, Castleview, and Sandfield.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILMANAHEEN [which see], in the dio. of Kilfenora. Vicarial tithe composition, £35; glebe, £7. The rectorial tithes are returned with those of the other parishes of the union, and are appropriated to the archdeaconry of Kilfenora. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 340; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmacrehy. In 1834, the parishioners, with 3 exceptions, were all Roman Catholics.

KILLASSER, a parish, 6 miles east-north-east of Foxford, and on the northern border of the barony of Gallen, and of the county of Mayo, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 19,677 acres, 14 perches,—of which 343 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,581; in 1841, 6,962. Houses 1,214. The surface consists variously of bogs, hills, and arable grounds; but in general has a bleak, poor, and repulsive appearance. The interior is traversed by the road from Foxford to Tubbercurry; and the southern boundary is traced by the river Moy. The hamlets are Cullonaghtan, Carn, Callow, and Grathy.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of STRAID [which see], in the dio. of Achonry. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £256 0s. 2d.; and the latter are impropriate in Sir W. H. Palmer. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Boulabee. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 7,051; and 6 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board—had on their books 395 boys and 105 girls.

KILLATEE. See KILLAGHTEE.

KILLATHY, or KILLATTY, a parish in the barony of Fermoy, 3 miles west by north of the town of Fermoy, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 3,217 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,402; in 1841, 1,547. Houses 229. Two townlands, previous to the recent changes in baronies, belonged to Condons and Clangibbon. Pop. of these, in 1831, 382. The surface includes a small proportion of coarse ground and mountain, but consists principally of arable land; and it lies on the left bank of the Blackwater, and is traversed by the road from Fermoy to Doneraile and Mallow.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLYHOOLEY [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £150; and the latter are impropriate in Trinity College, Dublin. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 1,418; and a hedge-school was usually attended in summer by about 45 children.

KILLAVULLANE, a village in the parish of Monanimy, barony of Fermoy, 5 miles east by north of Mallow, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the left bank of the Blackwater, and on the road from Mallow to Fermoy. Along the path up the river from Clifford to Killavullane, pasturage, wood, and water are finely arranged in the landscape, and form a luxuriant contrast to the heathy and barren-looking mountain, which ascends behind the ruined castle of Carrignaconnny and its plantations. The descent to the pass of Killavullane is overlooked by the ruins of Monanimy, which are reputed to have belonged to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem; the pass itself is singular and romantic; and the road, after passing the bridge, wends round a mass of steep limestone rock, in which are natural caverns, used as habitations by the peasantry. Area of the village, 22 acres. Pop., in 1841, 394. Houses 57.

KILLEA, a parish 1½ mile north-east of St. Johnstown, and on the eastern border of the barony of Raphoe, and of the co. of Donegal, Ulster. It contains the village of CARRIGANS; which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,869 acres, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 928; in 1841, 959. Houses 166. The surface consists of rather light and middle-rate land; and it lies along the Foyle, and is traversed by the road from Lifford to Londonderry. The only seat is Dunmore-house. This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £170; glebe, £26. Gross income, £196; nett, £149 9s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1765, by means of private subscription and parochial assessment. Sitings 120; attendance 53. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 243 Churchmen, 472 Presbyterians, and 258 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 30 children; and two daily schools—the one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and the other with £11 1s. 6d. from Robertson's Benefaction—had on their books 85 boys and 35 girls.

KILLEA, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Ikerrin, 2 miles north-west by north of Templemore, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 4,772 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,491; in 1841, 1,526. Houses 238. The surface is part of the west side of the basin of the Suir, near its head; and it consists partly of mountainous ground, and partly of arable land interspersed with bog. The summits of Devil's Bit mountain and Kilduff mountain on the western boundary, have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 1,583 and 1,462 feet; and a hill in the interior has an altitude of 548 feet. The seats are Skehanagh-house, Kilduff-house, and Ashpark.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TEMPLEMORE [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £221 10s. 9½d.; glebe, £12 15s. A private house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of from 15 to 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Templemore and Clonmore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 64, and the Roman Catholics to 1,505; and a daily school was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and had on its books 75 boys and 43 girls.

KILLEA, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Gualtier, and of co. Waterford, Munster. It contains the town of DUNMORE: which see. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,953 acres, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,499; in 1841, 2,068. Houses 348. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,766. Houses 291. The surface lies along the west side of Waterford Harbour; but, though diversified in character, and pleasant in landscape, it has not in general a very good soil. The headland of Portally, the promontory of Creadan, and a hill on the north border, have altitudes of respectively 137, 202, and 417 feet.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Waterford. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £122 6s. 2d., and the rectorial for £147 13s. 10d.; and the latter are impropriate in James Kearney, Esq. The vicarages of Killea and RATHMOYLAN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Killea. Length and breadth, each 2 miles. Pop., in 1831, 3,270. Gross income, £244 13s. 10d.; nett, £198 3s. 8d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built in 1818, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Passage and Faithleg. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 253 Churchmen, 24 Protestant dissenters, and 2,310 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 337 Churchmen, 25 Protestant dissenters, and 3,035 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school, held in the church, was usually attended by about 30 children; 3 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board and £4 from Lord Elrington, and one with £10 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and a contribution from the vicar—had on their books 96 boys and 43 girls; and there were 2 daily schools in Rathmovlan.

KILLEAD, or KILLAGH, a parish in the barony of Lower Massarene, 4 miles south of Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 5; area, 42,836 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches,—of which 789 acres, 27 perches are in Carmavy grange, and 19,794 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches are in Lough Neagh. Pop., in 1831, 7,187; in 1841, 6,725. Houses 1,236. The surface comprises all the northern division of the barony; and is bounded by Lough Neagh on the west, Six-mile-Water on the north, an affluent of Six-mile-Water on the north-east, and Crumlin Water on the south. Three-fourths of the land is in a state of the highest cultivation; and the remainder has a good soil. The centre of the shoreline on Lough Neagh projects so as to form Ardmore point; and the southern extremity projects past the mouth of the Crumlin river, so as to form the peninsula and headland of Gartree. Langford-lodge, the beautiful seat of the Hon. Gen. Pakenham, occupies Gartree headland; and thence sends away its battalions of forest tree so far and boldly along Lough Neagh, as to produce from many points of view a picturesque effect. The seats of Glendarragh and Ben Neagh, the residences respectively of Col. Heyland and J. Macauley, Esq., stand on the southern border, adjacent to the village of Crumlin. The ruins of three churches occur in the townlands of Dundesart, Ballykennedy, and Carmavy. Those in Dundesart measure 60 feet by 20, and are situated on a large fort with a double in-trenchment, faced in front with stones, and paved over the top with two complete entrances. In the trench of the fort were found various small antiquities; and in the interior of the intrenchment were seen many human bones, some in a state indicating sepulture, and others in a state indicating massacre, or the overwhelming of a multitude by the overthrow of the building. Tradition says, respecting the numerous ruined churches in Massarene, that the rebels of 1641 seized and fortified so many of the churches in one night, as to compel the destruction of the edifices in order to the suppression of the rebellion. The interior of the parish is traversed by the road from Antrim to Armagh and Newry.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Vicarial tithe composition, £700; glebe, £12. Gross income, £712; nett, £652 17s. 11d. Patron, Viscount Massarene. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £830 18s. 8d., and are impropriate in the patron. The incumbent holds also the united benefice of Dunean and Cranfield, in the dio. of Connor. A curate has a salary of £75, and the surplice fees. The church was built about a century ago. Sittings 300; attendance, from 70 to 80. A chapel-of-ease at Gartree was built in 1831, by means of a gift of £920 from the late Board of First Fruits, and a donation of £305 from the Hon. Col. Pakenham. Sittings 200; attendance 130. The chaplain has a gross salary of £84 13s. 1d., and is appointed by the Hon. Col. Pakenham. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, the one formerly Secessional, and the other of the Synod of Ulster, have an attendance of respectively 100 and from 200 to 500. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Glenavy. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 784 Churchmen, 5,000 Presbyterians, 407 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,405 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school at Gartree was usually attended by about 90 children; and 15 daily schools had on their books 440 boys 285 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £3 from Col. Pakenham, and £2 from Archer Henry; one, with £3 from Col. Pakenham, and £20 9s. 3d. from a legacy; one, with £2 from the vicar; two, with respectively £15 and £30 from Col. Pakenham; one, with £3 from R. Dunne, Esq., and £8 from the National Board; one, with £10 from the National Board; and five, with £8 each from the National Board. In 1840, the National Board had two schools at Dungonnell, and seven at respectively Killead, Ballyquillan, Crosshill, Gortnagallon, Straidhaven, Cornmevey, and Kileross.

KILLEAGH, or KILLEIGH, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 5,854 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,783; in 1841, 2,815. Houses 427. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,087; in 1841, 2,026. Houses 317. The village stands on the post-road from Youghal to Cork, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Castle-Martyr and 5 west of Youghal. Fairs are held on June 13 and Nov. 12. An abbey is alleged by monastic writers to have been founded at the village by St. Abbin, who died in 650, and to have been presided over by the abbot St. Conchenna; but it confessedly looms so obscurely and indistinctly through the vapours of legend, that it may pretty safely be enumerated among the phantasmagoria of monasticism. Area of the village, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 608; in 1841, 760. Houses 110. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 79; in manufactures and trade, 37; in other pursuits, 24. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 61.

on their own manual labour, 94; on means not specified, 1. About 3 miles to the north of the village stands Mount-Uniacke, the seat of the elder branch of the family of Uniacke, who figure prominently among the gentry and proprietary of Imokilly. Less than one mile north of the village is Ahadda-cottage, the occasional residence of Sir Arthur Brooke, Bart.; and opposite to it is Killeagh-lodge, the seat of Roger Davis, Esq. The glen of Ahadda, in which Sir Arthur Brooke's cottage stands, is exquisitely picturesque,—sheeted with natural wood, romantic, and highly improved. Dr. Smith records that, when he wrote, two extraordinary trees were growing in the garden of Ahadda,—the one, “a bladder nut, or the nux vessicaria or staphilodendron of Parkinson,”—and the other, “the arbor vitæ of Gerrard, or the thugæ theophrast, C. B., being 15 inches in diameter, and about 30 feet high.” A castle was built at Ahadda by the Carews; and, in the time of Edward III., several annuities were granted out of the lands of Ahadda to William Skiddy of Cork. The land of the parish is in general very good, producing fine crops of wheat; and, from the nature of the soil and the local situation of the respective farms, it is capable of being tilled in any season, wet or dry.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £974 9s. 9d.; glebe, £25 2s. 6d. Gross income, £1,000 8s. 3d.; nett, £883 16s. 5½d. Patron, the Crown. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1812, by means of £346 3s. 1d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, £188 6s. 2d. raised by private subscription, and £122 15s. 4½d. raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 100; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ardagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 90, and the Roman Catholics to 2,797; a Sunday school was attended by 5 children; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £12 from the National Board, and £5 from collections at the chapel—had on their books 94 boys and 47 girls. The Killeagh dispensary is within the Middleton Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 10,451; and, in 1839–40, it expended £141 10s. 5d., and administered to 727 patients.

KILLEANY, a parish in the barony of Stradbally, 3¼ miles north-north-west of the town of Stradbally, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 945 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 121; in 1841, 154. Houses 25. It contains the demesne of Killon, part of the great heath of Maryborough, and the west side of the hill of Kilbits, 720 feet high. The rest of the land is tolerably good.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition and gross income, £50; nett, £46 6s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the licensed curacy of Carnew, in the dio. of Ferns. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics, and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILLEANY, a parish in the barony of Clare, 2 miles south of Headford, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 5,711 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches,—of which 1,151 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches are in Lough Corrib. Pop., in 1831, 1,572; in 1841, 1,772. Houses 288. The surface consists of very various land, from bog to good arable ground; and it is traversed by the road from Headford to Annaghdown. The hamlets are Kee-kill, Rossmount, Keernaun, Rafwee, and Carraghanin.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of HEADFORD [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £148 4s. 2½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 800 to 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Headford. In 1834, the parishioners, with two exceptions, were all Roman Catholics; and 2 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 80 children.

KILLEANY, barony of Arran, co. Galway. See KILLANEY.

KILLEANY, co. Clare. See KILHENY.

KILLEARY, KILLARY, or KILLARVEY, a parish on the western border of the barony of Lower Slane, 4 miles south-east by south of Nobber, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 6,205 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,343; in 1841, 2,582. Houses 427. The surface consists of good land, and is drained by the Keiran, one of the head-streams of the river Dee. The only demesne is Personstown; the chief hamlet is Lobinstown; and the highest ground is Slievebreegh, situated on the southern border, and possessing an altitude of 753 feet. The road from Navan to Ardee passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of SYDDAN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £110 15s. 4½d.; glebe, £9. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £212 6s. 2d., and are possessed by an ecclesiastical incumbent as a sinecure and separate benefice. The Roman Catholic chapel at Lobinstown has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels at Heronstown and Syddan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 72, and the Roman Catholics to 2,348; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £21 and other advantages from the proprietors of the parish—had on their books 127 boys and 71 girls.

KILLEBAN, or KILLABAN, a parish, partly in the barony of Ballyadams, but chiefly in that of Slievemargy, Queen's co., Leinster. The Ballyadams section contains the village of BALLYLINAN; and the Slievemargy section the villages of ARLES and BALLICKMOYLER: see these articles. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 5½. Area of the Ballyadams section, 7,290 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches,—of which 15 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches are in the Barrow. Area of the Slievemargy section, 18,705 acres, 6 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 11,661; in 1841, 12,939. Houses 2,250. Pop. of the rural districts of the Ballyadams section, in 1831, 2,860; in 1841, 3,200. Houses 562. Pop. of the rural districts of the Slievemargy section, in 1831, 7,814; in 1841, 8,769. Houses 1,504. The ecclesiastical parish excludes the chapelry of Mayo, and had, in 1831, a pop. of 9,776. The river Barrow traces part of the eastern boundary, and the rivulet Dowglass drains a portion of the interior. The surface varies in outline and quality from the rich low ground on the Barrow, to the sterile moors on the uplands of the Leinster coal-field. Mostly all the arable land is good; and some of it is very superior. The upland district is rich in a mineral point of view, and partakes the same character as the Castle-Comer hills: see CASTLE-COMER. The principal mansions and villas are Providence, Castletown, Coonbeg, Rahin, Ashfield, Cooper-hill, Strand, Towlerion, Clonbrock, Garrendenny, Ballinagar, Ballyfoyle, Maidenhead, Brook-cottage, Rossena, and Ardough. A sumptuous monastery is alleged by monastic writers to have been built in the parish about the middle of the 7th century, by St. Abban. Other chief objects of interest are noticed in the articles on the villages.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition and gross income, £1,292 6s. 1½d.; nett, £1,212 13s. 10½d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the archdeaconry of Leighlin, and the benefice which forms its corps. Two curates have each a salary of £92 6s. 1½d. The parish-church bears the name of Castletown, and was built in 1801. Sittings 200; attendance 120. The church of Mayo chapelry will be noticed under the word MAYO: which see. The Arles, Killeen, and Ballylinan, Roman Catholic chapels, have an attendance of respectively 1,500, 1,000, and 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Mayo. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 650, and the Roman Catholics to 9,457; 6 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 1,280 children; and 20 daily schools had on their books 500 boys and 451 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £6 from the rector, and a few voluntary contributions; one, with £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £7 from the rector; one, with £6 from the rector; and one, with a sum not named from subscription. In 1838, the National Board granted £100 toward the erection of a school at Ballylinan.

KILLEBEHAN. See KILBEAGH.

KILLEDAN, a parish in the barony of Gallen, 6 miles south by west of Swineford, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the village of KILTAMAGH: which see. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 14,515 acres, 10 perches,—of which 97 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,741; in 1841, 6,410. Houses 1,147. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 5,760. Houses 1,021. The surface is partly boggy, partly moorish, partly arable, and to a large extent upland and pastoral. The river Guishden effects the drainage northward. Slievecarra is the highest ground, and has an altitude of 855 feet. The principal seats are Ballinamore, Killedan, and Annagh-Hill. The roads from Foxford and Swineford to Ballina pass up the Guishden's vale. In 1608, a Franciscan friary in Killedan was found, by inquisition, to be possessed of various lands and tenements.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of STRAID [which see], in the dio. of Achonry. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £205 15s. 8d.; and the latter are impropriate in Sir William H. Palmer. The church is situated at Ballinamore, and was built in 1780, at the private expense of the late Mr. Ormsby. Sittings 40; attendance 10. A curate for the parish has a salary of £75. There is a Roman Catholic chapel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 6,145; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £14 from Thomas Ormsby, Esq.—had on their books 349 boys and 183 girls. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Greyfield, Devilease, and Kiltamagh.

KILLEDMUND, a village in the parish of Kiltennell, barony of East Idrone, co. Carlow, Leinster. It stands near the south-west base of Mount-Leinster, and 3½ miles east by north of Borris, on the road from that town to Enniscorthy. Area of the village, 31 acres. Pop., in 1831, 236; in 1841, 154. Houses 32.

KILLEEDNADEMA. See KILLEENADEMA.

KILLEEDY, a parish in the barony of Glenquin, 4½ miles south by west of Newcastle, co. Limerick, Munster. Three townlands are separated from the rest of the parish by a narrow portion of the parish of Monagea. Length and breadth, exclusive of these townlands, 10 miles and 5 miles; area of the whole, 25,456 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,420; in 1841, 6,341. Houses 949. Two-thirds of the land are moor and mountain, capable of great improvement; and the remainder is low ground of a clayey and very retentive soil. The uplands lie all in the centre and in the west; they form a chief part of the mountainous region in the south-west corner of the county; and are included in the great circumference of wild alpine region in Limerick, Kerry, and Cork, whose centre is Abbeyfeale. See ABBEYFEALE. The chief head-stream of the Deel river drains the lowland district; and on this stream, 4 miles south by west of Newcastle, stands the village of Glanduff.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £484 12s. 3½d.; glebe, £49 15s. 8d. Gross income, £534 5s. 11½d.; nett, £452 11s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1817, at the cost of £1,421 10s. 9d.; and was maliciously burned in 1822. The Ashford Roman Catholic chapel, the Tournafulla Roman Catholic chapel, and a farm-house, used as a Roman Catholic chapel, have an attendance of respectively about 550, 420, and 250; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 5,635; and 6 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board—had on their books 160 boys and 93 girls.

KILLEEDY, barony of Pubblebrien. See KILKEEDY.

KILLEEK, or KILLESK, a parish, 2 miles west of Swords, and formerly in the barony of Coolock, but now in that of Nethercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, southward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 807 acres, 2 roods, 6 perches,—of which 3 roods, 29 perches lie detached a little to the west. Pop., in 1831, 175; in 1841, 185. Houses 24. The seats of Leas and Westereave, though not within the parish, are but a few yards beyond its limits.—This parish is a curacy, and part of the benefice of Swords [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The tithes belonging to the incumbent are compounded for £10, and the remainder for £108 3s. 5½d.; and the latter are appropriate to the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's cathedral. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILLEELY. See KILLELLY and KILLILY.

KILLEEN, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Skreen, 2½ miles north by west of Dunshaughlin, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1; area, 3,347 acres. Pop., in 1831, 588; in 1841, 580. Houses 86. The surface consists of excellent land, and is traversed by the road from Dublin to Navan. Killeen-castle, the seat of the Earl of Fingal, was originally built, about the year 1180, by Sir Hugh de Lacy. It was, for many ages, the seat of the Cusack family; and it passed from them to the family of Plunkett, by the marriage of Joan, sole heiress of Lucas Cusack, Lord of Killeen, Dunlany, and Gerardston, with Sir Christopher Plunkett, who, in 1432, was deputy-lieutenant of Ireland. The new proprietors were, through nine descents, styled Barons of Killeen; and Lucas, the tenth of their line, and usually called Lucas More, was, in 1628, created Earl of Fingal. "The castle of Killeen in its existing state," says Mr. Brewer, "has few visible traces of high antiquity, but the ancient or Gothic style of architectural arrangement has been sedulously, and with a very pleasing effect, cultivated in the extensive alterations made under the direction of the present Earl. Large and tasteful additions, comprising several fine apartments, have been recently carried into execution, after the designs of the able architect, Mr. Francis Johnston. His lordship has also improved the demesne by plantations to a great extent, which are in a thriving condition. At a short distance from the castle is a venerable and interesting church, built under the auspices of Sir Christopher Plunkett, in the early part of the reign of the fourth Edward. In this church are numerous monuments of the Plunkett family, among which is that of the founder, who died in 1445, and Joan Cusack, his wife, who died in 1441. Sir Christopher and his lady founded, in the church of their erection, a chantry of four priests, to pray for their souls. There was also founded, in the same structure, a guild or fraternity, consisting of brethren and sisters, termed the Guild of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Killeen. It is believed that an abbey was founded at this place by St. Endeus, in the 6th century; and also a nunnery, in which was interred St. Fanchea, sister of the founder.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TARAH [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £68; glebe, £171. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £196, and are impropriate in Peter Ponsonby Metge, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 596; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILLEEN, an ecclesiastical parish, in the barony of Clarmallagh, 2½ miles south-west of Durrow, Queen's co., Leinster. Area, 2,379 acres. Pop., in 1831, 632. It is now consolidated with the quoad civilia parish of Aughmacart; and forms the north-east district of that parish. The surface is various in both outline and quality; but the arable land is very good.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of AUGHMART [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Both the vicarial and the rectorial tithes are returned with those of the other parishes of the benefice. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 637. In 1841, the Killeen Loan Fund had a capital of £242, and circulated £373 in 175 loans.

KILLEEN, one of several denominations of a continuous bog, on the southern border of the barony of Slieveardagh, from 4½ to 7½ miles north-east of Cashel, co. Tipperary, Munster. The other denominations are Ballintoher, Gralla, Lurraga, Noan, Droumbon, Parkstown, and Liskeeveen. The bog is bounded, on the north, by Liskeeveen; on the east, by the Littleton river; on the south, by Ballintoher; and on the west, by Gralla. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 3,580 acres. Its interior is extremely wet; its highest point and its lowest pass lie respectively 418 and 375 feet above sea-level; and its maximum and average depth are respectively 32 and 18 feet. Estimated cost of reclamation, £4,849 16s. 2d.

KILLEEN, a demesne, and a mineral field, about 1 mile north-east of Tralee, barony of Trughe-nackiny, co. Kerry, Munster. The demesne and a considerable estate around it were granted by the act of settlement to a gentleman of the name of Bateman, who had been an officer in Col. Hierome Sankey's regiment of horse; and they descended from him to his posterity. The lands are limestone, and have some considerable caverns. Lead ore, containing a comparatively valuable intermixture, was mined in the course of last century.

KILLEEN, or NEW ARRAN, a fishing village in the barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands at the head of an inlet of Kilcolgan bay, 2½ miles west-south-west of Kilcolgan, and 2½ north-west of Kinvarra. At the time of Mr. Nimmo's Coast Survey, it had 300 inhabitants, and several yawls, and was reported on as follows: "This place appeared a favourable situation for a boat pier, and was adopted by the deputation in 1822. The pier named St. Kitt's, was begun by day labour, and afterwards completed by contract. It is a neat quay of hewn limestone, 120 feet long, with a return head of 20 feet; at the upper end is a small bridge, through which boats pass into a pool behind the quay, covered from the sea by a gravel bank, where they may be laid up in complete shelter. This place is much frequented by the Galway fishermen during the herring season, and with north-west winds. The pier is covered in front by the small isle Minish, 300 yards distant, and some strong reefs, and has two or three entrances at high-water; at low-water it is dry." It is one of the safest boat-harbours in Galway bay.

KILLEEN, or KILLEENY, co. Dublin. See KILLINEY.

KILLEENADEEMA, or KILNADEEMA, a parish in the barony of Loughrea, 3 miles south by west of the town of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 8½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 24,503 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches,—of which 289 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches are in the lake of Loughrea, and 15 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 3,554; in 1841, 3,754. Houses 600. The surface ascends southward from Loughrea, to the boundary-line with Munster. The southern district, amounting to at least one-half of the whole area, consists of a wild section of the Slievebaughta mountains; but the northern district consists of good arable and pasture land. The two highest summits in the south have altitudes of 1,080 and 1,207 feet. The chief residences are Toureen, Grousehill, and Abbeyville; and the hamlets are Mountain-village, Millmount, Toornacnevin, Toorantoo, Tooraaglassa, Derrylaur, and Bellananallaght.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LOUGHREA [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £140 19s. 14d.; glebe, £4 14s. 6d. But a portion of the tithes, compounded for £12 18s. 5½d., is appropriated to the deanery of Clonfert. The Killeenadeema and Derrybryan Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 600 and 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Kiltessill. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 52, and the Roman Catholics to 3,507; and 6 daily schools—4 of which were salaried by the London Hibernian Society, and 2 of these 4 aided also with £5 each from the Earl of Clancarty—had on their books 206 boys and 119 girls.

KILLEENAGARRIFF. See KILNEGARRUFF.

KILLEENASTEENA, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 3½ miles south-south-west of Cashel, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 729 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches. Pop., in 1831, 202; in 1841, 220. Houses 31. The road from Golden to Clonmel passes through the interior.—This parish is a wholly impropriate rectory, in the dio. of Cashel; and a salary is paid to a neighbouring clergyman for the performance of occasional duties. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

KILLEENAVARRA. See KILLUNAVARA.

KILLEENDUFF, a creek on the coast of the barony of Tyreragh, between Achris-head and Pullocheny, co. Sligo, Connaught. It is frequented by fishing-boats, but has need of a pier.

KILLEENEEN. See KILLINEEN.

KILLEENEMER. See KILLEENEMOR.

KILLEENEY, KILLINNY, or KILLENHY, a parish 4½ miles west-north-west of Gort, and in the barony of Kiltartan, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,117 acres. 1 rood, 13 perches,—of which 3 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are in Cahirglassin lake. Pop., in 1831, 820; in 1841, 1,165. Houses 193. Three townlands formerly belonged to Dunkellin, and were transferred by the Act 6th and 7th William IV. Pop., in 1841, 436. The surface consists of limestone-land, light, chiefly pastoral, and very rocky; and partakes in the caverned and tunnelled perforations of rock which so singularly abound in the water-course in the vicinity of Gort.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCOLGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £27 13s. 6d., and the rectorial for £28 7s.; and the latter are appropriated to the bishop and the dean. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILLEEVAN, a parish, 2½ miles east of Clones, and in the barony of Dartry, co. Monaghan, Ulster. The Dartry section contains the village of NEWBLISS: which see. Length, south-south-westward, 5 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 11,571 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches,—of which 127 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches lie detached, and 55 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 8,261; in 1841, 8,417. Houses 1,463. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 7,851. Houses 1,364. The ecclesiastical parish is less extensive than the civil one, and had, in 1831, a pop. of 7,273. Two townlands formerly belonged to the barony of Monaghan, and were transferred by the act 6 and 7 William IV. Area, 257 acres, 13 perches. Pop., in 1841, 157. The land is, for the most part, good, fertile tillage ground. The bogs serve well for turbary, and are pretty equally and diffusively dispersed. The river Fina effects the drainage southward; and there are 7 small lakes and 4 tolerably large ones. The principal demesnes are those of Newbliss, Ballynure, and Killicumbent. The roads from Clones to Dublin and Ballyboy pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £518 15s. 5d.; glebe, £134 10s. Gross income, £653 5s. 5d.; nett, £559 3s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1794; and was enlarged in 1812, by means of a loan of £276 18s. 5½d., and a gift of £92 6s. 1½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 350. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 250, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to the chapel of Aughaboy. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,820 Churchmen, 520 Presbyterians, and 4,933 Roman Catholics; and 11 daily schools had on their books 588 boys and 350 girls. Two of the schools were salaried with respectively £8 and £10 from the National Board; three, with graduated allowances from the London Hibernian Society; and one, with £12 from subscription.

KILLEGALLY. See TESSAURAN.

KILLEGAN. See KILTEGAN.

KILLEGLAND, a parish in the barony of Ratoath, 2½ miles east of the town of Ratoath, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains the town of ASHBOURNE: which see. Length, 1 mile; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 716 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches. Pop., in 1831, 473; in 1841, 411. Houses 53. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 36. Houses 5.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Ratoath, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £54. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 200 to 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ratoath. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 49, and the Roman Catholics to 439; and 2 daily schools—the one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board, and the other with £13 18s. from the rector—had on their books 96 boys and about 40 girls.

KILLEGNEY, a parish in the north of the barony of Bantry, about 6 miles south-west of Enniscorthy, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 6,685 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,616; in 1841, 1,763. Houses 274. The surface is washed and bounded on the north by the rivulet Boro; and it is traversed by the roads from Dublin and from Enniscorthy to New Ross. A small portion of the land is of tolerably good quality; but all the remainder is very poor, and, unless frequently broken up, runs into moss or stunted furze. Some hills variegates the prevailing tame landscape, and are partly arable, and partly pastoral. Castleboro, the seat of Lord Carew, is a fine residence; and the plantations of its demesne extend over a considerable space, and form a pleasing relief to the pervading nakedness of the country. The hamlets are Barns and Cullenstown.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £304 12s. 4d. The rectory of Killegney, and the appropriate curacy of CHAPEL [which see], constitute the benefice of KILLEGNEY. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 2,443. Gross income, £380 13s. 8½d.; nett, £337 3s. 11½d. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Tecoline, in the dio. of Leighlin. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d., and the use of the glebe-house. The church was built in 1827, by means of a loan of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 90. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in the parish of Chapel. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 77, and the Roman Catholics to 1,569; the Protestants of the union to 140, and the Roman Catholics to 2,364; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 28 children; 2 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £15 from Lady Carew—was attended by about 75 children; and 6 daily schools in the union had on their books 142 boys and 89 girls, and were attended by about 68 other children.

KILLEHENY, or KILLAHINY, a parish on the west coast of the barony of Iraghtic Connor, 8½ miles west-north-west of Listowel, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the villages of BALLYBUNION and ARA-PHOND: see these articles. Area, 4,664 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 3,050; of the rural districts, 2,498. Houses in the whole, 474; in the rural districts, 391. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 2,209, and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 2,136. The surface lies immediately north of the embouchure of the Cashen river; and includes a large proportion of marshy, boggy, and coarse waste land.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LISTOWEL [which see], in the Co. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £41 10s., and the rectorial for £83; and the latter are inappropriate in Thomas Stoughton, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 2,270; and a hedge-school had on its books 30 boys and 20 girls.

KILLEIGH, a village in the parish and barony of Geashill, King's co., Leinster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Tullamore to Mountmellick, with that from Portarlinton to Frankford, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Tullamore, and $40\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south of Dublin. It claims a comparatively high antiquity, yet does not seem to have ever possessed much economical importance, and appears to have been remarkable only as an unusually crowded seat of monasticism. The number of its monasteries was three,—one for grey friars, one for Augustinian nuns, and one for Augustinian canons. The first is said to have been founded in the reign of Edward I.; the second pretends to have been founded by the Warren family shortly after the Anglo-Norman conquest; and the third is alleged to have originated in the sixth century. The remains of one of the monasteries still exist at the foot of a hill, and in the vicinity of the present Protestant place of worship. Killeigh ranks as a chapelry, and as part of the benefice of GEASHILL [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. The chapel is supposed to have been built about 1654; and was almost wholly rebuilt in 1830, by means of £599 12s., raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 350; attendance 180. The chaplain has a salary of £82. The district assigned to the chapelry, though not accurately defined, is understood to include one-third of all the Protestant population within the benefice. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,250; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Ballykean and Ballinegar. Fairs are held in the village on June 1, and Oct. 16. Area of the village, 35 acres. Pop., in 1831, 478; in 1841, 262. Houses 47.

KILLEIGHY. See BALLYKEAN.

KILLEILAGH, a parish in the north-west corner of the barony of Corcomroe, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west by north of Ennistymon, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the villages of ROADFORD and FISHER-STREET; which see. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 4; area, 12,357 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches,—of which 22 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,359; in 1841, 3,904. Houses 644. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,551. Houses 586. It lies along the South Sound, directly opposite the islands of Arran; and has a mountainous, broken, and pastoral surface. At the small bay of Doolin, which indents the coast, the schistose rocks which compose the cliffs all the way hither from the entrance of the Shannon, are succeeded by the limestone of the barony of Burren. In the vicinity of the bay is Doolin Castle, the seat of W. N. Macnamarra, Esq. No fewer than 9 or 10 hamlets are sprinkled over the interior. The chief roads are the coast one from Blackhead bay round to Ennistymon, and a branch one from this to Kilfenora.—This parish is a rectory, and a vicarage, in the dio. of Kilfenora. Tithe composition, £221 10s. 9d. The rectories and vicarages of Killeilagh and Kilmoon, and the rectory of Carrune [see KILMOON and CARRUNE], constitute the benefice of Killeilagh; but the rectory of Carrune is a sinecure. Pop., in 1831, 4,447. Gross income, £330 7s. 8d.; nett, £312 6s. 4d. Patron of the rectories, the Marquis of Thomond; of the vicarages, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kilmahon, in the dio. of Cloyne, and resides on that benefice. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Clouney. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and union amounted to 62; the Roman Catholics of the parish and union to respectively 3,546 and 4,712; 2 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £20 from the Baptist Society—had on their books 74 boys and 8 girls; and 2 other daily schools in the parish were shut during winter, and made no report of their attendance.

KILLEINY, or KILLINY, a parish on the north side of the barony of Corkaguiney, 10 miles north-east by east of Dingle, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the town of Castle-Gregory, and the village of Killeiny: see CASTLE-GREGORY. Length, 6 miles; area, 14,966 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,344; in 1841, 3,481. Houses 589. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,780. Houses 479. It includes the Seven Hogs and the Magharee islets, and the low, long, narrow peninsula which separates Brandon bay on the west from Tralee bay on the east; yet it has a comparatively small extent of low land, and runs chiefly up into the lofty, massive, and wild ridge of mountain which forms the huge backbone of Corkaguiney. Such portions as are disposed in arable fields and meadows are good and fertile. The villages of Cloghane and Killeiny had, in 1831, a pop. of 222 and 263.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £432 18s. 5d.; glebe, £13 16s. 11d. Gross income, £446 15s. 4d.; nett, £412 15s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is also surrogate of the diocese, and is non-resident. A curate has a salary of £100. The church was built in 1810, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 8 to 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of North Cloghane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 101, and the Roman Catholics to 3,453; an infant school made no return of its attendance; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 105 boys and 27 girls. In 1839, the National Board granted £126 toward the erection of a boys' school and a girls' school at Martramane.

KILLELAGH, or KILLILAGH, a parish in the barony of Loughinsholin, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of Maghera, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Length, 4 miles; medium breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 10,269 acres, 3 roods, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,046; in 1841, 3,258. Houses 579. Three-fourths of the surface are mountain, pasture, bog, and rocky ground; and nearly the whole has a cold, hilly soil, which requires frequent liming in order to be stimulated into fertility. About 630 Irish acres are lofty upland; and the mountain of Carnatochar rises on the western boundary, and has an altitude of 1,521 feet. The nascent rivulet Clody effects the drainage westward. A sandstone quarry is worked at Fallalea for the supply of the neighbouring country. The road from Belfast to Londonderry, by way of Dungiven, passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £200 15s. 1½d.; glebe, £100 7s. 8½d. Gross income, £301 2s. 10d.; nett, £255 6s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built about 30 years ago. Sittings 200; attendance, about 15. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in the benefice of Maghera. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 41 Churchmen, 415 Presbyterians, 7 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,704 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools—one of which was partially supported by the rector—had on their books 60 boys and 26 girls. In 1839, the National Board granted £73 10s. toward the erection of a school at Tirkane.

KILLELAN, a parish in the barony of Kilkea and Moone, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Castle-Dermot, co. Kildare, Leinster. Three detached portions lie respectively $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west by north, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ south by west, of Castle-Dermot. Length and breadth of the main body, each $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Area, of the whole, 7,378 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches; of the detached portions, 1,804 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,049; in 1841, 1,764. Houses 277. The land averages in annual value about 26s. per plantation acre. Davidstown, situated to the east of the Dublin and New Ross road, is the seat of R. Archbold, Esq.; and the other seats are Bellevue, Hughstown, Sheriff-hill, and Jarman's Cottage.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TIMOLIN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £110; glebe, £39. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £220, and are impropriate in Sir Richard Steele, Bart. In 1831, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 1,030; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILLELEAGH. See KILLYLEAGH.

KILLELONEHAN, KILLONEHAN, or KILLALATHAN, a parish, partly in the barony of Pubblebrien, and partly in that of Coshma, co. Limerick, Munster. The Pubblebrien section contains part of the town of St. Patrick's Well: see PATRICK'S-WELL (ST.). Length, 3 miles; breadth, from a few perches to $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile. Area of the Coshma section, 873 acres; of the Pubblebrien section, 1,196 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,085; in 1841, 982. Houses 146. Pop. of the Coshma section, in 1831, 482; in 1841, 422. Houses 58. Pop. of the rural districts of the Pubblebrien section, in 1831, 510; in 1841, 416. Houses 64. The surface is touched by the Limerick and Kerry road at St. Patrick's-Well; and it thence stretches away to the south-east. The land is in general good, and varies in annual value from 40s. to 60s. per plantation acre. Attyfin, the seat of J. Westropp, Esq., is near St. Patrick's Well; and another seat is Fort Etna.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Munchin's, in the dio. of Limerick. See MUNCHIN'S (ST.). Tithe composition, £124 12s. 3½d.; glebe, £11 1s. 6½d. A church, containing accommodation for 80 persons, has just been erected, by means of a contribution of £493 16s. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 55, and the Roman Catholics to 1,075; and a pay daily school had on its books 5 boys and 20 girls.

KILLELY, KILLEALY, or KILLYGALLY, a parish, partly in the barony of Lower Bunratty, co. Clare, and partly in the city of Limerick, and barony of Pubblebrien, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Bunratty section, 5,013 acres; of the Pubblebrien section, 1,210 acres; of the city of Limerick section, 360 acres of land, and 20 acres of water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,140; in 1841, 5,065. Houses 797. Pop. of the co. Clare section, in 1831, 2,030; in 1841, 1,955. Houses 307. Pop. of the Pubblebrien section, in 1841, 509. Houses 73. The Pubblebrien and the city of Limerick sections formerly belonged to the quondam county of the city of Limerick. The parochial surface extends in the direction of north-west from the Shannon; and is traversed by the road from Limerick to Ennis. It contains the hamlet of Meelick, and part of the wood of Cratloe: see CRATLOE. About two-thirds of the surface consist of good land; and the remainder is mountainous, and of inferior quality. A mountain on the northern boundary has an altitude of 1,010 feet. The chief residences in the Clare section are Woodcock-Hill, Punch-Bowl, Fort-Cottage, Burton, Summer-Hill, and Meelick.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £280; glebe, £50. Gross income, £249 10s.; nett, £312 17s. 11½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also a vicar choralship in Limerick cathedral. The church was built in 1735, at the private expense of Mr. Burton, an ancestor of the Marquis of Conyngham. Sittings 100; attendance, about 12. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 164 Churchmen, 17 Presbyterians, and 5,226 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 35 children; and 6 daily schools—one of which was supported partly by the rector, and another wholly by subscription, and by a charity sermon at the chapel—had on their books 136 boys and 142 girls.

KILLELY, or KILLILY, a parish in the barony of Ballaghkeen, 2 miles south-south-east of Oulart, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,811 acres. Pop., in 1831, 677; in 1841, 770. Houses 142. The surface consists of good land, declines to the east, and lies between the Irish sea and the east road from Wexford to Dublin. Within the limits is a portion of the village of Blackwater, containing, in 1831, a population of 177; and in the vicinity of that village is the demesne of Castle Talbot. See BLACKWATER.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of Castle-Ellis [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £39 13s. 6d.; glebe, £36 2s. 5d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £45 11s. 3d.; and are impropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth. The Roman Catholic chapel at Blackwater has an attendance of 3,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 25, and the Roman Catholics to 665; and 2 hedge-schools were usually attended by about 70 children.

KILLEMLAGH, KILLEMLY, or KILLEMLAGH, a parish on the west coast of the barony of Iveragh, 9 miles south by west of Cahirciveen, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 6; area, 11,857 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,548; in 1841, 2,728. Houses 466. But this statement of population includes also the parish of Kilconloe, whose length, breadth, and area, are respectively $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles, 4 miles, and 5,753 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches. The surface is for the most part loftily mountainous in character, and comparatively unproductive or at least light in soil. Yet some very good land occurs near the site of the quondam church, and around the head of the bay which sweeps round from Puffin Island to Bolus Head. This bay washes most of the coast of the parish, and has only one small creek where a boat can possibly land, and is often tumultuously lashed by a rolling and tumbling sea from the great swell of the Atlantic. See PUFFIN, BOLUS, and BALLINSKELLIGS.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £101 10s. 9d.; glebe, £60. The rectories of Killemlagh and Kilconloe, and a sinecure portion of the rectory of Ardfert, constitute the benefice of Killemlagh, and the corps of the treasurership of Ardfert cathedral. Gross income, £341 3s.; nett, £282 12s. 6½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate for Killemlagh has a salary of £55 7s. 8½d.; and a curate for the occasional duties of Kilconloe has a salary of £18 9s. 2½d. The curate of Killemlagh's house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 6. The Roman Catholic chapel of Port-Magee and Real have an attendance of respectively 700 and 550; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 2,710; one hedge-school had on its books 13 boys and 7 girls; and two other hedge-schools made no report of their attendance.

KILLEN, a village in the parish and barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. A fair is held on Dec. 4. Pop. not specially returned.

KILLEN, or KILCARRAGH. See KILCAR.

KILLENAGH, a parish near the northern extremity of the barony of Ballaghkeen, 5 miles south by east of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, southward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 3,232 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 704; in 1841, 734. Houses 129. The surface extends between the Irish sea and the river Avon-Banna, and consists, for the most part, of poor land. The chief hamlet is Killenagh; and the principal seats are Tomduff-house and Ballywalter-house. —This parish is an improper curacy, and part of the benefice of ARDAMINE [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes are wholly improper in H. K. G. Morgan, Esq., and are compounded for £145. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 123, and the Roman Catholics to 638; and a hedge-school was usually attended by about 28 children in summer. The Killenagh dispensary is within the Gorey Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 8,203; and, in 1839–40, it expended £147 0s. 3d., and administered to 2,112 patients.

KILLENANE. See KILLINANE.

KILLENAULE, a parish, containing a small market and post town of the same name, in the barony of Shieveardagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{4}$; area, 7,711 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,467; in 1841, 3,755. Houses 624. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,889; in 1841, 1,969. Houses 309. About one-half of the land has a light soil. The landscape, though containing a watershed between considerable affluents of the Suir, and lying upon a comparatively high basis, is interesting, and in some places almost picturesque. The principal country-seats are Lanepark, Killeen, Springhill, Roan, Clonbroggan, and Sherbourne. A good colliery, called Listen Rock, began long ago to be worked in the vicinity of the town; see TIPPERARY (County of). The roads from Urlingford to Clonmel and from Cashel to Callen intersect each other at the town, and occasion a considerable thoroughfare. The town is situated $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles north of Fethard, 11 south by west of Urlingford, and $7\frac{1}{4}$ south-west by south of Dublin. Though in a rather rich district, and somewhat advantageously situated for provincial trade, it is a sorry place. Fairs are held on Jan. 1, March 25, May 14, June 24, Aug. 14, and Oct. 17. A dispensary in the town is within the Cashel Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 7,336; and, in 1839–40, its receipts and disbursements amounted to respectively £88 12s. and £126 8s. The Kilkenny line of railway approaches within 24 statute miles of the town, the nearest point being at Ballyragget. A mail-car runs daily to Thurles. Area of the town, 34 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,578; in 1841, 1,786. Houses 315. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 143; in manufactures and trade, 160; in other pursuits, 84. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 173; on their own manual labour, 159; on means not specified, 45. —Killenaule parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Cashel. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £127 12s., and the rectorial for £200; and the latter are appropriated to the chancellorship of Cashel cathedral. The vicarages of Killenaule and ST. JOHNTOWN, and the rectories of COOLAGH, DRANGAN, MACOWRY, ISERTKERRIN, and BARRET'S-GRANGE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Killenaule. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 7,859. Gross income, £1,062 2s.; nett, £933 15s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is nonresident, and holds also the benefice of Kells, in the dio. of Ossory. One curate has a salary of £150, and another has a salary of £100 and the use of the glebe-house. The church was quite recently built, by means of a contribution of £689 6s. 5d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Sittings 200; attendance 150. The Killenaule and Moglass Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively above 3,000 and between 500 and 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Drangan. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 160, and the Roman Catholics to 3,486; the Protestants of the union to 353, and the Roman Catholics to 8,401; 6 daily schools in the parish had on their books 255 boys and 289 girls; and 14 daily schools in the union had 513 boys and 549 girls.

KILLENCARE, KILLENKERE, or KILLINKERE, a parish, partly in the barony of Upper Loughtee, but chiefly in that of Castleraghan, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles west by south of Bailieborough, and the same distance east by north of Ballyjamesduff, co. Cavan, Ulster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Loughtee section, 3,833 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches,—of which 32 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches are water. Area of the Castleraghan section, 12,078 acres, 36 perches,—of which 98 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 7,503; in 1841, 8,126. Houses 1,353. Pop. of the Loughtee section, in 1831, 2,110; in 1841, 1,894. Houses 328. Though the general surface is broken, and lies on a high basis, it is nearly all in tillage, and produces good and even abundant crops of oats. Some parts are let at an acreable rent of £2 per annum; and the whole averages from 20s. to 30s. per plantation acre. The two chief head-streams of the co. Meath Blackwater, effect most of the drainage. The hamlets are Killencare and Waterloo.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Vicarial tithe composition, £480; glebe, £347 11s. The rectorial tithes are estimated in annual value at £550, and are improper in the Marquis of Westmeath. Gross income of the benefice, £827 11s.; nett, £684 14s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The church was built in 1817, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 164. The greater portion of the parish is included within the perpetual curacy of Mullagh, which has a church of its own; see MULLAGH. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, the one formerly Secessional, and the other of the Synod of Ulster, have an attendance of respectively 60 and 150; and two Roman Catholic chapels are mutually united in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, and have jointly an attendance of 1,436. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,085 Churchmen, 1,194 Presbyterians, and 5,762 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 62 children; and 12 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £36 18s. 6d. from Lord Farnham, one with £24 from the London Hibernian Methodist Society, and two with respectively £5 and £25 from subscription—had on their books 550 boys and 384 girls. In 1840, the National Board had a boys' school and a girls' school at Finternaght.

KILLENORTY, KILNORTY, OF CILLENUGHTY, a parish in the baronies of Coshma and Pubblebrien, co. Limerick, Munster. Area of the Coshma section, 104 acres; of the Pubblebrien section, 754 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 420; of the Coshma section, 88. Houses in the whole, 67; in the Coshma section, 14. The Census of 1831 places the whole parish in Pubblebrien, and states its pop. at 390.—This parish is in the dio. of Limerick, and is wholly appropriated to the diocesan. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILLENTIERNA, a parish in the baronies of Magonihy and Trughenackmy, 3½ miles south by west of Castle-Island, co. Kerry, Munster. Area of the Magonihy section, 1,211 acres; of the Trughenackmy section, 9,020 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 3,106; of the Magonihy section, 366. Houses in the whole, 480; in the Magonihy section, 65. The Census of 1831 places the whole parish in Trughenackmy, and states its pop. at 2,079. The surface is washed by the Brown Flesk, and traversed by the road from Castle-Island to Killarney; and it presents a series of mixed tillage, rough pasture, barren heath, naked rock, red bog, and wooded glen.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £283 7s. 2d. The rectories of Killentierma and DYSERT [see that article], constitute the benefice of Killentierma. Pop., in 1831, 3,510. Gross income, £499 18s. 1d.; nett, £473 5s. 3d. Patrons, the proprietors of the seignory of Castle-Island. The church was built in 1814, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 80; attendance 16. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 18, and the Roman Catholics to 2,214; the Protestants of the union to 47, and the Roman Catholics to 3,717; 2 hedge-schools in the parish had on their books 65 boys and 35 girls; and there were also 2 hedge-schools in Dysert.

KILLENUMERY, a parish in the barony of Dromahaire, 1½ mile south by east of the town of Dromahaire, co. Leitrim, Connaught. Length, south-eastward, 5½ miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 14,086½ acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,115; in 1841, 4,605. Houses 750. The surface is to a large extent upland, and consists in general of indifferent land. A skirt of the Arigna mineral field lies within the southern border. The Bonnet river washes the north border; and is there overlooked by the mansion of Friarstown.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ardagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £150; glebe, £285. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £70, and are inappropriate in Robert Baker, Esq. of Sligo. The vicarages of Killenumery and KILLERY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Killenumery. Length, 16 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 7,084. Gross income, £513 9s. 2d.; nett, £474 10s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church of Killenumery was built in 1822, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 60. There is a church also in Killery. The Roman Catholic chapel of Killenumery has an attendance of about 500. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Killery. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 659, and the Roman Catholics to 3,620; the Protestants of the union to 988, and the Roman Catholics to 6,411; 7 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £12 from the Baptist Society—had on their books 293 boys and 167 girls; and 11 daily schools in the union had 450 boys and 264 girls.

KILLENVOY, a parish in the barony of Athlone, 5½ miles east by south of Athleague, co. Rosecommon, Connaught. It contains the village of KNOCKCROGHERY: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 6,554 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch,—of which 911 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches are in Lough Ree, and 5 acres, 24 perches are in Lough Collog. Pop., in 1841, 2,388. Houses 425. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,125. Houses 382. The pop. of the whole, in 1831, is stated by the Census at 2,402; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 2,250. The surface extends westward from the shore of Lough Ree; is bisected by the road from Roscommon to Athlone; consists, for the most part, of good arable and pasture land; and is decorated with the demesnes of Mount-Plunkett, Churchborough, Sandfield, and Sreagg.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £65; glebe, £35 12s. 6d. The rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Kilmean and Raharrow, are compounded for £186 7s., and are inappropriate in the Incorporated Society. The vicarages of Killenvoy, KILMEAN, PORTERIN, IVERNOON, and RAHARROW [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Killenvoy. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 6½. Pop., in 1831, 9,693. Gross income, £323 4s. 4d.; nett, £266 6s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1822, by means of a loan of £1,384 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. KILLEON. KILLIAN.

KILLERERAN, a parish, 4½ miles east-south-east of Tuam, and partly in the baronies of Ballymoe, Dunmore, and Tyaquin, but chiefly in the barony of Clare, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 6. Area of the Ballymoe section, 674 acres, 3 roods, 2 perches; of the Dunmore section, 1,634 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches; of the Tyaquin section, 1,918 acres, 7 perches,—of which 7 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches are water; of the Clare section, 10,307 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 4,782; of the Ballymoe section, 116; of the Dunmore section, 338; of the Tyaquin section, 705; of the Clare section, 3,603. Houses in the Ballymoe section, 20; in the Dunmore section, 61; in the Tyaquin section, 117; in the Clare section, 613. The Ecclesiastical Authorities state the pop., in 1831, at 4,307; and the Census states it at 4,643. Transferences of some townlands from barony to barony were made in the recent changes. See GALWAY (County of). The surface consists in a general view of light sheep pasture-ground, with a large proportion of interspersed bog; and though containing several extensive tracts of good land, is so flat, so ill-cultivated, so devoid of embellishment, and so unpleasantly powdered with wretched huts, as to have a poor and desolate appearance. A group of trees around the parish-church, the scattered trees of Castle-Moyle, the scanty decorations of Mr. M. J. Blake's demesne of Brooklodge, and some gravelly ridges and low hills in the vicinity of that demesne, are almost the only objects which relieve the monotony of wide-spread flatness and of intermixed bog and meadow. The highest ground has an altitude of 373 feet above sea-level. The only noticeable residences besides Castle-Moyle, are Hillsbrook and Barbersfort. The nascent rivulet Moyne, and the mail-road from Dublin to Westport, pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £341 10s.; glebe, £28. The rectories of Killreran and ABBEYKNOCKMOY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Killreran. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 7,173. Gross income, £589 10s.; nett, £517 7s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1823, by means of a loan of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel of Killreran has an attendance of 500; and there is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Abbeyknockmoy. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 90, and the Roman Catholics to 4,539; the Protestants of the union to 112, and the Roman Catholics to 7,611; and 8 daily schools in the union—7 of which were in the parish—had on their books 197 boys and 101 girls, and were attended by about 100 other children. Three of the schools in the parish were in connection with the London Hibernian and Tuam Diocesan Societies; one was in connection with the London Hibernian and London Ladies' Hibernian Societies; and one was salaried with £20 from Mr. Blake.

KILLERICK, or KILLERBIO, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Carlow, 5½ miles east by north of the town of Carlow, co. Carlow, Leinster. It consists of a chief district, and of three detached portions, which lie respectively 2, 6, and 7½ miles south-west of the chief district. Area of the whole, 5,318 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches; of the detached portion, 1,132 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches. Pop., in 1841, 860. Houses 129. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 1,336; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 1,261. The land is in general good. The principal residences are Busherstown, Russelstown, Ardnehoe, Borton, and Dackell's Grove.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of URGLIN [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. The tithes are compounded for £360, and are wholly impropriate in the representatives of the late H. Bunbury of Russelstown and Humphry of Dublin; and a salary of £15 15s. is paid by the impropiators to the incumbent. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 76, and the Roman Catholics to 1,202; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILLERIES (THE), two bays at the boundary between the counties of Galway and Mayo, Connaught. The smaller one, called the Little Killery, ramifies from near the entrance of the larger, projects to the extent of about 3 miles, and lies all within co. Galway. The larger, usually called Killery Harbour, separates over its whole length the county of Galway from that of Mayo, projects to the extent of about 10 miles, and extends first in the direction of south-east by east, and next in a direction nearly due east. Both bays are narrow, and overhung with mountains, and closely resemble the fiords of Norway and the sea-lochs of the western Highlands of Scotland. The Greater Killery, or Killery Harbour, varies from ¼ to ½ of a mile in width, and is so precipitously screened by steep and lofty mountains as to image in some degree the idea of a stupendous natural canal. It is throughout an excellent harbour, capable of holding large ships, and having, over a great part of its extent, a depth of from 10 to 12 fathoms; yet, in consequence of occasional squalls, strong and sudden, from the mountains, it is often unsafe for small sailing boats. Its salmon fishery is valuable; and its fisheries of cod, haddock, and herring, are plentiful. The river Errive is precipitated into the harbour, nearly at its head; the Bundurra rivulet enters its north side; the Marquis of Sligo's mountain-lodge at Delphi, stands adjacent in the glen of the Bundurra; the Muilrea mountain-group magnificently soars over it to a monarch position among the neighbouring mountains; and the hill or pass of Salruc commands from the interior a superb and exquisitely thrilling view of the harbour itself, and of its screens, its entrance, and its seaward aspect. See ERRIVE, BUNDURRA, DELPHI, MUILREA, and SALRUC. "After passing through a somewhat more open country," says Mr. Inglis, "I suddenly dropped down upon the Killery. The Killery is a narrow, deep inlet of the sea, reaching far up into the country, and bounded on both sides, and throughout its whole extent, by a range of mountains nearly as elevated, and of as picturesque forms, as any in Ireland. It may easily be conceived how great the attractions of this scene must be. It is of an entirely novel character; and resembles more the scenery of a Norwegian fiord, than anything I know near home. The inlet is not above an English mile across; several parts of the mountain boundary rise abruptly from the water; but there are here and there clefts and hollows, which discover more elevated peaks beyond, and show the breadth and extent of the range. There is no scene in England of the same character as the Killery; nor another in Ireland either, on so grand a scale. If the mountain sides on the Killery were wooded, it would be almost unnecessary to travel into Norway in search of scenery."

KILLERMUGH, or KILDERMOY, a parish in the barony of Clarmallagh, 1½ mile north of Durrow, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,764 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,078; in 1841, 1,114. Houses 190. The land is in general a light limestone soil, suitable for tillage. The surface declines to the south, and is traversed by the road from Durrow to Mountrath. The only seat is Eglish. Killermogh was anciently called Arnmuighe, and is said to have had a Culdee establishment, founded by St. Columb.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £142; glebe, £340. Gross income, £482; nett, £418 4s. 7d. Patrons, the Ladies Fitzpatrick. The church was built in 1809, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; attendance 60. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 120, and the Roman Catholics to 985; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 20 children, and 2 daily schools—the one of which was salaried with £4 from the Ladies Fitzpatrick, and the other with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and £2 and a rood of ground from the rector—had on their books 40 boys and 59 girls.

KILLERSHERDINY, KILDESHERDUN, or KILDRUMSHERDUN, a parish in the barony of Tullaghgarvey, 2½ miles south-west of Cootehill, co. Cavan, Ulster. It contains the villages of CLEMENTSTOWN, and TULLYVIN: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 16,618 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches,—of which 107 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,997; in 1841, 10,208. Houses 1,685. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 9,867. Houses 1,624. About one-eighth of the surface consists of middle-rate land; and most of the remainder is bog and mountain. The Annalee river effects the drainage westward. The principal mansions and villas are Annalee, Fort-Henry, Rathkenny, Tullyvin, Fort-William, Drumsheil, and Ashfield. The road from Dublin to Clones traverses the eastern border. There are several villages and hamlets; and the inhabitants are engaged in the manufacture of linen-yarn and cloth.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Vicarial tithe composition, £250; glebe, £410 13s. 7d. Gross income, £660 13s. 7d.; nett, £482 18s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the chancellorship of the dio. of Ossory, and a vicar choralship, and the sinecure prebend of Tassagard, in the cathedral of St. Patrick's, Dublin. The rectorial tithes of Killersherdiny, are compounded for £230, and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Westmeath. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1795, by means of a donation of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 140; attendance 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,540; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ashfield. The perpetual curacy of Ashfield was originally erected within Killersherdiny, but it is now regarded, both civilly and ecclesiastically, as a separate parish. See ASHFIELD. In 1834, the parishioners of Killersherdiny consisted of 450 Churchmen, 501 Presbyterians, 2 other Protestant dissenters, and 5,249 Roman Catholics; and 10 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £50 Irish, under the will of William Moore, one with £5 from subscription, and allowances from the London Hibernian Society, and two with £8 each from the National Board—had on their books 442 boys and 294 girls.

KILLERY, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Tiraghrill, and of co. Sligo, 5 miles south-south-east of the town of Sligo, Connaught. It contains the village of BALLINTOGER: which see. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 9,094 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches,—of which 193 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches form a detached district, 844 acres, 3 roods, 14 perches are in Lough Gill, and 8 acres, 2 roods, 35 perches are in Lough Lunnan. Pop., in 1831, 2,969; in 1841, 3,298. Houses 601. The land is in general good; and Slishearow mountain occupies the northern border, and screens the head of Lough Gill.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLENUMERY [which see], in the dio. of Ardagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £78 9s. 2d., and the rectorial for £32 6s. 2d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Robert Baker, Esq., of Sligo. The church was built in 1715, at the sole expense of a private individual.

Sittings 90; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 329, and the Roman Catholics to 2,791; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the London Hibernian Society, and one with £5 from the Irish Society—had on their books 157 boys and 97 girls.

KILLERY, cos. Galway and Mayo. See KILLERIES (THE).

KILLESHANDRA, a parish in the barony of Tullaghonoho, co. Cavan, Ulster. It contains the town of Killeshandra, and the village of Arvagh. See ARVAGH. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 22,241 acres, 11 perches,—of which 323 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches form a detached portion, and 1,212 acres, 28 perches are water. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 12,552; of the rural districts, 10,852. Houses in the whole, 2,149; in the rural districts, 1,859. The Census of 1831 states the entire pop. in that year at 14,475, but includes the parish of Scrabby; and the Ecclesiastical Authorities state the pop. in 1831, at 7,284, but exclude the perpetual curacy of Arvagh.—The parochial surface includes a large part of the west side of the basin of the Erne; and it is richly embellished in a transverse direction, by the stream and the chain of lakes of the rivulet Croghan, sweeping past the town, and terminating at Lough Oughter. The extreme south partakes the majestic beauty of Lough Garta, whose shores are wooded, and whose height above sea-level is 224 feet; the district immediately north of this, is chiefly a series of pastoral grounds, diversified with lakes; and the districts farther north vary in almost constant tumulations from the bold hill to the gentle swell, and, but for being defaced by bad culture, wretched cabins, and numerous divisional ditches, would exhibit an almost continuous series of pleasing landscapes. The localities of Castle-Hamilton, immediately adjoining the town, are rich in scenic power: See CASTLE-HAMILTON. The land of the parish may be regarded as of five qualities, the best of which can produce no stronger a crop than oats. The interior is traversed by the road from Cavan to Central Leitrim, by that from Enniskillen to Oldcastle, and by that from Ballyconnell to Longford. The principal residences are Bruce-hall, Laurel-bank, Corranery-lodge, Cornhouse, Drumgoon, Rookfield, Port-Aluff, Springfield, Oakhill, Tully, Gartinardress, Lakeview, Lahard, Portlongfield, and Hackwood.—The market and post town of Killeshandra stands at an intersection of these roads and on the rivulet Croghan, 4½ miles north-west of Crossdoney, 6½ south-south-east of Ballyconnell, 22 south of Enniskillen, and 61 north-west of Dublin. It occupies a romantic site, on a gentle ridgy hill, environed by the Croghan's chain of interesting lakes; and consists principally of one street, spacious, clean, and of better character than might be anticipated in so sequestered a region. It contains three places of worship, a sessions-house, and various schools. Though comparatively little regular trade exists, a rather large quantity of coarse linens and of agricultural produce is sold at the weekly markets. Fairs are held on June 28, March 28, May 9, June 22, July 15, Aug. 19, Sept. 28, and Nov. 8. A coach runs three times a-week to Dublin. A dispensary in the town is within the Cavan Poor-law union, and, in 1839-40, it expended £102, and administered to 1,175 patients. In 1841, the Killeshandra Loan Fund had a capital of £2,092, circulated £9,270 in 2,206 loans, cleared £66 19s. 8d. of nett profit, and expended £70 10s. for charitable purposes. Area of the town, 48 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,137; in 1841, 1,085. Houses 189. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 55; in manufactures and trade, 126; in other pursuits, 50. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 17; on the directing of labour, 122; on their own manual labour, 76; on means not specified, 16.—Killeshandra parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £660; glebe, £471 5s. Gross income, £1,331 5s.; nett, £1,209 13s. 9d. Patron, Trinity college, Dublin. Two curates have each a salary of £80; and one of them has the use of the glebe-house and garden. The parochial church was probably built before the Reformation. Sittings 400; attendance 270. A chapel-of-ease at Derrylane was built in 1833, by means of a gift of £800 from the late Board of First Fruits, and a donation of £100 from Lord Farnham. Sittings 400; attendance 320. The Wesleyan chapel has an attendance of 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Arragh. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,540 Churchmen, 425 Presbyterians, and 4,702 Roman Catholics; and 11 daily schools—2 of which were wholly supported by Lord Farnham, and 4 were in connection with the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 448 boys and 381 girls.

KILLESHER, a parish in the barony of Glenawley, 3½ miles north of Swanlinbar, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 4; area, 24,936 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches,—of which 642 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches are in Lower Lough Macnean, and 24 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches are in the river Erne and in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 5,114; in 1841, 5,225. Houses 875. The surface includes the chief part of the Dowbally mountains; extends from Lower Lough Macnean along the Arney to the Erne; and is to a great extent embellished by the noble demesne and the improved estate of FLORENCE COURT: which see. About 12,958½ acres are arable and pasture land; and the remainder of the surface, with the exception of water, is bog and mountain. Slieve-Cuileagh, on the southern boundary, has an altitude of 2,188 feet. Three rivulets among the Dowbally mountains sink into subterranean tunnels, make a confluence below the ground, and re-issue under a natural marble arch. The road from Killeshandra to Enniskillen passes through the interior, and has the post-office of the Cross-Road of Florence Court 3½ miles north of Swanlinbar. The hamlet of Whitehill is within the limits.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £200; glebe, £1,077 4s. 1d. Gross income, £1,277 4s. 1d.; nett, £1,211 3s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is nonresident, and holds the benefice of Termonmaguirke in the dio. of Armagh. A curate has a salary of £83 1s. 6½d. The church was built upwards of 55 years ago, by means of subscription and parochial assessment; and was enlarged and improved in 1819, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance 200. The Roman Catholic chapels at Whitehill and Cross-Road have an attendance of respectively 300 and 476; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 2,457, and the Roman Catholics to 2,641; 5 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 214 children; and 8 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board, one with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, and four with respectively £4 4s., £5 5s., £10 10s., and £26 from subscription—had on their books 323 boys and 227 girls. In 1840, the National Board had at Cross-Roads a boys' school and a girls' school, salaried with £15 and £6, and attended by 66 boys and 49 girls.

KILLESHELL, or KILLISHILL, a parish on the west border of the barony of Dungannon, 3½ miles east by north of Ballygawley, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 9,839 acres, 2 roods, 21 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,615; in 1841, 4,985. Houses 910. Part of the surface consists of good clay land; a large proportion consists of the lightest reclaimed peat mountain; and the remainder consists of land of almost every variety of character, intermediate between clay and bog. A head-stream of the Blackwater effects the chief drainage southward. The road from Ballygawley to Dungannon passes through the interior. The principal seats are the glebe-house and Fort-Edward.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £280 18s. 6½d.; glebe, £403 5s. 1d. Gross income, £684 3s. 7½d.; nett, £548 3s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1768, by means of a gift of £444 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 60. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses have an attendance of respectively 430 and 247. A Roman Catholic place of meeting in the open air is attended by 750; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to a similar place of meeting and to a chapel in Donaghmore. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 480 Churchmen, 1,429 Presbyterians, 45 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,890 Roman Catholics; and 6 daily schools had on their books 320 boys and 263 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one, with £12 from the National Board; two with £7 each from Colonel Verner; and two, with respectively £8 and £2 from Mr. Gough.

KILLESBIN, a parish in the south-east corner of the barony of Slievemargy, and of Queen's County, Leinster. It contains the town of GRAIGUE, and the village of SLEATY-GRAIGUE: see these articles. Length and breadth, each 5 miles; area, 10,905 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches,—of which 31 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches are in the river Barrow. Pop., in 1831, 5,152; in 1841, 5,278. Houses 891. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,286. Houses 553. The surface includes part of the Slievemargy mountains, a chief part of the small basin of the Fishoge rivulet, and a belt of low ground along the Barrow; and it varies in the quality of its land from 2s. 6d. to 60s. per plantation acre per annum. The highest ground is on the southern border, and has an altitude of 1,102 feet. The principal residences are Springhill, Crossleigh, Laurel-lodge, Fruit-hill, Everton, Graigue, the Barn, Olderrig, Mayfield, Curragh, Herondale, Ballyharmon, and Moorfield. "The cut of Killesbin," about three miles from Carlow, on the way to the collieries of the great Leinster coal-field, has been justly regarded as a great artificial curiosity, and was described in 1801, by Sir Charles Coote, as follows: "It commences on the rise of the mountain, and is the main road to the colliery. This pass runs through a lofty hill for above half-a-mile in length, and is from 10 to 40 feet deep, according to the ascent of the ground; it is only 4 feet 4 inches wide, cut through the solid quarry, and so narrow, that the car has barely room to pass, the wheels scraping either side of the rock, and was the axle-tree but half-an-inch wider than 4 feet 4 inches, it never could pass through; consequently all the axle-trees of the cars are fitted to this measure. The constant flow of water here, and the friction of the wheels, cuts the rock, and has occasioned the extraordinary excavation, which has been reduced to its present great depth in the short space of 30 years." "Contiguous to this remarkable cut of Killesbin,"—we still quote from Sir Charles Coote,—“are the ruins of a church of the same name, which has a very antique and highly ornamental entrance in the Doric order, of really excellent workmanship, and around which is an inscription, in very old Saxon characters, but so battered and abused as to be almost totally defaced. Adjoining this church was a Danish rath, encircled with a very deep fosse. This place is remarkable for having once been the chief town in the Queen's county in disturbed times, though not a stone building is now standing, except the ruins just mentioned. Here was the county gaol and courthouse, where the assizes were held, and the governor's mansion, which was a fine building; also a fort and public buildings, of which there is now no trace. The stone stocks and gallows stood the wreck of time the longest, and their sites are pointed out by the old people, in whose recollection they yet are."—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, and gross income, £461 10s. 9d.; nett, £432 1s. 7d. Patrons, the Crown and the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the archdeaconry of Glandelough; and is non-resident. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1826, by means of a gift of £923 1s. 6½d. and a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 250. The Roman Catholic chapels at Graigue, Killeslin, and Everton, have an attendance of respectively 3,000, 800, and 80; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 379 Churchmen, 23 Protestant dissenters, and 4,645 Roman Catholics; and 9 daily schools—one of which was salaried with a sum not reported from the National Board, one with £7 from the Association for Discourteous Vice, and these two, and another with certain sums from subscription—had on their books 297 boys and 125 girls.

KILLESK, a parish in the barony of Ballaghkeen, 4½ miles south-east of Enniscorthy, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,037 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,036; in 1841, 1,268. Houses 224. The land is for the most part good.—This parish is an improper curacy, and part of the benefice of CASTLE-ELLIS [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £76 5s. 5d.; glebe, £31 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £87 16s. 10d., and are improper in the Earl of Portsmouth. In 1834, the parishioners, with 3 exceptions, were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILLESK, a parish in the barony of Shelbourne, 3½ miles north-east by north of Ballyhack, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 2,820 acres, 29 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,009; in 1841, 1,067. Houses 172. Very nearly all the surface is arable ground. One hill on the south boundary, and another on the north border, have altitudes of respectively 256 and 276 feet. The only mansion is Bodeevan. A feudal castle still exists in tolerable preservation.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £200; glebe, £1 1s. The rectory of Killesk, and the improper curacies of ST. JAMES', DUNBRODY, and RATHROE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Killesk or St. James'. Length and breadth, each 7 miles. Pop., in 1831, 5,131. Gross income, £219 10s. 3d.; nett, £164 2s. 3d. Patron, Lord Templemore. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church is in St. James'; and there is also a chapel in Duncannon Fort. The Roman Catholic chapels are at Duncannon and Ramsgreen. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish were all Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 131 Churchmen, and 5,103 Roman Catholics; a hedge-school in the parish was attended by about 25 children; and there were 13 daily schools in the union.

KILLESK, co. Dublin. See KILLEEK.

KILLESKIN. See KILLESKIN.

KILLESKY, or KILLISKY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Newcastle, 4½ miles north-west of Wicklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 9,231½ acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,169; in 1841, 2,211. Houses 309. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 157. Houses 23. The surface is singularly rich in those combinations of grand, romantic, and beautiful landscape for which the best parts of the county of Wicklow are celebrated; and, while naturally opulent in scenes of high character and great power, it acquires softness and finish from a comparative profusion of demesnes and plantations. One hill on the west boundary, another near the centre, and Dunran-hill on the north boundary, have altitudes of respectively 581, 968, and 1,122 feet. The chief features of interest will be found noticed under the words DUNRAN, DEVIL'S GLEN, VARTREY, and GLENMORE: which see. The road from Dublin to Wicklow traverses the interior; and while within the limits passes through the well-wooded glen of Kiltymon, which forms part of the demesne of Hugh Eccles, Esq. The principal seats, in addition to Kiltymon, are Glenmore-Castle, Dunran-house, Sweetbank, Grange, and Ballycurry.—This parish is a chapelry, and part of the benefice of WICKLOW [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The tithes are returned cumulatively with those of the chapelries of Glanely, Rathnew, and Kilcommon; and one-third of them belongs to the incumbent of the benefice,—two-thirds to the prebendary of Wicklow, a dignitary of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. The chapel was built in 1818, by means of a gift of £780 9s. 2½d., and a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and was recently enlarged by means of contributions of £456 4s. 3d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £186 from private sources. Sittings, previous to the enlargement, 250; attendance, from 200 to 250. A curate for the chapelry has a salary of £70. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,200 to 1,400. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 448 Churchmen, 11 Presbyterians, and 1,892 Roman Catholics; 3 daily schools—two of which were almost wholly supported by respectively Mr. Fletcher and Mrs. Tottingham—had on their books 53 boys and 79 girls; and two other daily schools—the one of which was salaried with £30 and other advantages from the Rev. Mr. Crofton, and the other with £30 and a house from Mr. Syngé—were probably attended by about 90 children.

KILLEROLAN. See CASTLE-BLAKENNY.

KILLESTER, a parish in the barony of Coolock, 2½ miles north-east of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, ¾; area, 279 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 113; in 1841, 456. Houses 64. The small village of Killester is adorned with one extensive demesne, and several handsome villas. Killester-house, the principal residence, was recently the seat of Viscount Newcomen, and is a spacious and pleasing mansion, in the midst of tastefully disposed grounds. The manor of Killester was, in 1174, granted by the prior of Christ-church, Dublin, to Adrien le Brun, for the annual payment of 40 pence sterling, and a pair of slippers. The village was for many years the residence of a branch of the Coote family, descended from the second son of the celebrated Sir Charles Coote, the republican general. Maryville, in the vicinity of the village, was recently the seat of Viscount Frankfort de Montmorency, and received from him several considerable additions. The demesne which surrounds it is highly improved and very tastefully planted, and commands beautiful views of the Irish sea, the islands of Lambay, and Ireland's Eye, the promontory of Howth, the south shore of Dublin bay, and the fine perspective of the Wicklow mountains.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Dublin; and is wholly appropriated to the economy fund of Christchurch, Dublin. Tithe composition, £18 9s. 2d. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 25 Churchmen, 2 Protestant dissenters, and 86 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was attended by about 20 children; and a free daily school had on its books 16 boys and 17 girls.

KILLETTER, a village in the parish of Leckpatrick, barony of Strabane, 3 or 4 miles north of the town of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Fairs are held on July 12, Oct. 26, and Nov. 19. Pop. returned with the parish.

KILLEVALLY, a village in the parish of Newtown, and on the eastern verge of the barony of Moycashel, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Athlone, half-a-mile west-south-west of Tyrrel's Pass. Area, 14 acres. Pop., in 1831, 186; in 1841, 121. Houses 23.

KILLEVAN. See KILLEEVAN.

KILLEVY, or KILSLEVE, a parish, 3 miles west of Newry, and partly in the barony of Lower Orior, but chiefly in that of Upper Orior, co. Armagh, Ulster. Length, 9½ miles; breadth, 4½. Area of the Lower Orior section, 4,191 acres, 27 perches; of the Upper Orior section, 23,983 acres, 6 perches,—of which 16 acres, 2 roods are tideway, and 96 acres, 32 perches are fresh water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 17,197; in 1841, 17,789. Houses 3,280. Pop. of the Upper Orior section, in 1831, 14,188; in 1841, 15,349.* Houses 2,844. The ecclesiastical parish of Killevy excludes the two perpetual curacies of Meigh and Camlough, and had, in 1831, a pop. of only 4,259. See CAMLOUGH and MEIGH. Upwards of three-fourths of the surface is arable land; and the remainder is lake, bog, and mountain. SLIEVEGULLION [which see], is on the western boundary; DRUMBANAGHER [which also see], imparts high decoration to the northern district; Lough Cam is in the central district; and Killevy-lodge, the seat of P. Foxall, Esq., stands in the midst of extensive improvements which constitute a marked feature in a wild tract of country. The principal residences, besides Mr. Foxall's, are Hawthorn, Chelsea, Heath-hall, Carrickbroad, Mount-Caulfield, Millvale, Bessbrook, and Mountain-house. The roads from Newry to Newtown-Hamilton, and from Dundalk to Armagh, pass through the interior. An alleged St. Monnena, whom some writers represent as the sister of St. Patrick, and others as a person who lived upwards of a century later than the time of St. Patrick, is pretended by certain monastic compilers to have been the superioress of a nunnery at Kilsleve.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the precentorship of Armagh cathedral, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £1,271 12s. 7d.; glebe, £469 11s. 1d. Gross income, £1,741 3s. 8d.; nett, £1,424 17s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure chancellorship of Lismore cathedral. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is situated at Drumbanagher, and was built in 1832, by means of a loan of £2,000 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitzings 500; attendance 140. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, the one formerly Secessional, and the other of the Synod of Ulster, have an attendance of respectively 350 and 428. The Roman Catholic chapel at Lessummon has an attendance of 460; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Lestrea and Carrickeruppon. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 723 Churchmen, 1,953 Presbyterians, and 1,581 Roman Catholics; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £13 from the National Board, one with £12 from Mr. Hall, one with £5 5s. from Mrs. Hall, one with £10 from Col. Close, and one with £10 from Mrs. Close—had on their books 291 boys and 175 girls.

KILLEYMUR, or KILLIMER, a parish in the south-west corner of the barony of Clonderalaw, 4 miles east by south of Kilrush, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 5; area, 6,302 acres, 3 roods, 30 perches,—of which 36 acres, 7 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,023; in 1841, 3,241. Houses 491. The surface is washed on the south-east by Clonderalaw bay, and on the south by the estuary of the Shannon; it consists partly of arable land, but chiefly of pastoral and waste ground; it has been undergoing great improvement from the free use of sea-manure; and it is embellished upon Clonderalaw bay by the demesne of Burrane, and north-west of Killeymur by the demesne of Donogorogue. The highest ground has an altitude of 233 feet. The hamlets are Killeymur and Dysert. The road from Ennis to Kilrush passes along the coast.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILMURRY-CLONDERALAW [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £83 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £1 1s. Part of the rectorial tithes are compounded for £55 7s. 8½d., and appropriated to an ecclesiastical incumbent; and the remainder are compounded for £64 12s. 3½d., and are impropriate in Lord Castlecoote. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 23, and the Roman Catholics to 3,223; and two daily schools—one of which was a free school, under the superintendence of the Roman Catholic clergyman—had on their books 78 boys and 54 girls.

KILLEYMUR, or KILLIMER, co. Galway. See KILLIMORE-DALY.

KILLIAGH. See KILLAGH, co. Westmeath.

KILLIAN, a barony on the eastern border of co. Galway, Connaught. It is bounded, on the west and north-west, by Tyaquin; on the north, by Ballymoe; on the east, by the river Suck, which divides it from co. Roscommon; and on the south and south-west, by Kilconnel. Length, nearly southward, 11 miles; breadth, from 1½ mile to 10 miles; area, 52,388 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches,—of which 459 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches are water. A very large proportion of the surface, especially in the north and along the Suck, is bog; and hardly a spot of it rises in character above the utmost tameness. The chief interior stream is the Shiven.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ahascragh, Athleague, Moylough, and Taughboy, and the whole of the parishes of Ballinakill, Killeraran, and Killian. The chief villages are Mount-Bellew and Ballygar. Pop., in 1831, 16,432; in 1841, 17,122. Houses 2,781. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,297; in manufactures and trade, 433; in other pursuits, 139. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,638; who could read but not write, 877; who could neither read nor write, 4,980. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 545; who could read but not write, 523; who could neither read nor write, 6,422. Killian lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Ballinasloe.

* Two townlands were transferred from Lower Orior to Upper Orior, by the Act 6 and 7 William IV.

The total number of tenements valued is 2,575; and of these, 1,780 were valued under £5,—580, under £10,—77, under £15,—28, under £20,—12, under £25,—10, under £30,—20, under £40—9, under £50,—and 59, at and above £50.

KILLIAN, a parish in the barony of Killian, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Mount-Bellew, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 13,564 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches,—of which 14 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,401; in 1841, 5,671. Houses 937. The surface extends west-north-westward from Ballinamore, and is bisected by the rivulet Shiven. The ground in the swells and ridgy hillocks which are free from bog, is for the most part well suited to tillage, and averages in annual value about 30s. per plantation acre. The road from Athlone to Tuam, and that from Ballinasloe to Castlereagh, pass through the interior. Riversdale, the seat of James Kelly, Esq., is situated on the Shiven, adjacent to Ballinamore; St. Brandons, the seat of the Hon. Thomas Ffrench, is situated on the Castlereagh road, 3 miles from Ballinamore; and Ballybane and Killian, the latter the seat of John Cheevers, Esq., are situated within a mile of Ballinamore, and on the road to Tuam. Nearly the whole parish is powdered with small poor hamlets.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £86; and the latter are inappropriate in the Incorporated Society. The vicarages of Killian and KILLARARAN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Killian. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 10,163. Gross income, £160 ls. 1½d.; nett, £148 11s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. The police barrack of Ballinamore is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 16. The Killian and Killararan Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. A convent chapel has an attendance of 450, and is served by two officiates. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 23, and the Roman Catholics to 5,770; the Protestants of the union to 41, and the Roman Catholics to 10,855; and 9 schools in the union, 7 of which were in the parish, had on their books 421 boys and 113 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £5 from the vicar, and £5 from the Diocesan Fund.

KILLIANE, barony of Kilconnel, co. Galway. See KILLANE.

KILLIANE, a parish on the east coast of the barony of Forth, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-south-east of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length and breadth, each three-fourths of a mile; area, 1,074 acres. Pop., in 1831, 260; in 1841, 280. Houses 49. The surface is part of the low western seaboard of Wexford Harbour, derives some embellishment from the villa demesne of Killiane, and is traversed by the road from Wexford to St. Margaret's.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of KILLINICK [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes belonging to the impropriate curacy are compounded for £51 ls. 1d., and those belonging to the rectory for £17 10s. 4d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth and Mr. Colclough. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 346; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Piercestown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 254; and a pay daily school had on its books 18 boys and 18 girls.

KILLIKEEN, one of the most beautiful of the chain of lakes, and one of the most luscious of the sylvan scenes in the series of lakes and woodlands which so richly embellish the estate of Farnham, is the basin of the Upper Erne, co. Cavan, Ulster. Among the fine woods of Killikeen, the last countess of Farnham erected a handsome cottage; and on a small island in the vicinity are the ruins of Cloughoughter-castle, on which the insurgents of 1641 incarcerated the pious Bishop Bedell. KILLILY, or KILLEELY, a parish in the barony of Dunkellin, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by east of Oranmore, co. Galway, Connaught. Length and breadth, each 4 miles; area, 6,232 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,443; in 1841, 1,740. Houses 271. Two sections formerly belonged to the baronies of Kiltartan and Loughrea, but were transferred by the Act 6 and 7 William IV. Pop. of these, in 1831, 384 and 22. The parochial surface consists of light limestone land, partly arable, chiefly pastoral, and to a large extent rocky. The principal seats are Rahasane, Carrigeen, and Larkvale. The road from Loughrea to Kilcolgan passes westward through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCOLGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kilmaeduaigh. Vicarial tithe composition, £42; glebe, £25 16s. 2d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £84, and are appropriated to the bishop of the diocese, the provost of the cathedral, and the prebendary of Kinvarra. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 700. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 1,510; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £3 from the vicar and graduated allowances from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 103 boys and 76 girls, and were attended by about 30 other children.

KILLIMORE-BOLLOGE, a parish on the west side of the barony of Longford, 5 miles north-north-west of Portumna, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 9,220 acres, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,284; in 1841, 4,140. Houses 702. The land is in general of second-rate quality. The Arduttagh stream, which drains the surface and runs southward thence to Lough Derg, is sometimes called the Killimore. The road from Banagher and Eyrecourt to Loughrea passes through the interior; and is overlooked by Hearnbrook and Ramore, the demesnes of respectively Mr. Kirkaldy and Mr. Mac Dermott. The village of Killimore stands nearly in the centre of the parish. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 431. Houses 85. Fairs are held on Jan. 1, March 17, June 29, Sept. 29, and Nov. 22.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DONONAUGHTA [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £110 13s. 4½d., and the rectorial for £83 1s. 6½d.; and the latter are appropriated to the diocesan. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tynearnagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 78, and the Roman Catholics to 4,213; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 141 boys and 63 girls.

KILLIMORE-DALY, a parish in the barony of of Athenry, Tyaquin, and Kilconnel, 7 miles east of the town of Athenry, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, south-eastward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Athenry section, 1,799 acres, 35 perches; of the Tyaquin section, 662 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches; of the Kilconnel section, $7,750\frac{1}{2}$ acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,945; in 1841, 2,029. Houses 327. Pop. of the Athenry section, in 1831, 291; in 1841, 389. Houses 70. Pop. of the Tyaquin section, in 1831, 272; in 1841, 266. Houses 40. Pop. of the Kilconnel section, in 1831, 1,382; in 1841, 1,374. Houses 217. The surface includes a considerable extent of bog, and a pleasing amount of arable and demesne grounds, yet consists principally of grazing lands. The seats are Killimore-castle and Clooncagh. The nascent rivulet Carnamart runs through the interior, and bisects a bog of the two denominations of Killimore and New-Inn. This bog has an area of 2,805 acres, and lies 196 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet above the level of high water in Galway bay; but, in 1813, a part of it was reclaimed, and the estimated cost of reclaiming the remainder was £3,464. The old road from Ballinasloe to Galway passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of AUGHRIM [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £73 16s. 11d. But though the parish is called a rectory, a small portion of its tithes is appropriated to the dean, and a fourth part to the bishop of Clonfert. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kiltullagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 2,076; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 89 boys and 29 girls.

KILLINABOY. See KILNEBOY.

KILLINAGH, a parish in the barony of Tullaghagh, co. Cavan, Ulster. It is situated $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by south of Manor-Hamilton, on the road thence to Enniskillen. Length, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 24,783 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches,—of which 806 acres, 27 perches are in Upper Lough Macnean, 42 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches are in Lower Lough Macnean, and 133 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches are in streams and small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 5,383; in 1841, 6,512. Houses 1,054. The surface forms the northern district of the barony, and north-west extremity of the county; and almost wholly consists of a section of the wild accumulation of rough and lofty mountains which environs the sources of the Shannon. Upper Lough Macnean washes the extreme north or north-east; and the mountains which screen it on the side of Killinagh lift up the summit-line between the earliest affluents of the Shannon, and the Macnean or middle portion of the basin of the Erne. The road from Enniskillen to Manor-Hamilton enters Killinagh at Belcoo Bridge; and it thence proceeds along the shore of Lough Macnean, and has, at 2 miles from Belcoo Bridge, the hamlet of Largay or Red Lion, which a tourist will find the most advantageous diverging point for excursions among the highlands of Cavan, Fermanagh, and Leitrim.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Vicarial tithe composition, £290; glebe, £90 6s. 8d. Gross income, £380 6s. 8d.; nett, £328 5s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are claimed by the Saunders family in right of an abbey, and are reputed to be double the vicarial tithes in value, but have not been paid during the last 36 years. A curate has a salary of £50, and the use of the glebe-house and other accommodations. The church was built in 1797, at the cost of £369 4s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; of which £95 6s. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. was gifted by the Pleydell family, and £276 18s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. was gifted by the late

Board of First Fruits. Sittings 180; attendance 120. A private house is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 30. The Primitive Wesleyan meeting-house has an attendance of 55. The Roman Catholic chapels of Killinagh and Doobally have an attendance of respectively 300 and 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 632, and the Roman Catholics to 5,033; a Sunday school was attended by about 16 children; and 10 daily schools—2 of which were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and one was supported by subscription—had on their books 463 boys and 174 girls.

KILLINANE, a parish, partly in the barony of East Idrone, but chiefly in that of West Idrone, co. Carlow, Leinster. The two sections lie a little detached from each other; the larger on the right bank, and the smaller on the left bank of the Barrow. The West Idrone section contains the village of ROYAL OAK: which see. Area of the East Idrone section, 380 acres, 8 perches,—of which $2\frac{3}{4}$ acres are in the Barrow. Area of the West Idrone section, 1,884 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches,—of which 24 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are in the Barrow. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 899; in 1841, 818. Houses 134. Pop. of the East Idrone section, in 1831, 215; in 1841, 87. Houses 16. Pop. of the rural districts of the West Idrone section, in 1831, 356; in 1841, 439. Houses 67. The surface consists in general of good land, under good cultivation. The seats are Bagenalstown, Malcomville, Killinane, and Ballinaboley.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the chancellorship of Leighlin cathedral, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition and gross income, £270; nett, £252 15s. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure precentorship of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. There is no church; and the curate of an adjoining parish receives a salary of £20 for performing the occasional duties. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 46, and the Roman Catholics to 862.

KILLINANE, a parish in the baronies of Loughrea and Dunkellin, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of the town of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Loughrea section, 4,945 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches; of the Dunkellin section, 815 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 886; in 1841, 1,033. Houses 153. Pop. of the Loughrea section, in 1841, 887. Houses 131. Two townlands formerly belonged to Kiltartan, and were transferred to Loughrea by the act 6 and 7 William IV. Pop., in 1831, 69. The parochial surface is diversified, partly upland, and to a considerable extent picturesque; it is watered by the Gurtnameakin rivulet, and traversed by the road from Loughrea to Gort; and it boasts the beautiful and finely wooded demesnes of Roxborough and Castleboy, the residences of respectively Dudley Perse and R. H. Perse, Esqrs.—This parish is a vicarage, and a rectory, in partibus, in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. Vicarial and part rectorial tithe composition, £88; glebe, £10 2s. 6d. The remainder of the rectorial tithes are compounded for £24 10s., and are appropriated to the see. The vicarages and part-rectories of Killinane, KILCHRIST, and KILTHOMAS, the rectory of ISERTKELLY, and the vicarages of KILLOGILLEEN and KILLORA [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Killinane. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 8,539. Gross income, £467 2s. 6d.; nett, £428 17s. 4d. Patron, alternately the diocesan and the Marquis of Clanricarde. The incumbent holds also the registranship of the dioceses of Clonfert and Kilmacduagh, and the sinecure prebends of Kinvarra and Fenore, in Kilmacduagh cathedral. The church was built in 1797, by means of private subscription and parochial assessment. Sittings 120; attendance, from 25 to 50. There are Roman Catholic chapels in Killogilleen, Killora, Kilchrist, and Kilthomas. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 18, and the Roman Catholics to 931; the Protestants of the union to 267, and the Roman Catholics to 8,892; a day school in the parish had on its books 34 boys and 16 girls; and 9 daily schools in the union had on their books 405 boys and 213 girls.

KILLINANE, a parish in the barony of Iveragh, 3½ miles north-north-east of Cahirciveen, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5; area, 26,868 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,124; in 1841, 3,569. Houses 644. It extends from Valentia Harbour north-eastward along Dingle bay; and consists of a series of mountains with intervening glens and vales. Of several small creeks on the coast, two, called Kells and Lough Key, are capable of affording security to a small vessel. The river Fartin washes the interior, and is navigable a considerable way up from Valentia Harbour. The mountains toward the sea are, for the most part, profitable only during the summer months; and one of them, called the Hag's Tooth, is very lofty, and has on its north side some romantic lakes. The vales and glens are coarse and rocky; and about one-half of the whole parochial surface may be pronounced bog, rock, or otherwise unprofitable ground.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CAHIR [which see], in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £160 16s. 1d.; glebe, £36 18s. 5½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Cahir and Glenbeagh. In 1831, the Protestants amounted to 37, and the Roman Catholics to 3,314; and 2 daily schools had on their books 23 boys and 13 girls.

KILLINCARRIG, a village in the parish of Delgany, half-barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the coast-road from Dublin to Wexford, 4 miles south of Bray; and closely adjoining it are an old castle and a mansion of its own name,—the latter the seat of Arthur Jones, Esq. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1831, 168; in 1841, 179. Houses 30.

KILLINCHY, a parish in the baronies of Lower Castlereagh, Upper Castlereagh, and Dufferin, co. Down, Ulster. The Dufferin section contains the village of Killinchy. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Lower Castlereagh section, 3,281 acres, 17 perches; of the Upper Castlereagh section, 4,147 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches,—of which 50 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches are water; of the Dufferin section, 6,437 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches,—of which 75 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 7,820; in 1841, 7,470. Houses 1,329. Pop. of the Lower Castlereagh section, in 1841, 1,919. Houses 335. Pop. of the Upper Castlereagh section, in 1841, 2,342. Houses 434. The surface lies somewhat north of the middle of the west shore of Lough Strangford, and is drained thither by the rivulet Blackwater and some tiny brooks. The land is, for the most part, of good quality. Bawn island, and some other insulated ground on the island-powdered bosom of Lough Strangford, belongs to the parish. The chief seat is Holly-park. Killinchy village stands on the road from Comber to Killyleagh, and within a brief distance of Lough Strangford, 4 miles north by west of Killyleagh, 4½ south by east of Comber, and 9 north of Downpatrick.

At Whiterocks Pier, about a mile from the village, corn and provisions are shipped in vessels of considerable burden. Fairs are held in the village on the 1st Wednesday of Feb., May, and Aug. In the vicinity are the residences of Ardview, Holly-park, and Rockmount; and a little to the west, on the road to Belfast, is Florida, the seat of J. P. Gordon, Esq. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 199; in 1841, not specially returned.—Killinchy parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £738 9s. 2½d.; glebe, £18. Gross income, £756 9s. 2½d.; nett, £596 13s. 2½d. Patrons, Viscount Bangor and the Earl of Carrick. A curate is employed. The church was built in 1829, at the cost of £900, raised in equal proportions by private subscription and parochial assessment. Sittings 350; attendance 200. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 400 to 600, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 100. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 408 Churchmen, 6,192 Presbyterians, 41 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,349 Roman Catholics; and 13 daily schools had on their books 577 boys and 384 girls. Three of the schools were salaried with £2 each from the rector; two, with each £4 from the rector and £5 from Lord Dufferin; one, with £2 from the rector and £5 from David Gordon, Esq.; one, with £23 from the rector and £8 from the National Board; one, with £13 16s. 11d. from the rector and £6 from the National Board; three, with £8 each from the National Board; and one, with £10 from the National Board.

KILLINCOOLE, a parish in the barony of Louth, 2½ miles east-south-east of the town of Louth, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,397 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 771; in 1841, 697. Houses 129. The land is of prime quality. Here are a fine old castle, and the beautiful demesne of Fane-Valley.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £241 18s. 3d.; glebe, £82. Gross income, £303 18s. 3d.; nett, £262 19s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the adjoining benefice of Bannstown. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1799, by means of a gift of £533 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 25. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 29, and the Roman Catholics to 800; and two daily schools, one of which was supported by the rector, were usually attended by about 94 children.

KILLINCOR, a quondam chapelry in the parish and barony of Geashill, King's co., Leinster. It is now consolidated with Geashill, and lies a little south of Philipstown.

KILLINEEDY, or KILLINEELY, a quondam parish in the barony of Connello, and rectory in the dio. of Limerick, co. Limerick, Munster. Its situation is now unknown.

KILLINEEN, a parish in the barony of Deskelin, 3½ miles south by west of Athenry, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 4,966 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,574, in 1841, 1,531. Houses 243. The surface is to a large extent rocky; yet consists on the whole of light limestone land. The principal seat is Rockfield. There are several hamlets. The mail-road from Dublin to Galway traverses the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCOLGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £45, and the rectorial for £54 11s.; and the latter are appropriated to the bishop and the archdeacon. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 1,540; and a pay daily school had on its books 30 boys and 10 girls.

KILLINEGARUFF. See KILNEGARRUFF.

KILLINEY, a parish on the coast of the half-barony of Rathdown, 2½ miles south-south-east of Kingstown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It contains part of the village of CABINTREELY: which see. Length, south-eastward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,334 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 495; in 1841, 986. Houses 145. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 739. Houses 107. Killiney bay extends from Dalkey to Bray Head, a distance of 5 miles, and of course belongs but partially to the parish of Killiney; and it forms a sweep of only slender breadth, or is a small segment of a circle, its greatest distance of indentation upon the land being only about ¼ of a mile. Killiney village, situated at the head or broadest part of this beautiful bend upon the shore, consists chiefly of a steep and narrow street at the base of Killiney hill, and of a number of villas and bathing lodges scattered over the hill's declivities. Killiney hill is properly a group of three eminences which all rise abruptly from the water's-edge, and overlook Killiney bay. The summit of the central hill has an altitude of 470 feet above sea-level, and is crowned by an obelisk which Col. Mapas erected in 1741, to give employment to the poor. A large part of one of the hills was quarried and carried off as building material for the pier at Kingstown; and the mineral structure of what remains possesses considerable interest for the geologist. A panoramic view of singular power and beauty is obtained from the obelisk or its vicinity,—a view as varied or even contrasted in the style of its successive landscapes, as it is rich in the composition of its particular scenes,—and including, among other objects, the bays of Dublin and Killiney, the islands of Lambay, Ireland's Eye, and Dalkey, the peninsula and hill of Howth, the opulent and luscious country around Dublin, and the amphitheatre of mountains from Bray Head to the inland extremity of the co. Dublin highlands. On the side of Killiney hill which overlooks Loughlinstown, stands a pyramidal pillar to the memory of George, fourth Duke of Dorset, who was killed on the spot, in 1815, by a fall from his horse while hunting. The ruins of the old parish-church are covered with ivy, and afford a curious specimen of ancient architecture. A well-preserved Druidical circle, with its priests' seat and its sacrificing-stone, occur within a carefully kept enclosure, behind Mount-Druid demesne, and near the Martello Tower, but is made accessible by the proprietor to respectable visitors. Though the now finely cultivated and thickly inhabited shores were recently in a state of neglect, and almost of wilderness, they have yielded up numerous human skeletons, several sepulchral stone circles, and six large urns of baked clay, and consequently must at an early period have been a considerable seat of population. On the north side of Killiney bay, but within the neighbouring parish of Dalkey, was recently founded, chiefly for the attraction and accommodation of sea-bathers, a new town to be designated QUEENSTOWN: see that article. The principal mansions, villas, and cottages ornées within the parish of Killiney, are Druid-cottage, Loughlinstown-house, Ballybrack-grove, Martello-house, Rosetta, Marino, Desmond, Druid-lodge, Templeville, Sambury, Killiney-house, Killiney-lodge, Killiney-park, Sarah-villa, Percy-lodge, Ballybrack-house, Dorset-lodge, Wyattville, and Kilbogget-house.—Killiney parish is a curacy and a chapelry, in the dio. of Dublin. The curacy is part of the benefice of MONKSTOWN: which see. The curatual tithes are compounded for £39 0s. 4d., and the rectorial for £78 0s. 7½d.; and the latter are appropriated to the deanery of Christ-church. The chapelry is a separate benefice, and has a glebe, and an endowment from rent of lands and houses. Gross income, £111 15s.; nett, £71 3s. Patron, the incumbent of Monkstown. The chapel was built in 1834, by means of a gift of £1,500 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 170. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 115, and the Roman Catholics to 380; and a daily school was wholly supported by subscriptions and collections, and had on its books 36 boys and 26 girls.

KILLINEY, a village in the parish of Kill, half-barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. Area, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 204. Houses 33.

KILLINEY, co. Kerry. See KILLEINY.

KILLINGLEY. See KILLANULLY.

KILLINICK, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, ¾ of a mile; area, 1,284 acres. Pop., in 1831, 591; in 1841, 611. Houses 109. The surface is part of the low western sea-board of Wexford Harbour, and is traversed by the road from Wexford to Broadway. Killinick village stands on that road, 4 miles south of Wexford. Fairs are held on Whitsun-Tuesday, Easter-Monday, Sept. 21, and Nov. 30. Pop., in 1831, 163; in 1841, not specially returned.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £85 2s. 7d. But a portion of the tithes compounded for £3 14s. 4d., is inappropriate in Cæsar Colclough, Esq.; and two-thirds of the tithes of the townlands of Assaley and Ballycoreboys, belong to the rector of Ballybrenan. The rectory of Killinick, the vicarage of Maglass, and the inappropriate curacies of Ichartmon, Killiane, Kilmachree, and St. Michael [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Killinick. St. Michael's lies detached. Length of the other members of the union, 4½ miles; breadth, ¾. Pop., in 1831, 2,388. Gross income, £368 17s. 11½d.; nett, £315 9s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1828, by means of a parochial assessment of £69, and a loan from the late Board of First Fruits of £1,100. Sittings 200; attendance 70. There are Roman Catholic chapels in Maglass and Killiane. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 63, and the Roman Catholics to 539; the Protestants of the union to 187, and the Roman Catholics to 2,245; 2 daily schools in the parish—one of which was largely aided by subscription—had on their books 94 boys and 76 girls; and 4 daily schools in the union had on their books 156 boys and 128 girls.

KILLINKERE. See KILLANCARE.

KILLINNY. See KILLEENEY.

KILLINOR, or KILNINOR, a parish on the north border of the barony of Gorey, co. Wexford, 4½ miles south-west by west of Arklow, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 3½ miles; area, 6,435 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,319; in 1841, 1,407. Houses 221. A large proportion of the surface is mountainous; and the remainder is variously woodland, arable ground, and meadow. The highest ground is in the north, and has an altitude of 985 feet. The only mansion is Ballyfad; yet within the limits are parts of the demesnes of Newtown, Fortmount, and Borleagh.—This parish is an inappropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of KILPIPE [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Curatual tithe composition, £55 7s. 8½d.; glebe, £17. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £69 4s. 7½d., and are inappropriate in Sir Richard Steele, Bart.

The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 48, and the Roman Catholics to 1,299.

KILLINSERE, a parish in the county of the town of Drogheda, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of the centre of that town, Leinster. Pop. not specially returned.

KILLISHEE, a parish, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Naas, and partly in the barony of North Naas, but chiefly in that of South Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the North section, 147 acres; of the South section, 3,999 acres. The North section is uninhabited. Pop. of the South section, in 1831, 769; in 1841, 835. Houses 129. The land is in general good. The road from Naas to Ballymore-Eustace passes through the interior. Killishee-house is the seat of Mr. Graydon; and in the small demesne attached to it are fragments of several interesting ruins which are supposed to be of great antiquity. One of the many pretended abbeys of St. Patrick's founding is assigned a site at Killishee, and coolly placed under the superintendence of one of the multitude of St. Patrick's nephews.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £232 13s. The rectories of Killishee and BALLYMANNY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Killishee. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 954. Gross income, £269 11s. 5d.; nett, £244 13s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of St. Thomas, in the dio. of Dublin, and the sinecure chancellorship of Kildare cathedral. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church is of unknown date. Sittings 60; attendance, from 10 to 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to Newbridge chapel, in Old Connell. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 33, and the Roman Catholics to 746; the Protestants of the union to 34, and the Roman Catholics to 928; and a pay daily school in the parish had on its books 30 boys and 23 girls.

KILLIYOCK, the site of a parish-church, a glebe-house, and a Roman Catholic chapel, 5 miles west-north-west of Stranorlar, co. Donegal, Ulster. But the name is merely a corruption—and a very grotesque one it is—of KILTEEVOCK: which see.

KILLOAH. See KILLUA.

KILLODIERNAN, a parish 5 miles south-west by west of Borris-o'-Kane, and on the west border of the barony of Lower Ormond, and of co. Tipperary, Munster. It contains the village of PUCKANE: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,562 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches,—of which 1,255 acres, 29 perches are in Lough Derg, and 54 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 1,348; in 1841, 1,238. Houses 211. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,175; in 1841, 1,083. Houses 178. The surface lies on very nearly the middle of the east side of Lough Derg, and consists for the most part of rather light land. The principal residences are Blackfort, Johnstown, Urna, and Rock-valley.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £230 15s. 4d.; glebe, £22. Gross income, £252 15s. 4d.; nett, £183 12s. 0½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1811, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Montsea. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 83, and the Roman Catholics to 1,259; and 4 hedge-schools had on their books 117 boys and 78 girls.

KILLOE, or KILLOW, a parish partly in the barony of Granard, but chiefly in that of Longford, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Longford, co. Longford, Leinster. The barony of Longford section contains the villages of DRUMLISH, and BALLINAMUCK: which see. Length, 12 miles; breadth, 5. Area of the Granard section, 7,291 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches,—of which 259 acres, 10 perches are in Lough Gowna, and 150 acres, 1 perch are in small lakes. Area of the barony of Longford section, 34,221 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches,—of which 329 acres, 37 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 16,767; in 1841, 19,477. Houses 3,213. Pop. of the Granard section, in 1831, 2,004; in 1841, 3,134. Houses 500. Pop. of the rural districts of the barony of Longford section, in 1831, 14,026; in 1841, 15,810. Houses 2,615. The land is very various in character and quality, but averages in annual value about 30s. per plantation acre. The surface is nearly flat and tame, or diversified only with moorish grounds and shivering lakes and ponds. The only mansions of any note are Newtownbond, and Farraghroe; and the principal hamlets are Clooney, Corboy, Drumgort, and Horsepark.—This parish is a vicarage of two parts, called respectively Upper Killoe and Lower Killoe, in the dio. of Ardagh.—Upper Killoe, or the smaller part, comprises an area of 4,049 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches; with a pop., in 1831, of 1,721; and is a portion of the benefice of TEMPLEMICHAEL: which see. Vicarial tithe composition, £110; glebe, £111 1s. 3d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £90, and are inappropriate in Sir John P. Piers, Bart. The church was built in 1824, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, a donation of £64 12s. 3½d. from the church of Templemichael, and a donation of £184 12s. 3½d. from W. Bond, Esq. Sittings 230; attendance 150. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 75. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to a chapel in Lower Killoe. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 293 Churchmen, 154 Presbyterians, and 1,857 Roman Catholics; and 5 daily schools had on their books 178 boys and 120 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £7 from the Ardagh Association, £8 from Willoghty Bond, Esq., and £1 16s. 11d. from the rector; one, with £7 from the Ardagh Association, and £10 from Lord Lorton; and one, with £7 from the Ardagh Association, £8 from Lady Rosse, and £2 from the Edgeworth family.—The larger section of the parish and vicarage, or that called Lower Killoe, is part of the benefice of CLONGESH: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £535 7s. 9d., and the rectorial for £276 18s. 5d.; and the latter are inappropriate in John P. Piers, Bart. The church is situated at Drumlish, and was built in 1828, by means of a gift of £950 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance 55. Five Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,084, 1,163, 1,053, 950, and 624; and, along with the chapel of Clongesh and that of Upper Killoe, are served by 8 clergymen. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 414 Churchmen, 12 Presbyterians, and 15,146 Roman Catholics; and 21 daily schools had on their books 983 boys and 430 girls. One of the schools was aided with £4 a-year from the London Hibernian Society; one was salaried with £20 from the Roman Catholic bishop; and all the others were supported wholly by fees.

KILLOFIN, a parish on the coast of the barony of Clonderalaw, 7 miles west-south-west of Kildysert, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the village of LABASHEEDA: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 6,692 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches,—of which 10 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,072; in 1841, 3,985. Houses 605. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,379. Houses 497. The parochial surface includes all the peninsula which lies between the east side of Clonderalaw bay and the estuary of the Shannon; and it varies in outline and quality, from coarse upland pasture to fine lowland arable ground and demesne. Round the coast are Kilkerrin Point and battery, Calmans-town Castle, Mount Shannon Wood, Gap Castle, Labasheeda village, and Cloonkerry-house; and a little inland are Ballyartney-house, Killofin proper, and the ruins of an old friary.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILMURRY-CLONDERALAW [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £124, and the rectorial for £160; and the latter are impropriate in Bindon Scott, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 41, and the Roman Catholics to 4,324; and 6 pay daily schools had on their books 244 boys and 181 girls.

KILLOGENNEDY. See KILLOKENNEDY.

KILLOGHCONNOGHAN, KILLACONNIGAN, or KILLICONIGAN, a parish 6½ miles west of Trim, and on the western border of the barony of Lune, and of co. Meath, Leinster. It contains the village of KILBALIVER: which see. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 11,561 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches,—of which 20 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch are in the Boyne. Pop., in 1831, 2,329; in 1841, 2,319. Houses 407. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,146; in 1841, 2,161. Houses 377. The surface includes a considerable extent of bog, and varies very much in quality; yet the greater part of it is in tillage, and produces good crops of wheat and potatoes. The declination is eastward, and within the basin of the Boyne; and the road from Trim to Mullingar passes through the interior. The seats are Parkstown, Elmgrove, and Kilmur; and the hamlets are Tinker's Lane and Glack.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Glebe, £26 5s. Gross income, £134 16s. 5½d.; nett, £116 13s. 5½d. Patron, the Earl of Darnley. The tithes are compounded for £300, and are wholly impropriate in the patron. The church was built in 1821, by means of a loan of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and a donation of £221 10s. 9½d. from the late Earl of Darnley. An elegant gateway and a beautiful communion-service were also provided by the Earl of Darnley. Sittings in the church 120, attendance 90. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kildalkey. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 145, and the Roman Catholics to 2,247; and 4 daily schools—one of which at Kilbaliver was supported wholly by the Earl of Darnley—had on their books 149 boys and 151 girls.

KILLOGILLEEN, a parish 5 miles west of Loughrea, and partly in the barony of Loughrea, but chiefly in that of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. Area of the Loughrea section, 759 acres,—of the Dunkellin section, 2,845 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 939; in 1841, 1,074. Houses 186. Pop. of the Dunkellin section, in 1831, 774; in 1841, 842. Houses 144. The surface contains part of the water-shed between the Carnmacart and the Gurtmackin rivers; and consists variously of arable ground and pasture land.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLINANE [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £62, and the rectorial for £58; and the latter belong to the bishop and archdeacon of Kilmacduagh, and the vicars choral of Christ-church, Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 300 to 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killora. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 992; and a pay daily school, kept in the chapel, had on its books 60 boys and 30 girls.

KILLOKENNEDY, a parish in the barony of Lower Tulla, 2½ miles east of Broadford, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the village of KILBANE: which see. Length, 7½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 11,656 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,586; in 1841, 3,811. Houses 596. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,441. Houses 538. The surface, with the exception of Mr. Arthur's demesne, consists of indifferent and mountainous land. The mountains of Cragnamurragh and Glennagalliagh have altitudes of 1,729 and 1,458 feet. The drainage is chiefly westward by the Glenomra to the Ougarnee; and the road from Broadford to Killaloe passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILTANANLEA [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £103 14s. 11d.; glebe, £12. But a portion of the tithes, compounded for £2 15s. 4½d., is appropriated to Tomgrany prebend. The rectory is part of the benefice of O'MULLOD: which see. Rectorial tithe composition, £103 14s. 10½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 750; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kiltananlea. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 155 boys and 70 girls.

KILLONE, a parish in the barony of Islands, 1 mile south-west of Clare, co. Clare, Galway. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 5,718 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches,—of which 40 acres, 5 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,354; in 1841, 2,777. Houses 429. The surface is a chief part of the western screen of the head of the estuary of the Fergus; and presents a picturesque intermixture of rich low grounds, rocky hillocks, hills, and ridges, and strongly featured intersecting dells. The lake of Killone, 1½ mile south-west of Clare, is a pleasing feature. Newhall, the seat of John MacDonnell, Esq., and Edenvale, the seat of Richard J. Stackpoole, Esq., are both handsome residences. The other seats are Kilmoran and Mulvohill. An Augustinian nunnery was founded at Killone, about the year 1190, by Donald O'Brien, king of Limerick.—This parish is a wholly impropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe; but is temporarily attached to the benefice of DROMCLIFFE: which see. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 2,515; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 140 boys and 30 girls. In 1840, a National school at Newhall was salaried with £12, and had on its books 75 boys and 46 girls.

KILLONE, a curious, conical, limestone hill, in the barony of Portneinch, about 4 miles north-east of Maryborough, Queen's co., Leinster. A cavern opens near its vertex, and slopes towards its centre. This cavern is narrow at the entrance; but, after a descent of some fathoms, opens into a saloon 20 or 30 feet high, and upwards of 30 feet in diameter; and on one side, a dark precipice breaks sheer down, 50 or 60 fathoms, to a subterraneous and quite inaccessible lake.

KILLONEHAN. See KILLELONEHAN.

KILLONOGHAN, or KILLONAHAN, a parish on the west coast of the barony of Burren, 9 miles north by west of Ennistymon, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the village of FERMOYLE: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 7,350 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,185; in 1841, 1,369. Houses 235. The surface has the mountainous and rocky character which prevails throughout the barony; and consists to a very large extent of unprofitable ground. A hill in the north has an altitude of 821 feet; and Slieve-Elva on the east boundary sends up three summits to the height of 1,004, 1,109, and 1,134 feet.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RATHBOURNEY [which see], in the dio. of Kilfenora. Tithe composition, £82 10s. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 460; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Rathbourny. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a hedge-school had on its books 34 boys and 17 girls.

KILLORA, a parish in the barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the small post village of CRAUGHWELL: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 5,372 acres, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,663; in 1841, 1,618. Houses 264. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,344. Houses 219. Two townlands were transferred from Kiltartan to Dunkellin by the Act 6 and 7 William IV. Pop., in 1831, 207. The parochial surface is nearly all profitable land; and, though to some extent coarse and broken, is generally of good quality either as pasture or as arable ground. The Carnamart rivulet, and the mail-road from Dublin to Galway, pass through the interior. Ballymore, the seat of R. Rathbourn, Esq., adjoins Craughwell; and Lambert-lodge, another principal residence, is situated in the south.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLINANE [which see], in the dio. of Kilmaedugh. Vicarial tithe composition, £79; glebe, £4 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £78, and are appropriated to the diocesan and the archdeacon. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 400 to 700. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 55, and the Roman Catholics to 1,727; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 157 boys and 94 girls.

KILLORAN, a parish 4½ miles south-south-west of Aughrim, and partly in the baronies of Clonmacnoon and Leitrim, co. Galway, Connaught. It consists of a main body, which comprises the Clonmacnoon and Longford sections; and of two detached districts, which constitute the Leitrim section, and lie respectively half-a-mile west, and 2 miles south-west of the main body. Length of the main body, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Clonmacnoon section, 415 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches; of the Longford section, 4,174 acres, 7 perches; of the north portion of the Leitrim section, 360 acres, 8 perches; of the south portion of the Leitrim section, 444 acres, 26 perches. The pop. of the whole, in 1831, is stated by the Census at 1,573; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 1,835. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 1,838; of the Clonmacnoon section, 169; of the Leitrim section, 121; of the Longford section, 1,548. Houses in the Clonmacnoon section, 27; in the Leitrim section, 19; in the Longford section, 272. The land is for the most part good; and the surface declines to the east. The only demesne is Burkeville. There are 4 or 5 hamlets.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILLORMER [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £60 12s. 3¼d.; glebe, £3. A portion of the tithes, compounded for £18 9s. 2¼d. is appropriated to the diocesan. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Mullagh in Abbeygormican. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 5, and the Roman Catholics to 1,967; and a hedge-school had on its books 62 boys and 24 girls.

KILLORAN, a parish in the barony of Leney, 6½ miles north-west by west of Ballymote, co. Sligo, Connaught. It contains the village of COOLANEY: which see. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 4; area, 13,999 acres, 28 perches,—of which 44 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,699; in 1841, 4,044. Houses 731. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,373; in 1841, 3,664. Houses 670. The surface is to a large extent boggy and mountainous; but has of late years acquired considerable enrichment from the georgic operations on the estate of Annaghmore. The drainage is effected north-eastward by the Coolooney and the Owenmore rivulets. The chief residence is Greenfield cottage.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Achonry. Vicarial tithe composition, £196 12s. 3¼d.; glebe, £27. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £112 3s. 1d., and are appropriated to the demery of Achonry. The vicarages of Killoran and KILVARNET [see that article], constitute the benefice of Killoran. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 6,059. Gross income, £296 13s. 1d.; nett, £244 19s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is nonresident, and holds also the benefices of Ballisakerry and Rathrea in the dio. of Killalla, the sinecure prebend of Rosserkbeg in Killalla cathedral, and the sinecure archdeaconry of Achonry. A curate has a salary of £75, and the use of the glebe-house and 17 plantation acres of land. The church was built about 1766, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9¼d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and enlarged in 1829, by means of a loan of £460 from that Board. Sittings 450; attendance 170. The Killoran Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 550; and there is also a Roman Catholic chapel in Kilvarnet. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 616 Churchmen, 12 Protestant dissenters, and 3,257 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 973 Churchmen, 27 Protestant dissenters, and 5,363 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools in the parish were usually attended by about 110 children; 6 daily schools in the parish had on their books 285 boys and 158 girls; and 11 daily schools in the union had 496 boys and 397 girls. One of the daily schools in the parish was salaried with £16 from Major O'Hara; one, with £2 from Major O'Hara, and £12 from the Baptist Society; and each of two with £2 from Major O'Hara, and about £9 or £10 from the London Hibernian Society.

KILLORGLIN, or CASTLE-CONWAY, a parish in the baronies of Iveragh, Dunkerrin, Magonihy, and Trughenackmy, co. Kerry, Munster. The Trughenackmy section contains the village of Killorglin. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Iveragh section, 5,744 acres; of the Dunkerrin section, 12,925 acres; of the Magonihy section, 2,118 acres; of the Trughenackmy section, 9,401 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 8,574; of the Iveragh section, 1,026; of the Dunkerrin section, 1,660; of the Magonihy section, 1,194; of the rural districts of the Trughenackmy section, 3,769. Houses in the Iveragh section, 206; in the Dunkerrin section, 284; in the Magonihy section, 195; in the Trughenackmy section, 843; in the rural districts of the Trughenackmy section, 683. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 7,919. The surface consists of part of the seaboard of Castlemaine Harbour on the north, part of the vale of the Lane on the east, part of the offshoots of MacGillicuddy's Reeks on the south, part of the Killorglin bog in the centre, and part of the sublime glen of Carra in the west. About one-third is arable land; about 880 acres are waste bog; and the remainder is land of a coarse, an inferior, or an useless quality. The great thoroughfare to the Lakes of Carra, and into the barony of Iveragh, passes along the northern border. The village of Killorglin stands on this thoroughfare, and on the river Lane half-a-mile above the stream's expansion into estuary and comminglement with Castlemaine Harbour, 2 miles west-south-west of Milltown, 10 north-west by west of Killarney, and 154 south-west of Dublin. The Lane is here of considerable breadth; and its banks are high, verdant, and finely varied, and form an agreeable contrast to the poor bleak land in their vicinity. The village itself is an unprosperous, sequestered, and almost squalid seat of population; and appears to have acquired marvellously little profit from the advantageousness of its position for both inland and seaward trade. Dr. Smith said, in 1756, "It looks tolerably well for these parts;" and an impartial topographer cannot say as much for it at the present day. A small but not uncomfortable inn forms the tourist's last stage before plunging out of the civilization around Killarney into the social wilderness of Carra and Iveragh; and the 'Sportsman in Ireland' says, "I recommend the anglers to spend one evening here for a very essential purpose, that of procuring flies of a gaudy feather, exactly suited to the fresh river salmon, among which he may anticipate abundant sport." Fairs are held on May 19, June 30, August 11, and Nov. 18. Area of the village, 23 acres. Pop., in 1831, 896; in 1841, 925. Houses 160. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 41; in manufactures and trade, 98; in other pursuits, 40. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 13; on the directing of labour, 101; on their own manual labour, 58; on means not specified, 7. The seigniorship of Killorglin was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Captain Jenkin Conway, and passed by marriage in the next generation to the family of Blennerhasset.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £400; glebe, £22. Gross income, £422; nett, £361 5s. 6½d. Patron, the Crown. But the tithes of a part of the parish, compounded for £245 17s. 11d., are inappropriate in the Ventry family. A curate has a salary of £50, with board, &c. The church was built in 1816, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 95. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 379, and the Roman Catholics to 8,084; and three daily schools—one of which was wholly supported by the London Missionary Society—had on their books 82 boys and 48 girls. In 1840, two National schools at Killorglin were salaried with respectively £18 and £14, and had on their books 147 boys and 180 girls.

KILLORGLIN BOG, an expanse of boggy ground adjacent to Killorglin village and Castlemaine Harbour, co. Kerry, Munster. Its area is 8,570 English acres. An official report upon it in 1814, says, "It is bounded on the north by the strand of Castlemaine Harbour, and rises as by successive steps to the foot of the mountains, where its elevation is about 100 to 160 feet; westward it passes the river Carra, and extends to the Glen Bog; eastward it has some rising arable grounds which divide it from the Lane and the bog of the Awnagarry. It is interspersed with low ridges of moor; the bottom of which is a stone brash of the mountain rock, covered in most places with 3 or 4 feet of bog; the hollows are in general from 12 to 20 feet deep, the upper part of the Tullig stream, only excepted, which seldom exceeds 5 or 6 feet. * * From the neck of the point of Cromann to the mouth of the Cara river, is a considerable tract of sandy downs. A part of the bog has been formerly overblown with this sand, and, without farther trouble, converted thereby into good arable land, where the covering of sand was not too thick. This instance is instructive, and has suggested a method of extending the benefit. * * Even the more unpromising parts of the bog are not out of the reach of a profitable cultivation. A Mr. Murphy has taken a lease of 1,400 acres of this bog and the adjacent mountain from Judge Dog, and has already built a good many cottages on it." The estimated cost of reclaiming the whole bog, as it existed in 1814, was £7,749 19s. 6d.

KILLOSCOB. See KILLASCOBE.

KILLOSCULLY, a parish in the barony of Owney and Arra, 6½ miles south-west by south of Nenagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. It contains the village of SHELLEE: which see. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 4; area, 14,439 acres, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,993; in 1841, 3,099. The eastern district is all occupied with the Keeper mountain, whose summit soars 2,278 feet above sea-level; and the western district is low and comparatively ornate ground, traversed by the Dublin and Limerick railroad. Glen-Colloo descends westward between the Keeper mountain and a height which lifts a summit on the northern boundary to the altitude of 1,607 feet. The Doonane rivulet tumbles about 1,000 feet from its source within the parish to the point of confluence with the Mulkern river. The chief residences are Kinalta, Shellee, Lower Shellee, and Greenhall; and the other chief objects of interest are a cromlech and quondam gold mines.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of NEWPORT [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £323 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £6. The church was built about 1828, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, about 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballinahinch in Kilnerath. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 114, and the Roman Catholics to 3,035; and 3 daily schools—one of which was wholly supported by Lord Bloomfield—were usually attended by about 166 children. In 1840, a National school was salaried with £8, and had on its books 97 boys and 50 girls.

KILLOSKEHANE, a parish in the barony of Ikerrin, 3 miles west-south-west of Templemore, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 2,542 acres. Pop., in 1831, 601; in 1841, 743. Houses 117. The surface is mountainous; and the land is variously waste, poor, or indifferent. Killoskehane-house is the seat of James Willington, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILFITHMONE [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £110. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 22, and the Roman Catholics lies to 610; and a pay daily school had on its books 36 boys and 10 girls.

KILLOSOLAN. See CASTLE-BLAKENEY.

KILLOSSORY, a parish in the barony of Nethercross, 3 miles north-west by north of Swords, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,731 acres. Pop., in 1831, 380; in 1841, 391. Houses 58. The act 6 and 7 William IV. transferred to Nethercross 3 townlands of Killossory from Balrothery, and 9 from Coolock. Pop. of the former, in 1831, 79; in 1841, 112. Pop. of the latter, in 1831, 239; in 1841, 212. The northern branch of the Malahide river washes the interior, and is overlooked by the mansion of Lispopple.—This parish is a curacy, and part of the benefice of Swords [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The tithes are compounded for £161 9s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and are appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's, Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Clonmethan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 374.

KILLOSSY. See KILLISHEE.

KILLOTTERAN, a parish, 2 miles west of Waterford, and formerly within the county of the city of Waterford, but now in the barony of Middlethird, Munster. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,493 acres, 32 perches. Pop., in 1831, 504; in 1841, 662. Houses 97. The surface extends along the right bank of the Suir; and is adorned with the seats of Knock, Killoteran, and Oldcourt.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Trinity or Waterford, in the dio. of Waterford. Tithe composition, £155. The church was built about a century ago, at the expense of the Incorporated Society. Sittings 100; attendance, from 12 to 20. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 30, and the Roman Catholics to 457. The Charter-school of Killoteran was built in 1744, and endowed by the corporation of Waterford with 26 acres of land. The building crowns a rising ground; is approached through a long avenue; and contains a school-room of 30 feet by 21, two lofty dormitories each 30 feet by 21, and apartments for master and ushers;—and detached from it are a small infirmary and room of recovery. The annual cost of the establishment varies from £700 to £800.

KILLOUGH, co. Westmeath. See KILLAGH.

KILLOUGH, co. Tipperary. See CASHEL.

KILLOUGH, a chapelry in the parish of Rathmullen, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It has no definite limits, but seems in a loose sense to be identical in extent with the town of KILLOUGH; which see. It forms a separate benefice in the dio. of Down. Gross income, £98 6s. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £94 9s. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the incumbent of Rathmullen. The chapel was built about 1812, at the cost of £1,107 13s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., all defrayed by the Rev. James Hamilton, incumbent of Rathmullen. Sittings from 100 to 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Bright. The remaining statistics are mixed up with those of Rathmullen.

KILLOUGH, a bay in the barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It is separated by a small peninsula from Dundrum bay on the west, and by a still smaller one from Ardglass bay on the east; and is thus described by Mr. Nimmo: "The mouth of this bay, between Ringfad Point and the Castle Point, is 700 fathoms across; and nearly half-way is a rock of 500 long, just covered at high-water, which serves as a kind of breakwater to a good anchorage behind, fit for large vessels; and which, were the breakwater heightened and extended, would be the best place of shelter along this coast. The tide at high-water flows $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile inland, forming two bays, of which that on the north side, or Coney Island bay, is too open for a harbour; the western, between Coney Island and the village of Killough, is spacious and well-sheltered, though dry at low-water. This is properly the harbour of Killough, and extends over 100 Irish acres." A pier, built under Mr. Nimmo's direction, measures 500 feet in length on the Killough side, and 100 feet on Coney Island, and has a depth at high-water of from 10 to 18 feet. Such rocks in the bay as could not easily be removed have been perched; and an accurate hydrographic survey of the whole bay and harbour has been made and charted.

KILLOUGH, a village in the parish of Kilmanagh, barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 183. Houses 31.

KILLOUGH, or PORT ST. ANNE, a small market, post, and sea-port town, in the parish of Rathmullen, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It stands at the head of Killough bay, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of Ardglass, 5 miles south-south-east of Downpatrick, and 78 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Dublin. It has a considerable export trade in corn, a considerable import trade in coals, and a comparatively extensive trade in the produce of the fisheries. Ten or twelve years ago, there were belonging to it 15 carrying-vessels employed in the general export and import trade, and 18 smacks and wherries, and 24 yaws, employed in the fisheries,—the latter exclusive of a large number of small craft which frequented the bay during the herring season. The only salt-work within a large extent of the coast of Down occurs at Killough. Fairs are held on the first Friday of Feb. old style, June 9, Aug. 17, and Nov. 12. Great improvements on the town, and augmentations of its prosperity, were effected by its proprietor, the second Viscount Bangor, who died in 1827. A mineral spring near the Charter-school is said to be both emetic and purgative; and Scordin's Well has acquired local fame for the singularly light quality of its water. Several curious caves occur in the vicinity. Area of the town, 47 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,162; in 1841, 1,148. Houses 224. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 51; in manufactures and trade, 126; in other pursuits, 81. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 12; on the directing of labour, 68; on their own manual labour, 118; on means not specified, 60.

KILLOW. See KILLOE.

KILLOWEN, a parish in the barony of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the suburb or western section of the town of COLERAINE; see that article. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,796 acres, 17 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,906; in 1841, 2,708. Houses 524. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 928; in 1841, 598. Houses 115. The surface extends along the left bank of the river Bann; and, excepting town-grounds, demesne-grounds, and a small aggregate area for roads and country houses, it consists entirely of arable land. The glebe-house is in the south; and the fine demesne of Jackson Hall is in the north.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £160; glebe, £59. Gross income, £220; nett, £180 13s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1830, at the cost of £1,026; of which £300 was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, £221 was a debt due by the parish, and the remainder was contributed by Bishop Knox, the Irish Society, the Clothworkers' Company, and various private subscribers. Sittings 200; attendance, from 120 to 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the Roman Catholic chapels of Aghadowey and Dunboe. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 726 Churchmen, 1,164 Presbyterians, 7 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,223 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 144 children; and 5 daily schools had on their books 194 boys and 110 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £3 from the Irish Society, £5 from the Clothworkers' Company, and £4 from the rector; one, with £2 from the Irish Society, and £10 from the Clothworkers' Company; and two, with respectively £31 10s. and £6 10s. from a bequest by the late Mr. Chyle.

KILLOWEN, a small headland and a fishing harbour, on the south coast of the barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. The harbour is situated on the north side of Carlingford bay, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-east of Rosstrevor. It has pretty deep water within the gravelly headland; and Mr. Nimmo reported that "a jetty should be run out from the opposite side of the cove, for about 200 feet to low-water, which would admit a coasting vessel, at an expense of about £500."

KILLOWEN, a quondam colonial territory, near the head of the Kenmare river or estuary, co. Kerry, Munster. A colony of English Protestants were settled here in 1670, by Sir William Petty, at an expense of £10,000; and they were employed upon iron-works and a fishery, and contributed largely by their industry to improve the surrounding country. But during the war of the Revolution, in consequence of being plundered and almost overwhelmed by the Irish, 42 families of them, amounting to 180 persons, and including 75 fighting men, strongly fortified a house which Sir William Petty had built on a peninsula of the Kenmare for his chief agent, and there so long and resolutely maintained themselves against very strong bodies of assailants, that they eventually surrendered only on honourable terms, and to an army of 3,000 men, and after nearly all the south of Ireland had fallen under the power of the Jacobites.

KILLOWEN, or KILROWEN, a parish in the barony of Kinalmeaky, co. Cork, Munster. Post-town, Bandon. Length and breadth, each $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile; area, 1,264 acres. Pop., in 1831, 432; in 1841, 366. Houses 54. The land is in general good.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition and gross income, £140 12s. 9d.; nett, £112 12s. 1½d. Patron, Lord Kinsale. A private house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 27. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 46, and the Roman Catholics to 471; and a Protestant Sunday school was attended by about 16 children.

KILLOWER, a parish on the northern border of the barony of Clare, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Tuam, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 3,597 acres. Pop., in 1831, 828; in 1841, 905. Houses 144. The surface is very varied in outline, and partly picturesque in character; and it variously consists of bog, arable-land, meadow, hill-pasture, woodland, and demesne. The chief features are noticed under the word CASTLE-HACKET: which see. The road from Tuam to Headford passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of HEADFORD [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £112 12s. 4½d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 23, and the Roman Catholics to 864; and a daily school for girls was wholly supported by Mrs. Kirwan, and had an average attendance of about 30.

KILLOWILLAN, a small inappropriate parish in the barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. It figures very obscurely in topography; and seems to be rather a townland than properly a parish.

KILLS. See KELLS.

KILL-ST.-LAWRENCE, a parish in the barony of Gualtier, 3 miles south-south-east of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, half-a-mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile; area, 308 acres. Pop., in 1831, 64; in 1841, 71. Houses 10. Most of the land is good.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILLURE [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. Tithe composition, £25. In 1834, all the inhabitants of the ecclesiastical parish were Roman Catholics.

KILL-ST.-NICHOLAS, a parish in the barony of Gualtier, co. Waterford, Munster. It contains part of the town of PASSAGE-EAST: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 2,884 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,676; in 1841, 1,743. Houses 289. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,109. Houses 181. A district which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 352, belonged to the quondam county of the city of Waterford. The surface is pleasantly diversified, and combines with one or two adjacent parishes, and with grounds on the opposite side of the Suir and of Waterford Harbour, to form a series of interesting landscapes. The surface extends from the Suir opposite the east side of Little Island, to the upper part of Waterford Harbour, opposite Ballyhack; but is cut off by the parish of Faithlegg from any near approach to the confluence of the Suir and the Barrow. The chief seats are Springhill, Parkswood, Drumrusk, Woodland, and Ballyconvan.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Waterford. Tithe composition, £108 12s. 3d.; glebe, £33 15s. The rectories of Kill-St.-Nicholas, and FAITHLEGG [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kill-St.-Nicholas. Length and breadth, each 3 miles. Pop., in 1831, 2,382. Gross income, £252 7s. 3d.; nett, £164 19s. 8d. Patron, the Crown. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built many years ago. Sittings 300; attendance, from 60 to 100. A private house at Passage is also used for parochial Sabbath-evening service. The Kill-St.-Nicholas and Faithlegg Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance, the former of from 300 to 400, and the latter of 250; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Killea. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 161 Churchmen, 7 Protestant dissenters, and 1,490 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 175 Churchmen, 11 Protestant dissenters, and 2,196 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools in the union—5 of which were in the parish—had on their books 176 boys and 104 girls. Two of the schools in the parish were salaried with respectively £8 and £10 from the National Board; and one was supported by Lord Waterford, the archdeacon of Waterford, and the Association for Discountenancing Vice.

KILLUA, or KILLOAH, a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Delvin, and of co. Westmeath, Leinster. It contains the town of CLONMELLON; which see. Length, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{4}$; area, 5,259½ acres,—of which 51 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,202; in 1841, 1,950. Houses 324. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,242; in 1841, 1,091. Houses 190. The surface consists for the most part of light limestone land; and its highest ground has an altitude of 316 feet. Ballinlough, the seat of Sir James Nugent, is situated in the south, and takes its name from a small adjoining lake. Killua-castle, the fine residence of Sir M. L. Chapman, Bart., adjoins the town of Clonmellon; and is a handsome, modern, castellated pile, in the midst of an extensive, varied, and well-planted demesne. The only other noticeable residence is Heathstown.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLALLON [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £45, and the rectorial for £80; and the latter are inappropriate in Michael Ogle, Esq., of Dysert. The church is of unknown date. Sittings 280; attendance, from 80 to 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killallon. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 287, and the Roman Catholics to 1,844; 3 daily schools made no returns of their attendance; and 3 other daily schools—one of which was salaried with £30 6s. 8d. from the National Board, £10 from Lady Chapman, and some advantages from Sir T. Chapman—had on their books 168 boys and 168 girls.

KILLUCAN, or RATHWIRE, a parish partly in the barony of Delvin, but chiefly in that of Farbill, co. Westmeath, Leinster. The Farbill section contains the town of KINNEGAD, and the villages of Killucan, RATHWIRE, and RAHARNEY: see these articles. The Delvin section lies detached half-a-mile north of the main body. Area, 136 acres. Pop., in 1841, 16. Houses 3. The Farbill section is strictly identical in extent, topography, and statistics with the barony of FARBILL: which see. The surface includes a considerable aggregate of bog, and a noticeable amount of gentle upland; yet consists for the most part of good land. The chief heights are Sion Hill in the north, 497 feet; Knocksheban and Lisnabin near the centre, 477 and 503 feet; and Heathstown-hill in the south, 381 feet. The great road to Connaught passes along the southern border; and the Royal Canal passes through nearly the centre. Among the seats are Grange, E. Briscoe, Esq.; Lisnabin, Mr. Purdon; Corbetstown; Hyde Park; Griffinstown; Lowtown; Wardenstown, Corristown; Grangebeg; Derrymore; Riverdale; Graddanstown; Joristown; and Huntingdon.—The village of Killucan stands at the intersection of the road from Dublin to Mullingar with that from Kinnegad to Castle-town-Delvin, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles north by west of Kinnegad, $6\frac{1}{2}$ east of Mullingar, and 34 west by north of Dublin. The village occupies a pleasant site, and vaunts a fame or character far above that of most Irish villages of its size. An abbey is alleged by Archdall to have been built here by St. Lucian, at a very early period. The old parish-church was a building of considerable antiquity, and the largest edifice of its class in Westmeath; and is described in the Collect. Hib. i. 60, 61. The present church is a respectable modern building, surmounted by a handsome spire; the whole erected in 1803 and 1812, by means of £1,107 13s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, £121 15s. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. raised by private subscription, and £1,108 12s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. raised by parochial assessment. The glebe-house, situated in the vicinity of the church, is a neat structure, amidst shrubberies and plantations. A comfortable inn and good posting establishment in the village is noted as the rendezvous of the Killucan Club, one of the oldest hunting associations in Ireland. Fairs are held on March 27 and Nov. 28. A dispensary here is within the Mullingar Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 28,000 acres, with a pop. of 6,200; and, in 1839-40, it expended £131 8s., and administered to 1,100 patients. In 1841, the Killucan Loan Fund had a capital of £1,798, circulated £6,200 in 1,129 loans, cleared a nett profit of £105 18s. 4d., and expended for charitable purposes £30. Area of the village, 25 acres. Pop., in 1831, 206; in 1841, 181. Houses 29.—The ecclesiastical parish of Killucan is exclusive of the perpetual curacy of KINNEGAD: which see. Pop., in 1831, 5,989. This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £1,072 8s.; glebe, £73 6s. 6d. Gross income, £1,145 14s. 6d.; nett, £831 18s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £80 4s. 8d., and the use of a house and 5 plantation acres of land. Sittings in the church, 260; attendance, from 60 to 100. The Rathwire and Rathfarn Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 2,000 and 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 337 Churchmen, 27 Presbyterians, and 5,755 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools had on their books 152 boys and 121 girls. The Rathfarn school was salaried with £10 from the National Board; the Killucan school, with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith; the Craddonstown school, with £10 from Lord Longford, £5 5s. from the rector, and £2 2s. from subscription; and another school, with £5 from Lady Longford.

KILLUKEN, or KILLUCAN, a parish on the east side of the barony of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It contains the village of CROGHAN, and the western suburb of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON: see these articles. Length, 5 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 4,831 acres, 1 perch.—of which 78 acres, 2 roods, 21 perches are in the Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 2,948; in 1841, 2,963. Houses 496. Pop., exclusive of the part of Carrick, in 1831, 2,501; in 1841, 2,605. Houses 451. If the land area were distributed into 233 pendicles, 165 of them would be found to be natural pasture, 7 of them meadow, and 61 of them arable land. Most of the surface is a continued series of low, round hills, chiefly isolated, and for the most part pastoral. The Killuken rivulet issues from the small lake of Knoekroe in Creeve, and runs north-eastward through Killuken to the Shannon, a little below Carrick. The gentlemen's seats are Croghan, Hermitage, and Fairview. The antiquities are numerous Danish raths, and one Druidical altar. The road from Carrick-on-Shannon to Frenchpark and Elphin passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, the corps of Elphin archdeaconry, and part of the benefice of ARDCARNE [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. Tithe composition, £101 7s. 3d.; glebe, £32 10s. A curate has a salary of £75, and the use of the glebe-house and 13 acres of land. The church is an old building. Sittings 130; attendance 35. There is a Roman Catholic chapel at Croghan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 130, and the Roman Catholics to 2,996; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 25 children; and 7 daily schools had on their books 177 boys and 105 girls, and were attended by about 22 other children. One of the schools was salaried with £8 from subscription; one with £14 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and £4 10s. from the curate; and one with £4 from the London Hibernian Society, £4 from the Elphin Diocesan Society, £2 from the rector, and £4 from a fund raised by subscription.

KILLUKEN, or KILLUCAN, a parish on the south-west border of the barony of Roscommon, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-west of Strokestown, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,956 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches.—of which 307 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,438; in 1841, 3,445. Houses 584. The arable land, though not first-rate, is very good. A considerable tract of bog occurs in the west. The seats are Doon and Mount-Brown. Several lakes diversify the interior; and the largest, Ardakilin, has an elevation of 172 feet above sea-level. The chief roads are those from Strokestown to Ballintobber, and from Elphin to Lanesborough.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARDCLARE [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £71 10s., and the rectorial for £78 8s.; and the latter are impropriate in Mr. Lindsey. The church was built about the year 1750, at the private expense of Mr. Hawks. Sittings 100; attendance 32. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 7, and the Roman Catholics to 3,702; and three hedge-schools had on their books 112 boys and 72 girls.

KILLULAGH. See KILWEILAGH.

KILLUMOD, a parish on the south-east border of the barony of Boyle, 3 miles north by east of Elphin, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,159 acres, 3 roods, 35 perches,—of which 92 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches are in the Shannon, and 208 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 1,958; in 1841, 1,857. Houses 314. The surface contains a good deal of boggy and marshy ground, and is profusely watered with interior lakes, and with a lacustrine expansion of the Shannon. The only seat is Danesfort. The road from Croghan to Drumsna passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of AUGHRIM [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and rectorial tithes are each compounded for £42; and the latter are impropriate in Viscount Lorton. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 27, and the Roman Catholics to 2,067; and a hedge-school had on its books 44 boys and 24 girls.

KILLUNAVARRA, or KILLENAVARRA, a parish in the barony of Dunkellin, 5 miles north by west of Gort, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,173 acres, 3 roods, 14 perches,—of which 88 acres, 28 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,362; in 1841, 1,717. Houses 242. The surface consists of very good light limestone land, with a free interspersion of rocky ground; it extends eastward from the shore of Kinvarra bay; and it is traversed by the road from Gort to Galway. The only seat is Clonballymore; and there are 7 hamlets.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCOLGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £28 17s. 6d., and the rectorial for £31 17s. 6d.; and the latter are appropriated to the bishop. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a daily school at Cloughmare was partly supported by Mr. Blake of Clonballymore, and was usually attended by about 80 children.

KILLURANE, a parish in the barony of Lower Tulla, 2½ miles north-north-west of Broadford, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the village of CALLAGHAN'S-MILLS: which see. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 7,103 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches,—of which 293 acres, 11 perches are in Lough Doon, and 127 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 2,942; in 1841, 3,058. Houses 480. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,727. Houses 422. A large part of the surface is light and mountainous. The lake of Doon lies on the south-west boundary; and a part of the vale of the Ougarnee rivulet forms the west border. The road from Killaloe to Ennis passes along the south-west, and through Callaghan's-Mills.—This parish is a rectory and a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. The rectory is part of the sinecure benefice of O'MULLOD: which see. Tithe composition, £78 5s. 6½d. The vicarage is part of the benefice of KILSEILY: which see. Vicarial tithe composition, £92 6s. 2d. But a portion of the tithes, compounded for £33 10s., is appropriated to the prebend of Tomgrany in Killaloe cathedral. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killishen. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 3,159; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 118 boys and 81 girls.

KILLURE, a rivulet and a bog on the eastern border of the county of Galway, Connaught. The rivulet rises at Doon, 2½ miles west of Ahascragh; and flows 6 miles south-eastward to the Suck, immediately above Ballinasloe. The bog lies between this rivulet and the Ahascragh rivulet, at the distance of from 1½ mile to 3 miles north-north-west of Ballinasloe; and comprises an area of 2,371 acres. Its average depth is 23 feet; and, at the time of being surveyed by Mr. Griffith, it was very wet, and in many places quite a quagmire. Estimated cost of reclamation, £3,027 9s. 7d.

KILLURE, a parish in the barony of Gaultier, 3 miles south-south-east of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. Length and breadth, each ¼ of a mile; area, 627 acres. Pop., in 1831, 121; in 1841, 124. Houses 15. It is not regarded as a parish in the civil territorial division. The surface consists in general of good land; yet includes some wet but improvable ground.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Waterford. Tithe composition, £43. The rectories of Killure, KILL-ST.-LAWRENCE, CORBALLY, KILRONAN, and ROSSDUFF [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Killure. Length, 8 miles; but only Killure and Kill-St.-Lawrence are mutually adjacent, while Corbally lies about 2½ miles, and Kilronan and Rossduff about 3½, distant from Killure. Pop., in 1831, 670. Gross income, £191 1s. 6½d.; nett, £151 17s. 6½d. Patron, the diocesan. There is no church in the union; and there is a Roman Catholic chapel only in Corbally. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish were all Roman Catholics; and those of the union consisted of 19 Protestants and 674 Roman Catholics. Ruins exist in Killure of a preceptory which was founded in the 12th century for the Templars, and which was afterwards given to the Hospitallers, and became a commandery.

KILLURIN, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of West Shelmallee, 5½ miles north-west of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,874 acres. Pop., in 1831, 660; in 1841, 651. Houses 111. The surface is bounded on the east by the Slaney, and traversed through the interior by the road from Wexford to Enniscorthy; and, excepting a small portion of woodland and bog, it consists of good land.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ferns. Vicarial tithe composition, £47 12s. 2½d.; glebe, £46. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £38 17s., and are impropriate in Lord Portsmouth. The vicarage of Killurin, and the impropriate curacies of BALLYHEOGUE, WHITECHURCH-GLIN, and KILBRIDE-GLIN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Killurin. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 3,952. Gross income, £548 18s. 8½d.; nett, £454 5s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1785, by means of parochial assessment; and enlarged, by private means and for private accommodation, in 1828. Sittings 200; attendance, from 120 to 140. The Roman Catholic chapel of Killurin has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel in the mountains of Forth. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Ballyheogue. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 192, and the Roman Catholics to 458; the Protestants of the union to 358, and the Roman Catholics to 3,671; 3 daily schools in the parish were usually attended by about 130 children; and there were also 3 daily schools in Ballyheogue. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £10 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, quarterly premiums from the London Hibernian Society, and £3 10s. from subscription; and another, with £12 from the vicar, £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £3 10s. from subscription.

KILLURIN, King's co. See ANNAGHMORE.

KILLURSA, a parish in the north-west corner of the barony of Clare, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the larger part of the town of HEADFORD: see that article. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 8,877 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches,—of which 2,506 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches are in Lough Corrib, and 16 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 4,644; in 1841, 4,995. Houses 795. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,438; in 1841, 3,592. Houses 598. The surface is divided from co. Mayo on the north by the Black river, remarkable as a sinking or subterranean stream; and it consists variously of good arable land, light stony pasture, and waste morass, but includes a large proportion of both bog and rocky ground. The island of ISCHIRQUIN [which see], lies within the limits. Archdall alleges that St. Fursey, the son of Fintan, of the blood-royal of South Munster, who died about the year 653, built an abbey on Rathmuth, an island of Lough Corrib; and says that, though there are no traces of this house, Colgan supposes it to be the old parish church of Killursa, near Lough Corrib.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of HEADFORD [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £211 10s. 10d. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated in Headford, and has an attendance of from 800 to 1,000; a barrack in Headford, used as a Roman Catholic chapel, has an attendance of from 150 to 200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, these are united to the chapel of Killeany. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 128, and the Roman Catholics to 4,815; and 9 daily schools—2 of which were supported wholly by Mr. St. George and the rector, and one partially by a salary of £15 from the National Board—had on their books 305 boys and 172 girls, and were attended by about 30 or 40 other children.

KILLURY, a parish on the coast of the barony of CLANMAURICE, 4½ miles north of Ardfert, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the village of CAUSEWAY: which see. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 11,090 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,974; in 1841, 6,480. Houses 974. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,588; in 1841, 5,953. Houses 895. The seaboard overlooks the estuary of the Shannon, midway between Kerry Head and the embouchure of the Cashen river. About one-third of the whole area is arable land; 880 acres are bog; and the remainder is coarse and poor land, chiefly pastoral or waste.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £392 6s. 2d.; glebe, £15. Gross income, £407 6s. 2d.; nett, £347 4s. 2d. Patron, W. Crosby, Esq. of Ardfert Abbey. The incumbent holds also the curacy of the adjoining impropriate parish of Rattoo. The church was quite recently built, by means of a contribution of £498 6s. 5d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Sittings 100; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 850; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Rattoo and Ballyheigue. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 67, and the Roman Catholics to 5,253; and 3 daily schools—one of which was supported by a salary of £10 from the National Board, and a bequest from the late Rev. Dr. Neylom—had on their books 135 boys and 50 girls. In 1840, three schools were salaried with aggregately £24 from the National Board, and had on their books 243 boys and 109 girls.

KILLYAN. See KILLIAN.

KILLYBEGS, a parish, partly in the barony of BOYLAGH, but chiefly in that of BANNAGH, co. Donegal, Ulster. The civil division makes it two parishes, under the names of Upper Killybegs and Lower Killybegs. Upper Killybegs is wholly in the barony of BANNAGH, and contains the town of Killybegs. Pop., in 1831, 4,287; in 1841, 4,838. Houses 825. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,563; in 1841, 4,040. Houses 689. Even Lower Killybegs lies principally in BANNAGH; and contains within that barony the village of ARDARA. Pop., in 1831, 2,990; in 1841, 3,290. Houses 577. Pop. of the BOYLAGH section, in 1831, 666; in 1841, 802. Houses 141. Pop. of the rural districts of the BANNAGH section, in 1831, 1,868; in 1841, 1,885. Houses 334. The ecclesiastical parish of Killybegs is strictly co-extensive or identical with Upper Killybegs; and the perpetual curacy of ARDARA [which see], includes the whole of Lower Killybegs. Length of the ecclesiastical parish, 6½ miles; breadth, 4½; area, 15,583 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches,—of which 41 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches are water. The surface lies round Killybegs and Fintragh bays, and ascends thence to the mountain-summits which occupy the centre of BANNAGH. A large proportion of the area is coarse moor and lofty mountain, and even the arable land is intermixed with rocky pasture. The highest ground, Crownarad, is situated 1½ mile north of the hamlet of Largy, and has an altitude of 1,619 feet. Killybegs Harbour has a common entrance with Macswine's bay, but soon deflects so as to have an inner entrance of its own; and it is at first about a mile in breadth, and eventually penetrates the land east of northward about 2½ miles. But another bay, that of Fintragh, commences almost immediately west of the common entrance of Killybegs and Macswine's Harbour, and indents all the remainder of the seaboard of the parish. See PORTNACROSS. A wild, craggy, and broken range of hills screen Killybegs Harbour; and as they rise to a considerable elevation, and present among their crags numerous cabins and isolated corn-fields, they sling over the sheet of water a picturesque and imposing appearance. "The lough or harbour of Killybegs," says the Fishery Report. "is the safest on this coast; and several hundred sail of vessels have been known to be there at one time, purchasing or curing herrings. There do not now appear to be a dozen of boats in the whole lough, and none of them employed in the fishery. This bay, however, is the best rendezvous for the fishing-vessels on that coast, Brucklas being too small, and all the others unsheltered or shallow. The cause of the want of fishing-boats in Killybegs seems to be the distance from the present fishing-grounds; as, immediately to the westward, and in a much more exposed situation, the boats are numerous. In west or south-west winds, a vessel cannot put to sea from Killybegs."—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of RAPHA. Tithe composition, £300; glebe, £240 15s. 9½d. Gross income, £540 15s. 9½d.; nett, £474 9s. 10½d.

Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1825, by means of a loan of £923 ls. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 68 to 111. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killaghtee. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 672, and the Roman Catholics to 3,790; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 15 children; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £40 from Mr. Murray of Broughton, and one with £11 ls. 6d. from Robinson's Fund—had on their books 249 boys and 154 girls. In 1838, the National Board granted £44 6s. 8d. toward the erection of a school at Fintragh; in 1839, they granted £66 13s. 4d. toward the erection of a school at Meenvally; and, in 1840, a school of theirs at Killybegs was salaried with £9, and had on its books 136 boys and 67 girls.

KILLYBEGS, a post, market, and sea-port town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Killybegs, and barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the west side and near the head of Killybegs Harbour, 7¼ miles south of Ardara, 13¼ west of Donegal, and 123½ north-west by west of Dublin. The streets are narrow and straggling; and even the newest portions are inconvenient and irregular. Though situated on an excellent harbour, and within full command of a wide sweep of circumjacent country, the town makes but trifling exports, and carries on very little general trade; yet, in both its architecture and its prosperity, it has of late years been improving. Two great hinderances to its immediate advancement are the distance from it of the fishing-grounds, and the sadly unimproved condition of the surrounding country. A small inn accommodates travellers and tourists with cars and horses. Fairs are held on Jan. 15, April 20, June 26, Aug. 12, and Nov. 12; and a weekly market is held on Tuesday. Two dispensaries, within the Glenties Poor-law union, take partial designation from Killybegs. The Killybegs and Killybegs dispensary serves for a district of 34,466 acres, with a pop. of 8,606, and, in 1839-40, expended £73 ls. 3d., and administered to 2,204 patients; and the Ardara, Dunkaneely, and Killybegs dispensary serves for a district of 50,373 acres, with a pop. of 15,922, and, in 1839-40, expended £132 4s., and administered to 5,270 patients.—Killybegs was originally called Callebegge, and is a place of considerable antiquity. It belonged, in common with the greater part of the county, to the Earls of Tyrconnel. A small house for friars of the third order of St. Francis, was built here by Macawiney Bannig. The town was erected into a borough by charter of 13 James I.; and its incorporation, though later than that of some other places of a similar kind, formed part of the plan of "the Plantation of Ulster." Roger Johnes, who appears to have been the undertaker, was required to mark out a convenient site for a new town, to adapt the streets "as well for defence as decency," and to set apart sites for a market-house, a church, and a churchyard. The corporation was to consist of a provost, 12 burgesses, and a commonalty of "cottagers and other inferior inhabitants." Considerable property was granted to the borough, part of which assumed the form of burgage tenements, and was conveyed to descendants and assignees by the members of the incorporated community, who first obtained it, and part appears to have assumed a disputed character as commonage, but eventually became the exclusive possession of the holders of the burgage tenements. The corporation has long been extinct, and almost forgotten; nor does it seem ever to have existed but as the tool of "a patron" for returning two members to the Irish parliament. The Earl of Conyngham, the ancestor of the present Marquis of Conyngham, was "the patron" of the borough, though otherwise totally unconnected with it; and, at the Legislative Union, he received the whole of the compensation for disfranchisement. Area of the town, 30 acres. Pop., in 1831, 724; in 1841, 798. Houses 136. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 51; in manufactures and trade, 63; in other pursuits, 51. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 50; on their own manual labour, 88; on means not specified, 19.

KILLYBEGS, a parish in the barony of Clane, co. Kildare, Leinster. It contains the town of PROSPEROUS: which see. Length, 3¼ miles; breadth, 1¼; area, 2,628 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,294; in 1841, 1,216. Houses 211. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 256; in 1841, 690. Houses 120. The surface is a flat and boggy country, touched on the south by the Grand Canal, and traversed by the road from Dublin to Rathangan. The seats are Killybegs and Longtown.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Clane, in the dio. of Kildare: see CLANE. Tithe composition, £113 10s. 3d. A private house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 26. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Caragh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 71, and the Roman Catholics to 1,117; and 2 National schools were salaried with respectively £10 and £8, and had on their books 128 boys and 131 girls. A commandery of Knights Hospitallers stood in Killybegs.

KILLYGARVAN, a parish on the east border of the barony of Kilmacrenan, 5 miles north-east by north of Rathmelton, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains the village of RATHMULLEN: which see. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 9,132 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches,—of which 20 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,643; in 1841, 3,644. Houses 629. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,005. Houses 506. The surface is bounded on the east by Lough Swilly, and by its expansion of Rathmelton bay. Nearly the whole of the parish, as well as a small extent of adjacent country, is consecutively noticed in the following terms by Mr. Fraser: "The road from Rathmelton to Rathmullen keeps along the shores of Lough Swilly, and commands, from several points, good views of that part of the estuary, and its opposite shores. The country presents a succession of rough hills, rocks, and valleys, to which a considerable extent of natural wood gives additional interest. We pass on the left Glenalla, the beautifully situated residence of Mr. Hart. The extensive natural woods of Hollymount, N. Batt, Esq., follow and stretch along the banks of the lough to the neighbourhood of the small town of Rathmullen. A little below the town, on the banks of the Swilly, are the Lodge, the residence of N. Batt, Esq., and Fortroyal, Charles Wray, Esq., and below it Drumalla-house and Killygarvan glebe. The road continues along the Swilly for about 5 miles, to the base of Knockalla, which rises to the height of 1,200 feet* above the sea, and presents a continuation of varied views, successively increasing in interest as we proceed down the Swilly. The country, on the one hand, is in many places beautiful, and almost everywhere broken by rugged and picturesque undulations; on the other, the waters of the estuary are deeper; the shores on this side, as well as on the opposite coast of Innishowen, become bolder and more defined; and the small batteries, which command the passage of the lough, occupying the more prominent points, add much to the interest of the scenery. From Rathmullen, roads branch in various directions to Mulroy bay, and thence to Rosnakill."—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £154; glebe, £41 3s. 1d. Gross income, £218 5s. 1d.; nett, £200 14s. 7d. Patron, the Crown. Previous to 1835, the rectory was appropriated to the deanery of Raphoe, and the parish was a perpetual curacy; but in 1835, the rectory was merged in the perpetual curacy, and endowed with the glebes of Drumany and Drumfad in the parish of Clondevad-dock. A curate has a salary of £50. The church was built in 1814, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d., and a loan of £276 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 130. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 82, the Wesleyan meeting-house by 25, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the last is united to the chapel of Tully. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 397 Churchmen, 534 Presbyterians, and 2,887 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school at Aughabannan was usually attended by about 120 children; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £6 from subscription and £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Benefaction—had on their books 116 boys and 51 girls. In 1841, the Killygarvan Loan Fund had a capital of £353, circulated £1,747 in 517 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £9 6s. 4d.

KILLYGLEN, a parish in the barony of Upper Glenarm, 2½ miles west-north-west of Larne, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,295 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 524; in 1841, 605. Houses 100. The surface extends from the North Channel to near the north-west base of Agnew's Hill, and is traversed along the coast by the road from Larne to Glenarm.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CONNOR [which see], in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £62 10s. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 11 Churchmen, 435 Presbyterians, and 102 Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 15 boys and 12 girls.

KILLYGORDON, a village in the parish of Donaghmore, barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands in the vale of the Finn, and on the road from Stranorlar to Strabane, 3 miles east of Stranorlar. A dispensary here is within the Stranorlar Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 46,378 acres, with a pop. of 13,344; and, in 1839–40, it expended £118 12s. 8d., and administered to 1,001 patients. A little to the south of the village are Monellan and Mounthall, the seats respectively of J. Delap, Esq., and W. Young, Esq.; and midway between it and Stranorlar, are Edenmore, J. Cochran, Esq., and Woodlands, J. Johnston, Esq. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 294. Houses 50.

KILLYLEAGH, a quoad sacra parish, containing a village of the same name, and lying within the baronies of Turamy and Armagh, and on the west border of co. Armagh, Ulster. It comprises portions of the parishes of Tynan, Derrynoose, Armagh, and Eglisli. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, about 9,265 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,452. The surface is fertile, beautifully undulated, and thickly inhabited; it is bounded and drained by the Blackwater on the west, and traversed by the Ulster Canal through the interior; and it possesses the large aggregate of ornament produced by the demesnes of Elmpark, the Earl of Charlemont,—Knappa, James Johnston, Esq.,—Woodpark, A. St. George, Esq.,—Fellows Hall, T. K. Armstrong, Esq.,—and Darton, M. Cross, Esq. The village of Killyleagh is in the parish of Tynan, and barony of Armagh; and stands on the road from Caledon to Armagh, 2 miles north-east of Tynan, 2½ east of Caledon, and 4½ west of Armagh. It consists of one long street, climbing a steep hill, and tedious in the ascent; but its houses are well built of stone and lime, and it has a clean and even neat exterior. A fair, principally for the sale of horses, is held on the last Friday of every month. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1841, 337. Houses 60.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Gross income, £75; nett, £55. Patrons, successively the rectors of the quoad civilia parishes within which the curacy lies. The church was built in 1832, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits, and a sum of £708 raised by subscription. Sittings 400; attendance 250. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 924 Churchmen, 1,162 Presbyterians, and 1,373 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools—one of which was aided by Mr. Close, and one salaried with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and a sum not named from subscription—had on their books 198 boys and 142 girls.

KILLYLEAGH, a parish, partly in the barony of Upper Castlereagh, but chiefly in that of Dufferin, co. Down, Ulster. The Dufferin section contains the town of KILLYLEAGH, and the village of TULLYVERY: see these articles. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4½. Area of the Castlereagh section, 968 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches; of the Dufferin section, 10,771 acres, 30 perches,—of which 123 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches are water. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 6,688; of the Castlereagh section, 487; of the rural districts of the Dufferin section, 4,333. Houses in the Castlereagh section, 83; in the rural districts of the Dufferin section, 777. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 6,817; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 5,712. The surface is part of the western seaboard of Lough Strangford; and possesses a large aggregate of both natural and artificial beauty. About two-thirds of it consist of excellent land, which produces crops of hay, oats, barley, and wheat, equal to any in Ireland; about 700 acres are morass or lake; and about the same number of acres are reclaimed bog and rocky ground, assessed to the payment of tithe composition. The general appearance of the country is highly improved; and its varied undulations, its mutual intersections of hill and vale, and its sheets of corn-field, and masses of plantation, blend finely with the isles and waters and opposite shores of Lough Strangford, in the production of picturesque effect. The chief residences within the rural districts are Delamont, Ringdufferin, Crossgar, Toy, and Ardigan. The road from Downpatrick to Newtown-Ardes passes along the shore.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £795; glebe, £47 1s. 10d. Gross income, £842 1s. 10d.; nett, £718 15s. 4½d. Patron, Trinity College, Dublin. The church was built in the 17th century; and it was enlarged and refitted in 1812, and subsequent years, by means of a loan of £1,846 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and a donation of £1,846 3s. from Lord Dufferin and Claneboy. Sittings 520; attendance 115. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 800, and the Roman Catholic chapel by about 100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the latter is united to the chapels of Inch and Kilmore. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 761 Churchmen, 5,079 Presbyterians, 30 other Protestant dissenters, and 989 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 324 children; and 9 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board, one with £12 from Lady Dufferin, one with £15 from Lord Dufferin, one with £16 from the Ladies' Hibernian Society, and one with £20 from the Rev. Mr. Hamilton—had on their books 302 boys and 287 girls. In 1834, the National Board had schools at Derryboy, Ballytrim, Tullymaknows, and Killinchy Woods.

KILLYLEAGH, a post, market, and sea-port town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Killyleagh and barony of Dufferin, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the west shore of Lough Strangford, and on the road from Downpatrick to Newtown-Ardes, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Killinchy, 5 north of Downpatrick, 16 south-east of Belfast, and $78\frac{1}{2}$ north by east of Dublin. A remote nucleus of the present town is believed to have been formed by the Irish sept of MacCartan, who possessed the territory now constituting the baronies of Dufferin and Kinelearty, and the southern part of Castlereagh. On the conquest of the maritime parts of Ulster, Sir John de Courcey appears to have found Killyleagh a place of some importance, and to have adopted it as the site of one of his castles and principal settlements. An English family of the name of Mandeville were constituted its lords, but seem to have been soon succeeded by another English family of the name of White. The castle built by De Courcey came now to be designated White's Castle, and was known for ages by this name. In 1567, the Whites were besieged in it by Shane O'Neil, but made so vigorous a resistance that Shane was eventually compelled to retire. In 1590, the Whites had become so reduced that they were able to raise only 120 footmen, and 20 horse-men, a force altogether incompetent to defend their territory; and about 1598, they were able to raise only 20 footmen, and had sunk to a mean as well as powerless condition, while the remaining families of the old sept of MacCartans joined Tyrone in rebellion, and suffered the attainder of their remaining possessions. In 1648, the castle was demolished by General Monk; and, in 1666, a new castellated pile was erected on its site, by the Hamiltons, Earls of Clanboy and Clanbrassil, whose title was created by Charles I., and became extinct in 1675. The structure, after being the seat of the Earls, descended, along with a portion of its domains, to the late celebrated A. Hamilton Rowan, and is now the property of his grandson. It stands at the upper end of the principal street of the town; but, though commanding in position, castellated in character, and massive and venerable in appearance, it is strictly a mere mansion, battlemented along the summit, and flanked with large, circular, battlemented turrets. It has passed, however, into neglect and even desolation; its courts and yards are overgrown with weeds; and its walls have assumed that dull, heavy, aspect which so decidedly indicates coming ruin, and appears as if destined to moulder through all the successive stages of decay. At Ringhaddy, north of the town, and on Scatterick, one of the isles of Lough Strangford, anciently stood two fortalices, which acted subordinately to Killyleagh castle in the defence of Dufferin.

The site of Killyleagh is a rising ground, at the head of a creek or arm of Lough Strangford, dry and healthy in its air, and commanding a prospect of the lough, the Ardes, and St. George's Channel. The creek or little bay, at the foot of the principal street, shelters vessels from all winds, and was lately improved as a harbour, by the chief proprietor of the town, Lord Dufferin. The public or conspicuous buildings are the Church, the Presbyterian meeting-house, the Castle, the Market-house, the Barrack, and several good mansional or villa residences. The Church crowns an eminence at a brief distance from the body of the town, and is a handsome cruciform structure. The cotton manufacture is extensively carried on; a considerable trade exists in the exportation of corn and provisions, and the importation of cotton, iron, timber, and other articles; a weekly market is held on Monday; and fairs are held on April 10, June 3 and 15, Oct. 11, and Dec. 11. A mail-car is in daily transit between Belfast and Downpatrick. A Loan Fund, which was closed in 1840 in consequence of the opposition of some influential gentlemen in the vicinity, was admirably worked while in operation, affording assistance and support to very many indusrious families, and finally appropriating a handsome sum, derived from its profits, to benevolent purposes.

Killyleagh was incorporated by charter of 10 James I. The borough limits extend about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile over the townlands of "the corporation," "Corbally," and "Castlewilliam," and comprise an area of 1,173 acres. The corporation is styled by charter "the Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Killyleagh;" and consists of a provost, 12 burgesses, and a commonalty. The provost and burgesses, previous to the Legislative Union, sent two members to the Irish parliament. Up to 1833, no Roman Catholic, and only one Protestant dissenter, had been admitted into the corporation. A borough court of record once existed, but has long been in desuetude. The manor of Killyleagh and Killinchy comprises the corporation district; and has a seneschal appointed by A. Hamilton Rowan, Esq., a court-leet held once a-year, and a court of record, with jurisdiction to the amount of £10 Irish, held every three weeks. The only prison is a wretched and unwholesome place, called "the Black Hole." The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary; and the roads and streets are repaired by Grand Jury presentment. About 57 acres of enclosed commonage—the remains of a more extensive landed property of the borough—is under the control of a corporation jury, and is managed, within certain restrictions, for the common good of a portion of the community. Killyleagh was the birth-place of the celebrated physician and naturalist, Sir Hans Sloane. Area of the town, 52 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,147; in 1841, 1,116. Houses 205. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 53; in manufactures and trade, 130; in other pursuits, 42. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 102; on their own manual labour, 103; on means not specified, 9.

KILLYMAN, a parish, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Moy, and partly in the barony of West O'Neilland, co. Armagh, but chiefly in the barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Armagh section, 3,154 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches,—of which 49 acres, 35 perches are water. Area of the Tyrone section, 7,404 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches,—of which 36 acres, 32 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 7,579; in 1841, 8,220. Houses 1,168. Pop. of the co. Tyrone section, in 1831, 6,277; in 1841, 6,748. Houses 1,144. The river Blackwater divides the two sections of the parish from each other, or forms the boundary-line between the counties. The co. Armagh section is for the most part flat and tame in character; and the co. Tyrone section is considerably diversified with undulations and hills. Three-fourths of the entire surface are prime arable land; and the remainder is good ground, variously arable, meadow, and pasture. On the Blackwater, 3 miles below Moy, are Verner's Bridge, the hamlet of Church-Hill, and Col. Verner's handsome seat and demesne of Church-Hill,—the last, from the high ground which it occupies, forming a conspicuous and fine feature amid the surrounding flat country; and in the Tyrone section are the demesnes of Rhone-Hill and Derrygally, and a paper manufactory.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £484 5s.; glebe, £365 15s. Gross income, £850, nett, £784 12s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The celebrated controversialist, the Rev. Mortimer O'Sullivan, became rector of Killyman in 1830. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1824, by means of a loan of £1,846 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 1,200; attendance, from 300 to 600. The Wesleyan meeting-house is attended by from 80 to 100; and a schoolhouse, used as a Wesleyan meeting-house, by 200. The Roman Catholic chapels of Killyman and Clonmore have an attendance of respectively 700 and 460. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,493 Churchmen, 213 Presbyterians, 127 other Protestant dissenters, and 3,901 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 366 children; and 8 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the rector, and £7 10s. from the Society for Discourteasing Vice, and another had just become connected with the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 187 boys and 79 girls, and were attended by about 143 other children.

KILLYMAR, a rivulet of the eastern declination of co. Galway, Connaught. It rises near the Dublin and Galway mail-road, about midway between Aughrim and Loughrea, and flows 7 miles east-south-eastward, and 6½ southward, to a common embouchure with the Ballyshruel rivulet in a bay of Lough Derg, 3 miles west by south of Portumna.

KILLYMARD, a parish in the barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains a small part of the town of DONEGAL: which see. Length, 9 miles; breadth, in the north, 6,—in the south, 2½; area, 28,229 acres, 3 roods, 35 perches,—of which 472 acres, 24 perches are in Lough Esk, and 207 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 4,798; in 1841, 4,743. Houses 821. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,390. Houses 754. The surface rests its narrow and low end upon the north side of the head of Donegal bay; and it thence extends, expands, and climbs northward, bounded on the east by the Esk lake and river, and embracing within its limits much of the wild alpine country lying immediately west of the Gap of Barnmore and the mountain of Craugan. The mountains of Silverhill and Bluestack have an altitude of respectively 1,967 and 2,213 feet; and Lough Belshade, a little east of Bluestack, has an elevation of 1,035 feet. Upwards of one-third of the parish is land of an average good quality; and most of the remainder is either moorish and very inferior pasture or totally barren mountain. Many little bays and sea-coves enliven the shore-line on the south; several fertile and romantic dells intersect the craggy hills among the offshoots of the southern mountains; and the lake, woods, demesne, and hill-screens of the Esk beautify the east: see ESK. The road from Donegal to Killybegs passes along the shore.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £276 18s. 5½d.; nett, £223 0s. 10d. Gross income, £499 19s. 3½d.; nett, £396 1s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1830, by means of a loan of £800 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 288; attendance 170. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 95; the Wesleyan meeting-house by 40; and the Roman Catholic chapel by 1,300. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,594 Churchmen, 145 Presbyterians, and 3,059 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools had on their books 263 boys and 191 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Fund; one, with £26 from the Wesleyan Missionary Society; one, with £5 from Mr. Murray of Broughton; one, with £11 from subscription; one, with £10 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society and allowances from the London Hibernian Society; and one was in connection with the Kildare Place Society.

KILLYON, a parish in the barony of Upper Moyfenragh, 3½ miles north by east of Clonard, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 4,316 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches,—of which 13 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches are in the river Boyne, and 28 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches lie detached. Pop., in 1831, 818; in 1841, 784. Houses 119. The surface is washed in the east by the river Boyne, impinged upon in the south by the Royal Canal, and traversed through the interior by the road from Trim to Kinnegad; and it comprises a considerable extent of bog, and consists variously of good, bad, and indifferent land,—about one-third of the whole area being good or even prime. The only seat is Killyon-house.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CLONARD [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £46 3s. 1d., and the rectorial for £92 6s. 1½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Mrs. Magan and Lady Rich. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Longwood. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 841; and a hedge-school had on its books 36 boys and 11 girls.

KILLYVARNEN, a beautiful hill, finely wooded, in the northern vicinity of Rathdrum, and overhanging the road thence to Bray, co. Wicklow, Leinster.

KILMACABEA, a parish, 4 miles west by north of Rosscarbery, and partly in the eastern division of the barony of West Carbery, but chiefly in the western division of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the West Carbery section, 4,272 acres; of the East Carbery section, 9,485 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,800; in 1841, 6,209. Houses 1,020. Pop. of the East Carbery section, in 1831, 4,006. in 1841, 4,259. Houses 731. The surface extends northward from the head of Glendore Harbour to the southern declivities of Kilvenog mountain, and includes a large aggregate of poor land. Gorton says, "There is a pool called Loughdrine in the parish, the islands of which are said to have changed positions; and there is a second pool called Ballinlough, containing trout of a peculiarly fine flavour. On the banks of the last mentioned lake stands an ancient Danish rath, supposed to enclose a subterraneous passage towards the margin of the lake.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ross. Vicarial tithe composition, £295. The rectorial tithes are inappropriate to the amount of £99 5s. 6d., and appropriated to the archdeaconry of Ross to the amount of £195 14s. 6d. The vicarages of Kilmacabea and KILFAUGHNABEG [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilmacabea. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 8,261. Gross income, £445 1s. 6½d.; nett, £420 11s. 5½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1828, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 230; attendance 90. A schoolhouse in Kilmacabea and a private house in Kilfaughnabeg are also used as parochial places of worship, and have an attendance of respectively 35 and 18. The Kilmacabea and Kilfaughnabeg Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 2,200 and 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 194, and the Roman Catholics to 5,894; the Protestants of the union to 254, and the Roman Catholics to 8,305; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 17 children; 3 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and one with £24 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 316 boys and 159 girls; and there were two National schools in Kilfaughnabeg.

KILMACALLANE, a parish in the barony of Tiraghrill, 4 miles south-east by south of Colooney, co. Sligo, Connaught. It contains part of the village of RIVERSTOWN: which see. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 6½; area, 9,928 acres, 7 perches,—of which 283 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches are in Lough Arrow, and 39 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 4,262; in 1841, 5,098. Houses 852. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,954; in 1841, 4,729. Houses 791. The outline is singularly capricious. The surface is very much diversified, includes a considerable aggregate of mountain, and contains some pleasing scenery; but consists, in the aggregate, of decidedly poor land. The river Arrow runs northward through the interior; and the mail-road from Dublin to Sligo passes along the west border. Lakeview, the seat of W. Weir, Esq., stands near the mail-road; and Cooper's Hill, the seat of A. B. Cooper, Esq., adjoins Riverstown. The highest ground is in the extreme east, has an altitude of 999 feet, and bears aloft a monument to O'Connor.—This parish is a vicarage and a prebend, in the dio. of Elphin; and the vicarage forms part of the benefice of Boyle, while the prebend is a sinecure, and is held along with that benefice: see BOYLE. Vicarial tithe composition, £83 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £28 6s. 7d. Rectorial tithe composition of Drumcollum, Taunagh, Ballinakill, and Ballysumaghan, appropriated to Kilmacallane prebend, £158 15s. 4d. The rectorial tithes of Kilmacallane, Boyle, and Aghana, are jointly compounded for £313, and are inappropriate in Viscount Lorton. The church was built in 1818, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. and a loan of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance 350. Two Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of 850. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 318, and the Roman Catholics to 4,160; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 60 children; and 8 daily schools—two of which were salaried with respectively £10 and £12 from the National Board—had on their books 434 boys and 137 girls, and were attended by about 46 other children.

KILMACALOGUE. See TUOSIST.

KILMACANOGUE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, 2½ miles south-south-west of Bray, half-barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 5,401 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,347; in 1841, 2,336. Houses 366. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 103; in 1841, not specially returned. The ecclesiastical parish seems to be less extensive than the civil one, and is returned as having had in 1831 a pop. of 1,136. The surface is prevailingly mountainous, and profusely picturesque, partaking the attractions of the Sugarloaf mountains, and of the rich and magnificent scenery which environs their base. The Great Sugarloaf is wholly within the limits, and has an altitude of 1,651 feet. The seats are Wingfield, Hillside, Bushypark, Newtown, Charleville, Ballyorney, and Hollybrook,—the last the beautifully situated Elizabethan villa of Sir G. F. Hodson.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DELGANY [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £119 18s. 6d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Bray and Stagonil. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 192, and the Roman Catholics to 944; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by from 200 to 250 children; and 2 daily schools—the one of which was aided from subscription, and the other salaried with £8 from the National Board—had on their books 77 boys and 56 girls.

KILMACAR. See KILMOCAR.

KILMACDONOUGH, a parish on the south coast of the barony of Imokilly, 3½ miles south-west of Youghal, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of BALLYMACODA: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 6,241 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,455; in 1841, 3,838. Houses 648. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,533. Houses 591. The surface forms a peninsula between Castlemartyr river and Youghal Harbour on the one side, and Fenis river and Ballycotton bay on the other; it terminates seaward in the headland called Ring Point; and it consists partly of coarse upland, but chiefly of good arable and pasture-ground. The mansion of Ring stands a mile west of Ring Point; and the islet called Cable or Cappul, lies a little to the north-east.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Kilcredan, in the dio. of Cloyne. Vicarial tithe composition, £337 11s. 8d.; glebe, £11. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £675 3s. 4d., and are appropriated to the prebend of Kilmacdonough in Cloyne cathedral. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Itermorrhough and Kilmahon. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 40, and the Roman Catholics to 3,263; a Protestant Sunday school had on its books 12 boys and 12 girls; and 2 pay daily schools were usually attended in summer by about 170 children. In 1840, the National Board granted £73 10s. toward the erection of a school at Kilmacdonough.

KILMACDUAGH, a parish, and nominal seat of a bishopric, 3 miles south-south-west of Gort, barony of Kiltartan, co. Galway, Connaught. The parish contains the village of CONNELLS, and part of the town of GORT: see these articles. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 8,804 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches,—of which 112 acres, 18 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,780; in 1841, 4,149. Houses 681. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,268; in 1841, 2,828. Houses 468. The surface is limestone-ground, partly arable, partly rocky and pastoral, and aggregately well relieved with wood and water. The seats are Termon, Dromeen, and Rosencade. "Three miles from Gort, near the road leading to Curofin," says Mr. Fraser, "are the ruins of the round tower and seven churches of Kilmacduagh. The tower is nearly perfect; but considerably off the perpendicular. A part of the ruin, dignified by the name of cathedral, still exists; but the relics of the others are only discernible; and, judging from what remains, they must have been at best mere huts, worse than even those which the virtuosi have pressed into the service of Glendalough and Clonmacnoise; and though wanting that interest arising from the lake and mountains surrounding the former, or that which is produced by the low ranges of pastoral hills, and the deep sullen waters of the Shannon, bounding the latter, still there is a sternness and coldness of character about Kilmacduagh, where all mountain and plain, as far as the view extends, seems one vast sheet of limestone, which accords with the solitary ruins and the extensive cemetery connected with them." Archdall says, "St. Colman, the son of Duagh, founded an abbey here about the year 620; and Maurice, bishop of this see, who died in 1283, erected on the ancient site a monastery for regular canons of the order of St. Augustine. This abbey is situated to the north-west of the cathedral, (which is now in ruins,) on a neck of land between two loughs, which, according to some authors, evacuate themselves in summer into whirlpools; however, this rarely happens, as the water never goes off but in a very dry season. The church, though small, is a very neat building; the pillars and arches from the entrance to the altar-part, and those of the east window, are finished in an elegant style, and the angles at the east end are worked in pillars. To the south of the church is a sacristy, and adjoining to that room, where was probably deposited the valuable effects belonging to the church, and which, being arched, they call the jail; on the south of these is a chapel and the refectory; from the whole of these we may infer that the canons of the monastery dwelt in separate houses. To the north, about 2 feet from the church, is an old wall; an ancient tradition still exists at Kilmacduagh, of its being once a place of penance. There is also a holy well here, with a circular enclosure. Here is an ancient round tower which leans 17½ feet from its perpendicular. It may not be improper to remark, that the tower at Pisa, so universally celebrated, leans but 13 feet. At the general suppression, this monastery was granted to Richard, Earl of Clanricarde."—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £92 6s. 2d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £130, and are appropriated to the treasurer and the precentor of Kilmacduagh cathedral. The vicarage of Kilmacduagh, and the rectories of KILBEACONTY, and KILTARTAN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilmacduagh. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 11,191. Gross income, £452 13s. 10½d.; nett, £401 8s. 3½d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Aughaboy, in the dio. of Clogher. A curate has a salary of £100. The church is situated in Gort, and was built in 1820, at the cost of £1,292 6s. 1½d., and repaired in 1828, at the cost of £600; both of which sums were borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitzings 300; attendance 65. The Kilmacduagh, Gort, and Kiltartan Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance,—the first of from 300 to 600,—the second, of from 1,700 to 1,800,—and the third, of 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, they are mutually united. There are two Roman Catholic chapels also in Kilbeacounty. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 81, and the Roman Catholics to 3,903; the Protestants of the union to 146, and the Roman Catholics to 11,849; 4 pay daily schools in the parish were usually attended by about 120 children; and there were 6 daily schools in the other sections of the union.

A legend affirms the SEE of KILMACDUAGH to have been founded early in the 7th century, and narrates a stupid yet seemingly plausible story respecting its pretended founder St. Colman, the near relative of Guair, King of Connaught. This Colman, says the legend, was called Mac-Duagh, or "the son of Duagh," to distinguish him from other holy men of the name of Colman; he was fond of asceticism, and spent 7 years in a wilderness in the south of Connaught, with only one companion; and, at the close of his normal period of voluntary exile from human society, he was made bishop over an abbey or church which he had founded, and which, taking name from himself, was called Kil-macduagh. An imperfect and rather suspicious list is preserved of twenty successive bishops. The see was permanently annexed in 1602 to Clonfert; and became united in 1833, to likewise Killaloe and Kilfenora.—The gross and nett amount of episcopal income connected with the see, on the average of 3 years ending in 1831, was respectively £675 0s. 7d., and £808 6s. 1½d. The dignitaries, with the gross amount of income belonging to their respective dignities, are, the dean, £459 8s. 8d.; the archdeacon, £252 2s. 10d.; the provost, £150; the precentor, £60; the treasurer, £70; the prebendary of Kinvarra, £74 5s.; and the prebendary of Island-Eddy, £6 6s.—The diocese lies all in the south-west of co. Galway, and comprehends the barony of Kiltartan, and part of the baronies of Dunkellin and Loughrea. Length, 18 miles; breadth, 12 miles; area, 117,626 acres, 1 rood, 16½ perches. Pop., in 1831, 43,035. Number of parishes, 21; of benefices, 4. Tithe composition belonging to the benefices, £1,923 11s.; glebes, £138 19s. 7d. Gross income, £2,062 10s. 7d.; nett, £1,853 8s. 9d. Patron, of one benefice, the Crown; of one, the diocesan; of one, the Marquis of Clanricarde; of one, alternately the diocesan and the Marquis of Clanricarde. Improper tithe composition, £23; appropriate tithe composition, £1,033 13s. 5d. Number of curates, 2; amount of their salaries, £118 9s. 2½d. Number of churches, 4; sittings 720. Number of Roman Catholic chapels, 19. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 636 Churchmen, and 45,476 Roman Catholics; 32 daily schools had on their books 1,483 boys and 661 girls; 21 other daily schools, of which no lists were produced, were computed to be attended by 1,407 children; and 46 of the total number of schools were supported wholly by fees.—The Roman Catholic sees of Kilmacduagh and Kilfenora are mutually annexed, and are suffragan alternately to Tuam and to Cashel. Kilmacduagh alone has 11 parishes, 10 parochial clergymen, and 6 coadjutor clergymen; and the bishop's parish is Kinvarra. The eleven parishes, with the site of their respective chapels, are, Kinvarra, at Kinvarra and Dinas; Kilchrist, at Kilchrist; Kiltartan, at Kiltartan; Kilbeacounty, at Kilbeacounty; Craughwell, at Craughwell; Ballenderin, at Ballenderin; Kilcormac, at Kilcormac and Claranbridge; Kilmacduagh, at Gort and Kilmacduagh; Peter's Well, at Peter's Well; Beagh, at Beagh; Ardahan, at Labane.

KILMACDUANE, a parish on the east border of the barony of Moyarta, 5½ miles north by east of Kilrush, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the village of COORACLARE: which see. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 4½; area, 16,701 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches,—of which 286 acres, 17 perches lie detached, and 24 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches are water.* Pop., in 1831, 5,738; in 1841, 6,762. Houses 1,045. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 6,584. Houses 1,007. The parochial surface is for the most part a series of bleak uplands, moors, and bogs, washed by the Dunbeg and Creegh rivers, and intersected or diversified with narrow vales. A principal one of the bogs includes the two denominations of Kilmacduane and Dromelyhy, fills the valleys between the hills of Dromelyhy, Dunganella, and Clonredane, comprises an area of 1,420 acres, and has a maximum and an average depth of respectively 27 and 15 feet. The estimated cost, in 1813, of reclaiming this bog was only £1,842. The highest ground is on the south border, and has an altitude of 252 feet. The seats are Dunganella, Gower, and Cloonena.—Kilmacduane parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILMURRY-CLONDERALAW [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £120, and the rectorial for £184 12s. 3½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Lord Castlecoote. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,100 and 850. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 6,136; and 6 pay daily schools had on their books 164 boys and 79 girls.

KILMACENOGUE. See KILMACANOGUE.

KILMACKEVOGUE, a parish in the barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It lies 4½ miles south-west of New Ross, and is traversed by the road thence to Waterford. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 3,231 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,027; in 1841, 1,239. Houses 187. The Barrow flows along the eastern boundary. The highest ground is on the southern boundary, 1½ mile from the Barrow, and has an altitude of 493 feet. The seats are Aylwardstown and Ballinabarha; and the hamlets are Glenmore and Kilmackevogue.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ROSSBERCON [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £55; glebe, £24. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £110, and are inappropriate in the Corporation of Waterford. The Roman Catholic chapel at Glenmore has an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 2, and the Roman Catholics to 1,047; and 2 pay daily schools were usually attended in summer by about 140 children.

KILMACLASSER, a parish in the eastern part of the barony of Burrishoole, 3½ miles east-north-east of Westport, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 6,865 acres, 2 roods, 21 perches,—of which 78 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,444; in 1841, 3,548. Houses 629. The surface comprises a large proportion of mountainous and coarse land; yet is very much diversified in the character of its land. The only hamlet is Fahey.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of WESTPORT [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Vicarial tithe composition, £84 10s.; glebe, £3 4s. 6d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £45 10s., and are appropriated to the prebends of Faldown and Killybegs. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 700 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmina. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 160, and the Roman Catholics to 3,519; two free daily schools at Slingen were supported by subscription and the Tuam-Diocesan and Kildare Place Societies, and had on their books 81 boys and 39 girls; and a pay daily school at Fahey had 51 boys and 20 girls.

KILMACLEAGUE, a parish in the barony of Gualtier, 5½ miles south-south-east of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 3,462 acres. Pop., in 1831, 999; in 1841, 1,025. Houses 167. The surface extends along the east side of Tramore bay, and terminates seaward in the promontory of Brownston Head. The land, with the exception of a small portion, is poor and wet, yet might with tolerable facility be improved by draining.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLINAKILL [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £78 3s. 3d., and the rectorial for £114 4s. 10d.; and the latter are appropriated to the chancellorship of Waterford cathedral. But the entire tithes of Ballygarrin townland, compounded for £29 2s., are inappropriate in G. Ivie, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 1,022; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILMACLENAN, or KILMACLENY, a parish in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, 6 miles west-south-west of Doneraile, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,042 acres. Pop., in 1831, 325; in 1841, 322. Houses 42. The surface is partly pastoral, and is various in character; and it is impinged upon by the road from Mallow to Newcastle. Fairs are held on April 6, June 21, and Oct. 2.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition and gross income, £92 6s.; nett, £87 0s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is non-resident, and holds the united benefices which form the corps of the chancellorship of Cork cathedral. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILMACNEVIN, a parish in the barony of Moygoish, 6½ miles west-north-west of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 5,016 acres, 7 perches,—of which 57 acres, 22 perches are in the river Inny. Pop., in 1841, 1,760. Houses 273. The Census of 1831 places part of the parish in Rathconrath, and states the pop. of the Moygoish section at 2,184, and of the whole parish at 2,604. Nearly all the land is either good or excellent. The Royal Canal crosses the interior; and the Inny flows on the western boundary. The hamlets are Oldtown, Newtown, Freahane, Seabaugh, and Gataduff.—This parish is a curacy, and part of the benefice of LENEY [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The tithes are compounded for £130; and are inappropriate in Sir J. B. Piers, Bart. of Tristernagh Abbey. The Roman Catholic chapel at Empor has an attendance of about 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Rathconrath. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 73, and the Roman Catholics to 2,579; and two daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and aided with important advantages from Mr. Tuite—had on their books 105 boys and 56 girls.

KILMACOE. See KILMACOW.

KILMACOEN, or KILMACOWEN, a parish in the south-west corner of the barony of Carbery, 4½ miles south-west of Sligo, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length,

* A small uninhabited district of 166 acres is not included in the above statement, and lies within the barony of Ibriclane.

2½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 3,548 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches,—of which 4 acres, 2 roods, 27 perches are tideway, and 13 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 2,276; in 1841, 2,011. Houses 367. The surface lies on the east side of Ardnaglass Harbour, and consists for the most part of good and well-cultivated arable and pasture land. On the east border is the demesne of Cloverhill; and on the shore is that of Seafield. Archdall alleges that the original church of the parish was built by St. Maneus, a disciple of St. Patrick. —This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. John's of Sligo, in the dio. of Elphin. Tithe composition, £180 15s. 2d. A private house is used as the parochial place of worship in summer, and has an attendance of 30. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 187, and the Roman Catholics to 2,109; and a daily school was salaried with £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, and had on its books 14 boys and 44 girls.

KILMACOLLOUE. See TUOSIST.

KILMACOMB, a parish in the barony of Gualtier, 5½ miles south-west by south of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, ½; area, 2,401 acres. Pop., in 1841, 817. Houses 129. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 866; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 785. If the land were distributed into 124 parts, 74 of them would be found untilled, 41 tilled, and 9 meadow. Within the limits are a hill, a lake, two bogs, and the handsome marine villa of Woodstown,—the last the property of Lord Carew. Coal was, some time ago, discovered and mined on the lands of Woodstown; but was soon found to exist in too small quantity to be compensating. The ruins of the old parochial church still exist.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLINAKILL [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £49 7s. 9d., and the rectorial for £74 1s. 7d.; and the latter are appropriated to the chancellorship of Waterford cathedral. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 37, and the Roman Catholics to 768; and a girls' daily school was salaried with £6 from the National Board, and had on its books 22 girls.

KILMACOMOGUE, a parish, partly in the western division of the barony of East Carbery, but chiefly in the barony of Bantry, co. Cork, Munster. The barony of Bantry section contains the town of Bantry. Length, 14 miles; breadth, 12. Area of the Carbery section, 1,206 acres; of the Bantry section, 57,629 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 14,483; in 1841, 16,188. Houses 2,274. Pop. of the Carbery section, in 1831, 102; in 1841, 140. Houses 21. Pop. of the rural districts of the Bantry section, in 1831, 9,351; in 1841, 10,759. Houses 1,640. The parish is very nearly identical with the barony of Bantry; excluding from that barony only a district which contained, in 1831, a population of 620, and including from Carbery a district containing only 102; and it has therefore been already so fully described in the three articles on the barony, the bay, and the town of Bantry, that any further notice of it, large though the district is, would be superfluous. Yet some detailed information as to particular localities will be found under the words WHIDDY, GLENGARIFF, GHOUL, COOMHOLA, OUVANE, and DUNAMARC: which see.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Vicarial tithe composition, £625; glebe, £145 9s. Gross income, £770 9s.; nett, £492 11s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £561 15s.; and are inappropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1818, by means of a loan of £1,384 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and a sum of £553 16s. 11d. raised by subscription. Sittings 500; attendance 280. The glebe-house and three places of meeting at Glengariff, Ballylickey, and Scart Mountain, are also used as parochial places of worship, and have an attendance of respectively 50, 30, 25, and 20. The Roman Catholic chapels of Bantry, Camola, and Kealkill, have an attendance of respectively 4,050, 1,000, and 2,500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 948, and the Roman Catholics to 13,717; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 75 children; and 15 daily schools had on their books 646 boys and 347 girls. Two of the daily schools were salaried with respectively £11 and about £10 from subscription; one, with £34 from the National Board, £25 from an annual collection at the Bantry chapel, and a sum not named from subscription; one, with similar sums from the same sources as the preceding; one, with £8 from the Baptist Society, and about £10 from subscription; and one, with £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £9 from subscription.

KILMACOW, a parish on the east border of the barony of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains the villages of Kilmacow, GRANY, and DAXGAN (OLD): see these articles. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 4,445 acres, 5 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,923; in 1841, 2,120. Houses 341. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,673. Houses 262. The parochial surface extends northward from the Suir around Grany, up the west side of the Blackwater rivulet; and it is traversed across the south end by the road from Waterford to Clonmell. The land varies in annual value from 10s. to 40s. per plantation acre. The village of Kilmacow stands on the Blackwater, and on the road to Dangan, 3½ miles north-north-west of Waterford. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 187. Houses 34.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £360; glebe, £33. Gross income, £393; nett, £316 0s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Ardfinnan in the dio. of Lismore, and the sinecure precentorship of Lismore cathedral. The church was built in 1818, by means of a loan of £784 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 70; attendance 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200 at one service, and 1,500 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Dunkitt and Kilbeacon. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 44 Churchmen, 3 Protestant dissenters, and 1,929 Roman Catholics; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 133 boys and 69 girls. The Kilmacow dispensary is within the Waterford Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 10,606; and, in 1839-40, it expended £150 11s., and administered to a considerable number of patients.

KILMACOW, a parish in the barony of Artlow, 2½ miles south-south-east of Rathdrum, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 461. It has a mountainous surface, and contains the Cronchase copper mines; but, though figuring in topography as a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Castlemacadam, in the dio. of Dublin, it has practically ceased, both ecclesiastically and civilly, to possess the status of a parish.

KILMACOW, the site of a quondam castle, and of quondam iron-works, on the eastern verge of the barony of Kinnataloon, and of co. Cork, Munster. The castle was built by John Fitzgerald, a descendant of the house of Maccollop; passed, in Jan. 1604, to Sir Richard Boyle; and fell about the middle of last century. The iron-works were the property of the first Earl of Cork; they were supplied with ore principally from Ballyregan; and, in 7 years, they produced 21,000 tons of bar-iron, which cost Lord Cork only about £63,000, and sold for about £378,000.

KILMACOWEN. See KILMACOEN.

KILMACREAN, or COMMER, a parish on the east side of the barony of Clare, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles south-west of Tuam, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the village of BALLINPHUIL: which see. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{4}$; area, 9,314 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches,—of which 509 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches are in Lough Clonkeen. Pop., in 1831, 1,907; in 1841, 1,889. Houses 316. The surface is flat, monotonous, and irksome; and is diversified, yet scarcely relieved, by part of the chain of turloughs, or alternate lakes and meadows, in the course of the Clare river. On the road from Tuam to Galway is Corofin, the seat of Pierce Joseph Blake, Esq.; and elsewhere are the residences of Ballybanagher and Ballinderry,—the latter the property of Mr. Nolan. Most of the land is of middle-rate quality; and some is very bad.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of MOYLUGH [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £280; glebe, £8 15s. The Roman Catholic chapel at Corofin has an attendance of from 800 to 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Belclare. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 2,038; and 4 daily schools—3 of which were salaried with respectively £8, £8, and £10, from the National Board—had on their books 199 boys and 100 girls.

KILMACREDA, a hamlet in the barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the road from Killybegs to Donegal, and at the head of Inver bay, in the vicinity of the village of Inver, and 5 miles east of Killybegs.

KILMACREDOCK, a parish in the barony of North Salt, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Celbridge, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 479 acres, 26 perches. Pop., in 1841, 31. Houses 4. It contains the demesne of Barrogstown, and is touched on the north by the Royal Canal.—This parish lies within the dio. of Kildare; but does not seem to be ecclesiastically recognised.

KILMACREE. See KILMOCREE.

KILMACREHY, a parish on the coast of the barony of Corcomroe, co. Clare, Munster. It consists of a main body and a detached district; and contains the village of LISCANOR, and part of the village of LEHINCH: see these articles. Length and breadth of the main body, $3\frac{1}{2}$ and $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles. Area of the whole, 7,403 acres, 1 perch; of the detached district, 702 acres, 22 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,343; in 1841, 4,264. Houses 673. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,322. Houses 513. An old ruined church, called the church of Mac-Creehy, gives name to the parish, and is traditionally said to have been built by a bishop, a bust of whom remains upon its walls. An alias though obsolete name of the parish is Quoranna, 'the distinct projection,' and alludes to the magnificently grand and imposing cape which terminates the sublime cliffs of the coast. The main body is washed on the west by the Atlantic, and on the south by the bay of LISCANOR or BALLYELLA: which see. The surface is for the most part pastoral, and consists of what is locally called cold stone or grit ground, free from the protrusion of naked rock. The cliffs of Moher on the coast are singularly sublime; they raise two summits to the altitude of respectively 909 and 1,009 feet above sea-level; and on the former, called Hogshead, or Hagg's Head, stands a signal tower. See MOHER.^{*} The seats are Birchfield, Ballyvorda, Ferrypark, Rock-Lodge, Liscanor-house, Castlepark, and Moher. The detached district lies at the head of Liscanor bay, and contains a race-course and part of Lehinch village.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILMANAHEEN [which see], in the dio. of Kilfenora. Vicarial tithe composition, £76 18s. 5½d.; glebe, £4 4s. The rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Kilmanaheen and Killaspuglenane, are compounded for £393 6s. 2d., and appropriated to the archdeaconry of Kilfenora. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killaspuglenane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 24, and the Roman Catholics to 3,571.

KILMACRENAN, a barony of the county of Donegal, Ulster. It is bounded, on the west and north-west, by the Atlantic ocean; on the east, by Lough Swilly; on the south, by Raphoe; and on the south-west, by Boyleagh. Its greatest length, in the direction of west by north, is $24\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth, south-south-westward, is 23 miles; and its area is 310,656 acres. All the west and north-west coast, 24 miles in length as measured in a straight line, and extending from Guidore bay to Fannat Point, will be found noticed in the article on the county of DONEGAL; all the eastern district is identical with the peninsula of FANNAT, and the west shores and screens of Lough SWILLY; and the chief features of the southern and central districts will be found noticed in connection with Loughs VEAGH and SALT, the streams GLEN, CLADY, and LEANAN, and the mountains of ARRIGAL, DERRYVEAGH, and MUCKISH: see these articles. Excepting a comparatively small aggregate of country on Lough Swilly, nearly the whole surface is a region of moor and mountain, sending up the loftiest summits in the county, extensively sublime or savage in its character, and rather slenderly relieved by intersections of practicable glen and vale. The north-western district is greatly dissevered, or rather intricately and deeply indented, by the injection and ramifications of SHEEPHAVEN and MULROY BAY.—This barony contains part of the parish of Conwall, and the whole of the parishes of Aughanuncheon, Aughnish, Clondehorky, Clondevaddock, Gartan, Kilgarvan, Kilmacrenan, Mevagh, Raymunterdoney, Tulloghobegly, and Tullyfern. The towns and chief villages are Letterkenny, Ramelton, Dunfanaghy, Daghbeg, Rathmullen, Creeslough, Ballyrooskey, and Tawny. The annual valuation, under the Poor-law, is £42,293 13s. 5d.; and the sum levied under the grand warrants of Spring and Summer 1841, were £5,384 3s. 1d., and £4,301 4s. 11d. Pop., in 1831, 71,598; in 1841, 72,918. Houses 12,784. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 9,357; in manufactures and trade, 3,282; in other pursuits, 677. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 6,600; who could read but not write, 4,463; who could neither read nor write, 19,982. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,499; who could read but not write, 5,172; who could neither read nor write, 24,683. Kilmacrenan barony lies within the Poor-law unions of Dunfanaghy, Letterkenny, Milford, and Stranorlar. But at the date of the latest report which has reached us, the valuation was not completed.

KILMACRENAN, a parish containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length, 11 miles; breadth, $6\frac{1}{2}$; area, 35,617 acres, 7 perches,—of which 5 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches are tideway in the river Lackagh, and 782 acres, 27 perches are in fresh-water lakes. Pop., in 1831, 9,301; in 1841, 9,343. Houses 1,635. It forms, in a general view, the central district of the barony; and consists, to a main extent, of bog and mountain. The soil of the arable lands is cold and wet, but very improvable. Edenacarnan mountain in the south, and Lough Salt mountain in the north, have altitudes of respectively 642 and 1,541 feet; and the lake whence the latter has its name is 204 feet in depth, and lies at an elevation of 815 feet above sea-level. Lough Keel, 2 miles south-east of Lough Salt, has an elevation of 328 feet. The village of Kilmacrenan stands in the pretty valley of the Leanan, and on the road from Letterkenny to Dunfanaghy, 5 miles north by west of Letterkenny, $13\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-east of Dunfanaghy, and $120\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Dublin. "St. Columb," says Archdall, "founded an abbey here, which was richly endowed. And O'Donnell founded a small house here, probably on the site of the ancient abbey, for friars of the order of St. Francis. The present church is supposed to be part of the Franciscan friary; over the door is a mitred head in relief." A dispensary here is within the Milford Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 35,000 acres, with a pop. of 10,301; and, in 1839-40, it expended £114, and administered to 1,356 patients. Pop. of the village not specially returned. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 243. Houses 44.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £674 15s. 5d.; glebe, £150. Gross income, £824 15s. 5d.; nett, £680 1s. 3d. Patron, Trinity College, Dublin. The church is an old building. Sitzings 150; attendance 100. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 350; the Roman Catholic chapel at Kilmacrenan, by 1,200; and the Roman Catholic chapel at Termon, by 850; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the last is united to the chapel of Gartan. In 1834 the parishioners consisted of 776 Churchmen, 2,015 Presbyterians, and 6,701 Roman Catholics; 5 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 320 children; and 11 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Benefaction, and one with a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 498 boys and 187 girls. In 1840, a National school at Leiter was salaried with £8, and had on its books 25 boys and 32 girls.

KILMACSHALGAN, a parish in the barony of Tyreragh, 5 miles east-south-east of Easkey, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $5\frac{1}{2}$; area, 26,008 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches,—of which 24 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches are in Lough Easkey, and $34\frac{1}{2}$ acres are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 3,330; in 1841, 3,872. Houses 685. About five-sixths of the surface are mountainous; and the remaining sixth consists of aggregately good arable land. The surface descends from Lough Easkey to the coast; and is drained by the rivulets Easkey and Dunniel. The demesnes are Dunmore and Farranmacfarrel; and the hamlets are Dunmore-West, Coolpark, and Charlesfort. See DUNMORE.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Killalla. Vicarial tithe composition, £200; glebe, £13 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £200, and are inappropriate in Colonel Gore of Belleek Castle. The vicarages of Kilmacshalgan and TEMPLEBOY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilmacshalgan. Length, 7 miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 7,117. Gross income, £423 10s.; nett, £382 18s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1820, by means of a loan of £1,200 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitzings 350; attendance 125. The Roman Catholic chapels of Kilmacshalgan and Templeboy have an attendance of respectively 500 and 550. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 341, and the Roman Catholics to 3,137; the Protestants of the union to 679, and the Roman Catholics to 6,759; 4 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £8 from the Irish Society—had on their books 180 boys and 88 girls; and 9 daily schools in the union had 365 boys and 185 girls. In 1840, a National school in Dromore-West was salaried with £4, and had on its books 79 boys and 73 girls.

KILMACTALWAY, a parish in the barony of Newcastle, 5 miles south-west of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,493 acres. Pop., in 1831, 472; in 1841, 537. Houses 86. The land is in general good. Castle-Baggot, within the parish, and near the Grand Canal, is the seat of J. J. Baggot, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and part of the benefice of CLONDALKIN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £184 12s. 4d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 442.

KILMACTEIGUE, or KILMACTIGUE, a parish in the barony of Leney, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south of Tubbercurry, co. Sligo. It contains the village of ACLARE: which see. Length, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $8\frac{1}{2}$; area, 32,533 acres, 20 perches,—of which 170 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches are in Lough Easkey, and 326 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches are in Lough Talt and small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 7,620; in 1841, 9,097. Houses 1,692. A range of mountain, chiefly pastoral, passes quite through the parish, and, jointly with large tracts of wet bog, occupies nearly one-half of its area. A portion of the mountains, which is basaltic, and seems to have been thrown up by some stupendous convulsion, embosoms Lough Talt at its base, soars aloft from the water's edge in romantic and picturesque acclivities and mural ascents, and affords upon its crests, or within the fissures of its cliffs, a place for the eagle's eyry. The highest ground is in the west, and has an altitude of 1,383 feet. Lough Talt lies wholly in the interior, and has an elevation above sea-level of 455 feet; and Lough Easkey lies partly within the north corner, and has an elevation of 607 feet. The bogs are so generally interspersed among the arable lands as everywhere to afford a facile and plentiful supply of fuel. The river Moy passes through the interior, and beautifies the landscape with its banks and current. Granite, limestone, and basalt are so abundant in loose blocks as occasionally to occupy one-half of the surface; and both limestone and slates are quarried. The chief seats are Banada and Clonsugees; and the chief of several villages or hamlets is Banada: which see. The road from Ballina to Tubbercurry and Boyle traverses the interior. The antiquities are an abbey at Banada; an old building at Kilmaectigue, said to have been a Roman Catholic college; an old castle at Beleclare, said to have been built by some one of the once powerful sept of O'Haras; and many rudely formed raths, popularly regarded as Danish forts.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Achonry. Tithe composition, £323 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £60. Gross income, £383 1s. 6½d.; nett, £320 19s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church is an old building. Sittings 100; attendance 30. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 2,000 and 1,500. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 169 Churchmen, 6 Presbyterians, and 7,867 Roman Catholics; a Protestant Sunday school had on its books 14 boys and 16 girls; and 4 daily schools—2 of which were salaried with respectively £10 and £6 from the National Board—had on their books 252 boys and 123 girls. In 1840, the National Board had two schools at Banada, one at Kilmacteigue, and one at Largy.

KILMACTHOMAS, a post and market town, in the parishes of Ballylaneen and Rossmire, barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on the mail-road from Cork to Waterford, 10½ miles north-east of Dungarvan, 12 west-south-west of Waterford, and 87½ south-south-west of Dublin. Its site is the declivity of a steep and dangerous hill, overhanging the rivulet Mahon; but the public road is so constructed as to avoid the inconvenient ascents. In 1649, Cromwell, when marching to Dungarvan from the siege of Waterford, passed an entire day in sending his army across the freshet-swollen waters of the Mahon at Kilmacthomas. But the stream seems not now to be subject to such voluminous increase as it was then, and it is at present spanned by a handsome stone-bridge. An ancient castle which stood at Kilmacthomas, was the property of the Le Poer family, the ancestors of the present most extensive landowners of the circumjacent country. Fairs are held on May 12, Aug. 12, and Dec. 6. A mail-coach from Waterford to Cork, a mail-coach from Waterford to Youghal, and a car from Waterford to Youghal, pass daily through Kilmacthomas. A dispensary here is within the Waterford Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 9,606; and, in 1839-40, it expended £184 8s. 4d. In 1841, the Kilmacthomas Loan Fund had a capital of £2,241, circulated £12,294 in 2,529 loans, realized a nett profit of £214 3s. 1d. Area of the Ballylaneen section, 31 acres; of the Rossmire section, 35 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 982; in 1841, 1,197. Houses 203. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 124; in manufactures and trade, 95; in other pursuits, 32. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 100; on their own manual labour, 137; on means not specified, 8. Pop. of the Rossmire section, in 1831, 634; in 1841, 533. Houses 95.

KILMACTRANEY, a parish in the barony of Tiraghrill, co. Sligo, Connaught. It lies on the east side of Lough Arrow, 6 miles north by east of Boyle, and 11 south-east by south of Colooney. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 13,447 acres, 23 perches,—of which 1,067 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches are in Lough Arrow, and 114 acres, 2 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 4,008; in 1841, 4,604. Houses 789. The most interesting features are noticed under the word ARROW: which see. About one-fourth of the parochial surface is mountainous; and the remainder consists, for the most part, of good land. The highest ground is in the north-east, and has an altitude of 1,346 feet. The Arigna river flows on the eastern boundary; and the Cammogue rivulet in the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £53 1s. 6d.; glebe, £13. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £53 1s. 6d., and belong partly to Viscount Lorton, but chiefly to Mr. William Molloy. The vicarages of Kilmactraney, KILLADOON, and SHANCOE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilmactraney. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, 5½. Pop., in 1831, 6,741. Gross income, £102 1s. 6d.; nett, £83 5s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan.

The church was built in 1816, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 30. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 550 and 350. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 176, and the Roman Catholics to 4,035; the Protestants of the union to 187, and the Roman Catholics to 6,895; and 7 daily schools in the union—5 of which were in the parish—had on their books 283 boys and 132 girls. One of the schools in the parish was in connection with the London Hibernian Societies, and partly aided by the Rev. Mr. Mulloy; and one was in connection with the Elphin Diocesan Society, and partially aided by Lord Dundas. In 1840, two National schools at Geeragh were salaried with jointly £21, and had on their books 43 boys and 29 girls.

KILMACUD, a parish in the half-barony of Rathdown, 4 miles south-east by south of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length and breadth, each half-a-mile; area, 286 acres. Pop., in 1831, 144; in 1841, 192. Houses 24. The hamlet of Kilmacud stands about ¼ of a mile south-east of Dundrum, and is alleged to have acquired its name from being the birth-place of St. Cuthbert, the celebrated early bishop of Lindisfarne. Kilmacud-house is a good and beautifully situated mansion, in a demesne of about 25 acres, and commands an extensive view of the Irish sea and its finely-improved seaboard.—This parish is a chapelry, and part of the benefice of STILLORGAN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The tithes are compounded for £45 10s.; and, though appropriated to the deanery of Christ-church, Dublin, have been all made over to the incumbency of Stillorgan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 106, and the Roman Catholics to 38.

KILMACUMSEY, a parish in the southern border of the barony of Frenchpark, 4 miles north-west of Elphin, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,454 acres, 15 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,396; in 1841, 2,686. Houses 472. Most of the land is good. Tracts of bog occur in the west and north-east. A large turlough lies on the southern boundary. The road from Boyle to Tulsk passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARDCLARE [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £46 3s. 1d.; and the latter are appropriated to the precentorship of Elphin cathedral. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 2,532; and two hedge-schools had on their books 90 boys and 38 girls.

KILMADUM. See KILMODUM.

KILMAGANNY, or KILMOGANNY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Kells, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 3½ miles; area, 7,454 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,107; in 1841, 2,635. Houses 400. About two-thirds of the surface are pasture land; a small proportion, amounting to less than 300 acres, is bog; and the remainder is arable land and meadow. The roads from Kilkenny and Knocktopher to Carrick-on-Suir pass through the interior. The plantations of Rosnara, the cheerful seat of W. M. Reade, Esq., surround the village of Kilmaganny, cover the adjoining heights, and give the parish a large aggregate of wood. The highest ground is in the south, and has an altitude of 705 feet. The ruined castle of Currahill is in the south; and the ruined castle of Clone in the north.—The village stands on the joint road from Thomastown and Kilkenny to Carrick-on-Suir, 7 miles north-northeast of Carrick, 9 south-west of Thomastown, and 69 south-west by south of Dublin. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 514; in 1841, 503. Houses 96. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 31; in manufactures and trade, 48; in other pursuits, 25. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 56; on their own manual labour, 43; on means not specified, 2. Fairs are held on Easter Tuesday and Sept. 4. A fever hospital and a dispensary here are within the Callan Poor-law union, and serve for a pop. of 7,982; and, in 1839, the hospital expended £114 5s., and admitted 131 patients,—and the dispensary expended £123, and administered to 1,000 patients. In 1841, the Kilmaganny Loan Fund had a capital of £291, circulated £1,204 in 360 loans, and realized £7 5s. 7d. of nett profit.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KNOCKTOPHER [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £300. The whole of Kilmaganny parish and part of Tullahaught constitute the perpetual curacy and separate benefice of Kilmaganny. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 5; area, 9,718 acres, 3 roods, 39½ perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,107; glebe, £10. Gross income, £108 2s.; nett, £96 2s. Patron, the incumbent of Knocktopher. The church was built in 1831, by means of a loan of £750 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Dunnemaggin. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 226, and the Roman Catholics to 1,965; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 104 children; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 129 boys and 72 girls.

KILMAHON, a parish in the barony of Imokilly, 4½ miles south-east of Cloyne, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of BALLINACREEN: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 2,849 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,658; in 1841, 1,785. Houses 248. The surface slowly ascends from the margin of the Atlantic, or west side of Ballycotton bay; and consists, for the most part, of excellent land.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £506 18s. 6d.; glebe, £30. Gross income, £536 18s. 6d.; nett, £470 17s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Killeilagh, in the dio. of Kilfenora. The church was built about 40 years ago. Sittings 70; attendance 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilmacdonough and Itermorrough. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 24, and the Roman Catholics to 1,672; and two pay daily schools had on their books 61 boys and 30 girls.

KILMAHUDDRICK, a parish in the vicinity of Clondalkin, barony of Newcastle, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length and breadth, each ½ of a mile; area, 181 acres. Pop., in 1841, 6. House 1.—This parish is a chapelry, and part of the benefice of CLONDALKIN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £16 13s. 4d.

KILMAIN, a barony in the extreme south of the county of Mayo, Connaught. It is bounded, on the west and north-west, by the barony of Carra; on the north and north-east, by the barony of Clanmorris; and on the east, south, and south-west, by the county of Galway. Its greatest length, southward, is 17 miles; its greatest breadth, westward, is 13; and its area is 105,989 acres. Loughs Carra and Mask, with the brief stream which connects them, form the whole of the western boundary; and Lough Corrib, so far as it belongs to Mayo, belongs to Kilmain, and lies on the southern boundary. The chief streams are the Robe, through the interior to Lough Mask, and the Black river on the eastern boundary to Lough Corrib. The surface is for the most part pleasantly, though nowhere very boldly diversified; and is rather undulated than hilly, and extensively subsides into nearly a dead level. A large proportion is profusely sprinkled with blocks of limestone rock; a noticeably large proportion is bog; but the general appearance, for a lowland Connaught district, is decidedly agreeable and occasionally ornamental.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ballinrobe, Cong, Mayo, and Ballincalla, and the whole of the parishes of Kilcommon, Kilmainbeg, Kilmainmore, Kilmolara, Moorgaga, Ro-been, and Shrute. The chief towns and villages are Ballinrobe, Hollymount, Cong, Kilmain, and Shrute. Pop., in 1831, 37,830; in 1841, 42,342. Houses 7,489. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 6,139; in manufactures and trade, 995; in other pursuits, 521. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,653; who could read but not write, 962; who could neither read nor write, 14,473. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,121; who could read but not write, 830; who could neither read nor write, 16,664. Kilmain barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Ballinrobe. The total number of tenements valued is 6,583; and of these, 4,792 were valued under £5,—1,136, under £10.—254, under £15,—140, under £20,—53 under £25,—20 under £30,—42, under 40,—£32, under £50,—and 114, at and above £50.

KILMAIN, a parish on the north border of the barony of Athlone, 3 miles south-south-east of Roscommon, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 8,966 acres, 29 perches,—of which 964 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches are in Lough Ree. Pop., in 1831, 2,678; in 1841, 3,194. Houses 530. The surface consists of good arable and pasture land; it is drained by the rivulet Hine in the north, and washed by Lough Ree on the east; and it is traversed through nearly the centre by the road from Roscommon to Athlone. A chief feature is the demesne of MOATE-PARK: which see. The principal hamlet is Bracknagh.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLENOY [see that article], in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £63 7s. The rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Killenvoy and Rahara, are compounded for £186 7s., and are inappropriate in the Incorporated Society. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 85 Churchmen, 12 Protestant dissenters, and 2,369 Roman Catholics; and 4 hedge-schools had on their books 169 boys and 119 girls.

KILMAIN, co. Wicklow. See KILLAHURLER.

KILMAIN, a benefice, containing the village of Kilmain, in the barony of Kilmain, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies within the dio. of Tuam, and consists of the rectories of KILMAINBEG, KILMAINMORE, and MOORGAGA: see these articles. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 6,037. Gross income, £604 19s. 1½d.; nett, £548 6s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure prebend of Kilmainmore. A curate has a salary of £100 and the use of the glebe-house and land, valued at £30. The church was built about 66 years ago. Sittings 60; attendance, from 32 to 39. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 80, and the Roman Catholics to 6,423; and 6 daily schools had on their books 222 boys and 105 girls.

KILMAIN, or KILMAINMORE, a village in the parish of Kilmainmore, barony of Kilmain, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the road from Ballinrobe to Galway, 5 miles south-east of Ballinrobe, and 5 miles south of Hollymount. It is a poor place; yet contains the parish-church, a large school-house, and a small court-house for petty-sessions. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1841, 421. Houses 74.

KILMAINBEG, a parish in the barony of Kilmain, 1½ mile east by south of the village of Kilmain, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,613 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches,—of which 549 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches, lie detached a mile to the south. Pop., in 1831, 1,343; in 1841, 1,491. Houses 253. The land is in general good. The road from Kilmain to Tuam passes through the interior. The hamlets are Knock-anplawy and Fountain-hill.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMAIN [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £127 15s. 2½d.; glebe, £17 10s. But a portion of the tithes, compounded for £10 0s. 2d., is appropriated to the prebend of Killybegs. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 36 boys and 11 girls.

KILMAINHAM, a western suburb of the city of Dublin, in the parish of St. James, barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It is situated immediately without the limits of the city; and between the river Liffey and the Grand Canal; and is strictly continuous with St. James street, leading out thence the thoroughfare toward Naas, and lying within the sweep of the Circular Road which crosses the Liffey at Sarah Bridge, and wends round toward Dolphin's Barn. Its bulk or importance as a suburb is comparatively trivial; and almost its whole interest rests on its antiquity, its royal hospital, and its jail for the county of Dublin.

Previous to 606, some sort of religious establishment, variously called by monastic writers a priory and an abbey, is said to have been built at Kilmainham by St. Magnend, whose festival was observed on Dec. 18; and from this establishment, the place came to be called, and was long denominated, Kilmaignend. In 1174, on the site of the old pile, Richard Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke, erected a priory of Knights Templars; and on the suppression of the Templars in 1307, Edward II. and the Pope of Rome granted it to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. The priors now excluded the infirm and the sick, who had always been admitted by the Templars; they transmuted the priory into an "hospital" or rather banqueting-house for guests and strangers; and they were henceforth persons of high rank and great influence, all successively sitting as Barons in the House of Lords, and several of them filling the offices of Chancellor and Lord-deputy of Ireland. James Keating, who was prior in 1482, was guilty of such monstrous mal-practices, and in particular gave such overt countenance to the treasonable scheme of raising Lambert Simnell to the throne of England, that a law was passed excluding every person but an Englishman from eligibility to the priorship; and, in 1535, John Rawson, the first Englishman subsequently appointed, surrendered to the Crown the priory and all its possessions, and was made Viscount Clontarf, with a salary of 500 marks. About 1557, the priory was re-established by Cardinal Pole, and placed under the government of Sir Oswald Massingbred; in the second year of Queen Elizabeth, it was finally suppressed; and thence till during the reign of Charles II., its property was gradually disposed of in grants to private individuals, in gratuities to cathedral and parochial churches, and in a largess or endowment toward the erection of the present military hospital.

The Royal Hospital of Kilmainham, similar in character to Chelsea Hospital near London, and adapted for the residence and support of 5 captains, an adjutant, and 200 invalid soldiers, was founded in 1680, and built after a design by Sir Christopher Wren, at the cost of £23,559. The structure is a hollow quadrangle, 306 feet by 288. The north or principal front has a projecting centre, decorated with four Corinthian pilasters and an angular pediment; and in this centre are two large arched windows and a doorway,—the latter adorned with pilasters and a semicircular pediment. Each side of the front, eastward and westward from the centre, is pierced with a series of round-headed windows, nearly as high as the building; and above the centre rises the steeple, consisting of a square tower of two stages and a surmounting spire. The other fronts are comparatively plain. The interior court measures 210 feet square; and is skirted, wholly on three sides and partly on the fourth, by a piazza 13 feet wide, and formed by 59 Doric arches. The dining-hall, in the north side, measures 100 feet by 50; has the lower half of its walls wainscotted with oak and painted white; and is ornamented on the upper part with so rich a series of weapons and portraits as imparts, to a considerable degree, the character of both armoury and gallery. A spacious corridor runs along the south side of the hall from the master's apartments to the chapel, and is supported by brackets of carved oak representing figures as large as life. The chapel measures 80 feet by 40, and has a very imposing appearance; the east window ornamented with stained glass, the communion-table formed of beautifully carved Irish oak, and the ceiling coved, and divided into compartments of exquisitely finished stucco-work. The deputy-master's house, the infirmary, and other requisite structures and offices, occur at convenient distances round the hospital. The old approach was through the most putrid part of the ancient city and western outlets of Dublin; but the present one is a pleasant drive, called the Military Road, along the banks of the Liffey, commencing at an embattled gateway on Usher's Island, and communicating with the Phoenix-park by King George the Fourth's bridge. The hospital was originally maintained by a deduction from the pay of soldiers on service; but is now upheld by an annual grant of £10,000 from parliament.

The County of Dublin Jail at Kilmainham occupies a comparatively elevated situation, and enjoys pure air and a plentiful supply of excellent water. The main building consists of two quadrangles, measures 178 feet by 102, and stands on an area of 283 feet by 190 enclosed by a lofty wall. The guard-room and the door-keeper's office are detached from the main building. The capacities of the prison, in 1841, comprised 69 sleeping cells, 8 small dark day-rooms, 9 good yards, 2 large rooms for hospitals, a small undivided chapel, and 10 rooms for debtors; and they required several alterations, the addition of 40 large single cells for separation, and the institution of a good classification in the chapel, in order to secure the full efficiency or real excellence of the system of prison discipline. In 1841, the average number of prisoners was 116, the maximum number was 168, the total number, including debtors, was 1,338, and the total expense was £2,755 1s. 8d. Kilmainham is the place at which members of parliament for the county of Dublin are elected; and it possesses, in some other respects, the practical character of the county town. Area, 38 acres. Pop., in 1841, 670. Houses 58. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 14; in manufactures and trade, 58; in other pursuits, 18. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 65; on their own manual labour, 21; on means not specified, 1.

KILMAINHAMWOOD, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the northern district of the barony of Lower Kells, and on the northern border of co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,716 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,454; in 1841, 1,412. Houses 251. The land, in some of the farms, is pretty good; and, in others, is cold and wet. The village of Kilmainhamwood stands 3 miles north-west of Nobber, a little to the left of the road from Dublin to Clones. A dispensary here is within the Kells Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 14,319 acres, with a pop. of 4,187; and, in 1839-40, it expended £46 0s. 9½d., and administered to 1,207 patients. A Commandery for Knights Hospitallers was founded at Kilmainhamwood in the 13th century, by the family of Preston, and the ruins of a small old church are still to be seen. Area of the village, 5 acres. Pop., in 1831, 147; in 1841, 137. Houses 21.—Kilmainhamwood parish is in the dio. of Meath, and is tithe-free; but, in consequence of the landlord, A. S. Hussey, Esq. of Westown, paying £46 3s. in lieu of tithes, it is called a vicarage, and constitutes a separate benefice. Gross income, £92 7s.; nett, £71 13s. 10d. Patron, A. S. Hussey, Esq. The church was built in 1803, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 21. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 850; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Moybologue. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 21 Churchmen, 4 Presbyterians, and 1,474 Roman Catholics; and a daily school, held in the chapel, had on its books 78 boys and 37 girls.

KILMAINMORE, a parish in the barony of Kilmain, 5 miles south-east of Ballinrobe, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the villages of KILMAIN, CARROWMORE, and RATHGRANAGHER: see these articles. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 13,792 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches,—of which 106 acres, 28 perches are water, and 1,223 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches lie slightly detached on the north. Pop., in 1831, 4,176; in 1841, 4,877. Houses 887. The surface is slightly undulated, and consists, in an aggregate view, of good land. The highest ground is near the centre, and has an altitude of only 178 feet. On the east border are the mansions of Cloghane, Millford, and Turin-castle; and adjacent to the village of Kilmain is the snug parsonage. The roads from Tuam to Cong, from Hollymount to Shrule, and from Ballinrobe to Galway, traverse the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMAIN [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £399 13s. 10½d.; glebe, £5. It contains the church and the Roman Catholic chapel of the benefice. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 80, and the Roman Catholics to 4,426; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £5 from the rector, about £6 and other advantages from the curate, and £7 from subscription, and one with £20 from the Roman Catholic parish clergyman and other subscribers—had on their books 143 boys and 81 girls.

KILMAKEA, or KILMOKEA, a parish on the western border of the barony of Shelburne, and of co. Wexford, 6 miles south by west of New Ross, Leinster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,420 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,225; in 1841, 1,220. Houses 183. The surface extends along the river Barrow, includes the penin-sulated ground called GREAT ISLAND [which see], and is traversed by the road from New Ross to Ballyhack. In the south-west corner, grouping with several beautiful villas, at the estuarial confluence of the Barrow and the Suir, stands Kilmanick, the seat of Geo. P. Haughton, Esq.; and 5½ miles south-east of New Ross stands Fruit Hill, the seat of Geo. Glascott, Esq. The hamlets are Priesthaggard, Ballyvarney, and Loughtown.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of WHITECHURCH [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £279 4s. 7½d.; glebe, £30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Whitechurch. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 35, and the Roman Catholics to 1,222; a hedge-school was usually attended by from 30 to 40 children; and two daily schools at Horeswood were salaried with respectively £10 and £8 from the National Board, and £10 and £12 from subscription, and had on their books 74 boys and 61 girls.

KILMALEADY, a disrupted bog, commonly called "the moving bog," in the barony of Kilcoursey, 2 miles north of Clara, King's co., Leinster. On June 25, 1821, it burst from its limits; and during several following days, it fitfully and at intervals, careered, travelled, or crept along, till it achieved a distance of about 3 miles, and destroyed an extent of land amounting to about 150 acres. A brief excerpt or two from a report on it to the Royal Dublin Society, written in July 16, 1821, by the skilful engineer, Mr. Griffith, will be acceptable to our readers: "The bog of Kilmaleady is of considerable extent; it may probably contain about 500 acres; in many parts of it, it is 40 feet in depth; and it is considered to be the wettest bog in the country. It is bounded on all sides, except the south, by steep ridges of high land, which are composed, at the top, of limestone gravel, and beneath of cavernous limestone rock, containing subterranean streams; but the southern face of the bog is open to a moory valley, about ¼ of a mile in breadth, which, for nearly a mile in length, takes a southern direction in the lands of Lisanisky, and then turns at right angles to the west, and continues gradually widening for upwards of two miles. * * * The surface of the bog was elevated upwards of 20 feet above the level of the valley, from which it rose at a very steep angle, and its external face, owing to the uncommon dryness of the season, being much firmer than usual, the inhabitants of the vicinity were enabled to sink their turf-holes, and cut turf at the depth of at least 10 feet beneath the surface of the valley, and, in fact, until they reached the blue clay which forms the substratum of the bog. Thus, the faces of many of the turf banks reached the unusual height of 30 feet perpendicular; when, at length, on the 19th of June, the lower, pulpy, and muddy part of the bog, which possessed little cohesion, being unable to resist the great pressure of water from behind, gave way, and being once set in motion, floated the upper part of the bog, and continued to move with astonishing velocity, along the valley to the southward, forcing before it not only the clumps of turf on the edge of the bog, but even patches of the moory meadows, to the depth of several feet, the grass surface of which heaved and turned over almost like the waves of the ocean; so that in a very short space of time, the whole valley, for the breadth of about ¼ of a mile, between the bog edge and the base of the hill of Lisanisky, was covered with bog to the depth of from 8 to 10 feet, and appeared everywhere studded with green patches of moory meadow." The bog was arrested for some time by the hill of Lisanisky; it then moved off at right angles from its original course, and flowed with unabated rapidity till it encountered a bog road 5 or 6 feet high right across the valley; it was here arrested for five days, and then overleaped the road, and swept along as before till arrested by a second and similar road at the distance of about half-a-mile; and, surmounting even this new obstacle, it proceeded onward so menacingly, that only prompt, judicious, and strong measures adopted at the desire of the Lords-justices, by the engineer to the Directors-general of Inland Navigation, appear to have brought it to a halt, and divested it of any power of further locomotion.

KILMALEERY, a parish on the western border of the barony of Lower Bunratty, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Newmarket, co. Clare, Munster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,266 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches,—of which $13\frac{1}{2}$ acres are water, and 55 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches are islands. Pop., in 1831, 667; in 1841, 737. Houses 104. The surface is part of the eastern seaboard of the estuary of the Fergus; and consists in general of good land. Within the limits are the seat of Carrowban, and the ruins of a church and three castles.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILNASOOLAGH [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £52 3s. 4d. The rectory of the parish forms part of the sinecure benefice of Traddery or Tomfinlough. Rectorial tithe composition, £73 16s. 11d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 712; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILMALLOCK, a parish and "liberties," or a barony, containing a town of the same name, in co. Limerick, Munster. It lies between the barony of Coshma and that of Costlea, at the average distance of $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the southern boundary-line of the county. Length and breadth, each 4 miles; area, 4,074 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,833; in 1841, 3,126. Houses 495. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,620; in 1841, 1,718. Houses 258. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 336; in manufactures and trade, 162; in other pursuits, 84. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 648; who could read but not write, 222; who could neither read nor write, 462. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 413; who could read but not write, 219; who could neither read nor write, 785. Kilmallock is properly the name of the liberties; and St. Peter and St. Paul of Kilmallock is properly the name of the parish. The surface is drained westward by two of the earliest head-streams of the Maig; and is pleasantly diversified in outline, and embellished with cultivation. Adjoining the town is Ash-Hill, the seat of Eyre Evans, Esq.; and about a mile to the south-east is Mount-Coote, the seat of Chidley Coote, Esq. The district is marked out on the maps of the Down Survey, and is stated, in the accompanying book, to comprise the site of the town, $9\frac{1}{4}$ acres of Spittal lands, 135 acres of Corporation Commons, and 2,142 acres of forfeited lands.—This parish is an appropriate vicarage in the dio. of Limerick. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £100, and belong to the dean and chapter of Limerick cathedral, who pay a salary of £83 1s. 6d. to a curate. The parishes of Kilmallock, KILBREEDY-MAJOR, BALLINGADDY, ATH-KASSY, ARDPATRICK, BALLINVANNA, and PARTI- CLES [see these articles], seem to be thrown together as an inappropriate or appropriate benefice under the name of Kilmallock, and are under the care of two resident curates. The church is situated in the town of Kilmallock, and will be noticed in next article; attendance 35. The Roman Catholic chapel has 3 officiates, and an attendance of 800. There are also three Roman Catholic chapels in Ardpatrik, and one in Ballingaddy. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 77, and the Roman Catholics to 2,876; the Protestants of the union to 280, and the Roman Catholics to 11,176; 3 daily schools in the parish had on their books 137 boys and 49 girls; and 5 daily schools in the union had 188 boys and 89 girls.

KILMALLOCK.

A market and post town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, and a place of great note, in the Liberties of Kilmallock, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands on the rivulet Cammogue, and at the junction of the Cashel and Limerick roads to Charleville, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Bruff, $4\frac{1}{2}$ north-east by north of Charleville, 16 south of Limerick, and $109\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Dublin.

General Description.—Kilmallock has been styled the Balbec of Ireland; and if understood to be an assemblage of mere ruins, once interesting, wholly Irish, and quite destitute of the peculiar magnificence of oriental architecture, it may, within certain limitations, be allowed to bear the name. Its ground-plan was nearly cruciform, or chiefly exhibited two streets intersecting each other at right angles, the Cammogue rivulet flowing past the end of one of the streets, and two great and picturesque ecclesiastical ruins standing on the banks of the stream. Walls, which anciently surrounded the town, and were pierced with four castellated gateways at the egress of the four great thoroughfares, are still to a considerable extent standing, and display, in addition to some minor towers, two of the fortified gatehouses, strong and heavy, and somewhat resembling specimens of Spanish or Moorish architecture. The ruins within the town, though still many and interesting, are greatly fewer and more dilapidated than at the commencement of the present century; and are so steadily and rapidly dwindling down to extinction, that, in the course of a few years, only the ecclesiastical ruins on the Cammogue are likely to remain as monuments of the former splendour of the place. The town, after sinking into decay, was abandoned for ages as the retreat of poverty and disease, and had lurking within its half-ruined mansions chiefly persons who could nowhere else find a home; and since it has recommenced in a degree to be the seat of a steady and industrious population, its ancient structures have been constantly used as convenient quarries for the building of cabins and the repairing of the roads. "Whenever a hovel is required to be built," says Mr. Croker, "the materials are procured by breaking down part of these once splendid mansions, some of which have been lowered and fitted up in accordance with the neglect and desertion of the place, and the interior of others is occupied by sheds for cattle, or more loathsome pig-sties." Yet a very few of the massive and elaborate residences of the ancient burghers still exist in a state of comparatively good preservation; and fragments or vestiges of others, almost as interesting to an antiquary as entire edifices, are comparatively numerous. The ancient houses of the town were built of hewn stone, and apparently on a uniform plan; they were generally of three stories, ornamented with an embattlement, and with tasteful stone mouldings; and their window-frames, mullions, and large fire-places, were all of boldly and massively carved limestone, so firm in texture, and so resistful to the erosions of the elements, that those of them which remain present nearly as much sharpness and finish as if they were quite fresh from the chisel. "The most remarkable of all the ruins, because the most uncommon," said Mr. Weld, in 1812, "are the remains of a wide street with a range of houses on each side, the walls of which, built of hewn limestone, are as fresh as the day they were finished. The plans of these houses are nearly all the same; they present two or more gable-ends to the street, and are divided into three stories. The entrances, by spacious portals with semicircular arches, open into small halls, which communicate with broad passages, that probably contained the stairs, whence there are doorways leading to the principal apartments. The windows, of a square form, and small in proportion to the size of the rooms, are divided into compartments by one or more uprights, and sometimes by a cross of stone. The chimney-pieces are large and lofty, and the fire-places calculated for containing huge piles of wood. All the ornaments are of a very simple kind."

Ecclesiastical Buildings.—A monastery is alleged to have been founded at Kilmallock, early in the 7th century, by St. Mochelloc. The older of two existing ecclesiastical ruins stands on the town-bank of the Cammogue, and within the town-walls; and claims to have been the church of an abbey dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. It consists of a choir, a nave, a south transept, and a circular belfry; the choir is still roofed, and is used as the parish-church; the nave is subdivided by a range of four pointed arches, which spring from square columns of plain mason-work; the transept and the nave contain several barbarously or grotesquely sculptured monuments to members of the Fitzgerald, Verdon, Blakey, and Haly families; and the circular belfry rises in two unequal stages to some height above the church, and is perforated by several pointed windows, yet has been absurdly mistaken by some Irish topographers for the stump of an old pillar-tower. —The Dominican abbey, situated on the bank of the Cammogue exterior to the town claims to have been founded in 1291, by Gilbert, second son of John of Callan, Lord Ophaly. The church is of greater extent than that of St. Peter and St. Paul, and exhibits a sternness and loneliness of appearance more sublime than picturesque. The architecture, though massive, is graceful; and the form of the pile is cruciform, with a tall steeple rising from the intersection of nave and transept. Many parts challenge admiration, and afford good subjects for the pencil; and the late Sir Richard Hoare pronounced the east window "chaste and elegant," and regarded the entire structure as "surpassing in decoration and good sculpture any he had seen in Ireland." In the centre of the choir is a fragment of the tomb of that branch of the Fitzgeralds or Geraldines who assumed the title of the White Knights. A large portion of the cloister still remains; but it was never elegant or pretending, and its ambulatory was formed only of timber.

Trade.—The only trade or commerce consists in the business of the markets and fairs, and in the retail supply of ordinary articles to the farmers and peasantry of the neighbourhood. A market is held weekly; and fairs are held on Feb. 21, March 25, June 9 and 12, July 6, Nov. 8, and Dec. 4. In 1838, the public conveyances were a coach in transit between Limerick and Charleville, and a mail-coach in transit between Limerick and Cork.

Poor-law Union.—The Kilmallock Poor-law union ranks as the 6th; and was declared on Jan. 9, 1839. It lies all within the county of Limerick, and comprehends an area of 151,179 acres; with a pop., in 1831, of 74,776. The number of ex-officio and elected guardians is respectively 9 and 28. The electoral divisions, together with their respective superficial extent in acres, are Bruree, 12,229; Manisteranenagh, 4,551; Cabircorney, 2,821; Ballinlough, 5,162; Hospital, 6,878; Knockany, 8,552; Uregarle, 5,747; Bruff, 6,978; Dromeen, 9,623; Kilmallock, 3,950; Tankardstown, 9,862; Ballyshonboy, 4,582; Ardpatrik, 16,997; Ballinvana, 7,454; Kiltinane, 6,258; Kildynn, 5,032; Glenroe, 6,867; Ballylanders, 7,725; Glenbrohane, 5,991; Knocklony, 5,288; Galbally, 15,287; and Charleville, 9,408. The total number of persons rated is 11,404; and the total nett annual value of property rated is £178,282 15s. The total number of tenements valued is 11,404; and of these, 6,755 were valued under £5,—282 under £6,—255 under £7,—201 under £8,—173 under £9,—162 under £10,—255 under £12,—251 under £14,—118 under £15,—105 under £16,—154 under £18,—183 under £20,—417 under £25,—292 under £30,—489 under £40,—331 under £50,—and 982 at and above £50. The workhouse was contracted for in Sept. 1839, to be completed in Sept. 1840,—to cost £7,000 for building and completion, and £1,212 7s. 1d. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 7 acres, procured for £525 of purchase-money, and £62 12s. 11d. of compensation to occupying tenant,—and to contain accommodation for 800 persons. Paupers began to be admitted on March 29, 1841; and the total expenditure of the union for the first half-year was £2,046 15s. 11½d.,—and for the second half-year £1,622 2s. 3½d. The medical charities are fever hospitals at Charleville and Kilmannan, and dispensaries at Kilmallock, Ballylanders, Bruff, Bruree, Charleville, Galbally, Kilmannan, and Knockany. The Kilmallock dispensary serves for a pop. of 10,686; and, in 1839-40, it expended £106 5s. 3½d., and administered to 1,440 patients.

Municipal Affairs.—The town of Kilmallock is one of the most ancient in Ireland; and the corporation, if not one by prescription, must have been created by a very early charter. The governing charter, however, is only of the 27th year of Elizabeth. The corporation is styled "The Sovereign and Burgesses of the Town of Kilmallock;" and consists of a sovereign and an unlimited number of burgesses, 12 of whom form the council. The sovereign is a justice of peace within the borough, but only cumulatively with the magistrates of the county. A court of the nature of a court of conscience, with jurisdiction to the amount of 40s., is held once a fortnight before the sovereign or his deputy; and a court of petty-sessions is held by the county magistrates alone, for cases without the borough, and by them and the sovereign for cases within the borough. The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary. The property of the borough was at one time very extensive; but, by a course of the most flagrant jobbing, it was diverted from the public benefit to the exclusive advantage of private individuals. Previous to the Legislative Union, Mr. Richard Oliver Gascoigne acquired "the patronage" of the borough, and nominated its two members of parliament; and at the Union, when the borough suffered disfranchisement, he received the whole £15,000 of compensation. Area of the town, 58 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,213; in 1841, 1,408. Houses 237. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 101; in manufactures and trade, 141; in other pursuits, 70. Fam.

lies dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 141; on their own manual labour, 128; on means not specified, 32.

History.]—Kilmallock has been the scene of many interesting historical events, and, in particular, is intimately associated with the stirring and mighty story of the Fitzgeralds of South Munster, the Earls of Desmond. The town, though very ancient, and early of considerable importance, may be regarded as having been practically refounded by the Fitzgeralds, and was for a long period the chief scene of their power and splendour; and when we recollect that they were nearly a match for the English sovereignty in Ireland, and that their possessions comprised nearly four counties, or an area of 570,000 acres, we must necessarily infer that the seat of their court was a place of at once bustle, influence, and prosperity. When Gerald the 16th Earl of Desmond was liberated from the government's surveillance, and when his ancient and hereditary enemy, the Earl of Ormond, was vested with the military command of Munster, and charged with instructions to crush his powerful opponent, the contest which ensued was conducted "with all the vindictive bitterness of a personal quarrel," and one of its earliest results was the almost total destruction of Kilmallock by order of the Earl of Ormond's brother. In 1641 and 1642, several battles were fought in the vicinity, and the town was reduced to nearly a state of demolition; and from that period downward, Kilmallock has been little else than a mass of ruins.

KILMALODA. See KILMALOODA.

KILMALOG, or KILMALOGUE, a parish on the south border of the barony of Ballaghkeen, 5 miles south-east by south of Enniscorthy, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,093 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,159; in 1841, 1,408. Houses 234. The land is in general good. The rivulet Sow flows on the western boundary. The principal hamlet is Ballymura. The seats are Willmount, Kilmalog, and Ballinkeel,—the last, the seat of John Maher, Esq.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CASTLE-ELLIS [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Vicarial tithe composition, £81 16s. 8d.; glebe, £28 18s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £120 15s. 5d., and are inappropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth. The Roman Catholic chapel at Ballymura has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Crossabeg, in Tickillen. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 17 Churchmen, 5 Protestant dissenters, and 1,160 Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 7 boys and 6 girls.

KILMALOODA, a parish in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Bandon, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of BALLYMACARTHY: which see. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 7,347 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,317; in 1841, 3,281. Houses 543. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,150; in 1841, 3,127. Houses 515. The land is very variable in both outline and value, and aggregately possesses inferiority of character; about one-fourth of it averages 22s. 6d. of yearly value per acre; about one-half averages only 12s. 6d.; and the remaining one-fourth averages less than 10s. The road from Bandon to Clonakilty passes through the west district, and the Arigadeen rivulet waters the south.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ross. Tithe composition, £675; glebe, £16 10s. Gross income, £691 10s.; nett, £579 17s. 10d. Patron, the Rev. Thomas Walker and his heirs. The church was built about 1793.

Sittings 150; attendance 70. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Timoleague. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 150, and the Roman Catholics to 3,212; a Sunday school had on its books 24 boys and 22 girls; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the rector—were usually attended by about 225 children.

KILMALY, a parish in the barony of Islands, 5 miles west-south-west of Ennis, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 23,936 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches,—of which 142 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,296; in 1841, 4,908. Houses 758. About one-half of the surface is moor, mountain, and red bog; and even the best of its land is of indifferent quality. The Clareen rivulet runs eastward along the centre; several small lakes lie in the centre, in the north and in the south; and the road from Ennis to Milltown-Malbay passes through the interior. The two highest grounds are in the south, and have altitudes of 672 and 689 feet; and Lough Naminna lies between them, and has an elevation of 560 feet. The demesne of Lough Burke lies round a lake of its own name in the north; and the residences of Snugville and Fairhill stand in the vale of the Clareen.—This parish is a rectory and a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. The rectory is part of the benefice of DROMCLIFFE: which see. Tithe composition, £129 4s. 7d. The vicarage is a separate benefice. Tithe composition and gross income, £73 16s. 11d.; nett, £65 19s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £30. A private house, capable of accommodating 50 persons, is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 30. Two Roman Catholic chapels, denominated Kilmaly-East and Kilmaly-West, have an attendance of respectively 800 and 250; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Inch. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 35, and the Roman Catholics to 4,578. The Kilmaly dispensary is within the Ennis Poor-law union, and serves for a population of 6,781; and in 1839-40, its receipts and disbursements amounted to respectively £99 and £86.

KILMANAGH, a parish containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Cranagh, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Callan, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 3 miles; area, 5,620 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,710; in 1841, 1,950. Houses 310. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1841, 115. Houses 19. The land, though hilly, is of good quality, and it is drained southward by a head-stream of the King's river. The seats are Graigue, Sheeptown, and Banse.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £323 2s. 6d.; glebe, £320. Gross income, £643 2s. 6d.; nett, £549 12s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Bordwell, in the dio. of Ossory. The church was built about 76 years ago. Sittings 80; attendance 105. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballycullan and Killaloe. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 151, and the Roman Catholics to 1,547; and 3 daily schools—one of which was aided from subscription, and one was salaried with £15 a-year from Mr. Caulfield—had on their books 125 boys and 70 girls.

KILMANAGH, co. Cork. See KILNAMANAGH.

KILMANAGHAN, a parish, partly in the barony of Clonlonan, co. Westmeath, and partly in the barony of Kilcoursey, King's co., Leinster. The Westmeath section contains part of the town of MOATE: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3½. Area of the Westmeath section, 1,633 acres, 30 perches,—of which 24 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches are water. Area of the King's co. section, 6,563 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,414; in 1841, 3,526. Houses 642. Pop. of the King's co. section, in 1831, 1,986; in 1841, 2,076. Houses 373. Pop. of the rural districts of the Westmeath section, in 1831, 1,047; in 1841, 645. Houses 112. The surface extends south-eastward from the town of Moate; is traversed thence by the road to Clara; and, though nearly destitute of scenic beauty, consists to a large amount of excellent flat land. The demesnes are Aghanargat, Greenville, Cloverpark, Wilton, Cloghatanny, Sheehan, Spring-Garden, Kilfoylan, Tubber, Moyally, Hollywood, Ballinaminton, Tully, and Ballyboughlin. The highest ground is on the east boundary, and has an altitude of 206 feet.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARDNURCHER [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial tithe composition is returned in cumulo with that of the other vicarages of the benefice; and the glebe in the incumbent's possession has an annual value of £90 13s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £147 13s. 10½d., and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Downshire. The parish also forms part of the perpetual curacy of CLARA: see that article. The Roman Catholic chapel at Tubber has an attendance of from 700 to 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballagh in Kilcumreagh. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 413 Churchmen, 21 Protestant dissenters, and 3,062 Roman Catholics; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £16 5s. from the Baptist Society, and one partially aided by the Roman Catholic clergyman—had on their books 210 boys and 85 girls.

KILMANAHEEN, a parish in the barony of Corcomroe, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the town of ENNISTYMON, and part of the village of LEHINCH: see these articles. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 8,177 acres, 11 perches,—of which 5 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches are water, and 463 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches form a detached district about ¼ of a mile to the south. Pop., in 1831, 5,579; in 1841, 6,436. Houses 1,065. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,116; in 1841, 4,294. Houses 711. The surface is watered by the Oyna or Ennistymon river, and washed on the west by the head of Liscanor bay. It all consists of what is locally called cold stone or grit ground, nearly free from bare rock; and the greater part of it is a congeries of low hills, naturally pastoral, but, to a large aggregate, artificially arable—and, whether pastoral or arable, offering important facilities to the improver. The two loftiest hills are both on the east border, but 2½ miles asunder; and they have altitudes of 483 and 510 feet. Adjacent to Ennistymon is Ennistymon-house, the seat of A. Finucane, Esq.; and in the vicinity is Woodmount, the seat of Mr. Lysaght. The antiquities are the ruins of a church, the castles of Dough and Ennistymon, and several Danish raths.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Kilfenora. Vicarial tithe composition, £84 1s. 10½d.; glebe, £78. The rectorial tithes, jointly with those of two adjacent parishes, are compounded for £393 6s. 2d.; and are appropriated to the archdeaconry of Kilfenora. The vicarages of Kilmanaheen, KILMACREEHY, and KILLASPUGLE-NANE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilmanaheen. Length, 12 miles, along the coast; breadth, from 1 to 3½. Pop., in 1831, 10,272. Gross income, £285 4s. 4½d., exclusive of £393 6s. 2d. belonging to the incumbent as archdeacon; nett, £245 8s. 6½d., exclusive of £368 11s. 6d. as before. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the vicar-generalship of Kilfenora. The church was built in 1829, by means of a loan of £1,000 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance 40. The Roman Catholic chapel of Ennistymon has an attendance of 4,000. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 38, and the Roman Catholics to 5,841; the Protestants of the union to 65, and the Roman Catholics to 10,870; 5 daily schools in the parish made no returns of their attendance; and 4 other daily schools in the parish had on their books 157 boys and 108 girls.

KILMANAN. See KILMANNAN.

KILMANIVOGUE. See KILMACKEVOGUE.

KILMANLOE, or KILROE, a parish in the barony of Duballow, co. Cork, Munster. It contains part of the town of KANTURK: which see. Area, 919 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,291; in 1841, 1,798. Houses 277. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 300. Houses 51.—This parish is in the dio. of Cloyne, and its tithes are wholly appropriated to the economy fund of Cloyne cathedral. There is neither church nor chapel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 7, and the Roman Catholics to 1,332; and three pay daily schools had on their books 47 boys and 35 girls.

KILMANMAN, a parish in the barony of Tenehinch, Queen's co., Leinster. It contains the village of CLONASLEE: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 5; area, 16,848 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches,—of which 96 acres, 3 roods, 1 perch are in Lough Annagh. Pop., in 1831, 3,186; in 1841, 4,363. Houses 787. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,672; in 1841, 4,004. Houses 691. About one-half of the land is good; and the remainder is variously bog, mountain, and indifferent pasture and tillage-ground. A portion of Monettia bog occupies the north-east corner; Barrados mountain occupies the south corner; and the bogs around Lough Annagh [see that article], occupy the north border. The highest ground is in the south, and has an altitude of 1,054 feet. The demesnes are Brittas, Castlecuffe, and Edgehill.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of OREGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. Vicarial tithe composition, £49 19s. 3½d.; glebe, £160. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £177 8s. 1½d., and are inappropriate in General Dunne of Brittas. The whole of Kilmanman and two townlands of Kerry constitute the perpetual curacy of CLONASLEE; and the remaining statistics of the former are given in the article on that district.

KILMANNAGH. See KILNAMANNAGH.

KILMANNAN, a parish on the north border of the barony of Bargie, 8 miles south-west of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1½; area, 4,251 acres. Pop., in 1831, 794; in 1841, 1,127. Houses 197. A part of the land is of inferior quality; but the remainder is both fertile and well tilled. On the northern margin of the parish stands Sledagh, the seat of Benjamin Wilson, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of MULRANKIN [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £190 0s. 8d.; glebe, £5 15s. 7½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Duncormick. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 27, and the Roman Catholics to 794; and a daily school was salaried with £10 from annual contributions and £10 from the National Board, and had on its books 40 boys and 30 girls.

KILMAOGUE, KILMEAGUE, or KILMAGUE, a parish partly in the barony of East Ophaly, but chiefly in that of Connell, co. Kildare, Leinster. The Connell section contains the villages of Robertstown and Kilmeague: see ROBERTSTOWN. Length and breadth, each 4 miles. Area of the Ophaly section, 346 acres, 32 perches; of the Connell section, 10,535 acres, 34 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,004; in 1841, 3,496. Houses 584. Pop. of the Ophaly section, in 1841, 153. Houses 28. Pop. of the rural districts of the Connell section, in 1841, 2,887. Houses 484. The surface consists of tracts of light land, and large sections of the Bog of Allen; and has aggregately a flat, tame, repulsive appearance. The Grand Canal passes through the interior; and attains on the east border its summit-level of 279 feet above the sea. The seats are Robertstown, Newpark, and Clearview.—The roads from Dublin to Rathangan, and from Clane to Kildare, and the Barrow or Athy branch of the Grand Canal pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £245 14s. 1d.; glebe, £22 5s. The rectories of Kilmaogue and RATHERNON, and the rectory and prebend of LULLIAMORE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilmaogue. Gross income, £444; nett, £392 17s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is of unascertained date of erection. Sittings 200; attendance 200. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 700 to 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to Milltown chapel in Feighcullen. In 1834, the Protestants in the ecclesiastical parish amounted to 364, and the Roman Catholics to 2,874; the Protestants of the union to 493, and the Roman Catholics to 3,894; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 170 children; and 7 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board, and one with £10 from the rector and £10 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 220 boys and 171 girls.

KILMARD. See DONEGAL (TOWN OF).

KILMASHALGAN. See KILMACSHALGAN.

KILMASHOGUE, a small village on the east margin of the barony of Newcastle, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands near the north base of the Three Rocks Mountain, and on a nascent head-stream of the Dodder rivulet, 4 miles south of Dublin Castle.

KILMASTULLA, a parish in the barony of Owney and Arra, immediately north of Birdhill, and 3 miles north by east of Newport-Tip., co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 4,805 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,834; in 1841, 2,046. Houses 315. A considerable proportion of the surface is mountainous ground within the group of the Keeper Mountain; and the remainder consists for the most part of middle-rate land. The highest ground has an altitude of 794 feet. The road from Dublin to Limerick passes through the interior; and is overlooked by the church and hamlet of Kilmastulla. The other hamlets are Ryanstown, Bushfield, and Derdaol; and the seats are Bushfield and Craneagh.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £318 9s. 2½d. The rectories of Kilmastulla and TEMPLE-KELLY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilmastulla. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 7,558. Gross income, £731 12s. 3½d.; nett, £654 7s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built about the year 1791, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 23 to 25. A private house is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of about 40. The Kilmastulla and Temple-Kelly Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively about 1,600, and about 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 98, and the Roman Catholics to 2,884; the Protestants of the union to 224, and the Roman Catholics to 7,730; a Roman Catholic Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 280 children; 3 pay daily schools in the parish had an average attendance of about 173 children; and there were 6 daily schools and a Roman Catholic Sunday school in Temple-Kelly.

KILMEADEN, a parish, partly in the barony of Upperthird, but chiefly in that of Middlethird, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Upperthird section, 2,308 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches; of the Middlethird section, 6,934½ acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 2,620; of the Middlethird section, 2,234. Houses in the whole, 411; in the Middlethird section, 356. The Census states the pop. of 1831 at 2,135; the Ecclesiastical Authorities state it at 2,621; and the former places the whole parish in Middlethird. The surface is part of the south side of the valley of the Suir; and the land, though aggregately good, presents so wide a variety as to range in annual value between 5s. and 40s. per plantation acre. Two of the highest grounds have altitudes of respectively 354 and 493 feet. The principal seats are Whitefield, Ballyduff, Mount-Congreve, Wood-Villa, Colfin, and Whitfield. The village of Kilmeaden stands on the road from Waterford to Carrick-on-Suir, 3 miles east-south-east of Portlaw, and 5 west of Waterford. Pop., in 1831, 194; in 1841, not specially returned. The village and its neighbourhood were formerly places of some consequence; but a great baronial castle and various ancient private residences which adorned them, have long since gone to decay. Kilmeaden castle occupied an elevated and commanding site on the banks of the Suir, and was the residence of one of the branches of the noble family of Le Poer, or Le Power,—whose other branches had their chief residences at Curraghmore and Don Isle, and who were descendants of Robert Le Poer, marshal of King Henry II. Cromwell, when sweeping the south of Ireland, demolished Kilmeaden castle, hanged its proprietor on an adjacent tree, and parcelled out its lands among some illiterate individuals in his military train. The property extended from Kilmeaden to Tramore; it was soon sold by its ignorant grantees to a gentleman of the name of Ottrington; and it was partly colonized by the new proprietor with families from Ulster, whose descendants now figure as respectable gentry of the county. Elizabeth, Viscountess Doneraile, grand-daughter of Mr. Ottrington, erected to his memory a still extant tomb in the churchyard of Kilmeaden; and from her the extensive property purchased by her grandfather has descended to the Earl of Doneraile. At Phair Brook, on the lands of Cullenagh, is an extensive paper manufactory, which 20 years ago employed about 140 men, women, and children; and on the same stream that works it—a stream which falls into the Suir at a little distance from Pouldrew—are a bolting-mill, a corn-mill, and corn-stores, nearly on the site of a quondam extensive iron-manufactory.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Waterford. Vicarial tithe composition, £170; glebe, £21. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £226 4s. 3d., and are appropriated to the members of Waterford chapter. The vicarages of Kilmeaden and RIESK [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilmeaden. Pop., in 1831, 3,592. Gross income, £274 5s. 6d.; nett, £251 18s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice and prebend of Seskenan, in the dio. of Lismore. The church is an old building. Sittings 100; attendance, from 15 to 45. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and union amounted to 121; the Roman Catholics of the parish to 2,532; and the Roman Catholics of the union to 3,300; 4 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £5 from Lord Doneraile, £4 from three clergymen, and £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and one with £12 from subscription, and some advantages from other sources—had on their books 218 boys and 121 girls; and there was a daily school also in Riesk. In 1840, two National schools at Ballyduff were salaried with respectively £12 and £8, and had on their books 130 boys and 102 girls.

KILMEAN. See KILMAEN, co. Roscommon.

KILMEEDY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Upper Connello, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 9,037 acres. Pop., in 1841, 4,739. Houses 749. The surface has a diversified outline; and is drained by the Deel and the Skeagh. The village of Kilmeedy stands 5 miles east-south-east of Newcastle, on the road from Drumcolloher to Rathkeale. Area, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 222. Houses 42.—This parish is ecclesiastically treated as merely a denomination or subdivision of CASTLETOWN: which see. The Kilmeedy Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,100 to 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Castletown. The Feenagh and Kilmeedy dispensary is within the Newcastle Poor-law union, and serves for a population of 11,012; and, in 1839–40, it expended £165 11s. 4d., and administered to 1,570 patients.

KILMEEN, a parish 3 miles west-south-west of Newmarket, and partly in the barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, but chiefly in the barony of Duhallow, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of BOHERBOY: which see. Length, 16 miles; breadth, 8; area, 36,710 acres. Pop., in 1831, 8,322; in 1841, 10,380. Houses 1,627. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 10,045. Houses 1,565. A district of ten townlands, formerly known as one of the East Fractions of Magonihy, was transferred from co. Kerry by the Act 6 and 7 William IV. Pop., in 1831, 1,045; in 1841, 1,355. The parochial surface includes large tracts of deep bog, and a section of both ranges of the mountains which screen the infant Blackwater on the boundary between Cork and Kerry. Some interesting georgic improvements, partially within the parish, will be noticed under the word POBBLE-O'KEEFE: which see.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DRUMTARIFFE [which see], in the dio. of Ardfer and Aghadoe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £370, and the rectorial for £300; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore. Three Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of from 1,400 to 1,700. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 8,652; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 90 boys and 37 girls.

KILMEEN, a bog in the barony of Duhallow, co. Cork, Munster. It drains, partly to the Brogeen rivulet, and partly to the Blackwater river, by the Dromagh stream. Area, 1,204½ acres; average depth, from 15 to 20 feet; altitude above sea-level, 450 feet; estimated cost of reclamation, £600 16s. It is in general a very wet red bog.

KILMEEN, a parish 3½ miles north-north-west of Clonakilty, and partly in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, but chiefly in the western division of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Carbery section, 7,305 acres; of the Ibane and Barryroe section, 1,362. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,980; in 1841, 3,736. Houses 614. Pop. of the Carbery section, in 1831, 3,517; in 1841, 3,090. Houses 512. The surface is very hilly, but excellent roads intersect it. The land is in general so good as to produce wheat; it lets, on the average, at from 15s. to 21s. per acre. The nascent Arigadeen river effects the drainage eastward. Fairs are held at Ballygurteen on June 24, July 25, and Dec. 26.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ross. Tithe composition, £750; glebe, £31 5s. Gross income, £781 5s.; nett, £646 5s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £70. The church was built in 1810, by means of £424 12s. 3½d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £341 10s. 9½d. raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 200; attendance 130. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilkerranmore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 254, and the Roman Catholics to 3,853.—In this parish are the remains of the old castle of Ballyward, which is popularly ascribed to the same person who built the castle of BALLINACARRIG: which see. They consist of a strong tower, with a spiral staircase. In this parish there are several very curious raths.

KILMEEN, a parish, partly in the barony of Loughrea, but chiefly in that of Leitrim, 3½ miles west by north of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Loughrea section, 136 acres; of the Leitrim section, 3,672 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 852; in 1841, 980. Houses 166. The Loughrea section is a single townland, and was transferred from Leitrim by the Act 6 and 7 William IV. Pop., in 1841, 34. Houses 7. The surface, though not lying high, is nearly the summit-level of all the county east of Lough Corrib. The highest ground is on the western boundary, and has an altitude above sea-level of only 447 feet. The road from Loughrea to Banagher passes through the interior; and the demesne of Ballydugan is situated on the northern border.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £75. The rectory of Kilmeen and the greater part of the rectory of Oranmore constitute the benefice of Kilmeen. Gross income, £155 5s. 3d.; nett, £142 16s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is also a minor canon and a vicar choral of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 400 to 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Leitrim and Kilcooley. In 1834, the parishioners, with two exceptions, were all Roman Catholics; and a daily school, held in the chapel, had on its books 72 boys and 22 girls.

KILMEENA. See KILMINA.

KILMEGAN, a parish in the baronies of Lecale, Kinelearty, and Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. The Iveagh section contains the town of CASTLEWELLAN; and the Lecale section contains the village of DUNDRUM: see these articles. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, 4½. Area of the Lecale section, 5,983 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches,—of which 2½ acres are water; of the Kinelearty section, 1,792 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches; of the Upper Iveagh section, 6,195 acres, 26 perches,—of which 107 acres, 13 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 6,921; in 1841, 7,467. Houses 1,335. Pop. of the Lecale section, in 1831, 3,100; in 1841, 3,514. Houses 621. Pop. of the Kinelearty section, in 1831, 732; in 1841, 783. Houses 134. Pop. of the rural districts of the Upper Iveagh section, in 1831, 2,360; in 1841, 2,364. Houses 434. The surface lies along the west side of Dundrum bay, and ascends thence north-north-westward away to the summit-line of the Slievicroob group of mountains. See DUNDRUM and DOWN (COUNTY OF). The highest ground, Slieve-Croob proper, is situated on the northern boundary, and has an altitude of 1,755 feet. A large aggregate amount of the area is upland; and no small proportion, especially in the west, around Castlewellan, is highly picturesque. The Earl of Annesley's beautiful seat of Castlewellan, situated at the base of Slieve-na-slatt, overlooking a pretty little natural lake, and surrounded by ornate and well-improved grounds, greatly embellishes the immediate vicinity of Castlewellan; and on the side of the town opposite Lord Annesley's demesne, are the villas of Annsborough, Woodlawn, and Woodlodge, 2 miles to the north is Ballywillwill, the seat of the Rev. G. H. MacDowell Johnston, and 3½ miles to the north-east, on the road to Downpatrick, is Mount-Panther, the residence of J. Reed Allen, Esq.—This parish is a chapelry or rectory, and part of the benefice of KILKEEL [which see], in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £500. A curate for the parish has a salary of £75. The church is of unknown date. Sittings 350; attendance, from 150 to 250. The Presbyterian and the Wesleyan meeting-houses have an attendance of respectively 180 and from 50 to 100. The Roman Catholic chapels of Kilmegan, Clonbaraghan, and Castlewellan, have an attendance of respectively 650, 700, and 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,629 Churchmen, 1,281 Presbyterians, and 4,162 Roman Catholics; and 9 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £2 10s. from the London Hibernian Society, one with £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and two with respectively £6 and £8 from the National Board—had on their books 377 boys and 376 girls. In 1840, there were two National schools at Mount-Panther, two at Annsborough, one at Castlewellan, and one at Aglishnafin.

KILMELCHEDOR, or KILMALKEDER, a parish in the barony of Corkaguiney, 2¼ miles north-north-west of Dingle, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 5,900 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,288; in 1841, 2,333. Houses 403. The surface includes part of the seaboard of Smerwick Harbour, and part of the mountain-range which forms the backbone of the barony; and it, in consequence, possesses great variety of both outline and georgic character. Some curious and interesting antiquities occur at GALLERUS: which see. The melancholy village of Kilmelchedor consists of a few wretched cabins; yet possesses some monuments which most antiquaries will pronounce of great value. One of these is dignified with the name of the mansion of St. Brandon; and, though obviously of a far later age than that which hagiography ascribes to the saint, is a two-story building of considerable antiquity, and is divided in the interior into two sections or apartments, which communicate with each other by a semicircularly arched but half-dilapidated door. Another monument, the old and ruinous church of Kilmelchedor, is a building in the English style of the 12th century; and, like some of the English churches of that period, it has a massive partition-wall between the nave and the chancel, pierced by a small arch of sufficient capacity for the simultaneous ingress or egress of not more than two persons. The other monuments are numerous remains of old grave-stones in the cemetery, very curious in character, quaintly carved and rudely shaped, evidently belonging to a wide diversity of periods, and exhibiting here the comparatively modern head-stone, and there the old pillar-stone with the indecipherable Ogham inscription.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £70, and the rectorial for £13; and the latter are inappropriate in Lord Ventry. The vicarage of Kilmelchedor, the rectory of FENIT [see that article], and part of the sinecure rectory of Ardfert constitute the benefice of Kilmelchedor, and corps of the chancellorship of Ardfert cathedral. Gross income, £225 15s. 4d.; nett, £173 6s. 11½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £24. A police station is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700. In 1834, the Protestants of Kilmelchedor and Fenit amounted to 59, and the Roman Catholics to 2,387; and a pay daily school, under the superintendence of the Roman Catholic clergyman, had on its books 80 boys and 40 girls.

KILMENAN, a parish on the west border of the barony of Fassadining, 2¼ miles north of Ballyragget, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, ¼; area, 1,008 acres. Pop., in 1831, 316; in 1841, 319. Houses 44. A small affluent of the Barrow forms the western boundary-line, and separates the parish from Queen's county; and the land is, in a general view, of second-rate quality.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ATTANAGH [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £60. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

KILMESSAN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, 5 miles east of Trim, barony of Lower Deece, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 2¼ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,337 acres. Pop., in 1831, 812; in 1841, 773. Houses 135. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1831, 146; in 1841, 138. Houses 25. The land is of medium quality, and forms part of the right side of the basin of the Boyne. The road from Trim to Skreen passes through the interior; and adjacent to it is the old demesne of Swanstown.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £175; glebe, £44 11s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £50, and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Drogheda. The vicarage of Kilmessan and the chapelry of MACETOWN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilmessan. The parishes lie about 4 miles asunder. Pop., in 1831, 1,231. Gross income, £229 11s.; nett, £209 1s. 6d. Patron, the Marquis of Drogheda. The church is an old building. Sittings 150; attendance, about 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Dunsany. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 49, and the Roman Catholics to 796; the Protestants of the union to 66, and the Roman Catholics to 1,211; and a daily school in the parish was salaried with £5 from collections at the chapel, and had on its books 98 boys and 49 girls.

KILMICHAEL—vulgarly KILMIHILL—a parish, containing a hamlet of the same name, in the barony of Clonderalaw, 8½ miles west-north-west of Kildysert, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 18,772 acres, 3 roods, 2 perches,—of which 142 acres, 2 roods, 15 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,794; in 1841, 5,080. Houses 860. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1831, 79; in 1841, 118. Houses 23. Fairs are held on May 19, July 8, and Sept. 28. The parochial surface consists of arable and pasture land, intermixed with bog and mountain; and is washed and drained by the Creegh and Doonbeg rivers. The highest ground is in the north, and has an altitude of 554 feet; and the highest level of the Creegh rivulet, within the north border, is 493 feet.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILFARBOY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £80 4s. 1d., and the rectorial for £118 3s. 1d., and the latter are inappropriate in Lord Castlecoote and Bindon Scott, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to one or two chapels within the benefice of Kilmurry-Clonderalaw. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 4,068; and two hedge-schools had on their books 82 boys and 41 girls. The Kilmichael and Cooreclare dispensary is within the Kilrush Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 7,635; and, in 1839-40, it expended £95 12s. 10d., and made 2,400 dispensations of medicine.

KILMICHAEL, a parish 5½ miles south-south-west of Macroom, and partly in the western division of the barony of East Carbery, but chiefly in the barony of West Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. Length and breadth, each 6 miles. Area of the Carbery section, 4,413 acres; of the Muskerry section, 16,456 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 6,166; in 1841, 6,250. Houses 1,002. Pop. of the Muskerry section, in 1831, 5,130; in 1841, 5,184. Houses 839. The surface comprises a section of the valley and hill-screens of the Lee, a little below Inchegeelagh; and consists partly of arable and pasture land, and partly of bog and mountain. The roads from Cork to Castletown-Berehaven, and from Macroom to Dunmanway, pass through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part-rectory, in the dio. of Cork. Vicarial and part-rectorial tithe composition, £692 6s. 2d.; glebe, £8 15s. The rectorial tithes of 13,500 acres, compounded for £273 5s. 8d., are inappropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. The vicarage and part-rectory of Kilmichael, and the rectory of MACLONEIGH [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilmichael. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 7,686. Gross income, £1,011 1s. 2d.; nett, £884 15s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was quite recently built, by means of a contribution of £450 1s. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Sittings 80; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapels of Cooldurrihy, Johnstown, and Macloneigh, have an attendance of respectively 2,000, 1,100, and 1,300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 70, and the Roman Catholics to 6,316; the Protestants of the union to 107, and the Roman Catholics to 7,872; 5 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £12 from the rector—were usually attended in summer by about 256 children; and there were also 3 daily schools in Macloneigh. In 1840, a National school at Dromleigh had on its books 121 boys and 67 girls.

KILMICHAEL, a village in the parish of Kilnamanagh, barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 140. Houses 24.

KILMICHAEL, a headland in the barony of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. It is situated within a mile of the north-coast-extremity of the county, 4½ miles south of the mouth of the Ovoca, and 7 north of Cahore Point. A fishing-bank, 4 miles in length, and called Kilmichael Bank, extends parallel to the coast at a brief distance from the shore, and lies in nearly equal proportions north and south of Kilmichael Point. Kilmichael is a coast-guard station; and, in 1836, it had employed in the fisheries 3 row-boats, 20 open sail-boats, and 138 fishermen.

KILMICHAELLOGUE. See GOREY.

KILMICKLIN, or KILMUCKLIN, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 3½ miles north of Tipperary, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 588 acres. Pop., in 1831, 165; in 1841, 161. Houses 22. The road from Tipperary to Cappaghwhite passes through the interior. Dr. Beaufort places this parish, under the alias name of Kilmilcon, 1½ mile south by west of Newport-Tipperary, in the barony of Owny and Arra, and in the dio. of Emly; and he is followed, in his mistake, by both Carlisle and Gorton.—Kilmicklin is a rectory in the dio. of Cashel, wholly appropriated to the bishop's mensal. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

KILMINA, a parish in the barony of Burrishoole, 2½ miles north by west of Westport, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the village of KNOCKASTYVEEN: which see. It comprises a large proportion of Clew bay and its islands, and is cut, in its mainland division, into a series of peninsulæ and indented sections, so that its breadth and length cannot easily be stated. Area, 10,762 acres, 3 perches,—of which 147 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 9,000; in 1841, 7,876. Houses 1,371. The Clew bay division is sufficiently noticed under the word CLEW: which see. The mainland division extends along the head of Clew bay, from within 1 mile of Westport to the immediate vicinity of Newport-Pratt; and, in spite of containing a considerable aggregate of bog, is so richly diversified in surface, and so profusely interlaced with belts and shreds of marine water, as to be very decidedly beautiful. The average quality of the land is only middle-rate. The road from Westport to Newport passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £309 12s. 4d.; glebe, £14. Gross income, £323 12s. 4d.; nett, £290 7s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. A portion of the tithes, compounded for £40 7s. 8d., is appropriated to the prebends of Faldown and Killybegs. In 1834, a church was in progress of erection, and two schoolhouses, situated in different parts of the parish, were used as the parochial places of worship, and had each an attendance of 35. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,500 to 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Faly in Kilmacllasser. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 276, and the Roman Catholics to 9,394; and 13 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £15 from the rector, and one with £10 from the Tuam Diocesan Society—had on their books 234 boys and 101 girls, and were usually attended by about 900 other children.

KILMINE. See KILMEAN.

KILMOCAHILL, or KILMACAHILL, a parish in the barony of Gowran, 2½ miles north of the town of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains part of the village of WHITEHALL: which see. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 4,593 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,391; in 1841, 1,552. Houses 252. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,240; in 1841, 1,373. Houses 213. A hilly district, called Knockadreen, was, an age or two ago, overrun with heath and furze, but is now arable land; and in the descent thence to the plain, the soil gradually improves till it becomes a rich loam. The Akore stream, a small affluent of the Barrow, runs eastward through the interior, and drives one or two mills. The chief residences are Paulstown-castle, Fairview, and Montrothe; and the first of these is an old square building, with some modern additions. Two flag quarries occur in the west; and coal has been an object of search. The road from Dublin to Cork passes through the interior; and the Barrow navigation is within an easy distance.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Vicarial tithe composition, £170; glebe, £10. Gross income, £180; nett, £147 13s. 4½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £200, and are inappropriate in the hospital of Waterford, and in Henry Flood, Esq. of Paulstown-castle. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 40. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 78, and the Roman Catholics to 1,291; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 96 boys and 44 girls.

KILMOCAR, a parish in the barony of Fassadinig, 3½ miles south-west of Castle-Comer, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 4,815 acres, 2 roods, 21 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,413; in 1841, 1,997. Houses 316. One-fourth of the surface is profitable mountain; one-eighth is unprofitable mountain; and the remainder is variously meadow, tillage, and pasture land. The highest ground has an altitude of 689 feet. The Cloghnagh, a small affluent of the Dinane rivulet, effects the drainage southward. The only seat is Bleachfield; and the chief hamlet is Barrack-Village.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £86; nett, £75 17s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Rathgaran in the same dio. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £170, and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Ormonde. There is no church or glebe-house; and the curate of the adjoining benefice performs the occasional duties for a salary of £5. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and 2 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 93 children.

KILMOCOMOGUE. See KILMACOMOGUE.

KILMOCREE, a parish in the barony of Forth, 4½ miles south of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, ¾ of a mile; area, 1,112 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 203; in 1841, 218. Houses 36. The road from Wexford to Killinick passes through the interior. The seats are Grange, Orristown, and Ballyfinogue.—This parish is an inappropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of KILLINICK [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes belonging to the incumbent are compounded for £42 0s. 4d., and the rectorial for £17 17s. 9½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth and Mr. Colclough. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 197; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILMOCRISH. See KILMUCKRIDGE.

KILMODUM, a parish in the baronies of Fassadinig and Gowran, 4½ miles south of Castle-Comer, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1. Area of the Fassadinig section, 904 acres; of the Gowran section, 2,521 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 1,119; of the Gowran section, 921. Houses in the whole, 172; in the Gowran section, 140. The pop. of the whole, in 1831, is stated by the Census at 1,207; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 900. The surface consists for the most part of good upland; so that, though mountainous, it has a tolerably fair average acreable value. The Douglas rivulet, and afterwards the Dinane, effect the drainage.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DUNMORE [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £70, and the rectorial for £140; and the latter are inappropriate in the Corporation of Kilkenny. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to Lisnafunchin chapel in Mothell, and Muckalee, Coom, and Smithstown chapels in Dysart. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 916.

KILMODUMOGUE, a parish in the south-east corner of the barony of Fassadinig, 5½ miles south by west of Castle-Comer, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,726 acres. Pop., in 1841, 551. Houses 95. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 985; and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 619. The land is for the most part good, and averages in value 30s. per acre per annum. The river Dinane effects the drainage southward; and the road from Castle-Comer to Kilkenny passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of MOTHELL [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £157 14s. In 1834, the inhabitants of the ecclesiastical parish were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school was usually attended by about 30 children.

KILMOE, a parish at the southern extremity of the western division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of CROOKHAVEN: which see. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3; area, 13,974 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,889; in 1841, 7,234. Houses 1,255. Pop., exclusive of Crookhaven, in 1831, 6,469; in 1841, 6,839. Houses 1,173. The surface, exclusive of some unimportant islands, consists of a coarse, mountainous, and comparatively barren peninsula, extending south-westward, from the base of Mount Gabriel, and lying between Crookhaven Harbour and Dunmanus bay. Remarkable headlands on the coast are Three-castle Point, Mizen Head, and Brow Head; and remarkable harbours are Barley and Spanish coves, and the bays of Dunmanus, Crookhaven, and Ballydelvin.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £500; glebe, £8 8s. Gross income, £508 8s.; nett, £477 7s. 7d. Patron, alternately the Crown and the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kilcornan, in the dio. of Limerick. A curate has a salary of £100. The former church was built upwards of a century ago, at the private expense of Bishop Browne; and had 300 sittings. The present church was quite recently built, by means of contributions of £582 4s. 5d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £150 from private sources. Sittings 300; attendance 100. Three schoolhouses are used as week-day and Sabbath-evening parochial places of worship, and have each an attendance of 80. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Skull. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 639, and the Roman Catholics to 6,378; three Protestant Sunday schools had on their books 103 boys and 136 girls; and 10 daily schools—one of which was supported by the Roman Catholic clergyman, and three salaried with various sums from subscription—were usually attended by about 502 children.

KILMOILY, KILMAILY, or KILMOYLY, a parish on the west border of the barony of Clannaurice. 3 miles north by west of Ardfert, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the villages of LERRIGS [which see], and Kilmoily. Area, 7,750 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,525; in 1841, 4,459. Houses 661. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,611; in 1841, 4,203. Houses 618. Area of the village of Kilmoily, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 191; in 1841, 140. Houses 21. The surface is the low seaboard of the central part of Ballyheigue bay. See BALLYHEIGUE.—This parish is a rectory, and a vicarage, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. The rectory is impropriate. Tithe composition, £300. The vicarage is appropriate. Tithe composition, £150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 68, and the Roman Catholics to 3,702; and 3 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 135 children.

KILMOKEA. See KILMAKEA.

KILMOLARA, a parish in the barony of Kilmolin, 2½ miles south of Ballinrobe, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the village of NEALE: which see. Length, south-south-westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 3,961 acres, 23 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,350; in 1841, 1,296. Houses 240. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,100. Houses 206. The surface is part of the east side of the basin of Lough Mask; it has agreeable variations of outline, yet on the whole is low; and, though containing some rocky ground, consists for the most part of good land. The road from Ballinrobe to Cong passes across the west wing, and is overlooked by the village and the noble demesne of the Neale.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £200. The rectories of Kilmolara, BALLINCALLA, and ROSS [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilmolara. Length, 19 miles; breadth, 9. Pop., in 1831, 8,742. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church, though closely adjoining the Neale, is situated outside the boundary of Kilmolara, and was built about 56 years ago, at the private expense of Lord Kilmain. Sitzings 200; attendance 40. A private house is used as a parochial place of worship in Ross. The Kilmolara Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and there are Roman Catholic chapels or places of meeting, also at Fairhill, Finny, and Maam. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 64, and the Roman Catholics to 1,390; the Protestants of the union to 102, and the Roman Catholics to 9,295; two daily schools in the parish—one of which was supported wholly by subscription—had on their books 118 boys and 62 girls; and there were three schools in the other members of the union.

KILMOLASH, a parish in the two baronies of Decies, 3½ miles south-south-east of Cappoquin, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½. Area of the Decies-within-Drum section, 1,769 acres; of the Decies-without-Drum section, 1,920 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,397; in 1841, 1,491. Houses 228. Pop. of the Decies-without-Drum section, in 1831, 755; in 1841, 786. Houses 119. The surface is boldly variegated with hill and dale; consists in the aggregate of middle-rate land; and is watered partly by the Brickly, but chiefly by the Phineas. The road from Waterford to Cork passes through the interior. Woodstock, the seat of Thomas Walsh, Esq., stands on high ground a little north of that road; and Ballinapark, the seat of Thomas Fitzgerald, Esq., stands near the village of Aglish. The ruins of King John's castle of Clough are also in the vicinity of that village: see CLOUGH.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £77 10s. 4½d.; nett, £70 19s. 11½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £154 19s. 7½d.; and are appropriated to the archdeaconry of Lismore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 1,439; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILMOLERAN, a parish on the north border of the barony of Upperthird, and of the county of Waterford, Munster. It contains Carrick-on-Suir suburb of CARRICKBEG: which see. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,937 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,896; in 1841, 3,113. Houses 540. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 192; in 1841, 433. Houses 61. The surface is a rich and ornate section of one of the most beautiful stretches of the golden valley of the Suir; but, in common with artificial objects of interest, it has already been sufficiently noticed in the article on Carrickbeg.—This parish is a rectory, and a vicarage, in the dio. of Lismore. The rectory is part of the sinecure benefice of Dysert and Kilmoleran. Tithe composition, £128 3s. 5d.; glebe, £8. The vicarage is part of the benefice of DYSERT: which see. Vicarial tithe composition, £64 1s. 9d.; glebe, £5 5s. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel has an attendance of from 3,000 to 4,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Dysert and Kilsheehan. The friary chapel is served by two friars; and has an attendance of about 1,500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 18, and the Roman Catholics to 2,991; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 170 boys and 100 girls.

KILMONOGHAN. See KILMANAGHAN.

KILMONEY, a parish in the barony of Kerrycurry, 3½ miles west of Carrigaline, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 1,431 acres. Pop., in 1831, 711; in 1841, 771. Houses 130. The surface is part of the basin of the Annabuoy river; and consists in general of tolerably good tillage land.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of Tracton, in the dio. of Cork: see TRACTON. The tithes are compounded for £100, and are impropriate in the Earl of Shannon. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to a chapel in St. Bridget's. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 720. and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and £3 from subscription—were usually attended in summer by about 80 children.

KILMONOGUE, a parish at the southern extremity of the barony of Kinnalea, 1½ mile east of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of BALGOLY: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 3,061 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,217; in 1841, 1,178. Houses 193. The surface extends northward from Oyster Harbour, lies conveniently for both sea-manure and lime, consists of light yet fertile land, and is principally disposed in pasturage.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Peter's of Cork, in the dio. of Cork. See COAK (County of the City of). Tithe composition, £147 13s. 10d. Kilmonogue also forms part of the perpetual curacy of NOHOVAL: which see. A school-house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 12. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 116, and the Roman Catholics to 1,141, and three pay daily schools were usually attended in summer by about 83 children.

KILMOOD. See KILMUD.

KILMOON, a parish in the barony of Burren, 4 miles north-north-west of Kilsfennora, co. Clav.

Munster. Length, south by westward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,461 acres, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,088; in 1841, 1,239. Houses 197. The surface of the northern district chiefly consists of a prominent part of the Slieve-Elva group of mountains; and that of the southern district consists of the broken and tumulated limestone land which prevails throughout the barony.—One summit on the western border has an elevation of 1,109 feet above sea-level; and two adjacent to it, and on the western boundary, have altitudes of respectively 1,004 and 1,134 feet. The seats are Roaskey-lodge and Rathbaun-house. There is a spa in the south.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILLEILAGH [which see], in the dio. of Kilfenora. Tithe composition, £73 16s 11d. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILMOON, a parish, formerly in the barony of Upper Duleek, but now in that of Skreen, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles north of Ratoath, east border of the county of Meath, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,834 acres. Pop., in 1831, 687; in 1841, 639. Houses 110. The area, as stated above, includes 337 acres, which constitute the detached townland of Callaghstown, alleged to be tithe-free, and lying 5 miles distant from the main body of the parish. Almost all the land is very good. The road from Dublin to Slane passes through the main body.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £146; glebe, £51. The rectories of Kilmoon and PIERCETOWNLANDY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilmoon. The parishes are neither contiguous to each other, nor compact in themselves. Pop., in 1831, 1,215. Gross income, £380 8s.; nett, £341 7s. 8d. Patron of Kilmoon, the archbishop of Armagh; of Piercetownlandy, the Crown. The church was built in 1816, at the cost of £618 7s. 2½d.; obtained chiefly by loan from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 22 to 28. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 49, and the Roman Catholics to 670; the Protestants of the union to 61, and the Roman Catholics to 1,192; and a hedge-school in the parish had on its books 11 boys and 7 girls.

KILMORE, a barony. See ORRERY.

KILMORE, a parish, partly in the barony of Clonmahon, but chiefly in that of Upper Loughtee, co. Cavan, Ulster. In the Clonmahon section is the village of BALLINAGH [which see]; and in the Loughtee section are the episcopal village of KILMORE, and the post-village of CROSSDONEY: which see. Length, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Clonmahon section, 3,937 acres, 5 perches,—of which 55 acres, 20 perches are water. Area of the Loughtee section, 12,948 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches,—of which 2,154 acres are in Lough Oughter, and 125 acres, 39 perches are in streams and small lakes. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 7,295; in 1841, 7,250. Houses 1,194. Pop. of the Loughtee section, in 1831, 4,723; in 1841, 4,472. Houses 742. Pop. of the Clonmahon section, exclusive of Ballina, in 1831, 1,883; in 1841, 1,942. Houses 318. The surface extends north-north-westward, down the valley of the Erne, from the vicinity of Ballinagh to the foot of Lough Oughter; and a great part of it blends with Farnham demesne in forming one of the prettiest series of close landscapes in the central counties: see FARNHAM. Kilmore-house, the episcopal residence of the bishop of Kilmore, is a modern and substantial edifice, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-west by south of Cavan; and the demesne attached to it is of large extent, beautifully undulated, rich in soil, and well dressed and adorned. Adjoining the demesne on the north-west, is Danesfort, the residence of the dean of Kilmore; and around Crossdoney, or south of Kilmore demesne, are numerous villas, among which may be named Lisnamandra, G. L'Estrange, Esq.—Belleville, Captain Fleming,—Castle-Cosby, Mr. Whitethorn,—Drumcarbin, Mr. Booth,—Drumhiel, Mr. Bell,—Lakeview,—Ricehill,—Tully,—Hermitage,—Roseville,—Rockville,—and Bingfield. One-half of the entire land in the parish is of prime quality; and the other half is variously second and third rate. The roads from Cavan to Granard, and from Killeshandra to Dublin, pass through the interior. The small village of Kilmore stands adjacent to Kilmore-house, on the road from Cavan to Crossdoney. It appears to have been originally called 'Cella Magna Deathreib;' and is alleged, by monastic writers, to have been the site of an ancient abbey, founded in the sixth century by St. Columb. The present church, or cathedral, is an ancient and very plain edifice.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Kilmore. Vicarial tithe composition, £225 2s. 8d.; glebe, £210. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £127 17s. 4d., and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Westmeath. The vicarages of Kilmore and BALLINTEMPLE, and the sinecure rectory of KEADUE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilmore, and the corps of the deanery of Kilmore cathedral. Pop., in 1831, 12,143. Gross income, £590 2s. 8d.; nett, £485 12s. 2d.; but these sums are exclusive of respectively £239 5s. 10½d. and £227 16s. 7½d., arising from tithe composition of Keadue, and from renewal fines and rents of deanery lands. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Castleraghan, in the dio. of Kilmore. Two curates have each a salary of £75. There are two churches,—the one in Kilmore, and the other in Ballintemple. Sittings in Kilmore church, 340; attendance 130. Drumcor and Ballina Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 600 and 900; and Ballahee, Bruska, and Aghalourd Roman Catholic chapels, of respectively 900, 565, and 430; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, each of these two sets of chapels is mutually united. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 1,711 Churchmen, 27 Presbyterians, and 5,798 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union, exclusive of the whole of Keadue and of three townlands of Kilmore attached to the perpetual curacy of Drumkeen, consisted of 2,127 Churchmen, 27 Presbyterians, and 10,576 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools in the parish, at Crossdoney, Gurtbrattan, and Clonegall, had on their books 120 boys and 99 girls; 13 daily schools in the parish had 394 boys and 295 girls; and 19 daily schools in the union had 747 boys and 402 girls. Three of the schools in the parish were wholly supported by Lord Farnham; one was wholly supported by subscription; one was chiefly supported by the London Hibernian Societies and subscription; and one was aided with £6 from subscription and £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice. In 1839, the National Board granted £73 10s. toward the erection of a school at Drumcor; and, in 1840, they had a boys' school and a girls' school at Ballina, attended by 213 boys and 133 girls.

KILMORE, a diocese in the ecclesiastical province of Armagh, and partly in the civil provinces of Leinster and Connaught, but chiefly in the civil province of Ulster. Dr. Beaufort, estimating its area at 497,250 Irish acres, states that 281,000 acres are in co. Cavan, 184,750 in co. Leitrim, 29,300 in co. Fermanagh, and 2,200 in co. Meath; and estimating the number of parishes at 39 and a part, he states that 26 are in Cavan, 10 in Leitrim, 3 in Fermanagh, and a part in Meath. Length of the diocese, 58 miles; breadth, from 10 to 20; area, 648,036 acres, 5½ perches. Pop., in 1831, 291,960.—This see was founded in the 13th century; but originally bore the name of Brefne or Triburna. Florence O'Conarty, the first bishop, died in 1231. Andrew MacBrady, who was bishop in 1484, erected the parish-church of Kilmore into the cathedral. John Garvey, previously dean of Christ-church, was the first Protestant bishop of Kilmore, and held the see during four years ending in 1589, when he was translated to the primatial see of Ireland. From 1589 till 1603, the see of Kilmore was vacant; and from 1629 till 1641-2, it was held jointly with Ardagh by the pious, learned, and justly celebrated Bedell, the translator of the Bible into Irish. The act of 1833 permanently annexed Kilmore to ELPHIN: see that article.

The average gross and nett income of the see during three years ending in 1831, was respectively £7,477 17s. 0½d. and £6,225 9s. 8½d. The deanery is the only dignity; and has for its corps the united benefice of Kilmore and Ballintemple, the sinecure rectory of Keadue, and the additional income of £239 5s. 10½d. Total number of parishes, 45; of benefices, 39; of resident incumbents, 33. Tithe compositions belonging to the benefices, £9,648 17s. 7d.; glebes, £12,624 13s. 0½d. Gross income, £22,797 2s. 7½d.; nett, £19,343 8s. 3½d. Patron of 1 benefice, the Crown; of 28, the diocesan; of 7, incumbents; of 3, laymen and corporations. Appropriate tithes, £682 4s. 0½d.; impropriate tithes, £2,567 12s. 8½d. Number of stipendiary curates, 36; amount of their income, £2,708 9s. 3½d., exclusive of additional advantages enjoyed by 5. Churches, 46; sittings, 14,876; cost of building 27, enlarging 3, building and enlarging 2, and building and repairing 1, £41,163 7s. 5d.,—of which £9,753 16s. 10½d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £27,269 14s. 3½d. was lent by that Board, £3,093 18s. 8d. was raised by private subscription and donation, and £1,045 17s. 7½d. was raised by parochial assessment. Presbyterian meeting-houses, 12; Protestant dissenting meeting-houses, not Presbyterian, 17; Roman Catholic chapels, 76. In 1834, the pop. consisted of 46,879 Churchmen, 8,736 Presbyterians, 97 other Protestant dissenters, and 240,593 Roman Catholics; 444 daily schools, of which lists were returned, had on their books 18,827 boys, and 11,658 girls, and 2 daily schools, of which no lists were returned, were computed to be attended by 138 children; 264 of the daily schools were supported wholly by fees; and of the 182 which were supported or aided by endowment or subscription, 23 were in connection with the National Board, 16 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 1 with the Board of Erasmus Smith, 32 with the Kildare Place Society, and 59 with the London Hibernian Society.

The Roman Catholic dio. of Kilmore continues unannexed. The number of parishes is 43; of parochial clergymen, 41; of coadjutor clergymen, 32. The bishop's parishes are Drumgoon and Crosserlough. A diocesan college exists at Cavan, and has a president and 3 professors. The parishes of the diocese, with their respective number of chapels, are Drumgoon, 2; Moybollogue and Kilmainham, 2; Larah-Lower, 1; Kilmore, 2; Knockbridge, 2; Ballinaceleragh, 1; Glannede, 1; Annagh-West, 2; Killinkere, 3; Innismagrath, 1; Kinawley, 1; Larah-Upper, 1; Castleterra, 2; Killina, 1; Killersherdiny, 2; Drumlane, 2; Killeshandra, 2; Kildalton and Tomregan, 2; Drumreilly-Low, 1; Killasnet, 2; Carrigallan, 2; Templeport, 3; Ballaghameehan, 1; Glangevlin, 1; Aughteragh, 2; Knockninny, 3; Killesher, 2; Drumlase, 1; An-

KILMORE, a parish in the baronies of West O'Neilland and Lower Orior, co. Armagh, Ulster. The O'Neilland section contains the town of RICH-HILL: which see. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, 5½. Area of the O'Neilland section, 12,474 acres, 2 roods, 27 perches; of the Lower Orior section, 4,799 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches,—of which 13 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 14,034; in 1841, 14,256. Houses 2,552. Pop. of the Lower Orior section, in 1831, 4,087; in 1841, 4,019. Houses 751. Pop. of the rural districts of the O'Neilland section, in 1831, 9,010; in 1841, 9,485. Houses 1,654. The ecclesiastical parish is minus the eastern district, or the perpetual curacy of MULLAVILLY [which see]; and, in 1831, it had a population of 7,444. The surface of the civil parish is one of the richest and most softly beautiful sections of the county; partly plain and meadowy; chiefly undulated, gently hilly, and disposed in small and well-fenced farms; and almost everywhere arable, fertile, and ornate. The chief streams which drain it are the Bann and the Casher on the east boundary, and the Tall through the interior; and all glide northward within the great Lough Neagh basin. The principal mansions and villas are Rich-hill, Killynalavagh, Broomfield, Bellview, Cornascreeb, Wheatfield, Annagh-hill, Course-Lodge, Hollywell, Money, Drumart, Springvale, Greenmount, Fairview, Rockvale, Ash-tree-hill, Mullavilly, Mount-Pleasant, Prospect, Mandeville, Sandymount, Brackagh, and Ballintaggart. On the west border of the parish, 1½ mile east-north-east of Loughgall, are the intrenchments and ruins of Castleran; and ¾ of a mile north of these is the hamlet of the Diamond, situated in a glen, and celebrated as the scene of 'the battle of the Diamond.' The two parties of prædial insurgents, known in local history as the Defenders and the Peep-o'-day boys, having fought several skirmishes, and sustained mutual losses of blood and life, agreed upon a truce, and appointed a meeting for negotiation to be held in the house of a man named Winter, in the village of the Diamond. At this meeting, say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "a Roman Catholic clergyman on the one part, and a Protestant gentleman on the other, bound themselves for their respective parties, that peace between both should be strictly preserved for a period named. The Protestant gentleman was fired at on his way home, after having affixed his name to the treaty; and his party was, on the next day, attacked by above 700 of the Defenders. But it is asserted that these Defenders were at that time ignorant of the fact that an armistice had been agreed upon. Thus exasperated, both parties prepared for a resort to arms; both assembled in large numbers; the one upon the one hill that overlooked the Diamond, and the other upon the hill opposite, each having laid in a large store of provisions and ammunition, and each being amply provided with weapons. The battle took place on the 21st of September, 1795; and happily before much mischief was done, although several lives were sacrificed, the parties were separated by the timely arrival of the military. Out of this affray—preceded as it undoubtedly was by many other unhappy quarrels, and a terrible state of insubordination in the county of Armagh—arose the Orange Institution. The original church of the parish is said by Archibald to have been monastic, and founded by St. Mochter. This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the chancellorship of Armagh cathedral, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £1,213 7s. 3d.; glebe, £864 11s. 8d. Gross income, £2,077 18s. 11d.; nett, £1,765; but both these sums are exclusive of £24 8s. 9d. belonging peculiarly to the chancellorship. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1814, by means of a loan of £1,846 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance, from 330 to 500. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 95 to 120; the Independent by from 80 to 110; the Primitive Wesleyan by from 20 to 100; the Seceding Methodist by from 70 to 80; and the Roman Catholic by from 500 to 560;—and the last is united, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, to the chapel of Mullavilly. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,914 Churchmen, 738 Presbyterians, 550 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,524 Roman Catholics; 6 Sunday schools—one of which was aided with £2 a-year from Mr. Caulfield, and each of four with £2 a-year from the rector—were attended on the average by 465 children; and 8 daily schools—two of which were salaried with respectively £5 and £12 from the National Board, one with £57 16s. 11d. from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and one with £4 from Miss Richardson—had on their books 337 boys and 262 girls.

KILMORE, a parish in the baronies of Kinnelearty and Upper Castlereagh, 4 miles east by south of Ballinabinch, co. Down, Ulster. The Castlereagh section contains the villages of Crossgar and Kilmore. See CROSSGAR. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 3½. Area of the Kinnelearty section, 6,387 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches,—of which 89 acres, 36 perches are water. Area of the Castlereagh section, 6,466 acres, 29 perches,—of which 5 acres, 18 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 6,602; in 1841, 6,277. Houses 1,169. Pop. of the Kinnelearty section, in 1831, 2,769; in 1841, 2,516. Houses 451. Pop. of the rural districts of the Castlereagh section, in 1841, 2,932. Houses 537. The surface presents some tracts of deep heavy land, and many scattered spots of bare rock, yet consists, on the whole, of light thin soil on a rocky but fertile bottom. Loughs Polramer and Mann lie in the south; and the rivulet Annacloy runs on the eastern boundary. The principal residences are Crossgar, Rademan, and Rockville. The village of Kilmore stands about a mile east of the church. Area, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 134. Houses 32. Fairs are held on Feb. 4, March 14, May 1, June 3, Aug. 5, Sept. 29, Nov. 5, and Dec. 23. The road from Ballinabinch to Killyleagh passes through the parish, and is overlooked by Crossgar.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Vicarial tithe composition, £320; glebe, £22 1s. 4½d. Gross income, £342 1s. 4½d.; nett, £292 6s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £394; and are appropriated to the use of Down. The church was built about 1792, from private funds, supplied principally by the family of the present Sharman Crawford, Esq. Sittings 150; attendance 100. Three Presbyterian meeting-houses are attended by respectively 200, from 100 to 250, and from 400 to 500. The Roman Catholic chapels of Kilmore and Crossgar have each an attendance of 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Inch and Killyleagh. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 740 Churchmen, 3,495 Presbyterians, and 2,480 Roman Catholics; 7 Sunday schools were attended on the average by 457 children; and 13 daily schools—3 of which were aided by the London Hibernian Society, and one by the Society for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 401 boys and 270 girls.

KILMORE, a parish in the barony of Upper Deece, 3½ miles east-south-east of Summerhill, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,607 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches,—of which 14 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,266; in 1841, 1,274. Houses 193. The surface consists for the most part of good land; and is drained by the Moyalty river. The road from Summerhill to Dublin passes through the interior. The chief hamlet is Moyalty. The seats are Larchhill, Phepotstown, Jenkinstown, Kilmore, Curraghmore, and Arodstown. The Kilmore dispensary is within the Dunshaughlin Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 18,761 acres, with a pop. of 3,944, and, in 1839-40, it expended £99 5s. 8d., and administered to 1,713 patients.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £330 14s. 3d.; glebe, £18. Gross income, £348 14s. 3d.; nett, £294 14s. 8½d. Patron, the Crown. The church is an old building. Sittings 60; attendance, from 12 to 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Gaultrim. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 105, and the Roman Catholics to 1,209; and 2 daily schools were attended on the average by 90 children.

KILMORE, a parish in the barony and county of Monaghan, 2½ miles west by north of the town of Monaghan, Ulster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, from ½ to 3; area, 8,689 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches,—of which 334 acres, 38 perches are detached, and 15 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,095; in 1841, 5,121. Houses 910. The surface consists, for the most part, of good land, and is traversed westward by the road from Monaghan to Clones. No fewer than 21 lakes diversify the surface; and those on the north side are all mutually connected. Turbary is more plentiful in the central district than in the extremities. The road from Monaghan to Rockcorry, and that from Ballybay to Smithborough intersect each other in the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £286 3s.; glebe, £107 10s. Gross income, £393 13s.; nett, £347 15s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built about 1790. Sittings 250; attendance 250. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Drumsart. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 743 Churchmen, 1,226 Presbyterians, and 3,288 Roman Catholics; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 95 children; and 9 daily schools—2 of which were aided by subscription, 2 by the National Board, 2 by the London Hibernian Society, and 1 by the Society for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 319 boys and 261 girls.

KILMORE, a parish in the barony of North Ballyntobber, and on the east border of co. Roscommon, Connaught. It contains part of the village of HILL-STREET [which see]; and lies along the Shannon opposite the towns of Drumsna and Jamestown. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 9,316 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches,—of which 763 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches are in the Shannon and Lough Boderig, and 154 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 5,086; in 1841, 5,164. Houses 874. The Shannon makes a large sweep round the north of the parish, so as to peninsulate about one-third of the landed area. The parochial surface consists in general of very good land; and is very gently yet agreeably diversified with swells and low hills. Excellent turbarry is well diffused. Limestone, suitable for manure, occurs on every townland. The most interesting demesne is CHARLESTOWN [which see]; and the other chief mansions and villas are Tully-lodge, Lakeview, Ashfortvale, Rushport, Aghaward, Ballycummin, Moyglass, Cloonteen, and Prospect. The hamlets are about 23 in number; and the principal are Charlestown, Clogher, and Cealare. An annual May fair is held in the townland of Dangan. The road from Elphin to Jamestown passes through the interior; and a canal-cut of the Shannon navigation traverses the peninsulated north. A priory of Augustinian canons is said to have been founded in the parish by Con O'Flanagan in 1232; and two old buildings, the one in the townland of Kilbride, and the other on the lands of Ballycommon, are alleged to have been respectively a nunnery and a church.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Elphin. Tithe composition, £184 12s. 3½d.; glebe, £18. Gross income, £202 12s. 3½d.; nett, £173 16s. 8½d. Patrons, A. Ahmuty, Esq., and J. W. Kelly, Esq. The church was built in 1828, by means of £146 15s. 9½d. contributed by the parish, and £923 1s. 6½d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 193, and the Roman Catholics to 5,201; and 7 daily schools—2 of which were aided by respectively the Elphin Diocesan Society and the Society for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 223 boys and 110 girls.

KILMORE, a parish in the barony of Lower Kilnemanagh, 2½ miles north-north-west of Golden, co. Tipperary, Munster. It consists of a main body and a detached portion, the latter lying a little to the north of the former, and traversed by the road from Tipperary to Templemore. Area of the whole, 2,004 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches; of the detached portion, 829 acres, 26 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,029; in 1841, 1,162. Houses 168. Two-thirds of the land are excellent; and the remainder is moor and mountain. The only mansion is Kilmore-house.—This parish is a sinecure benefice, and nominally a chapelry, but practically a rectory, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition and gross income, £100; nett, £95. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Shronell in the dio. of Emly. In 1834, the parishioners, with the exception of 3, were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 66 boys and 30 girls.

KILMORE, a parish in the barony of Upper Ormond, 4 miles south of Nenagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. It contains the village of SILVERMINES: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3; area, 13,535 acres, 39 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,717; in 1841, 5,138. Houses 908. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,456. Houses 786. The northern and central divisions are rich and beautiful campaign ground, profusely embellished with cultivation and park-scenery; and the southern division is moorish upland, climbing away from Silvermines to a final altitude of 1,607 feet. Much of the water-level in the south exceeds 500 feet in height. Kilboy, the noble demesne of Lord Dunally, lies immediately north of Silvermines, and is bisected by the road from Toomavara to Newport-Tip. This demesne contains the richest lands in the fertile plain in which it lies; it exhibits some of the largest oak and ash trees anywhere to be seen in the western part of the county; and it stretches away to the base of the hills, there to blend with exquisite natural landscape. The other demesnes, whether mansion or villa, are Mountland, Tulla, Lessenah, Silvermines-cottage, and Garryard. Lead mines occur on the west border, and are successfully worked. The chief antiquities are ruins of two churches and four castles.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £101 10s. 9½d.; glebe, £27 4s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £221 10s. 9½d.; and are appropriated partly to the chanter of Killaloe cathedral, but chiefly to the diocesan. The vicarage of Kilmore, and the rectories of LISBUNNY and KILNANEAVE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilmore. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3½. Pop., in 1831, 8,295. Gross income, £673 7s. 1½d.; nett, £551 11s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is also dean of Ardferd. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1810, by means of a loan of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and of a donation of unknown amount from Lord Dunally. Sittings 160; attendance, about 80. The Roman Catholic chapel of Kilmore has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballinaclough. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Kilnaneave. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 211, and the Roman Catholics to 4,783; the Protestants of the union to 258, and the Roman Catholics to 8,482; and 5 daily schools in the parish and union—2 of which were supported by Lord Dunally—had on their books 37 boys and 116 girls, and were attended by about 50 other children.

KILMORE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the coast of the barony of Bargie, 3½ miles west-south-west of Broadway, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,233 acres, 3 roods, 9 perches,—of which 309 acres, 32 perches are in the Saltee Islands, and 226 acres, 17 perches form a detached district. Pop., in 1831, 1,749; in 1841, 1,865. Houses 291. Area of the village, 3 acres. Pop., in 1841, 212. Houses 35. The surface of the main body of the parish is washed on the west by Broadwater and Ballyteigue sea-lough, and terminates on the south in the bluff headland of Grossfarnogue. The seats are Sashill, Ballycross, Ballyharty, and Ballyseakin,—the last in the detached district to the east. The ruins of Ballyteigue-castle stand on the shore of Ballyteigue Lough. The Little and the Great Saltee Islands lie respectively 2 miles south, and 3½ south by west of Grossfarnogue Point. See SALTEE. Kilmore Harbour, situated immediately east of Grossfarnogue Point, is a creek subservient to a fishing station and a coast-guard station; and it contains an utterly incompetent pier, erected, in 1825, by the fishermen. In 1836, the fishing-craft, within the district of the Kilmore coast-guard station, amounted to 27 open sail-boats and 46 row-boats, manned by 384 persons.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TOMHAGGARD [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Vicarial tithe composition, £115 15s.; glebe, £12 1s. 4d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £337 7s. 8½d.; and are impropriate in John Rowe, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,002; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tomhaggard. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 55, and the Roman Catholics to 1,757.

KILMORE, a parish in the barony of Carbery, 2 miles west of Castle-Carbery, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,908 acres, 13 perches. Pop., in 1831, 198; in 1841, 457. Houses 67. It contains Windmill-lodge, and the hamlet of Kishawanny.—This parish lies within the dio. of Kildare, and among the parishes which constitute the benefice of Castle-Carbery; but it does not seem to be ecclesiastically recognised.

KILMORE-ERRIS, a parish in the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the villages of BINGHAMSTOWN and TERMONCARRAGH: see these articles. Length and breadth, exclusive of islands, respectively $14\frac{1}{2}$ and $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Area of the whole, 29,492 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches,—of which 381 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 9,159; in 1841, 9,428. Houses 1,664. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 8,800. Houses 1,554. The mainland comprises the whole of the peninsula, called the Mullet; and is bounded on the west by the Atlantic, and on the east by Broadhaven, the town of Belmullet, and the bay of Blacksod. The insular district comprises most of the islands belonging to the barony of Erris, the chief of which are INNISKEA (NORTH), INNISKEA (SOUTH), DEVILAN, and INNISGLORA: see these articles. The highest grounds are a hill at the north end of the peninsula, 285 feet; Termon Hill, at the south end of the peninsula, 342 feet; and Knocknaska in South Inniskea, 230 feet. An estimate which assumes the mainland to possess an area of 18,000 Irish acres, distributes it into 6,100 acres of arable ground and green pasture, 2,800 of sandy plains, and 9,100 of highly improvable bog and mountain. Though the peninsula contains a greater proportion of good land than any other district in the barony, it exhibits great wretchedness of both cultivation and population,—undivided farms, bad roads, squalid villages and hamlets; yet it has experienced considerable georgic improvement, under the direction and encouragement of its well-known Roman Catholic clergyman, Lyons. The chief features of the district will be found noticed in the articles already referred to, and in those on BROADHAVEN, BLACKSOD, ERRIS-HEAD, BELMULLET, PORTAFRANKA, and TARMON.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killalla. Vicarial tithe composition, £130; glebe, £20. Gross income, £150; nett, £129 14s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £130; and are appropriated to the precentorship of Killalla cathedral. The church was built in 1827, at the cost of £738 9s. 2½d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitzings 150; attendance 54. Two Roman Catholic chapels, and a private house used as a Roman Catholic chapel, have an attendance of respectively 1,500, 800, and 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 235, and the Roman Catholics to 9,597; and 6 daily schools—one of which was in connection with the National Board—had on their books 210 boys and 95 girls.

KILMOREMOY, a parish, partly in the barony of Tyrawley, co. Mayo, and partly in the barony of Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. The Mayo section contains the town of BALLINA; and the Sligo section contains the town of ARDNAREE, and the villages of BUNREE and CROCKETSTOWN: see these articles. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Mayo section, 4,338 acres, 38 perches,—of which 11 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches are in the river Moy. Area of the Sligo section, 7,992 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches,—of which 31 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches are in the Moy. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 14,586; in 1841, 13,129. Houses 2,480. Pop. of the rural districts of the Mayo section, in 1831, 3,237; in 1841, 1,715. Houses 294. Pop. of the rural districts of the Sligo section, in 1831, 3,357; * in 1841, 4,050. Houses 733. The river Moy, flowing westward, bisects the parish into its two divisions; and separates Ballina from Ardnaree. The surface and scenery are noticed in the articles on the towns. The chief mansion in the Mayo division is Belleek-castle, the seat of Edward Howley, Esq.; and the chief country-houses in the other division, are Downhill and Ardnaree-cottage. The beautiful Bunree rivulet bisects the Sligo division.—This parish is a vicarage, and part-rectory, in the dio. of Killalla. Vicarial and part-rectorial tithe composition, £422 5s. 8d.; glebe, £33 16s. 10½d. The residuary-rectorial tithes are compounded for £49 17s. 11d.; and are appropriated to the precentor and the bishop of Killalla. This parish, and the vicarages of Ardagh, Ballinahaglish, Kilbelfad, Attymass, and Kilgarvin, constitute the benefice of Kilmoremoy or Ardagh. See ARDAGH. The church is situated in Ardagh, 3 miles west of Ballina, and has an attendance of 350. The Baptist and the Methodist meeting-houses in Ballina have an attendance of respectively 80 and 150. The Roman Catholic chapel in Ardnaree has three officiates, and an attendance of 4,000. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 904 Churchmen, 5 Presbyterians, 42 other Protestant dissenters, and 14,591 Roman Catholics; and 17 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 13s. from the National Board and £11 7s. from subscription, one with £8 13s. 6d. from the National Board, one with £30 from subscription, one with £16 from the Baptist Society, one with £20 from the Rev. Mr. Hueston, one with £15 5s. from subscription, one with £12 from the Baptist Society, and one with £4 from the vicar and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 480 boys and 403 girls.

KILMORGAN, a parish in the barony of Corran, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Ballymote, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,768 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches,—of which 33 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,228; in 1841, 2,343. Houses 405. The land is of various quality. The only demesne is Newpark; and the chief hamlet is Drumfin. The mail-road from Dublin to Sligo passes down the eastern border.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of EMLAGHEAD [which see], in the dio. of Achonry. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £120, and the rectorial for £103 15s.; and the latter are inappropriate in Sir Henry Montgomery. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Emlaghfad. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 203 Churchmen, 40 Presbyterians, and 2,098 Roman Catholics; and a daily school was salaried with about £12 from the London Hibernian Societies, and £2 from Mr. Clifford, and had on its books 8 boys and 32 girls.

KILMOVEE, a parish in the barony of Costello, 4 miles west by south of Ballaghadireen, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the village of KILKELLY: which see. Length, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 20,756 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches,—of which 451 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,491; † in 1841, 5,844. Houses 1,062. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 5,702. Houses 1,033. About one-half of the surface is waste or poorly pastoral upland, comparatively low in altitude, but averagely very bleak and churlish; and the remainder consists of land of four qualities, and possesses few amenities of either soil or scenery. A principal height in the south has an altitude of 372 feet; and Lough Nanoge, on the southern border, has an elevation of 268 feet. The chief residences are Carrowbeg and Oxfield; and the principal antiquities are a monastic edifice and two ruined churches. The road from Ballaghadireen to Castlebar passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CASTLEMORE [which see], in the dio. of Achonry. Vicarial tithe composition, £92 6s. 1½d.; glebe, £26 6s. 4d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £92 6s. 1½d.; and are impropriate in Viscount Dillon. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,500 and 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Kilcoleman. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 4,541; and 4 hedge-schools had on their books 237 boys and 86 girls.

KILMOYLAN, a parish in the barony of Clare, 5½ miles south by east of Tuam, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the villages of ANBALLY and POLSILLAGH; which see. Length and breadth, each 5 miles; area, 8,567 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches,—of which 8 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,788; in 1841, 1,903. Houses 338. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,524. Houses 272. Some of the land is very bad; and most is of middle-rate quality. The surface is so low and flat that a principal height on the west border has an altitude of only 167 feet above sea-level. The seats are Annagh, Corbally, Ardskeagh, Ardskeaghbeg, Ballylaheen, Brooklodge, and Gortbeg. The road from Tuam to Galway crosses the western wing.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of MOYLUGH [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £140; glebe, £5. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

KILMOYLAN, a parish in the barony of Shanid, immediately west of Shanagolden, co. Limerick, Munster. It contains the village of BALLYHAHILL; which see. It is very irregular in outline, and is intersected by the parish of Shanagolden. Area, 15,091 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,326; in 1841, 3,350. Houses 525. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,154. Houses 486. The surface is part of the seaboard of the Shannon's estuary; is principally drained by the Oran rivulet; and derives some embellishment from the fantastically named demesne of Whiskey-hall. About one-third is good arable land; and the remainder is pasture-ground and mountain.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £95; nett, £89 14s. 1d. Patrons, the vicars choral of Limerick. The incumbent is also stipendiary curate of St. John's parish in the dio. of Limerick. The occasional duties of Kilmoylan are performed by the vicar of Shanagolden, for a salary of £5. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £137 7s. 11d.; and are impropriate in the Countess of Ormonde. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 750; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Shanagolden and Robertstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 3,450; and a pay daily school had on its books 6 boys and 4 girls.

KILMOYLER, a Roman Catholic parish on the east border of the barony of Clanwilliam, 3½ miles north-west of Caher, co. Tipperary, Munster. It is in the dio. of Cashel and Emly; and the chapel is on the west border of the civil parish of Killardry. Kilmoyley demesne, immediately adjacent to the chapel, is the property of S. O'Meagher, Esq.

KILMUCKRIDGE, a parish on the coast of the barony of Ballaghkeen, 4½ miles east-north-east of Oulart, co. Wexford, Leinster. It contains part of the village of FORD; which see. Length, 3¼ miles; breadth, 2¼; area, 3,898 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches,—of which 21 acres are in Lough Learys. Pop., in 1831, 1,380; in 1841, 1,602. Houses 280. The surface is low and declines to the sea. The seats are Kilmuckridge, Letterbeg, and Upton. The ruins of Castle-Annesley stand near the shore; and in their vicinity is a coast-guard station. Fairs are held on Jan. 1, Easter-Monday, June 24, and Sept. 29.—This parish is a wholly impropriate curacy in the dio. of Ferns; and is united without emolument, to the vicarage of BALLYVALDEN; which see. The tithes are compounded for £150; and are impropriate in H. K. G. Morgan, Esq. The church was built in 1815, by means of a loan of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,500; and is united to the chapel of Monimolin. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 149, and the Roman Catholics to 1,267; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £18 from subscription—were usually attended by about 158 children.

KILMUD, or KILMOOD, a parish in the barony of Lower Castlereagh, 2¼ miles north-north-west of Killinehy, co. Down, Ulster. Length, 3¼ miles; breadth, 1¼; area, 4,634 acres, 1 rood, 39 perches,—of which 34 acres, 25 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,219; in 1841, 2,154. Houses 369. The surface consists in general of good land; and is drained chiefly by the Blackwater rivulet. The road from Comber to Killyleagh passes through the interior; and the demesne of Florida, the residence of J. P. Gordon, Esq., is in the south.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Vicarial tithe composition, £86; glebe, £37 6s. Gross income, £160 4s. 5½d.; nett, £126 15s. 6½d. Patron, alternately the Marquis of Downshire, and David Gordon, Esq. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £65 12s. 8d.; and are impropriate in the patrons. The church was built in 1821, at the cost of £2,215 7s. 8½d. contributed by the patrons, by Lord Dufferin, and by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 80 to 250. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 282 Churchmen, 1,904 Presbyterians, 21 other Protestant dissenters, and 39 Roman Catholics; 4 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 280 children; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and one with £4 from Lord Dufferin—had on their books 212 boys and 139 girls.

KILMURRY, a parish in the baronies of East and West Muskerry, 6 miles south-east of Macroom, co. Cork, Munster. Area of the East Muskerry section, 159 acres; of the West Muskerry section, 8,950 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 3,762; of the West Muskerry section, 3,403. Houses in the whole, 596; in the West Muskerry section, 549. The pop. of the whole, in 1831, is stated by the Census at 4,626, and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 4,147. Two townlands are separated nearly two miles from the main body of the parish by the intervention of Kilnichael. The parochial surface lies partly within the basin of the Lee, and partly round the sources and along the early course of the Bride; it includes a portion of the Carrig Hills; and, while very various in both quality and character, it contains a considerable aggregate of ornate land. Two of the principal seats are Standonangan, the residence of the Rev. Somers Payne, situated in the valley of the Lee,—and Warrenscourt, the handsome residence of Sir Augustus Warren, Bart., situated in the southern vicinity of Doniskey. Fairs are held in the parish on May 1, September 8, November 1, and December 21.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Cork. A church is in the course of erection, chiefly by means of a contribution from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,400, and is united to the chapels of Cannaway and Moviddy. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 120, and the Roman Catholics to 4,183; and 4 hedge-schools were usually attended by about 217 children.

KILMURRY, a parish $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Limerick, and formerly in the county of the city of Limerick, but now in the barony of Clanwilliam, co. Limerick, Munster. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 3,570 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,803; in 1841, 1,708. Houses 264. The surface consists of good land, lies on the lower side of the confluence of the Mulkern and the Shannon, and is traversed by the mail-road from Limerick to Dublin. One of the principal mansions is Newcastle.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £364; glebe, £40. The rectories of Kilmurry and DERRYGALVIN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilmurry. Gross income, £549; nett, £509 6s. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron of Kilmurry, the Crown; of Derrygalvin, the diocesan. The incumbent is also diocesan, schoolmaster, and a vicar-choral, of Limerick. A curate has a salary of £80. The church was built in 1812, by means of a loan of £535 7s. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, about 25. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of between 500 and 600; and is united to the chapel of St. Patrick's. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 67, and the Roman Catholics to 1,804; the Protestants of the union to 79, and the Roman Catholics to 2,541; a Roman Catholic Sunday school in the parish was attended by about 300 children; and 3 pay daily schools in the parish had on their books 79 boys and 43 girls.

KILMURRY, a parish in the barony of East Iffa and Offa, 3 miles west-north-west of Carrick-on-Suir, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 7,275 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches,—of which 19 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches are in the river Suir. Pop., in 1831, 2,028;* in 1841, 2,478. Houses 374. But the parish, as thus defined, includes the whole of the ancient parish of Ardcollum, the townlands of which are so intermixed with those of Kilmurry that the oldest inhabitant cannot distinguish them. The surface slowly ascends from the Suir to a water-elevation of 250 feet above sea-level. Most of the land is good; and some is excellent. The seats are Ballydine, Kilmurry, Ballycurkeen, and Dovehill; the hamlets are Ballydine, Rathelarish, and Glenbower; and the chief antiquities are ruins of three churches and two castles.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILSHEELAN [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £504 18s. 11d.; glebe, £12. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,300; and is united to the chapels of Mockler and Grange. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 7, and the Roman Catholics to 2,106; and a pay daily school had on its books 60 boys and 31 girls.

KILMURRY, a demesne on the north border of the parish of Collumbkill, and in the barony of Gowran, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-east of Thomastown, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It is noted as the birth-place and residence of the Right Hon. Charles Kendal Bushe, Lord-chief-justice of Ireland.

KILMURRY AND HENBROOK, a bog, 5 miles east of Tuam, co. Galway, Connaught. Area, 1,904 acres; elevation above high-water level in Galway bay, 239 feet; estimated cost of reclamation, £2,352. The official report describes it as "a high, dry, firm, pasturable bog, having several small belts of gravel in it." The residence of Kilmurry and the hamlet of Claddagh stand in respectively its north and its west skirts.

KILMURRY-CLONDERALAW, a parish in the barony of Clonderalaw, exactly mid-distance between Kildysart and Kilrush, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the village of KNOCK: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{4}$; area, 10,457 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,859; in 1841, 4,332. Houses 678. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,217. Houses 657. The surface extends along three-fourths of the west side of Clonderalaw bay, from the head downward; and ascends thence northward into the moorlands of the barony. See CLONDERALAW. A district about a mile broad along the bay consists of fair arable land, and possesses a large aggregate of demesne embellishment; but nearly all the remainder of the surface is bleak, moorish, and comparatively unproductive. Two chief heights in the north have altitudes of 277 and 298 feet; and one of them is crowned with Reantassa fort. The hamlets are Kilmurry-MacMahon and Greenaune; and the seats are Cahirbane, Oaklands, Summer-lodge, Bridge-park, Thornberry, and Clonderalaw. The road from Ennis to Kilrush passes down the coast.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £87 13s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £25 13s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £120; and are inappropriate in Bindon Scott, Esq. The vicarages of Kilmurry, KILLOFIN, KILMACDUANE, KILFEDANE, and KILLEYMUR [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilmurry-Clonderalaw. Length, 16 miles; breadth, 9. Pop., in 1831, 20,858. Gross income, £547 12s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £469 9s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is also minor-canon of Limerick. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1810, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 70. The Kilmurry Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and there are 5 other Roman Catholic chapels within the benefice. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 176, and the Roman Catholics to 3,953; the Protestants of the union to 271, and the Roman Catholics to 22,104; 5 hedge-schools in the parish had on their books 198 boys and 108 girls; and 24 daily schools in the union had 896 boys and 504 girls.

KILMURRY-ELY, a parish in the barony of Clonlisk, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-west of Shinrone, King's co., Leinster. It contains the village of BROSNA: which see. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,385 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,504; in 1841, 1,655. Houses 265. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,513. Houses 246. The surface includes a considerable extent of bog; yet consists, for the most part, of tolerably good land. The seats are Annville, Ashpark, Leipsic, Hollypark, Derry, Clareen, Bellfield, Currallanty, and Ballincor. The road from Shinrone to Birr, and that from Roscrea to Portumna, intersect each other in the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of SHINRONE [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £238 15s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £64. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300; and is united to the chapel of Shinnrone. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 341, and the Roman Catholics to 1,235; and a pay daily school had on its books 28 boys and 18 girls.

KILMURRY-IBRICKANE, a parish in the barony of Ibrickane, 2½ miles west by south of Milltown-Malbay, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the villages of Mullagh and Kilmurry-Ibrickane. See MULLAGH. Length and breadth, exclusive of islands, respectively 8 miles and 4½; area, 25,857 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches,—of which 331 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches are in Lough Doo, 40 acres, 2 roods, 29 perches are in small lakes, and 160 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches are in sea-girt islands. Pop., in 1831, 8,433; in 1841, 10,747. Houses 1,652. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 10,523. Houses 1,614. The parochial surface extends from side to side of the barony, or from the western declivity of Slieve-Callan to the Atlantic ocean; and by far the greater part of it is now a congeries of wild uplands, and now a dreary expanse of bogs, moors, and bleak pasture and arable grounds. Slieve-Callan on the eastern boundary has an altitude of 1,282 feet; Knocknaboley, 2 miles further south, has an altitude of 701 feet; a hill on the south-east corner has an altitude of 700 feet; Lough Doo, 1½ mile north of the last hill, and all within the parish, has an elevation of 281 feet; and the rivulet Annagh, the most northerly of the three streams by which the parish is drained, descends within the parochial limits from an elevation of 509 feet to sea-level. The coast is all rocky and iron-bound; and contains the headlands of Lurga and Caherrush. The principal islands are Enniskerry, Carrickaneetwar, Muttie, and Carricknola. Though several villas and mansional houses are sprinkled over the seaboard, scarcely one clump or belt of wood exists. The village of Kilmurry-Ibrickane stands 1 mile from the sea, and on the road from Milltown-Malbay to Doonbeg. Area, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 91. Houses 15. Fairs are held on May 17 and Aug. 25.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory and vicarage in the dio. of Killaloe; and the vicars of Killara and Kilfarboy often officiate in it gratuitously. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and is united to the chapel of Kilfarboy. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 27, and the Roman Catholics to 9,029; and 7 pay daily schools had on their books 248 boys and 113 girls.

KILMURRY-NEGAUL, a parish, containing a village of the same name, and formerly situated in the barony of Upper Tulla, but recently transferred to the barony of Lower Bunratty, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,917 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches,—of which 13 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches are in Lough Cullaunyheeda, and 334 acres, 32 perches are in other lakes. Pop., in 1831, 628; in 1841, 699. Houses 101. The surface is good meadow and arable land. The seats are Ashley-Park, Shandangan, Kilkeshin, Derry, and Kilcornan. The village of Kilmurry-Negaul stands 2½ miles north by west of Six-Mile-Bridge, on the road thence to Quin. Area of the village, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 137. Houses 23.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILFINAGHTY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £36 18s. 5½d., and the rectorial for £41 10s. 9½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Egremont. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholic to 671.

KILNABOY. See KILNEBOY.

KILNABRONOGUE, KILNABROGUE, or KILMALLINOGUE, a parish in the barony of Longford, 2½ miles north of Eyrecourt, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 3,552 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches,—of which 77 acres, 12 perches are in the Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 988; in 1841, 1,126. Houses 184. The surface lies on the east margin of the county and province; and consists for the most part of low, flat, and excellent land. The seats are Earlstown, Fairfield, Harding-grove, and Corr-lodge. A ruined castle stands near the centre; and the ruined church and a Dominican convent stand on the west border.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CLONFERT [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £53 13s. 1d. A portion of the tithes, compounded for £17 17s. 8½d., is appropriated to the bishop. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 979.

KILNADEEMA. See KILLEENADEEMA.

KILNAGARIFF, KILNEGARRUFF, KILLINAGARRIFF, or KILLEENAGARRIFFE, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 2 miles south-east of Castle-Connell, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,455 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,361; in 1841, 2,724. Houses 434. A large section formerly belonged to the quondam county of the city of Limerick, and had, in 1831, a pop. of 1,472. The surface is drained by the Mulkern river, and traversed by the mail-road from Limerick to Dublin. One-eighth of the land is moorish; all the remainder is good arable and pasture ground; and much is rich in soil and ornate in dress. Considerable ornament is derived from the grounds of Rich-hill, and part of the demesne of Mount-Shannon.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of STRADBALLY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £271 13s. 11d.; glebe, £9 13s. 10d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 700; and is united to the chapel of Castle-Connell. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 47, and the Roman Catholics to 2,406; and two National schools and a pay daily school had on their books 109 boys and 86 girls.

KILNAGHTIN. See KILNAUGHTEN.

KILNAMANAGH, a parish on the north border of the barony of Frenchpark, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of the town of Frenchpark, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 7,621 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches,—of which 746 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches are in Lough Gara, 29 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches are in Lough-an-lea, and 7 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches are in the river Breeogue. Pop., in 1831, 2,815; in 1841, 2,900. Houses 527. Most of the surface is poor and bleak; and a large proportion is bog [see next article]. The principal hamlet is Breeogue; and the only noticeable residence is Kingsland. An old abbey existed in the parish; it is characteristically alleged by Archdall to have been founded in an early century; and it was granted at the dissolution to Richard, Earl of Clanricarde.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £41; glebe, £21. Gross income, £62; nett, £52 2s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is also surrogate of the diocese, and an officiate in the diocesan school. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £41; and are inappropriate in Viscount Lorton, and Robert Young, Esq. of Castleroa. A schoolhouse is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 6. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600; and is united to the chapel of Bridnague. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 2,966; and 4 daily schools, one of which was salaried with £20 from subscription, had on their books 99 boys and 58 girls.

KILNAMANAGH, one of ten denominations of a cluster of bogs, in the baronies of Frenchpark and Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connaught. The other denominations are Breeogue, Finisklin, Tonerroe, Knockglass, Camlin, Lignagun, Granny, Loam, and Knockroe. The whole series lies chiefly south and east of Breeogue bridge; and extends from west to east about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Area, 3,792 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches. Little interruption occurs to the series except the ridge of land called Fullaghan. Estimated cost of reclamation, £6,422 13s. 2d.

KILNAMANAGH, a parish in the barony of Bere, 9 miles south-west of Castletown-Berehaven, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the villages of ALLIHIES, BALLYDONAGAN, BALLINACALLA, BALLINACRIGGA, CLONNINES, FIRKEEL, KILKINNI-

KIN, KILLOUGH, and KILMICHAEL: see these articles. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3; area, 13,810 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,612; in 1841, 5,861. Houses 994. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,333. Houses 687. The surface includes DURSLEY ISLAND [which see], and the lower or terminating part of the peninsula between Bantry bay and the Kennare estuary. About one-third is arable, and the remainder is bog and mountain. A locality of prime interest is the district of the copper-mines of ALLIHIES: see that article. The coast is all bold and rocky; and comprises the bays of Ballydonagan and Kilkinny, the narrow sound between Dursley Island and the mainland, and the promontories of Garrinish Point, Crow Head, and Blackhall Head.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Berehaven or Killaconenagh, in the dio. of Ross. See KILLACONENAGH. Vicarial tithe composition, £148 12s. 3d.; glebe, £20. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £130; and are inappropriate. A licensed room is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 28. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000; and is united to the chapels of Bere-Island and Castletown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 93, and the Roman Catholics to 5,729; and 5 pay daily schools had on their books 295 boys and 78 girls.

KILNAMANAGH (LOWER), a barony of co. Tipperary, Munster. It is bounded, on the west and north, by Upper Kilmanagh; on the north-east, by Eliogurty; on the east, by Middlethird; and on the south, by Clanwilliam. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 7; area, 42,041 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches. The western district is upland and mountainous; the southern district is profusely wooded; and part of the eastern district is a portion of the right side of the valley of the Suir. The principal summits in the west have altitudes of from 500 to 820 feet; and Knockbane, the monarch height, has an altitude of 1,188 feet.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Clonoulty, Donoghill, and Oughterleague; and the whole of the parishes of Agbacrow, Ballintemple, Clogher, Kilmore, Kilpatrick, and Rathkennan. The only village is Ballagh. Pop., in 1841, 14,385. Houses 1,991. The baronies of Lower and Upper Kilmanagh formerly constituted only one barony. Pop., in 1831, 30,774. Houses 4,494. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred to Clanwilliam two townlands of Oughterleague, and one of Clonoulty. Pop., in 1841, 484. Families in Lower Kilmanagh employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,844; in manufactures and trade, 200; in other pursuits, 129. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,557; who could read but not write, 1,292; who could neither read nor write, 2,454. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,077; who could read but not write, 1,665; who could neither read nor write, 3,404. Lower and Upper Kilmanagh, or the undivided barony as it existed in 1831, is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Cashel, Thurles, and Tipperary. The total number of tenements valued in 4,397; and of these, 2,255 were valued under £5,—840, under £10,—434, under £15,—262, under £20,—183, under £25,—80, under £30,—123, under £40,—67, under £50,—and 153 at and above £50.

KILNAMANAGH (UPPER), a barony of co. Tipperary, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by Upper Ormond and Ikerrin; on the east, by Eliogurty and Lower Kilmanagh; on the south, by Lower Kilmanagh and Clanwilliam; and on the west, by co. Limerick and Upper Ormond. Length, $14\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 8; area, 59,990 acres, 26 perches. A district in the south, of nearly 7 miles in length, and about $3\frac{1}{2}$ in mean breadth, projects between Lower Kilnamanagh and co. Limerick; and is nearly all upland, moorish, and comparatively inhospitable; and by far the greater part of even the northern or chief district is cold and mountainous,—exposing only a band of country on the east to the amenities of a temperate level and a tolerably grateful soil. Three of the chief heights in the south have altitudes of 1,295, 1,446, and 1,501 feet; and three of the chief ones in the north have altitudes of 1,205, 1,216, and 1,429 feet.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ballycahill, Doon, and Toem; and the whole of the parishes of Glenkeen, Moyliff, Templebeg, and Upperchurch. The chief villages are Cappaghwhite and Borris-o'-leagh. Pop., in 1841, 20,859. Houses 3,065. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,714; in manufactures and trade, 421; in other pursuits, 190. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,456; who could read but not write, 1,794; who could neither read nor write, 3,846. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,427; who could read but not write, 2,697; who could neither read nor write, 4,873.

KILNAMANAGH, a parish in the barony of Ballaghkeen, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Oulart, co. Wexford, Leinster. The south or principal district is detached to the average distance of 1 mile from the north district by the intervention of Killincooly. Length of the south district, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,379 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches. Length of the north district, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,298 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 759; in 1841, 870. Houses 140. The surface of both districts consists of tolerably good land; and is traversed by the east road from Wexford to Gorey. The only mansion is Kilnamanagh-house.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £126 18s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £32 14s. Gross income, £159 12s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £148 17s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1813, by means of a donation of £46 3s. 1d. from Robert Doyne, Esq., and a gift of £563 1s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; attendance 130. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 261, and the Roman Catholics to 502; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 32 children; and a daily school was salaried with £8 from subscription and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and had on its books 17 boys and 29 girls.

KILNAMARTRY, or KILNEMARTERY, a parish in the barony of West Muskerry, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by west of Macroom, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 2; area, 11,680 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,604; in 1841, 2,782. Houses 435. The surface comprises a large portion of the prolonged river peninsula between the Sullane and the Lee; it is to a large extent upland, and has aggregately a poor soil; and it is traversed by the road from Macroom to Inchegeelagh. The principal seat is Raleigh.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £420; glebe, £30. Gross income, £450; nett, £357 13s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Dri-hane in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe; but is resident in Kilnamartry. The church was built in 1813, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 15. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and is united to the chapel of Ballyvourney. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 2,615; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £3 from subscription and £15 from the National Board—were usually attended by about 243 children.

KILNANARE. See KILLANEAR.

KILNANEAVE, or KILLANEAVE, a parish in the barony of Upper Ormond, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east by south of Nenagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,607 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,156; in 1841, 2,021. Houses 294. The surface of the southern district is all mountainous; and of the central and northern districts, principally good arable and pasture land. The chief summit in the south has an altitude of 1,218 feet. The Nenagh river, flowing principally on the boundary, and then across a narrow part of the centre, descends from an elevation of 953 to one of 490 feet; and while on the boundary, it forms some interesting cascades. The seats are Mount-Kennedy in the centre, and Millbrook and Monaquill in the north.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMORE [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £221 10s. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 600; and is united to the chapel of Templeberry. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 39, and the Roman Catholics to 2,186.

KILNASEAR. See CALLABEG.

KILNASOOLAGH, a parish on the west border of the barony of Lower Bunratty, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile west of Newmarket-on-Fergus, co. Clare, Munster. Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 3; area, 5,138 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches,—of which 33 acres, 33 perches are in Dromoland lake, and 7 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches are tideway in the Ardsolus river. Pop., in 1831, 1,319; in 1841, 1,158. Houses 162. The surface forms the east screen of the upper part of the Fergus estuary; and consists, in the aggregate, of good or even of rich and ornate land. The demesne of Dromoland in the north is extensive, profusely wooded, beautifully watered, and tastefully disposed; and it is presided over by the modern, castellated pile of Dromoland-castle, the magnificent residence of Sir Lucius O'Brien, Bart. Carrigovan, the seat of Charles Creagh, Esq., in the south-east, is also a pleasant feature. The only other noticeable residences are Shepherdfield and Joy-lodge. The principal antiquities are two old castles; though immediately beyond the parochial boundary, and at the back of Dromoland demesne, are some curious Druidical ovals or circles, brought into notice, in 1825, by T. Steele, Esq. The interior of the parish is traversed by the road from Limerick to Ennis.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £94 8s. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £20 5s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £188 16s. 1d.; and are appropriated to an ecclesiastical incumbent. The vicarages of Kilnasoolagh, DROMLINE and KILMALEERY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilnasoolagh. Pop., in 1831, 3,168. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 103, and the Roman Catholics to 1,311; the Protestants of the union to 114, and the Roman Catholics to 3,287; and three daily schools—one of which was supported by Lady O'Brien—had on their books 49 boys and 69 girls.

KILNATALOON. See KISNATALOON.

KILNAUGHTEN, a parish at the north-east extremity of the barony of Inaghtramon, and of co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the town of TAR-

BERT: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 9,164 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,371; in 1841, 5,102. Houses 802. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,415; in 1841, 4,078. Houses 625. Nearly every topographical feature and interesting object within the parish, excepting merely the town of Tarbert, may be noticed in the following words of Mr. Fraser: "About a mile from the town, on a bold headland, formed by the winding outlines of the Shannon, stands Tarbert-house, the seat of — Leslie, Esq., the proprietor of the town. From its elevated site and extensive plantations, it forms a conspicuous feature in the scenery, and a great relief to the bleakness around. From many parts of the demeane, fine views are obtained of the Shannon, its numerous islands, creeks, and sinuosities, and of the more prominent features along the opposite coast. Adjoining Tarbert demesne, on a small island, is a battery and revenue police-station. Beyond Tarbert, the aspect changes. The hills trend away southerly, and the country assumes an open and slightly undulating character, in which vast fields of bog prevail. The soil is generally poor, and still more poorly cultivated. * * Near Tarbert are Pymount and Leslie-lodge; and as we proceed to Ballylongford, we pass on the right, and within a short distance of that poor village, Sallowglen, Tho. Sandes, Esq., and the fine ruins of Lislaghtin abbey."—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LISTOWEL [which see], in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition, £89 3s. 1½d.; glebe, £1 4s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £178 6s. 3d., and are inappropriate in Thos. Stoughton, Esq. A curate for Kilnaughten and Murher has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built about the latter end of last century. Sittings 300; attendance 230. The Methodist chapel is attended by 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,800; and is united to the chapels of Murher and Aghavillin. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 562, and the Roman Catholics to 4,107; and 7 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and one with £4 from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 152 boys and 87 girls.

KILNEBOY, KILNABOY, or KILLINABOY, a parish in the barony of Inchiquin, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the town of CORROFIN: which see. Length and breadth, each 5½ miles; area, 17,967 acres, 32 perches,—of which 554 acres, 30 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,678; in 1841, 4,102. Houses 660. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,778; in 1841, 3,193. Houses 513. The surface of the northern and central districts is nearly all moorish, mountainous, or otherwise comparatively waste; and even that of the southern district, though much relieved with water, and partially embellished with wood, has aggregately a bleak appearance. The two chief heights are a hill on the southern boundary, and Glasgeivnagh hill on the northern boundary; and they have an altitude of respectively 629 and 698 feet above sea-level. Most of the water-area lies in part of Loughs Inchiquin and Atedaun on the southern boundary, and in part of Lough Cullaun on the eastern boundary. The hamlets are Killeheen, Glenroe, Ashfield, Aglish, Rinnamona, and Kilneboy. The seats are Elmvale, Ballycasheen, Drummoher, Cahirblonick, Inchiquin, Crossard, Kells, Springfield, Richmond, Rinroe, and Bawnkill. The principal antiquities are three cromlechs, two 'giants' graves,' one or two hill forts, the stump of a pillar-tower, and the ruins of three churches and three castles. The stump of the turrughan is about 10 feet high, and stands to the north-west of the old church of Kilneboy. The chief of the castles is that of INCHQUIN: which see.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £104 18s.; glebe, £4 10s. The rectories of Kilneboy, KILKEEDY, and INCHICRONANE, and the vicarages of DYSERT, RATH, and CLARE-ABBAY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilneboy. Length, 20 miles; breadth, 10. Pop., in 1831, exclusive of Clare-Abbey, 15,789. Gross income, £565 1s. 6½d.; nett, £508 3s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is also prebendary of Dysert. A perpetual curate has entire charge of Clare-Abbey; and two stipendiary curates for the other parishes of the union have salaries of respectively £100 and £78 9s. 2½d., with, in the latter case, the use of the glebe-house. Kilneboy church is situated in Corrofin, and was built about the commencement of the last century as a chapel-of-ease, by a son of Sir Donatius O'Brien; and, in 1826, it acquired extension and a steeple, by means of a loan of £369 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance, from 80 to 87. There are churches also in Clare-Abbey and Kilkeedy; and a private house is used as a church in Inchicronane. The Corrofin and Kilneboy Roman Catholic chapels are attended by respectively 600 and 400; and there are seven Roman Catholic chapels in the other parishes of the union. In 1834, the Protestants of Kilneboy parish amounted to 138, and the Roman Catholics to 3,817; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 189 boys and 120 girls. The Reports of the Commissioners of Public Instruction exhibit the parishes of Inagh and Ruan as attached to the benefice of Kilneboy; and, at the same time, exhibit Clare-Abbey as entirely detached. In 1834, the inhabitants of the union thus defined, consisted of 239 Churchmen, 68 Protestant dissenters, and 22,674 Roman Catholics; and 15 daily schools—11 of which were supported wholly by fees—had on their books 1,020 boys and 647 girls.

KILNEDDY, an ecclesiastical parish in the barony of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It forms part of the civil parish of Knocktopher. Pop., in 1831, 38.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KNOCKTOPHER [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. In 1834, all the inhabitants were Roman Catholics.

KILNEGARVAN. See KILGARVEY.

KILNEHUE, KILNAHUE, or LAMOGUE, a parish in the barony of Gorey, 3½ miles north-west by west of the town of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 15,360 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,393; in 1841, 3,596. Houses 588. Two townlands were transferred by the Act 6 and 7 William IV. from Scarewalsh to Gorey. Pop., in 1831, 521. The northern district is mountainous; and the central and southern districts have aggregately a poor and light soil, yet exhibit considerable embellishment of wood and culture. Mount Annagh, on the northern boundary, has an altitude of 1,498 feet; and the Bann river, rising on its south skirt, and flowing southward through the parish, descends from an elevation of 546 to one of 175 feet. The seats are Monaseed, Hollyfort, Mount-Nebo, Ballingurry, Kilnehue, Carrickbeg, Coobishal, and Glendoran. The principal hamlets are Monaseed and Hollyfort. The road from Gorey to Carnew passes westward through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Gorey, in the dio. of Ferns. See GOREY. Tithe composition, £465 16s. 9½d. The ecclesiastical parish is so reduced by the cession of the chief part of the civil parish to the perpetual curacy of Kilnehue, as to have had, in 1831, a pop.

of only 703; and, in 1834, its inhabitants consisted of 400 Churchmen and 317 Roman Catholics.

KILNEHUE, a quoad sacra parish in the barony of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 12,261 acres, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,746. It comprises parts of the quoad civilia parishes of Kilnehue and Kilcavan; and consists of mountainous ground, and of land whose soil is light and poor.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Gross income, £124 16s. 10d.; nett, £102 16s. 10d. Patron, the incumbent of Gorey. The church was built in 1813, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. KILNESOLAGH. See KILNASOOLAGH.

KILNOE, a parish in the barony of Upper Tulla, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by west of Scarriff, co. Clare, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 10,512 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches,—of which 319 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,314; in 1841, 3,482. Houses 574. The eastern and central districts are mountainous, moorish, and boggy; but the western district possesses many amenities, and is profusely wooded and watered. The chief heights are Knocknalecka on the east boundary, and Knockglass on the south-east border; and they have altitudes of respectively 818 and 541 feet. The principal water area is part of Lough Annilloon, St. Bridget, Derrymore, and Kilgory; the first and second lying respectively 133 and 115 feet above sea-level; and all, except the last, situated on the southern boundary. The seats are Ballinahinch, Derrymore, Kilgory, Coolreagh, and Cahirburly. The principal hamlets are Bodykee, Boherglass, and Cloonlooskaun. The road from Scarriff to Ennis passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILSEELY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £101 11s. Tithe composition, to the amount of £38, is appropriated to the prebend of Tomgrany. The rectorial tithes consist of a moiety of the whole, and are appropriated to an ecclesiastical incumbent. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000; and is united to the chapel of Tomgrany. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 3,545; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 125 boys and 117 girls.

KILO— See KILLO—

KILPATRICK, a parish 3 miles south-south-west of Crosshaven, and partly in the barony of Kerriurrihy, but chiefly in that of Kinnalea, co. Cork, Munster. Area of the Kerriurrihy section, 715 acres; of the Kinnalea section, 1,949. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,145; in 1841, 1,081. Houses 169. Pop. of the Kinnalea section, in 1831, 808; in 1841, 833. Houses 131. The surface forms part of the western seaboard of Outer Cork Harbour, in the immediate vicinity of Ringabella bay; and consists, for the most part, of tolerably good arable land. Within the limits are three mansions.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of TRACTON [which see], in the dio. of Cork. The tithes are compounded for £120; and are wholly impropriate in the Earl of Shannon. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 56, and the Roman Catholics to 1,120; and a hedge-school was attended in summer by about 40 children.

KILPATRICK, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Lower Kilnamanagh, 3 miles north-north-east of Tipperary, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 2,783 acres, 4 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,483; in 1841, 1,734. Houses 251. The surface consists of good land, and is traversed by the road from Tipperary to Templemore. The chief hamlet is Knockamcunne.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLINTEMPLE [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £148. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 1,504; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 105 boys and 61 girls.

KILPATRICK, a parish in the barony of Demifore, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Castle-Pollard, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,892 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 416; in 1841, 447. Houses 83. The surface consists of good land; and is traversed by the road from Mullingar to Oldcastle.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of RATHGRAFF [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The tithes are compounded for £110; and are wholly impropriate in the vicars choral of the Dublin cathedrals. Both the church and the Roman Catholic chapel are in ruins. In 1834, the parishioners, with one exception, were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 35 boys and 29 girls.

KILPATRICK, a parish in the barony of East Shelmalier, 4 miles north-north-west of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,739 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches. Pop., in 1831, 852; in 1841, 879. Houses 149. The south end rests on the north-west side of the upper part of Wexford Harbour; and the north-west corner is washed and bounded by the Slaney. The surface consists of fertile land; and is surpassingly rich in artificial decoration. All the south-east end, to the mean distance of about ¼ of a mile from the beach, is occupied by the opulently wooded and beautifully situated demesne of Saunders' Court, the property of the Earl of Arran; a large portion of the north-western district is occupied with the demesnes of Lonsdale, Moate-park, and Kyle,—the last the seat of William Harvey, Esq.; and the intermediate districts are extensively beautified with the mansions and villas of Garry-William, Sion-house, Broomley-cottage, Mount Annagh, and Villapark. The road from Wexford to Dublin passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ferns. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £84 11s., and the rectorial for £61 7s. 5d.; and the latter are impropriate in the Earl of Arran. The vicarages of Kilpatrick and Tickillen [see TICKILLEN], constitute the benefice of Kilpatrick. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 1,588. Gross income, £153 11s.; nett, £114 18s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated in Saunders' Court demesne, and was built upwards of a century ago. Sittings 100; attendance, about 75. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 800; and is united to the chapel of Ballymura in Kilmallogue. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 123, and the Roman Catholics to 782; the Protestants of the union to 197, and the Roman Catholics to 1,442; and a National School in Kyle was salaried with £20 a-year, and had on its books 5 boys and 42 girls.

KILPATRICK, a village in the parish of Brinny, barony of Kinnalmeaky, co. Cork, Munster. Pop., in 1831, 182; in 1841, not specially returned.

KILPATRICK, a parish in the barony of Carbery, 2½ miles south by east of Castle-Carbery, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 7,076 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,227; in 1841, 1,080. Houses 181. The whole of the surface is tame, most is dismal, and by far the greater part is bog. The Grand Canal bisects it into nearly equal portions. The seats are Kilpatrick and Drummond.—This parish lies among the southern members of the benefice of Castle-Carbery, in the dio. of Kildare; but does not seem to be recognised in the ecclesiastical divisions.

KILPATRICK, co. Meath. See CASTLETOWN-KILPATRICK.

KILPEACON, a parish in the baronies of Pobblebrien and Small County, 4½ miles south of Limerick, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1. Area of the Pobblebrien section, 182 acres; of the Small County section, 1,032 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 578; in 1841, 424. Houses 64. Pop. of the Small County section, in 1831, 509; in 1841, 326. Houses 50. The Ecclesiastical Authorities state the pop. in 1831, at 947.

The surface consists of good land, and is traversed by the road from Limerick to Bruff. The ancient demesne of Kilpeacon is the property of Edward Villiers, Esq. The Kilpeacon dispensary is within the Limerick Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, its receipts and expenditure amounted to respectively £274 6s. and £250.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £92 6s. 3d. The rectories of Kilpeacon and Hackmys, and the vicarage of KNOCKNEGAUL [see these articles], constitute the benefice and prebend of Kilpeacon. The rectory of Hackmys is a sinecure, and lies 13 miles distant from Kilpeacon. Gross income of the benefice, £482 15s. 9½d.; nett, £419 11s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Ulloe, in the dio. of Emly. The church is old; and was repaired and enlarged in 1819, by means of parochial assessment, and a loan of £369 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, about 60. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 32, and the Roman Catholics to 954; the Protestants of the union, exclusive of Hackmys, to 62, and the Roman Catholics to 2,357; and a daily school in the parish was aided with gratuities from the rector and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and had on its books 8 boys and 7 girls.

KILPEDDER, a hamlet in the parish of Kilcoole, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 72. Houses 11.

KILPHELAN, a parish in the barony of Condons and Clangibbon, 1¼ mile south-south-east of Mitchellstown, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 524 acres. Pop., in 1841, 201. Houses 26. This parish lies within the dio. of Cloyne, and figures in old authorities as a rectory; but does not seem to be now allowed a parochial status in the ecclesiastical divisions.

KILPIPE, a parish 8 miles west of Arklow, and partly in the barony of Gorey, co. Wexford, but chiefly in the barony of South Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 4½. Area of the Wexford section, 3,477 acres, 39 perches; of the Wicklow section, 12,153 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,368; in 1841, 3,400. Houses 551. Pop. of the Wicklow section, in 1831, 2,864; in 1841, 2,879. Houses 460. A large proportion of the surface is mountainous, and is variously waste and pastoral. Mount Annagh, on the southern boundary, has an altitude of 1,498 feet; and the lowest water-level in the north is about 140 feet. A district on the east border retains traces of old workings in search of gold. The Derry rivulet effects the chief drainage of the Wicklow section. The village of AUGHRIM [which see] stands on the northern boundary. The principal seats are Coolbawn, Coolalug, Tobberparrick, and Wingfield. The road from Carnew to Rathdrum passes through the interior.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes belonging to the impropriate curate are compounded for £147 13s. 10d., and the rectorial tithes for £230 15s. 4½d.; and the latter are impropriate in Sir Richard Steele, Bart. The impropriate curacies of Kilpipe and Killinor [see KILLINOR], constitute the benefice of Kilpipe. Length, 11 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 4,703. Gross income, £220 1s. 6½d.; nett, £201 6s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. A stipendiary curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1765, principally by parochial assessment. Sittings 250; attendance 150. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Killinor. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 639, and the Roman Catholics to 2,445; the Protestants of the union to 687, and the Roman Catholics to 3,744; and 2 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £20 from the Board of Erasmus Smith—had on their books 85 boys and 63 girls.

KILPOOLE, a parish on the coast of the barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It contains, on its north border, the greater part of the town of WICKLOW: which see. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,028 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,269; in 1841, 2,977. Houses 463. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 720. Houses 115. The surface possesses little of the interest which is so generally diffused through the county, yet it contains vantage-grounds, whence exquisite views are obtained of the coast and seaboard. The highest ground is in the north-west, and has an altitude of 614 feet; and another principal height is situated on the coast adjacent to Bride's Head, and has an altitude of 268 feet. The principal headland is Wicklow Head, near the middle of the coast line, and bears aloft three lighthouses; and the other headlands are Bride's Head and Seapark Point. An impending sea-cliff, a little east of Wicklow, carries vestiges of Black-castle, which is said to have been built in the 14th century. Ruins exist of two churches. The only noticeable country residence is Kilpoole-house.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Wicklow, in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £60; and the latter are inappropriate in Earl Fitzwilliam. The church is within the parish of Drunkney. The Quakers' meeting-house is attended by about 25; and the Methodist meeting-house by from 50 to 60. The Wicklow Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,200. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 552 Churchmen, 28 Protestant dissenters, and 2,075 Roman Catholic; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 62 boys and 56 girls.

KILQUADE, a Roman Catholic parish in the barony of Newcastle, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It lies within the dio. of Dublin; and has chapels at Kilquade, Newtown, and Kilmurry. Kilquade proper is on the southern border of the civil parish of Kilcoole; and Kilquade-house is the seat of John T. O'Reilly, Esq.

KILQUANE, a parish on the south border of the barony of Lower Bunratty, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the village of ARDNACRUSHA [which see]; lies 2 miles north of the city of Limerick; and is politically called North St. Patrick's, and treated as part of the parish of St. Patrick's of Limerick. See LIMERICK. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,894 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches,—of which 84 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches are in the Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 2,028; in 1841, 2,081. Houses 314. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,945. Houses 297. The surface is bounded for $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile by the Shannon; is traversed through nearly the middle by the road from Limerick to Broadford; and consists variously of inferior and of very good land. The seats are Maryview, Bellevue, Queen's-borough, Springhill, Ballyglass, Annegrove, Fairy-hill, Parteen, Whitehall, and Quinville. The chief antiquities are the ruins of Kilquane church and Druman-castle.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Gross income, £100 16s. 11d.; nett, £87. Patron, the incumbent of St. Patrick's. The church was built in 1819, by means of a gift of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitzings 120; attendance, about 80. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of between 300 and 400; and is united to the chapel of St. Munchin. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 102 Churchmen, 8 Presbyterians, and 2,067 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 150 children; and two daily schools—the one of which was salaried with £18 from the National Board, and the other with £10 from the rector of St. Patrick's—had on their books 49 boys and 46 girls.

KILQUANE, a parish in the barony of Longford, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,858 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,674; in 1841, 1,930. Houses 326. The land is aggregately of second-rate quality. The highest ground overhangs the road from Banagher to Loughrea, and has an altitude of 309 feet. The rivulet Ardultagh effects the chief drainage. The seats are Raheen and Quainsborough. The principal hamlets are Moortfield, Peak, Derrew, Old-street, and Kilquane.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DONANAUGHTA [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Vicarial tithe composition, £41 10s. 9½d.; glebe, £3 3s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £71 1s. 6½d., and are appropriated to the bishop, the dean, and the prebendary of Kilquane. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300; and is united to the chapel of Fahy. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 1,673; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 118 boys and 75 girls.

KILQUANE, a parish in the barony of Corkaguiney, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Dingle, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 9,709 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,674; in 1841, 1,760. Houses 299. The Ecclesiastical Authorities state the pop. in 1831 at 1,982. The surface is part of the north side of the Corkaguiney peninsula; and is bounded by Smerwick Harbour on the west, and the stupendous mountain-mass of Brandon on the east. See SMERWICK and BRANDON. The chief features on the coast are the creek and promontory of Ballydavid. Almost the whole of the interior is mountainous.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardfer and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £102 15s. 4½d.; glebe, £8. Gross income, £110 15s. 4½d.; nett, £104 11s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kildimo, in the dio. of Limerick; and is non-resident in Kilquane. There is no church; and a curate performs the occasional duties for a salary of £10. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 55 boys and 20 girls.

KILQUANE, co. Cork. See KILCOAN.

KILRAGHTIS, a parish in the barony of Upper Bunratty, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Ennis, co. Clare, Munster. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,587 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches,—of which 113 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,866; in 1841, 1,995. Houses 297. A large portion of the northern district is waste or very poor land; but the remainder of the surface is for the most part fertile. The seats are Roselawn, Tooreen, Chipfield, Cappagh, Cahireeny, Ashgrove, and Ballyline. The principal hamlet is Spence-Hill. The mail-road from Ennis to Galway passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory and a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarage forms part of the benefice of DROMCLIFFE; and the rectory forms part of the benefice of OGASHIN: see these articles. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £51 4s. 7½d.; and the rectorial for £46 3s. 1d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 650. In 1834, the parishioners, with two recto-tions, were all Roman Catholics; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 149 boys and 81 girls.

KILRAGHTS, co. Antrim. See KILBAUGHTS.

KILRAINY. See KILRENNY.

KILRANE, a parish on the east coast of the barony of Forth, 2 miles north-east of Broadway, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 2,047 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches. Pop., in 1831, 714; in 1841, 720. Houses 95. The extremes are washed by the sea; but the central district is pushed away from the coast by the intervention of St. Helen's. The seats are Hilltown and Ballytreat. The church is in ruins.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TACUMSHANE [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Vicarial tithe composition, £57 7s. 8d.; glebe, £14 11s. 4½d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £120; and are appropriated to the prebend of Kilrane. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and is united to the chapel of Rosslare. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 19, and the Roman Catholics to 697; and a pay daily school had on its books 19 boys and 8 girls.

KILRANELAGH, a parish in the barony of Upper Talbotstown, 3 miles east of Baltinglass, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 2½; area, 4,470 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,831; in 1841, 1,800. Houses 275. A large proportion of the surface is mountain, moor, and marsh; and the average value of the arable land is about 40s. per plantation acre. The highest ground in the interior has an altitude of 1,252 feet; and Mount Keadeen, on the north-east boundary, has an altitude of 2,143 feet. The seats are Fort-Granite, Ballinrone, and Kilranelagh,—the last the seat of the Rev. T. F. Green.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £193 16s. 11d. The rectory of Kilranelagh and the vicarage of KILTEGAN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilranelagh. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 5,646. Gross income, £407 18s. 5d.; nett, £333 10s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is in Kiltogan. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600; and is united to the chapels of Rathvilly and Tinnock. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 224, and the Roman Catholics to 1,378; the Protestants of the union to 890, and the Roman Catholics to 4,919; 4 daily schools in the parish—2 of which were variously aided by the National Board, 1 by the rector, and 1 by the Board of Erasmus Smith—had on their books 139 boys and 72 girls; and 11 daily schools in the union had on their books 358 boys and 290 girls.

KILRAUGHTS—pronounced Kilrats—a parish in the barony of Upper Dunluce, 4 miles east by south of Ballymoney, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 5,132 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches,—of which 5 acres, 24 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,837; in 1841, 1,542. Houses 260. The land has for the most part a light soil; yet produces excellent crops of flax, oats, potatoes, and clover. The road from Ballymoney to Broughshane passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RASHARKIN [which see], in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £150. Three Presbyterian meeting-houses have an attendance of respectively 750, 275, and 400. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 40 Churchmen, 1,578 Presbyterians, and 277 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 90 children; and 3 daily schools—one of which was aided with £2 a-year from the rector—had on their books 89 boys and 23 girls.

barony of Kells, 3 miles north-west of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 1,947 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 652;* in 1841, 720. Houses 114. The surface is fertile and ornate; and is traversed by the road from Dublin to Carrick-on-Suir. The seats are Kilree and Chapel-Izod,—the latter the residence of Wm. Izod, Esq. The chief hamlet, Danganbeg, stands on the south border. Kilree proper is situated on the north border, and appears to have been very anciently a seat of population. A pillar-tower here is one of the finest in Ireland; consists of exquisitely fine masonry; and though deprived of its roof or conical cap, and inhumed to some height by an accumulation of soil around its base, still measures little less than one hundred feet from the ground to the summit. The door, in consequence of the accumulation of soil, is now not more than 5½ feet from the ground; the interior contains brackets and rests, which seem evidently to have served as supporters of floors; and a crossbeam near the top has been treated as evidence that the tower was, at no very remote date, used as a belfry. A ruined monastic church adjacent contains a marble monument to the memory of Richard Comerford, Lord of Danganmore, who died in 1622, and was father-in-law to the 19th Earl of Desmond. The abbey to which the church belonged, was founded about the year 1176, by Geoffrey Fitz-Robert de Marisco, seneschal of Ireland, and brother-in-law of Earl Strongbow; and was dedicated to some one of the Saints Gobban, who figure in Irish hagiology. Close to the round tower is a very curious and very ancient stone-cross, about 8 feet high, formed from a single block of sandstone, and ornamented on the centre and extremities with orbicular figures or rings. A stoutly disputed tradition asserts that this cross is monumental of Neill Callan, monarch of Ireland, and that he was drowned in the stream since called the King's river.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KELLS [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £130 4s. 7½d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 48, and the Roman Catholics to 565.

KILREE, a parish on the east border of co. Londonderry, and partly in the barony of Coleraine, but chiefly in that of Loughinsholin, Ulster. The Loughinsholin section contains the town of KILREE: see next article. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, from 1 to 2½ miles. Area of the Coleraine section, 1,061 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches,—of which 27 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches are in the river Bann. Area of the Loughinsholin section, 5,252 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches,—of which 110½ acres are in the river Bann. Pop., in 1831, 4,262; in 1841, 4,277. Houses 721. Pop. of the Coleraine section, in 1831, 612; in 1841, 622. Houses 113. Pop. of the rural districts of the Loughinsholin section, in 1831, 2,435; in 1841, 2,414. Houses 413. The surface extends along the Bann; and contains some poor land and much bog; but consists for the most part of good arable land, partly light yet fertile, and partly strong and not a little fructiferous. Mr. Fraser, speaking jointly of the town and parish, says, "We proceed along the flat boggy tract, skirting the western side of the Bann to Kilree, which forms part of the large estates belonging to the Mercers' Company of London, who, we are glad to see, have commenced its improvement. As the leases expire, it is the intention of this Company to carry on extensive improvements in the town, and in the large tract of dreary, wild, and uncultivated country around. From what has already been done, much may be expected." The road from Maghera to Ballymena crosses the parish at the town; and a road passes down the banks of the Bann from the towns on the western shores of Lough Neagh to Coleraine.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £258 17s. 9d.; glebe, £341 2s. 3d. Gross income, £600; nett, £536 12s. 6½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is of unknown date. Sittings 150; attendance 120. Two Presbyterian places of worship have an attendance of respectively 120, and from 300 to 400. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 773 Churchmen, 1,583 Presbyterians, and 2,078 Roman Catholics; and 11 daily schools—4 of which were variously salaried by the London Hibernian Society, 2 by the Board of Erasmus Smith and by the Mercers' Company, and 2 by the Mercers' Company and subscription—had on their books 397 boys and 288 girls.

KILREE, a post and market town in the above parish, stands at the intersection of the road from Portglenone to Coleraine, with that from Maghera to Ballymena, 8 miles north by west of Portglenone, 7½ north-north-east of Maghera, and 103½ north by west of Dublin. It presents an improving appearance, and possesses a prosperous character. The Mercers' Company, to whom it belongs, have built in it an agent's house, a public school, a police barrack, a hotel, and a market-house; and they seem to be wisely as well as strongly studious to promote its well-being. Some new lines of road, recently formed to connect the two sides of the basin of the Lower Bann, have greatly facilitated intercourse, and materially increased local business. The principal trade of the town consists of the weaving of linen, the sale of agricultural produce, and the conveyance of goods along the Bann. Fairs are held on Jan. 2, March 20, April 22, June 8, July 1, Aug. 19, Oct. 10, and Nov. 10. A public car runs three times a-week to Belfast. Area of the town, 25 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,215; in 1841, 1,191. Houses 195. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 54; in manufactures and trade, 153; in other pursuits, 30. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 13; on the directing of labour, 144; on their own manual labour, 74; on means not specified, 5.

KILRENNY, or KILRAINNY, a parish at the north-west extremity of the barony of Carbery, and of co. Kildare, 3½ miles north-north-west of Castle-Carbery, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,617 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, 608; in 1841, 638. Houses 105. The land averages in annual value 27s. per plantation acre. The seats are Kilrenny and Kilglass. The Dublin and Galway mail-road crosses the north corner.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kildare. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £15; nett, £13 18s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £30; and are inappropriate in the heirs of the late Lady Jane Loftus. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 33, and the Roman Catholics to 600; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILRICKILL, or KILREEKILL, a parish, 4½ miles east-north-east of Loughrea, and formerly in the baronies of Loughrea and Athenry, but now on the west border of the barony of Leitrim, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 5,947 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,003; in 1841, 1,737. Houses 283. The surface consists in general of good arable and pasture land; forms part of a low tableau; has an altitude in the vicinity of Kilrickill hamlet of 321 feet; and is traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Galway. The seats are Dartfield, Cooleeny, and Newgrove; the hamlets are Kilrickill, Newtown, and Glennaskeahy; and the only other noticeable artificial object is the ruined mansion of Wallscourt. "St. Patrick," says the romancing Archdall, "built Kilrichelle for his sister Saint Richella."—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LOUGHREA [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £20, and the rectorial for £82 10s.; and the latter are appropriated to the dean of Clonfert and the prebendaries of Droughta and Ballynoulter. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 750; and is united to the chapel of Killalaghton. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 1,990.

KILRIEDOON. See KILLADOON.

KILROAN, a parish in the baronies of Kinsale and Courceys, 3½ miles south of the town of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. Area of the Kinsale section, 245 acres; of the Courceys section, 805 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 641; in 1841, 731. Houses 124. Pop. of the Courceys section, in 1831, 451; in 1841, 572. Houses 94. The surface forms part of the western seaboard of Kinsale Harbour.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory in the dio. of Cork. The impropiators are the vicars choral of Cork cathedral; and the incumbent of the adjacent parish of Ringrove acts as a curate. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 18, and the Roman Catholics to 685; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILROGUE, a hamlet in the parish of Lacklagh, barony of Clare, co. Galway, Connaught. Pop., in 1831, 48. Houses 7.

KILRONAN, a parish, 8 miles north by west of Carrick-on-Shannon, and forming the northern extremity of the barony of Boyle, and of co. Roscommon, Connaught. It contains the villages of KILDUE and BALLYFARNON: see these articles. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 16,356 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches,—of which 1,315 acres, 9 perches are part of Lough Allen, 313 acres, 3 roods, 14 perches are in Lough Meelagh, 38 acres, 27 perches are in the river Shannon, and 14 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches are in Lough Culbalkeen. Pop., in 1831, 6,940; in 1841, 7,085. Houses 1,211. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 6,622. Houses 1,133. The principal rural features will be found noticed under the words ARIGNA, CASTLE-TENISON, MEELAGH, and ALLEN: which see. The chief residences, additional to Castle-Tenison, are Alderford, Lough Allen-cottage, and Knockrone-house. About one-fourth of the parochial surface is waste mountain; and the remainder is aggregately good arable and pasture land. The average annual value of the best land is from 20s. to 30s. per acre. The highest ground is on the west border, and has an altitude of 1,098 feet. Much of the upland district is interesting nearly as much to the painter as to the miner; but will be noticed in its scenic character in our article on Lough Meelagh. The hamlet of Kilronan consists of a sprinkling of cabins, partly on the highway and partly toward the mountains, and inhabited by the dingy miners in the neighbouring collieries. The cemetery around the old church of Kilronan at the hamlet, is a favourite and crowded burying-place of the peasantry, and possesses celebrity as the resting place of the ashes of Carolin, the well-known poser of music, and one of the last of the veritable Irish bards. Carolin died at Alderford, an old man, in 1741; and is said to have had the most splendid "wake" which was ever held in the district; and his skull, which "had once been the seat of so much verse and music," was, for several years, placed in a niche of the old church, decorated, not with laurel, but with a black ribbon. The ruins of the church possess some interest for the antiquary. "A Saxon portal in tolerable preservation," says Mr. Weld, "leads into the church on the side next to the lake, the ornaments of which are different from any that I can call to recollection. They consist in the representation of cylinders of about 4 or 5 inches in diameter, placed in pairs, the first pair standing horizontally side by side, with the ends toward the front of the building; the next pair transversely with the ends facing the interior of the archway; and so in alternation the whole way round: the effect is more pleasing than from any of the zigzag ornaments." In addition to the coal and metal mining operations in the parish, considerable employment exists in the manufacture of sandstone and limestone flags for tombstones. The road from Leitrim to Sligo passes through the interior; and the eastern district commands the commencement of the Shannon navigation.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £130; glebe, £45. Gross income, £175; nett, £138 12s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £130; and are inappropriate in William Mulloy, Esq. The church was built in 1788, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance 70. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 700 and 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 211, and the Roman Catholics to 7,134; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 30 children; and 6 daily schools—one of which was supported by Miss Tenison, one salaried with £8 from the National Board, and one salaried with £10 from the London Hibernian Society, £8 from the Ardagh Diocesan Society, and advantages worth £4 from Colonel Tenison—had on their books 286 boys and 208 girls.

KILRONAN, a parish in the barony of Glengahiry, co. Waterford, 3½ miles south-west by south of Clonmel, Munster. Length, 6¼ miles; breadth, from 1 to 4¼; area, 16,701 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches,—of which 46 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches are in the river Suir. Pop., in 1831, 3,914; in 1841, 4,772. Houses 678. The Suir describes much of the western boundary, and forms the separation-line from co. Tipperary; the Nier runs westward through the interior, cutting the parish into two not very unequal parts; and the Russeltown rivulet flows westward in the north, partly on the boundary, and partly within the border. The vales of the Suir and the Nier are ornate; but nearly all the rest of the surface is bleak; a large proportion is mountainous; and most has a middle-rate character as land. The principal heights respectively south and north of the Nier have an altitude, the former of 864, and the latter of 1,071 feet. Hornblende and sienite rocks abound; and copper mines exist about a mile south of the Nier. The seats are Kilonan, Kilmanaghan, Ballymakee, Farmhill, and Glenabbey. The mountain road from Clonmel to Youghal passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £190; glebe, £5 10s. 9d. Gross income, £195 10s. 9d.; nett, £185 3s. 3d. Patron, the Duke of Devonshire. The incumbent is also a vicar choral of Lismore. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £221 10s. 4d.; and are inappropriate in the patron. There is no church; and a curate performs the occasional duties for a salary of £10. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,450; and is united to the chapel of Newcastle. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 3,967; and 4 daily schools—one of which was aided with £5 a-year from Lady Osborne—had on their books 194 boys and 92 girls, and were attended by about 70 other children.

KILRONAN, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 3¼ miles south-west of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, ¼; area, 546 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches. Pop., in 1831, 112; in 1841, 126. Houses 16. One-third of the land is good, one-third light, and one-third rocky and wet. The road from Waterford to Stradbally and Bonmahon passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILLURE [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. Tithe composition, £35; glebe, £23 1s. 6½d. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILROOT, a parish on the coast of the barony of Lower Belfast, 2½ miles north-east by east of Carrickfergus, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,418 acres, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 536; in 1841, 735. Houses 109. The surface comes down from the basaltic uplands a little east of Lough Mourne, to the margin of Belfast Lough, midway between White Head and Carrickfergus. The southern district is profusely wooded, and adorned with the demesnes of Kilroot, Castle-Dobbs, and Bellahill; the second the seat of R. Dobbs, Esq.; and the third the seat of M. Dalway, Esq. The arable lands are fructiferous in cereal crops, and highly productive in meadow and artificial grasses. The road from Belfast to Larne passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLINURE [which see], in the dio. of Connor. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £50 6s. 7d.; and the rectorial tithes belong to the Marquis of Donegal, but are not collected. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 29 Churchmen, 475 Presbyterians, and 57 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 24 children; and 2 daily schools—the one of which was salaried with £4 4s. from Mrs. Dobbs, and the other with £8 from the National Board—had on their books 30 boys and 28 girls.

KILRORAN. See KILLARARAN.

KILROSS, a parish in the barony of Tiraghrill, 2½ miles east by north of Coloony, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 3,932 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches,—of which 79 acres, 15 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,669; in 1841, 1,633. Houses 281. The northern district is mountainous, moorish, and waste; the central district is adorned with the park and woods of Castle-Dargan; and the western border possesses many amenities and a large aggregate of wood. The highest ground, Slieve-Dacane, is situated on the northern border, and has an altitude of 900 feet. Most of the water area is in part of the sylvan Lough Ballylawley on the west border, and the whole of Lough Dargan at the north-east corner of Castle-Dargan demesne. The seats, additional to Castle-Dargan, are Union-lodge, Tullymore-house, and Markree-castle; and are all situated on the western border. The chief part of Markree demesne, however, is within the parishes of Ballysadere and Drumcollumb. An establishment at Kilross or Kilruisse for Premonstratensian canons, was founded by Clarus MacMoylin O'Moillehonry, archdeacon of Elphin, who died in 1251. The road from Sligo to Keadue passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BOYLE [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £41 10s. 9½d., and the rectorial for £41; and the latter are impropriate in Mr. Baker. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 350; and is united to the chapel of Ballinakill. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 345, and the Roman Catholics to 1,408; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £12 from the Baptist Society, and one with £3 from subscription, and 1s. for each child from the Diocesan Society—had on their books 107 boys and 80 girls.

KILROSSANTY, a parish in the barony of Decies-without-Drum, 3¼ miles west-south-west of Kilmaethomas, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, from north to south, 7 miles; breadth, 4; area, 17,416 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,019; in 1841, 3,615. Houses 501. The principal hamlet, Glendaligan, had, in 1831, a pop. of 178. The whole of the northern district of the parish, and part of the western district, are portions of the Monavoulagh or Cummeragh mountains; and even the other districts, notwithstanding a considerable aggregate of sylvan and demesne ground, are aggregately chilly in appearance and averagely poor in character. The two principal summits in the north have altitudes of 2,180 and 2,387; and the two principal on the west have altitudes of 1,321 and 1,952 feet; but the loftiest of these grounds is the monarch-summit, Seafin, on the north-west boundary. The rivulet Tay in the interior of the north, and the rivulet Mahon on the north of the eastern boundary, descend from elevations of respectively 1,152 feet, and 2,031 feet. The chief seats are Tinnasaggart, Cummeragh-lodge, Cummeragh-house, Tay-lodge, Mount-Kennedy, and Annescourt. The mail-road from Waterford to Cork passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £200; glebe, £17 16s. Gross income, £217 16s.; nett, £199 1s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £400; and are appropriated to the prebend of Kilrossanty. The church was built in 1808, by mean of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and of a donation of unknown amount from John Palliser, Esq. Sittings 90; attendance 65. A meeting-house of the Irish Evangelical Society has an attendance of from 35 to 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 700 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Fewes. A private Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 10. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 100, and the Roman Catholics to 3,070; and 4 daily schools—2 of which received some aid from respectively Col. Palliser, and P. C. Barron, Esq.—had on their books 188 boys and 112 girls. In 1840, two National schools, the one for males and the other for females, were salaried with each £8, and attended by respectively 93 boys and 80 girls.

KILROWEN. See KILLOWEN, co. Cork.

KILRUANE, a parish in the baronies of Lower and Upper Ormond, 3¼ miles north-east of Nenagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, from north to south, 3 miles; breadth, 2¼; but these measurements are exclusive of detached districts. Area of the Lower Ormond section, 1,029 acres, 3 roods, 2 perches,—of which 78 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches form a detached district. Area of the Upper Ormond section, 2,881 acres, 18 perches,—of which 478 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches lie detached about a mile to the northeast. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,384; in 1841, 1,444. Houses 240. Pop. of the Upper Ormond section, in 1831, 1,090; in 1841, 1,111. Houses 187. The surface consists in general of very good land; and is traversed by the road from Birr to Limerick. The seats are Rapla, South-hill, Clermont, and Bothurles.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition and gross income, £198 17s. 3d.; nett, £147 4s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1822, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 170; attendance, from 40 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Arderony and Moderen. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 82, and the Roman Catholics to 1,338; and a pay daily school had on its books 33 boys and 14 girls.

KILRUDDERY, the interesting demesne and magnificent mansion of the Earl of Meath, in the parish of Bray, 1¼ mile south of the town of Bray, barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. "The grounds of the demesne," says the author of the Guide to the County of Wicklow, "are laid out in an old-fashioned formal style of Dutch pleasure-grounds, and are, in this country, quite unique. Amongst the shrubberies are some of the finest evergreens in Ireland. In one place is a circular pond, enclosed by a hedge of beech, nearly 20 feet in height. The pleasure-grounds higher up the hill are disposed in a uniform manner; from different centres broad green walks diverge, as radii of a circle, enclosed by close beechen hedges, at the end of which run long straight terraces, carpeted with smooth and soft green moss. Here the arbutus is seen of an enormous size, and indeed every tree in the demesne appears to wanton in the luxuriance of its situation, for all have outstripped the usual limits of their specific growth. The old mansion of Kilruddery, becoming unfit for the residence of a nobleman of taste and fortune, was removed in the year 1829, and the present splendid building commenced upon the same site. This beautiful and singular structure is after the design of an eminent artist, William Morrison, Esq., to whose ingenuity and taste Shelton Abbey, in this county, will bear a lasting and enviable testimony. Kilruddery-house represents the style of architecture of the latter end of Henry's and beginning of Elizabeth's reign, that style which superseded the florid Gothic, and is now called the old English: many specimens are to be seen in England, but not a single instance in this country. The exterior here is richly decorated with ornamental carving: bower windows are surmounted by open-work balustrades, the summits of each pier being ornamented with armorial bearings. The entrance is beneath an octagonal tower, crowned with a cupola, rising in the centre of the north front. Ascending, then, a broad flight of steps, the great hall is entered. This splendid apartment, which rises to the height of the building, is an admirable specimen of the ancient baronial hall, the scene of noble-minded hospitality and grandeur, where minstrels

'Paur'd to lord and lady gay
The unpremeditated lay.'

The walls are wainscotted with oak, to about one-third of their height, at which level a Gothic cornice and frieze, filled with armorial bearings, run round the chamber. Above this the light is admitted, on one side, by a row of lofty windows, glazed with stained glass. An open arcade is continued round the remaining sides; the arches of which corresponding with the windows, preserve continuity and uniformity. The ceiling is supported by carved oak-beams, resting on open-work brackets, springing from goss-hawks, the family crest, carved in dark oak. The grand staircase opens from the hall, and is richly and beautifully decorated. The reception-rooms, which are in suite, open on the great hall; they consist of a morning-parlour, dining-room, library, and great drawing-room: the last-mentioned apartment, which is 44 feet in length, is subdivided by two screens of porphyritic columns, supporting a rich entablature. There is, besides, a small drawing-room, with a singularly beautiful pendant ceiling; this elegant apartment terminates the suite, and opens into an extensive conservatory, filled with the choicest plants."

KILRUSH, a parish, containing a town of the same name, on the south coast of the barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. Length, from east to west, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 4; area, 15,658 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches,—of which 77 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 9,732; in 1841, 11,385. Houses 1,574. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,736; in 1841, 6,314. Houses 910. The bay of Poulmasherry forms part of the western boundary; and the estuary of the Shannon bounds the whole of the south. The coast upon the Shannon trends west-north-westward, and, if measured in a straight line, extends $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; but it is constantly sinuous, and is indented about the middle by Kilrush Harbour. The parochial surface is low, comparatively flat, extensively boggy, and almost everywhere destitute of wood; yet it comprises much good land, and so blends in the general landscape with interesting objects in the vicinity as to be free from insipidity. The highest ground in the interior has an altitude of 100 feet; and the highest ground on the northern boundary has an altitude of 252 feet. The principal country residences are Kilrush-house, Broomhill-house, Fort-house, Bellevue-house, and Monmore-cottage. Most of the water area lies in Loughs Monmore and Knockerry. INNISCATTERY [which see], lies in the Shannon opposite the town; and HOG ISLAND [which also see], lies between the town and Inniscattery. Scarcely a townland is destitute of convenient turbary; and the north-west district is largely occupied with a chief section of the great and singularly useful bog of Monmore. Geological improvement has been extensively performed to the amount of burning exhausted bogs, and converting them into excellent tillage-grounds for oats and potatoes; and though it has too commonly proceeded no further, it might in every case be facily conducted to all the amount achievable by means of a plentiful supply of seaweed, sea-shells, lime, sand, earth, and marl. Some handsome plantations of comparatively recent date on the demesne of Kilrush-house, are the principal woods; and even these have been reared in defiance of a stupid popular conviction that the vicinity of the ocean is inimical to arboriculture. Modern experiments have proved that such trees as ash, oak, birch, elm, alder, and Scottish fir, thrive well; and the abundant dendritic contents of the bogs demonstrate that the whole district must at one time have been a forest. The bog timber consists partly of yew, but chiefly of fir and oak; and is often found so undecayed and of such large size as to serve for roofing houses. One fir-tree, dug up a number of years ago, measured 38 inches in diameter at the thickest end, and 31 inches in diameter at the height of 68 feet; and was sold for £14 19s. 6d. "The manner of finding these trees," says the Rev. John Graham, "is remarkably curious. Early in the morning, before the dew evaporates, a man with a long, small, sharp spear, called in Irish, tharagher or bog-auger, goes into the bog; and, as the dew never lies on the part over the trees, he can ascertain their position and length; and easily find whether they are sound or rotten: if sound, he marks with a spade the spot where they lie, and at his leisure proceeds to extricate them from their bed, which is undoubtedly a laborious, and oftentimes a very difficult process." A chalybeate well at Monmore was, a number of years ago, frequented every summer by multitudes of invalids. Several brickfields were, many years ago, in operation on the townland of Monmore; and valuable clays for bricks and potteries occur not only there, but in other localities. Quarries of excellent grit flags exist at Knockerry and Tullagower; the great grit stone quarry of Crag impends over the town; and deep beds of excellent building sand are found, both round the hill of Crag quarry, and in digging for the foundation of almost every new house.

Kilrush parish is a rectory, and a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. The rectory forms a sinecure and separate benefice, and the corps of the prebend of Inniscattery. Tithe composition and gross income, £240; nett, £228. Patron, the Marquis of Thomond. The vicarage, jointly with the vicarages of KILFIERAGH, KILBALLYHONE, and MOYARTA [see these articles], constitutes the benefice of Kilrush. Vicarial tithe composition, £152 6s. 2d.; glebe, £13. Length of the benefice, from east to west, 20 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 27,107. Gross income, £506 9s. 1½d.; nett, £432 9s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent also holds the sinecure rectory of Kilrush. Two curates, the one for the parish of Kilrush, and the other for the rest of the benefice, have each a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. Kilrush church was built in 1819, by means of £1,384 12s. 9½d. borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £193 16s. 11½d. raised by the sale of pews. Sittings 400; attendance 200. There is a church also in Kiltieragh. Two Roman Catholic chapels in Kilrush have an attendance of respectively 1,450, and from 500 to 600. There are 5 Roman Catholic chapels in the other parts of the union. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 798, and the Roman Catholics to 9,445; the Protestants of the union to 1,045, and the Roman Catholics to 27,857; and 7 daily schools in the parish and union—one of which was salaried with £30 from the board of Erasmus Smith, one with £7 from the Protestant clergyman, and £12 from the Roman Catholic clergyman—had on their books 492 boys and 139 girls.

KILRUSH,

A post, market, and sea-port town, in the parish of Kilrush, barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It stands at the head of the creek or harbour of Kilrush, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-east of Inniscattery, 8 miles east-south-east of Kilkee, 15 west by south of Kildysert, 27 south-west of Ennis, and $138\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of Dublin.

Environs.—The principal features of interest in the environs are the estuary of the Shannon in front of the town, and the mansion of Kilrush immediately to the east of the town, and between the roads to Knock and Kilmurry-Clonderalaw. The demesne around the mansion is $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile in length, extends from the town to the eastern boundary of the parish, and is the property of C. M. Vandeleur, Esq., the town's proprietor. The mansion is a handsome, commodious, and modern edifice, "standing on an interesting spot, which commands a view of Manger-ton and MacGillicuddy's Reeks at Killarney, Brandon Mountain, Kerry Head, and the mouth of the river Shannon. The inner area of this rich prospect is ornamented by a view of one of the finest harbours in Europe, Balebar, Kilredan-Point, Rehyhill, Carrigaholt, and Carrigafoyle castles, with the round tower, cathedral, and ruined churches, in the celebrated island of St. Senanus, now called Inniscattery. The view of the town and harbour is truly delightful at sunset on a summer evening, when Scattery road is crowded with shipping, and upwards of 200 herring-boats issue together from the neighbouring creeks, gliding over the glassy surface of the Shannon, to take their station for the night's fishing."

The Town.—The principal parts of the town are a spacious central square, and two spacious streets running parallel with each other, and on a line with respectively the north and the south sides of the square; and these parts are in a chief degree modern, and contain many good houses. The portion of the southern street, in particular, which extends from the square to the quays, is airy, well-built, and comparatively respectable; the square itself has a lively and cheerful appearance during the bustle of the weekly markets; and the vicinity of the quays exhibits large stores and pretending new edifices. The market-house, in the centre of the square, is a handsome structure, built at the private expense of Mr. Vandeleur. The custom-house, near the lower quay, is a neat modern building. The bridewell, situated near the upper quay, is the largest building of its class in the county; contains keepers' apartments, 8 cells, 2 day-rooms, and 2 yards; and is maintained in a clean and orderly condition. The places of worship, and the schools, have been sufficiently noticed in the article on the parish.

The Harbour.—The creek or natural harbour of Kilrush, is dry at low water; admits only small craft even with the tide; and is provided with two small quays and a patent slip. The pier, which affords accommodation to larger sailing-craft and to steam-vessels, extends toward Hog Island from the upper side of the entrance of the creek. This pier was originally built by the Commissioners of Customs; and was subsequently transferred to the Commissioners of Fisheries; but practically became the private property of Mr. Vandeleur, or passed under his care for conservation. In 1825, in order to obviate the disadvantage of fishing-craft being obliged to wait out in stormy weather until half-flood, and to create facility for their entering the harbour and approaching the landing-quay at any state of the tide, Mr. Vandeleur contributed £456 13s. 10d., and the Fishery-Board £1,367 1s. 8d. for adding 165 feet to the length of the pier, and extending it into 6 feet low water of spring-tides. The Commissioners for improving the navigation of the Shannon, say, "This pier is too small to answer the demands of the present trade, and, in particular, of a steam-vessel which frequents it daily from Limerick, and which cannot always procure accommodation alongside, for discharging its cargo, or landing the passengers. We propose, therefore, to lengthen the pier 150 feet, but in a different direction, for the purpose of giving the prolongation the most favourable position, as well for the present object as for such further extension as may hereafter be required. The estimate amounts to £8,600." The body of the pier is to be filled with rubble; the exterior face to be paved with good ashlar; the head and inner-face to be built with the same material; a flight of steps to be formed near the pier-head for the accommodation of persons embarking or disembarking from steam-vessels or passenger-boats. The old pier runs nearly due south, and the extension of it runs to the south-south-west. "This direction," say the Commissioners, "was adopted in order that greater accommodation might be afforded to vessels when lying at anchor within it; either waiting to load or discharge, or having taken refuge from the westerly gales." So heavy and rollingly impetuous is the surge from the west, that it often broke over the old pier, and placed a drenching arrest upon business. "I will here observe," says Capt. Mudge, in his report of 1832, "that this part of the Shannon is exposed to the whole ocean-swell: the sea, which sets in such a continuance of southerly or westerly winds, baffles all description, especially when accompanied by the rollers,—a periodical visitation." Kilrush harbour is the first above the Shannon's mouth; and the roadstead opposite Kilrush, and under lee of Inniscattery, is the first secure anchorage from the westerly gales.

Fisheries.—The fishing trade of the town, as to both capture and sale, is somewhat extensive. About 20 small hookers, employing about 200 persons, belong strictly to itself, and are engaged in fishing and in dredging for oysters; and numerous fishing-craft, of various classes, belonging to neighbouring creeks upon the Shannon, have their rendezvous and market at Kilrush, and are employed in both the herring and the general fishery. In 1830, the fishing-craft within the Kilrush district consisted of 2 decked vessels, of jointly 64 tons, with 12 men; 163 half-decked vessels, of aggregately 1,467 tons, with 652 men; 12 open sail-boats, with 48 men; and 443 row-boats, with 1,749 men. So prolific and general are the fishing-grounds, that lucrative fishing-establishments might be formed at every practicable part of the coast, from Kilrush to Galway bay.

Turf Trade.—Enormous quantities of turf are sent from Kilrush and from the bay of Poolnasherry to the city of Limerick, and are supplied from a tract of 24,000 acres of turbary, which commences in the immediate vicinity of the town, and extends to Moore bay and Dunbeg on the Atlantic. "This trade," said a local statistic writer of 28 years ago, "employs numbers of people at a season when little else can be done by them; while it contributes essentially to the comforts of the peasants employed in it. Turf-cutting is the first step towards the recovery of tracts of ground from an unprofitable state, after which the land is generally planted with rape and potatoes, and eventually sown with oats and grass-seed. For these reasons, this trade is encouraged by one of the principal proprietors, who permits his tenants to cut and dispose of as much turf as they choose, without any pecuniary remuneration. It is thought that the value of the turf sent off annually amounts to upwards of £10,000. A boat manned by two persons, generally a man and a boy, earns about £200 a-year at this trade; and would produce considerably more if freighted with limestone in return."

General Trade.—During a long period, one person, a Mr. Paterson, conducted the whole corn trade of Kilrush; and, in 1802, he purchased 12,000 barrels at £6,666,—in 1807, 26,000 barrels, at £18,795 16s. 8d.,—and in 1812, 34,000 barrels at £33,681 5s.; in 1807, he made his first shipment of oats to a port out of Ireland; in 1810, he shipped the first butter; in 1812, he began the making up of provisions, chiefly pork; in the same year, he fitted out the first packet between Kilrush and Limerick; in 1813, he had a second packet plying; "and such," said the local statist three years later, "is the resort of strangers to this part of the country for the benefit of sea-bathing and other purposes, that the same enterprising person is now engaged in the erection of hot baths and an extensive hotel near the creek of Kilrush." The facility of conveyance by steam between Limerick and Kilrush, has very greatly increased the latter's prosperity, and, among other effects, has produced a smart competition in the control and supply of the markets; "and now," said Mr. O'Brien in 1837, "instead of one corn-merchant, as was the case formerly, we have eleven, and instead of two grocers we have fifteen, and instead of two woollen-draperies we have twelve, and so on." A weekly market is held on Saturday; and annual fairs are held on May 10, and Oct. 12. Branch offices of the National Bank and the Agricultural and Commercial Bank, were established in 1835. The public conveyances are a mail-car to Ennis, and a steam-vessel to Limerick. The nearest point of projected railway is on the Shannon line at Tarbert, on the opposite shore of the Shannon's estuary.

Manufactures.—The manufactures are chiefly for home consumption, and consist of frieze, flannel, stockings, shoes, nails, strong sheeting, and a narrow and serviceable kind of linen called bandlecloth. Several weavers from the north settled a number of years ago in the town, and considerably improved the linen manufacture.

Commerce.—The number of vessels which frequented the port in 1835, was 32 loading, 5 discharging, 2 in distress, and 103 trading-hookers, &c.; in 1836, 34 loading, 6 discharging, 8 in distress, and 690 trading-hookers, &c.; and, in 1837, 37 loading, 7 discharging, 10 in distress, and 743 trading-hookers, &c. The imports in 1827 consisted of 180 tons of salt, 189 tons of coals, 70 tons of iron, 10 crates of ware, and 60 barrels of herrings; in 1831, of 50 tons of salt, 177 tons of coals, 120 tons of iron, and 150 barrels of herrings; and, in 1836, of 140 tons of salt, 150 tons of coals, 250 tons of iron, and 454 barrels of herrings; but this statement does not include the foreign trade, nor a considerable portion of the British trade, which are blended in the accounts with Limerick. The exports in 1827 consisted of 33 barrels of wheat and 19,269 barrels of oats; in 1831, of 5,417 barrels of barley, 30,309 barrels of oats, and 94 blocks of marble; and, in 1836, of 3,180 barrels of wheat, 27,202 barrels of barley, 36,898 barrels of oats, 2,574 barrels of beans, 87 firkins of butter, and 20 bags and 14 puncheons of miscellaneous goods; but this statement does not include the shipments made by small traders to Limerick, Cork, &c. The estimated amount of carriage from the town consists of 100 tons of imported articles, and 850 tons of manure and other bulky articles; and of carriage to the town, 6,000 tons for exportation, 3,225 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 500 tons of excisable articles not received by direct importation, and 21,225 tons of stone, lime, and other bulky articles.

Statistics.—Area of the town, 145 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,996; in 1841, 5,071. Houses 664. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 330; in manufactures and trade, 523; in other pursuits, 183. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 37; on the directing of labour, 517; on their own manual labour, 406; on means not specified, 76. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,130; who could read but not write, 218; who could neither read nor write, 732. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 701; who could read but not write, 369; who could neither read nor write, 1,239.

Poor-law Union.—The Kilrush Poor-law union ranks as the 57th, and was declared on July 23, 1839. It lies all in co. Clare, and comprehends an area of 115,746 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 70,676. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop. in 1831, are, Kilrush, 9,850; Killinor, 3,023; Knock, 3,859; Killofin, 4,070; Kilfidane, 4,165; Kildysert, 4,501; Kilmichael, 3,794; Kilmurry, 8,433; Kilmacduane, 5,620; Killard, 5,629; Kilkee, 6,594; Moyarta, 7,441; and Killybegh, 3,695. The number of elected and of ex-officio guardians is respectively 29 and 9; and of the former, 5 are chosen by Kilrush division, 4 by Kilmurry, 3 each by Kilkee and Moyarta, 2 each by Killofin, Kilfidane, Kildysert, Kilmacduane, and Killard, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £58,269 11s 7d.; the total number of persons rated is 8,103; and of these, 819 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—970, not exceeding £2,—963, not exceeding £3,—867, not exceeding £4,—and 932, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on June 8, 1840,—to be completed in Sept. 1841,—to cost £6,800 for building and completion, and £1,350 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 6 acres, purchased for £750,—and to afford accommodation for 800 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was July 9, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £773 0s. 11½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,751 5s. 3d. The medical charities are a fever hospital and six dispensaries. The fever hospital is a new building, situated at Kilrush, erected by the exertions of Mr. Vandeleur and other gentlemen, and containing 50 beds, with a surgical department; and, in 1839–40—immediately previous to its being opened—it was provided with an annual income of £400 from subscription, and £933 from parliamentary and county grants. The dispensaries have their seats at Kilrush, Knock, Kildysert, Dunbeg, Cooraclare and Kilmichael, and Carrigaholt and Kilkee; and, in 1839–40, they were aggregatedly supported with £269 5s. 6d. from subscription, £269 5s. 6d. from parliamentary and county grants, and £8 1s. 6d. from other sources. The Kilrush dispensary serves for a pop. of 11,243; and, in 1839, it received £89 7s. 6d., expended £89 9s. 5d., and made 4,000 dispensations of medicine.

KILRUSH, a parish in the barony of West Ophaly, 5½ miles south by east of Kildare, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 3½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 4,076 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches. Pop., in 1841, 577. Houses 96. The pop. of 1831 is stated by the Census at 704, and by the Ecclesiastical Authorities at 690. The surface consists of good demesne, arable, and meadow land, interspersed with boggy pasture and good turbary. The seats are Kibeggan, Eaglehill, Fearaun, Ironhills, and Taunrush. The road from Athy to Kileullen-Bridge passes north-eastward through the interior. An abbey was founded at Kilrush in the 13th century; and seems to have been intended as a place of strength; for it was surrounded by a ditch of great breadth, faced with masonry 10 feet high. In 1642, the Earl of Ormond, while on his expedition against the rebel forces in the county of Kildare, was confronted along the high grounds of Kilrush and Bullhill by the army whom he sought to destroy, and became unavoidably involved in a general engagement. "The left wing of the Irish was broken by the first charge; the right, animated by their principal leaders, maintained the contest for some time, and retired in good order to a neighbouring eminence, since called Battle-mount, but here they broke, fled, and were pursued across the grounds they had marched over in the morning. The line of pursuit is discoverable by the number of human bones turned up at Glassealy, when the earth is stirred a foot deep. This victory was considered of so much consequence, that Ormond was presented by the Commons with a jewel, value £500."—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLYSONNON [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £221 10s. 9½d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 699; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILRUSH, a parish in the barony of Cranagh, 1½ mile west by south of Freshford, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 752. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 84 Churchmen and 683 Roman Catholics. The civil parochial division treats it as only a townland in the east of Clomentagh parish; and even the ecclesiastical division very hesitatingly assigns it a parochial status. Kilrush-house, within the limits, is the seat of Arthur St. George, Esq.

KILRUSH, a parish in the barony of Decies-without-Drum, 4 of a mile west-north-west of Dungarvan, co. Waterford, Munster. Length and breadth, each 1½ mile; area, 1,522 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 724; in 1841, 723. Houses 106. The surface consists in general of good land; and is traversed by the road from Dungarvan to Cork. A principal height in the east has an altitude of only 69 feet. The seats are Springmount, Ballinamuck, and Waterloo-lodge.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £152 6s. 3d.; glebe, £2. Gross income, £154 6s. 3d.; nett, £89 7s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. This benefice, together with the sinecure rectories of Ballybeacon and Kilmolash, forms the corps of the archdeaconry of Lismore. Gross income, exclusive of Kilrush benefice, £515 7s. 0½d.; nett, £489 11s. 8½d. The incumbent holds also a vicar-choralship in Lismore cathedral. Kilrush church is in ruins; and the glebe-house is situated in the parish of Lismore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 746; and there was no school.

KILRUSH, a parish in the barony of Scarewalsh, 2½ miles east by south of Newtownbarry, co. Wexford, Leinster. It contains the village of CLOHAMON: which see. Length, southward, 4½ miles; breadth, 4½; area, 11,385 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches,—of which 27 acres, 17 perches are in the river Slaney. Pop., in 1831, 2,731; in 1841, 3,158. Houses 530. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,849. Houses 481. The Slaney traces the western boundary downward from Newtownbarry. The parochial surface consists for the most part of good land; and lies on an average basis of about 160 feet above sea-level. The eastern district is somewhat bleak, but the western district and part of the southern border are warm and sylvan. The seats are Ballybracken, Newlands, Charlesfort, Clohamon, Brownpark, and Woodfield. The ruins of Borris Castle stand about a mile north of the church.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition and gross income, £694 3s. 1d.; nett, £596 19s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church is of unknown date of erection. Sitings 300; attendance 125. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 350, and the Roman Catholics to 2,371; and 2 daily schools—the one of which was salaried with £10 from the rector, and the other with £2 from Mr. Grogan Morgan—had on their books 139 boys and 10 girls.

KILRUSH, a quondam parish and chapelry, now included in the parish of Lusk, barony of East Balrothery, co. and dio. of Dublin, Leinster.

KIL-ST.-NICHOLAS. See KILL-ST.-NICHOLAS.

KILSALLAGHAN, a parish, 3¼ miles west by north of Swords, and formerly in the barony of Castleknock, but now in that of Nethercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, south by westward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,730 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, 581; in 1841, 548. Houses 92. But this includes also the ecclesiastical parish of CHAPEL-MIDWAY: which see. Pop., in 1831, of Kilsallaghan proper, 78. The transference from the barony of Castleknock to that of Nethercross was effected under the Act 5 and 6 Victoria. The land is for the most part good. The seats are Newburn-house, Thorntown-lodge, Kilcoskan-house, and Corstown-house. The principal hamlet is Kilsallaghan. The antiquities are Dunmucky fort in the west, the ruins of a church at Chapel-Midway, and the ruins of a castle at Kilsallaghan. Archdall says that there was an ancient monastery in Kilsallaghan; but even he can tell nothing respecting it. The road from Dublin to Drogheda, by way of Ashbourne, passes through the interior, and is here overlooked by a constabulary station and a petty-sessions house.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £170; glebe, £66. Gross income, £236; nett, £208 13s. 5d. Patron, the Crown. The rectorial tithes are received by the incumbent in return for a crown-rent of £9 12s. 9d. The church was built in 1811, by means of a loan of £708 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 100; attendance 90. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 61, and the Roman Catholics to 352; and two daily schools—the one of which received aid from the vicar, and the other from subscription and the National Board—had on their books 71 boys and 51 girls.

KILSARAN, a parish on the east border of the barony of Ardee, 1 mile south of Castle-Bellingham, co. Louth, Leinster. It contains the village of GREENMOUNT: which see. Length and breadth, each 2½ miles; area, 3,393 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches,—of which 14 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches are in the river Glyde. Pop., in 1841, 2,098. Houses 371. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,873. Houses 327. The surface consists of good land, approaches within a few perches of the margin of Dundalk bay, and is traversed northward by the mail-road from Dublin to Belfast and Armagh. The river Glyde flows along the southern boundary. The seats are Greenmount, Major Makan; Main-house, B. B. Stafford, Esq.; Milestown, J. Woolsey, Esq.; Kilsaran-house; and Williamstown. The hamlet of Kilsaran is on the mail-road; and that of Milestown stands a mile to the north-north-east. A remarkable Danish mound exists near the village of Greenmount. In the 12th century, a commandery of Knights Templars was founded in Kilsaran by Maud de Lacy; and in the reign of Edward II., it was given to the Knights Hospitallers.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £359 1s. 6d.; glebe, £58 13s. The rectories of Kilsaran and GERANONSTOWN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kilsaran. Length, southward, 3¼ miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 3,254. Gross income, £564 9s. 10d.; nett, £450 9s. 11½d. Patron, John MacClintock, Esq. of Drumcar. The church is situated at Castle-Bellingham, in Geranontown. The Roman Catholic chapel at the hamlet of Kilsaran has an attendance of 1,180; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Stabamon. In 1834, the inhabitants of the union consisted of 299 Churchmen, 8 Presbyterians, and 2,908 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools—two of which were salaried with respectively £10 and £8 from the National Board, one with a sum not reported from subscription, and one with £10 from the rector and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 122 boys and 196 girls.

KILSCANLAN, a parish in the barony of Bantry, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of New Ross, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, southward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,154 acres, 32 perches. Pop., in 1831, 333; in 1841, 404. Houses 67. The surface consists for the most part of good arable and pasture land; and is crossed by the road from New Ross to Taghmon. A rivulet which flows westward on the north boundary has an elevation of 186 feet a little before leaving the parish.—Kilscanlan is an appropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of St. Mary's of New Ross, in the dio. of Ferns. See ROSS (NEW). The tithes are compounded for £43 16s. 11d., and belong to the bishop. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILSCANNEL, a parish in the barony of Lower Connello, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of Rathkeale, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,203 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,031; in 1841, 1,049. Houses 147. The surface consists in general of good land; and is traversed by the road from Rathkeale to Newcastle. The demesne of Elm-hill, the residence of Ion Studdert, Esq., is situated about a mile west of the church.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RATHKEALE [which see], in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £210. The church was built in 1823, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 80 to 90. The Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of about 90. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 285, and the Roman Catholics to 788; and a daily school was salaried with £8 from subscription, and had on its books 33 boys and 16 girls.

KILSCORAN, a parish in the barony of Forth, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north by east of Broadway, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, westward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,151 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches. Pop., in 1831, 616; in 1841, 666. Houses 109. The land is low, nearly all arable, and improved by sea manure. The surface reaches to within a few perches of the shore of Greenore bay, and is traversed across its west end by the road from Broadway to Wexford. Hill-castle stands near the centre of the parish.—Kilscoran is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TACUNSHANE [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £226 17s. 10½d.; glebe, £10 4s. 9d. The church was built in 1817, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 53, and the Roman Catholics to 604; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 85 children; and a daily school was salaried with £10 from Dr. Elrington, and had on its books 29 boys and 35 girls.

KILSEILY, a parish in the barony of Lower Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the town of BROADFORD: which see. Length, southward, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 11,102 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches,—of which 99 acres, 20 perches are in Lough Doon. Pop., in 1831, 4,227; in 1841, 4,469. Houses 717. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,844; in 1841, 4,153. Houses 662. Lough Doon, lying at an elevation of 86 feet, is situated on the north-west boundary; and the rivulet Glenomra flows west-north-westward to it from an elevation, immediately after entering the parish, of 120 feet. The district watered by the lake and the stream, or averagely within a mile of them, is lowland, and for the most part arable and ornate; but by far the greater portion of both the central and the southern districts is poor tillage ground, mountain, bog, and waste land. The summit of Knockaplunta, very nearly in the centre of the parish, has an altitude of 843 feet; and another summit, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the west of it, has an altitude of 1,018 feet. The seats are Doon-house and Woodfield, on Lough Doon; Killuddery-house, near Lough Doon; Violet-hill, half-a-mile north of Broadford; and Curdlestown, immediately south of Broadford. The three hamlets of Millanstown, Neilstown, and Corbea, are situated in the south. The principal antiquities are two cromlechs, two "giants' graves," Knockatobber fort, the ruins of Ballykelly-castle, and the ruins of the old church of Kilseily.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £120; and the latter are appropriated to an ecclesiastical incumbent. The vicarages of Kilseily, KILLURANE, and KILNOE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilseily. Length, 11 miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 10,500. Gross income, £313 17s. 2d.; nett, £260 10s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated adjacent to Broadford, and was built in 1810, by means of a loan of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 45. The Kilseily Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killokenedy. Two Roman Catholic chapels exist also in respectively Killurane and Kilnoe. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 49, and the Roman Catholics to 4,486; the Protestants of the union to 73, and the Roman Catholics to 11,190; 4 pay daily schools in the parish had on their books 188 boys and 149 girls; and 8 daily schools in the union had on their books 534 boys and 347 girls.

KILSHALVEE, KILSHALVY, or KILLESHALWAY, a parish in the barony of Corran, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Ballymote, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, south-eastward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,505 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches,—of which 8 acres, 38 perches are water, and 124 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches form a detached district a little to the south-east. Pop., in 1831, 2,034; in 1841, 2,411. Houses 427. The surface is bleak, yet consists for the most part of good land; and it is watered by the Owenmore and Black rivers, and traversed by the road from Ballymote to Ballaghadireen.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLARAGHT [which see], in the dio. of Achonry. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £169 4s. 7½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Sir Henry Montgomery. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilfree. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 98, and the Roman Catholics to 2,038; and a daily school was salaried with £13 from the National Board, and had on its books 203 boys and 111 girls.

KILSHANAGHAN. See BALLINAULTIG.

KILSHANE, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Tipperary, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length and breadth, each $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; area, 1,424 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches. Pop., in 1841, 615. Houses 90. Both the Census of 1831 and the Ecclesiastical Authorities appear to include in Kilshane the parish of CORROGE [which see]; and they state the pop. at respectively 1,051 and 1,050. Kilshane proper is an ornate district, watered by the Tipperary river, and beautified with the demesnes of Kilshane and Spring-house.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Emly; and, even regarded as inclusive of Corroge, it contains neither church, chapel, nor school. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 1,196.

KILSHANIG, or KILSHANICK, a parish on the east border of the barony of Duhallow, 3 miles south-west of Mallow, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of GLANTANE: which see. Length, westward, 7 miles; breadth, 6; area, 27,595 acres. Pop., in 1831, 8,057; in 1841, 9,348. Houses 1,505. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 9,155. Houses 1,473. The surface ascends westward from the rivulet Clydagh up the valley of the Blackwater, and southward from the top of the Blackwater to the summit-line of the Boggra mountains; and it is bisected and partly drained northward by the rivulet Leer. A small portion of the land is good; some is very poor; most is of a middle-rate quality; and a large proportion is bog and mountain. The low grounds upon the Clydagh and the Blackwater are studded with mansions and villas, and embellished with a comparatively large aggregate of wood. Lombardstown-house, in the west, was built about a century ago, and encompassed with newly improved grounds. Newbury, east of the former, and near the parish-church, was erected into a manor by James II. The old castle of Drumaneen on the Blackwater is separately noticed: see DRUMANEEN. Dromore was surrounded about a century ago with young plantations, and occupies a rising ground which commands an extensive view of the valley of the Blackwater. Woodfort, on the peninsula between the Blackwater and the Clydagh, is a handsome mansion, with elegant plantations and extensive orchards; and was inhabited about the middle of last century by Simeon Marshall, Esq., surveyor-general of Munster. A circular hill to the south of the house is sheeted all over with wood; is washed at the base by the Clydagh, meandering through groves of evergreens; and is surmounted by a turret which commands a thrilling view of the vale of the Clydagh, the valley of the Blackwater, the town of Mallow, the declivities of the Boggra mountains, and the far-away alps of Waterford, Limerick, and Kerry. Upper Dromore, on the Clydagh above Woodfort, overlooks the romantic glen of the stream embroidered with groves, silvered with cascades, and threaded with ornate walks. Other seats than these noticed are Kilpadder, Ballinameeda, Glencane, and Betsborough. Some Danish intrenchments are planted with fir, and contribute their sylvan clumps as a fine feature of the general landscape.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £738 9s. 2½d.; glebe, £8 7s. 3d. Gross income, £746 16s. 5½d.; nett, £646 16s. 4½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1719. Sittings 340; attendance 180. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Glantane and Kilpadder have an attendance of respectively 1,300 and 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 559, and the Roman Catholics to 7,867; 3 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 90 children; and 31 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £5 from the rector, one with £15 from subscription, and one with £10 from Mr. Newman, and £2 from Mr. Lombard—had on their books 561 boys and 282 girls.

KILSHANNAGH. See BALLINAULTIG.

KILSHANNY, a parish in the barony of Corcomroe, 2½ miles north of Ennistymon, co. Clare, Munster. Length and breadth, each 3½ miles; area, 5,805 acres, 24 perches,—of which 8 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,013; in 1841, 2,114. Houses 315. The surface is aggregately flat; and a considerable tract in the west, as well as portions in the north and east, is waste. Lough Goller, on the north boundary, has a surface elevation of 275 feet; but a rivulet which bisects the parish, has a medium elevation of about 100 feet. The chief residences are Streamlet-lodge, Smithstown-house, Annefield, Fantore, and Ballinagree. The principal antiquities are Kilshanny church, Smithstown castle, and Ballytasna and Ballaghboy forts. Corcomroe Abbey had anciently a cell in Kilshanny. See ABBEY. The roads from Ennistymon to Kilfenora and Black-Head pass through the interior.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Kilfenora. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilfenora. In 1834, the parishioners, with two exceptions, were all Roman Catholics; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 185 boys and 80 girls.

KILSHARVAN, a parish in the baronies of Lower and Upper Duleek, 3 miles south of Drogheda, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, westward, 2 miles; breadth, 1½. Area of the Lower Duleek section, 1,528 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches; of the Upper Duleek section, 568 acres, 21 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 487; in 1841, 440. Houses 67. Pop. of the Lower Duleek section, in 1841, 370. Houses 56. The surface consists wholly of profitable land; and is bisected eastward by the Nanny Water. The hamlets of Kilsharvan and Shallon had, in 1831, a pop. of respectively 86 and 169. The principal country residences are Kilsharvan, Annagor, and Cooper-hill. Kilsharvan occupies a situation of calm, quiet, sylvan solitude; and has been much improved in both mansion and demesne, by its proprietor, Andrew Armstrong, Esq. The church of Kilsharvan, now a ruin, appears to be of great antiquity, and is still much used for sepulture. The most of the portions of the remaining walls are the chancel arch, which is in the pointed style, and clothed with ivy; a semicircular arch, which divides the nave from the choir; and two beautifully executed windows in the south wall, square-headed and deeply recessed, with mullions, tracery, and a bold projecting label.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CALFE [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, inclusive of the rectorial tithes of Balgreas townland, £40; glebe, £12 10s. The rectorial tithes of the other townlands than Balgeen are inappropriate in George Pepper, Esq., of Mesney. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 50, and the Roman Catholics to 440; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILSHEELAN, a parish, 4½ miles west by north of Carrick-on-Suir, and partly in the barony of East Iffa and Offa, co. Tipperary, partly in the barony of Upperthird, co. Waterford, Munster. The Tipperary section contains the village of Kilsheelan. Length, southward, 3½ miles; breadth, 3½. Area of the Tipperary section, 4,348 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches,—of which 33 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches are in the Suir, and 592 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches form a detached district nearly a mile to the west. Area of the Waterford section, 4,629½ acres,—of which 25 acres, 28 perches are in the Suir. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,570; in 1841, 1,936. Houses 277. Pop. of the Waterford section, in 1831, 283; in 1841, 360. Houses 50. Pop. of the rural districts of the Tipperary section, in 1831, 967; in 1841, 1,141. Houses 160. The two sections are mutually separated by the Suir, and connected by a bridge. The Tipperary section consists for the most part of low light land; and contains the residences of Ballina and Lindville, and the ruins of Ballylasheen Castle, and the old parish-church. The Waterford section is to a large extent upland; yet over three-fourths or upwards of its area is covered with the woods of Gurteen and Landscape demesne. A mountain, completely sheeted with wood, has an altitude of 1,071 feet; and a rivulet, which traces the southern and western boundaries, descends from an elevation of 1,066 feet to the level of the Suir. A splendid mansion was commenced a number of years ago at Gurteen, by its proprietor Mr. Power, but was left unfinished. The village of Kilsheelan stands on the left bank of the Suir, and on the road from Clonmel to Waterford. Area, 25 acres. Pop., in 1831, 290; in 1841, 435. Houses 67. The Kilsheelan dispensary is within the Clonmel Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of 6,873; and, in 1839-40, it received and expended £163 10s.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £250 7s. 2d.; and the rectorial for £122 7s. 1d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Viscount Lismore and the representatives of E. Power, Esq., of Gurteen. The vicarage of Kilsheelan, and the rectories of KILMURRY and ARDCOLLUM [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kilsheelan. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 3,751. Gross income, £767 6s. 1d.; nett, £706 11s. 6½d. Patron, the Marquis of Ormonde. There is no church. The Kilsheelan Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilgrant and Kileash. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Kilmurry. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 1,589; the Protestants of the union to 22, and the Roman Catholics to 3,695; 2 pay daily schools in the parish had on their books 54 boys and 26 girls; and there was a daily school also in Kilmurry.

KILSHINANE, a parish on the south border of the barony of Clanmaurice, 5½ miles south by east of Listowel, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 13,478 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,668; in 1841, 2,271. Houses 343. The surface consists, to a large extent, of a portion of the Clanruddery mountains; and is drained northward by the Smeatlagh rivulet.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILFLYN [which see], in the dio. of Ardferit and Aghadoe. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £74 17s. 7d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Cork. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 18, and the Roman Catholics to 1,765; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILSHINE, a parish in the barony of Morgallion, 4½ miles south of Nobber, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, westward, 3 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,543 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches,—of which 180 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches lie detached. Pop., in 1831, 654; in 1841, 609. Houses 114. The surface consists of good land; and has an extreme altitude, at the site of the church, of 263 feet. A large proportion is occupied with the parks and woods of Mountinstown, the handsome demesne of H. C. Pollock, Esq.; and a district in the east is occupied with the demesne of Knightstown. The roads from Nobber to Navan and Trim pass across the parish.—Kilshine is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CLONGILL [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £92 5s. 10d.; glebe, £27 10s. The church was built in 1812, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 80; attendance, from 10 to 35. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 20, and the Roman Catholies to 655; and a daily school at Knightstown was salaried with £15 from the National Board, and £13 and other advantages from Sir William de Bath, and had on its books 46 boys and 34 girls.

KILSHURDANY. See KILLERSHERDINY.

KILLSILLAGH, a parish in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, 5½ miles east-south-east of Clonakilty, co. Cork, Munster. Length and breadth, each half-a-mile; area, 245 acres. Pop., in 1831, 166; in 1841, 188. Houses 28. The surface consists of good land; is entirely surrounded by the parish of Lislee; and forms part of the peninsula between the bays of Clonakilty and Courtmacsherry.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LISLEE [which see], in the dio. of Ross. Tithe composition, £42 14s. 2d. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILSKEER. See KILSKYRE.

KILSKEERY, or KILSKERRY, a parish in the south-west corner of the barony of Omagh, and of the county of Tyrone, Ulster. It contains the town of TRILLICK: which see. Length, west-north-westward, 7 miles; breadth, 4; area, 20,438 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches,—of which 30 acres are water. Pop., in 1831, 8,789; in 1841, 9,352. Houses 1,598. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 8,917. Houses 1,516. A tiny district of Magheracross, belonging to co. Fermanagh, lies isolated a little south of the centre. The water-area consists of the two small lakes of Relagh, both situated in the south. The only demesne is Relagh, the property of J. H. Storey, Esq. The parochial surface contains no prime land, consists for the most part of decidedly inferior land, and comprises a considerable aggregate of heathy mountain. The roads from Enniskillen to Fintona and Omagh pass through the interior. Archdall says that a monastery of the name of Kilskeery was founded in 749.—This parish is a rectory, and a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £675 9s. 4d.; glebe, £380. Gross income, £1,055 9s. 4d.; nett, £896 7s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Donaghmore in the dio. of Clogher. A curate has a salary of £82 8s. The church was built at the private expense and during the incumbency of Archdeacon Hastings. Sitting 700; attendance 450. The Methodist chapel has an attendance of 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,450. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,804 Churchmen, 53 Presbyterians, and 5,306 Roman Catholics; 6 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 639 children; and 15 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from subscription, one with £2 from subscription and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and one with a gratuity from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 505 boys and 250 girls. In 1839, the National Board granted £74 3s. 4d. toward the erection of a school at Darlea; and, in 1840, they had two schools at respectively Feglish and Crossan, jointly attended by 84 boys and 33 girls. In 1841, the Kilskeery Loan Fund had a capital of £152, circulated £440 in 122 loans, and realized a nett profit of 18s.

KILSKYRE, or KILSKEER, a parish in the barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains the town of CROSSAKEEL: which see. Length, north-north-westward, 6 miles; breadth, 3; area, 11,724 acres, 25 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,537; in 1841, 5,014. Houses 845. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,698. Houses 793. The principal hamlets, with their respective pop. in 1831, are Athglasson, 114; Ballinlough, 117; Balgree, 77;

Kilskyre, 156; Pottercha, 124; Robinstown, 146; and Smithstown, 122. One-fourth of the land is good; and three-fourths are of a light quality. The mansions are Milltown, Ashpark, and New-Grove,—the last the seat of H. O'Reilly, Esq. Part of the demesne of Sylvan-Park, W. Keating, Esq., is within the eastern boundary. The roads from Dublin to Killesbandra, and from Kells to Castletown-delvin, intersect each other in the interior. The hamlet of Kilskyre stands on the former of these roads, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-east of Crossakeel. Archdall places here one of his necessarily obscure early abbeys, and says that it was "founded under the invocation of Schiria the Virgin, who lived in the year 580."—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £425; glebe, £46 4s. Gross income, £471 4s.; nett, £397 3s. 8d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the archdeaconry of Meath, with the united benefices which constitute its corpa; and is non-resident in Kilskyre. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d., and the use of the glebe-house and garden. The church was built in 1818, by means of an unknown amount of subscription, and of a loan of £1,292 6s. 1½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 100 to 120. The Roman Catholic chapels at Kilskyre and Ballinlough have an attendance of respectively 850 and 1,250; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 180, and the Roman Catholics to 4,507; and 3 daily schools at Crossakeel, Kilskyre, and Ballinlough, had on their books 167 boys and 115 girls. The Crossakeel school was salaried with £20 certain and £10 conditional from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and with some important advantages from Mr. Wade; and the Kilskyre school was salaried with £2 12s. 6d. from Lord Killeen, Mr. Kearney, and the Roman Catholic clergyman. In 1840, two National schools, the one for males, and the other for females, were salaried with each £8, and attended by respectively 140 boys and 110 girls.

KILTALE, a parish in the barony of Lower Deece, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Dunshaughlin, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, westward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,018 acres, 37 perches. Pop., in 1831, 405; in 1841, 419. Houses 61. The land is excellent. The hamlets are Kiltale and Little Batterjohn. The road from Dublin to Trim passes along part of the southern boundary.—This parish is an improper curacy, and part of the benefice of KNOCKMARK [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The tithes are compounded for £71 5s., and belong to Lord Dunsany. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a hedge-school was attended by about 40 children.

KILTALLA, or KILTALLAGH, a parish on the south border of the barony of Trughenackmy, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the town of CASTLEMAIN: which see. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,757 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,631; * in 1841, 1,303. Houses 222. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,244; in 1841, 1,153. Houses 189. The surface extends along the right bank of the river Maine, and ascends thence to the acclivities of Slievemish. About one-third of it is mountain; and about two-thirds are aggregately inferior arable meadow, and pasture-land, yet possessed of considerable amenities from wood and cultivation. A considerable demesne is Anna; and a seat of some former note is Ballycrispin, the residence of the ancestors of the now noble family of Spring Rice.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £166 3s. 1d.; glebe, £15 0s. 11d. The rectories of KILTALLA, KILGARRYLANDER, and CURRENS [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kiltalla. Length, 16 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 6,160. Gross income, £532 12s. 9d.; nett, £488 18s. 7½d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built in 1816, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 40. The Kiltalla Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 550. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Kilgarrylander and Currens. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 163, and the Roman Catholics to 1,684; the Protestants of the union to 245, and the Roman Catholics to 6,343; and 4 daily schools in the union—none of which were in the parish—had on their books 69 boys and 27 girls.

KILTAMAGH, or KILTIMOGH, a village in the parish of Killeden, barony of Gallen, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the road from Ballinrobe to Swineford, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Balla, and $5\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Swineford. A dispensary is within the Swineford Poor-law union; and, in 1840–41, it expended £152 8s., and administered to 2,463 patients. In its vicinity are the mansions of Annagh Hill and Oxford. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 650. Houses 126. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 53; in manufactures and trade, 56; in other pursuits, 17. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 48; on their own manual labour, 70; on means not specified, 2.

KILTANAN, a demesne in the parish of Tulla, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of the village of Tulla, barony of Upper Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. The mansion is the seat of James Moloney, Esq.; and the demesne is a feature of great beauty amidst a bleak and neglected country, and possesses considerable natural interest from the subterraneous course within its limits of the rivulet Tomeens.

KILTARTAN, a barony of the county of Galway, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by Galway bay and the barony of Dunkellin; on the north-east and east, by the barony of Loughrea; and on the south-east, south, and west, by the county of Clare. Its greatest length, west-north-westward, is $15\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 8 miles; and its area is 66,654 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches,—of which 1,542 acres, 39 perches are fresh water. The surface, in a general view, is low, roughly undulated, and curiously broken; and exhibits striking alternations of luscious demesne and meadow, ponderously rocky pasture, and dreary pendicles and expanses of sterility. It excels every other district of Ireland or Great Britain in the number, though not in the boldness, beauty, or romance, of the caverned and tunnelled course of sinking streams; and it possesses a feature of much attraction in the large lake and noble demesne of Lough-Cooter. The two highest grounds are on the boundary with co. Clare; and have altitudes of respectively 407 and 681 feet above sea-level. Nearly all the seaboard consists of the north shore of Kinvarra bay, and the little peninsula to the west.—The Act 6 and 7 William IV. transferred from Kiltartan to Dunkellin two townlands of Killora, seven of Killeely, one of Kilcolgan, and two of Ardahan, aggregately possessing, in 1841, a pop. of 810; from Dunkellin to Kiltartan three townlands of Ardahan, and three of Killinny, jointly possessing, in 1841, a population of 436; and from Kiltartan to Loughrea, two townlands of Killinan, and one of Isertkelly, jointly possessing, in 1841, a pop. of 150.—The barony of Kiltartan, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Ardahan and Kiltomas, and the whole of the parishes of Beagh, Kilbeconty, Killinny, Kilmacduagh, Kiltartan, and Kinvarra-Doorus. The only town is Gort, and the chief villages are Kinvarra, Knockgarra, and Toberreendoney. Pop., in 1831, 24,292; in 1841, 27,565. Houses 4,671. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,719; in manufactures and trade, 807; in other pursuits, 320. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,661; who could read but not write, 1,021; who could neither read nor write, 8,222. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 982; who could read but not write, 877; who could neither read nor write, 10,158. Kiltartan barony lies within the Poor-law unions of Gort and Loughrea. The total number of tenements valued is 4,192; and of these, 2,476 were valued under £5,—1,019, under £10,—344, under £15,—120, under £20,—70, under £25,—33, under £30,—39, under £40,—24, under £50,—and 67, at and above £50.

KILTARTAN, a parish in the barony of Kiltartan, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains, on its southern border, part of the town of GORT: which see. Length, south-south-westward, 4 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 5,725 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches,—of which 36 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,930; in 1841, 2,962. Houses 469. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,645; in 1841, 1,845. Houses 284. The surface, though aggregately consisting of indifferent land, possesses a large amount of verdure, tillage, park-ground, and wood. Coole and Raheen, the demesnes respectively of Mr. Gregory and Mr. O'Hara, richly adorn all the west. The other seats are Ballylee-castle, Newhall, Ballinamantan, Lisnabirra-lodge, Roseville-cottage, and Córker-house. The chief antiquities are the ruins of Kiltartan castle and two churches. The interior is traversed by the road from Gort to Galway.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMACDUAGH [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. Tithe composition, £175 7s. 8½d.; glebe, £10. The Roman Catholic chapel, 2 miles north of Gort, has an attendance of 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Gort and Kilmacduagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 62, and the Roman Catholics to 3,078; and 3 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 154 children.

KILTEAL, a parish in the baronies of Stradbally and East Maryborough, 2½ miles north-west of the town of Stradbally, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, westward, 3 miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Stradbally section, 1,561 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches; of the Maryborough section, 1,991 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches,—of which 274 acres, 2 roods, 21 perches are in the Great Heath of Maryborough. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,116; in 1841, 1,067. Houses 176. Pop. of the Stradbally section, in 1841, 459. Houses 74. The surface is partly hilly and pastoral, partly heathy or meadowy, and partly lowland and arable. The portion of the Great Heath of Maryborough within the parish lies in the north-west corner, and is overlooked on the east by the Heath House. Kilbite-hill, in the Stradbally section, is sheeted over with wood, and has an altitude of 720 feet. The rock of Dunamase is situated immediately beyond the south-west boundary, and within Dysert-enos. See DUNAMASE. The seats are Ballycarrol and the Cottage. The road from Stradbally to Portarlinton passes northward through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TEGOLME [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. Vicarial tithe composition, £58 14s. 7½d.; glebe, £10 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £117 9s. 2d.; and are impropriate in Lord Carew. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 71, and the Roman Catholics to 1,020; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILTEEL, KILKEEL, or EADESTOWN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the east border of the barony of South Salt, and of co. Kildare, 5½ miles east by north of Naas, Leinster. Length, west-north-westward, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,435 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, 755; in 1841, 797. Houses 123. The eastern district contains Cupidstown Hill, and a considerable extent of waste surface; but the central and western districts aggregately consist of good land. The height of Cupidstown Hill, above sea-level, is 1,248 feet. The chief residence is Whitefort, and the principal antiquity is Kilteel castle. "It is questionable," says Mr. Wright, "whether the tower, which now forms part of Kilteel castle, and serves as a staircase to the interior, is not one of the many specimens of those religious edifices, which are to be found in various parts of Ireland, usually denominated round towers; from the circumstance of there being the remains of an old abbey and church near to the site, as also an ancient stone-cross, in a tolerable state of preservation, standing in the garden immediately adjoining. The ascent to what were the several floors of the castle, is by stone steps in the round tower, 60 in number, varying from 7 to 9 inches in depth. The remains of the abbey are, at present, unimposing; and, with the exception of the gable and ruined door-way, nothing but low and ragged bits of the early walls are left,—these, however, are sufficient to show that the original building was one of considerable extent. In taking advantage of the old foundation-stones, &c., for the purpose of building in the neighbourhood, several of the abbey vaults have, from time to time, been opened; and, on those occasions, many specimens of antiquity were found, such as coins, axes, keys, spoons, &c. There are still several vaults unexplored. The village of Kilteel stands on the road from Ballymore-Eustace to Rathcoole, 6½ miles north-north-east of Ballymore-Eustace. Fairs are held on May 1, June 24, Sept. 29, and Nov. 2. Area of the village, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 253; in 1841, 168. Houses 32.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of RATHMORE [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £58 16s. 10d., and the rectorial for £97 13s. 6d.; and the latter are impropriate in Mrs. E. Cogan, as lessee of Lieut.-Col. Alen. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Rathmore and Kilbride. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 754; and there was no school.

KILTEELY, or LISTEELY, a parish in the baronies of Coonagh and Small County, 2 miles south-west by south of Pallas-Green, co. Limerick, Munster. The Coonagh section contains the village of Kildeely. Length, 2½ miles, breadth, 1½. Area of the Coonagh section, 1,655 acres; of the Small County section, 1,529. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,128; in 1841, 2,049. Houses 325. Pop. of the Small County section, in 1841, 871. Houses 137. Pop. of the rural districts of the Coonagh section, in 1841, 1,035. Houses 164. The surface consists wholly of profitable land; and is drained by affluents of the Camogue river. An establishment of the Knights Templars stood on an eminence within the parish. The village of Killeely stands on the conjoint road from Pallas-Green to Bruff and Hospital. Area, 28 acres. Pop., in 1841, 143. Houses 24. Fairs are held on Feb. 1, June 1, and Oct. 25.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLYBROOD [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £284 14s. 5½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Dromkeen. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 72 boys and 93 girls. In 1840, two National schools at Killeely, the one for males and the other for females, were each salaried with £8, and had on their books respectively 143 boys and 161 girls; and two for males and females at Cloverfield were salaried with respectively £12 and £10, and had on their books respectively 152 boys and 129 girls.

KILTEELY, a village in the parish of Temple-shambo, barony of Scarewalsh, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands 6 miles south-south-west of Newtownbarry, at the intersection of the road from Dublin to New Ross, with that from Enniscorthy to Borris through Scollagh-Pass. Pop. not specially returned.

KILTEERY, a small harbour in the parish of Loughill, barony of Shanid, co. Limerick, Munster. It is situated on the Shannon between Glyn and Foynes, and on the estate of the Earl of Clare, at the commencement of a newly-formed branch-road to the road from Limerick to Tarbert. A pier was proposed by the Commissioners for improving the Shannon navigation to be constructed here, at the cost of £1,836, and on a plan which should considerably accommodate small coasting-vessels.

KILTEEVAN, a parish on the east border of the barony of south Ballintobber, 3 miles east of Roscommon, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, westward, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 8,411 acres, 32 perches,—of which 959 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches are in Lough Ree. Pop., in 1831, 2,523; * in 1841, 2,818. Houses 464. The land immediately upon Lough Ree is low and boggy; but the rest is good, and possesses some degree of embellishment. The seats are Killeevan and Beechwood; and the hamlets are Cloonmore, Creevyquin, and Killeenboy. The road from Roscommon to Lane-borough crosses a wing on the north.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ROSCOMMON [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £50, and the rectorial for £65 4s. 8d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Messrs. Armstrong. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 7, and the Roman Catholics to 2,716; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £5 a-year from Mr. Mapother—had on their books 103 boys and 42 girls.

KILTEEVOCK, or KILTEEVOGUE, a parish on the west side of the barony of Raphoe, 5½ miles west by north of Stranorlar, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length, southward, 8½ miles; breadth, 7½; area, 41,131 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches,—of which 91 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches are water. Pop., in 1841, 4,864. Houses 783. The Census states the pop. of 1831 at 4,290; and the Ecclesiastical Authorities state it at 4,365. Five-sixths of the surface is mountainous and marshy; and the remainder consists of argillaceous land of aggregately middle rate quality. The glen of the river Finn, and that of its affluent Reelan, cleave the congeries of uplands, and at the same time cut the parish, into three great sections; the smallest of which is in the west between the streams, or above their confluence, the largest on the south, and the medium one on the north. The character of the chief glen, and the principal features of interest connected with the chief demesne and estate, are noticed under the words FINN and CLOGHAN which see. The mountain Altnapaste, overhanging the south side of the Finn a little below the influx of the Reelan, has an altitude of 1,199 feet; and the mountain Croagh-naeger, on the southern boundary, has an altitude of 1,793 feet. The road from Strabane to Dunglo passes up the vale of the Finn.—This parish was originally a part of the parish of Stranorlar, and is now a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Glebe, £23 1s. 6½d. Gross income, £92 6s. 7½d.; nett, £87 5s. 3d. Patron, the incumbent of Stranorlar. The church is of unknown date and cost. Sittings 300; attendance 55. A schoolhouse is also used monthly as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Stranorlar. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 933 Churchmen, 56 Presbyterians, and 3,587 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school at Welshtown was usually attended by about 30 children; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £2 15s. 4½d. from Robinson's Benefaction, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, and one with £8 6s. 2d. from Robinson's Benefaction, and £2 from subscription—had on their books 171 boys and 97 girls.

KILTEGAN, a parish, 3 miles north-west of Hacketstown, and partly in the barony of Rathvilly, co. Carlow, but chiefly in the baronies of Upper Talbotstown and South Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, south-westward, 6 miles; breadth, 4. Area of the Rathvilly section, 815 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches; of the Talbotstown section, 10,931 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches; of the Ballinacor section, 4,200 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,823; in 1841, 3,969. Houses 628. Pop. of the Rathvilly section, in 1831, 330; in 1841, 328. Houses 48. Pop. of the Talbotstown section, in 1831, 2,960; in 1841, 3,069. Houses 484. Pop. of the Ballinacor section, in 1831, 533; in 1841, 572. Houses 94. The western and central districts lie on an average basis of between 600 and 700 feet above sea-level; and, for the most part, are as wild, moorish, bleak, and waste, as they are lofty. Ballinabarny Gap, on the east road from Dunard to Hacketstown, has an altitude of 1,178 feet; Slieve-ragh, on the northern boundary, has an altitude of 1,560 feet; and Carrig Mountain, in the interior, has an altitude of 1,845 feet. The Derreen rivulet rises on the northern margin, and flows southward along the boundary between the Ballinacor and the Talbotstown sections; and, after running nearly 3 miles, it has still an elevation of 613 feet. The western district is watered by the Douglas rivulet; and, though lying for the most part upon a basis of at least 410 or 420 feet above sea-level, it contains a large aggregate of arable land, and a tolerable amount of artificial embellishment. The arable land averages in yearly value about 40s. per plantation acre. The principal features of interest are the fine demesnes of Humewood and Highpark, the residences of respectively W. W. F. Hume, Esq. and W. J. Westby, Esq. The road from Hacketstown to Baltinglass impinges on the south-west corner of the parish; and is there overlooked by the village of Kiltegan. Pop., in 1831, 136. Houses 19.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILRANELAGH [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. Vicarial tithe composition, £176; glebe, £38 1s. 6d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £313 16s. 11d., and are impropriate in W. W. F. Hume, Esq. The church was built in 1806, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9d., and a loan of £295 7s. 8d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and enlarged in 1826, by means of a loan of £100 from that Board. Sittings 250; attendance 200. A private house, used as a Protestant dissenting place of worship, has an attendance of 12. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 646 Churchmen, 20 Protestant dissenters, and 3,541 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £7 10s. from the National Board, and £1 from the chapel fund—had on their books 219 boys and 218 girls. In 1840, the National Board had a school at Rathdangan, and granted £28 2s. toward the erection of a boys' school and a girls' school at Rathcoile.

KILTEGAN, or KILTIGAN, a parish in the barony of East Iffa and Offa, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of Clonmel, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, 2 miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile; area, 1,069 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 190; in 1841, 283. Houses 37. The southern half is very nearly all occupied with the ornamental grounds attached to the seats of Summerhill, Summerville, and Glenconner,—the second and the third the residences of respectively Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Bagwell.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DONAGHMORE [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £93 13s. 10d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 189; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILTENANLEA. See KILTONANLEA.

KILTENNEL, a parish in the barony of East Idrone, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by north of Borris, co. Carlow, Leinster. It contains the village of KILLED MUND: which see. Length, south-westward, 5 miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile to $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; area, 11,170 acres, 25 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,206; in 1841, 3,544. Houses 638. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,970; in 1841, 3,390. Houses 606. About one-third of the surface, lying chiefly in the east, is waste and loftily mountainous; and the remainder consists of tolerably good arable and pasture land. Mount Leinster, on the east boundary, and near the north-east extremity, has an altitude of 2,610 feet; Knockroe, on the east border, 1,746 feet; Tomduff, on the north boundary, 1,308 feet; the mountain of the Nine Stones on the north boundary, 1,726 feet; Knockmore, on the south boundary, 752 feet; and the source of one of the indigenous rivulets, in the east between Mount Leinster and Knockroe, 1,126 feet. The Scallagh Pass is in the south-east corner; and the Camlin Gap is in the north. The seats are Brooklodge, Mount-Leinster-lodge, and Kilcoltrim-house; and the hamlets are Knocknamoyle, Rathanna, Coonogue, Newtown, Oldyard, and Barmona. The roads from Borris to Enniscorthy and Clonegall pass through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £135; nett, £110 6s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £250, and are impropriate in Thos. Kavanagh, Esq., as lessee of Lord Cloncurry. The church is situated at Killedmund; and was new-roofed about 42 years ago. Sittings 150; attendance 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 267, and the Roman Catholics to 2,980; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and two with respectively £8 and £12 from the National Board—had on their books 245 boys and 235 girls.

KILTENNEL, a parish on the coast of the barony of Ballaghkeen, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,125 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,137; * in 1841, 1,279. Houses 193. The land, in general, is of a cold quality, and rather below mediocrity. The surface, in an aggregate view, lies low—probably not higher on the average than 80 or 100 feet; but Tara Hill on the northern boundary has an altitude of 826 feet. The principal features of interest have been noticed under the word COURTOWN: which see. The man-sions are Courtown, Seafield, Conanown, and Kilbride.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £154 16s. 3d.; glebe, £16 2s. Gross income, £170 18s. 3d.; nett, £130 1s. 5d. Patron, the Earl of Courtown. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Tomb, in the dio. of Ferns; but is resident in Kiltennel. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7d. The church was built about 77 years ago. Sittings 200; attendance, from 100 to 150. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 369, and the Roman Catholics to 1,015; a Protestant Sunday school had on its books 50 boys and 52 girls; and 2 daily schools were each aided with £10 a-year and other advantages from subscription, and had on their books 45 boys and 38 girls.

KILTERAGHT. See KILTORAGHT.

KILTERNAN, or KILTIERNAN, a parish in the south-west corner of the barony of Rathdown, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Dundrum, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, west-south-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,165 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches. Pop., in 1831, 913; in 1841, 1,019. Houses 151. The surface possesses little attraction for the plodding agriculturist, or the prosaic and hobnail grazier, but is replete with grandeur and romance to a tasteful observer of landscape. It comprises one of the richest sections of the highland district of co. Dublin, and participates in the magnificence of the scenery around the SCALP [which see]; and it, at the same time, forms the vestibule to one of the richest divisions of the great and grand natural picture-gallery of co. Wicklow. A water-level on the western boundary has an elevation above sea-level of 1,407 feet; a mountain on the western border has an altitude of 1,618 feet; a mountain in the north-eastern district has an altitude of 1,103 feet; Prince William's Seat on the southern boundary has at altitude of 1,825 feet; and the Glencullen rivulet, nearly at the point of leaving the parish, has an elevation of 656 feet. Glencullen-house is situated on the south side of the glen whence it takes its name; Springfield, the villa of Thomas Thompson, Esq., is romantically situated at the entrance of the Scalp; and Kilternan-house, the residence of Mr. Anderson, is situated a little to the west of the village of Kilternan. The other seats are Fountain-hall, Fountain-hall Cottage, Kingstown-lodge, Kilternan-lodge, Jamestown-lodge, and Golden-ball. The road from Dublin to Enniskerry passes through the interior, between the Three-Rock mountain and Rathmichael. The village of Kilternan stands on this road; and is overlooked on the east by a metalliferous hill,—the scene of lead-mining operations. The old church is a small but picturesque ruin of a very early date; and the new church, situated about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile from the old, is one of the new-fangled and fantastic imitations of Gothic, less pretending than some other new structures of its class, possessing a stone roof and granite walls, and forming a decidedly striking feature in the midst of a quiet and romantic landscape.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £41 11s. 6d.; glebe, £40. A portion of the rectorial tithes, worth £50 per annum, is impropriate in Sir Compton Domville, Bart., and a portion worth £30 is impropriate in Christopher Fitzimon, Esq.; but no amount of either of these portions is levied by the impropiators. The vicarage of Kiltarnan and the perpetual curacy of KILGOBBIN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kiltarnan. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1½. Pop., in 1831, 2,062. Gross income, £234 1s. 6d.; nett, £206 5s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan for one turn, and the archdeacon of Dublin for two turns. The church was built in 1826, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, a loan of £461 10s. 9½d. from that Board, and a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Viscount Powerscourt. Sitings 300; attendance about 160. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 600. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 157, and the Roman Catholics to 757; the Protestants of the union to 251, and the Roman Catholics to 1,813; a daily school at the Scalp was aided by the proceeds of a charity sermon and local subscription, and had on its books 51 boys and 41 girls; a daily school at Glencullen was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and was usually attended by about 50 children; and there was a daily school also in Kilgobbin.

KILTESKILL, a parish in the baronies of Loughrea and Leitrim, 3½ miles south-east of the town of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, southward, 3½ miles; breadth, 1½. Area of the Loughrea section, 1,716 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches; of the Leitrim section, 2,979 acres, 34 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 900; in 1841, 802. Houses 130. Pop. of the Leitrim section, in 1831, 538; in 1841, 468. Houses 72. The southern district is pre-eminently moorish and waste, but is partially relieved by Kilgarraff wood; and the northern district consists for the most part of good arable and tillage land, and possesses a considerable amount of ornament. The highest ground is in the south-east, and has an altitude of 508 feet. The chief mansion is Masonbrook, and the principal hamlet is Straumananth. The road from Loughrea to Searraff passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LOUGHREA [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Vicarial tithe composition, £57 6s.; glebe, £15 14s. 6d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £30 15s. 1d., and are appropriated to the diocesan and to the prebendary of Kilteskil. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Killeenadeema and Derrybrien. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was no school.

KILTESKIN or TITESKIN, a parish in the barony of Imokilly, 2½ miles south-south-west of Cloyne, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,145 acres. Pop., in 1831, 450; in 1841, 703. Houses 104. The land is, for the most part, of middle-rate quality.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £201 14s. 9d.; glebe, £66 3s. Gross income, £267 17s. 9d.; nett, £258 14s. 11d. Patron, the Crown. Previous to the passing of the Church Temporalities Act, Kilteskil was part of the benefice of Aghada. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 29, and the Roman Catholics to 435; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILTEVAN. See KILTEEVAN.

KILTEYNAN, or KILTINAN, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 2½ miles south-east of Fethard, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, eastward, 3½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 5,102 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,206; in 1841, 1,296. Houses 176. The western district is low ground, and consists of good land; but the eastern district climbs away to the height of 1,589 feet on the acclivities of the Slievenaman group of mountains, and is pre-eminently bleak, yet fertile. A rivulet mutually divides the two districts; and, in doing so, cuts the parish into two nearly equal parts. Kiltynan, the picturesque residence of Robert Cooke, Esq., is the principal feature in the west. The antiquities are the ruins of a castle and two churches. The road from Clonmel to Clonkeen passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition and gross income, £320; nett, £288 15s. Patron, the diocesan. But the benefice is suspended under the Church Temporalities Act; and the minister of the adjoining parish performs its occasional duties for a salary of £5. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 1,267; and a daily school was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and had on its books 80 boys and 69 girls.

KILTHOMAS, a parish in the baronies of Loughrea and Kiltartan, 3½ miles north-east of Gort, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, south-eastward, 5½ miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Loughrea section, 7,125 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches; of the Kiltartan section, 4,584 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches.—of which 24 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches are in Lough Cor. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,066; in 1841, 3,278. Houses 576. Pop. of the Loughrea section, in 1831, 2,326; in 1841, 2,063. Houses 368. The south-eastern district is part of the Slieve-Baughta mountains, bleak and waste; but the central and north-western districts are lowland, and consist for the most part of tolerably good land. The highest ground is near the centre of the southern district, and has an altitude of 977 feet. The mansions are Cappard and Limepark; and the principal hamlet is Skehanagh. The road from Gort to Portumna crosses the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a vicarage, in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. The vicarage and part of the rectory form a member of the benefice of KILLINANE; which see. Tithe composition, £100; glebe, £17 10s. The tithes of the remaining part of the rectory are compounded for £52 10s.; and are appropriated to the diocesan, and to the prebendary of Kinvarra. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 700. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 3,260; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 83 boys and 27 girls.

KILTOGHART, a parish in the barony and county of Leitrim, Connaught. It contains the villages of Kiltoghart, LEITRIM, DRUMSHANNO, and JAMESTOWN, and the greater part of the town of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON; see these articles. Length, southward, 11½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 4½ miles; area, 30,494 acres, 3 roods, 2 perches.—of which 1,717 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches are in Lough Allen, 592 acres, 19 perches are in the Shannon and its earliest lacustrine expansions, and 414 acres, 30 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 16,434; in 1841, 17,581. Houses 2,801. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 14,143. Houses 2,403. The village of Kiltoghart stands on the road from Drumshambo to Drumsna, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east by east of Leitrim, and 3 north-north-east of Carrick-on-Shannon. Area, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 484. Houses 85. The hamlet of Loughtown stands on the south side of a lake of its own name in the east; and the hamlet of Morbaun stands half-a-mile north of Drumshambo, and at the foot of Lough Allen. The parish extends from the middle of the east side of Lough Allen to the bend in the Shannon, south of Jamestown; and is bounded over all the south by the Shannon, and over all the west by Lough Allen and the Shannon. The northern district is mountainous and waste, and attains in the summit of Slieve-an-Erin, an extreme altitude of 1,922 feet; the central district is greatly dappled and splashed with cold lakes and shivering ponds; and by far the greater portion of the practicable land is of indifferent quality. The principal seats are Drumheiny-lodge, Jamestown-lodge, Shannon-lodge, Keonbrook, Newbrook, Rosebank, Summerhill, Castlecarra, Port, Hollypark, and Rose-lodge. The principal features of interest will be found noticed in the articles on the towns, and on Lough Allen and the Shannon.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Tithe composition, £562; glebe, £209 5s. Gross income, £771 5s.; nett, £648 19s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates have salaries of respectively £69 4s. 7d., and £75. The parochial church, situated in Carrick-on-Shannon, was built in 1827, by means of £200 borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and £500 raised by parochial assessment, and by the sale of the materials of the old church. Sittings 500; attendance 250. The chapel-of-ease at Drumshambo was built in 1828, by means of a loan of £1,200 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 200. Two Methodist meeting-houses made no return of their attendance; and a third has an attendance of 50. Four Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance severally of 2,000, 1,300, 1,200, and 650. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 2,091, and the Roman Catholics to 15,002; and 15 daily schools had on their books 679 boys and 459 girls. Three of the schools were salaried with respectively £8, £8, and £12 from the National Board; two with respectively £8 and £10 from the London Hibernian Society; one with £7 10s. from the Ardagh Diocesan Society; one with £12 from the Baptist Society; one with £15 from the Ardagh Diocesan Society; one with £4 from the Elphin Diocesan Society, £4 from the Ardagh Diocesan Society, and £4 from subscription; one with £32 from the Ardagh Diocesan Society, the London Hibernian Society, and subscription; one with £15 and other advantages from Mr. Latouche; and one with £5 5s. from Lord Duncannon. In 1840, the National Board had two schools at Jamestown, one at Cratty, one at Drumkeelamore, one at Leitrim, one at Cor-durry, and one at Lisduff; and salaried the whole with £78 a-year.

KILTONANLEA, or DOONASS, a parish on the east border of the barony of Lower Tulla, and of co. Clare, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles south by west of O'Brien's Bridge, Munster. It contains the village of CLOONLARA: which see. Length, south-south-westward, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 7,627 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches,—of which 242 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches are in the Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 4,061; in 1841, 4,016. Houses 629. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,797. Houses 598. The Shannon, partly winding in mazy folds, and in one place achieving the picturesque cataract of Doonass, traces the whole of the eastern, south-eastern, and southern boundaries, and combines with banks of wood and of varied outline to produce a series of interesting and even brilliant landscapes. See DOONASS. The demesnes are numerous, well-kept, and well-adorned; but most of the land not within their limits is indifferent in quality and poor in appearance. The mansions on the Shannon are Snipe-lodge, Lucyfield, Errinie, Errina-house, Rose-hill, Waterpark, Summer-hill, Doonass-house, Landscape-house, and Belleisle-house; and those in the interior are Prospect-hill, Banard, Oakfield, Newtown, Elmhill, Springfield, and Mount Catherine. The canal of the Limerick and Killaloe navigation, and also the road from Limerick to Killaloe pass through the interior. The chief antiquities are the ruins of two castles, and of the old church of Kiltonanlea.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £341 10s. 9½d. The rectory of Kiltonanlea, and the vicarage of KILLOKENNEDY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kiltonanlea. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 3½. Pop., in 1831, 7,647. Gross income, £457 5s. 8½d.; nett, £409 9s. 4½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built about the year 1782, and received the accession of a gallery and a steeple in 1829. Sittings 200; attendance 95. The Roman Catholic chapels of Kiltonanlea and Killokennedy have an attendance of respectively 800 and 750; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and the union consisted of 233 Churchmen, and 6 Dissenters; the Roman Catholics of the parish and the union amounted to respectively 4,114 and 7,965; 4 daily schools in the parish—one of which received aid from Lady Massy—had on their books 176 boys and 101 girls; and there were 2 hedge-schools in Killokennedy. In 1839, the National Board granted £126 toward the erection of a boys' school and a girls' school at Coolastyke.

KILTOOM, a hamlet in the parish of Faughantown, barony of Demifore, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands at the north end of the parish, half-a-mile from the east shore of Lough Dereveragh, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-south-west of Castle-Pollard. A monastery, a church, a cemetery, a castle, and a mansion, were formerly situated here; and some of them have left traces of their site. The monastery is alleged by monkish annalists to have been founded at an early period by St. Nennid; and Archdall, while perfectly acquainted of course with the monastery, and especially with its antiquity, ludicrously declares the position of it, or the identity of what he calls Kiltoma, to be "now unknown." The mansion was anciently a seat of a branch of the Nugent family, and afterwards of the family of Smyth; and it eventually became the property of the Earl of Longford.

KILTOOM, or KILTOMB, a parish in the barony of Athlone, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-north-west of the town of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, southward, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles; breadth, $4\frac{1}{4}$; area, 13,246 acres, 14 perches,—of which 2,757 acres, 15 perches are in Lough Ree, and $30\frac{1}{4}$ acres are in the Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 4,514; * in 1841, 4,150. Houses 735. The surface consists for the most part of light land, and has a flat and tame appearance; yet it derives some relief from a height of 396 feet on the north boundary, and from the winding outline of Lough Ree in the bays of Hodson and Bally. The seats are Newpark, Hodson's-bay-house, and Grove-house. The chief hamlet is Ports. There are two constabulary police-stations. The road from Athlone to Roscommon passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £90; glebe, £30. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £65; and are inappropriate in the Incorporated Society. The vicarages of Kiltoom and CAMMA [see that article], constitute the benefice of Kiltoom. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 8,629. Gross income, £230; nett, £196 16s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is of unknown date and cost. Sittings 120; attendance 35. The Roman Catholic chapel of Kiltoom has an attendance of 550; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in Camma. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 108, and the Roman Catholics to 4,660; the Protestants of the union to 133, and the Roman Catholics to 9,002; a hedge-school in the parish had on its books 30 boys and 16 girls; and 6 daily schools in the union had 271 boys and 117 girls. In 1840, two National schools at Ballybay were salaried with respectively £9 and £8; and one at Famore with £12.

* The Census of 1831 extends the southern border to the town of Athlone, and includes within the parochial boundary 78 houses of the town, with a pop. of 434. The Ordnance Survey exhibits the extreme south-east of the parish, as half-a-mile north of Athlone.

KILTOOMY, KILTOMEY, or KILTORNEY, a parish in the barony of Clanmaurice, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Listowel, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains part of the village of LIXNAW: which see. Area, 5,866 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,728; in 1841, 2,043. Houses 335. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,928. Houses 314. The surface is watered by the river Brick; and consists of about equal parts of bog and mountain, and of arable and pasture land. The road from Listowel to Ardfert passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILFLYN [which see], in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £60; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Cork. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 1,835.

KILTORA, or KILTURRAGH, a parish $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Tubbercurry, and partly in the barony of Costello, co. Mayo, partly in the barony of Corran, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Mayo section, 3,645 acres, 23 perches,—of which 47 acres, 14 perches are water. Area of the Sligo section, 3,238 acres, 30 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,481; in 1841, 2,613. Houses 464. Pop. of the Sligo section, in 1841, 1,263. Houses 211. The surface is bleak and tame. The chief height is in the Mayo section, and has an altitude of 309 feet. Lough Cloonakillina, on the southern boundary, has a superficial elevation of 258 feet. The principal residence is Doocastle-cottage; and the chief hamlets are Cloontannagh and Toomour. The road from Ballymote to Ballaghadireen passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of EMLYFADD [which see], in the dio. of Achonry. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £120 5s. 10d., and the rectorial for £109 7s. 6d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Sir Henry Montgomery. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 78, and the Roman Catholics to 2,559; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 155 boys and 37 girls.

KILTORAGHT, a parish in the barony of Corcomroe, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Kilfenora, co. Clare, Munster. Length, southward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,091 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches,—of which 15 acres, 16 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,145; in 1841, 1,074. Houses 163. One-third of the surface consists of prime fattening land; and the remainder of good tillage-land, with but little bog.

The water elevation at the centre of the parish is 253 feet. Lough Fergus lies on the western boundary. The principal hamlet is Knockeighra; and the chief antiquities are Knockaunacurra fort, and the ruin of Inchovea-castle. The road from Kilfenora to Ennis passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Kilfenora. Vicarial tithe composition, £30; glebe, £12 2s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Clouney, are compounded for £166 13s. 4d., and are appropriated to the deanery of Kilfenora. The vicarages of Kiltoraght and CLOUNEY [see that article] constitute the benefice of Kiltoraght. Length, 8 miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 4,516. Gross income, £158 14s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £152 5s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is in a dilapidated state; and the vicar's house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 4. The Roman Catholic chapels of Kiltoraght and Clouney have an attendance of respectively 200 and 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and the union amounted to 15; the Roman Catholics of the parish and the union to respectively 1,214 and 4,834; a hedge-school in the parish had on its books 69 boys and 40 girls; and 4 daily schools in the union had 239 boys and 117 girls.

KILTORCAN, or KILTORKAN, an ecclesiastical parish in the barony of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 996 acres, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 176. This parish is not recognised in the civil parochial division. It is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KNOCKTOPHER [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £34. In 1834, the parishioners, with one exception, were all Roman Catholics.

KILTORMER, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Longford, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Eyrecourt, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, westward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,898 acres, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,133; in 1841, 2,089. Houses 355. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 245. Houses 40. The surface is low, consists in the aggregate of good land, and contains a considerable extent of demesne-ground. The seats are Eyreville, Chesterfield, Belleview, Cloggar, Newpark, and Charter-house. The principal hamlet is Ballydonagh. The chief antiquities are two earthen fortifications, and the ruins of a Roman Catholic chapel and altar. The road from Eyrecourt to Loughrea passes through the interior; and is overlooked by the church and village.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £32 6s. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £16 4s. But though the parish is called a rectory, the chief portion of the tithes, compounded for £89 4s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., is appropriated to the diocesan and the dean. The rectories of Kiltormer, KILLORAN, and ABBEYGORMAGAN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kiltormer. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 6,808. Gross income, £220 2s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £175 4s. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1814, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d., and a loan of £184 12s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 80. The Roman Catholic chapel of Kiltormer has an attendance of 900. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Abbeygormagan and Killoran. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 108, and the Roman Catholics to 2,026; the Protestants of the union to 131, and the Roman Catholics to 7,012; 3 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £6 from the rector—had on their books 84 boys and 61 girls, and 6 daily schools in the union had 240 boys and 131 girls. In 1840, a boys' school and a girls' school at Kiltormer village were salaried with respectively £12 and £8, and had on their books 128 boys and 103 girls.

KILTORNEY. See KILTOOMY.

KILTRELLIG, a village in the parish of Killyhone, barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It stands at the head of Kilbaha bay, 3 miles east by north of Loop Head, and 5½ miles west-south-west of Carrigaholt. Adjacent to it is Kiltrellig-lodge. Area, 24 acres. Pop., in 1841, 304. Houses 50.

KILTRISK, a parish 5 miles north-east of Oulart, and partly in the barony of Ballaghkeen, but chiefly in that of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, 3½ miles; breadth, 1½. Area of the Ballaghkeen section, 41 acres, 13 perches; of the Gorey section, 3,243 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 690; in 1841, 757. Houses 131. Pop. of the Gorey section, in 1841, 739. Houses 128. The land, though of a stiff marly nature, is all arable. The Awina-varra river creeps along the northern boundary; and there descends from an elevation of 129 to one of 120 feet in the space of 2 miles. The seats are Ellendale, Morrion-lodge, Clonganny, and Ballinasteed. The road from Blackwater and Ford to Gorey passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LESKINFERE [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £126; glebe, £21 12s. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 63, and the Roman Catholics to 640; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

KILTRUSTAN, a parish in the barony and county of Roscommon, Connaught. It contains on its southern border a small part of the town of STROKESTOWN: which see. Length, southward, 4½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,339 acres, 35 perches,—of which 126 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches are in Lough Nablahy, 192 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches are in small lakes, and 5 acres, 15 perches are in an expansion or arm of the Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 3,543; in 1841, 3,938. Houses 703. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,830. Houses 685. The surface is profusely splashed and dappled with lacustrine water; and comprises three qualities of land, worth respectively £3, £2, and 15s. per plantation acre per annum. The seats are Creta, Creggan, Tobberpan, and Doonardbeg. The road from Strokestown to Elphin passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BUMLIN [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £208 6s. 8d., and the rectorial for £104 3s. 4d.; and the latter are appropriated to the prebend of Kilgoghlin. The Roman Catholic chapel stands 2½ miles north of Strokestown; but the attendance on it is not separately returned. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 3,741; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £6 from the London Hibernian Society, £6 from the Elphin Diocesan Society, and advantages worth £2 from Lord Hartland—had on their books 119 boys and 65 girls.

KILTUBRID, a parish in the barony of Leitrim, 3 miles east-south-east of Drumshambo, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It contains the village of KESHARRIGAN: which see. Length, in the direction of south by east, 6½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 15,608 acres, 23 perches,—of which 684 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,508; in 1841, 7,228. Houses 1,212. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 6,414; in 1841, 7,096. Houses 1,192. The northern district is mountainous; and the central and southern districts consist of indifferent land, poor in its landscape composition, and but languidly relieved by great abundance of water and comparative plenty of demesne-ground. Slieve-an-Erin, on the north-west border, has an altitude of 1,922 feet. The Aghacashel rivulet rises on the eastern declivities of that mountain, and pursues its way to the south. Lough Scur lies a little south-east of the centre of the parish, contains the larger part of the parochial water-area, and lies at a superficial elevation of 220 feet above sea-level. The other principal lakes are those of Keshcarrigan, Carrigaport, and Scurdaun. The principal residences are Letterfine, Driny, Laheen, Bellevue, and Aghacashel. The road from Drumshambo to Ballinamore passes across the interior. The Kiltubrid dispensary is within the Carrick-on-Shannon Poor-law union, and serves strictly for the parish; and, in 1840–41, it expended £48 8s. 5d. and administered to 1,345 patients. In 1841, the Kiltubrid Loan Fund had a capital of £804, circulated £2,881 in 1,327 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £9 4s. 4d.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Tithe composition, £281; glebe, £240 4s. 10d. Gross income, £521 14s. 10d.; nett, £440 0s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built about the year 1788, partly by means of a gift of £406 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,120. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 366, and the Roman Catholics to 6,363; and 5 daily schools had on their books 291 boys and 279 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £7 from the National Board; one with £10 from the National Board, and £6 6s. from Lord Southwell; one with £18 from the National Board, and £7 from Lord Southwell; one with £18 from the London Hibernian Society, and £3 10s. from the Irish Society; and one with £6 from the Ardagh Diocesan Society, and £3 from the rector.

KILTULLAGH, a parish 4½ miles east by south of Athenry, and partly in the barony of Kilconnel, but chiefly in that of Athenry, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, east-south-eastward, 5 miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Kilconnel section, 1,171 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches; of the Athenry section, 7,776 acres, 30 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,069; in 1841, 3,244. Houses 530. Pop. of the Athenry section, in 1841, 2,974. Houses 491. The surface lies on an average basis of about 150 feet above sea-level, and consists, in general, of good arable, meadow, and pasture land. The Raford rivulet effects the chief drainage. The seats are Kiltullagh and Raford. The principal antiquities are ruins of a church and a castle. Archdall says that a cell of the third order of St. Francis was built in Kiltullagh some time before 1441. The Loughrea and Kiltullagh dispensary is within the Loughrea Poor-law union; and, in 1840–41, it expended £125.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILCONICKNY [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £144 11s. 0½d. But a portion of the tithes, compounded for £60, is appropriated to the bishop, the dean, and the archdeacon of Clonfert. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killimore-Daly. The chapel of the Dominican friary at Esker has an attendance of 800, and is served by 7 friars. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; a Roman Catholic Sunday school at Esker had on its books 72 boys and 61 girls, a National school at Esker was salaried with £50 from the Board, and had on its books 254 boys and 154 girls, and a hedge-school at Kiltullagh had on its books 70 boys and 54 girls.

KILTULLAGH, a parish in the barony of Castlerea, 5½ miles west-south-west of the town of Castlerea, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It contains the village of BALLINLOUGH: which see. Length, south-westward, 9 miles; breadth, from 1½ to 5 miles; area, 24,713 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches, —of which 373 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches are in Lough O'Flynn, and 33 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 7,110; in 1841, 7,664. Houses 1,450. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 7,473. Houses 1,418. The surface consists in the aggregate of indifferent land; and comprises a considerable proportion of waste. Slieve O'Flynn, on the eastern border, is the highest ground, and has an altitude of 497 feet. Lough O'Flynn projects to the extent of upwards of a mile within the northern boundary, yet lies, to the amount of 103 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches, within the adjoining parish of Kilkeevin; and it has a superficial elevation of 255 feet above sea-level. Low though the parochial interior is, it contains a watershed between the two grand basins of the Shannon and Lough Corrib, and shakes off head-rills toward respectively the Suck and the Clare. The seats are Cushlievelodge, Willsborough, and Lowberry. The road from Castlerea to Tuam passes through the interior. Archdall says, "A monastery for Franciscan friars of the third order, and of the order De Penitencia, was erected here some time after the year 1441; of which no other particulars have transpired."—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £227 6s. 11d.; glebe, £3 12s. The rectories of Kiltullagh, TEMPLETOGHER, ANNAGH, BECAN, and AGHAVOWER, and the vicarage of KNOCK [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Kiltullagh. Length, 12 miles; breadth, 7. Pop., in 1831, 34,619. Gross income, £778 19s. 8½d.; nett, £676 16s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate for Knock, Becan, and Aghavower, receives the tithe composition of these parishes, amounting to £323 7s. 1d.; the diocesan effecting by that arrangement a practical though only temporary partition of the benefice. The church of Kiltullagh is situated in Ballinlough, and was built in 1824, by means of a loan of £692 6s. 2d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance, about 85. The curate's house at Ballyhaunis, and also private houses in Kiltullagh and Annagh, are likewise used as parochial places of worship. The Roman Catholic chapels of Garraulahan and Clonfad in Kiltullagh, have an attendance of respectively from 1,000 to 1,200, and about 950; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. A private house in Kiltullagh is also used for public Roman Catholic service, and there are 6 Roman Catholic chapels in the other parishes of the benefice. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 172, and the Roman Catholics to 7,368; the Protestants of the union to 267, and the Roman Catholics to 36,679; 10 daily schools in the parish had on their books 547 boys and 226 girls; and 40 daily schools in the union had 1,907 boys and 832 girls. One of the schools in the parish was supported by £5 from the rector, £4 from W. R. Wills, Esq., and aid from the London Hibernian and the Tuam Diocesan Societies; one was supported by £9 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, and £2 from Mr. Wills; and one was aided with £1 from the Roman Catholic clergyman.

KILTURK, a parish on the coast of the barony of Bargie, 5½ miles west-south-west of Broadway, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, southward, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,206 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, 817; in 1841, 912. Houses 132. The surface is low, and consists of fertile and well-cultivated land. The seats are Ballybealy-house, Sweetbrier-lodge, and Woodville. A district of 93 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches lies detached in Kilmore; and a detached district of Kilmore, amounting to 226 acres, 17 perches, lies isolated in the centre of Kilturk. The road from the village of Kilmore to westward, passes through the interior. —Kilturk is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TOMHAGGARD [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Vicarial tithe composition, £80 13s. 7d.; glebe, £31. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £108 1s.; and are inappropriate in Lord Robert Tottenham. The church was built in 1808, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance 60. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 49, and the Roman Catholics to 739; and a hedge-school had on its books 10 boys and 10 girls.

KILTURRÁGH. See KILTORA.

KILTYCLOGHER, a village in the parish of Cloonclare, barony of Rossclogher, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It stands on the north verge of the county, and on the north road from Manor-Hamilton to Enniskillen, 2½ miles north-west of the head of Upper Lough Macnean, and 6½ north-east of Manor-Hamilton. Area, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 244. Houses 55.

KILTYMON, a picturesque glen, on the north border of the parish of Killiskey, 2½ miles south by east of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It extends about a mile in length; exhibits over all its sides a profusion of wood; is overhung on the west by Durnahill, whose summit has an altitude of 1,122 feet; contains the mansion of Kiltymon, the residence of William Eccles, Esq., beautifully situated on a rising ground; and is traversed by the new line of road from Dublin to Wexford.

KILVARNET, a parish in the barony of Leney, 3½ miles north-west of Ballymote, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, south-westward, 5 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 6,696 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches, —of which 103 acres, 13 perches are in Templehouse Lough, and 93 acres are in Finn-Lough and in streams. Pop., in 1831, 2,360; in 1841, 2,352. Houses 414. The north and the south ends of the parish are much beautified with the demesnes of respectively Annaghmore and Templehouse; but the rest of the surface is bleak, and contains a considerable proportion of bog and of poor land. The Owenmore river describes the whole of the eastern boundary; and Templehouse Lough, an expansion of that stream, has an elevation of 186 feet above sea-level, and lies to the extent of 143 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches in the parish of Emlyfadd, of 108½ acres in Cloonahill, and 35 acres, 27 perches in Achoury. The principal hamlet is Ballinacarrow. The road from Ballymote to Coolany, and that from Tubbercurry to Sligo, intersect each other in the interior. —The parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLORAN [which see], in the dio. of Achoury. Vicarial tithe composition, £41 10s. 9½d.; glebe, £31 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £35 1s. 7d.; and are appropriated to the deanery of Achoury. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballyrodan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 357 Churchmen, 15 Protestant dissenters, and 2,165 Roman Catholics; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £14 from Col. Percival, one with £12 from the Baptist Society, £8 from Major O'Hara, and one with £16 from the Baptist Society.

and £2 from Major O'Hara—had on their books 211 boys and 239 girls.

KILVELLANE. See KILVOLANE.

KILVEMNON, a parish 7 miles east-north-east of Fethard, and on the eastern border of the barony of Slieveardagh, and of the co. of Tipperary, Munster. It contains the village of MULLINAHONE: which see. Length, south-south-westward, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 10,551 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,530; in 1841, 4,983. Houses 818. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,355; in 1841, 3,677. Houses 595. Excepting the declivity of mountainous ground on the southern margin, and 500 acres of bog in the interior, the entire surface consists of arable land, worth from 20s. to 50s. per acre. The highest ground on the southern boundary has an altitude of 1,088 feet above sea-level; and the surface of all the interior lies on an average basis of probably about 180 feet. The seats are Gurteen and Killaghy-Castle, the latter the residence of Francis Despard, Esq. The principal hamlets are Ballytoghill, Poulacapple, and Kylefreaghane. The mail-road from Dublin to Clonmel passes across a wing of the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £675 6s. 6½d.; glebe, £15. Gross income, £680 6s. 6½d.; nett, £579 2s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also a vicar-choralship in Cashel cathedral. The church was built about the year 1772, by means of parochial assessment to the amount of £461 10s. 9½d. Sittings 100; attendance, between 8 and 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 3,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 75, and the Roman Catholics to 4,692; and 5 pay daily schools had on their books 195 boys and 95 girls.

KILVINE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, 6½ miles east-south-east of Claremorris, and on the eastern border of the barony of Clannorris, and of the county of Mayo, Connaught. Length, south-eastward, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 5,426½ acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,925; in 1841, 2,236. Houses 384. The village stands in the east district, 4 miles east of Ballindine. Area, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 260. Houses 49. The parochial surface lies on a basis of about 200 feet above sea-level; is separated by the rivulet Dalgan from co. Galway; and consists for the most part of very good land. The principal seat is Rockfort; and the principal hamlet is Fallakeeran. The road from Tuam to Ballyhaunis passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition and gross income, £116 12s.; nett, £109 5s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is non-resident; and there is neither church nor chapel. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 91 boys and 18 girls.

KILVOLANE, or KILVELLANE, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Owey and Arra, and of the western wing of co. Tipperary, Munster. It contains the town of NEWPORT-TIP: which see. Length, westward, 6½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 3; area, 8,678 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,656*; in 1841, 4,254. Houses 632. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,804; in 1841, 3,182. Houses 475. The eastern and narrow end of the parish is loftily upland, and sends up a summit to the altitude of 1,204 feet above sea-level; but the other districts are aggregately rather low in basis, and comparatively rich in embellishment. The Clare river, describing a great part of the southern boundary, descends from an elevation of about 600 to one of 127 feet; and the Mulkern river, running across the broad western district, descends from an elevation of 233 to one of 112 feet. The seats are Bloomfield, Mount-Prospect, Derryleigh, Dromore, Mount-Rivers, Ballinackeogh, Barna, Foxhall, Brooklodge, Consingle, and Mount-Philips,—the last the residence of William Philips, Esq. The principal hamlets are Lisnabrock and Gortnanoe. The chief antiquities are a ruined church, and the ruins of Derryleigh Castle. The road from Nenagh to Limerick passes across the parish; and the Anglesey road, constructed a few years ago by government, climbs up from Newport-Tip and the eastern extremity, and passes away among the beautiful and fertile tracts of the highland region of the Keeper and Slievephelim mountains toward Thurles.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of NEWPORT [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £461 10s. 9d.; glebe, £1 10s. The church was built about 77 years ago, by means of a gift of £415 7s. 8½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance 140. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilnerath and Kilcomenty. In 1834, the inhabitants of the civil parish consisted of 224 Churchmen, 5 Protestant dissenters, and 3,770 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the co. Limerick district of the ecclesiastical parish amounted to 152, and were all Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 from subscription, and £10 from the Incorporated Society—had on their books 254 boys and 226 girls. In 1840, the National Board granted £73 13s. 4d. towards the erection of a school at Tourentrien.

KILWARLIN, a small ancient toparchy, on the north border of the barony of Lower Iveagh, and of the western district of co. Down, Ulster. The chieftain of it in the time of Elizabeth was named Mac-Swine O'Rory; and he was able to bring into the field 12 horse and 80 foot, but submitted to the queen. An extensive district along the Lagan between Moira and the Maze Course, is still called the Bogs of Kilwarlin, though it has entirely ceased to contain any turbary.

KILWATERMOY, a parish in the barony of Coshmore and Coshbride, 2½ miles north-east of Tallow, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, southward, 3½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 3½; area, 6,556 acres, 3 roods, 1 perch,—of which 7 acres, 38 perches are tideway of the river Bride. Pop., in 1831, 2,527; in 1841, 2,400. Houses 385. The Bride describes the whole of the northern boundary. The southern district of the parish is pastoral, and sends up a summit to the altitude of 689 feet above sea-level; but the other districts, though various in the quality of their soil, possess a large aggregate of wood and ornament. The seats are Moore-Hill, W. Moore, Esq.; Janeville; Ballyhamlet; Sapperton, Stephen Moore, Esq.; and Headborough, the Rev. P. S. Smyth. The north-east road from Tallow to Youghal passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TALLOW [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £88 12s. 3d.; glebe, £3 13s. 10d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £177 4s. 6d.; and are inappropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. The church was built in 1830, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 140; attendance 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is at the base of the Kilworth mountains, 2½ miles north-north-east of Fermoy, 7 south of Mitchelstown, 19½ north-north-east of Cork, and 106½ south-west by south of Dublin. The route of the Dublin road, over 5 miles north-north-east of the town, is among the Kilworth mountains; and, in a general view, is confined, irksome, and chilly. Though the hills are intersected by some fertile vales, and occasionally clumped or clad with plantation; yet they, for the most part, present to the traveller only bleak and shivering declivities, wanly relieved by intervening tracts of reclaimed moorland. The town itself consists principally of one long street, and has some good houses and respectable inhabitants. Its public buildings are an ancient church, a commodious Roman Catholic chapel, a neat market-house near the church, and a neat bridge of 6 arches across the Funcheon. Some flax-dressing mills were a few years ago erected in the neighbourhood, by the Earl of Mountcashel, for the employment of the poor; and comparatively extensive corn-mills exist at Maryville and elsewhere in the environs. Fairs are held on January 25, April 21, June 18, September 11, November 21, and December 10. A dispensary in the town is within the Fermoy Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £148 14s. 2d., and administered to 2,742 patients. The environs boast not only the noble seat of Moore-Park, but the minor seats of Maryville, Woodview, and Rushmount. Area of the town, 83 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,963; in 1841, 1,772. Houses 271. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 130; in manufactures and trade, 156; in other pursuits, 89. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 170; on their own manual labour, 144; on means not specified, 45.

KIMMAGE, a pleasant hamlet, 2 miles south-west of Dublin Castle, co. Dublin, Leinster. In its vicinity is Kimmage-house, the seat of the Right Hon. F. Shaw.

KIMMAR'S PORT, a creek in Ardglass Harbour, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. A pier was built here, by means of a grant of £513 from government, and a contribution of £200 from the Commissioners of Ardglass Harbour; it is situated at the inner end of the harbour, and is of much use to fishing-vessels and other small craft; and it was even much used for trading purposes previous to the construction of the large pier. See ARDGLASS.

KINAWLEY, a parish, partly in the barony of Tullaghagh, co. Cavan, but chiefly in the baronies of Knockninny and Glenawley, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The Cavan section contains the town of SWANLINBAR: which see. Length of that section, east-south-eastward, 8½ miles; breadth, from 3 furlongs to 3 miles; area, 15,346 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,384; in 1841, 3,593. Houses 632. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,986; in 1841, 3,101. Houses 541. The surface is prevailingly mountainous, moorish, and repulsively bleak; and it is watered northward across the centre by the Blackwater and the Swanlinbar rivulets. The summit of Legavragra in the east, has an altitude above sea-level of 1,279 feet; of Cratty, in the centre, of 1,215 feet; of Cuileagh, toward the west, 2,188 feet; and of Tiltinbane, on the western boundary, 1,949 feet.—The co. Fermanagh section is strictly contiguous with the co. Cavan section; yet there lies isolated between part of them a detached district of the parish of Tomregan, comprising 3,200 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches. Length of the Fermanagh section, south-eastward, 10 miles; breadth, from 2½ to 5. Area of the Glenawley portion, 8,686 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches,—of which 206 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches are in Upper Lough Erne, and 39 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches are in small lakes. Area of the Knockninny portion, 26,970 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches,—of which 2,688 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches are in Upper Lough Erne, and 438 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches are in small lakes. Pop. of the whole of the Fermanagh section, in 1831, 12,741; in 1841, 13,262. Houses 2,220. Pop. of the Knockninny portion, in 1831, 9,069; in 1841, 9,742. Houses 1,611. The surface shades off from the stern and sombre colouring of the eastern declivities of Cuileagh, to the warm and luscious tints of the elaboration of island, peninsula, meadow, wood, and water, along the whole of the left side of Upper Lough Erne; and, in an aggregate view, it lies low, and comprises a large amount of marsh, bog, and poor gravelly land. Some caves occur in the extreme west. The Swanlinbar or Cladagh rivulet separates the Knockninny portion from the Glenawley portion; and the Woodford river flows 6½ miles along the southern and south-eastern boundaries to Lough Erne. The principal islands belonging to Kinawley in Lough Erne, named from the head of the lake downward, are Inisherck, Coney, Trasna, Rockan, Inishcrevan, Aghenish, Inishlaght, Inishlirroo, Doocarn, and Creaghmarourk. The principal small lakes lie chiefly on the immediate or near flank of Lough Erne; and, named north-westward, are Loughs Killymackan, Mill, Corracosh, Black, Corrabarra, Gole, Drumconor, Abacon, Slane, Derrycree, Drummully, Derrygallen, Corracosh, and Macken. The principal mansions are Prospect-Hill in the north-west corner of the Knockninny section, and Callowhill, Dresternan-Castle, and Mount-Prospect, all near the centre of that section. The hamlet of Kinawley stands in the Glenawley section, 6 miles south by west of Enniskillen; and the church, in the Knockninny section, 3½ miles south-east of Kinawley. The roads from Enniskillen to Ballyconnell and Belturbet pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £369 4s. 7½d.; glebe, £317 6s. 9d. Gross income, £686 11s. 4½d.; nett, £543 12s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates have each a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The parish-church was built in 1825, by means of a loan of £1,384 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance 400. The chapel of ease at Swanlinbar was erected about 77 years ago. Sittings 250; attendance 200. The Roman Catholic chapels of Knockninny, Glassmullen, and Drumderig, have an attendance of respectively 1,500, 720, and 560; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. The Roman Catholic chapels of Swanlinbar and Kinawley have each an attendance of 1,170; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 4,018 Churchmen, 17 Presbyterians, and 11,958 Roman Catholics; 7 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 280 children; and 21 daily schools had on their books 51 boys and 472 girls. Four of the schools were connected with the Kildare Place Society, and salaried with respectively £10, £8, £10, and £15, from subscription; another was salaried with £10, and other advantages from subscription; another with £8 from the National Board, and £2 from subscription; and another, with £10 from the National Board, and £1 from subscription. In 1841, the Kinawley Loan Fund had a capital of £1,702, circulated £4,338 in 995 loans, cleared a nett profit of £7, and expended for charitable purposes £90; and from the date of its institution till the close of 1841, it circulated £17,225 in 4,054 loans, cleared a nett profit of £212, and expended for charitable purposes £173 2s. 5d.

KINBANE. See KENBANE.

KINCON, a village in the parish of Kilfian, barony of Tyrawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. Area, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 125. Houses 20.

KINCORA, the seat of the celebrated Brian Boromh, and the chosen residence of the kings of Munster and North Munster, in the parish of Killaloe, barony of Lower Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It is situated on the Shannon, at the extreme point of the expansion of Lough Derg, 1 mile north-north-west of the city of Killaloe. But the only existing memorials of it are a large circular earthen fort, called Bal-Boromh, on its own site, and a modern residence, called Kincora-Lodge, half-way thence to Killaloe. "What had been the particular character of the structure at Kincora," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "we have but little means of conjecturing. In 1012, the Four Masters record the erection of many daingins, or fortified places, by Brian Boru; amongst the rest the caher of Kincora; but this we regard as merely a re-edifying, for we have numerous notices of the place previous to that year, and even in the year preceding. We find the same annals mention that Brian, at the head of an expedition, which he made to Cinell-Conaill, carried off with him O'Maoldora, the king of that district, in captivity, to Kincora. As this re-edifying, or re-construction, was anterior to the introduction of the castellated style of building in Ireland, we can only suppose that the strength of these places lay in the outworks, the great stone ramparts, and successive ditches, rather than in the interior dwellings and offices, which were probably not storied, and in which length and breadth, rather than height, were had in view. Timber frame-work, or cob-work, formed the walls, and the roofs were thatched: such we know to have been the style of contemporaneous Saxon and British dwellings. That Kincora was ornamented with trees, and possessed the luxuries of artificial fish-ponds, or rather salmon-wiers, we gather from Tigernach, who informs us, that in 1061, Hugh O'Connor burnt Killaloe, and overturned Kincora to its very foundations, and that his soldiers devoured the salmon from the fish-pond; which pond they also at the same time destroyed. Kincora was soon afterwards re-edified, for in 1069, Tady, son of Toreloch O'Brien, is recorded as dying in his father's bed at that place. In two years after this, the caher of Kincora was again destroyed by the northern Irish, who had pursued Murkestach O'Brien thither, and from thence carried off captives. In 1094, it was again re-edified by Murtogh O'Brien. In 1104, it was burnt by lightning; and in 1118, Tureloch O'Connor of Connaught, led a great army thither, which place they flung into the Shannon, as well the stones as the trees. This passage evinces that mason-work had been used in the construction of the caher, which was not the case in that of the fort of Bal-Boru, the only one of the many foundations now remaining which once constituted the palace of Brien. This solitary relic consists of a large circular earthen fort, at present having but a single vallum of about 20 feet in height, and the ditch partly filled up. The external circumference is about 650 feet; a low modern stone wall has been built for the protection of the lower part of the rampart. The inner area is 80 feet in diameter, and the surrounding vallum about 10 feet in height; the whole has been thickly planted with fir trees. On the whole, there is nothing in the appearance of the structure to distinguish it from the thousand similar forts everywhere remaining over the face of the country; but its strong position at the extremity of a steep green headland, whose base is washed at three sides by the water of the river."

KINDELAN. See CASTLE-KINDELAN.

KINDEVIN, the small demesne of Robert Sproule, Esq., in the parish of Street, 3 miles north-north-east of Rathowen, barony of Moygoish, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It extorts a separate notice on account of the important improvements its proprietor has effected in the drainage and reclamation of swampy grounds.

KINEAGH, a parish, 3 miles west by south of Rathvilly, and partly in the barony of Kilkea and Moone, co. Kildare, but chiefly in the barony of Rathvilly, co. Carlow, Leinster. The two sections are mutually separated by the intervention of the Carlow parish of Rahill. Length of the main body of the Kildare section, westward, 2½ miles; breadth, from a few perches to 2 miles; area, 3,008 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches,—of which 981 acres, 33 perches form a detached district 2½ miles to the south-south-east, but a district which, nevertheless, is contiguous with the Carlow section. Length of the Carlow section, westward, 3 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 3,289 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,441; in 1841, 1,580. Houses 242. Pop. of the Carlow section, in 1841, 938. Houses 142. The land is, in general, excellent. The seats in the Carlow section are Ricketstown, Bettyfield, and Philipstown; and in the Kildare section, Newtown. The church is in the Carlow section; and the highest ground is on the west boundary of the main body of the Kildare section, and has an altitude of 855 feet.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £105 17s. 9½d.; glebe, £37. Gross income, £142 17s. 9½d.; nett, £132 14s. 11d. Patron, the vicars choral of St. Patrick's, Dublin. Rectorial tithe composition to the amount of £80 is appropriated to the bishop of Kildare; and to the amount of £80 is inappropriate in the vicars choral of St. Patrick's, Dublin,—to the amount of £21 17s. 9d. in the Duke of Leinster,—to the amount of £22 18s. 9d. in John D. Dukett, Esq.,—and to the amount of £14 11s. 7d. in Hugh Cumming, Esq. The church was built in 1832, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 140. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 74, and the Roman Catholics to 1,389.

KINELEARTY, a barony of co. Down, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by Upper Castlereagh; on the east, by Dufferin; on the south-east, by Lecale; on the south, by the inner harbour of Dundrum and by Upper Iveagh; and on the west, by Upper and Lower Iveagh. Its greatest length, in the direction of south by east, is 11½ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 7 miles; and its area is 40,322 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches,—of which 426½ acres are water. The culminating summit of the Slieve-Croob group of mountains is situated near the middle of the western boundary; but, excepting the upland declivities, which descend from that summit to the east, the surface of the barony prevalently exhibits the tumulated, billocky, and undulating character which characterizes the greater part of the county. The Ballinahinch river, flowing eastward, effects most of the drainage toward Lough Strangford; but some streamlets run southward to Dundrum harbour, and some northward within the basin of the Lagan. Acholy MacCartane, the last independent toparch of Kinelearty, and the descendant of a race of toparchs of the district, was able to muster only 80 fighting men for a conflict; and he submitted to Queen Elizabeth. "Kinelearta, more properly Kinelartan," says a 'Chorographical Description of Down,' written exactly a century ago, "was so called from an ancient proprietor of that tract named Artane, from whence MacCartan, or more properly MacArtan, of the race of Ire, from whence sprang also the Magennises of Iveagh. 'Kinell' signifies a branch of a family from whence tracts of countries have taken their names, and imports not only the head of a family, but the country possessed by them. So 'Kinellartane' is the country of Artane.—This barony contains the whole of the parish of Loughin-island, and part of the parishes of Annahilt, Dromara, Kilmegan, Kilmore, and Magheradroll. The only town is Ballinahinch; and the chief villages are Clough and Seaford. The annual valuation under the Poor-law act is £25,334 14s. 10d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840, were £1,374 17s. 8d., and £1,467 6s. 8d.,—and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £1,508 8s. 9d., and £1,359 11s. Pop., in 1831, 21,241; in 1841, 20,895. Houses 3,738. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,343; in manufactures and trade, 1,326; in other pursuits, 140. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,476; who could read but not write, 2,518; who could neither read nor write, 1,883. Females at and above 5 years who could read and write, 2,497; who could read but not write, 4,170; who could neither read nor write, 2,832.—Kinelearty lies within the Poor-law unions of Downpatrick and Lisburn. The total number of tenements valued is 4,229; and of these, 2,199 were valued under £5,—936, under £10,—468, under £15,—254, under £10,—132, under £25,—54, under £30,—90, under £40,—32, under £50,—and 64, at and above £50.

KINGSALE. See KINSALE.

KING'S COUNTY.

An inland county, on the west side of the middle division of Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by co. Westmeath; on the north-east, by cos. Meath and Kildare; on the east, by co. Kildare; on the south, by Queen's co. and co. Tipperary; and on the west, by cos. Tipperary, Galway, and Roscommon. Its northern boundary is, interruptedly and to the aggregate extent of 6½ miles, traced by small streams, but is everywhere else artificial and capricious. Its north-eastern boundary with Meath, an extent of 3½ miles, is traced by a small tributary of the Boyne; and with Kildare, an extent of 4 miles, is traced by the Boyne itself. Its eastern boundary is, interruptedly and to the aggregate extent of 3½ miles, formed by streams; but is elsewhere artificial and wildly capricious. Its southern boundary line, over the first 5½ miles, is the Barrow; over the next 8½ miles, is artificial; over the next 4½ miles is Lough Annagh, and the headstream thence of the Silver river; over the next 9 miles—the direction of which, however, is southward and south-south-westward—is the water-shed of the Slievebloom mountains; and over the last 10 miles—the direction of which is also south-south-westward—is occasionally the water-shed, but generally the western declivities, and sometimes even the western base, of the Devil-Bit mountains. The western boundary-line, over the first 11 miles, is principally artificial; over the next 6½ miles is the Little Brosna; and over the last 15½ miles is, very sinuously, the Shannon. One comparatively large district, and two more pendicles, formerly lay detached at the distance of from 2½ to 8½ miles; and were chiefly or solely surrounded by co. Kildare: but, for the sake of making order and terminating absurdity, they were incorporated with co. Kildare by authority of the late acts connected with the Poor-laws and other reforms. Even the main body of the county, however, or what now constitutes its entire territory, has not only an irregular and inconvenient, but a ridiculous outline; consisting, in a general view, of a very slender and compressed oblong, extending from east to west, and of a projection south-south-westward, which goes off from the west end of the oblong with a breadth of about 11½ miles, and extends 17 miles in a somewhat tapering manner almost to a point. The greatest length of the county, westward from the most easterly point of the parish of Monasteroris to the Shannon half-a-mile below Shannon-Bridge, is 35½ miles. Its breadth, southward, from the junction point of eos. Meath and Westmeath, and King's co., to the southern boundary 2 or 3 perches south-south-west of Portarlinton, is 11½ miles; or southward from the northern boundary at the division between the parishes of Kilclonfert and Ballycommon to the southern boundary 5 furlongs south-south-east of Rath-Hill, is 6 miles; or southward from the most northerly point of the King's co. section of the parish of Kilcumreagh, to the southern boundary due south of Rath-robin House, is 9½ miles; or southward along the great south-south-westward projection of the county, in lines drawn through Frankford and Birr, is respectively 21½ and 26½ miles. Its area comprises 337,256 acres of arable land, 145,836 of uncultivated land, 8,258 of continuous plantations, 902 of towns, and 1,733 of water.

Surface.—The aggregate surface of King's co. so closely resembles that of Kildare, that a description of the one might, with mere changes of the nomenclature and position of districts and objects, be regarded as very nearly an accurate description of the other. Both include a great aggregate of the Bog of Allen; both contain a vast central tableau, flat, featureless, and comparatively low; both are relieved in the interior only by a few incon-siderable hills, by unimportant undulations, or by such nearly imperceptible water-sheds as vein the expanse of a tableau; and both possess along one frontier, in partnership with a contiguous county, a chain of mountain, whose altitudes, escarpments, and scenic power completely redeem a considerable extent of country from the prevailing monotony. King's co., however, cannot boast any such rich and beauteous valley as that of the Liffey, which adorns so large a section of Kildare; while, in partial compensation for so great a want, it sports, along the majority of its streamlets, belts of verdure and cereal wealth almost peculiarly its own. The western declivities of the Devil-Bit mountains, which extend along the east margin of the southern part of the great south-south-westward projection, have a very slender breadth within King's co., and nowhere present a higher summit than that of Knockbane, 555 feet in altitude above sea-level, and situated at the extremity of the projection. The western lateral half of the range of the Slievebloom mountains, or that longitudinal section of it which is situated within King's co., extends 9½ miles north-north-eastward from the vicinity of the sources of the Suir and the Nore, or from the north side of the depression which separates it from the Devil-Bit range; it has a mean breadth of only about 2½ miles, though the actual breadth is boldly various and continually changing; and its principal summits, named in a series from south to north, are one of 757 feet of altitude above sea-level, one of 1,332 feet, Farbreague of 1,411 feet, Arderin of 1,733 feet, Carrole-Hill of 1,584 feet, one of 1,691 feet, one of 1,602 feet, Black Gap of 1,203 feet, and Spink of 1,087 feet. The hill or mountain of Knocknaman, 1,113 feet in altitude, is usually regarded as one of the Slieveblooms; but it really stands a little detached from them, 1½ mile south-east of Kinnitty village, and 3½ miles south-west of Spink mountain. The only passages through the Slievebloom range are the Black Gap and the Gap of Glandine, the former nearly due east of Kinnitty, and the latter very nearly in the middle of the range,—but both are very lofty, exceedingly narrow, and aggregately inconvenient. All the parts of the county directly west of the mountains, or those parts which jointly with the mountains constitute the great south-south-westward projection, are low, and, in a general view, rich, verdant, ornate, or perhaps even luscious; and they blend with the Devil-Bit range, but especially with that of Slievebloom, in forming a series of beautiful landscapes, both close and extensive. See BIRN, KINNITTY, and SLIEVEBLOOM. The remainder of the county, constituting its great body, and comprising the grand oblong which extends from east to west may, for the sake of analysis, be cut southward into three not very unequal sections, western, central, and eastern, by lines through respectively Clara and Geashill. The western one of these sections is, in a general view, almost as flat and level as a bowling-green,—a vast region of fens, morasses, and bogs,—a smooth and hairy chaos of moss-plants, heaths, and ferns; yet it is much relieved, and even worked into fertility and ornateness around Banagher, along a large proportion of the valley of the Brosna, and two or three other dispersed but small localities. The river Shannon, when within only 2 or 3 miles of taking leave of the west boundary of the district, or at the point where it is intersected by the Grand Canal, has a surface elevation above sea-level of 115 feet, and a principal lake among the bogs of the south-east corner of the district has an elevation of 177 feet: yet so low and monotonous is the whole of the land, whether bog, pasture, or arable ground, that heights of 174, 209, and 221 feet above sea-level figure in the maps of the Ordinance Survey as principal points of altitude; and the only tolerable apologies for hills of any sort, are Cloghan-Hill, 378 feet in height, and situated in the vicinity of the village of Cloghan, and Knockhill, 499 feet in height, and situated on the very eastern margin of the district. The central section has a considerably less proportion of bog, and a considerably larger proportion of woodland and demesne-ground, than the western section; yet it has the same flatness, lowness, and tameness of general character; it presents no higher summits than four of respectively 435, 409, 379, and 457 feet of altitude above sea-level; and it possesses relief or ornament, principally in the south-west corner, along the vale of the Clodagh, and along the western half of the northern border or margin. The eastern section is a curious patchwork of bogs, morasses, meadows, arable grounds, woodlands, and demesnes; but the bogs and morasses have far the ascendancy in superficial extent, and so prevalently impinge upon all the other varieties of ground with which the district is tessellated, as to give their dull, dead tone to much the larger proportion of the landscape. Croghan-Hill, in the north-west, is comparatively a grand feature, and naturally a far, panoramic-seeing summit, possessing an altitude of 769 feet above sea-level; but the only other tolerable hill within the limits of the district is one of nearly 360 feet in altitude. Any reader will easily infer, that excepting the small aggregate proportion of the western declivities of the Slievebloom mountains which are rocky or otherwise waste ground, very nearly the whole of the enormous surface of 145,836 acres of uncultivated land within the county, consists of unreclaimed bogs.

Waters.—The river Shannon, over the whole course of its connection with the county, is navigable, and offers valuable facilities of communication northward to the great lakes of its upper basin, and southward to Limerick and the ocean. The Black-water drains a district of bogs in the extreme north-west; and pursues a west-south-westerly course to the Shannon, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile below Shannon-Bridge. The Brosna comes in from Westmeath, and runs about 14 miles south-westward and west-south-westward through King's co. to the Shannon at Shannon Harbour. The Clara rivulet runs $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile on the northern boundary, and 3 miles in the interior, westward to the Brosna, a mile below Clara. The Clodagh comes in from Queen's co., and describes the quarter of a circle from north to west, and over a distance of about $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the Brosna $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile below Ballycumber. The Silver river issues in two head-streams from Lough Annagh on the boundary with Queen's co., and from the west end of the Black Gap, and performs an extreme run of about 13 miles, prevalently northward, to the Brosna, 24 miles below the embouchure of the Clodagh. The Little Brosna rises at the south-west extremity of the Slievebloom mountains, and flows about $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-westward, partly in the interior of King's co., but chiefly on the boundary with co. Tipperary, to the Shannon $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles below Banagher. The Borris-o'-Kane rivulet and two other minor streams drain the southern part of the great south-south-westward projection, in a westerly direction into co. Tipperary and toward the Shannon. These drainages are all within the basin of the Shannon; and they include the whole of the baronies of the county except those of Philipstown, Coolestown, and Warrenstown, jointly constituting a district in the east of $14\frac{1}{2}$ miles in extreme length and $12\frac{1}{2}$ in extreme breadth, and naturally divided into two parts of respectively about one-third within the basin of the Boyne, and about two-thirds within the basin of the Barrow. The principal streams of the Boyne district are the Boyne itself on the north-east boundary, and its Mengagh and Yellow-river affluents eastward; and the principal streams of the Barrow district are the Barrow itself on the southern boundary, the Little Barrow chiefly on the eastern boundary, and the Feagile southward through the interior.—The principal lakes within the county are Lough Boora, of 107 acres, 10 perches, in area, in the baronies of Ballyboy and Garrycastle; Lough Annaghmore, of 111 acres, 29 perches, in the barony of Ballyboy, but extending also into Queen's co.; Lough Pallas, of 82 acres, 2 roods, 29 perches, in the barony of Ballyboy; Lough Fin, of 186 acres, in the barony of Garrycastle; Lough Nashade, of 16 acres, 26 perches, in the baronies of Warrenstown and Lower Philipstown; and Lough Ballinderry, of 71 acres, in the barony of Kilcoursey. The Grand Canal traverses the county westward from end to end; comes in from co. Kildare at an elevation of 261 feet above sea-level, and descends to the Shannon at the embouchure of the Brosna; sends off a small branch to Edenderry, and a longer one toward Kilbeggan; touches the towns of Philipstown and Tullamore; and affords to all the central and northern districts of the county the whole of its facilities of communication eastward to Dublin, and westward to the Shannon and to Ballinasloe.

Climate.—The county's configuration of surface, and its distance from the sea, occasion its climate to be much less moist than that of many other districts in Ireland. The great prevalence of bog appears to exert little of the malign influence which so generally arises from morasses; and the nonputrescent quality of the bog of the country is evinced by the state of comparatively high preservation in which pieces of timber are found at exceedingly great depths. The average narrowness of most of the county from north to south, and the occupancy of much of the broad part with the Slievebloom mountains, prevent any perceptible variation among different districts in seed-time and harvest.

Minerals.]—A formation of clay slate and greywacke slate occupies the summit and higher declivities of the Slievebloom mountains; and measures within the boundary-line of King's co., about $8\frac{1}{2}$ statute miles, by on the average about $1\frac{1}{2}$. The rock dips 70° toward the south; it generally consists of strata of from 1 foot to 3 feet in thickness, but in some places it laminates into excellent flags of from 1 inch to 5 inches in thickness; and it may, in a general view, be described as a quartzose clay slate, approaching in granulation and appearance to fine-grained greywacke. A formation of yellow sandstone constitutes all the King's co. section of the Devil-Bit mountains, and also all the surface parts of the Slievebloom mountains not occupied by the clay slate. It has usually a grey or yellowish-white colour, and rarely the redness which characterizes the yellow sandstone formation farther south; it lies conformably on the supporting clay slate rock; and it is very compact, consists of granular particles of quartz, and seldom passes into conglomerate.—A protruded brecciated greenstone formation, tilting up the edges of encincturing flötz limestone, constitutes the Hill of Croghan. The rock varies in colour from pale lavender to greyish-black; it contains a general diffusion of calcareous matter, in the form especially of rounded lumps; it consists, where its colour is palest, of compact felspar and carbonate of lime, and where its colour is least pale, of a mixture of hornblende and felspar, with minute disseminated particles of quartz, calcareous spar, and iron-pyrites; it exhibits such a profusion of stony grains and lumpish pieces of its component ingredients, particularly of the calcareous fragment, as to rank doubtfully between greenstone breccia and greenstone conglomerate; and it is very easily decomposed, and forms a soil so singularly rich and friable as to have produced a luxuriance of both green and cereal crops without any manurial aid. Some considerable masses of greenstone appear also about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile from Philipstown, in the direction of Croghan hill.—Granular limestone, of the quality of marble, occurs in the parish of Clonmacnoise, and has been quarried to the amount of at least 3,000 cubic feet.—Flötz limestone, part of the vast central flötz limestone field of Ireland, occupies all the great remainder of the county, forming the substratum of all the bogs, and directly or indirectly constituting both the soil and the subsoil of the cultivated lands. Banks, low ridges, and elongated hillocks of rolled limestone gravel, usually called eskers, traverse, undulate, or otherwise diversify many districts of the flötz limestone formation; and in consequence of their appearing to have been deposited by water in rapid action, they form an interesting topic of study to the geologist.

Soils.]—"The soil of Slievebloom at this side," says the agricultural statist of the county, "is at the extremity a cold grit, and takes a great deal of lime to render it arable; its quality is argillaceous, and interspersed thickly with rocks of freestone. This upper stratum is pretty deep, in few places less than two spades from the surface, and a silicious substratum covers the whole range of the summit. The centre parallel has various soils, being of a light sandy loam, a stiff yellow clay, or gritty shallow gravel, and a deep brown earth, which is far the best of it, and the bottom line is always a cold, spongy, deep clay, only productive where the loam is so dry as to check the springs above; at the foot, where the declivity vanishes, is a deep irreclaimable bog, approachable but in very dry seasons. This will be found to be the more general description of this side the Slievebloom, but does not universally hold good; for towards the centre of this range the land is very fertile in pasture, and grazed the whole year throughout with numerous flocks of sheep and young cattle; the soil being of a limestone quality, and large rocks of that mineral thickly interspersed; neither is the bottom range boggy, but a stiff clay, where abundant crops of corn are yielded. On the mountain of Knocknaman this is the case, and also the range of Castletown Cumber, and down to Lettybrook, which latter is some of the best land in the county."—The prevailing soil of the arable parts of the vast limestone district, is either a shallow gravelly loam, or a deep moorish gravel; it is not very fertile in its natural state, but may be rendered so by the use of composts, and even of bog manures; and it needs but to be judiciously treated in a due rotation of cropping, in order to its yielding a very fair return. The moorish soils are very productive in dry summers; and, when limestone gravel is freely used upon them, they speedily become the most valuable land in the county. The pastures, though not very luxuriant, are kind and fattening, and are peculiarly suitable for sheep. Bogs reclaimed with the profuse application of limestone gravel, are remarkably luxuriant; yet they are two or three weeks later than the other lands in maturing cereal crops.

Agriculture.]—The baronies of Upper and Lower Philipstown may, in most respects, be regarded as a fair agricultural specimen of all parts of the county except the mountains and the south-south-western low grounds which they flank. The farms of the baronies average about 24 English acres; and pay a rent of from 15s. to £2 2s. per Irish acre. The soil varies from a very thin stratum of bog upon a sterile clay, to a most fertile dry loam, covering the rising grounds called islands. The produce of wheat on the poorest lands which produce it, is 7 barrels of 20 stones per Irish acre; on good lands, it averages 12 barrels; and on some choice lands, it has amounted to 17 barrels. Though the agriculture, except on a few large farms, is everywhere wretched, yet "the islands" are so fertile as almost always to produce excellent crops. The usual rotation is, first, from ley or grass, without manure; second, potatoes, slightly manured; third, fourth, and fifth, oats; and lastly, a sufficient duration of fallow to allow the exhausted land to reacquire a good sward. So great is the competition for shelter and a potatoe, that whenever a farm is known to be about to become vacant, so many as 40 or 50 applicants will strive with one another who to get it even at a high rent. Agricultural labourers are in a deplorable condition, and have of late years been rendered worse by the transmutation into grazing-grounds of a large proportion of the arable lands of some large farms; they can obtain no employment in winter, only precarious employment in summer, and not full employment even in harvest; they lie in miserable damp hovels, and scantily feed on such potatoes as in England would scarcely be regarded fit food for cattle; and they were, in consequence, described in 1836, by an intelligent policeman, as "not fatigued or inclined for rest by night, but on the contrary, restless and discontented, with a starving family, ready for any midnight outrage, and easily made tools of." A very enterprising and judicious large farmer of the name of George Rait, followed or imitated by several other large farmers, has for a considerable series of years exhibited a beautiful exemplification of the methods and successes of improved husbandry; but he has been so askance attended to by the crowd of husbandmen, and practically treated with such indifference or even contempt, that his case eminently illustrates the difficulty of disseminating enlightened agricultural principles in a large portion of Ireland, and the slothfully slow pace at which they travel. The small farmers choose to remain quite ignorant of any means of improvement; and many of them never saw any implements of husbandry except the rudest, or heard the name of many useful plants commonly cultivated by good farmers. Their ploughs have long beams and wooden mould-boards, patched with thick boards which impede their progress; their potatoes are planted in the lazy-bed manner; their wheat is covered by the spade with the soil lifted from the furrows; and their green crops are very nearly a nonentity, and, in every instance, fail to make even the slightest provision for the practice of summer stall-feeding,—the grand recipe for a constant and abundant supply of good manure, and the lucrative means of enabling a small farmer to keep three cows for every one he kept before. The small farmers keep each from one to six sheep; and the women spin the wool into yarn, and pay 1s. per yard for the manufacturing of it into a kind of frieze which they use for clothing. In 1841, the number of farmers of from 1 acre to 5 acres in extent within the rural districts of the county, was 5,657; of from 5 to 15 acres, 4,502; of from 15 to 30 acres, 1,374; and of upwards of 30 acres, 1,213.

Live Stock.—Most of the black cattle are of the Irish long-horned breed; but English or half-bred short-horned bulls are very common. The graziers prefer the stock which has a mixture of the short-horned breed; and the bulls of that breed are, in consequence, becoming more and more used. The sheep are of a large, long-woolled kind, that are capable of being fat and plump at two years of age. The horses are light-boned active animals, and well suited to work double in the plough, or to draw one-horse carts. The long-legged race of pigs have quite disappeared; and the kind now in use are thick, and apparently well inclined to fatten.—In 1841, the live stock, on farms or holdings not exceeding one acre, consisted of 638 horses and mules, 1,457 asses, 1,709 cattle, 942 sheep, 5,107 pigs, and 44,915 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 1,754 horses and mules, 1,334 asses, 3,425 cattle, 1,805 sheep, 5,093 pigs, and 44,204 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 4,233 horses and mules, 354 asses, 6,818 cattle, 6,654 sheep, 6,221 pigs, and 58,654 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 2,451 horses and mules, 214 asses, 5,279 cattle, 8,477 sheep, 3,103 pigs, and 23,206 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 4,089 horses and mules, 210 asses, 16,685 cattle, 48,369 sheep, 3,910 pigs, and 30,316 poultry. The totals of these classes, together with their respective estimated value, are 13,165 horses and mules, £105,320; 3,560 asses, £3,560; 33,916 cattle, £220,454; 66,247 sheep, £72,817; 23,374 pigs, £29,218; and 201,295 poultry, £5,032. Grand total of estimated value, £436,455. But these statistics are exclusive of the live stock in the civic districts; and the classes of this, together with their respective estimated value, were 458 horses and mules, £3,664,—271 asses, £271,—630 cattle, £4,095,—358 sheep, £394,—1,319 pigs, £1,649,—and 1,803 poultry, £45. Total estimated value of live stock in the civic districts, £10,118.

Woods.—Sir Charles Coote said, in 1801, "There are no woods but at Killeigh, and those comprised in ornamental plantations, as at Charleville, yet no quantity of very old timber is here. On the border of the county, adjoining Tipperary, is a good appearance of wood, but yet does not amount to any that is very old. Cangor has the oldest and growest timber, and much of this has made way for young plantations. Knocknamase has some old valuable timber, but the greater part of the wood in this county is ornamental, and in demesne lands, though originally its whole face was one uninterrupted forest, of which it bears evident marks to this day; the alder was natural to the soil, and a small patch of its ancient forest, which has quite the venerable appearance of antiquity, stands yet protected in the park at Droughtville."—In 1841, the continuous woods within the county consisted of 557 acres of oak, 84 of ash, 12 of elm, 41 of beech, 816 of fir, 6,197 of mixed trees, and 551 of orchards,—in all, 8,258 acres; and of these there were planted previous to 1791, 270 acres of oak, 9 of ash, 4 of beech, 32 of fir, 2,150 of mixed trees, and 115 of orchards. The total number of detached trees in the same year was 468,362,—equivalent to 2,927 acres; and thus the grand total of actual woodlands was 11,185 acres.

Trade and Manufactures.—The average annual aggregate of sales of grain at the principal market-towns within the county during the 10 years terminating in 1836, was as follows—counting 26 stones to the barrel of wheat, and 16 to the barrel of barley and of oats:—at Tullamore, 45,000 barrels of wheat, 35,000 of oats, and 20,000 of barley; at Philipstown, 100 of wheat, 9,000 of oats, and 6,000 of barley; at Clara, 16,000 of wheat, and 16,600 of oats; at Fethane, 60,000 of wheat, 30,000 of oats, and 300 of barley; at Cloghan, 5,800 of wheat, and 300 of oats; at Banagher, 25,000 of wheat, 40,000 of oats, and 1,000 of barley; at Birr, 5,600 of wheat, 15,100 of oats, and 13,000 of barley; and at Edenderry, 20,000 of wheat, 30,000 of oats, and 25,000 of barley.—The departments and condition of both trade and productive industry will be best shown by a statistic view of the classes of persons whom they employ. In 1841, there were in the county 121 millers, 12 brewers, 11 distillers, 132 bakers, 24 confectioners, 2 soda-water makers, 1 fishmonger, 4 fruiterers, 18 cattle-dealers, 55 pig-jobbers, 283 huxters and provision-dealers, 137 butchers, 36 victuallers, 43 grocers, 5 tobacconists, 13 flax-dressers, 68 carders, 927 flax-spinners, 2 cotton-spinners, 105 wool-spinners, 2,619 spinners of unspecified classes, 6 winders and warpers, 13 wool-dressers, 16 cotton-weavers, 4 corduroy-weavers, 166 linen-weavers, 32 woollen-weavers, 1 stuff-weaver, 2 silk-weavers, 3 lace-weavers, 480 weavers of unspecified classes, 2 woollen manufacturers, 3 lace-manufacturers, 12 dyers, 1 corduroy-cutter, 14 curriers, 10 tanners, 163 brogue-makers, 780 boot and shoe makers, 658 tailors, 644 sempstresses, 635 dress-makers, 37 milliners, 25 stay-makers, 2 comb-makers, 560 knitters, 33 hatters, 111 bonnet-makers, 4 cap-makers, 8 glovers, 8 hairdressers and barbers, 1 umbrella-maker, 3 leather-dealers, 1 hosier, 7 haberdashers, 11 woollen-drapers, 31 pedlars, 30 dealers in old clothes, 17 mg and bone dealers, 7 builders, 32 brick-makers, 71 stone-cutters, 10 lime-burners, 8 bricklayers, 20 stone-masons, 79 slaters, 10 thatchers, 25 plasterers, 50 sawyers, 911 carpenters, 25 cabinet-makers, 128 coopers, 10 turners, 17 millwrights, 12 wheelwrights, 8 shipwrights, 6 pump-borers, 6 reed-makers, 3 brush-makers, 6 basket-makers, 26 broom-makers, 1 miner, 2 iron-founders, 436 blacksmiths, 3 farriers, 22 whitesmiths, 100 nailers, 10 gunsmiths, 11 braziers and coppersmiths, 4 wire-workers, 1 pin-maker, 3 bell-hangers, 6 plumbers, 22 tin plate workers, 49 tinkers, 6 machine-makers, 2 clock and watch makers, 12 watchmakers, 3 goldsmiths, silversmiths, and jewellers, 23 coach and car makers, 20 saddlers, 22 harness-makers, 7 rope-makers, 10 letter-press printers, 1 bookbinder, 6 mat-makers, 21 chandlers and soap-boilers, 1 starch-manufacturer, 86 painters and glaziers, 5 tobacco pipe makers, 4 delph dealers, 3 booksellers and stationers, 6 ironmongers, 105 dealers of unspecified classes, 343 shopkeepers of unspecified classes, 175 shop-assistants, 3 tradesmen of unspecified classes, and 22 apprentices of unspecified classes.

Fairs.—The principal fairs at present held within King's co., are the following: Ballyboy, May 4, Aug. 21, and Dec. 6; Ballycowan, July 31; Ballycumber, May 2; and Dec. 1; Banagher, Sept. 15; Birr, Feb. 11, May 15, Aug. 25, and Dec. 11; Brusna, Aug. 4; Clara, Jan. 6, Feb. 1, March 25, May 12, June 29, July 25, Sept. 26, and Nov. 1; Clongown, July 22; Cloghan, March 17, May 15, Aug. 15, and Oct. 29; Dunkerrin, May 4, May 14, Sept. 23, Nov. 3, and Dec. 21; Edenderry, Shrove-Tuesday, Thursday after Whitsunday, and Nov. 4; Ferbane, Aug. 2, and Oct. 20; Frankford, April 28, May 28, Sept. 23, and Nov. 8; Gallen, May 21; Geashill, May 1, Oct. 6, and Dec. 26; Killyon, June 5, and Oct. 10; Killeigh, June 1, and Oct. 16; Kinnitty, May 25, and Oct. 2; Moneygall, Aug. 3, and Nov. 24; Philipstown, Jan. 3, March 28, May 15, June 24, Aug. 17, Oct. 18, and Dec. 3; Rathlione, May 14; Shannon-Bridge, Jan. 1, April 28, June 24, and Sept. 12; Shinrone, July 9, and Nov. 21; and Tullamore, March 19, May 10, July 10, Oct. 21, and Dec. 13.

Communications.—We noticed in the section on the "Waters" of the county, the singularly rich advantages enjoyed in connection with the transit of the Grand Canal from end to end of the county, the deflection of two branches from that canal to the north, and the long sweep of the Shannon navigation along the whole of the extreme west.—The Main Trunk of the southern system of railways, projected by the Public Commissioners, touches a salient angle of the county in the vicinity of Portarlinton; and a line projected by other parties, from Dublin to Galway by way of Mullingar and Athlone, touches the extreme angle of the barony of Kilcoursey very nearly due north of Clara.—The county surveyor was appointed in May 1834; and he had under his charge, in 1842, 729 miles of road, only 5 of which were made subsequently to the date of his appointment. The most important public roads within King's co., are the Dublin and Galway mail-road across a small northern wing of the county, the Dublin and Limerick mail-road across the southern part of the great south-south-western projection, the mail-road from Cashel to Ballinasloe, the mail-roads from Kilbeggan to Tullamore, Frankford, and Banagher, and the stage-coach road from Dublin to Birr.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in the county was 254, of scholars 10,139, of male scholars 5,787, of female scholars 3,929, of scholars whose sex was not specified 420, of scholars connected with the Established Church 2,064, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 1, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissenters 21, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 7,959, and of scholars whose ecclesiastical connection was not ascertained 94; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 254, of scholars 10,391, of male scholars 6,072, of female scholars 4,162, of scholars whose sex was not specified 157, of scholars connected with the Established church 2,103, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 1, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissenters 11, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 8,036, and of scholars whose ecclesiastical connection was not ascertained 240. The statistics of education and of ecclesiastical matters for 1834, were arranged according to the diocesan divisions; and those for King's co., may be inferred by reference to the articles MEATH, KILLALOE, and KILDARE. At the close of 1842, the National Board had in full operation within the county 46 schools conducted by 34 male and 20 female teachers, attended by 2,630 male and 2,838 female scholars, and aided during the year with £574 13s. 4d. in salaries, and £68 18s. 1½d. in school-requisites.—The number of persons committed for public offences, in 1842, was 559; and of these, 138 were charged with offences against the person, 16 with offences against property committed with violence, 292 with offences against property committed without violence, 1 with a malicious offence against property, 4 with offences against the currency, and 108 with offences not included in the above categories. The number convicted was 294; and of these, 2 were sentenced to death, 32 to transportation, 227 to imprisonment, 28 to pay fines, and 5 were discharged or not sentenced. The number acquitted was 265; and of these, 133 were found not guilty on trial, 102 had no bill found against them, 5 were not prosecuted, and 25 were bailed and not tried. On Jan. 1, 1843, the constabulary force consisted of 1 third rate county-inspector, 1 first rate sub-inspector, 3 second rate sub-inspectors, 1 third rate sub-inspector, 2 first rate head-constables, 4 second rate head-constables, 48 constables, 244 first rate sub-constables, 19 second rate sub-constables, and 7 mounted police. The cost of maintaining this force during 1842 was £13,681 2s. 11½d. A stipendiary magistrate is stationed at Tullamore. The county gaol is at Tullamore, and a bridewell is at Birr. The assizes are held at Tullamore; quarter-sessions at Tullamore, Birr, and Philipstown; and petty-sessions at Ballycumber, Banagher, Bellmount, Clara, Clongown, Doone, Edenderry, Fahy, Frankford, Kinnitty, Moneygall, Birr, Philipstown, Portarlinton, Shinrone, Thomastown, and Tullamore. The county infirmary is at Tullamore; the district lunatic asylum, to which King's co. may send 48 patients, is at Maryborough in Queen's co.; fever hospitals are at Birr and Shinrone; and dispensaries are at Banagher, Clara, Edenderry, Ferbane, Frankford, Geashill, Kinnitty, Leap, Moneygall, Birr, Philipstown, Rhode, and Shinrone. Savings-banks are at Tullamore and Parsonstown; and Loan Funds in Ballyrichy, Bellare, Clara, Edenderry, Ferbane, Kinnitty, Birr, and Tullamore. Poor-law union workhouses are at Tullamore, Edenderry, and Birr. The annual amount of property valued for the poor-rate is £294,965. The grand jury presentments, in 1842, amounted to £25,085, equivalent to 1s. 2½d. per acre. The staff of the county militia is stationed at Birr. The only boroughs which ever existed in the county are Philipstown and Banagher; and both were disfranchised at the Legislative Union. The county sends two members to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1841, 1,078; of whom, 961 were freeholders, and 117 were leaseholders.

Pop., in 1792, 74,500; in 1813, 113,226; in 1821, 131,088; in 1831, 144,225; in 1841, 146,857. The following statistics are all of 1841. Males, 72,651; females, 74,206; families, 26,683. Houses inhabited, 24,534; houses built but not inhabited, 932; houses in the course of erection, 118. First class houses, 669; second class, 5,417; third class, 12,020; fourth class, 6,428. Families residing in first class houses, 757; in second class houses, 6,083; in third class houses, 12,928; in fourth class houses, 6,915. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 17,582; in manufactures and trade, 4,461; in other pursuits, 4,640. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1,086; on the directing of labour, 8,103; on their own manual labour, 16,738; on means not specified, 756. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food 32,748, to clothing 2,384, to lodging 2,718, to health 64, to justice 489, to education 249, to religion 126, unclassified 3,065, without any specified occupations 2,532. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food 4,127, to clothing 6,363, to lodging 24, to health 53, to charity 1, to justice 2, to education 119, to religion 24, unclassified 5,361, without any specified occupations 30,469. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 24,600; who could read but not write, 11,704; who could neither read nor write, 27,373. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 13,134; who could read but not write, 17,871; who could neither read nor write, 34,461. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 4,488; attending superior schools, 457. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 4,078; attending superior schools, 255. Per-centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 48; married, 47; widowed, 5. Per-centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 40; married, 46; widowed, 14. Physicians, 29; surgeons, 19; apothecaries, 15; chemist, 1; midwives, 23; and nurse-tenders, 30. School teachers, 213 males and 82 females; ushers and tutors, 19; governesses, 33; music and dancing masters, 17 males and 4 females. Clergymen of the Established church, 35; Methodist ministers, 4; Presbyterian ministers, 2; Baptist minister, 1; Roman Catholic clergymen, 50; ministers of religion whose denominational connection was not specified, 21; nuns, 24; clerks, 4; scripture-readers, 3; sextons, 6.

Divisions and Towns.—King's co. is divided into the baronies of Warrenstown, Coolestown, Lower Philipstown, and Upper Philipstown, in the east of the main body; Geashill, Ballyboy, Ballycowan, and Kilcoursey, in the centre and partly in the west of the main body; Garrycastle, on the west of the main body; and Eglish, Ballybrit, and Clonlisk, in the south-south-western projection. The Act 6 and 7 William IV. transferred one townland of the parish of Durrow from the barony of Moycashel, co. Westmeath, to the barony of Ballycowan, King's co.,—pop., in 1841, 31; two townlands of Ballykean from Upper Philipstown to Geashill,—pop. 147; one townland of Duneany, 11 of Ballybracken, the whole parish of Harristown, and 9 townlands of Fontstown, from Upper Philipstown, King's co., to East Ophaly, co. Kildare,—pop. 2,661; and one townland of Moone from Upper Philipstown, King's co., to East Ophaly, co. Kildare,—pop. 97. The baronies as now constituted are parochially subdivided as follows:—Ballyboy contains 2 whole parishes; Ballybrit, 5 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes; Ballycowan, 3 whole parishes, and part of another parish; Clonlisk, 7 whole parishes, and part of 6 other parishes; Coolestown, 3 whole parishes, and part of another parish; Eglish, 2 whole parishes; Garrycastle, 7 whole parishes; Geashill, part of 2 parishes; Kilcoursey, 1 whole parish, and part of 3 other parishes; Lower Philipstown, 4 whole parishes, and part of another parish; Upper Philipstown, 1 whole parish, and part of 2 other parishes; and Warrenstown, 1 whole parish, and part of 2 other parishes. The towns and principal villages are, in Ballyboy, Frankford, Ballyboy, and Mount-Bolus; in Ballybrit, Birr, Kinnitty, and Crinkle; in Ballycowan, Tullamore; in Clonlisk, Shinrone, Moneygall, Dunkerrin, and Brosna; in Coolestown, Edenderry, Clonbulloge, and Conabury; in Garrycastle, Banagher, Ferbane, Cloghan, Clonony, Shannon-Harbour, Ballycumber, and Newtown; in Geashill, Geashill, Killeigh, and Ballinagar; in Kilcoursey, Charlestown and Clara; in Lower Philipstown, Philipstown; and in Upper Philipstown, Cloneygown, and part of Portarlinton. Dr. Beaufort, treating the county as still claiming some detached portions, and estimating it to contain in toto 52 parishes and 25 churches, assigns 16 parishes and 10 churches to the dio. of Meath, 16 parishes and 6 churches to the dio. of Killaloe, 18 parishes and 8 churches to the dio. of Kildare, 1 parish to the dio. of Clonfert, and 1 parish and 1 church to the dio. of Ossory.

Antiquities.—The civil and military monuments of the early and middle ages in King's co. are much fewer and less remarkable than those of most of the other counties of Ireland. Several old castles figure picturesquely in the landscape; but they are chiefly of the reign of Elizabeth, and are obscurely exhibited in either history or tradition. Three of the principal castles—those of Leap, Cloghan, and Birr—are still inhabited. Greatly the most extensive and interesting group of ruins within the county, occurs at CLONMACNOISE: which see. Twenty-eight religious houses, additional to those of Clonmacnoise, have been enumerated; and the chief of them were a monastery for Augustinian canons at Gallen, a priory of the Holy Cross, a friary of minorites, and a nunnery of Augustinians at Killeigh, a convent of Carmelites at Kilcarmic, a convent of minorites at Monasteroris, and a monastery at Seir Kyran or Saigar-Kiaran.

History.—“This county, in the most ancient history of Ireland,” says Sir Charles Coote, “was a part of that territory denominated Hy Falgia, in which district the counties of East and West Meath, Dublin, and Kildare were also included. Hy Falgia is derived from Hy Bealgia, that is, the country of the worshippers of Beal. Some years before the Christian era, on the arrival of several Caledonian colonies under the denomination of Ullagh, a number of the ancient Falgii conducted by Eoghah Bhealagh, or Eoghah Failloch, retired across the Shannon, and established a colony at Croighan; others, with their chief, retired southward into the district of Coiteigh, now the King's County. This county was also included with the Queen's County, Dublin, and Kildare, under the denomination of Hy Laighe, the chief of which territory resided at Donamase. It (or, as some say, but the southern part only) was afterwards included in the district of Eile or Hy Leagh, comprehending also the western part of the Queen's County, and the northern part of the county of Tipperary, thence was divided into 3 principalities, each governed by its paternal chief. From whence was Eile ui Chearbhuil, which was situate in the south of this county, and west of the Slabh Bladhna or Slievebloom mountains; and consequently it obtained the name of Eile ui Chearbhuil, or the plain district near the rock. The chiefs of this district were called O'Carrol, under whom was a subordinate dynast, named O'Delany, presiding over a district in the south, denominated Dal-Leagh-ma, or the district of the flat country. These territories, whose denominations seem so barbarous to us, we find in looking into their derivations, that they are significantly applied, and undeserving the harsh criticisms which some authors have bestowed on them; thus only exposing their own ignorance, by cavilling at what they did not understand. We find that great tracts of this county were in the hands of various pro-priests, and at length these several principalities were united into one kingdom, under the title of the kingdom of Ophaly, which included with this, a part of the county of Kildare. It held this title for several centuries after the landing of the English, in the reign of Henry II.; and in the history of the wars which succeeded, between the English and the natives, it is often recognised as such. Ophaly lay on the western borders of the pale, and in 1557, in the fifth of Philip and Mary, during the administration of Thomas, Earl of Sussex, was confiscated to the Crown, under the title of Western Glenmallery; at the same time was Queen's County also forfeited, under the title of Eastern Glenmallery. This great tract of country was then divided into two districts; that part of Glenmallery that lies by the river Io, (now the river Maryborough,) was called the Queen's-shire or county, and the fort and town was named Maryborough, in honour of Queen Mary; the western side was called the King's-shire or county, and the fort of Dingna named Philipstown in compliment to King Philip. We find this country had been the scene of wars for a length of time, and that the O'Connors, who were the ancient chiefs, kept up constant skirmishes with the royal forces, and were very troublesome neighbours to the English Pale, but at length were entirely reduced. The clan dispersed in 1558, and their territory given by the Lord-lieutenant and council to Teig O'Carroll, who thence became the Lord of the country. This was during the last year of Queen Mary's reign; in 17 years after it is related by Ware, that the O'Connors fought to obtain their lands from the O'Carrolls, and between them and their sept the country was almost ruined. These intestine broils continued for many years, until in 1599, the Lord-lieutenant entered the county with an army of 2,500 men, and entirely subdued the O'Connors, as also the O'Mores, in the Queen's County, who had rebelled; but, in the succeeding year, they became as troublesome as before, when Sir Oliver Lambert came with 1,000 foot and 100 horse, relieved the fort of Philipstown, which had been closely besieged, and with great conduct and bravery dispersed the insurgents on every side." The scenes of the principal and almost only noticeable events during the wars of 1641, and the Revolution, were BIRR and TULLAMORE: which see. The forfeitures consequent on both wars were very extensive,—those after the Revolution amounting to 30,459 acres of profitable land, estimated to have then a total value of £89,321 14s.; and the principal families among the attainted were the Coghlanes, the Carrolls, the Geoghegans, and the Graces.

KINGSCOURT, a post and market town, in the parish of Enniskeen, barony of Clonchee, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Clones, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-south-west of the junction of the counties of Cavan, Meath, and Monaghan, 5 south-west of Carrickmacross, 6 south-south-east of Shercock, 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Nobber, and 37 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Dublin. Immediately adjacent to the town on the east and north-east lies the extensive, richly-wooded, and brilliant demesne of CABRA-CASTLE [see that article]; and 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the west soars the summit of Loughanleagh, to the altitude of 1,116 feet above sea-level. The town itself consists principally of one long straggling street; and contains an inn, a spacious Roman Catholic chapel, and a neat church. A Presbyterian meeting-house also takes name from it, but is really situated about two miles distant. The town contains some well-built and respectable houses. A considerable amount of agricultural produce is sold at the weekly markets; and fairs are held on April 17, May 23, June 18, Aug. 1, Sept. 19, Nov. 8, and Dec. 4, and 20. In 1838, the only public conveyance was a coach in transit between Clones and Dublin. A dispensary in the town is within the Bailieborough Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 14,410 acres, with a pop. of 4,844; and, in 1839-40, it expended £98 13s. 2d., and administered to 1,160 patients. In 1841, the Kingscourt Loan Fund had a capital of £2,646, circulated £10,700 in 2,637 loans, cleared a nett profit of £186 6s. 9d., and expended for charitable purposes £201; and from the date of its institution till the close of that year, it circulated £24,032 in 7,005 loans, cleared a nett profit of £450 12s. 9d., and expended for charitable purposes £299 15s. Kingscourt gives name to a Roman Catholic parish, in the dio. of Meath: the chapels of the parish are situated at Kingscourt and Meath. Area of the town, 68 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,616; in 1841, 1,614. Houses 284. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 70; in manufactures and trade, 184; in other pursuits, 52. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 187; on their own manual labour, 93; on means not specified, 16.

KING'S RIVER, a stream of co. Tipperary, Munster, and of co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Its remotest head-water rises in the upland coalfield of the parish of Buolick, in co. Tipperary, and runs 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles southward and south-eastward, through the parishes of Buolick, Ballingarry, Mowney, Lismalin, and Modeshil, to the boundary between Munster and Leinster. The next head-stream, commonly called the Munster river, rises at an elevation above sea-level of about 1,060 feet, and runs 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles southward, along the boundary between Munster and Leinster, to the former head-stream. The united stream now takes an easterly direction; and is joined, after a run of $\frac{1}{2}$ mile, by the third head-stream, which rises at an elevation of about 800 feet in the parishes of Tubrid-Britain and Tullaroan, and runs 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles southward, through the parishes of Kilmanagh, Kilmaloe, and Callan. The triply conjoint stream now runs 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles eastward through the parishes of Mallardstown, Kells, and Ennisnag, and between those of Danesfort and Church-Jerpoint, to the Nore at a point 3 miles west-south-west of Thomastown. The principal seats of population on its banks are Callan and Kells.

KING'S RIVER, a rivulet of the barony of Lower Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It rises on the east border of the parish of Boystown, at an elevation of upwards 2,000 feet above sea-level, and describes a semicircle of 9 miles through the parishes of Boyston and Hollywood, and makes a further run northward of nearly 3 miles in the former of these parishes to the Liffey, at a point about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile below Blessington. It receives about eight mountain-tributaries before it descends to an elevation of 712 feet, and the Douglas river and Little Douglas stream at an elevation of about 654 feet; and it makes its own confluence with the Liffey at an elevation of 566 feet.

KINGSTON, an alias name of the extensive estate of Mitchelstown, on the mutual frontiers of the counties of Cork and Tipperary, Munster. The name was a few years ago very frequently and almost exclusively applied to the celebrated caves in the Tipperary part of the estate; but now, in reference to these, as well as to the estate at large, and to the noble mansion of the estate's proprietor, it is almost entirely superseded by the name MITCHELSTOWN: see that article. Sir John King, the descendant of a Yorkshire family, performed important military services in the reign of Elizabeth, and received as guerdon a lease of the abbey of Boyle in co. Roscommon from Elizabeth, and several valuable grants the more modern parts of this interesting locality are gradually resolving themselves; nor until these few years past do the improvements and extensions of the town and neighbourhood appear to have been carried on under any defined plan. Streets and villas are grouped and scattered apparently at random, and the whole of that tract which stretches along the shore from the village of Blackrock to the base of the Killiney hills—a distance of 3 miles—which is partially covered with buildings of every character, exhibits evident want of arrangement. The older parts of the town are badly and inconveniently built; and the roads—for they are not worthy of the name of streets—ill formed and worse kept. In many of the modern parts, however, such as Gresham and Haddington terraces, as also in the streets now in progress, elegance, uniformity, and comfort have been attended to.—The principal buildings, additional to many neat and elegant mansions and villas, are several hotels, a Free church, a Mariners' church, a large Roman Catholic chapel, a Presbyterian meeting-house, a Methodist meeting-house, a Quakers' meeting-house, and several schools. On the summit of a rude mass of granite in the vicinity of the harbour stands an obelisk commemorative of the landing and departure of George IV. The obelisk is enclosed by an elegant oval-formed iron railing; rests on four large balls; and is decorated with sunk pannels, and surmounted by a crown. The inscriptions on it state that the king in person named the adjacent harbour the Royal Harbour of George the Fourth, that the obelisk was erected in 1823, during the Viceroyalty of Marquis Wellesley, and that the first stone of the east pier of the harbour was laid by Lord Whitworth, Lord-lieutenant, on May 31st, 1817.

Railways.—The railway from Dublin to Kingstown has already been fully noticed in our article on the city of DUBLIN: which see. The atmospheric railway, to connect Kingstown with Dalkey, is the protergon of its class,—at once the first example and the model of all atmospheric railways which may exist. It is constructed on an old tram railroad, which was used for conveying stones to Kingstown harbour; and it presents several curves sharper than any which occur on ordinary railways. The line is $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length, and rises $71\frac{1}{2}$ feet toward Dalkey, making a gradient of 1 in 115. The main pipe between the rails, which is 15 inches internal diameter, commences at Kingstown station, and is continued to within 500 yards of Dalkey. The communication between the main pipe and the steam-engine (at Dalkey), is formed through the medium of a close pipe, laid outside the trackway, and attached at the lower end into the main, and at the upper end into the vacuum pump. A branch valve is placed at the junction between the close and open main, which allows the vacuum pump to act on the main, or be shut off from it at pleasure. The dimensions of the engine are—Cylinder $34\frac{1}{2}$ inches diameter; stroke, 5 feet 6 inches; speed, 242 feet per minute. It works expansively—the steam being admitted in the cylinder at 40 lbs. above the atmosphere, and cut off at one-fourth stroke when the engine is at its full load; it is then expanded for the remaining portion of the stroke, and condensed in the usual way. The degree of cut-off is regulated by a cam worked by the governor, and is therefore proportionately shorter as the duty of the engine is less; but in no case is the steam admitted for a greater distance than one-fourth of the stroke. The vacuum pump is double acting. The dimensions are—Diameter, 67 inches; stroke, 5 feet 6 inches; speed, 242 feet per minute.

says the Mechanics' Almanac for 1844, “has been achieved—atmospheric railway travelling is no longer a theory—it is now a practical result of unerring principles and mechanical skill; and to Ireland belongs the honour of having first risked the experiment, and carried the enterprise into an example for the rest of the world to profit by as well as herself. An experimental line on this principle has been laid down from Dublin to Dalkey, and is now on the point of being opened. Although but a mile and three quarters long, it presents some rather formidable difficulties; starting from Kingstown, for more than half the distance it is a succession of sharp curves, three of which are little more than 500 feet radius, whilst the ascent to Dalkey in that short distance is $71\frac{1}{2}$ feet perpendicular—the small portion of this distance, which is unaffected by stopping, or starting, is uniformly passed over at a rate exceeding 40 miles per hour, the inclination being 1 in 115; the train of six carriages, crammed with passengers, has been occasionally permitted to travel at between 50 and 60 miles per hour; and on one occasion a single carriage was sent at a rate of upwards of 80 miles per hour; and, on this occasion, the resealing of the long valve was perfectly effected. Several times the train has been stopped by the brakes within 20 yards, the full power of the engine being still applied; and, after remaining at rest for about half a minute, a velocity of 35 miles per hour was obtained within half-a-mile up to the same incline of 1 in 115. The centrifugal tendency to fly off at a tangent has been remarkably counteracted by corresponding elevations and depressions on either line of rails, as the case may require; and as no danger could arise even in the narrowest practicable curves from this cause, except from an excess of velocity, that excess has been amply provided against by a most ingenious contrivance for regulating the degree of exhaustion to be maintained in the cylinder while passing through the curves. It is very simple, and quite efficient. In the piston carriage (which leads the train) stands a barometer, from the top of which a tube passes down and runs along the piston rod till it reaches and perforates the piston, and thus communicates with that part of the cylinder in advance which is undergoing the process of exhaustion; the amount of which is thus ascertainable in the piston carriage, from whence the engineer can communicate by signals with the engine-house, and thus regulate the element of motion. At present this is done by flags and other signals, but it is intended to establish along the line an electric telegraph, by which communication can be carried on with the speed of thought, and with infallible certainty. When this delicate instrument shall be complete, nothing will be wanting towards the perfect management of the sufficing velocity.

The Harbour.—The small original fishery pier of Dunleary is included within the present magnificent works; and together with its former tide-harbour, is now crossed by the Dublin and Kingstown railway. The present harbour was designed by the late Mr. Rennie, by order of the Lords of the Admiralty; and it was commenced in 1817, and is now very nearly completed. It consists of two piers, the one commencing at Dunleary, the other about 6 statute furlongs farther east, and both extending for about half their length north-eastward, or in the direction of Howth-Head, and then making three successive angular deflections toward each other, so as to leave an entrance of 850 feet in width between their ends, and to enclose an area of 251 statute acres. The eastern pier is 3,500 feet in total length; and the western pier is 4,950 feet. “The piers are 310 feet

50; and a Methodist meeting-house, by 60. Two Roman Catholic chapels, designated Eastern and Western Knockbride chapels, have an attendance respectively 850 and 840; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,598 Churchmen, 1,468 Presbyterians, and 6,680 Roman Catholics; and 13 daily schools—two of which were salaried with respectively £6 and £10 from subscription—had on their books 553 boys and 252 girls.

KNOCKCLOGHER, a hill, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-east of Maghera, barony of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster.

KNOCKCOMMON, a parish in the barony of Lower Duleek, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-east of Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, southward, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles; breadth, from 1 mile to $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles; area, 3,500 acres 7 perches,—of which 26 acres, 4 perches are in the river Boyne. Pop., in 1831, 902; in 1841, 1,000. Houses 154. The Boyne traces the northern boundary. The land is, for the most part, of indifferent quality. The chief residences are Newtown, Ronsaree, and Cullen. The road from Slane to Dublin passes through the interior.—This parish is a tith free curacy in the dio. of Meath; but is included in the benefice of DULEEK: which see. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 500, and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement is united to the chapel of Donore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 27, and the Roman Catholics to 905.

KNOCKCROGHERY, a village in the parish of Killenovy, barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands on the road from Roscommon to Athlone, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-east of Roscommon, and $10\frac{1}{4}$ north-north-west of Athlone. It stands on the summit and the declivity of a small hill; and forms a spacious and airy street of rather pleasing appearance. In 1830, it consisted of the parish-church and school-houses, one three-story slated house, two two-story thatched houses, two decayed two-story houses, and about two score of thatched cabins. The fair-green occupies the crown or tableau of the hill, is lined with the best houses, and, on October 25, is the arena of one of the most considerable sheep-fairs in the county. The church and school-houses crown a different eminence from that of the fair-green. The village has some local celebrity from the manufacture of a humble kind of tobacco-pipe short in the stem, small in the bowl, and peculiarly adapted to the economizing of tobacco. About eight kilns are in requisition; and they employ about 20 journeymen-moulders, and produce on the average about 500 gross of pipes per week, of the value of one shilling per gross. The clay for the manufacture is carried from a distance of two miles; and fuel is more expensive than in some other parts of the county. In 1841, the Knockcroghery Loan Fund had a capital of £1,367, and circulated £3,619: 957 loans. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 263. Houses 43.

KNOCKDEE, a hill in the barony of Clare, 2 miles north-north-east of Clare-Galway, co. Galway, Connaught. Altitude, 218 feet.

KNOCKDRIN-CASTLE, the demesne of Sir Richard Levenge, Bart., partly in the parishes of Taghmon and Tyfarnham, barony of Corkaree, but chiefly in the parish of Rathconnel, barony of Moyashel and Magheradernon, co. Westmeath, Leinster. The mansion is situated $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile east of Louisa, and $3\frac{1}{4}$ north-north-east of Mullingar; and is a handsome, castellated, modern structure. The demesne, as to its extent, surface, wood, and water, is a splendid specimen of scenery; and it combines with Mr. Gibbon's beautiful and extensive & 3d. The ore is shipped at the mines in boats, which carry it to vessels riding at anchor at some distance from the land; and supplies of timber and iron are brought on cars to the mines from Waterford, and are imported to the latter place the timber from Norway, and the iron from Wales. The number of persons employed by the mines, exclusive of carriers and of other classes not stated on the spot, is about 1,000. The following statement of sales of Irish copper ore at Swansea, made on April 29, 1840, will show the superiority of the mines of Knockmahon over those of other Irish mineral fields:—The quantity from Knockmahon was 704 tons, worth £5,807 14s.; that from Allihies 388 tons, worth £3,053 16s.; that from Ballymurtagh 504 tons, worth £1,192 11s.; that from Tigrony 137 tons, worth £547 18s. 6d.; and that from Connoree 14 tons of precipitate, worth £304 17s.

KNOCKMARK, a parish in the barony of Lower Dece, 2 miles west of Dunscaughlin, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 3 miles; greatest breadth, 1½ mile; area, 2,876 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 714; in 1841, 630. Houses 113. The surface consists of good land. The rivulet Skane flows on the north-east boundary. The road from Trim to Dublin passes through the interior. The hamlets are Warrenstown and Cross Keys; and the only mansion is Warrenstown.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £200; glebe, £36 5s. The rectory of Knockmark, the vicarage of Colmoly, and the inappropriate curacy of Kiltale, constitute the benefice of Knockmark. See COLMOLYN and KILTALÉ. Length and breadth of the union, respectively 6 miles and 3 miles. Pop., in 1831, 2,063. Gross income, £376 5s.; nett, £276 12s. 9½d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built in 1819, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 25. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Colmoly. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 20, and the Roman Catholics to 727; the Protestants of the union to 25, and the Roman Catholics to 2,104; two daily schools in the parish—one of which received some aid from the rector—were usually attended by about 49 children; and two daily schools in the other parishes of the union were attended by about 100.

KNOCKMELEDOWN, a range of mountains on the mutual frontier of the counties of Tipperary and Waterford, Munster. It commences 8 miles south-west by south of Clonmel, and extends 12 miles due westward to the boundary with co. Cork, or rather is continued 4½ miles into the interior of Cork under the local name of the Kilworth mountains. The range has a mean breadth of about 4½ miles; and is bounded by the vale of the rivulet Tar on the north, and by the valley of the Blackwater and the vale of the Phineas rivulet on the south. Its principal summits within co. Waterford, together with their several altitudes above sea-level, are Knocknash, 1,591 feet.—Knocknafalia, 2,199.—Deyrick, 1,297.—Knocknalough, 1,028.—Crown Hill, 1,003.—and six others, respectively 1,096, 1,088, 1,086, 1,031, 1,164, and 1,066; the principal summits on the boundary between the two counties are Knockanare, 2,149.—Knocknasterkin, 1,084.—Sugarloaf, 2,144.—Knockmeledown proper, 2,690.—and two others respectively 2,069, and 2,101; and those within co. Tipperary are West Crohan, 1,718 feet.—Knockshanabullion, 2,150.—Farbrean, 1,603.—Knockanard, 1,337.—and Carran-Hill, 1,180. Knockmeledown proper is situated 4½ miles north by west of Lismore, and, in a straight line, 9 miles south-west of Clonmel. Its northern face is so rapidly declivitous as to seem very nearly perpendicular; and its western side, as the mountain is approached, appears to be the easiest of ascent. Its summit commands a panoramic view of great extent and surpassing brilliance,—the golden valley of the Suir on the north and the east,—the rich plain and romantic rock of Cashel in the north-east,—the gorgeous valley of the Blackwater to the south and the west,—and an extensive sweep of coast and ocean from south-east round to south by west. Slates are quarried half-way up the mountain; and the species of Saxifrage, called London Pride, grows wild upon its sides. The ingenious but eccentric Henry Eeles, who published many papers on electricity, and claims to have identified electricity with lightning, lies buried on the summit of Knockmeledown; and Ryland says, but incorrectly, that he occupies a common grave with his horse and his dog. Red deer frequented the mountain about the middle of last century; but they have long been exterminated.

KNOCKMOAN, an old castle in the parish of Whitechurch, barony of Decies-without-Drum, 3½ miles west of Dungarvan, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on a tall insulated rock, surrounded and perfectly secured by a morass, commanding an extensive panoramic view, and constituting a feature of singular picturesqueness in the landscape over which it presides. A female is alleged to have built it, and been interred in it; but the facts of its origin are really unknown. In 1641, Sir Richard Osborne was besieged in it; and afterwards, while Cromwell lay before Dungarvan, a detachment of his force took Knockmoan by storm, and probably reduced it to ruin.

KNOCKMORE, a mountain on the north-west border of the barony of Carra, 5½ miles east-north-east of Newport, co. Mayo, Connaught. Altitude, 1,259 feet.

KNOCKMOREDOWN, a mountain on the west border of the barony of Moycullen, and on the west coast of the bay of Kilkerrin, 7½ miles east-south-east of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. Altitude, 1,163 feet.

KNOCKMOURNE, a parish in the baronies of Condons and Clangibbon, Kinnataloon, and Barrymore, 4½ miles east of Castle-Lyons, co. Cork, Munster. The Kinnataloon section contains the village of CONNA: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Condons and Clangibbon section, 1,996 acres; of the Kinnataloon section, 5,887 acres; of the Barrymore section, 953 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,142; in 1841, 3,576. Houses 506. Pop. of the Condons and Clangibbon section, in 1831, 688; in 1841, 949. Houses 152. Pop. of the Kinnataloon section, in 1831, 2,256; in 1841, 2,212. Houses 326. Pop. of the Barrymore section, in 1831, 198; in 1841, 215. Houses 28. The surface comprises a section of the vale and hillscreens of the river Bride, and consists, for the most part, of tillage land. The road from Castle-Lyons to Tallow passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Cloyne. Vicarial tithe composition, £535 6s. 4½d.; glebe, £1 17s. 6d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for the same sum as the vicarial, and are inappropriate in the corporation of Waterford. The vicarages of Knockmoure and Ballinoe [see BALLINOE], constitute the benefice of Knockmoure. Pop., in 1831, 5,836. Gross income, £843 9s. 10½d.; nett, £738 19s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75, and resides with the incumbent. The church was built in 1815, partly by means of a loan of £276 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapels of Knockmoure and Ballinoe have each an attend-405; in 1841, 292. Houses 48. The greater part of the surface is arable ground, variously of good and of middle-rate qualities. A branch of the Grand Canal lies across the southern extremity. The seats are Lewinstown, Ladytown, and Newhall.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and part of the benefice of Great Connell, in the dio. of Kildare. See CONNELL (GREAT). Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £31 16s. 6d. The rectorial tithes are impropriate; and they belong to the three quotas of £37 7s. 11d., £19 7s. 5d., and £6 17s. 5d., respectively Sir Thomas Molyneux, Bart., Andrew Rourke, Esq., and Sir George Cockburn, Bart.; but those belonging to the first and the second of these impropriators are not levied. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

LAGAN, a river, and an artificial navigation, in the counties of Down and Antrim, Ulster. The river rises on the northern declivities of the Slieve-Croob mountains, and on the south margin of the parish of Dromara, barony of Kinelarty, co. Down. It first flows 8 miles north-west by west, through Kinelarty and Lower Iveagh, and past Dromore and Gillball, to Springhall; it next flows 4½ miles westward, north-north-westward, and northward, to the vicinity of Magheralin, or midway between Moorefield and Newforge; it next flows 7 miles north-east by east, partly within Lower Iveagh, but chiefly on the boundary between Down and Antrim to Lisburn; and it finally flows 6 miles north-north-eastward along the boundary between Down and Antrim, to Belfast Harbour or the head of Belfast Lough. Its longest affluent has a run of only 7 miles, and joins it from co. Down at Lisburn; and the other noticeable affluents are only 4 in number, all flowing in co. Down, and two of them joining it above, two of them below, Lisburn. The banks and vale of the river, though nowhere grandly picturesque, are, for the most part, decidedly beautiful; and, in their stretch from Lisburn to Belfast, they become profuse in ornament and brilliant in beauty.

The Lagan navigation, tracing it upward, ascends the river Lagan from Belfast Harbour to the south-south-western vicinity of Lisburn; and then commencing to be all canal, it first describes a crescent curvature, with the concavity to the north, within co. Down,—and it next describes another but less bold curvature, with the concavity to the south, chiefly within co. Antrim, but partly on the boundary between Antrim and Down, to the south-east corner of Lough Neagh, at a point 2½ miles due north of Lurgan. The length of the navigation is 22 miles; the rate of lockage is 8½ feet; and the cost of construction was £96,000 in toto, or £4,363 per mile; the rate is 9½d. per ton for the whole voyage; and the totals of tonnage upon it, and of revenue from it, in 1831—1837, were 265,750 tons, and £10,738 7s. 11d. Its interior landing-places are the bleach-works, mills, and factories, between Belfast and Lisburn; the town of Lisburn; the limekilns and brickfields in the vicinity of Lisburn; the towns of Hillsborough and Moira; the distilleries, breweries, and limekilns, in the vicinity of these towns; the villages of Magheralin, Soldier's-town, Aghalee, and Kilmore; and the town, distillery, and breweries of Lurgan. It likewise affords means of communication with all the shores of Lough, with the Blackwater and its navigations, and with the Newry navigation and the Bann. The principal goods carried upward are coals, foreign timber, herrings, salt, groceries, iron, bleaching-stuffs, spirits, barn, and bark; and the principal articles carried down are grain and flour—upwards of 35,000 tons of which were conveyed down during the years 1830—

1837—potatoes, sand, stones, fire-brick, and tiles. No passage-boat plies on the navigation; and none it was thought could ever be profitably established. While the Ulster railway was in the course of construction, no apprehension existed that, on completion, it could occasion any damage to the Lagan navigation.—Originally, or in 1733, the Lagan Navigation was placed under the direction of the Inland Navigation Corporation; in 1752, it was placed under the management of the sovereign of Belfast, and other local commissioners; and, since 1780, it has been under the exclusive control of the proprietors of the joint-stock of the undertaking, incorporated under the title of "The Company of Undertakers of the Lagan Navigation." The Act 1, 2 William IV., c. 55, s. 101, for the improvement of Belfast Harbour, made certain provisions for the improvement also of the Lagan Navigation; and the Act 1, 2 William IV., c. 2, made provision for erecting and maintaining a bridge over the river at Belfast. See BELFAST.

LAGAN (TRE), a small river, partly of the counties of Monaghan and Cavan, Ulster, and partly of the counties of Meath and Louth, Leinster. It rises in three head-waters,—the first at a point in co. Monaghan, 2½ miles east-north-east of Shercock, the second at a point in co. Cavan, 2½ miles east of Bailieborough, and the third at a point in co. Meath, 3½ miles east-north-east of Moynalty; the three head-streams unite very nearly at the junction point of the three counties in which they severally rise, and after the longest of them has made a run of 8½ miles; the united stream proceeds 5 miles east by northward along the boundary-line between co. Monaghan on the left, and cos. Meath and Louth on the right, to assume the name of the Glyde, and to pass under that name, across co. Louth, to the south side of Dundalk bay.

LAGHY, a village in the parish of Drumholm, barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the road from Donegal to Ballyshannon, 2½ miles south by east of Donegal, and 3 north-north-east of Ballintra. The country around it is hilly, fertile, and populous; and at 2 miles' distance from it are the ruins of Magherabeg abbey, and the mansion of St. Ernan's Island,—the latter the seat of John Hamilton, Esq. A fair for the sale of flax-seed is held in the village on April 29. Area, 30 acres. Pop., in 1841, 159. Houses 28.

LAGORE, a townland on the west border of the parish of Ratoath, barony of Ratoath, co. Meath, Leinster. The demesne of Lagore, the residence of Michael Thunder, Esq., is well-wooded, and is situated on the road from Dunshaughlin to Ashbourne, 1½ mile east by north of Dunshaughlin, and the same distance west-north-west of the town of Ratoath. The townland of Lagore, or rather a marsh in it of cognominal designation, is celebrated as the site of an enormous accumulation of ancient animal remains, and of various minute antiquities both military and domestic. The exact spot of celebrity occurs at the north-east extremity of a tract of dark coloured morass called the Black Bog, in contradistinction to another tract of different colour in its vicinity called the Red Bog. In this spot—to adopt the interesting account written by Mr. and Mrs. Hall—"there existed a circular mound, the circumference of which was upwards of 500 feet; and upon removing the surface of which, above '150 cart-loads' of animal remains were found, together with a vast store of rare—and many of them hitherto unknown—weapons, ornaments, and domestic implements of some of the former inhabitants of Ireland, probably the Danes—or some military, and, perhaps, invading people. The circumference of this circle was formed

"the Sovereign, Bailiffs, and Burgesses of the and Borough of Lanesborough," and should of a sovereign, two bailiffs, and twelve burgesses—that this corporation should admit what freemen they chose, on each one's paying 5s.,—and that the corporation and freemen return two members to parliament. The corporation, probably from the beginning, and certainly a long period previous to the Legislative Union, kept up merely as a tool for sending two members to parliament; and when it ceased to perform its function, it at the same time ceased to exist, a sum of £15,000 given as a compensation for disfranchisement was all awarded to its "Luke Lord Clonbrock. The town is a civil police station, but has neither a resident magistrate nor a court of petty-sessions. A dispend the town is within the Longford Poor-law union, and, in 1839-40, it expended £100 ls., made dispensations of medicine, and served for a total of 12,883 acres, with a pop. of 3,036.—The Duke of Lane, who gave name to the town, and possesses its borough honours, received from it the title of Viscount Lanesborough,—a title which became extinct in 1727. The family of Butler, descended from Sir Stephen Butler, who settled in Ireland in the reign of James I., now enjoy from it the title of Earl. In 1715, Theophilus Butler, Esq., was created Baron Newtown-Butler; in 1728, Brinsley Butler, second Baron, was created Viscount Lanesborough; and, in 1756, Henry, the second Viscount, advanced to the dignity of Earl of Lanesborough. Area of the town, 19 acres. Pop., in 1831, 303. Houses 48. Families employed in agriculture, 15; in manufactures and trades, 13. Families dependent on property and professions, 7; on the direct trade, 27; on their own manual labour, 25; or not specified, 1.

LANEY (THE), a small affluent of the river, barony of West Muskerry, co. Cork. It rises among the Derrynasaggart mountains north-west of Macroom; and makes a short stream the Sullane at a place called Newbridge. A narrow strip of meadow, in the peninsula between it and the Sullane, was a battle-field of Brian Boromh, who obtained three ancient monuments standing. The battle "was fought in consequence of a challenge from Brian, then king of Munster, to the murder of his brother, Mahon, by O'Donoghue Carbery. The latter solicited the aid of O'Mahon, and with their united forces, strengthened by 1,500 Danish auxiliaries, they encountered and his munster army; but were completely defeated with great slaughter, after a fierce and sanguinary conflict."

LANGFIELD (EAST or UPPER), a parish, barony of Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It lies on its west margin the greater part of the Drumquin: which see. Length, south to north, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 1 rood, 5 perches,—of which 22 acres, 14 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,143. Houses 537. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,791. Houses 477. The water is in general of good quality. Lough Claragh on the north border; and Fairy Water to the north boundary. The seats are Drumraw and Burn's Folly.—This parish is a rectorial parish, separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe position, £245; glebe, £52. Gross income nett, £243 6s. Patron, the diocesan. A vicar has a salary of £75. The church is situated 1 mile east by south of Drumquin, and was built in 1803, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9d. f extensive nature; and under favourable circumstances, we would recommend all who are anxious to know the localities of this district, as well as the admirers of general scenery, to ascend Knockshegouna. Towards the south-east, the view is limited by the Slievebloom mountains; the greater part of their outlines, however, can be traced. On the east and north, the eye ranges over all the King's county, the counties of Kildare and Westmeath, resting on all the more prominent points which lie scattered throughout their extensive plains; still more northerly, it comprehends a considerable portion of the counties of Roscommon and Galway, distinguishing even some of the mountains of Leitrim and Sligo. Westward is seen that beautiful assemblage of pastoral hills which lie around the smooth and verdant Keeper mountains, and also that more rugged chain of hills which surround Lough Derg, and trend westward through Clare; and, on the south, the lovely fertile country which is bounded by the Devil's-Bit hills. In the zone which more immediately belongs to Knockshegouna, you can distinctly note the towns of Borris-o'-kane, Shinrone, CloghJordan, and Parsonstown; Lough Derg, and several other reaches of the Shannon; the various seats and surrounding plantations, which adorn the surface, and the large brown fields of bog intermingling with the verdant lands."

KNOCKSIDAN, a village on the south border of the barony of Nethercross, 7 miles north of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster. It contains the ruins of a castle, some traces of intrenchments, and a lofty rath which commands an extensive view of the circumjacent country. Pop. not specially returned.

KNOCKTEMPLE, or MULLOWNY, a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Duballow, 3 miles west-north-west of Liscarrol, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of FREEMOUNT: which see. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 4,618 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,801; in 1841, 2,245. Houses 353. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,048. Houses 316. The land is very various in quality; yet, in the aggregate, is fit for the purposes of tillage or the dairy. The surface is drained by the river Allua, and traversed by the road from Newmarket to Charleville.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £250. The rectory of Knocktemple and the impropriate curacy of KILBOLANE [see that article], constitute the benefice of Knocktemple. Length, 5 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{4}$. Pop., in 1831, 5,815. Gross income, £256 3s. 1d.; nett, £242 8s. 7d. Patron of Knocktemple, the diocesan; of Kilbolane, the Earl of Cork. A curate is employed. The church is in Kilbolane. The three Roman Catholic chapels of Knocktemple, Kilbolane, and Sronepookeen, have an attendance of respectively 1,500, 1,200, and 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to a private house used as a Roman Catholic chapel in Tullylease. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 1,859; the Protestants of the union to 104, and the Roman Catholics to 5,929; 2 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 94 boys and 30 girls; and there were also two daily schools in Kilbolane.

KNOCKTOPHER, a barony of the southern division of co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by Shillelogher; on the north-east, by Gowran; on the east and south-east, by Ida; on the south-west, by Iverk; and on the west, by Kells. Its greatest length, southward, is 12 miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its area is 46,765 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches,—of which 25 acres, 28 perches are water. Considerably the greater part of the surface, especially in the southern and the central districts, is hilly, and consists of a light soil upon a slaty bottom. Part of the drainage is southward to the Suir; and part is northward and eastward to the Nore.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Aghaviller, Derrynahinch, Church-Jerpoint, Kilbeacon, Kilkeasy, Killahy, Knocktopher, and Lismateigue; and part of the parishes of Donemagin, Ennisnag, Fiddown, West-Jerpoint, Listerlin, Muckalee, Rossinan, and Stonecarthy. The towns and chief villages are Knocktopher, Hugginstown, Boolglass, Ballyhale, Stonyford, and Mullinavat. Pop., in 1831, 13,338; in 1841, 15,028. Houses 2,326. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,899; in manufactures and trade, 355; in other pursuits, 177. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,071; who could read but not write, 988; who could neither read nor write, 3,447. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 800; who could read but not write, 1,104; who could neither read nor write, 4,792. Knocktopher barony is distributed among the five Poor-law unions of Callan, Carrick-on-Suir, Kilkenny, New Ross, and Waterford. The total number of tenements valued is 1,678; and of these, 651 were valued under £5,—269, under £10,—225, under £15,—151, under £20,—85, under £25,—85, under £30,—86, under £40,—42, under £50,—and 84, at and above £50.

KNOCKTOPHER, a parish in the northern district of the barony of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains the town of KNOCKTOPHER: see next article. Length, south-south-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; greatest breadth, $2\frac{1}{4}$; area, 4,722 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,700; * in 1841, 1,968. Houses 303. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,225; in 1841, 1,501. Houses 225. The declination is north-eastward, within the basin of the Nore; and the two highest grounds are a hill of 229 feet of altitude in the west, and a hill of 458 feet in the south. The only demesne is that of Knocktopher-house, the property of Sir Robert Langrishe, Bart., adjoining the town. The principal hamlets are Carrickshock and Dogstown. The chief antiquities, apart from those immediately connected with the town, are the ruins of two churches, of Kilcuricastle, of Sheepstown-castle, and of Columb-castle. The road from Stonyford to Waterford passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £175; glebe, £49 12s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The rectories of Knocktopher, KILNEDDY, AUGHAVILLER, KILTORKIN, DARNAHERST, KILMOGANNY, and KILKERILL, and the vicarages of KILKEASY, and DONEMAGIN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Knocktopher. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, exclusive of Kilmoganny, 7,327. Gross income, £1,493 12s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £1,093 19s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £125. The church was built in 1826, by means of loans of £1,107 12s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Settlers 200; attendance, from 80 to 90. There is a church also within the perpetual curacy of Kilmoganny. The Knocktopher Roman Catholic convent chapel is served by one friar, and has an attendance of from 310 to 800; and there are 5 secular or non-conventual Roman Catholic chapels in the other parts of the union. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 99, and the Roman Catholics to 1,460; the Protestants of the union, exclusive of Kilmoganny, feet above the level of the sea; about 4 miles from, the fine bold promontory of Ballygally Head, formed of enormous basaltic pillars, several joints of which measure from 8 to 9 feet in length, is observed to the right—underneath which, on an isolated rock, standing out in the sea, are the ruins of Carne-castle—while, on the very verge of the coast, appears an old castellated mansion, built by a family of the name of Shaw, in 1625. Again, to the left, the Sallagh Banes, a range of high land, consisting of limestone base, capped with basalt, form a termination to the prospect.

Larne consists of an old town and a new town. The old town, though not very badly edified, is so irregularly aligned, and has such narrow and crooked thoroughfares, as to present a disagreeable appearance. The new town consists principally of one long, airy, well-built, and aggregately neat street. The public buildings are the parish-church, three Presbyterian meeting-houses, a Methodist meeting-house, and a Roman Catholic chapel.—A very considerable amount of manufacture exists in cotton-weaving, sail-cloth-making, bleaching, rope-making, flour-making, and tanning. About 20 years ago, from 10,000 to 16,000 pieces of yard-wide linens were annually bleached, 40,000 yards of sail-cloth made, and 500 tons of barley and from 1,500 to 2,000 tons of wheat converted into flour. The town, however, has not made much progress; for, in 1812, it contained 449 inhabited houses, and a population of about 2,783,—many of the houses accommodating each from 2 to 5 families. The port possessed, at one time, a comparatively very high importance; but, like Carrickfergus, though in a less degree, it has suffered a serious diminution of its consequence by the rise and rapid progress of the trade of Belfast. In 1835, the exports amounted, in estimated value, to £68,309; and consisted of £40,000 worth of linen, £16,372 of corn, meal, and flour, £5,360 of provisions, £4,277 of beans, and £300 of potatoes. In the same year, the imports amounted, in estimated value, to £7,256 6s. 7d.; and consisted of £5,051 worth of coals, culm, and enders, £900 of oak bark for tanners, £424 6s. 7d. of stones and slates, £260 of unwrought iron, £200 of fish, £140 of salt, £100 of swine, £90 of earthenware, and £90 of ponies. Rock salt was formerly a bulky article of manufacture and export; but it seems to have disappeared as an article of trade. The largest shipments from the harbour are of lime; but these affect, not properly the town, but the lineworks around the lough; and numbers of Scottish vessels, in particular, anchor in the harbour while waiting for cargoes from the extensive lime-works of Magheramorne. The retail trade of the town is very limited. The estimated amount of land carriage to the town is 3,000 tons for exportation, 2,025 of agricultural produce for local consumption, and 650 of exciseable articles not directly imported; and the amount from the town is 250 tons of imported articles, and 7,700 of coals, manure, and other bulky articles. Fairs are held on July 31 and Dec. 1. A branch office of the Belfast Bank was established in 1836. The public conveyances, in 1838, were two coaches to Belfast.

The Larne Poor-law union ranks as the 106th, and was declared on May 13, 1840. It lies all in the Antrim, and comprehends an area of 117,733 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 35,695. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are, Larne, 4,135; Carne-Castle, 2,171; Glencloy, 1,054; Ardclinis, 1,617; Kilwaughter, 2,016; Ballycor, 1,562; Ballinure, 3,315; Ballynure, 2,171; Glynn, 1,608; Island-Magee, 2,610; Templecoran, 1,800; and Carrickfergus, 8,706. The number of elected guardians is 23, and of ex-officio guardians, 7; and of the former, 4 are chosen by Carrickfergus division, 3 by Larne, 2 each by Glencloy, Ardclinis, Ballinure, Island-Magee, and Templecoran, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The Carrickfergus division lies within the county of the town of Carrickfergus; the divisions of Ballinure, Rakoo, Glynn, Island-Magee, and Templecoran, lie within the barony of Lower Belfast; the division of Larne lies within the baronies of Lower Belfast and Upper Glenarm; the division of Kilwaughter lies within the barony of Upper Glenarm; the division of Carne-Castle lies within the baronies of Upper Glenarm and Lower Glenarm; the divisions of Glencloy, Ardclinis, and Ballinure, lie within the barony of Lower Glenarm; and the division of Ballycor lies within the barony of Upper Antrim. The number of valued tenements in the Carrickfergus district is 1,244,—in the Upper Antrim district, 136,—in the Lower Belfast districts, 1,513,—in the Lower Glenarm districts, 929,—in the Upper Glenarm districts, 948,—in the entire union, 4,770; and of this total, 1,700 were valued under £5,—1,024, under £10,—724, under £15,—394, under £20,—284, under £25,—158, under £30,—174, under £40,—92, under £50,—and 220, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £646,216; the total number of persons rated is 4,902; and of these, 462 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—536, not exceeding £2,—288, not exceeding £3,—273, not exceeding £4,—and 272, not exceeding £5. The workhouse began to be provided for in Nov. 1840; and is to cost £4,989 for building and completion, and £333 15s. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 5 acres, 37 perches, purchased for £477 5s.,—and to contain accommodation for 400 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Jan. 4, 1843; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £331 13s. 10½d., and the total previous expenditure was £739 16s. 4d. The only medical charities are dispensaries at Larne and Carrickfergus. The Larne dispensary serves for a district of 30,858 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 11,434; and, in 1839-40, it expended £77 12s. 7d., and administered to 858 patients. In 1842, the Larne Loan Fund had a capital of £2,628; during that year it circulated £12,699 in 2,764 loans, cleared a nett profit of £173 3s. 2d., and expended for charitable purposes £20; and from the date of its establishment till the close of 1842, it circulated £26,268 in 6,301 loans, cleared a nett profit of £289 9s. 4d., and expended for charitable purposes £30.

Larne was originally called Inver,—a word which signifies lowly situated. In 1315, the peninsula of Curraan, in the vicinity of the town, was Edward Bruce's landing-place, in his vain, foolish, ambitious, and sanguinary expedition, to make himself king of Ireland; and at several subsequent periods, the town of Larne, or rather the neighbouring fortress of Oldfleet, figured somewhat prominently in opposing predatory bands of Scots who made descents on the coasts of Antrim.—Area of the Inver section of the town, 30 acres; of the Larne section, 66 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,979; in 1841, 3,345. Houses 569. Pop. of the Inver section, in 1831, 363; in 1841, 408. Houses 67. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 18; in manufactures and trade, 42; in other pursuits, 14. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 35; on their own manual labour, 34; on means not specified, 3. Pop. of the Larne section, in 1831, 2,616; in 1841, 2,937. Houses 442. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 161; in manufactures and trade, 306; in other pursuits, 114. 405; in 1841, 292. Houses 48. The greater part of the surface is arable ground, variously of good and of middle-rate qualities. A branch of the Grand Canal lies across the southern extremity. The seats are Lewistown, Ladytown, and Newhall.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and part of the benefice of Great Connell, in the dio. of Kildare. See CONNELL (GREAT). Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £31 16s. 6d. The rectorial tithes are impropriate; and they belong to the three quotas of £37 7s. 11d., £19 7s. 5d., and £6 17s. 5d., to respectively Sir Thomas Molyneux, Bart., Andrew Rourke, Esq., and Sir George Cockburn, Bart.; but those belonging to the first and the second of these impropriators are not levied. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

LAGAN, a river, and an artificial navigation, in the counties of Down and Antrim, Ulster. The river rises on the northern declivities of the Slieve-Croob mountains, and on the south margin of the parish of Dromara, barony of Kinelearty, co. Down. It first flows 8 miles north-west by west, through Kinelearty and Lower Iveagh, and past Dromore and Gillhall, to Springhall; it next flows 4½ miles westward, north-north-westward, and northward, to the vicinity of Magheralin, or midway between Moorefield and Newforge; it next flows 7 miles north-east by east, partly within Lower Iveagh, but chiefly on the boundary between Down and Antrim to Lisburn; and it finally flows 6 miles north-north-eastward along the boundary between Down and Antrim, to Belfast Harbour or the head of Belfast Lough. Its longest affluent has a run of only 7 miles, and joins it from co. Down at Lisburn; and the other noticeable affluents are only 4 in number, all flowing in co. Down, and two of them joining it above, two of them below, Lisburn. The banks and vale of the river, though nowhere grandly picturesque, are, for the most part, decidedly beautiful; and, in their stretch from Lisburn to Belfast, they become profuse in ornament and brilliant in beauty.

The Lagan navigation, tracing it upward, ascends the river Lagan from Belfast Harbour to the south-south-western vicinity of Lisburn; and then commencing to be all canal, it first describes a crescent curvature, with the concavity to the north, within co. Down,—and it next describes another but less bold curvature, with the concavity to the south, chiefly within co. Antrim, but partly on the boundary between Antrim and Down, to the south-east corner of Lough Neagh, at a point 2½ miles due north of Lurgan. The length of the navigation is 22 miles; the rate of lockage is 8½ feet; and the cost of construction was £96,000 in toto, or £4,363 per mile; the rate is 9½d. per ton for the whole voyage; and the totals of tonnage upon it, and of revenue from it, in 1831—1837, were 265,750 tons, and £10,738 7s. 11d. Its interior landing-places are the bleach-greens, mills, and factories, between Belfast and Lisburn; the town of Lisburn; the limekilns and brickfields in the vicinity of Lisburn; the towns of Hillsborough and Moira; the distilleries, breweries, and limekilns, in the vicinity of these towns; the villages of Magheralin, Soldier's-town, Aghalee, and Kilmore; and the town, distillery, and breweries of Lurgan. It likewise affords means of communication with all the shores of Lough, with the Blackwater and its navigations, and with the Newry navigation and the Bann. The principal goods carried upward are coals, foreign timber, herrings, salt, groceries, iron, bleaching-stuffs, spirits, harm, and bark; and the principal articles carried down are grain and flour—upwards of 35,000 tons of which were conveyed down during the years 1830—

1837—potatoes, sand, stones, fire-brick, and tiles. No passage-boat plies on the navigation; and none it was thought could ever be profitably established. While the Ulster railway was in the course of construction, no apprehension existed that, on completion, it could occasion any damage to the Lagan navigation.—Originally, or in 1733, the Lagan Navigation was placed under the direction of the Inland Navigation Corporation; in 1752, it was placed under the management of the sovereign of Belfast, and other local commissioners; and, since 1780, it has been under the exclusive control of the proprietors of the joint-stock of the undertaking, incorporated under the title of "The Company of Undertakers of the Lagan Navigation." The Act 1, 2 William IV., c. 55, s. 101, for the improvement of Belfast Harbour, made certain provisions for the improvement also of the Lagan Navigation; and the Act 1, 2 William IV., c. 2, made provision for erecting and maintaining a bridge over the river at Belfast. See BELFAST.

LAGAN (THE), a small river, partly of the counties of Monaghan and Cavan, Ulster, and partly of the counties of Meath and Louth, Leinster. It rises in three head-waters,—the first at a point in co. Monaghan, 2½ miles east-north-east of Shercock, the second at a point in co. Cavan, 2½ miles east of Bailieborough, and the third at a point in co. Meath, 3½ miles east-north-east of Moynalty; the three head-streams unite very nearly at the junction point of the three counties in which they severally rise, and after the longest of them has made a run of 8½ miles; the united stream proceeds 5 miles east by northward along the boundary-line between co. Monaghan on the left, and cos. Meath and Louth on the right, to assume the name of the Glyde, and to pass under that name, across co. Louth, to the south side of Dundalk bay.

LAGHY, a village in the parish of Drumholm, barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the road from Donegal to Ballyshannon, 2½ miles south by east of Donegal, and 3 north-north-east of Ballintra. The country around it is hilly, fertile, and populous; and at 2 miles' distance from it are the ruins of Magherabeg abbey, and the mansion of St. Ernan's Island,—the latter the seat of John Hamilton, Esq. A fair for the sale of flax-seed is held in the village on April 29. Area, 20 acres. Pop., in 1841, 159. Houses 28.

LAGORE, a townland on the west border of the parish of Ratoath, barony of Ratoath, co. Meath, Leinster. The demesne of Lagore, the residence of Michael Thunder, Esq., is well-wooded, and is situated on the road from Dunshaughlin to Ashbourne, 1½ mile east by north of Dunshaughlin, and the same distance west-north-west of the town of Ratoath. The townland of Lagore, or rather a marsh in it of cognominal designation, is celebrated as the site of an enormous accumulation of ancient animal remains, and of various minute antiquities both military and domestic. The exact spot of celebrity occurs at the north-east extremity of a tract of dark coloured morass called the Black Bog, in contradistinction to another tract of different colour in its vicinity called the Red Bog. In this spot—to adopt the interesting account written by Mr. and Mrs. Hall—"there existed a circular mound, the circumference of which was upwards of 500 feet; and upon removing the surface of which, above '150 cart-loads' of animal remains were found, together with a vast store of rare—and many of them hitherto unknown—weapons, ornaments, and domestic implements of some of the former inhabitants of Ireland, probably the Danes—or some military, and, perhaps, invading people. The circumference of this circle was formed mile. It washes the town of Castle-Dermot, and receives the large tribute of the Griese.

LEARMOUNT, a quoad sacra parish in the barony of Tyrkeeran, 6½ miles south-west of Dungiven, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 4,411. It comprises 18 townlands, one of which belongs to the quoad civilia parish of Lower Cumber, and the others to the quoad civilia parishes of Upper Cumber and Banagher. The surface is, in a general view, a congeries of lofty uplands, intersected with glens and vales; and it is traversed by the road from Dungiven to Strahane. Sawel Mountain, the highest ground, is situated on the southern boundary, and has an altitude of 2,296 feet above sea-level. The chief seats are the villas of Kilcrew and Tamnagh, and the extensive and well-wooded demesne of Learmount.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Gross income, £85; nett, £55. Patron, alternately the incumbent of Banagher and the incumbent of Upper Cumber. The church was built in 1831, by means of £300 raised by subscription, and £400 gifted by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Upper Cumber. In 1831, the inhabitants of the Upper Cumber section were 70 Churchmen, 57 Presbyterians, and 1,905 Roman Catholics; of the Lower Cumber section, 83 Churchmen, 140 Presbyterians, 5 other Protestant dissenters, and 54 Roman Catholics; of the Banagher section, 90 Churchmen, 356 Presbyterians, and 1,651 Roman Catholics; of the whole parish, 243 Churchmen, 553 Presbyterians, 5 other Protestant dissenters, and 3,610 Roman Catholics. In the same year, a Sunday school was usually attended by about 25 children; 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £5 from Beresford, and one with £8 from the National Board and £5 from subscription—had on their books 229 boys and 94 girls; and 2 other daily schools were attended on the average by 75 children.

LECALE, a barony on the east coast of co. Down, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Dufferin and the foot of Lough Strangford; on the north-east, by the entrance of Lough Strangford, which separates it from Ardes; on the east and south, by the Irish sea; and on the west, by the baronies of Upper Iveagh and Dufferin. Its length, south by westward, is 9½ miles; its extreme breadth is 8; and its area is 61,592 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches,—of which 336 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches are water. The principal and almost only indentation of the coast, is the bay of Killough. The only noticeable insular ground is Gun's Island. The surface of very nearly all the interior of the barony possesses the tumulated character which prevails throughout the county; and has a well-cultivated, pleasant, ornate, and occasionally picturesque appearance. Excepting the Ballinahinch river, with its little estuary, along the north-west, all the streams are of very meagre run and volume.—This barony contains part of the parish of Kilmeegan, and the whole of the parishes of Ardglass, Ballee, Ballyculter, Ballykinlar, Bright, Down, Dunsford, Inch, Kilclief, Rathmullen, Saul, and Tyrella. It was recently divided into two very nearly equal parts or baronial districts, called Lower Lecale and Upper Lecale. Annual valuation of Lower Lecale under the Poor-law acts, £27,391 2s. 6d.; sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, respectively £1,289 9s. 1d. and £1,415 14s. 1d. Annual valuation of Upper Lecale, £30,681 7s. 10d.; sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, respectively

£1,439 18s., and £1,549 2s. 4d. Pop. of the whole barony, in 1831, 33,356; in 1841, 31,776. Houses 5,740. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,156; in manufactures and trade, 2,051; in other pursuits, 794. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 7,285; who could read but not write, 2,579; who could neither read nor write, 3,602. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,714; who could read but not write, 4,512; who could neither read nor write, 5,826.—Lecale lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Downpatrick. The total number of tenements valued is 5,872; and of these, 3,067 were valued under £5,—771, under £10,—617, under £15,—365, under £20,—296, under £25,—184, under £30,—235, under £40,—115, under £50,—and 222, at and above £50.

LECCAUN, a village in the parish of Fiddown, barony of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 147. Houses 24.

LECK, a parish in the barony of Raphoe, ¾ of a mile east by south of Letterkenny, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length, south-westward, 4½ miles; breadth, from 1¼ to 3¼; area, 10,744 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches,—of which 263 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches are tide-way in Lough Swilly. Pop., in 1831, 4,036; in 1841, 3,722. Houses 633. The head of Lough Swilly washes a small district in the north. About one-sixth of the surface is mountainous; and all the remainder is good and highly cultivated land. The seats are Swillyview and Rockhill. The roads from Letterkenny to respectively Lifford and Londonderry pass through the interior. Letterkenny is so near as to offer to the parishioners all its advantages of market and communication.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £324; glebe, £20. Gross income, £344; nett, £321 11s. 1½d. Patron, the Crown. The parish was formerly a perpetual curacy, the tithes being appropriated to the deanery of Raphoe; but by order in Council of March 24, 1835, the rectory and vicarage were disappropriated from the deanery, and consolidated with the perpetual curacy. The church is of unknown date. Sittings 100; attendance 123. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 384 Churchmen, 1,420 Presbyterians, and 2,441 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 90 children; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £4 4s. from subscription, and one with £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Benefaction—had on their books 99 boys and 59 girls. In 1840, there was a National school at Trimra.

LECKARROW, a village on the boundary between the parishes of St. John and Killenvoy, barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands 7 miles south-east of Roscommon, on the road thence to Athlone. Fairs are held on March 17, June 27, Sept. 27, and Dec. 20. Pop. not specially returned.

LECKEN, or LACKAN, a village on the west margin of the parish of Rahara, barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands 4 miles south-east of Athlone, near the road thence to Athlone. In its immediate vicinity are a Roman Catholic chapel, and the seats of Lecken, Rahara, and Longfield. Pop. returned with the parish.

LECKEN, or LACKAN, a parish in the barony of Corkaree, immediately east of Ballinalack, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, southward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 3,202 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches,—of which 75 acres, 24 perches are in Lough Dereveragh, and 61 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches are in the river Inny. Pop., in 1831, 934; in 1841, 995. Houses 129. The land is, for the most part, of excellent quality. A bay of Lough De lies within the north-east corner; and the river issuing thence, describes all the northern bay and most of the western. Wilson's Hospital and Infirmary are situated in the extreme south-east; the former is an institution for supporting and educating 20 old men, and for educating and supporting the boys. An old castle stands on the south-west. —This parish is an impropriate curacy, and the benefice of LENEY [which see], in the Meath. The tithes are compounded for £114d., and are impropriate in Sir John Bennet Bart. of Triesternagh Abbey. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 600 in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement united to Multifarnham chapel. In 1834, Protestants amounted to 214, and the Roman Catholics to 711; and a hedge-school had on its books 12 boys and 12 girls. Archdall says, respecting Leck Crumin or Crumain was bishop here in the 10th century. St. Fechin, who died A. D. 664, in his 180th year.

LECKNOWE. See PIERCETOWNLADY.

LECKPATRICK, a parish on the west of the barony of Strabane, and of co. Tyrone. It contains the village of BALLYMURPHY and part of the town of STRABANE: see these articles. Length, westward, 5½ miles; breadth, northward, 4; area, 13,451 acres, 16 perches,—of which 10,000 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches are water, and 16,299 perches are tideway. Pop., in 1831, 6,030; in 1841, 5,723. Houses 1,005. Pop. of the rural population in 1841, 4,807. Houses 873. The river Bann traces the western boundary; the Strabane extends parallel to it a little to the east; and the Moor lies on the eastern boundary. Part of the face is mountainous; but the greater part is arable land. Ligfordrum, the highest ground, is situated on the south-eastern boundary, and has an altitude of 1,343 feet above sea-level. The principal country residences are Green-lodge, Warrington, Farinhill, and Hollyhill,—the last the seat of the late Sir Sinclair, Esq., situated a little to the east of Strabane Glen. In 1842, the Leckpatrick Loan Office had a capital of £477; and, during that year, it had issued £1,902 in 825 loans, cleared a nett profit of £19 16s. 3d., and expended for charitable purposes £5 0s. 4d.—This parish is a rectory, and a benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition £646 3s. 1d.; glebe, £242. Gross income £888 3s. 1d.; nett, £792 5s. 11d. Patron, the Duke of Devonshire. The incumbent holds also the sinecure rectory of Kilcoleman, in the dio. of Killaloe. A vicar receives a salary of £100. The church was built in 1817, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and enlarged in 1834, by means of a loan of £276 18s. 5½d. from the same body. The church has 600 sittings; attendance, between 350 and 400. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of from 150 to 300. The Roman Catholic chapel at Cloughcor and Glenmornan have an attendance respectively 450 and 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Donagheady. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,450 Churchmen, 1,708 Presbyterians, and 1,708 Roman Catholics; 5 Sunday schools were established, and were all attended by about 439 children; and 12 hedge-schools—one of which at the glebe, was supported with £5 from the rector and £10 from the Marquis of Abercorn, one at Ballee with £5 from the Marquis of Abercorn, one at Cloughcor with £5 from the Marquis of Abercorn, one at Ballylaw with £5 from the Marquis of Abercorn—had on their books 424 boys and 270 girls.

LEE (THE), a large and beautiful river in the south of Ireland. It issues from the Roman Catholic chapel at Cloughcor and Glenmornan.

A cromlech, situated near a small lake at the base of Slievenabailtrog, an offshoot of Slieve-Croob, in this townland, is described by the author of the 'Chorographical Description of Down,' as "a huge gritty rock, in the shape of a monstrous coffin, supported by three feet, or supporters,—as measuring about 11 feet long, 5 feet broad, and from 18 to 24 inches thick,—and as covering so great a cavity among its supporters that a man of 6½ feet high can stand upright under it."

LEGAVANNON, a mountain on the eastern margin of the parish of Faughanvale, and of the barony of Tyrkeeran, 4½ miles south-south-west of Ballykelly, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Altitude above sea-level, 1,289 feet.

LEGNASHINNA, the source of the river Shannon, on the mutual boundary of the parishes of Killinagh and Templeport, 4 miles south by west of the foot of Upper Lough Macnean, barony of Tullaghagh, co. Cavan, Ulster.

LEIHEN, one of three denominations of an irregularly dispersed, much intersected, and extensively ramified bog, chiefly in the barony of Dunmore, co. Galway, Connasught. Length, south-westward, 5½ miles; extreme breadth, 4½; area, 10,037 acres. The other denominations are Boyannagh and Meelick. The proportion of low bog to red bog, in the whole, is nearly as one to ten. The entire tract is bounded, on the north, by the high pasture land of Dunmore and Flackamore; on the east and south, by the road from Kilkerrin by Glenamadda to Killinalag; and on the west, by the road from Dunmore to Kilkerrin;—and in a general view, it lies immediately north-west of GLENAMADDA: which see. The Boyannagh section, or rather series of sections, abounds in great undulations, and other irregularities; but the Lehen and Meelick sections are similar in nature and circumstances to most other bogs, and may be drained and reclaimed by similar means. The principal discharge for the waters of the whole cluster is into the numerous streams and subterranean currents, which ultimately fall into the Dunmore river. Estimated cost of reclamation, £12,041 3s. 8d.

LEHINCH. See LAHINCH.

LEIGHLIN, a diocese in the ecclesiastical province of Dublin, and civil province of Leinster. Its nominal seat is Old Leighlin in co. Carlow. See LEIGHLIN, OLD (TOWN OF). The see is popularly, though not very authentically, said to have been founded by St. Lasarian or Molissa, who, in the synod of Whitefield or Leighlin, held in 630, advocated the accidental mode or time of celebrating Easter. Archdall—the general bone-gatherer from the manure-heaps of old annalists—says that Lasarian had at one time 1,500 monks under his jurisdiction; and alleges also that, on his becoming bishop, he acquired by cession a monastery which had, several years before, been built at Old Leighlin by a St. Gobban. But both the old annalists and their slavish copyists are wondrously silent respecting episcopal successors of St. Lasarian till immediately after the period of the English; and then they begin to feel no difficulty in presenting readers with a regular list. The pecuniary interests of the see suffered great and frequent damage from the wars which harassed the country; but they were, for a long period, constantly rectified by the prompt and dexterous exertions of various spirited prelates. In 1523, Maurice Kavanagh, archdeacon of Leighlin, murdered Maurice Doran, the bishop alleged to be the 28th in succession; and he was hanged for the crime on the spot on which it was committed. In 1550, Robert Travers, the first Protestant bishop, was appointed; but, at the accession of Queen Mary, he was deprived. During Mary's reign, Thomas Field, formerly a Franciscan friar, held the see. In 1567, Daniel Kavanagh, the second Protestant bishop, received his appointment; and by granting long leases, as well as by other unjustifiable acts, he committed irremediable damage upon the episcopal property. In 1600, after a vacancy of nearly three years, the see was united to that of Ferns; and ever since it has remained annexed to that see; and at the new arrangement made by the Church Temporalities Bill in 1833, it and Ferns were jointly decreed to be united to Ossory.

The gross and the nett yearly episcopal income of the see, on an average of three years ending at the close of 1831, were respectively £2,667 7s. 6½d. and £2,499 1s. 5½d. The economy fund of the dean and chapter yields an annual produce of £162 13s. 10d.; and is expended in making certain annual payments to other parties than the dean and chapter, amounting aggregately to £132 0s. 2d., and in making requisite repairs upon the cathedral. The dignitaries, together with the gross amount of income derived from the corps of their respective dignities are, the dean, £448 4s. 1d.; the precentor, £235 15s. 4d.; the chancellor, £281 4s. 6d.; the treasurer, £115; the archdeacon, £309 12s. 3d.; the prebendary of Ullard, £285 9s.; the prebendary of Teconme, £41 9s.; the prebendary of Tullomagrath, £335; and the prebendary of Aghold, £481 3s.—The diocese lies partly in the counties of Kilkenny and Wicklow, but chiefly in Queen's county and the county of Carlow. Dr. Beaufort, estimating its total number of Irish acres at 318,900, its parishes at 89, and its churches at 30, assigns to co. Kilkenny 17,850 acres, 6 parishes, and 2 churches; to co. Wicklow 42,000 acres, 7 parishes, and 2 churches; to Queen's co. 122,000 acres, 27 parishes, and 13 churches; and to co. Carlow 137,050 acres, 49 parishes, and 13 churches. The length of the diocese is about 50 statute miles; its breadth is from 8 to 16; and its area is 482,115 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 187,095. Total of parishes, including chapelries, 84; of benefices, 60. Total of tithe composition belonging to the benefices, £30,148 6s. 3d.; glebes, £693 2s. 2½d. Gross income, £21,299 10s. 6½d.; nett, £18,492 6s. 11½d. Patron of 4 benefices, the Crown; of 32, the diocesan; of 2, incumbents; of 13, laymen and corporations; and of 9, alternate parties. Total amount of appropriate tithes, £1,970 0s. 11½d.; of impropriate tithes, £4,931 18s. 11½d. Number of stipendiary curates, 30; gross amount of their salaries, £2,185 0s. 0½d., exclusive of some advantages enjoyed by two. Total number of churches and of chapels-of-ease, 50; sittings, 10,721. Cost of building 25 of these, building and enlarging one, enlarging one, and repairing one, £29,568 2s. 6½d.; of which £12,253 16s. 11d. were gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £11,271 18s. 5d. were lent by that Board, £1,647 14s. 11½d. were proceeds of private donations, and £4,594 12s. 3½d. were raised by parochial assessments. Number of Presbyterian meeting-houses, 2; of other Protestant dissenting meeting-houses, 12; of Roman Catholic chapels, 64. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 20,391 Churchmen, 191 Presbyterians, 288 other Protestant dissenters, and 169,962 Roman Catholics; and one benefice contained no member of the Established Church, each of 6 contained not more than 20, each of 8 not more than 50, each of 4 not more than 100, each of 10 not more than 200, each of 15 not more than 500, each of 6 not more than 1,000, each of 5 not more than 2,000, and one between 2,000 and 5,000. In the same year, 279 daily schools had on their books 11,790 boys and 8,965 girls; 140 of these schools were supported wholly by fees; and of the remaining 139, which were supported or aided of the several classes of live stock, together with their respective value, was, in the rural districts, 168,753 horses and mules, £1,350,024; 23,599 asses, £23,599; 488,858 cattle, £3,177,577; 657,118 sheep, £722,831; 366,772 pigs, £458,463; and 2,206,941 poultry, £55,171;—and in the civic districts, 10,249 horses and mules, £81,992; 1,049 asses, £1,049; 8,069 cattle, £52,449; 2,386 sheep, £2,624; 19,982 pigs, £24,976; and 42,894 poultry, £1,072. Grand total of value of live stock in the rural districts, £5,787,665; in the civic districts, £164,162.

Commerce.—The only ports, whose commerce is of bulk enough to make a noticeable figure in a general estimate of that of the province, are the ports of Dundalk, Drogheda, Balbriggan, Dublin, Wicklow, Arklow, and Wexford, and part of the outlets of Carlingford bay, and Waterford Harbour. In 1835, the amount of the exports of Dundalk was 36,000 tons, of Drogheda 40,000, of Balbriggan 600, of Dublin 90,000, of Wicklow 16,000, of Arklow 900, of Wexford 30,000, of Carlingford bay 30,000, and of Waterford Harbour 118,000; the amount of the imports of Dundalk was 30,000 tons, of Drogheda 50,000, of Balbriggan 12,000, of Dublin 500,000, of Wicklow 8,000, of Arklow 4,000, of Wexford 40,000, of Carlingford bay 60,000, and of Waterford Harbour 130,000; the estimated value of the exports of Dundalk was £450,000, of Drogheda £800,000, of Balbriggan £5,000, of Dublin £2,600,000, of Wicklow £85,000, of Arklow £3,500, of Wexford £330,000, of Carlingford bay £600,000, and of Waterford Harbour £2,060,000; and the estimated value of the imports of Dundalk was £108,000, of Drogheda £270,000, of Balbriggan £10,500, of Dublin £4,400,000, of Wicklow £15,000, of Arklow £6,500, of Wexford £600,000, of Carlingford bay £560,000, and of Waterford Harbour, £1,572,000. A more various and minute view of the commerce of the province may be inferred from the statements in the Chapter of the General Introduction on the Commerce of Ireland.

Trade and Manufactures.—We must refer for historical notices and cumulative statistics of trade and manufactures to the General Introduction; and shall, in this place, merely exhibit the personal statistics of trade and productive industry as ascertained in the Census of 1841:—Farmers, 86,354; servants and labourers, 320,966; ploughmen, 2,561; gardeners, 3,195; graziers, 83; herds, 5,826; caretakers, 712; land-agents, 64; land-stewards, 1,763; game-keepers, 185; dairy-keepers, 1,627; fishermen, 2,564; millers, 1,539; maltsters, 67; brewers, 146; distillers, 82; wine-coopers, 4; barm-makers, 7; bakers, 2,565; confectioners, 591; cooks, 40; soda water makers, 49; cordial-makers, 9; salters, 52; salt-manufacturers, 15; vinegar-maker, 1; mustard-manufacturers, 2; tobacco-twisters, 104; snuff-grinders, 4; fish-mongers, 243; egg-dealers, 458; fruiterers, 199; cattle-dealers, 403; horse-dealers, 54; pig-jobbers, 415; sales-masters, 111; corn-dealers, 227; hay-factors, 6; seedsmen, 46; flour-merchants, 18; butter-merchants, 17; cheesemongers, 2; bacon-factors, 4; huxters and provision-dealers, 2,868; butchers, 1,771; poulterers, 111; victuallers, 927; grocers, 1,160; tea-dealers, 17; tobaccoconists, 280; wine-merchants, 102; spirit-merchants, 2; flax-dressers, 458; carders, 561; spinners of flax, 12,815; spinners of cotton, 136; spinners of wool, 11,706; spinners of unspecified classes, 28,569; winders and warpers, 948; silk throwsters, 12; wool-dressers, 474; weavers of cotton, 863; weavers of corduroy, 26; weavers of linen, 2,100; weavers of woollen, 857; weavers of tabinet, 19; weavers of silk, 531; weavers of ribbon, 167; weavers of fringe, 26; weavers of lace, in 1761, he was made Marquis of Kildare; and in 1766, he was advanced to the dignity of Duke of Leinster;—and he then possessed the rank which his descendant continues to enjoy, of the only Duke, the premier Marquis, and the premier Earl of Ireland. See KILDARE.

LEINSTER (MOUNT), a mountain on the mutual border of the counties of Carlow and Wexford, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Newtownbarry, Leinster. Its summit is the point of junction of four parishes,—Kiltannel, in East Idrome, co. Carlow,—Barragh, in Forth, co. Carlow,—Templeshanbo, in Scarewalsh, co. Wexford,—and St. Mary's of Newtownbarry, co. Wexford. It is broad-based; somewhat peaked in its acumination; decidedly picturesque in its outline; and grandly featured as a background to a series of rich landscapes seen over foregrounds in the circumjacent lowlands of Carlow and Wexford; and it lifts its summit to the altitude of 2,610 feet above sea-level. It may either be viewed as the northern and loftiest section of the great chain of the Blackstairs mountains [see BLACKSTAIRS], or as the nucleus and monarch mass of a somewhat independent group, whose southern offshoots run into the Blackstairs mountains, and whose other offshoots form a kind of radii over a few adjacent miles of Carlow and Wicklow. The roads from Newtownbarry to respectively Borris and New Ross pass over part of the high grounds connected with Mount Leinster, and command charming views across the low country of Wexford to the Wicklow mountains. Mount Leinster-lodge is situated at the west base of the mountain, within the parish of Kiltannel.

LEITRIM,

The most north-easterly county of the province of Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the bay and the county of Donegal; on the north-east, by the county of Fermanagh; on the east, by the counties of Fermanagh and Cavan; on the south-east and the south, by the county of Longford; and on the west, by the counties of Roscommon and Sligo. Though partly washed by sea-water, it can hardly be called a maritime county; for it is touched by Donegal bay, over a distance of only $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and it possesses, within that brief extent of coast, neither a port nor a fishing-village, nor even a coast-guard station. Its line of separation from co. Donegal, is the rivulet Bundoran, and from co. Fermanagh, is Loughs Melvin and Upper Macnean, and two rivulets which respectively feed them; its boundary-line with co. Cavan and co. Longford, is a series of alternating streams, watersheds, and artificial separations; its line of division from co. Roscommon, a length of 24 miles, is the Shannon and Lough Allen; and its boundary-line with co. Sligo is an alternation of artificial separations, with Mountkenney watershed, the lakes of Gill and Glin, and the small river Bunduff. Its outline is elongated and irregular; and may be variously regarded as a compressed and slightly truncated cone, and as a compressed and slender parallelogram. Its extreme length, in a direction half a point south of south-south-east, is $41\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its breadth, at the northern extremity, is $2\frac{1}{2}$,—at the centre, or Lough Allen, $5\frac{1}{2}$,—midway between the centre and the north, 13,—and midway between the centre and the south, 15; and its area comprises 249,350 acres of arable land, 115,869 of uncultivated land, 3,396 of continuous plantations, and 23,748 of water,—in all, 392,363 acres.

Surface.—The surface of the central and northern divisions of the county, in a general view, is a part of a wide shelving slope which descends northward, along Sligo, Leitrim, Fermanagh, and Donegal, to the sea; and of the southern division, is part of a compound series of mountains, high pasturage grounds, and poor arable lands, disposed round the sources and early course of the Shannon. But if regarded more closely, and apart from connection with the adjoining counties, the section north of Lough Allen may be regarded as a picturesque series of alternate glens, mountain-ridges, valleys, and mountain groups; the section around Lough Allen, as an alpine lake-basin, completely separating the country on the north from that on the south; and the section south of Lough Allen, as first a mass of wild uplands, next an undulating, loughlet-dappled plain, and next a successional alternation of poor, lake-patched vales and hollows, with low, steep ridges of moorland pasture. The loftiest summits in the northern division have altitudes above sea-level of 1,712,* 2,007, 1,575, 1,238, 1,511, 1,324, 1,448, 1,447, 1,123, and 1,377; and the loftiest summits in the southern division, all in the near vicinity of Lough Allen, have altitudes above sea-level of 1,407,† 1,707, and 1,922.‡

"If variety is a beauty," says Dr. MacParks, "this county possesses it in an eminent degree,—for it not only exhibits extensive tracts of some of the best and worst lands in the world, but exhibits them arranged in picturesque disorder, interspersed with hill, dale, wood, water, and mountain, forming some beautifully bold and grand landscapes. The ride from Rusky to Carrick-on-Shannon, along the charming outlets of Drumsna, no traveller can pass without admiration and pleasure. The windings of the Shannon through a fertile country, the intrusion of the wooded peninsula on its course, the pretty copping of Shubeg and Shumore, as if designed by Nature as a foil to the lofty grandeur of the more distant mountain of Slieve-an-Garain, are objects which on the one hand arrest the avidity of every one's observation, while on the other the sloping ascent, the luxuriant and variegated swell of the part of the county Roscommon, called Teemore, seduces the fancy and the eye of curiosity to sweep it over and over. In travelling northward by Lough Allen on either side of the lake, one observes the country, though tolerably good for tillage, to have a grey, gloomy aspect, rising by a steep ascent from the verge of the lake for a distance of two, three, and four miles to the Black mountains, which almost all around the lake terminate the visible horizon. I say almost, for even the gloom of this part of the country is relieved by partial beauties, particularly in different delightful views about the entrance of the Shannon into and departure from the lake. Thus leaving the lake, and travelling northward toward the sea, the lands, for 5 or 6 miles on either side, seem to be but little, if anything, of a better quality than those last described; however, in advancing or rather descending northward, large portions of land of very superior quality appear dispersed about Dromahaire, Manor-Hamilton, and Glenarr, and the face of the country is not less various and picturesque than the other parts. The rides and views about Manor-Hamilton and Lurganboy are extremely pretty. "In advancing still nearer to the sea, a mixture of the best and worst lands still continues to diversify the country. But here scenes of superior design and dignity enrapture the beholder. The bay of Donegal opens to the view, while the alluviments of Lough Melvin seize the eye to gaze on its old ruins and wooded islands; and the stupendous mountains of Dartry and Benbulbin, rise to the clouds, as if eager to enjoy the surrounding scenery."

Waters.—Lough Melvin, on the north-east boundary, lies 90 feet above sea-level, and has within co. Leitrim an area of 4,460 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches. Upper Lough Macnean, on the eastern boundary, lies 172 feet above sea-level, and has within co. Leitrim an area of 636 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches. Lough Garadice, on the eastern boundary, lies 176 feet above sea-level, and has within co. Leitrim an area of 1,106 acres, 36 perches. The chief lakes and loughlets on the eastern boundary south of Garadice, and also on the southern boundary, are Glasshouse, Laheen, Rockfield, Drumhart, Cullies, Gulladoo, Beaghmore, South Tully, Gortermone, Doogary, Nabelwy, Cloonooose, Fearglass, Sallagh, and Drumshambo. The lacustrine expansions of the Shannon, below Lough Allen, and while the river is in contact with Leitrim, are Corr, Nanogue, Boderig, and Boffin; and the portions of these, and of the Shannon itself, within co. Leitrim, amount to an area of 1,912 acres, 3 perches. Lough Allen, situated on the western boundary, lies 159 feet above sea-level in summer and 163 in winter, and has an area within co. Leitrim of 7,536 acres, 12 perches. Lough Gill, situated on the western boundary midway between Lough Allen and the sea, lies 20 feet above sea-level, and has an area within co. Leitrim of 498 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches. Lough Glin or Glencar, situated on the western boundary $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Lough Gill, lies 97 feet above sea-level, and has an area within co. Leitrim of about 190 or 200 acres. Six or seven of the interior lakes of the county have each an area of from 180 to 350 acres; but the others, though numerous, are in general very much smaller, and, exclusive of mere ponds, probably do not average more than between 30 and 50 acres. The principal ones in the northern division of the county are Glenade, Belhaven, Anarry, Carrigeencor, Lackagh, Mundkill, Arroo, Nabrack, Meenagraun, Adunny, and Barr; and the principal in the southern division are St. John's, Rinn, Scurr, Camagh, Carrickaport, Drumgilra, Bog, Cloonturk, Rooskey, Drumard, Cloonbonlagh, Cloonelivy, Cloonfinan, Cloonby, Cloone, Keeldra, Seltan, Rowan, Drumcollop, Adoon, Drumroosk, Donoghier, Cam, Little, Fort, Black, Carrigallen, Callougha, Cullies, Gulladoo, Killaneen, Corrachoo-eaun, Nacarriga, Drumkeelan, Lustia, Acres, Derrynahoo, Drumgorman, Carriskevy, Braw, Costrea, Kilmaddaroo, Headford, Adaff, Loughtown, Annaghery, Effrinagh, and Scardann. Excepting the Shannon after its efflux from Lough Allen, all the streams are of inconsiderable volume, and most of comparatively very brief length of run. The principal in the northern division of the county are the Drowes or Bunderan and the Duff or Banduff to Donegal bay; the Glenaniff, the Ballagh, the Lackagh, and the Kilcoo, to Lough Melvin; two rivulets to Upper Lough Macnean; the Shannon and the Diffagher to Lough Allen; and the Bonnet, the longest and much the most beautiful of the whole, to Lough Gill;—and the principal ones in the southern division of the county are the Yellow and the Stony rivers to Lough Allen; the Blackwater and the Dule to Lough Garadice; and the Aghacashel, the Eslin, and the Rinn to the Shannon. The chief mineral springs are those of Drumsna, Meelock, Athimonus, Cavan, and Oakfield. The first of these, and also several springs in the vicinity of Drumshambo, Castlecargan, and other places, are of the sulphureous kind; but the spas of Oakfield and Cavan—the latter on the neck of a peninsula at the head of Lough Allen—are chalybeate.

Climate.—The climate of Leitrim is aggregately colder than that of the southern counties of Ireland; and, owing to the great number and the height of its mountains, which draw down in vapours or break into rain the clouds just sailing landward from the ocean, it is more raw and wet than even most parts of other counties in the same latitude. The southern division, however, is considerably more genial than the northern; and sheltered valleys with a kindly soil, even in the north, particularly within the basin of the Bonnet river and around Manor-Hamilton, have a vegetation so luxuriant as to indicate the absence of all unpropitious climate.

Minerals.—A tiny district of gneiss, passing into granite and mica slate, lies about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of Manor-Hamilton, but is chiefly confined to the mountain of Benbo. A belt of mica slate, about 2 miles in mean breadth, and nearly insulating the previous formation, extends down the vale of the Bonnet river, from the immediate vicinity of Manor-Hamilton, to pass away into co. Sligo at Lough Gill, and eventually expand into the Ox mountains. Old red sandstone and sandstone conglomerate occupy a tiny district in the southern environs of Drumshambo, and a still tinier one $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Drumsna. Yellow sandstone and sandstone conglomerate form two districts, each about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles in mean breadth, and extending respectively across the northern and the southern extremities of the county. Millstone grit, including white sandstones and shales with thin beds of limestone and coal, forms a great district of from 6 to 16 miles in length northward from the foot of Lough Allen, and extending quite across the county to continuations in Sligo and Fermanagh; and it also constitutes the upland patch of surface which figures conspicuously in the mountain-mass of Dartree. The coal formation, constituting a chief part of the coalfield of Connaught, and spreading out to continuations in the adjacent counties of Roscommon and Sligo, exhibits itself in several comparatively large patches and pendicles within the millstone grit district, and particularly in the immediate vicinity of Lough Allen. Floetz or carboniferous limestone is the surface rock of all the remaining parts of the county, both north and south of the millstone grit district, and constituting rather more than one-half of its entire area.

—The rocks of the millstone grit district possess more resemblance to the millstone grit of the north of England, than to most known coalfields. “The series reposes on the splintery limestone which forms the upper member of the carboniferous or floetz limestone field. First in ascending order occur thick beds of yellowish white quartzzy sandstone, with interposed beds of black shale. The edges of these strata present the appearance of terraces. Then succeeds a massive bed of shale, which in some parts of the series attains a thickness of 700 feet. The lower beds of this member consist of thin alternations of black shale with impure dark bluish grey argillaceous limestone, containing many of the fossils of the carboniferous limestone formation. The calcareous beds gradually grow thinner as they ascend, and at length disappear, their places being supplied by layers, and frequently by large flattened spheroids, of argillaceous ironstone. The shale associated with the ironstone contains frequent casts of marine organic remains. The beds of ironstone also grow thinner as they ascend, and at length disappear, leaving the upper portion of the shale of a uniform structure. The next member of the series after the massive shale is a stratum of yellow sandstone, in some parts of the district 250 feet thick, associated with beds of true millstone grit. Alternations of shale and sandstone containing beds of coal, succeed wherever the mountains are of sufficient altitude; for it would appear that such a formation had originally extended over the entire district, and that the absence of those members from the lower mountains we may simply hint in conclusion, and as a means of conjecturing most other deficiencies, that the instrument of tillage in almost universal use is the semi-barbarous loy or one-sided spade.—In 1841, the number of farmers in the county was 13,326 males and 180 females; of servants and labourers, 24,990 males and 624 females; of ploughmen, 10; of gardeners, 48; of graziers, 2; of herds, 203 males and 15 females; of care-takers, 20 males and 1 female; of land-agents, 2; of land-stewards, 23; of game-keepers, 3; of dairy-keepers, 2 males and 3 females. In the same year, the number of farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres each, was 9,373; of from 5 to 15 acres, 7,971; of from 15 to 30 acres, 877; and of upwards of 30 acres, 202.

Live Stock.—Few if any systematic efforts have been made for the improvement of the breeds of live stock. Bulls, but no cows, of one or two favourite breeds have been imported; and when these have died, the true breeds have been lost, and only the crosses of them with the native breeds have remained. Excepting a few yearlings which are raised by the small farmer, and which yield him little profit, nearly all the supplies of cattle are obtained from the counties of Mayo and Roscommon.—In 1841, the live stock on farms or holdings, not exceeding 1 acre, consisted of 280 horses and mules, 242 asses, 2,146 cattle, 516 sheep, 3,600 pigs, and 27,040 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 385 horses and mules, 811 asses, 11,589 cattle, 1,897 sheep, 6,899 pigs, and 52,158 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 1,327 horses and mules, 1,290 asses, 23,190 cattle, 3,970 sheep, 9,511 pigs, and 68,014 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 620 horses and mules, 139 asses, 5,848 cattle, 1,448 sheep, 1,454 pigs, and 11,834 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 374 horses and mules, 33 asses, 2,648 cattle, 1,757 sheep, 348 pigs, and 4,309 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective value, are 2,986 horses and mules, £23,888; 2,515 asses, £2,515; 45,421 cattle, £295,237; 9,588 sheep, £10,547; 21,812 pigs, £27,265; and 163,355 poultry, £4,083. Grand total of value of live stock, £363,535.

Woods.—About 140 years ago almost the whole county was a continuous forest; and even about a century ago, a person might have travelled from Drumshambo to Drumkeeran, a distance of 10 miles, laying hold upon the branches of a close and uninterrupted series of trees. The portion of the forest on the Slieve-an-Ierin mountains was burnt to extinction in conducting iron-works on the banks of Lough Allen; and the many other portions are supposed to have been destroyed as common fuel, since the bogs, even about 40 years ago, had “only begun to be nibbled at around the edges for turf.” About the year 1770, a spirit of renovating the face of the country with wood succeeded the general indolence and want of taste; and from that year till the close of 1798, there were planted on eleven estates 145,384 trees,—so various in kinds as to include ash, planes, sycamore, beech, larch, elm, fir, eastern planes, white planes, laurels, palm-trees, oaks, chestnuts, Weymouth pines, poplars, philereas, silver fir, arbutus, laurustinus, alder, and plum-tree. In 1841, the continuous plantations within the county consisted of 67 acres of oak, 74 of ash, 15 of elm, 40 of beech, 99 of fir, 2,822 of mixed trees, and 279 of orchards,—in all 3,396 acres; and of these, there were planted previous to 1791, 55 acres of oak, 23 of ash, 8 of beech, 2 of fir, 708 of mixed trees, and 44 of orchards. The number of detached trees, in 1841, was 181,145,—equivalent to 1,132 acres; and these added to the continuous plantations, exhibit a total of 4,528 acres of wood.

Trade and Manufactures.—In 1835, or on the annual average of years from 1826 till 1835, both inclusive, the sales of wheat at Carrick-on-Shannon amounted to 246 barrels, at Drumsna to 483, at Jamestown to 1,449, and at Fenagh to 2,228; the sales of oats at Carrick-on-Shannon to 2,160 barrels, at Drumsna to 8,987, at Drumshambo to 23,400, at Mohill to 5,200, at Dromod to 500, at Ballinamore to 3,565, and at Carrigallen to 160; and the sales of rye at Carrick-on-Shannon to 118 barrels. But these sales exhibit a seriously defective view of the corn trade of the county; for the sales at Dromabaire, Drumkeeran, and Manor-Hamilton, are returned along with those of Sligo. In 1802, the only noticeable establishments or appliances in any of the departments of manufacture, were 4 bleachfields, a considerable number of looms, comparatively numerous coarse potteries, about 50 corn-mills, and about half-a-dozen tuck mills.—The existing state of trade and manufactures will be best shown by the personal statistics of productive industry ascertained in the Census of 1841:—Millers, 59; bakers, 69; confectioners, 13; fishmonger, 1; egg-dealers, 68; cattle-dealers, 8; horse-dealer, 1; pig-jobbers, 13; corn-dealer, 1; butter-merchant, 1; huxters and provision dealers, 31; butchers, 73; victuallers, 15; grocers, 16; tobacconist, 1; flax-dressers, 74; carders, 21; spinners of flax, 6 709; of wool, 1,379; of unspecified classes, 13,214; winders and warpers, 9; weavers of linen, 247; weavers of woollen, 30; weavers of unspecified classes, 709; bleachers, 12; dyers, 9; clothiers, 4; skinner, 1; curriers, 3; tanners, 3; brogue-makers, 126; boot and shoe makers, 540; tailors, 528; sempstresses, 413; dress-makers, 450; milliners, 60; lace-worker, 1; stay-makers, 2; knitters, 543; hatters, 9; bonnet-makers, 16; hair-dresser and barber, 1; leather-dealer, 1; hosier, 1; woollen-drafter, 1; dealers in old clothes, 9; rag and bone dealers, 10; architects, 2; builders, 8; brickmaker, 1; potters, 5; stone-cutters, 24; lime-burners, 6; bricklayers, 7; stone-masons, 250; slaters, 10; thatchers, 12; plasterers, 7; pavier, 1; quarrymen, 6; sawyers, 27; carpenters, 285; undertaker, 1; cart-makers, 14; cabinet-makers, 3; coopers, 246; turners, 2; mill-wrights, 9; wheel-wrights, 46; ship-wrights, 5; boot-tree and last maker, 1; pump-borer, 1; reed-makers, 3; card-makers, 2; brush-maker, 1; basket-makers, 7; broom-makers, 2; miners, 12; blacksmiths, 240; whitesmiths, 3; nailers, 122; cutlers, 2; braziers and coppersmiths, 4; plumber, 1; tin-plate workers, 23; tinkers, 19; machine-makers, 5; watch-makers, 5; coach and car makers, 5; saddlers, 4; harness-makers, 3; rope-maker, 1; letter-press printers, 5; bookbinder, 1; chandlers and soap-boilers, 3; painters and glaziers, 26; sieve-makers, 2; feather-dealers, 9; glass and delph dealers, 3; booksellers and stationers, 2; ironmongers, 3; merchants of unspecified classes, 20; dealers of unspecified classes, 214; shopkeepers of unspecified classes, 93; shop-assistants, 48.

Fairs.—The principal fairs held within the county are the following:—Ballinamore, Feb. 18, May 12, Aug. 18, Nov. 12.—Carrick-on-Shannon, Jan. 18, March 20, May 12, June 6, Aug. 11, Sept. 14, Oct. 22, Nov. 21, Dec. 16.—Carrigallen, April 20, May 7, Aug. 9, Oct. 8, Dec. 25.—Cloone, Feb. 12, April 5, May 26, June 13, July 10, Aug. 26, Sept. 29, Nov. 2, Dec. 20.—Drumkeeran, Jan. 27, March 8, April 20, May 27, June 24, July 18, Aug. 18, Sept. 16, Oct. 19, Nov. 11, Dec. 9.—Dromod, Jan. 1, March 28, May 16, June 29, Aug. 15, Oct. 10, Dec. 5.—Jamestown, May 28, July 8, Sept. 1, Dec. 20.—Leitrim, Jan. 22, Feb. 20, March 25, May 5, June 16, July 23, Sept. 1, Oct. 13, Dec. 1.—Longfield, May 17, Oct. 10, Dec. 28.—Lurganboy, May 15, June 21, Aug. 21, Sept. 24, Oct. 21.—Newtown, first Saturday of every month, and Feb. 25, May 25, Aug. 25, Nov. 25.—Newtownmore, June 26, Oct. 15.

Communications.—A line of canal to connect the Shannon with the Erne, and the internal navigations of the west with those of the north-east, is proposed to be cut across Leitrim. See BALLINAMORE. The proposed railway from Dublin to Sligo passes up the left bank of the Shannon for some distance within Leitrim, and touches the towns of Drumsna and Carrick-on-Shannon. The nearest line of railway proposed by the Public Commissioners, is that from Dublin through the counties of Cavan and Fermanagh to Enniskillen. The county surveyor was appointed in October 1836; and he superintended the formation of 64 miles of new road previous to the close of 1841, and had then under his charge 652 miles of road. The chief roads within the county are the mail-lines from Dublin to Sligo through Drumsna and Carrick-on-Shannon, from Enniskillen to Sligo through Manor-Hamilton, from Sligo to Londonderry across the north end of the county, from Drumsna to Mohill, and from Carrick-on-Shannon to Ballinamore. The county has a large share in the advantages of the navigation of the Upper Shannon, and will eminently profit by the extensive improvements of the Shannon Navigation Commissioners.

Divisions and Towns.—The county is divided into two baronies in the north, and three in the south. Rosslogher and Dromahaire occupy respectively the north and the south of the northern division; and Carrigallen, Mohill, and Leitrim, occupy respectively the east, the south, and the north-west of the southern division. The two sets of baronies form two civil districts for the despatch of court-business by the county magistrates,—the district of Manor-Hamilton on the north, and the district of Carrick-on-Shannon on the south.—The act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred 4 townlands of the parish of Drumreilly from the barony of Tullaghagh, co. Cavan, to the barony of Carrigallen, co. Leitrim,—pop., in 1841, 186; and four townlands of the parish of Mohill from the barony of Longford, co. Longford, to the barony of Mohill, co. Leitrim,—pop. 137. The barony of Carrigallen, as now constituted, contains the whole of two parishes and part of three other parishes; Dromahaire contains five whole parishes, and part of two other parishes; Leitrim contains two whole parishes, and part of three other parishes; Mohill contains part of four parishes; and Rosslogher contains the whole of one parish, and part of two other parishes. Dr. Beaufort, stating the total number of parishes at 17, assigns 10 to the diocese of Kilmore, and 7 to Ardagh,—each set containing 8 churches.—The towns and chief villages in Carrigallen, are Ballinamore, Carrigallen, and Newtownmore; in Dromahaire, Drumkeeran, Dromahaire, and part of Manor-Hamilton; in Leitrim, Drumsna, Drumsambo, Kiltoghert, Leitrim, Jamestown, Kesharrigan, and part of Carrick-on-Shannon; in Mohill, Dromod, Cloone, Mohill, and Roosky; and in Rosslogher, Kiltyclogher, Kinlough, Lurganboy, and part of Manor-Hamilton.

Statistics.—In 1834, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in the county was 242, of scholars 11,135, of male scholars 6,736, of female scholars 3,629, of scholars whose sex was not specified 770, of scholars connected with the Established church 2,147, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 27, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 7,757, of scholars whose religious connection was not known 1,204; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 242, of scholars 12,472, of male scholars 8,010, of female scholars 4,153, of scholars whose sex was not specified 309, of scholars connected with the Established church 2,484, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 23, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 9,786, and of scholars whose religious connection was not known 179. The school and church statistics for 1834 are returned according to the diocesan divisions, and may be remotely conjectured by reference to the articles KILMORE and ARDAGH. At the close of December, 1841, the National Board had in full operation within the county 32 schools, conducted by 31 male and 12 female teachers, attended by 2,463 male and 1,974 female scholars, and aided during that year with £357 13s. 4d. of salaries, £6 for building, £39 1s. 2½d. of school requisites at half price, and £36 of free stock. In 1842, the number of persons committed for drunkenness was 24; the number of cases before magistrates and petty-sessions was 158; and the number of committals on charges of felony was 45. Of the 457 persons committed for felony, 75 were charged with offences against the person, 75 with offences against property committed with violence, 118 with offences against property committed without violence, 9 with malicious offences against property, 3 with offences against the currency, and 177 with offences not included in the above categories. Of the 457 committed on these charges, 180 were convicted and 277 were acquitted and discharged. Of the 180 convicted, 2 were sentenced to death, 16 to transportation, 117 to imprisonment, 8 to pay fines, and 37 were either discharged on sureties or not sentenced. Of the 277 acquitted and discharged, 161 were found not guilty on trial, 78 had no bill found against them, and 38 were not prosecuted. At the close of 1842, the constabulary force consisted of 1 second-rate county inspector, 1 first-rate sub-inspector, 3 second-rate sub-inspectors, 1 third-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate head-constable, 3 second-rate head-constables, 26 constables, 124 first-rate sub-constables, 7 second-rate sub-constables, and 1 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining this force during 1842, was £9,242 7s. 5½d. Two stipendiary magistrates are stationed at respectively Mohill and Manor-Hamilton. The assizes for the county are held at Carrick-on-Shannon; courts of quarter session, at Carrick-on-Shannon, Ballinamore, and Manor-Hamilton; and courts of petty session at Ballinamore, Carrigallen, Carrick-on-Shannon, Kesharrigan, Cloone, Dromod, Dromahaire, Drumkeeran, Drumsambo, Drumsna, Kinlough, Bundoran, Mohill, and Manor-Hamilton. The bridewells are at Carrick-on-Shannon, Manor-Hamilton, and Ballinamore; the county infirmary at Carrick-on-Shannon; the district lunatic, at Ballinasloe in co. Roscommon; the dispensaries at Ballinamore, Carrick-on-Shannon, Carrigallen, Cloghan, Dromahaire, Drumkeeran, Drumsambo, Drumsna, Kinlough, and Manor-Hamilton; the law funds at Annaduff, Carrick-on-Shannon, Cloone, Clooncumber, Dromod, Lakefield, Mohill, Tullys, and Willsbrook; and the union work-houses at Carrick-on-Shannon, Manor-Hamilton, and Mohill.—The annual amount of property valued for the poor-rate is £162,552; the annual amount of property valued under the Act 6 and 7 William IV. c. 84, £121,003; and the amount of Grand Juror presentments for 1842, £21,507.—The number of tenements valued for the poor-rate is 25,302, and of these, 15,740 were valued under £5,—6,708, under £10,—1,654, under £15,—520, under £20,—342, under £25,—128, under £30,—123, under £40,—75, under £50,—and 120, at and above £50.—Leitrim sent to the Irish parliament two members for the county, two for Jamestown, and two for Carrick-on-Shannon; but it sends to the Imperial parliament only two members for the county. Constituency in 1841, 1,488; of whom 162 were £50 freeholders, 98 were £20 freeholders, 1,214 were £10 freeholders, 2 were £20 lease-holders, and 12 were £10 lease-holders.

Population in 1792, 50,000; in 1813, 94,095; in 1821, 124,785; in 1831, 141,524; in 1841, 155,297. Houses, in 1792, 10,026; in 1813, 17,899; in 1821, 21,762; in 1831, 24,200; in 1841, 25,912. The following statistics are all of the year 1841. Males 77,501; females, 77,796; families, 27,192. Inhabited houses, 25,912; uninhabited complete houses, 712; houses in the course of erection, 25. First-class inhabited houses, 152; second-class, 3,221; third-class, 11,340; fourth-class, 11,199. Families residing in first-class houses, 169; in second-class houses, 3,476; in third-class houses, 11,844; in fourth-class houses, 11,703. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 21,663; in manufactures and trade, 4,067; in other pursuits, 1,402. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 508; on the directing of labour, 5,799; on their own manual labour, 20,479; on means not specified, 406. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 35,866; to clothing, 2,242; to lodging, 1,526; to health, 37; to charity, 1; to justice, 297; to education, 205; to religion, 71; unclassified, 1,239; without any specified occupation, 3,355. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 768; to clothing, 20,924; to lodging, 6; to health, 27; to education, 61; to religion, 2; unclassified, 3,134; without any specified occupation, 24,784. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 23,908; who could read but not write, 11,995; who could neither read nor write, 31,664. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 7,773; who could read but not write, 14,318; who could neither read nor write, 45,165. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 3,780; attending superior schools, 69. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 2,757; attending superior schools, 41. Per-centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 42; married, 53; widowed, 5. Per-centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 36; married, 53; widowed, 11. Barristers, 3; attorneys, 5; clerk of the peace, 1; law-clerks, 3; excise officers, 68; inspector of weights and measures, 1; bailiffs, 29; gaol-keepers, 10; school teachers, 170 males and 45 females; ushers and tutors, 35 males and 4 females; governesses, 13; clergymen of the Established church, 20; Methodist ministers, 4; Presbyterian minister, 1; Roman Catholic clergymen, 34; ministers of religion whose denominational connection was not specified, 6; sextons, 3; parish clerks, 3 males and 2 females.

History.—In pure Irish times, or before the period of the Anglo-Norman conquest, the territory which now constitutes the county of Leitrim, formed the principality or petty kingdom of Breifne-O'Rourke, governed by the chief of the sept of O'Rourke, and named after that sept in order to be distinguished from Breifne-O'Reilly, the territory of the present county of Cavan. Events following Dermot MacMurrough, the king of Leinster's, abduction of Dervorgilla, the wife of Tiernan O'Rourke, king of Breifne-O'Rourke, proved the occasion of MacMurrough's appeal to Henry, and of the consequent conquest of Ireland. Though all Breifne-O'Rourke is said to have been formerly granted at the Conquest to Hugh de Lacy, yet the O'Rourks maintained, not only possession of it but toparchical control over it, and independence of the English authority till the reign of Elizabeth. Leitrim was first erected into a separate county, either in 1563, by Lord-deputy Sussex, or in 1565, by Sir Henry Sidney. Brian O'Rourke, the chief of his sept in the county, spurned the introduction of English law, annoyed and harassed Sir Richard Bingham, president of Connaught, and eventually, in 1588, rushed into open rebellion. He had in his pay a body of Munster auxiliaries, and was aided with the forces of the sept of MacSwiney; he held the castle of Dromahaire, till driven from it into Donegal by Sir Richard Bingham and the Earl of Clanrickard; he quarrelled, in Donegal, with his Munster auxiliaries, and took refuge for a season with his allies, the MacSwineys; and he finally fled to Scotland, and was delivered to the English, carried to London, and tried and executed for treason. In 1596, Tieve O'Rourke, the son of Brian, took part in the great rebellion of O'Donnell; in the course of a few months, he made submissions to the English government; in June 1597, he joined Maguire in rebellion, and shared in the successful attack upon an English force under Sir Conyers Clifford in a pass of the Curlew mountains; and in 1603, he made final submissions to the government, and sat peacefully down in possession, by English tenure, of an allotted remnant of his patrimonial estates. In 1615, numerous grants of land in Leitrim were made to English "undertakers." In 1641, Sir Owen O'Rourke, at the head of a force of the native Irish, seized all the military strengths of the county, excepting the castles of Manor-Hamilton and Carrickdrumrusk, and garrisoned them against the English government. In 1650, the Roman Catholic bishops and clergy held a synod at Jamestown, delegated agents to treat on their behalf with foreign powers, and framed a sentence of excommunication against the person and all the adherents of the Marquis of Ormond. The forfeitures which followed the long and great rebellion of the 17th century, extinguished the influence of the name of O'Rourke, and included almost all the lands which had remained with the native Irish up to the commencement of the rebellion; but the forfeitures which followed the wars of the Revolution do not appear to have affected so much as one estate in Leitrim. In 1798, the French invaders under General Humbert marched and counter-marched through Leitrim; and finally fought, sustained defeat, and surrendered at BALLINAMUCK: which see.

Antiquities.—A large cromlech occurs about half-a-mile north-east of Fenagh; and another at the road side, on the demesne of Letterfyan. The principal old military strengths, whether of the Irish or the English times, are O'Rourke's castle at Dromahaire, Sir William Villier's castle at Dromahaire, Jamestown-castle, Longfield-castle, Castlefore between Fenagh and Keshcarrigan, Castle-John on an island of Lough Skur, Cloncarrick-castle within half-a-mile of Carrigallen, the castles of O'Rourke and Park on the Leitrim banks of Lough Gill, Castlecar in Glencar about 3 miles from Manor-Hamilton, Dunganbuy-castle within $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile of the sea, Woodford-house on the ruins of one of the O'Rourke castles, and Manor-Hamilton-castle. The principal monastic ruins or vestiges are those of Crevlea abbey on the Bonnet river near Dromahaire, Fionagh abbey in the parish of Fenagh, Jamestown friary, Annaduff abbey near Lough Boffin, Cloone abbey, Kilnaille abbey on the verge of Killowmawn lake, Moy abbey at Newtown on the border toward co. Cavan, Corragh and Tarmon abbeys on the banks of Lough Allen, the monastery or military fortress of the town of Leitrim, and the extinct or erased monasteries of Mohill, Coolkille, Doiremelle, and Oilean-ionan.

Inse.—Either the county or the town of Leitrim gives the title of Earl, in the peerage of Ireland, to the noble family of Clements. In 1783, Robert Clements, Esq., a descendant of Albert Clements, Marshal of France about the end of the 12th century, and eldest son of the Right Hon. Nathaniel Clements, Deputy-vice-treasurer of Ireland, was created Baron Leitrim of Manor-Hamilton; and respectively in 1793, and in 1796, he was advanced to the dignities of Viscount Leitrim, and Earl of Leitrim. The family seats are Manor-Hamilton in co. Leitrim and Killadoon in co. Kildare.

LEITRIM, a barony in the north-west of the southern division of co. Leitrim, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Dromahaire; on the north-east by the barony of Carrigallen; on the east by the barony of Mohill; and on the south and west, by co. Roscommon. Its greatest length, southward, is 11½ miles; its greatest breadth is 7; and its area is 61,685 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches,—of which 4,874 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches are water. The northern district consists of a main part of the Slieve-an-Ierin mountains, and contains a summit of 1,922 feet of altitude above sea-level; the western and southern districts are part of the valley of the Shannon; and the central, eastern, and south-eastern districts are part of the great undulating plain and low hill-grounds of the county, profusely dappled with water. A portion of Lough Allen, to the amount of 1,717 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches, occupies the north-west corner of the barony; the river Shannon, occupying an aggregate area of 783 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches, traces all the western and southern boundary downward from Lough Allen; Lough MacHugh, covering an area of 41 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches, lies on the south-east boundary; and a large number of other lakes, principally situated in the interior, and individually of but small extent, occupy the whole of the remaining water area of the barony.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Kiltogher and Kiltubrid, and part of the parishes of Annaduff, Fenagh, and Mohill. Its towns and villages are Drumsna, Drumshambo, Kiltogher, Leitrim, Jamestown, Keshcarrigan, and part of Carrick-on-Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 30,773; in 1841, 32,658. Houses 5,416. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,464; in manufactures and trade, 867; in other pursuits, 400. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,101; who could read but not write, 2,522; who could neither read nor write, 6,515. Females at and above 4 years of age who could read and write, 1,933; who could read but not write, 3,231; who could neither read nor write, 8,950.—This barony lies partly within the Poor-law union of Mohill, and partly within that of Carrick-on-Shannon. The total number of tenements valued is 5,291; and of these, 3,327 were valued under £5,—1,416, under £10,—336, under £15,—80, under £20,—40, under £25,—17, under £30,—28, under £40,—11, under £50,—and 36, at and above £50.

LEITRIM, a barony in the extreme south-east of co. Galway, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Kilcomel; on the north-east, by the barony of Longford; on the east and south, by Lough Derg; on the south-west, by co. Clare; on the west, by the barony of Loughrea; and on the north-west, by the barony of Athenry. Its length, southward, is 24 miles; its extreme breadth is 9½; and its area is 120,185 acres, 20 perches,—of which 10,777 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches are in Lough Derg, and 286 acres, 16 perches are in small lakes. The southern and south-western districts are part of the Slieve Baughta mountains, with summits nowhere exceeding 692 feet in altitude above sea-level; the northern district and the western district north of the Slieve Baughta mountains, are part of the central tableau of the county, with an extreme elevation of about 400 feet; the north-eastern district is part of a great expanse of low, level country; and the eastern district, over nearly the whole length of Lough Derg, consists of the most scenic part of that picturesque, beautiful, and very extensive lake.—The Act 6 and 7 William IV. transferred two townlands of the parish of Inniscaltra from Upper Tulla in co. Clare, to Leitrim in co. Galway,—pop., in 1841, 182; on townland of the parish of Leitrim, and one of Kilmee, from Loughrea to Leitrim,—pop., 78; and the whole of the parish of Kilrickill, 7 townlands of Abbeygormacan, and 2 of Killoran, from Athenry to Leitrim,—pop., 2,128. The barony, as now constituted, contains the whole of the parishes of Ballinakill, Clonrush, Kileooly, Kilrickill, and Leitrim, and part of the parishes of Abbeygormacan, Dunry, Inniscaltra, Kilbarron, Killoran, Kilmee, Kilrickill, and Tynagh. The towns and villages are Woodford, Mount-Shannon, and Tynagh. Pop., in 1831, 28,209; in 1841, 32,590. Houses 5,302. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,491; in manufactures and trade, 732; in other pursuits, 272. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,105; who could read but not write, 2,021; who could neither read nor write, 8,297. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,478; who could read but not write, 2,093; who could neither read nor write, 10,626.—This barony lies partly within the Poor-law union of Loughrea, and partly within that of Scariff. The total number of valued tenements is 4,147; and of these, 2,603 were valued under £5,—890, under £10,—308, under £15,—93, under £20,—58, under £25,—39, under £30,—46, under £40,—24, under £50,—and 86, at and above £50.

LEITRIM, a parish in the barony of Leitrim, 4½ miles south-east by east of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,098 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,688; in 1841, 1,502. Houses 296. A fair proportion of the surface consists of good tillage land; and the western district is rendered ornate with the woods on the demesne of Dalystown. A height on the western boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 508 feet. The villages and chief hamlets are Leitrim, Kylebrack, Brekish, and Ballinamanragh. The village of Leitrim is the site of the Roman Catholic chapel, and of the ruins of an old church and castle; and, in 1831, it had a population of 280. The road from Loughrea to Mount-Shannon passes through the interior. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred the townland of Rafarn from the barony of Loughrea to that of Leitrim.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LICKMOLASSY [which see], in the diocese of Clogfert. Tithe composition, £54 14s. 7½d. A portion of the tithes, compounded for £13 16s. 11½d., is appropriated to the use of Clogfert. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to chapels of Killaneen and Kileooly, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 1,786; and a day school had on its books 68 boys and 33 girls.

LEITRIM, a parish partly in the barony of Coshbride and Coshmore, co. Waterford, but chiefly in the barony of Condons and Clangibbon, co. Cork, and 3½ miles east by south of Kilworth, Mount. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Waterford section, 1,218 acres; of the Cork section, 5,910 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,032; in 1841, 2,579. Houses 392. Pop. of the Cork section, in 1831, 1,694; in 1841, 2,189. Houses 333. The surface occupies the peninsula between the Blackwater river and the Araglin rivulet; and consists partly of good arable land, but chiefly of pasture and mountainous ground. The road from Fermoy to Lismore passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILWORTH [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £230; and the latter are inappropriate in the Norcott family. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 2,477; and two hedge-schools had on their books 57 boys and 25 girls.

LEITRIM, a village in the parish of Kiltoghert, barony and county of Leitrim, Connaught. It stands on the western verge of the county, on the left bank of the Shannon, and on the road from Carrick-on-Shannon to Manor-Hamilton, 3 miles north by east of Carrick-on-Shannon, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ south by west of Drumsambo. Though giving name to the county in which it lies, and laying claim to a considerable antiquity, it has long been an insignificant and obscure village. "If the town ever was of any note," said the county statist in 1802, "it is now, and has been for many years, so unpeopled and deserted, that scarce one remains there to tell anything about it." Its original or uncorrupted name was Leathdroman; and there figures, in monastic story and Romish hagiology, a St. MacLeigas, son of Cornac, and bishop of Leathdroman. Some slender vestiges remain of an ancient building which is variously supposed to have been a monastery and a fortalice, and which not impossibly may have been first the one and then the other. The bridge across the Shannon at Leitrim has 6 arches, and is 150 feet long and 13 wide; and it gives its name of Battle-Bridge to a hamlet on the Roscommon side of the river: see BATTLE-BRIDGE. About 400 yards above the village, a landing quay and harbour are to be constructed by the Commissioners for Improving the Navigation of the River Shannon, to be the terminus of the steam navigation of the Upper Shannon, and to cost £3,110 0s. 6d. From this point upward to Lough Allen, a distance of nearly 4 miles, a towing path will be formed for tracking barges; and hence, downward to Killaloe, there will be an uninterrupted steam navigation of 115 statute miles. Fairs are held on Jan. 23, Feb. 20, May 5, June 16, July 24, Sept. 1, Oct. 13, and Dec. 1. Area, 18 acres. Pop., in 1831, 274; in 1841, 406. Houses 66. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 39; in manufactures and trade, 25; in other pursuits, 10. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 7; on the directing of labour, 29; on their own manual labour, 38.

LEITRIM (THE), a river of the parish of Rathnew, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is properly but the name which the Vartry river bears from Newrath Bridge to the sea, and has a run, as the Leitrim river, of only about a mile eastward, till, jointly with two or three rivulets from the north, it forms the long estuarial stripe of marine water between which and the sea extends the flat, sandy, elongated peninsula, called the Murrough, and known as the racing-ground of the town of Wicklow.

LEIXLIP, a parish, partly in the barony of North Salt, co. Kildare, and partly in the barony of Newcastle, co. Dublin, Leinster. The Kildare section contains the town of LEIXLIP: see next article. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Kildare section, 1,695 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches,—of which 13 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches are in the river Liffey. Area of the Dublin section, 1,506 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches,—of which 18 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches are in the river Liffey. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,624;* in 1841, 2,033. Houses 208. Pop. of the Dublin section, in 1841, 391. Houses 74. Pop. of the rural districts of the Kildare section, in 1841, 556. Houses 98. The land is aggregately of good quality; and the general surface is ornate and softly picturesque. The Liffey traces the south boundary of the Kildare section, and then flows between the two counties to the town of Leixlip; the Rye flows east southward through the Kildare section to the Liffey at Leixlip; and the Royal canal passes along the north border, and has its 13th lock on the western boundary. The seats and other noticeable objects within the Kildare section are Leixlip castle, Leixlip-house, Barnhall, Easton, Music-hall, Collinstown, Newtownhill, St. Catherine's Park, Ryevale-house, Wonderful Barn, the Salmon Leap upon the Liffey, the Aqueduct across the Rye, and the hamlet of Newtown; and those within the Dublin section, are Mount Pleasant, Glenwood, Westmanstown, and the Devil's Mills. The landscape of the parish has been pronounced "one of the most beautiful bits of scenery in the kingdom;" and, though destitute of all boldness and grandeur, possesses the recommendation of considerable variety. "From the bridge by which the Liffey is crossed," says Mr. Fraser, "the scenery is very striking. Below the long reach of the river, with its densely wooded banks, and above the broader expanse of water, on different levels, occasioned by the mill-dams, over which the castellated mansion of the Hon. George Cavendish, embosomed in lofty trees, is seen. The town, which principally consists of a good row of houses, on either side of the road, is watered on one hand by the Liffey, and on the other by the rivulet called the Rye, the latter falling into the Liffey at the head of the town. Above the castle, on the one side, is the beautiful sylvan glen through which the Liffey tumbles, forming, in its descent over the rocky ledges, the well-known and much frequented salmon-leap; and, on the other, is the deep and fertile valley through which the smaller river Rye peacefully meanders. These fortuitous circumstances, together with the various handsome villa residences around, render the vicinity of Leixlip highly attractive." The Salmon-leap occurs half-a-mile above the town, and is approached by a footpath which has been generously made across green fields and through private grounds. "The roar of the waterfall," says Mrs. Hall, "greets the ear" of a person approaching by the footpath; "and, through some skilfully formed breaks among the foliage that skirts the river, occasional glimpses of it are caught. The cataract is of great width, and very picturesque in character: the waters glide onward in a smooth but rapid current, and dash down the rocky steep,—a mass of spray and foam. The whole neighbourhood is beautiful; the river is lined with graceful trees, from its borders up the slopes of hills that ascend from either side." Leixlip castle, the seat of the Hon. George Cavendish, boldly crowns an eminence, and overhangs the Liffey immediately above the town; and it is flanked on the west and the east sides by respectively a circular and a quadrangular tower. The White family were formerly the occupants of this castle, and for many ages the proprietors of the town and manor of Leix-

* The Census of 1831 takes no notice of the Dublin section; and the Ecclesiastical Authorities agree with it in stating the total population at 1,624.

Communications.]—Leinster is much richer in facilities of communication, at once with Britain, with its own interior, and with the rest of Ireland, than any other of the provinces. The communications by steam with Great Britain and Wales are much more numerous than those of either Ulster or Munster; and, with the exception of those to Scotland on the north, and those to Plymouth and London on the south, they are considerably more direct. The steam communications of Dublin with Liverpool are the most important in the kingdom; those of Dublin with Holyhead and of Drogheda, Dundalk, and Wexford with Liverpool, make a prominent figure; and those of Dublin with London, Bristol, and the Clyde, and of New Ross with England, are far from being trivial.—Within Leinster are the whole of the navigation of the Boyne, the whole of the navigation of the Barrow, the whole of the Royal Canal, all the branches, and by far the greater part of the main-line of the Grand Canal; along its western boundary extends the navigation of the middle and the lower Shannon, connecting it with all western Connaught and northern Munster; and along the inland part of its southern boundary extends the navigation of the Suir, connecting it with a considerable part of south-eastern Munster.—In 1838, the only completed railway within Leinster was the first in Ireland,—that from Dublin to Kingstown; the railways laid down by the Public Commissioners, were the southern main-trunk from Dublin to the vicinity of Maryborough,—the line from the end of the main-trunk to Kilkenny by Ballinakill, the ramifying line from the main-trunk toward respectively Limerick and Cork,—the line along the southern border of co. Kilkenny, connecting Waterford with Limerick,—the line from Dublin toward Armagh,—and the line from the preceding at Navan toward Enniskillen; the railways for which acts of parliament had been obtained were the line from Dublin to Kilkenny by way of Athy, and the line from Dublin to Drogheda along the coast; and the proposed railways, the surveys of which were laid before the Public Commissioners, were the line from Kingston to Bray,—the line from the Dublin, Athy, and Kilkenny line at the vicinity of Carlow to Wexford,—the line from Dublin to Limerick by way of Kildare and Roscrea,—the line from Dublin to Athlone toward Galway,—the line from Dublin to Longford toward Sligo,—a line from Kells to Longford,—a line from Dublin toward Armagh, east of the route of the Commissioners' line,—a line from Navan to Drogheda,—and a line from Drogheda toward Newry and Portadown by way of Dundalk and Carrlingford. The most remarkable of the railway works constructed since 1838, is the brief line of atmospheric railway from Kingstown to Dalkey,—the first work of its class in existence, and likely to be a model for works of great extent and vast importance.

Divisions.]—The province of Leinster is politically divided into five eastern or maritime counties, three western or Shannon-bounded counties, and four interior or inland counties; the maritime counties, named from north to south, are Louth, Meath, Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford; the Shannon-bounded counties are Longford, Westmeath, and King's; and the inland counties are Kildare, Queen's, Carlow, and Kilkenny. The earliest constituent counties were Dublin, Meath, Kildare, Louth, Carlow, Kilkenny, and Wexford; but in their original constitution, Dublin included Wicklow, Meath included Westmeath and Longford, and Kildare included King's county and Queen's county. Meath was divided into Meath and Westmeath in the reign of Henry VIII., King's county and Queen's county were erected into separate counties in the reign of Philip and Mary, Longford was made a county in the reign of Elizabeth, and Wicklow was separated from Dublin in the reign of James I.—The political province includes the whole of the ecclesiastical province of Dublin, with its five bishoprics of Dublin, Kildare, Leighlin, Ferns, and Ossory; and includes also 61 whole parishes and part of two other parishes in the diocese and province of Armagh, part of two parishes in the diocese of Clogher and province of Armagh, part of one parish in the diocese of Kilmore and province of Armagh, 25 whole parishes in the diocese of Ardagh and province of Armagh, 223 whole parishes, or the total parishes except one, in the diocese of Meath and province of Armagh, 17 whole parishes of the diocese of Killaloe in the province of Cashel, and one whole parish of the diocese of Clonsfert in the province of Tuam.

Education.]—In 1834, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in Leinster was 3,492, of scholars 158,740, of male scholars 92,130, of female scholars 62,557, of scholars whose sex was not specified 4,053, of scholars connected with the Established Church 30,934, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 584, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissent 372, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 123,265, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 3,565; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 3,492, of scholars 161,031, of male scholars 94,405, of female scholars 64,502, of scholars whose sex was not specified 2,124, of scholars connected with the Established Church 30,484, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 559, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissent 485, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 126,591, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 2,909.—The educational and ecclesiastical statistics of 1834, are arranged under the diocesan divisions; and, as regards the main part of Leinster which constitutes the ecclesiastical province of Dublin, they are given

2s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the united benefice of Ferbane and Tessaurean, in the dio. of Meath; and is non-resident in Lemanaghan. A curate has a salary of £18 9s. 2d., and other advantages which are estimated in value at £98 15s. The church was built in 1826, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £138 9s. 2½d. raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 300; attendance, from 200 to 250. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to Ballinahown chapel in Kileleagh. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 388 Churchmen, 2 Presbyterians, 2 other Protestant dissenters, and 5,509 Roman Catholics; 8 daily schools—one of which was supported by Mrs. Mullock, one aided with £2 from the curate and £14 from subscription, and one with £5 Irish from the rector, £5 and a premium from the London Hibernian Societies, and £13 from subscription—had on their books 258 boys and 149 girls; and 3 other daily schools were usually attended by about 97 children.

LEMANAGHAN, a bog, chiefly in the above parish, barony of Garrycastle, King's co., Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the high grounds of Cor and Thumbeagh; extends, on the south, very nearly to the river Brosna; is bisected near the middle by a vale and a rill; exhibits on both its east and its west borders a few derries or islands; and is traversed south-westward by the road from Ballycumber to Ferbane. Elevation above the level of the Shannon, from 43 to 86 feet; depth of borings, from 15 to 32 feet; estimated cost of reclamation per acre, £2 9s. 0½d. Area of the Lemanaghan and Castle-Armstrong denominations of the bog, 2,410 acres, 34 perches; of the Lemanaghan, Chillugh, and Curraghalassa, denominations, 2,319 acres, 32 perches.

LENE, a lake. See LANE.

LENEY, a barony of the county of Sligo, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Tyreragh; on the east, by the baronies of Carbery, Tiraghrill, and Corran; and on the south and west, by the co. of Mayo. Its length, south-westward, is 17½ miles; its breadth is from 3 to 10; and its area 121,685 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches,—of which 1,062 acres, 37 perches are water. The north-eastern extremity, or narrowest part of the barony, rests on the head of Ballysadere bay; the surface in most of that small district, and along much of the south-east side, is champaign and comparatively ornate; the grounds of a considerable part of the interior are moorish; and the north-western side, from the near vicinity of Ballysadere bay all the way to the boundary with co. Mayo, and with a breadth of from 1½ to 4½ miles, is occupied by portions of the Ox Mountains and the Lurgan Hills, and is wildly and rather loftily upland. The principal summits have altitudes above sea-level of 1,238, 1,685, 1,332, 1,446, 1,208, 1,047, and 1,363, feet. The north-eastern division lies chiefly within the basin of the rivers Uncion and Avonmore; and the south-western division contains the sources of the Moy, and is drained almost wholly by that stream and its earlier affluents. Lough Templehouse lies on the south-east boundary; Lough Easky, on the north boundary; and Lough Salt, on the west border. Many small lakes variegate the interior, particularly in the west.—This barony contains part of the parish of Ballysadere, and the whole of the parishes of Achonry, Killoran, Kilmacteigue, and Kilvarnet. The towns and chief villages are Tobbercurry, Bellaghy, Cooloney, Aclare, Curry, and part of Ballysadere. Pop., in 1831, 32,849; in 1841, 37,096. Houses

6,650. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 5,523; in manufactures and trade, 884; in other pursuits, 410. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,515; who could read but not write, 2,002; who could neither read nor write, 10,357. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,303; who could read but not write, 1,773; who could neither read nor write, 12,837.—Leney barony lies partly within the Poor-law union of Sligo, and partly within that of Swineford. The total number of tenements valued is 6,322; and of these, 3,847 were valued under £5,—1,672, under £10,—394, under £15,—159, under £20,—60, under £25,—43, under £30,—43, under £40,—23, under £50,—and 72, at and above £50.

LENEY, a parish in the barony of Corkaree, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It contains the villages of BALLINALACK and BUMBRUSNA: see these articles. Length, west-north-westward, 4½ miles; breadth, from ¾ to 1½ mile; area, 4,231 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches,—of which 175 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches are in Lough Owbel, 259 acres, 18 perches are in Lough Iron, and 23 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches are in the Inny river and in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 1,479; in 1841, 1,455. Houses 236. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,051. Houses 171. Pop., exclusive of Ballinalack, in 1841, 1,143. Houses 181. The surface nearly all consists of excellent land; and acquires much beauty from Loughs Iron and Owbel, which lie on the southern boundary. The seats are Claudagh-lodge and Lakeview. The church occupies a conspicuous site among beautiful pastoral heights in the north. Wilson's Hospital, though situated two or three hundred yards beyond the northern boundary, blends as a fine feature with much of the parochial landscape. Leney formerly contained a castle of the Gaynor family. The mail-road from Dublin to Sligo passes through the interior.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate curacy, in the dio. of Meath. The tithes are compounded for £118 2s. 1d.; and belong to Sir John Bennet Piers, Bart., of Tristernagh Abbey. The inappropriate curacies of Leney, TEMPLEORAN, LECKEN, TYFERNON, and KILMACNEVIN [see these articles], constitute the perpetual curacy and separate benefice of Leney. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 6,625. Gross income, £128 8s. 1½d.; nett, £88 2s. 8½d. Patron, Sir J. B. Piers, Bart. The church was built in 1812, at the cost of £1,107 13s. 10½d.; of which £323 1s. 6½d. was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, £507 13s. 10½d. was raised by parochial assessment, and £276 18s. 5½d. was contributed by Wilson's Hospital, and the Incorporated Society, in equal moieties, for the erection of separate galleries for the use of the schools belonging to these institutions in the union. Sittings 300; attendance, from 70 to 150, exclusive of the boys of Wilson's Hospital and the Charter School. There are Roman Catholic chapels at Lacken, Sonnagh, and Empor. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 292, and the Roman Catholics to 1,182; the Protestants of the union to 592, and the Roman Catholics to 6,036; 4 daily schools in the parish—one of which, at Ballinalack, was aided with £10 a-year, and other advantages from Mr. Gibbons, and one was a Charter school, endowed with an estate of from 200 to 300 acres at Farra—had on their books 137 boys and 38 girls; and 11 daily schools in the union had on their books 379 boys and 124 girls.

LENNON (THE), a river. See LEANANE.

LEOGH, or LEOGHMACKIVOGUE, a denomination of the benefice of Burrisleigh, co. Tipperary, and dio. of Cashel, Munster. It figures in documents as a parochial chapelry; yet is not known to have any actual existence except as a townland of the parish of Burrisleigh, in the barony of Eliogurty.

LERRHA. See ABBEYLARA.

LERRIG, or LERRIGS, a village in the parish of Kilmilly, barony of Clannaurice, 7 miles north by west of Tralee, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 14 acres. Pop., in 1831, 723; in 1841, 116. Houses 22.

LERRING, one of three denominations of a bog, in the barony of Tyaquin, 3 miles north of Newtown-Bellew, co. Galway, Connaught. Area, 3,249 acres. It is a pretty firm bog, divided or intersected by eskers. Of various streams which issue from it, some flow toward the Suck, and some in the opposite direction; so that the highest ground of the bog is part of the summit-line between the basin of the Shannon and that of Lough Corrib. The bog lies on limestone gravel, and has a mean depth of 10 feet. The other denominations than Lerring, are Richmond and Fidane; and the seats of Lerring and Richmond stand in the vicinity of respectively the northern and the southern margin. Estimated cost of reclaiming the bog, £3,510 10s.

LESKINFERE, LESKINFERE, or CLOUGH, a parish in the barony of Gorey, 3 miles south-west of the town of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, north-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 5,380 acres, 2 roads, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,213; in 1841, 1,260. Houses 203. The land is in general of good quality. The river Bann traces the north-western boundary, and descends there from an elevation above sea-level of 175 feet to one of 150. The seats are Mountforest, Ballin-clay, Barnadown, and Moneylawn. The road from Dublin to Wexford traverses the interior; and on this road stands the little village of Clough, the site of the parish-church.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £318; glebe, £20. The rectories of Leskinfere, BALLYCANNEW, MONOMOLIN, and KILTRESK [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Leskinfere, and the corps of the treasurership of Ferns cathedral. Length, 6 miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 5,056. Gross income, £1,131 7s.; nett, £973 17s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The church of Leskinfere was built in 1831, by means of a loan of £1,250 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 200 to 300. There are churches also in Monomolin and in Ballycannew; and the former has been made the church of a perpetual curacy and separate benefice. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Monomolin. The Primitive Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of from 50 to 70. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish, including 24 Dissenters, amounted to 551, and the Roman Catholics to 685; the Protestants of the union, exclusive of Monomolin, to 953, and the Roman Catholics to 2,176; a daily school in the parish was salaried with £7 from the rector, and £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice—was usually attended by about 25 children; and 2 other daily schools in the union, exclusive of one in Monomolin, had on their books 33 boys and 23 girls.

LESLIE CASTLE. See DONAGH, co. Monaghan.

LETTERBREEN, the site of a dispensary within the Poor-law union of Enniskillen, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The dispensary is placed in a poor cabin; and, in 1839-40, it expended £119, and made 4,200 dispensations of medicine.

LETTERKENNY, a market and post town, in the parish of Conwall, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the south margin of the barony, on the left bank of the river Swilly, and at the intersection of the road from Strabane to Dunfanaghy with that from Rathmelton to Stranorlar, 6 miles south-south-west of Rathmelton, 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-west of Raphoe, 10 north of Stranorlar, 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-west of Strabane, 19 south-east by south of Dunfanaghy, and 115 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Dublin. It stands on the side of a steep hill, and consists principally of one long straggling street. Its harbour is a mile distant, at the head of the estuary of the Swilly, and admits vessels of 150 tons burden. See BALLYRAINE. One bridge spans the river at Letterkenny; and another, called the Port Bridge, in the vicinity of Ballyrairie, and at the end of the navigation. In Letterkenny are the church of Conwall, three Presbyterian meeting-houses, and a Roman Catholic chapel; adjacent to it, on the right bank of the Swilly, is the church of Leek; and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile above it, in the glen of the Swilly, are the ruins of the old church of Conwall. The immediate environs of the town consist of a highly romantic, broken, and rocky country, interspersed with woods and demesnes, and blending at certain points with a magnificent general landscape of a large part of Lough Swilly and its mountain screens; and though the valley of the Swilly or band of low ground terminates a little above Ballyrairie, the glen of the Swilly, in its general character above Letterkenny, exults in the frolics of a wild river, and the expressive contour of picturesque banks and declivities. In the vicinity are Mr. Boyd's beautifully situated demesne of Ballymacool, Mr. Stewart's highly improved seat of Rockhill, the rector of Conwall's agreeable residence of Glendooen, and Mr. Chambers' picturesque and richly wooded demesne of Foxhall. Letterkenny is the only town within a great extent of country which possesses any good shops; and it supplies the more northerly parts of the county south of Lough Swilly with most of the miscellaneous articles of retail trade. Its disadvantageous position in reference to the harbour, however, exerts a very repressing influence upon its general markets and expansive prosperity. Fairs are held on May 12, July 10, Aug. 11, and Nov. 8. The town is the head-quarters of one of the seven districts of the county constabulary force; and it is the regular seat of quarter sessions, and the seat every Wednesday of petty sessions. The bridewell contains two day-rooms, two yards, and five cells; and is kept in a regular and creditable condition.—The Letterkenny Poor-law union ranks as the 127th, and was not declared till after 17th April, 1841. It lies all in co. Donegal; and comprehends an area of 101,998 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 25,322. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are Castleway, 2,235; Magheraley, 2,238; Kincraigy, 2,645; Manor-Conyngham, 1,916; Searor, 492; Temple Douglas, 3,009; Edemascan, 1,762; Gortnavern, 1,518; Carrickatimpan, 444; Gartan, 982; Ballymacool, 1,496; Killymosney, 1,348; Coravaddy, 1,491; and Letterkenny, 3,796. The number of ex-officio guardians is 7, and of elected guardians 21; and of the latter, 3 are chosen by the Letterkenny division, 2 by each of the divisions of Castleway, Magheraley, Kincraigy, Manor-Conyngham, and Temple Douglas, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The divisions of Coravaddy, Magheraley, Kincraigy, and Manor-Conyngham, lie within the barony of Raphoe; the divisions of Letterkenny, Killymosney, and Ballymacool, lie partly in the barony of Raphoe, and partly in that of Kilmacrenan; and the remaining divisions lie wholly within the barony of Kilmacrenan. Our latest reports exhibit the valuation of all the Raphoe districts, but do not exhibit the valuation of any of the Kilmacrenan districts. Total number of townlands on the south-west, by the hills of Dugan and Aulmore; and on the west, by the Atlantic Ocean. Its area is 14,244 acres, and occupies about one-third of the mainland of Kilgavower parish. Its greatest depth is 42 feet; and its medium depth 9 feet. It is in general a very soft bog of the nature of quagmire; it rests on a gravelly bottom of sand and waterworn granite stones; and it is drained, north-westward, by the Lewisburgh and the Carrownisky rivulets. Estimated cost of reclamation, £15,206 8s.

LEWISBURGH (TAX), a rivulet of the barony of Murrisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It rises on the north side of the Farnnagar mountain, gathers early volume from two small headstreams in the parish of Aughavil, and runs north-westward, through Lewisburgh bog in the parish of Kilgavower, to the Atlantic Ocean, a little below the village of Lewisburgh. Its length of course is between 7 and 8 miles. A harbour could be formed at its mouth, by running out a curved jetty from its west side, and would cost about £1,600. The rivulet is also called the Bun-owen.

LEWISBURGH, a village in the parish of Kilgavower, barony of Murrisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the Lewisburgh rivulet and on the coast-road from Westport to the mouth of Killery Harbour, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Clare Island, and 10 west by south of Westport. It is a poor and deeply secluded place; but might become a prosperous fishing village, with the aid of a suitable harbour at the mouth of the rivulet. It is the site of a church and a Roman Catholic chapel; and within 2 miles of it, from the north-east round to the east, are Boathaven-lodge, Boathaven quay, Boathaven coast-guard station, Old Head-lodge, a school, Kilgavower-lodge, Kilgavower church in ruins, and Ballinamona-lodge. Fairs are held on May 1, June 1, Oct. 1, and Dec. 8. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 448. Houses 77. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 24; in manufactures and trade, 43; in other pursuits, 25. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 45; on their own manual labour, 32; on means not specified, 10.

LICKBLA, a parish in the barony of Demifore, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Castle-Pollard, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, north-westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 8,837 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches,—of which 89 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,064; in 1841, 2,394. Houses 306. The river Inny traces the north-west boundary; the rivulet Glorie runs north-westward through the interior; and Lough Bane lies on the north-west border. A very large proportion of the surface, chiefly from the Inny inward, is bog; but most of the remainder is fertile arable land. A height in the bogs near the Inny has an altitude above sea-level of 246 feet; and a hill nearly in the centre of the parish has an altitude of 601. The seats are Webbsbrook, Newcastle, and Rockbrook. The road from Castle-Pollard to Finma passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of RATHGRAFF [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £153 16s. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and the rectorial for £123 1s. 6d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Marquis of Westmeath. The Roman Catholic chapel at Carlanstown, nearly in the centre of the parish, has an attendance of about 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Castle-Pollard, Boherbuy, and Tullystown. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 45 Churchmen, 9 Presbyterians, and 2,049 Roman Catholics; and two daily schools—one of which at Carlanstown was salaried with £8 8s. and other advantages from the Duke of Buckingham—had on their books 93 boys and 52 girls.

LICKERRIG, a parish in the baronies of Athenry, Dunkellin, and Loughrea, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of the town of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, south-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Athenry section, 267 acres, 22 perches; of the Dunkellin section, 2,524 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches; of the Loughrea section, 1,677 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches,—of which 331 acres, 3 roods, 35 perches lie detached a little to the north-east. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,205; * in 1841, 1,191. Houses 178. Pop. of the Athenry section, in 1831, 33; in 1841, 50. Houses 6. Pop. of the Dunkellin section, in 1831, 838; in 1841, 794. Houses 124. Pop. of the Loughrea section, in 1831, 334; in 1841, 374. Houses 48. The surface consists, in general, of good land; and is profusely embellished with the united plantations of Dunsandle and St. Clarens,—the former the extensive demesne of James Daly, Esq.; and the latter the beautiful seat of James Burke, Esq. Among objects of local interest are the ruins of a church, a chapel, and five castles. The road from Loughrea to Athenry passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCONICKNY [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Vicarial tithe composition, £23 7s. 1d.; glebe, £5 5s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £46 3s. 1d.; and are appropriated to the bishop and the dean of Clonfert. The church of the benefice is situated in Lickerrig, and was built in 1816, by means of a gift of £333 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilconeran. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 58, and the Roman Catholics to 1,140; a Protestant Sunday school at Kilmoleen was usually attended by about 18 children; and a National day school was salaried with £16 for the master and £14 for the mistress, and had on its books 120 boys and 126 girls.

LICKETSTOWN, a village in the parish of Portnascully, barony of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands near the left bank of the Suir, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Grann, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ west of Waterford. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 137. Houses 21.

LICKFIN, a parish in the barony of Slieveardagh, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Killenaule, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, south-westward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 679 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches. Pop., in 1831, 464; in 1841, 548. Houses 91. The surface is partly embellished with the small demesne of Lickfin; and it lies immediately south-west of the Slieveardagh coal-pits.—This parish is part of the benefice of Killenaule, in the dio. of Cashel; but is not noticed in the Reports of the Commissioners on Ecclesiastical Revenues and Patronage. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 473; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

LICKLAY and CARNAKELY, a bog in the baronies of Athenry and Kilmacnel, from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of the town of Athenry, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, eastward, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,607 acres. The bog is cut into two divisions by the road from Athenry to Grange and Attymon. The division north of the road declines to the river Moyne, lies chiefly on a flat bedded south, and part of the east and west, is the summit-line of mountains; and over all the remaining spaces, is a broken series of artificial demarcations. The outline of the county is proximately a parallelogram, extending east and west. Its greatest length, westward, is $38\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth, southward, is $24\frac{1}{2}$; and its area comprises 526,876 acres of arable land, 121,101 of uncultivated land, 11,575 of continuous plantations, 2,759 of towns, and 18,531 of water,—in all, 680,842 acres.

Surface.—The Slievephelim mountains—a continuation of the Keeper group in Tipperary, and the southern abutment of the range which extends in the direction of north-east by north to the north end of the Slievebloom mountains—occupy all the north-east corner of Limerick, from the immediate vicinity of the Shannon eastward to the county of Tipperary, with a mean breadth of from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 miles; and their chief summit, Croghan, is situated nearly in their centre. The western abutment of the Galtee mountains occupies a space of about 60 square miles in the extreme south-east of the county; and lifts, as its principal summits, Knocktinise and Slieveragh in the interior, Leadenry on the southern boundary, and Galteemore on the eastern boundary,—the last 3,008 feet above sea-level. The Castle-Oliver hills—nominally a distinct group, but so slenderly separated from the Galtees as to be strictly a continuation of them with the intervention of a water-course—occupy the southern border over a further distance of $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, to the vicinity of Charleville, and have for their chief summit Seafin, whose altitude above sea-level is 1,706 feet. The Mullaghareirk mountains, and congeries and summits which bear other names,—all of a moorish, boggy, and wild upland character, and forming part of the great alpine expanse of 900 square miles in area, whose other parts spread away through much of Cork and Kerry,—these mountains commence on the boundary with Cork, 10 miles west of Charleville, and constitute all the district thence to the margin of with Kerry westward, and almost to the margin of the Shannon northward, or a territory of about 15 miles by 9, whose eastern skirts adjoin the villages of Newcastle and Shanagolden, and whose principal summits in the south are Kiltane, Commeryconnell, Mullaghinish, and Kiltinte, and in the interior and the west are Knocknabarna, Meenyeen, Rooska, Drumada, Knockfinisk, Ballygetman, and Knocklagee. Except over about 11 miles in the east, and about the same distance in the south, the county is thus fortified in all other parts than along the Shannon with a frontier bulwark of mountains; and, even in the principal intervals both on the east and on the south, it has a sufficiency of single hills and groups of large knolls to induce a comparatively cool system-maker to represent it as protected by a complete and continuous cordon of mountains. The country included within this vast natural rampart, or the whole of the interior and of the northern border of the county, may, in a general view, be regarded as one great plain, and even strictly defined, is a champaign expanse, composed of a series of rivulet basins, somewhat parallel to one another, and all slowly descending to the Shannon. So flat is a large portion of the plain, in its middle parts and inward from the Shannon, that its natural division into river basins, or its actually consisting of a series of valleys, cannot, upon any excursive view of its landscape, be detected by the naked eye. All the other portions of the great plain, however, are more or less diversified,—generally the portions nearest the flat district or the Shannon, with mere undulations, and the portions nearest the mountains, with bold tumulations and considerable insulated hills. Several minor heights relieve the flatness of the plain immediately south of the quondam county of the city of Limerick. The hill of Knockruea, and the conical hills of Palas, Knockdirk, and Killeely, are situated within a brief distance of one another, in the low part of the eastern border of the county, about midway between the Slievephelim and the Galtee mountains. Knockfenel, one of several small hills which form and screen the basin of Lough Gur two or three miles west of Killeely, commands a panoramic view of a circle of the surrounding plain so rich and so extensive as to enjoy the reputation of being the greatest tract of arable land unincumbered with bog in Ireland. The steep hills of Knockferina and Ballinruan, the former lifting its summit 951 feet above sea-level, are situated in the vicinity of the village of Ballingarry; and a considerable aggregate of comparatively high ground intervenes between them and both the southern and the western mountains. The isolated hill of Knockpatrick, though sufficiently near the northern abutment of the western mountains to blend with them in several views of the general landscape, yet occupies a somewhat curious place between Shanagolden and the Shannon, and possesses quite enough of character to be a marked feature in the country.—Some of the upland outlines and openings of the county present considerable opulence of scenic character; but hardly any can pretend to sublimity, and much less to a combination of that most impressive element with roughness and romance, or with boskiness and beauty; and most are either common-place and tame pastoral grounds, remarkable for nothing but their height, or cold, dreary, repulsive aggregations of lofty moorland and shivering bog. The lowlands of the county are wondrously rich in all such scenery as is most admired by a native of the most characteristic districts of England, or the few most champaign parts of Scotland; and the country immediately upon the Shannon is, in the central parts, exquisitely soft and not a little luscious, and, in the extreme parts, an imposing combination of gorgeousness and brilliance.

Waters.—The only lakes of either considerable size or interest are Coolapish in the barony of Coonagh, and Gur in that of Small County; and even the mere loughlets and ponds are few in number, and unobtrusive in character. The Shannon, though strictly a river over part of its course along the boundary, and but slenderly an estuary over the remainder, is so voluminous, deep, and open, as to impart to Limerick, while an inland county, very nearly all the advantages and characters of a maritime one. The Mulkern river, descending from the eastern portion of the Slievephelim mountains, and drawing early accessions from the conterminous mountains of Tipperary, runs west-north-westward along the whole of the northern border, receives great affluence from the Newport river approaching it from the Tipperary region of the Keeper mountains, and pours a large volume of water into the Shannon about 3 miles above the city of Limerick. The Groody rivulet rises in the vicinity of Cahirconlish in the barony of Clanwilliam, and runs 7 miles north-westward to the Shannon about a mile above Limerick; and another rivulet rises 4 miles west of the Groody, and runs about 7 miles northward and west-north-westward to the Shannon, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles below Limerick. The Maig rises within co. Cork not far from Charleville; runs prevailing northward across co. Limerick to the Shannon at a point 7 miles below the city; cuts the great plain of the county, or rather the county itself, into two nearly equal parts; receives as its chief tributaries the Looba from Inse.—Either the county or the town of Leitrim gives the title of Earl, in the peerage of Ireland, to the noble family of Clements. In 1783, Robert Clements, Esq., a descendant of Albert Clements, Marshal of France about the end of the 12th century, and eldest son of the Right Hon. Nathaniel Clements, Deputy-vice-treasurer of Ireland, was created Baron Leitrim of Manor-Hamilton; and respectively in 1793, and in 1796, he was advanced to the dignities of Viscount Leitrim, and Earl of Leitrim. The family seats are Manor-Hamilton in co. Leitrim and Killadoon in co. Kildare.

LEITRIM, a barony in the north-west of the southern division of co. Leitrim, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Dromahaire; on the north-east by the barony of Carrigallen; on the east by the barony of Mohill; and on the south and west, by co. Roscommon. Its greatest length, southward, is $11\frac{1}{4}$ miles; its greatest breadth is 7; and its area is 61,665 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches,—of which 4,874 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches are water. The northern district consists of a main part of the Slieve-an-Ierin mountains, and contains a summit of 1,922 feet of altitude above sea-level; the western and southern districts are part of the valley of the Shannon; and the central, eastern, and south-eastern districts are part of the great undulating plain and low hill-grounds of the county, profusely dappled with water. A portion of Lough Allen, to the amount of 1,717 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches, occupies the north-west corner of the barony; the river Shannon, occupying an aggregate area of 783 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches, traces all the western and southern boundary downward from Lough Allen; Lough MacHugh, covering an area of 41 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches, lies on the south-east boundary; and a large number of other lakes, principally situated in the interior, and individually of but small extent, occupy the whole of the remaining water area of the barony.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Kiltoghert and Kiltubrid, and part of the parishes of Annaduff, Fenagh, and Mohill. Its towns and villages are Drumsna, Drumshambo, Kiltoghert, Leitrim, Jamestown, Keshcarrigan, and part of Carrick-on-Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 30,773; in 1841, 32,658. Houses 5,416. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,464; in manufactures and trade, 867; in other pursuits, 400. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,101; who could read but not write, 2,522; who could neither read nor write, 6,515. Females at and above 4 years of age who could read and write, 1,953; who could read but not write, 3,231; who could neither read nor write, 8,950.—This barony lies partly within the Poor-law union of Mohill, and partly within that of Carrick-on-Shannon. The total number of tenements valued is 5,291; and of these, 3,327 were valued under £5,—1,416, under £10,—336, under £15,—80, under £20,—40, under £25,—17, under £30,—28, under £40,—11, under £50,—and 36, at and above £50.

LEITRIM, a barony in the extreme south-east of co. Galway, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Kilconnel; on the north-east, by the barony of Longford; on the east and south, by Lough Derg; on the south-west, by co. Clare; on the west, by the barony of Loughrea; and on the north-west, by the barony of Athenry. Its length, southward, is 24 miles; its extreme breadth is $9\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 120,185 acres, 20 perches,—of which 10,777 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches are in Lough Derg, and 286 acres, 16 perches are in small lakes. The southern and south-western districts are part of the Slieve Baughta mountains, with summits nowhere exceeding 692 feet in altitude above sea-level; the northern district and the western district north of the Slieve Baughta mountains, are part of the central tableau of the county, with an extreme elevation of about 400 feet; the north-eastern district is part of a great expanse of low, level country; and the eastern district, over nearly the whole length of Lough Derg, consists of the most scenic part of that picturesque, beautiful, and very extensive lake.—The Act 6 and 7 William IV. transferred two townlands of the parish of Inniscaltra from Upper Tulla in co. Clare, to Leitrim in co. Galway,—pop., in 1841, 182; one townland of the parish of Leitrim, and one of Kilmeeen, from Loughrea to Leitrim,—pop., 78; and the whole of the parish of Kilrickill, 7 townlands of Abbeygormacan, and 2 of Killoran, from Athenry to Leitrim,—pop., 2,128. The barony, as now constituted, contains the whole of the parishes of Ballinakill, Clonrush, Kilcooly, Kilrickill, and Leitrim, and part of the parishes of Abbeygormacan, Duniry, Inniscaltra, Kilbarron, Killoran, Kilmeen, Kiltickill, and Tynagh. The towns and villages are Woodford, Mount-Shannon, and Tynagh. Pop., in 1831, 28,209; in 1841, 32,590. Houses 5,302. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,491; in manufactures and trade, 732; in other pursuits, 272. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,105; who could read but not write, 2,021; who could neither read nor write, 8,207. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,478; who could read but not write, 2,093; who could neither read nor write, 10,626.—This barony lies partly within the Poor-law union of Loughrea, and partly within that of Scariff. The total number of valued tenements is 4,147; and of these, 2,603 were valued under £5,—890, under £10,—308, under £15,—93, under £20,—58, under £25,—39, under £30,—46, under £40,—24, under £50,—and 86, at and above £50.

LEITRIM, a parish in the barony of Leitrim, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east by east of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, southward, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{4}$; area, 4,098 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,688; in 1841, 1,562. Houses 286. A fair proportion of the surface consists of good tillage land; and the western district is rendered ornate with the woods on the demesne of Dalystown. A height on the western boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 508 feet. The villages and hamlets are Leitrim, Kylebrack, Brekish, and Ballinamanragh. The village of Leitrim is the site of the Roman Catholic chapel, and of the ruins of an old church and castle; and, in 1831, it had a population of 280. The road from Loughrea to Mount-Shannon passes through the interior. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred the townland of Rafarn from the barony of Loughrea to that of Leitrim.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LICKMOLASSY [which see], in the diocese of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £54 14s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. A portion of the tithes, compounded for £13 16s. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. is appropriated to the use of Clonfert. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to chapels of Killaneen and Kilcooly, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 1,786; and a pay daily school had on its books 68 boys and 2 girls.

LEITRIM, a parish partly in the barony of Coshbride and Coshmore, co. Waterford, but chiefly in the barony of Condons and Clangibbon, co. Cork, and $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles east by south of Kilworth, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Water-

lip. Sir Nicholas White of Leixlip, who died in 1654, married a daughter of Lord Moore, and was buried in Leixlip church. The castle afterwards passed by purchase, along with the estate, to the Right Hon. William Conolly; and, while in possession of his family, it was the occasional residence of Primate Stone, Lord Townshend, and other eminent persons. The aqueduct of the Royal canal across the vale of the Rye is the largest structure of its class in Ireland, and was built at an enormous expense,—in compliment, it is said, to the late Duke of Leinster, who wished the canal to pass close to his town of Maynooth. "Leixlip spa," of temporary and surreptitious but very great fame, is noticed as follows by the author of the Tour in Connaught: "Just beneath the bridge that carries the road over the canal, is one of the most beautiful and abundant spring wells in Ireland. If it had been in old times it would have been sanctified, as most such are in Ireland—but it burst out for the first time from the depths of the earth on the excavation of the canal; and as it was discovered in winter, and its deep-seated source caused it to appear warmer than other more superficial springs, so immediately there were attributed to it virtues of no ordinary degree, and the crowds that in faith (for the Irish are rich in that cardinal virtue) resorted to it were enormous. While the credulity lasted, the harvest of coach and noddy owners (for jaunting cars were not yet in fashion) was immense: strings of carriages, miles long, might be seen on Sundays issuing from Dublin, containing crowds anxious to apply internally or externally its healing waters; and attestations of its curing the blind, restoring the palsied, strengthening the lame, came before the public every day. But, alas, the powers of ridicule were brought to bear against it, and one wicked wight drew a caricature in which he represented a broken down noddy as washed by the Leixlip spa water, and all its spokes and shafts, under the mopping of the jarvey, becoming strong and straight. This, certainly, was a pity; and no one in the world was served by dissipating such an innocent and salutary delusion, and after all it is not only a beautiful but an extraordinary spring; for, if you believe all the neighbours, not a fish or frog will live in its waters, and though there be a flocculent, rusty-coloured, ocherous matter constantly rising to the surface of the well, exactly similar to that which is found in springs strongly impregnated with iron, yet no test, either gallic acid, or prussiate of potash, can detect any iron; but in the centre of this flocculent matter is found a very red little worm about half an inch long, which all those who have still faith in the salubrity of the well, say, is the sovereignest remedy alive for a sore leg: nay more, let any one who has drank over night from 15 to 20 tumblers of punch, and whose head is so hot that it makes the water fizz into which it is plunged, let him, I say, but take a quart or two of the water of this spring on the following morning, and he will lose all his whisky fever, and walk home as cool as a cucumber."—Leixlip parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £133 11s. The rectories of Leixlip, LUCAN, STACUMNIE, and CONFOY, the vicarage of ESKEB, and the curacy of ALDERG [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Leixlip. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 4,673. Gross income, £677 9s. 4d.; nett, £526 7s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The benefice includes the perpetual curacy of LUCAN. The church is situated in the town of Leixlip. Sittings 500; attendance, from 150 to 300. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300 at one service and 700 at another; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Maynooth. In 1831, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 186, and the Roman Catholics to 1,438; the Protestants of the union to 314, and the Roman Catholics to 2,084. two daily schools in the parish had on their books 92 males and 53 females; and two infant schools in the parish—the one for the children of the poor, the other for the children of the middle and upper classes, and the former supported by subscription—were attended on the average by 9 boys and 57 girls.

LEIXLIP, a post and market town, in the parish of Leixlip, barony of North Salt, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands at the confluence of the Liffey and the Rye, and on the road from Dublin to Athlone. 1½ mile west-north-west of Lucan, 3¼ miles east-south-east of Maynooth, and 8½ west by north of Dublin. It chiefly extends in a single street along the Dublin and Athlone road. Its only public buildings are the parish-church, the Roman Catholic chapel, and the bridge across the Liffey,—the first a respectable building in the pointed style of architecture. It owes considerable importance to its site on the great thoroughfare to Connaught, to the vicinity of some manufactures, and especially to its environment with the rich scenery noticed in the preceding article; but, except in connection with these circumstances, it possesses hardly any trade. Fairs are held on May 4 and Oct. 9. Area, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,159; in 1841, 1,086. Houses 136. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 6; in manufactures and trade, 66; in other pursuits, 173. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 13; on the directing of labour, 93; on their own manual labour, 131; on means not specified, 6.

LEMANAGHAN, or KILNAGARENATH, a parish in the barony of Garrycastle, 3½ miles north-east by east of Fermagh, King's co., Leinster. Length, westward, 7 miles; extreme breadth, exclusive of a long but very narrow southerly projection from the south-east corner, 4½; area, 19,615 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 5,787; in 1841, 5,806. Houses 1,002. A large proportion of the surface is bog; a portion is pasture with a dry limestone soil; a portion is meadow; a portion is demesne ground; and only a comparatively minor section is arable land. Cor Hill, situated on the west border, has an altitude above sea-level of 378 feet; and Bellair Hill, situated in the north-east, has an altitude of 413 feet. The river Brosna traces part of the eastern boundary, runs across the south-east wing, and then traces a small part of the southern boundary. The Grand Canal passes across the south-east wing. The road from Dublin to Loughrea traverses nearly the longest part of the interior; and on this road, at the extreme east of the parish, stands the village of BALLYCUMBER: which see. The principal hamlets, with their respective pop. in 1831, are Ballyneigh, 76; Bellair, 81; Grogan, 298; and Lemanaghan, 290. The seats are Ballycumber-house, J. W. Armstrong, Esq.; Prospect-house, Charles Holmes, Esq.; Moorock-house, G. A. Holmes, Esq.; Bellair-house, Thomas Homan Mullock, Esq.; Castle-Armstrong, Mr. Armstrong; Doon-castle, R. J. C. Mounsey, Esq.; Corbea-house; Kilnagarenath-house; Hollybrook; Birdsville; Moorock-lodge; and Twickenham-house. The chief antiquities are the ruins of an abbey, a church, Lemanaghan-castle, Togher-castle, and Esker-castle,—the two last situated in Dean demesne. Lemanaghan-castle was the ancient seat of a chief branch of the O'Molloys.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £416 7s. 8d.; glebe, £98 15s. Gross income, £515 2s. 8d.; nett, £461 actual existence except as a townland of the parish of Burrisleigh, in the barony of Eliogurty.

LERHA. See ABDEYLARA.

LERRIG, or LERRIGS, a village in the parish of Kilmoily, barony of Clanmaurice, 7 miles north by west of Tralee, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 14 acres. Pop., in 1831, 723; in 1841, 116. Houses 22.

LERRING, one of three denominations of a bog, in the barony of Tyaquin, 3 miles north of Newtown-Bellew, co. Galway, Connaught. Area, 3,249 acres. It is a pretty firm bog, divided or intersected by eskers. Of various streams which issue from it, some flow toward the Suck, and some in the opposite direction; so that the highest ground of the bog is part of the summit-line between the basin of the Shannon and that of Lough Corrib. The bog lies on limestone gravel, and has a mean depth of 10 feet. The other denominations than Lerring, are Richmond and Fidane; and the seats of Lerring and Richmond stand in the vicinity of respectively the northern and the southern margin. Estimated cost of reclaiming the bog, £3,510 10s.

LESKINFERE, LISKINFERE, or CLOUGH, a parish in the barony of Gorey, 3 miles south-west of the town of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, north-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 5,380 acres, 2 roads, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,213; in 1841, 1,260. Houses 203. The land is in general of good quality. The river Bann traces the north-western boundary, and descends there from an elevation above sea-level of 175 feet to one of 150. The seats are Mountforest, Ballin-clay, Barnadown, and Moneylawn. The road from Dublin to Wexford traverses the interior; and on this road stands the little village of Clough, the site of the parish-church.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £318; glebe, £20. The rectories of Leskinfere, BALLYCANNEW, MONOMOLIN, and KILTRESK [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Leskinfere, and the corps of the treasurership of Ferns cathedral. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3½. Pop., in 1831, 5,056. Gross income, £1,131 7s.; nett, £973 17s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church of Leskinfere was built in 1831, by means of a loan of £1,250 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 300; attendance, from 200 to 300. There are churches also in Monomolin and in Ballycannew; and the former has been made the church of a perpetual curacy and separate benefice. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Monomolin. The Primitive Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of from 50 to 70. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish, including 24 Dissenters, amounted to 551, and the Roman Catholics to 685; the Protestants of the union, exclusive of Monomolin, to 953, and the Roman Catholics to 2,176; a daily school in the parish was salaried with £7 from the rector, and £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice—was usually attended by about 25 children; and 2 other daily schools in the union, exclusive of one in Monomolin, had on their books 33 boys and 23 girls.

LESLIE CASTLE. See DONAGH, co. Monaghan.

LETTERBREEN, the site of a dispensary with in the Poor-law union of Enniskillen, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The dispensary is placed in a poor cabin; and, in 1839-40, it expended £119, and made 4,200 dispensations of medicine.

LETTERKENNY, a market and post town, in the parish of Conwall, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the south margin of the barony, on the left bank of the river Swilly, and at the intersection of the road from Strabane to Dunfanaghy with that from Rathmelton to Stranorlar, 6 miles south-south-west of Rathmelton, 6½ north-west of Raphoe, 10 north of Stranorlar, 13½ north-west of Strabane, 19 south-east by south of Dunfanaghy, and 115½ north-north-west of Dublin. It stands on the side of a steep hill, and consists principally of one long straggling street. Its harbour is a mile distant, at the head of the estuary of the Swilly, and admits vessels of 150 tons burden. See BALLYRAINE. One bridge spans the river at Letterkenny; and another, called the Port Bridge, in the vicinity of Ballyrairie, and at the end of the navigation. In Letterkenny are the church of Conwall, three Presbyterian meeting-houses, and a Roman Catholic chapel; adjacent to it, on the right bank of the Swilly, is the church of Leck; and ½ mile above it, in the glen of the Swilly, are the ruins of the old church of Conwall. The immediate environs of the town consist of a highly romantic, broken, and rocky country, interspersed with woods and demesnes, and blending at certain points with a magnificent general landscape of a large part of Lough Swilly and its mountain screens; and though the valley of the Swilly or band of low ground terminates a little above Ballyrairie, the glen of the Swilly, in its general character above Letterkenny, exults in the frolics of a wild river, and the expressive contour of picturesque banks and declivities. In the vicinity are Mr. Boyd's beautifully situated demesne of Ballymacool, Mr. Stewart's highly improved seat of Rockhill, the rector of Conwall's agreeable residence of Glendooen, and Mr. Chambers' picturesque and richly wooded demesne of Foxhall. Letterkenny is the only town within a great extent of country which possesses any good shops; and it supplies the more northerly parts of the county south of Lough Swilly with most of the miscellaneous articles of retail trade. Its disadvantageous position in reference to the harbour, however, exerts a very repressing influence upon its general markets and expansive prosperity. Fairs are held on May 12, July 10, Aug. 11, and Nov. 8. The town is the head-quarters of one of the seven districts of the county constabulary force; and it is the regular seat of quarter sessions, and the seat every Wednesday of petty sessions. The bridewell contains two day-rooms, two yards, and five cells; and is kept in a regular and creditable condition.—The Letterkenny Poor-law union ranks as the 127th, and was not declared till after 17th April, 1841. It lies all in co. Donegal; and comprehends an area of 101,998 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 25,322. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are Castleway, 2,235; Magheraloy, 2,238; Kineraigy, 2,645; Manor-Conyngham, 1,916; Seacor, 492; Temple Douglas, 3,009; Edenacarra, 1,762; Gortavern, 1,518; Carriekatinpan, 444; Gartan, 982; Ballymacool, 1,496; Killymosney, 1,348; Coravaddy, 1,491; and Letterkenny, 3,766. The number of ex-officio guardians is 7, and of elected guardians 21; and of the latter, 3 are chosen by the Letterkenny division, 2 by each of the divisions of Castleway, Magheraloy, Kineraigy, Manor-Conyngham, and Temple Douglas, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The divisions of Coravaddy, Magheraloy, Kineraigy, and Manor-Conyngham, lie within the barony of Raphoe; the divisions of Letterkenny, Killymosney, and Ballymacool, lie partly in the barony of Raphoe, and partly in that of Kilmacrenan; and the remaining divisions lie wholly within the barony of Kilmacrenan. Our latest reports exhibit the valuation of all the Raphoe districts, but do not exhibit the valuation of any of the Kilmacrenan districts. Total number of tithes 41;

banks showed, at a little distance, the town and castle of Askeaton; and at a greater distance, the 'Hill of Truth,' so celebrated throughout this part of the country as the resort of the fairies or 'good people.' The river, after we passed the estuary of the Fergus, suddenly contracts to about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile wide; and Begh castle, an old black ruin, and near to it the domain of Castletown, and still farther the fine ruin of Carrigaguinal castle situated on a bold rock, present themselves successively. These are all on the Limerick side; but on the side of Clare, the objects of attraction are still finer,—particularly Bunratty castle, which, together with a new mansion, lies in a deep recess, surrounded by wood, and with fine a green behind. All the remainder of the distance to Limerick, the views are full of beauty. High, sloping, and finely cultivated hills, a little back from the river, with handsome houses and more than one old ruin nearer to the banks, are seen on the Clare side; while Cooper-Hill and Tervae, two fine domains, lie embosomed in wood on the other bank. The river has now gradually contracted; and the two last of its reaches up to Limerick are not more than from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile in breadth. Limerick is not seen, until the last reach of the river be entered; and owing to the absence of spires and architectural eminences, the city does not show to great advantage." No hill or sufficiently high rising ground exists in the vicinity, to command a view of the city or its environs; but the tower of the cathedral, situated in the very centre of the town, discovers the street-alignment and the superficial outline with minute detail, and lifts the eye along the tortuous windings of the Shannon, and athwart a large portion of the counties of Limerick and Clare. A whole series of views, from the lower quays on the re-united stream below the island, and from intersections of the principal street of the New Town by the streets which lead down to the river, are not a little interesting in both their foregrounds and their perspectives. "At every opening to the westward, salubrious breezes from the Shannon inspire health and vigour; and a walk to the quays is amply compensated by the scenes of busy traffic there presented, and the various enlivening prospects which meet the eye. Here the packet-boat from Kilrush is landing her joyous passengers, whose nerves have been braced, and spirits exhilarated, by some weeks' residence on the shores of the Atlantic, at Kilkee or Malbay. There turf and fish boats are discharging their cargoes, which are rapidly conveyed by Herculean porters to the dwellings of the consumers, amidst various specimens of Munster wit, sometimes delivered in the native language, and sometimes in Anglo-Irish. On the west are seen the distant towers of Carrigogunnel castle, and the Pool, where the larger ships ride at anchor in perfect security, while many a skiff cuts the blue wave: on the east appear the mill of Curragour, built in 1672, and its rapid current, which roars and eddies amidst rocks of various shapes and sizes—the bridge of Thomond, hoary with age, and the ivy-mantled turrets of King John's castle, backed by the mountains of Clare and Tipperary."

Interior of the town.—The suburb of Thomond-Gate consists principally of one street, about 1,000 yards in length, deflecting from the end of Thomond Bridge, and extending northward in a line parallel to the river,—another street, about 1,100 yards in length, branching from near the south end of the former, and extending north-westward along the old north road to Ennis,—and two other streets, respectively about 450 and 500 yards in length, intersecting the first street at right angles, and running parallel to each other, and westward from the river. This suburb, though populous, is incompact, of village character, airy in alignment, but malodorous in atmosphere, and not over-pleasing in appearance.—English-Town commences 250 yards north of Thomond-Bridge; extends 600 yards along the main stream of the Shannon, with a mean breadth of about 350 yards; and then expands eastward and southward to the Abbey river, occupying all the remaining part of the island, forming nearly a triangular figure of 700 yards on the north side, 600 on the south-east, and 500 on the south-west, and measuring about 400 yards along the bisecting line in continuation of the northern part of the town. The entire of English-town is thus about 1,000 yards in length, and from a few yards to 350 in breadth; it is everywhere compact to the degree of almost oriental density; and, though abounding to absolute profusion in lanes and alleys, its only great or even considerable thoroughfares are two sinuous yet somewhat parallel lines from end to end of the town, or from the northern extremity to Ball's Bridge, and a bent or slightly curved line eastward from the New Bridge, and in continuation of the principal thoroughfare of the New Town. "The English town," says a writer already quoted, "has all the antiquated appearance of a close-built fortress of the latter part of the 17th century: its venerable cathedral, narrow streets, and lofty houses, chiefly built in the Dutch or Flemish fashion, are said to give it a considerable resemblance to Rouen in Normandy. This gloom is however relieved at various openings by a view of the cheering waters of the Shannon, while the vicinity of the canal, and the verdant fields and gardens which skirt the borders of the Abbey river, afford a pleasant promenade to its dense population." Irish-Town is contemporaneous with English-Town principally along the south-west side, and the part of the south point of the latter's triangular division; it is, of course, separated from English-Town by the Abbey river, but it has no visible separation, except distinctiveness of character, from the New Town; and it extends 1,200 yards south-eastward from the main stream of the Shannon, with a breadth which almost regularly increases from 400 to 1,050 yards. Its south-east end consists of three parallel and tapering sections, separated by large and irregular open areas; is chiefly a modern extension of the old part of the town; and contains several straight, airy, and comparatively good, but generally short, streets. Its main part, comprising its central district and its north-west end, is very similar in character to English-Town, but even more irregular, yet has a good street along the line of the Dublin mail-road, a large open area round the cathedral, and a curious serpentine line of thoroughfare, conducting from the end of Ball's Bridge, and called successively Broad-street, Mungret-street, and High-street.—English-Town, and the main part of Irish-Town, are jointly known as the Old Town of Limerick, and are noticed in the following terms by three recent writers: "The old city was formerly considered as a principal fortress, and as an important military position: it was called the key of Munster, was surrounded by walls, and defended by a castle, now in ruins." "The old town 'which Shanon,' saith Camden, 'a most famous river, by parting his chanell, compasseth round about,' is picturesque, narrow, and dirty. the houses high, with peculiar old-fashioned gable-ends toward the street." "A person entering the city by the old town, and taking up his quarters there,—a thing, indeed, not likely to happen,—would infallibly set down Limerick as the very vilest town he had ever entered." But lest the last of these quotations should be thought over-coloured, we add the official statement of a parliamentary re-

Slieveareagh and past Kilmallock, the Morning Star from the eastern base of the Castle-Oliver hills and past Bruff, and the Cammogue from the Clanwilliam part of co. Tipperary, and past Hospital and Six-Mile-Bridge; washes with its accumulated waters the ancient town of Adare; and, thence to the Shannon, a distance of about 10 miles, is navigable for coasting craft, and has drawn the attention of the Commissioners for improving the Shannon's Navigation. The Washpool rivulet, a stream of less than 4 miles in length, drains the interior of the barony of Kenry north-north-westward to the Shannon. The Deel, very nearly equal in both length and volume to the Maig, rises within co. Cork 6 or 7 miles west-south-west of Charleville; runs partly north-westward but chiefly northward along the western border of the great plain of Limerick; receives a large number of small tributaries, the principal of which is the Skeagh; washes the towns of Rathkeale and Askeaton; falls into the Shannon at a point 8 miles west of the mouth of the Maig; and is navigable, over a distance of 3 miles, from its own embouchure into the interior. Four noticeable rivulets, the longest of which has a run of 6 miles, and three of which wash respectively Shanagolden, Loughill, and Glin, run northward to the Shannon between the Deel and the boundary with Kerry. The watershed of the western mountains ascends southward at a distance of from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the boundary with Kerry; and the numerous mountain-rills which flow from the declivities on its west side, belong to the basins of the Galy and the Feale,—the latter tracing much of the boundary with Kerry, and washing the mountain-girt and sequestered little town of Abbeyfeale.

Minerals.—A formation of clay slate, greywacke, and greywacke slate, constitutes the higher regions of the Slievephelim and the Galtees districts. Old conglomerate, with red, purple, green, and clay slate, constitutes a broad zone round the Galtees division of the preceding formation. Yellow sandstone and sandstone conglomerate constitute a narrow belt round the declivities of the Galtees, and a broader belt round the declivities of the Slievephelim mountains; and, together with old red sandstone—the latter usually in a zone round the former—they constitute six considerably large minor districts from 1 mile to 12 miles north and north-west of the base of the Galtees. Old red sandstone also occupies a small place on the north-western declivities of the Galtees mountains. The coal formation constitutes a small patch a little west of Pallasgreen; and, especially, it constitutes a great district in the extreme west of the county, nearly identical in area with the western mountains, but extending some miles eastward on the southern border, and altogether forming part of the Limerick, Cork, Kerry, and Clare coal-tract,—probably the most extensive in the three kingdoms. Crystalline greenstone protrusions occupy twelve different localities, aggregately large though individually small, in the moiety of the county east of the Maig; and they present their most remarkable appearance in the hills of Pallas, Knockdirk, and Killeely.—The floetz limestone formation, in south-westward continuation of the vast central limestone field of Ireland, is the surface rock in every part of the county not occupied by these other formations.—The alternation or mutual interposition of the greenstone protrusions and the limestone rocks is very distinct, in both small pendicles and great masses, in the hills of Pallas, Knockdirk, and Killeely, the escarpments of the hills exhibiting the interstratification of laminæ and thin strata of limestone with the trap, and the adjacent country exhibiting numerous low parallel ridgy heights of outcropping greenstone in alternation with little flats or hollows of undisplaced limestone. Pallas hill greatly resembles the remarkable hill of Croghan in King's county, as to both structure and fertility [see KING'S COUNTY]; and it also exhibits a façade about 70 feet high of columnar basalt, laid bare to the extent of about 180 feet by quarrying, consisting of irregular pillars chiefly pentagonal and hexagonal, and all superimposed upon the amorphous greenstone. The west side of this hill displays likewise an outcropping of red iron claystone; and the hills of Knockdirk, Killeely, and Knockrun, contain in several varieties a formation of felspar porphyry. A quarry of fine maroon-coloured marble, capable of being raised in blocks of any reasonable size, occurs about 7 miles from the city of Limerick on the road to Askeaton; and abundant quarries of black marble, of an inferior quality, and generally used as a building-stone, occur in the more immediate vicinity of the city. The coal of the great coal district occurs, as at Killa-naule, in troughs; and, owing to the undulations of the surface, and the rapid dip of the strata, it requires to be mined in the same manner as metallic veins. The coal has been observed in six beds; but it is generally of a slaty structure, much softer than the coal of Tipperary or Kilkenny, and fit chiefly for the burning of lime; and it has hitherto been worked only at Newcastle and Loughill. Iron, copper, and lead ores, occur in various places in the eastern division of the county; but they do not at present engage the attention of the miner.

Soils.—A westward continuation of "the Golden Vale," which comes in from Tipperary, and constitutes the greater part of the eastern half of the great plain of Limerick, is surpassingly rich in soil, and exceeds almost every spot of Great Britain in fertility. The tract extends from the sources of the Mulkern to the Maig; it forms an area of about 160,000 acres, it is equally suitable for tillage and grazing, but is chiefly used in the latter; it is so rich that one acre is sufficient to fatten a sheep and the largest bullock; and its soil is a rich, mellow, crumbling, calcareous loam. The "corcasses," as they are provincially called, extend 15 miles along the Shannon, from the vicinity of the city of Limerick to the embouchure of the Deel; they have a soil of yellow or blue clay, thickly covered with a rich black mould, and are similar in position and character to the corcasses of the valley of the Fergus [see CLARE, COUNTY OF]; they are productive of heavier crops of wheat than any other grounds in Ireland; and their produce in potatoes sometimes amounts to 2,200 stones per Irish acre. The soil of the remaining districts of the great plain is generally light and sweet, excellent for tillage, and productive of a rich herbage for sheep and dairy cattle. The soil of the mountains in the south and east of the county varies from both deep and shallow bog to brown soil lying on clay or stone,—the latter moderately deep and not naturally wet, and often cultivated high up the steep acclivities. The western and south-western mountains contain a great proportion of deep, black bog, and are to a vast extent uncultivated; yet they possess a considerable aggregate of black, swampy land, upon a subsoil of clay or cold stone, and present large tracts of shallow bog, and sloping deep bog, which might be somewhat easily reclaimed, and portions of which have very recently been brought into cultivation.

Agriculture.—An official and minute report before us of the agricultural condition of the baronies of Coshlea and Lower Connello; and we adopt the account of the former as a fair average view of the agriculture of the whole county, on account of Coshlea containing a considerable proportion of the 22 horses and mules, 2 asses, 19 cattle, 6 sheep, 25 pigs, and 83 poultry,—on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 8 horses and mules, 11 cattle, 12 sheep, 5 pigs, and 25 poultry,—and on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 27 cattle, 5 sheep, 3 pigs, and 7 poultry; and within all the rural districts of the county, there were, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 1,138 horses and mules, 724 asses, 2,616 cattle, 4,363 sheep, 17,746 pigs, and 120,314 poultry,—on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 1,294 horses and mules, 289 asses, 3,274 cattle, 4,869 sheep, 7,619 pigs, and 58,366 poultry,—on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 4,643 horses and mules, 238 asses, 13,932 cattle, 11,481 sheep, 15,546 pigs, and 96,835 poultry,—on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 4,664 horses and mules, 327 asses, 20,073 cattle, 12,590 sheep, 16,684 pigs, and 80,732 poultry,—and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 5,761 horses and mules, 729 asses, 36,140 cattle, 24,199 sheep, 15,967 pigs, and 66,360 poultry. Total of the classes of live-stock together with their respective value, in the liberties of the city of Limerick, 509 horses and mules, £4,072; 50 asses, £50; 611 cattle, £3,971; 73 sheep, £80; 1,720 pigs, £2,150; and 3,650 poultry, £491;—in the other civic districts, 189 horses and mules, £1,512; 16 asses, £16; 102 cattle, £663; 40 sheep, £44; 578 pigs, £722; and 1,230 poultry, £31;—and in the rural districts, 17,500 horses and mules, £140,000; 2,307 asses, £2,307; 76,035 cattle, £494,227; 57,502 sheep, £63,252; 73,562 pigs, £91,953; and 422,607 poultry, £10,565. Grand total of value of live stock in the liberties of the city of Limerick, £10,414; in the other civic districts, £2,988; in the rural districts, £802,304.

Woods.—The low lands of the county are almost all too rich to be profitably disposed in plantation-grounds; so that, except on the demesnes of the numerous landed proprietors, the amount of woods is very far from being in keeping with the generally opulent appearance of the surface. In 1841, the plantations or continuous woods within the county comprised 280 acres of oak, 302 of ash, 73 of elm, 104 of beech, 603 of fir, 8,539 of mixed trees, and 1,674 of orchards,—in all, 11,575 acres; and of these there were planted, previous to 1791, 49 acres of oak, 132 of ash, 31 of elm, 40 of beech, 31 of fir, 3,148 of mixed plantations, and 509 of orchards. In 1841, also, the total number of detached trees was 490,038,—equivalent to 3,063 acres; so that the grand total of woods was 14,638 acres.

Manufactures and Trade.—An excellent cider is made in various districts, particularly around Adare, Rathkeale, and Croom. Very large quantities of butter are made throughout the county, and though most of the exported portions of it are shipped at Limerick, a considerable proportion from the southern districts is sent to Cork. Flour-making, weaving, wool-combing, linen-bleaching, paper-making, tanning, and various other departments of manufacture, possess a considerable aggregate importance; but, in common with the numerous departments of artisanship, trading, and miscellaneous productive industry, they will be best exhibited as to both amount and classification, in a view of the personal statistics of the employed population as exhibited in the Census of 1841. We must premise, however, that the following vidimus of these statistics is exclusive of the liberties of the city of Limerick:—Millers, (60); maltster, 1; brewers, 4; barm-maker, 1; bakers, 133; confectioners, 11; salters, 2; salt-manufacturers, 3; tobacco-twisters, 2; fish-mongers, 8; egg-dealers, 35; fruiterers, 8; cattle-dealers, 20; horse-dealers, 5; pig-jobbers, 26; salesmasters, 2; corn-dealers, 2; seedsmen, 3; butter merchants, 2; huxters and provision dealers, 53;

The sales of wheat, in barrels of 20 stones each, amounted to 132,608 barrels in Limerick, 25 in Newcastle, 8,900 in Rathkeale, 2,457 in Shanagolden, 6,122 in Kilmallock, 20,750 in Cahoonish, and 7,820 in Askeaton; the sales of oats, in barrels of 14 stones each, amounted to 321,226 barrels in Limerick, 4,285 in Kilfinnan, 1,607 in Newcastle, 1,931 in Rathkeale, and 8,342 in Greenville; and the sales of barley, in barrels of 19 stones each, amounted to 36,953 barrels in Limerick, 26 in Newcastle, and 243 in Rathkeale.

Fairs.—The principal fairs held within the county are the following:—Abbeyfeale, June 20, Oct. 18; Abington, Jan. 3, Feb. 4, March 2, April 22, May 27, Aug. 31, Nov. 18; Adare, Jan. 20, Feb. 20, March 27, April 27, May 27, Sept. 15, Oct. 14, Dec. 15; Ardagh, May 11, Aug. 14, Nov. 21; Ardpatrick, March 17, April 26, Sept. 22, Nov. 17; Castleconnel, April 20, June 1, July 16, Oct. 4; Castletown, Feb. 11, April 17, Nov. 3, Dec. 1; Cluggin, May 13, Sept. 24; Croom, May 4, June 22, Sept. 1, Dec. 8; Dromon, June 12 two days, Aug. 18, Sept. 23, Dec. 14; Herbertstown, Jan. 12, March 17, June 28, Aug. 26, Nov. 7; Kilfinnan, May 19, Aug. 9, Oct. 25; Kilmallock, Feb. 21, March 25, June 9 and 12, July 6, Nov. 2, Dec. 4; Kilmore, April 20, Aug. 15, Nov. 1, Dec.

jects from the Shannon about 100 yards above the mouth of the Abbey river. The quay on the English side of the Abbey river is called George's Quay; that above Ball's Bridge on the Irish-Town side is called Lock Quay; and that between Ball's Bridge and New Bridge, Charlotte's Quay; and these are all situated above the entrance of the Limerick navigation from the Shannon, and belong properly to the canal. The quay before the Custom-house is called Custom-House Quay; and the quays whence to the westward, are called Archer's, Honan's, Hervey's, Russel's, and Kelly's Quays; but the former ones of these form an interrupted and irregular series of mere wharves. Previous to the great recent projects for improving respectively the harbour

Limerick and the navigation of the Shannon, the quays were encumbered with the disadvantages, most menacing to the city's commerce, of admitting vessels of no greater than 300 tons burden at the best state of the tide, and of being left dry, to overlook a mere strand, at low water; nor were these disadvantages more than very slenderly mitigated by the assistance of good anchorage, 4 miles below, for vessels of 800 tons. The bold plans, however, were conceived and formed by the proposed improvers of the river, of erecting completely across the river, immediately below the termination of the quays, such a weir as should cause a constant depth of from 16 to 23 feet of water over a considerable distance above, and of constructing within that distance, or between Wellesley Bridge and the Custom-House, a floating dock for the use of all such vessels as are more especially exposed to damage from lying aground. The improvements include also the construction of locks at the ends of the weir, and of a foot-bridge along the top; the construction of a bascule or a Swivel-bridge at the south end of Wellesley Bridge; the transmutation of the irregular series of wharves into a continuous train of quays; the construction of a tide-basin and a lock between the end of Wellesley Bridge and the entrance of the Floating-Dock; the construction of two graving-docks opposite the two ends of the weir; and the formation of long embankments and esplanades, immediately below the weir, and along the margin of both banks of the river, and of low lands which were used to be inundated by the tides. "The Limerick Bridge Commissioners"—as the Board of Directors for building Wellesley Bridge and improving the harbour of Limerick are called—were incorporated by act of parliament in 1823, and were empowered to borrow from the Commissioners of the Loan Fund any sum they might require, on a mortgage of tolls, rates, and duties. The harbour dues were doubled between 1823 and 1833, in consequence of the increase of trade; and in the latter year, they amounted to about £2,000, but they were all mortgaged to the Board of Works, with the reservation of £300 a-year for salaries to officers.

The Diocese.—The see of Limerick is alleged to have been founded in the 6th or the 7th century, by St. Munchin; but it makes no figure in authentic record or probable tradition till at least the 12th century. Gille or Gilbert, who is loosely known to have been a prominent actor in the great ecclesiastical events of his day, and who died about the year 1140, was bishop of Limerick. Three of his successors, Harold, Torgesius, and Briccius, are called Ostmen. William Casey, the first Protestant bishop of the diocese, was deprived in 1556 and restored in 1571. Dr. Knox, the present bishop, and Dr. Jebb, his immediate predecessor, and the author of well-known works on sacred literature, are both names of great distinction.—Patrick, who figures obscurely as bishop of Limerick in the first half of the 12th century, is said to have been consecrated by the archbishop of Canterbury. Harold or Erroll, an Ostman, became bishop of Limerick in 1151. Torgesius, also an Ostman, became bishop in 1152, and assisted at the synod convened by Cardinal Paparo at Kells. Briccius was in the see in 1179, and was one of the Irish prelates who assisted at the council of Lateran in 1179 and 1180. Donat O'Brien, a descendant of the regal family of O'Brien, died in possession of the see in 1207. Geffry was directed by King John to be elected bishop by the clergy of Limerick in 1207, and is known to have been in possession of the see in 1217. Edmund died bishop of Limerick in 1222. Hubert de Burgh, previously prior of Athassel abbey in the county of Tipperary, became bishop in 1222, conducted a bold but unsuccessful measure for making the episcopal power in a great measure independent of the crown, and died in 1250. Robert of Emly was appointed to the see in 1251, and died in 1272. Gerald de Mariscall, previously archdeacon of Limerick, became bishop in 1272, recovered some large and valuable possessions which had been illegally alienated from the see, and died in 1301. Robert Dondovenald or Dondonyl succeeded to the see in 1302, and died in 1311. Eustace Delewe or Waters, previously dean of Limerick, became bishop in 1310, and died in 1336. Maurice Rochfort became bishop in 1337, and died in 1353. Stephen Lawless, previously chancellor of Limerick, became bishop in 1354, and died in 1359. Stephen de Valle, previously dean of Limerick, became bishop by papal provision in 1360, received while in the see the appointment of lord-treasurer of Ireland, resigned the bishopric in 1369, and was afterwards translated to the see of Meath. Peter Curragh or Creagh became bishop in 1369, and resigned in 1400. Cornelius O'Dea, previously archdeacon of Killaloe, was appointed to the see of Limerick in 1400, and resigned in 1426. John Mothel, an Augustinian canon of Kells in the county of Kilkenny, was appointed to the see of Limerick by papal provision in 1426, and resigned in 1458. William Creagh became bishop by provision in 1459, recovered the lands of Donaghmore which had been alienated from the see, and died in 1472. Thomas Arthur became bishop in 1472, and died in 1486. Richard was appointed by papal provision to the see in 1486, but died before he could avail himself of the appointment. John Dunow, previously canon of Exeter, and then ambassador from Henry VII. to the court of Rome, was made bishop of Limerick by papal provision in 1486, but died in 1448 before he had any opportunity of visiting his see. John Folan, previously canon of Ferns, and then procurator for the archbishop of Armagh at the court of Rome, was made bishop of Limerick by papal provision in 1489, and died in 1521. John Coyn or Quin obtained possession of the see contrary to the wishes of the king in 1522, and resigned in 1551. William Casey became bishop in 1551, was deprived in 1556, became bishop again in 1571, received a coadjutor in the see in 1588, and died in 1591. Hugh or Ulic Lacy was appointed to the see by Pope Paul IV. at the instance of Queen Mary in 1557, and resigned in 1571. John Thornburg, previously dean of York, and chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, became bishop of Limerick in 1593, held his deanery and another preferment in commendam with the bishopric, resigned the latter in 1603, and was afterwards translated to successively the sees of Bristol and Worcester. Bernard Adams was appointed to the see of Limerick in 1604, held along with, pro hac vice tantum, the see of Killfenora, from 1606 till 1617, and died in 1625. Francis Gough, previously chancellor of Limerick, became bishop in 1626, and died in 1634. George Webb, previously for the materials of the old church. Sittings 300; attendance, from 250 to 300. The city Roman Catholic chapel has 3 officiates, and an attendance of about 2,500. The Roman Catholic chapel in the Bunratty section, has an attendance of about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilquane. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 195 Churchmen, 3 Presbyterians, and 3,873 Roman Catholics; and 5 daily schools had on their books 68 boys and 356 girls. One of the schools was under the superintendence of the nuns of the Presentation convent, and was salaried with £40 from the National Board, and had on its books 320 girls; and two of the schools were salaried with respectively £30 and £26, besides perquisites; from the trustees of the late Mrs. Villiers.

Parish of St. Nicholas.—This parish is partly in the borough of Limerick, and partly in the baronies of Clanwilliam and Pobblebrien. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the borough section, 319 acres; of the Clanwilliam section, 1,510 acres; of the Pobblebrien section, 59 acres. The aggregate area includes 64 acres of water; and the Pobblebrien section is uninhabited. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 6,374; in 1841, 3,290. Houses 420. Pop. of the borough section, in 1841, 2,067. Houses 218. The urban district is part of the old town of Limerick; and the rural district extends southward thence, and contains Rathurd-castle and an ancient fort.—St. Nicholas' is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Mary, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £216 18s. 5½d. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 436 Churchmen, 23 Protestant dissenters, and 6,156 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools had on their books 200 boys, and 97 girls. One of the schools was Dr. Hall's male free school, salaried with £37; one was Dr. Hall's female free school, salaried with £21; one was the Poors'-house male free school, salaried from the Poors'-house funds with £12; and one was the Poors'-house female free school, salaried from the Poors'-house funds with £20.

Parish of St. Patrick.—This parish is partly in the borough of Limerick, partly in the barony of Clanwilliam and county of Limerick, and partly in the barony of Lower Bunratty and county of Clare. It includes the district in the suburbs of Limerick denominated the Chapelry of Singland; and it bears in the Bunratty section the name of the Kilquane district. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the borough section, 722 acres,—of which 83 acres are water. Area of the Clanwilliam section, 793 acres. Area of the Bunratty section, 3,894 acres,—of which 85 acres are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,331;* in 1841, 4,132. Houses 656. Pop., in 1841, of the borough section, 885; of the Clanwilliam section, 1,166; of the Bunratty section, 2,081. Houses in the three sections, respectively 139, 203, and 314. The surface is bisected by the Shannon. One half of the land south of the river is upland, or what is provincially termed mountainous; and the other half is all profitable. The section north of the river contains the village of ANDNACRUSHA [which see], and the mansions and villas of Stream-Mount, Springhill, Annegrove, Ballyglass, Fairyhill, Queenville, Queensborough, and Whitehall.—St. Patrick's is a rectory, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, exclusive of the Kilquane district, £341 10s. 8d. The rectories of St. Patrick, CAHIRAVALLA, and EMLYGRENNAN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of St. Patrick, and the corps of the treasurership of Limerick cathedral. The parishes are not contiguous. Pop., in 1831, 3,794. Gross income, £701 10s. 8d.; nett, £541 3s. 5d.;—but these sums are exclusive of respectively £80 6s. 2d., and £69 10s. 4½d., specially connected with the treasurership. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sine-cure rectory and prebend of Kilmacdonough, in the dio. of Cloyne. Within the parish of St. Patrick is the perpetual curacy of KILQUANE: which see. Two curates for the occasional duties of Cahiravalla and Emlygreennan have each a salary of £5. There is no church except that of Kilquane. The Roman Catholic chapel of St. Patrick has an attendance of about 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of St. John and Kilmurry. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Kilquane and Cahiravalla. In 1834, the parishioners of St. Patrick's, exclusive of the curacy of Kilquane, consisted of 51 Churchmen, 7 Protestants dissenters, and 2,360 Roman Catholics; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by about 300 children; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 74 boys and 29 girls.

LIMERICK.

A post, market, and sea-port town and borough, a city, and the capital of Western Munster, stands on the river Shannon, 8 miles north-east by north of Adare, 11½ north by west of Bruff, 12 south-south-west of Killaloe, 14 north-east of Rathkeale, 14 east-north-east of Askeaton, 18 south-east by east of Ennis, 19½ south-west of Nenagh, 20½ north by east of Charleville, 29 east by north of Tarbert, 4½ north-east of Tralee, 51 north of Cork, and 94 south-west by west of Dublin.

Site and Environs.—The town stands upon low ground, at an insulating division of the Shannon, and in the midst of an extensive plain. The island embraced by the stream is a mile long, and 700 yards broad; extends from north to south; and has the main volume of the Shannon on its west side, and a lesser volume, called the Abbey or Salmon-Wen river, on the east. The suburb of Thomond-Gate stands on the west bank of the main stream, opposite the island; the division of the city called English-Town, occupies the south end of the island; the division called Irish-town stands on the right bank of the Abbey river opposite the foot of the island, or the south side of English-Town; and the large, modern, and beautiful division called New-Town-Pery, or abbreviatedly the New Town, extends south-westward, up slightly ascending ground from contact with Irish-Town. The great circumjacent plain has a medium elevation of but a few feet above the level of high water; yet it possesses such fertility of soil, luxuriance of vegetation, excellence of culture, and profusion of embellishment, as to be eminently, though in the very softest sense, beautiful. The entire approach to the city, over a distance of many miles, along the mail-road from Dublin, is first grandly brilliant at the skirts of the Keeper Mountains, and then luscious and meltingly lovely after it debouches into the plain; the approach down the Shannon from Killaloe, boasts the magnificent scenery around Castle-Connell and at Doonas, and afterwards luxuriates among the greenest meadows, and the most golden fields, till it enters the city; and the approach by navigation up the Shannon is thus noticed by Mr. Inglis: "The view at Achish Island was most captivating. The deep woods of Caharon and Mount Trenchard were behind; the green islands and more distant hills of Clare on one side, with the estuary of the river Fergus stretching far to the left; while on the Limerick side, a recess in the Municipal Affairs.—Limerick is a borough by prescription; and has charters of John, Earl of Morton, 20 Edward I., 1 Henry IV., 1 Henry V., 2 and 8 Henry VI., 2 Henry VII., 6 Edward VI., 17 and 25 Elizabeth, 6 James I., and 4 George IV. A proclamation by Charles I. in 1671, placed the borough under the "New Rules," and hence made the approbation of the Lord-lieutenant and Council necessary to the valid appointment of the corporate officers: and the Act 4 George IV., c. 126, is entitled "An Act for the better government of Limerick, and the due appropriation of the public revenues thereof," is usually called the Limerick Regulation Act, and enacts several regulations and provisions for the government of the corporation. The limits of the old municipal borough were those of the quondam county of the city, including the island of Inniscattery, opposite Kilrush, near the mouth of the Shannon, and involved an admiralty jurisdiction over "so much of the river Shannon and its creeks, banks, and rivulets, as extends from three miles north-east of the city to the mouth of the main sea." The limits of the new municipal borough are quite extensive enough to admit of extension on the west, the north, and the south; they include also all the open as well as the edificed part of King's Island; and they extend $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles by rather more than $1\frac{1}{4}$ and comprise an area of 2,618 acres,—of which 134 acres are tideway. The corporation, according to charter, is entitled "The Mayor, Sheriffs, and Citizens of the City of Limerick;" and consists of a mayor, two sheriffs, and an indefinite number of aldermen, burgesses, and freemen. The corporation, under the new arrangement, consists of 10 aldermen and 30 councillors, elected by the five wards of Thomond Bridge on the right bank of the Abbey river and the Shannon, Patrick-street bounded by Bedford-row on the west and High-street on the south, John-street bounded by High-street on the north and Upper William-street on the west, Glentworth-street bounded by Bedford-row on the east and Mallow-street on the west, and Richmond-Place all west of Mallow-street and Careys-road. The courts held within the city are the assizes, quarter-sessions, petty-sessions, and a civil bill court by authorities apart from the corporation; and a court of pleas of debt to an unlimited amount, and a court of conscience for pleas under 40s., by the corporation itself. The city is the station of a resident magistrate, and of a constabulary county inspector; and the head-quarters of the south-west military district, and of the constabulary force for a district comprising the 9 stations of Limerick, Annacotty, Ballinacurra, Ballysimon, Castle-Connell, Corbally, Lock-Quay, Roxborough, and Thomondgate. The number of resident freemen in 1833, registered under the Reform Act, was 271; the number who voted at the contested election of 1820, previous to the passing of the Limerick Regulation Act, was 441; and the number admitted between the passing of that Act and 1833 was 89. Twenty-one bodies exist as guilds of different trades, but do not appear to have ever exercised any corporate right. In 1833, the old town was flagged and paved in so deplorably bad a manner as to present a marked contrast in its carriage-ways to the new town; some parts of it were lighted and watched at the expense of private parties, and the parish of St. John by a voluntary public assessment amounting to about £130 a year, but all other parts were destitute of both lighting and watching; and the new town, or rather the parish of St. Michael, enjoyed the benefit, and exhibited the effects, of an act of parliament specially relating to it, and entitled "An Act for paving, cleansing, lighting, and watching the parish of St. Michael, in the liberties of the City of Limerick, and adjoining the said city, and for preventing and removing nuisances therein." During the year ending March 1832, the assessment for the purposes of this Act relating to the parish of St. Michael, amounted to £3,004 6s. 1d.; the watching was effected by 26 watchmen, aided by a party of the county constabulary, and cost £546 2s. 1d.; the lighting was by gas, and cost £487 3s. 6d.; and the paving, cleansing, and watering of the streets cost £593 2s. The revenues of the corporation of the city, in 1832, amounted to £598 6s. 8d. from houses and lands, £3,706 from tolls and customs, and £114 10s. from the cleansing of the streets,—in all, £4,418 16s. 8d.; the total receipts and disbursements during the aggregate of the years 1824–1833 amounted to respectively £34,311 4s. 7½d., and £30,795 6s. 7½d.; and the total receipts and expenditure of the year ending in March 1843, amounted to respectively £4,464 10s. 10d., and £4,271 16s. 1½d. The following observations occur near the close of the report of the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations: "It is to be regretted that the contest, so long maintained by the Common Council against the rights of the citizens of Limerick, and the strong feelings of jealousy and hostility thereby created on both sides, have hitherto retarded the improvement of this important city. The usurpations of the Council, for a long series of years, were defended at all hazards, and a fruitless waste of the corporate revenues took place in the endeavours of that powerful body to preserve uncontrolled its political superiority and exclusive management of the corporate affairs, with apparently a total disregard of the interests and welfare of the large community, for whose benefit the public institutions were created and those revenues designed. Their improvident neglect and still more censurable disposal of the corporate estates, the secrecy of their proceedings, their apparent devotion to the interests of a particular family, and studied exclusion of the general body of the citizens from their proper municipal station, have afforded tinued its original character as a remedial institution for cases both of accident and of general disease. But though the hospital cost Mr. Matthew Barrington nearly £10,000, and was bestowed as a mere gift upon the poor of the city, and is the chief infirmary to which those of them in disease have access, it is so marvellously ill-supported that, at the close of 1840, it could admit to its spacious accommodation for 120 patients no greater a number than 16, and was compelled to refuse admittance to persons in eminent need of infirmary relief. Though the grand jury presentments nominally allot £1,400 a-year to it, yet, owing to peculiarities in the local assessment, only £200 are actually raised and granted; and, in 1839-40, it had a total income from all sources of £593 18s. 2d., expended £576 6s. 1d., and admitted 308 patients. The shameful inadequacy of support to the institution prompted the governors in 1840 to make an unanimous declaration of opinion, that provision ought to be made for it on the principle of the poor-law rates; and incited its singularly benevolent and munificent founder to devise a method of general relief to the poor, which shall be noticed in our section on "Charitable Institutions." The hospital building is a comparatively plain yet tasteful structure of three stories; and consists of a centre and two rectilinear wings.—The county of Limerick infirmary is a very spacious structure, capable of accommodating 104 patients. Though intended principally for the county of Limerick, it admits some patients from the city; and, by a strange paradox, it is represented in one report, and even in one sentence, as sufficient for the district, and yet as refusing admission to many fit objects for want of room. In 1839-40, it received £119 14s. from subscription, £1,489 1s. 10d. from public grants, and £300 2s. 11d. from other sources,—in all, £1,908 18s. 9d.; expended £159 2s. in salaries of medical officers, £117 6s. 9d. on medicines, and £1,205 19s. 7d. on contingencies,—in all, £1,482 8s. 4d.; and admitted 669 intern patients, and administered to 12,960 extern patients.—The Limerick Fever Hospital was not originally intended for its present purpose; and as it existed at the close of 1840, it would have required the expenditure of at least £500 to keep it in tolerably habitable condition. It gives very considerable relief to the fever patients of the city, and of a district of 8 or 10 miles around; and it never refuses admission to any fit object. In 1839-40, it received £36 4s. 6d. from subscription, £1,200 from public grants, and £362 5s. 9d. from other sources,—in all, £1,598 10s. 3d.; it expended £190 in salaries to medical officers, £170 1s. 11d. for medicines, and £1,334 15s. 10d. for contingencies,—in all, £1,694 17s. 9d.; and it admitted 2,184 patients.—The Fever and Lock Hospital was founded in 1781, by Lady Harstonage; and is said to have been the earliest institution of its class in the United Kingdom.—The Lying-in Hospital is conducted in a hired and not very suitable building; and it is supported wholly by subscription, and frequently languishes from paucity and even destitution of funds.—The Limerick Dispensary serves for both the city and its immediate environs; and, in 1839-40, it received £301 2s., expended £254 7s., and administered to 13,303 patients.

Miscellaneous Public Buildings.—“King John,” says Stanihurst, “was so pleased with the agreeableness of the city, that he caused a very fine castle and bridge to be built there.” The castle has withstood all the sieges and the vicissitudes which the city has endured; it possessed great magnitude and strength, yet was not remarkable for the character of either its site or its architecture; it has generally been one of the objects most coveted by belligerent parties in Ireland; and, though now no longer a fortress or an undilapidated pile, it continues to present one front to the river, and another to a recently opened thoroughfare in the immediate vicinity of the east end of Thomond Bridge, and to display in both fronts a massiveness, a might, and a hoary antiquity, which produce a deep impression on a lover of the picturesque.—Some remnants of the ancient city walls, and some isolated bastions, still exist to challenge the notice of the antiquary; but the walls lost their continuousness, and were even formally destroyed about the year 1768, to make way for the extension of the town. Yet, in 1691, General Témash, in taking possession of Irish-Town, is said to have found the military works “exceedingly strong;” and, in 1750, the walls not only continued to stand, but boasted so many as seventeen gates.—The celebrated Treaty Stone, though not a “building,” may here be noticed: it derives its name from having been the spot on which the far-famed treaty of Limerick was signed in October, 1691; and it is a large stone near the Thomond-Gate end of Thomond Bridge, and usually figures, in the estimation of strangers, as one of the ‘lions’ of the city.

A barrack, consisting of three sides of a square, and containing accommodation for 400 men, stands within the remains of King John's castle; and artillery and infantry barracks, for about 1,600 men, are situated in Irish-Town. The Exchange was built in 1778; and has a handsome portico, and a commodious hall. The Custom-House, situated near the New-Town end of the New Bridge, and on the peninsular point at the confluence of the Abbey river with the main stream of the Shannon, is a handsome structure, and was built in 1769 at the cost of £8,000. The Chamber of Commerce was erected in 1805. The Assembly-house, situated on Charlotte Quay, was built in 1770, at the cost of £4,000, and has eventually been converted to the purposes of a theatre. The Linen Hall, and the Corn and Butter Markets, are situated in Irish-Town. The square at the end of Harrington-street, and south-south-east of Richmond-place, is railed round and planted, and the pillar in its centre has a fluted shaft, and is surmounted by a statue of the Hon. Spring Rice.

Charitable Institutions.—The Limerick Mont de Piété,* or Charitable Pawn-office, the earliest institution of its class in the United Kingdom, and the model which hundreds of other institutions will probably copy, was founded by Matthew Barrington, Esq., the beneficent erector of Barrington's Hospital. The mere building displays a dome, statues, and Grecian pillars which render it a chief architectural ornament of the city; but the institution itself possesses a species of interest with which no performances of the artist can effect a rivalry. Mr. Barrington, discovering to his surprise that a shamefully inadequate support was given by the public to the hospital or infirmary which he had founded, and knowing that many hospitals in the large towns of Italy, France, Belgium, and Holland, are supported by Monts de Piété, resolved to attempt the introduction of these institutions to Ireland. In October 1836, he explained his views to a few of the most influential citizens of Limerick, and was gratified to find his purpose appreciated and unanimously supported. Debentures, varying from £5 to £500, and bearing interest at the rate of six per cent., were

* The French name Mont de Piété is borrowed from the Latin one Mons Pietatis; and the latter was originally adopted in Italy, in allusion to the collections made by the private Christians for the poor,—these collections having borne the designation of Montes or Mounts, and the inventor of the Charitable pawn fund having added the word Pietas to give the institution a religious character.

March away with all the honours of war; and that those who might choose to remove from Ireland, should be permitted to retire with their effects to any country except Great Britain, in ships provided or that purpose at the expense of the English government. The civil articles amounted to 13, the military to 29. Fourteen thousand Irish, availing themselves of the permission to go beyond sea, bid farewell for ever to their native country."

The city now ceased to be the theatre of wars, and began to make a slow but steady progress in peaceful prosperity. In 1696, the mayor, at his own expense, lighted the public streets with lamps. In 1697, a market-house was substituted for the castle in the centre of Irish-Town. In 1717, quays were constructed along part of the Abbey river. About 1760, great facilities to trade were created by the making of new roads, and the commencing of the Limerick navigation. In 1761, the New bridge was constructed to facilitate intercommunication between English-Town and Irish-Town. In 1766, additional quays were erected on the Abbey river. And, in 1796, commenced on the ground then called South Prior's Land, the splendid and far-spread improvements of the building of Newtown-Pery, or the New Town of Limerick.—The noble family of Pery receive from Limerick the title of Earl in the peerage of Ireland. Edmund Sexton Pery, Esq., said to have been a descendant of ancestors who resided in Brittany, was Speaker of the Irish House of Commons from 1771 to 1785, and at his retiring from his post, was created Viscount Pery of New-Town-Pery. In 1806, the second Viscount, the son of the first, died without issue, and the peerage became extinct. In 1790, the Right Rev. William Cecil Pery, brother of the first Viscount, consecrated Bishop of Killaloe in 1781, and translated to the see of Limerick in 1784, was created Baron Glentworth of Mallow. In 1813, the second Baron, the only son of the Bishop, was made Viscount and Earl of Limerick, in the peerage of Ireland; and, in 1815, he was made Baron Foxford in the peerage of Great Britain.

LIMERICK NAVIGATION, the navigable communication between the Lower Shannon at Limerick, and the Middle Shannon at Killaloe, cos. Limerick and Clare, Munster. Its length is 12 miles; its aggregate of still water or artificial cut, is 6½; its rate of lockage is 7 feet; and the cost of its construction was £123,559 16s. 1d. It commences at the mouth of the Abbey river; ascends that stream to a point 150 yards above Ball's Bridge; crosses a peninsula of the Shannon, about one statute mile east-south-eastward, to a point on the Shannon nearly a mile above Athlunkard Bridge; ascends the Shannon ¼ of a mile to the vicinity of Plassy Lodge; passes north-north-eastward through the greater part of the parish of Kiltonanlea, within the county of Clare; re-enters the Shannon at a point 1½ mile below O'Brien's Bridge, and ascends the stream to a point within 1½ mile of Killaloe; and finally traverses the east border of the parish of Killaloe, at a very brief mean distance from the river, to the immediate outskirts of the city of Killaloe. The amount of traffic on the navigations is glanced at in the preceding article on LIMERICK; and its connection with the important navigation above it will be noticed in the article on the river SHANNON.

LIMERICK RAILWAYS, two great works proposed and planned by the Public Commissioners on Railways, the one to connect the city with respectively the town of Tarbert and the south-western ramifications of the Dublin railways, and the other to connect it with the city of Waterford. The former has received the name of the Shannon railway, and will be noticed under the word SHANNON; which

see. The Limerick and Waterford Railway is identical with the eastern part of the Shannon Railway to Donoghill, a distance of 23 statute miles from Limerick; and is there 309 feet above sea-level, and about 5 miles north of Tipperary; it next proceeds 3 miles and 40 chains on a dead level to Donoghill; next 4 miles down an aggregate descent of 72 feet to the vicinity of Golden-Bridge; next 3 miles down a total descent of 18 feet to Hemmingstown; next 2 miles up a total rise of 24 feet to the vicinity of New Inn; next 3 miles and 40 chains up a total rise of 35 feet; next 2 miles and 16 chains up a total rise of 29 feet to Woodruffe; and next 5 miles and 64 chains down a total fall of 203 feet to the vicinity of Clonmel. "From the river Suir," says Mr. Vignoles in his report to the Commissioners, "the railway proceeds to rise gently, and crosses the Cork line, about midway between Cashel and Cahir, at 104½ miles from Dublin, and 36 from Limerick. It then proceeds to a summit on the road from Cahir to Clonmel, being there 307 feet above the high water of Dublin bay, 41 miles from Limerick, and near Woodruffe demesne, from whence it has been conducted to fall into the course of the original projected railway from Waterford to Limerick, as laid out by the late Alexander Nimmo, the celebrated engineer; the direction and inclination of which line is followed, falling from the summit near Woodruffe at the rate of 1 in 151, to near Clonmel. Beyond that city no line has been explored by me, but either the route from Clonmel to Waterford designed by Mr. Nimmo, or that afterwards proposed by Mr. George Stephenson, might be taken; or a line to pass Clonmel on a higher level could be found, and with gradients probably not exceeding 16 feet per mile. The whole distance, from Limerick to Waterford, by either route, would be about 73 miles; namely, 23 miles along the Shannon line to Donoghill, near Tipperary, 20 miles from Donoghill to the junction with the original Limerick and Waterford line, 4 miles farther to Clonmel, and 26 miles from Clonmel to Waterford." The estimated cost of the railway from Donoghill is £178,099 in toto, or £7,417 per mile.

LINAAN, or LINGAN (THE), a rivulet chiefly of the county of Tipperary, Munster. It rises on the east side of Slievenaman, and flows 5 miles east-south-eastward through the interior of Tipperary, and 6 miles south by eastward along the boundary between Tipperary and Kilkenny, to the river Suir, at a point 1½ mile below Carrick-on-Suir.

LINANE, a small bay near the east side of the entrance of Lough Swilly, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. Shedid Port and it are the only places of safety for fishing craft near Dunaff Head, but both are so much exposed to westerly winds as to be unsafe for large vessels in heavy gales.

LISBELLAW, a village in a detached part of the parish of Cleenish, barony of Tyrkenney, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands on the road from Maguire's-Bridge to Enniskillen, 3 miles north-west by west of Maguire's-Bridge, and 4 south-east of Enniskillen. It is a pleasant and improving place; has fairs on May 11, June 20, and Nov. 11; and is the site of a chapel-of-ease, a Presbyterian meeting-house, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a district dispensary. The chapel-of-ease was built 53 years ago, by Lord Ross, at his private cost, and has 250 sittings. The Presbyterian meeting-house belongs Connel lie within the barony of Clanwilliam; the divisions of Cappaghmore, Doon, and Abington lie within the barony of Ownybeg; the divisions of Killokenedy and Killeely lie within the barony of Lower Tulla; the division of Kilfinaghta lies partly within the barony of Lower Tulla and partly within that of Upper Tulla; the division of Kiltonanlea lies within the baronies of Lower Tulla and Lower Bunratty; and the division of Killeely lies within the barony of Lower Bunratty. The number of valued tenements in the borough of Limerick districts is 7,503,—in the Clanwilliam districts, 1,519,—in the Ownybeg districts, 782,—in the Pobblebrien districts, 934,—in the Small County districts, 354,—in the Lower Bunratty districts, 593,—in the Lower Tulla districts, 1,612,—in the Upper Tulla districts, 162,—in the entire union, 13,459; and of this total, 5,891 were valued under £5,—2,241, under £10,—1,540, under £15,—762, under £20,—601, under £25,—375, under £30,—628, under £40,—382, under £50,—and 1,039, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £228,970 1s. 0d.; the total number of persons rated is 14,784; and of these, 521 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,670, not exceeding £2,—1,555, not exceeding £3,—1,108, not exceeding £4,—and 756, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Sept. 16, 1839,—to be completed in June 1841,—to cost £10,000 for building and completion, and £2,830 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 11 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches, obtained for £70 of compensation to occupying tenant, and an annual rent of £70,—and to accommodate 1,600 persons. The date of the first admission of paupers was May 20, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £15,436 17s. 5d.; and the total previous expenditure was £2,146 14s. 2½d. During the first half-year from the date of the opening of the workhouse, the expenses for clothing and maintenance amounted to £1,579 17s. 3d., and all other expenses to £2,480 1s. 2d.; and during the second half-year, the expenses for clothing and maintenance amounted to £2,914 17s. 3d., and all other expenses to £1,812 18s. 7d. The workhouse is situated on the north side of the river, half-a-mile west of Thomond Bridge; and the Board of Guardians meet there every Wednesday. The Medical charities within the union, and available for its population, are the County of Limerick Infirmary, the City of Limerick Infirmary or Barrington's Hospital, the Limerick fever hospital, and 12 dispensaries at Limerick, Broadford, Cahircoulsh, Castle-Connell, Clarina, Cratloe, Doonas, Fedamore, Kilpeacon, Murroe, Patrick's-Well, and Six-Mile-Bridge. In 1839-40, these charities received £982 13s. 3d. from subscriptions, £3,751 18s. 11d. from public grants, and £927 7s. 6d. from other sources,—in all, £5,661 19s. 8d.; and they expended £1,320 5s. 6d. in salaries to medical officers, £729 12s. 11d. for medicines, and £3,205 0s. 6½d. for contingencies,—in all, £5,254 18s. 11½d.

Condition of the Lower Classes in the City.—The Old town of Limerick was noticed in our descriptive section on the interior of the city, as eminently squalid, filthy, and repulsive; it has, for a considerable series of years, had the painful reputation of exceeding every other town of Ireland in the wretchedness of its inhabitants; and, even if abatements should be made for some over-colouring in the dismal accounts usually given of it by tourists and other observers, it may well be quoted as furnishing a large specimen of the very acme of those evils of starvation, disease, and putridity which render the poorest seats of Irish population so many segregations of charnel-houses of the living. That we may not be suspected of exaggeration, we shall exhibit the social condition of the old town, as it figures on the impartial pages of Mr. Inglis. "In Cork, Waterford, Kilkenny, and in other towns which I have visited," says he, "I have made it a part of my duty to inquire into the condition of the poor; and having been informed by those upon whom I thought some reliance was to be placed, that I should find more and deeper destitution in Limerick than in any place which I had yet visited, my inquiries in Limerick were prosecuted with all the care which I was capable of bestowing, and I regret to say, that I found too dreadful confirmation of the very worst reports. I spent a day in visiting those parts of the city where the greatest destitution and misery were said to exist. I entered upwards of 40 of the abodes of poverty; and to the latest hour of my existence, I can never forget the scenes of utter and hopeless wretchedness that presented themselves that day. I shall endeavour to convey to the reader some general idea of what I saw. Some of the abodes I visited were garrets, some were cellars, some were hovels on the ground-floor, situated in narrow yards or alleys. I will not speak of the filth of the places; that could not be exceeded in places meant to be its receptacles. Let the worst be imagined, and it will not be beyond the truth. In at least three-fourths of the hovels which I entered, there was no furniture of any description, save an iron pot; no table, no chair, no bench, no bedstead,—two, three, or four little bundles of straw with, perhaps, one or two scanty and ragged mats, were rolled up in the corners, unless where these beds were found occupied. The inmates were some of them old, crooked, and diseased; some younger, but emaciated, and surrounded by starving children; some were sitting on the damp ground, some standing, and many were unable to rise from their little straw heaps. In scarcely one hovel could I find even a potato. In one which I entered I noticed a small opening, leading into an inner room. I lighted a bit of paper at the ember of a turf which lay in the chimney, and looked in. It was a cellar wholly dark, and about 12 feet square; two bundles of straw lay in two corners; on one sat a bedridden woman; on another lay two naked children,—literally naked, with a torn rag of some kind thrown over them both. But I saw worse even than this. In a cellar which I entered, and which was almost quite dark, and slippery with damp, I found a man sitting on a little saw-dust. He was naked: he had not even a shirt: a filthy and ragged mat was round him; this man was a living skeleton; the bones all but protruded through the skin: he was literally starving. In place of forty hovels, I might have visited hundreds. In place of seeing, as I did, hundreds of men, women, and children, in the last state of destitution, I might have seen thousands. I entered the alleys, and visited the hovels, and climbed the stairs at a venture. I did not select; and I have no reason to believe that the forty which I visited, were the abodes of greater wretchedness than the hundreds which I passed by. I saw also another kind of destitution. The individuals I have yet spoken of were aged, infirm, or diseased; but there was another class fast approaching infirmity and disease, but yet willing and able to earn their subsistence. I found many hand-loom weavers, who worked from 5 in the morning till 9 at night, and received from a taskmaster from half-a-crown to four shillings a-week. Many of these men had wives and families; and I need scarcely say that confinement, labour, scanty subsistence, and despair, were fast reducing these men to the condition of the others, upon whom disease and utter destitution had already laid their hands. The sub-street, called Long Stone-street, irregularly edified, winding in alignment, and neither very airy in character nor pretending in appearance. The principal street is continuous with Long Stone-street, and extends first 300 yards eastward by the Market-house, and next 400 yards east-south-eastward to the Lagan; but, over the middle part of its north side, it is identical with an open and rather spacious triangular area around the Market-house,—and over the lower part of the same side, it is unedified, and flanks a great and pleasant expanse of promenading ground which extends parallel with the river. Castle-street deflects at such an angle from the Main-street in the western vicinity of the Market-house, as to form one of the three sides of the market area; and it thence ascends 530 yards north-eastward, overlooking the upper side of the great promenading ground, and leading out the public road toward Belfast. A series of buildings, arranged in the form of three sides of a pentagon, presents its three faces toward respectively the Main-street, the Market area, and Castle-street, encloses in its centre the parish-church, and expands its open portion toward the public promenading ground. A considerable aggregate of short but straight and somewhat airy streets wings the south side of Main-street; and two rather long alleys, called Antrim-lane and Jackson's-lane, ascend from the body of the town toward the north. The plan or street-arrangement of both the body of the town and its out-skirts is thus decidedly unfavourable to pleasing effect; and the suburb on the Down side of the river has a poor and even pitiful appearance. Yet Lisburn possesses a high character for agreeableness and beauty—so much so as often to have been pronounced one of the most handsome towns in Ireland. It owes its effect, however, to cleanliness, to evidences of comfort, to a rapidly sloping site, to the exquisite grouping which the buildings in and around the market area present to the main thoroughfares, and to the fine features and happy situation of the public promenade.

Public Buildings.—The parish-church is the cathedral of the diocese of Connor; yet possesses few architectural pretensions, and is conspicuous chiefly for its spaciousness, and for its being surmounted by a handsome spire of cut stone,—an erection of much later date than the church itself. Two remarkable monuments occur in the church; the one to the memory of Lieut. Dobbs, who was killed off Carrickfergus bay on April 4, 1778, in an action with Paul Jones; and the other to the memory of the celebrated Dr. Jeremy Taylor, who was for some time bishop of Down and Connor, and died here in 1667.—The Presbyterian meeting-house is plain but large; the other meeting-houses have not any remarkable feature; and the Roman Catholic chapel is a neat structure.—The Castle of Lisburn, a fine building of its class, was erected in 1610, by Lord Conway, who had obtained from James I. a grant of the lands of Kilulagh, and may be viewed as the founder of the town; it served both as a fortalice and as a palatial residence, and had attached to it a range of gardens; and in 1707, it was destroyed by fire, and its gardens formed into a public promenade. Part of the garden walls are still standing; the great terrace forms an agreeable walk, being well sheltered from the north by plantations, and pleasantly overlooking the river; and the grounds contain two gigantic elms called “the two sisters,” and are all kept in excellent order.—The Market-house is a large and handsome edifice with a cupola; and about 45 years ago, its interior was enlarged by the Marquis of Hertford, and partly fitted up as a suite of Assembly rooms.—The Linen-hall, for the sale of brown linen, is a good building.—The County of Antrim infirmary, situated at Lisburn, was not originally intended for an hospital, but has been admirably adapted to the purpose, and is now a very healthy, well managed, and efficient institution. Though the house is capable of containing 50 beds, and is greatly too small to serve for the county, the governors have been obliged, by paucity of funds, to reduce the number of beds to 30. In 1839, the infirmary received 471 7s. 1d. from subscription, £580 1s. 10d. from public grants, and £51 3s. 4d. from other sources,—in all, £711 12s. 3d.; it expended £181 16s. 11d. in salaries to medical officers, £87 11s. 3d. for medicines, and £739 8s. 1d. for contingencies,—in all, £988 16s. 4d.; and it admitted 512 intern patients, and had recommended to it 1,716 extern patients.—The Lisburn Fever Hospital is a well-managed institution, supported partly by subscription, but chiefly by assessment levied off the manor of Lisburn,—the property of the Marquis of Hertford; and in 1839, it received £342 12s. 3d., expended £296 4s. 3d., and admitted 233 patients.—Six free houses for destitute widows are maintained by a bequest of Mr. Williams.—The principal schools of the town are the free school for males, attended by from 200 to 250 scholars; the free school for females, attended by upwards of 200 scholars; 2 infant schools, supported by the Ladies of Lisburn; and the Quakers' school, situated on Prospect Hill, and affording education, clothing, and board, to upwards of 40 children, the sons and daughters of Quakers.

Poor-law Union.—The Lisburn Poor-law union ranks as the 5th, and was declared on Jan. 8, 1839. It lies partly in co. Down, and partly in co. Antrim; and comprehends an area of 186 square miles or 119,300 acres, which contained in 1831 a pop. of 72,436. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are Lisburn, 5,745; Lisroe, 1,613; Knocknadona, 1,900; Maghauagall, 1,182; Magheramisk, 1,700; Glenavy, 2,779; Ballyscolly, 2,265; Legatarriff, 2,165; Tullyrusk, 1,274; Island-Kelly, 2,575; Derryaghy, 2,666; Malone, 1,651; Breda, 3,644; Ballymacbrenan, 2,681; Drumbo, 3,176; Killany, 1,570; Saintfield, 3,091; Ouley, 2,881; Drumbeg, 1,977; Blaris, 2,606; Mage, 3,435; Hillsborough, 3,724; Ballyworphy, 2,662; Annahilt, 3,735; Glasdrumman, 2,708; Dromara, 3,083; and Ballykeel, 3,633. The guardians are 9 ex-officio and 29 elected; and they meet every Tuesday at 1 o'clock. The total number of tenements valued is 13,893; and of these, 7,327 were valued under £5,—652, under £6,—529, under £7,—492, under £8,—505, under £9,—388, under £10,—606, under £12,—539, under £14,—235, under £15,—236, under £16,—368, under £18,—278, under £20,—495, under £25,—301, under £30,—376, under £40,—183, under £50,—and 323, at and above £50. The total of the nett annual value of the property rated is £129,908 10s.; the total number of persons rated is 14,152; and of these, 3,953 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,417, not exceeding £2,—892, not exceeding £3,—751, not exceeding £4,—and 798, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on June 7, 1839,—to be completed in Sept. 1840,—to cost £6,200 for building and completion, and £1,358 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 6 acres, obtained for £742 of purchase-money, and £42 of compensation to occupying tenant,—and to contain accommodation for 800 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Feb. 11, 1841; the total expenditure thence, till Feb. 6, 1843, was £6,906 11s. 1d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,341 5s. 2d.—Several charitable bequests made for the benefit of the poor of Lisburn, are placed to have possessed nearly the same shape as the existing central parts, with the exception of the buildings in the immediate vicinity of the Market-house. An English traveller, noticing the town as it existed in 1635, says, "Linsley-Garvin, about 7 miles from Belfast, is well seated; but neither the town nor country thereabouts were planted (inhabited), being almost all woods and moorish, until you come to Dromore." On Nov. 28, 1641, little more than a month after the breaking-out of the great rebellion, the king's forces under Sir George Rawdon obtained at Lisburn a signal victory over the insurgent Irish under Sir Phelim O'Neill, Sir Con Magenis, and General Plunkett. In 1662, the inhabitants of the town were rewarded for their loyalty to Charles I. and Charles II., by the erection of their church into the cathedral of the diocese, and the bestowal upon them of a right to send two members to parliament. In 1699, Mr. Lewis Cromelin, a French refugee, obtained a patent for establishing a manufacture of linen in the town, and a grant of £60 a-year for the support of a French minister. In 1707, the town, in common with the castle, was burned to the ground; about 1775, it began to experience a brief period of rapid extension and increasing prosperity; in the earlier part of the present century, it seems to have been stationary; and of late years it has again revived, so as to be now in a flourishing condition.

LISCANOR, a village in the parish of Kilmaree, barony of Corcomroe, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the north side of Ballyella or Liscanor bay, and on the new coast-road of the county, 2½ miles west-north-west of Lehigh, and 4½ west of Ennistymon. It has been entirely formed since 1775; and contained, in 1814, nearly 200 houses, about 10 of which were slated, and about 40 inhabited by fishermen. It stands on the estate of General Sir Augustin Fitzgerald. A pier at the village is exposed to the force of the Atlantic, and has been several times much injured; but it possesses much comparative value in consequence of the bold and dangerous character of the neighbouring line of coast, and affords considerable shelter to small craft, and is much used for the purposes of trade. The cost of constructing it was £3,031. "The plan of the harbour," says an official report published in 1836, "was originally made by Mr. Nimmo, and was designed to have an interior excavated basin, and a pier extending 600 feet from the root to low water-mark. Exclusive of the objections to interior excavation, which the unsuccessful result of the experiment that had been made afforded, the objection on account of expense caused the Board to order a plan on a more limited scale. The plan consists of a pier in continuation of the work that had been commenced, embracing a natural lough, and the only portion of anchorage-ground which the place affords, nearly all the remainder being rock. This pier measures 527 feet in length; and there was also a breakwater pier 120 feet in length." The village is a coast-guard station; and, in 1839, the district belonging to that station employed in the fisheries 42 row-boats and 122 fishermen. Not far to the west of the village commence the magnificent cliffs of MOHER: which see. In the vicinity of the village are the ruins of Liscanor-castle, and the mansions and villas of Rock-lodge, Moher-house, and Birchfield,—the last the seat of Cornelius O'Brien, Esq. Area of the village, 24 acres. Pop., in 1831, 506; in 1841, 562. Houses employed chiefly in agriculture, 26; in manufactures and trade, 72; in other pursuits, 17.

Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 22; on their own manual labour, 84; on means not specified, 6.

LISCARROL, a parish in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, Munster. It contains a village of the same name: see next article. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,028 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,135; in 1841, 2,249. Houses 356. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,469; in 1841, 1,499. Houses 230. The surface is gently hilly, and is drained by the head-stream of the river Awbeg; yet consists in general of good land, without any mixture of waste ground. The road from Mallow to Newcastle, and that from Kanturk to Charleville, intersect each other in the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILBRIN [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £127; and the latter are inappropriate. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Churchtown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 30, and the Roman Catholics to 2,100; and three daily schools—one of which was in connection with the National Board—had on their books 158 boys and 44 girls.

LISCARROL, a village in the parish of Liscarrol, barony of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, Munster. It stands at the intersection of the two principal roads of the parish, 4½ miles north-west of Buttevant, 6 north-east by north of Kanturk, and 6½ south-west of Charleville. About 30 years ago, an extraordinary well existed somewhere in the vicinity of the village, so deep that the plunge of a stone thrown into it was not heard till after an interval of 16 seconds; but it seems to have been covered over and forgotten, or at all events is for the present lost to topography. The castle of Liscarrol, whose ruins and history are the chief notabilia of the village, is a massive mouldering pile, greatly dilapidated, yet majestic in its remains. It forms a rectangle of 240 feet by 120, and was 30 feet high in its walls, and flanked by six great towers, four of which were circular and two quadrangular. Its south entrance was defended by strong outworks; and connected with it or near it were some subterranean passages, most of which are now closed. The castle is popularly ascribed to King John, and appears, at all events, to have been erected soon after the Anglo-Norman conquest. It was subsequently much altered from its original form, and was very long the property of the Barrys; but it eventually passed to the Percevals; and, in the civil wars which commenced in 1641, it was one of the chain of fortresses which Sir Philip Perceval garrisoned and maintained for the defence of his Munster property, and was surrounded by him with a strong covert way and other devices of modern fortification. In 1642, its garrison were besieged by an Irish army, said to have been 7,000 strong; and, after defending it during 13 days, they surrendered upon conditions honourable to their bravery. On the day following the surrender, an English army, said to have consisted of only 2,000 foot and 400 horse, arrived at the village, and confronted, fought, and vanquished the successful besiegers. The Irish army contained Lords Mountgarret, Roche, Muskerry, and several other noblemen; and the English army was commanded by Lord Inchiquin, and contained, among other distinguished persons, Lords Barrymore, Dungarvan, Kinnalmenky, and Broghill, and Mr. Francis Boyle, afterwards Lord Shannon. Lord Kinnalmenky fell in the action; and Mr. Boyle, then only 19 years of age, carried off the body of his brother at the hazard of his own life. In 1646, the castle was again be-chaplain to Charles I., became bishop in 1634, and died in 1641. Robert Sibthorp, previously bishop of Kilfenora, was appointed to the see of Limerick in 1642, but never received from it any emolument, and died in 1649. Edward Synge, previously dean of Elphin, was appointed to the see of Limerick in 1660, with a clause in his patent permitting him to hold in commendam the sees of Ardfert and Aghadoe; and he resigned in 1663, and was translated to the united sees of Cloyne, Cork, and Ross. William Fuller, previously dean of St. Patrick's and treasurer of Christ-church, Dublin, was appointed to the sees of Limerick, Ardfert, and Aghadoe, in 1663—these sees becoming at that date permanently united—and was translated in 1667 to the see of Lincoln. Francis Marsh, previously dean of Armagh and archdeacon of Dromore, became bishop in 1667, resigned in 1672, and was translated to successively the sees of Kilmore and Dublin. John Vesey, previously dean of Cork, became bishop in 1672, and was translated in 1678 to the see of Tuam. Simon Digby, previously dean of Kildare, became bishop in 1678, and was translated in 1691 to the see of Elphin. Nathaniel Wilson, previously dean of Raphoe, became bishop in 1691, and died in 1695. Thomas Smith, previously chanter of Clogher, became bishop in 1695, and died in 1723. William Burschow became bishop in 1625; Dr. James Leslie, in 1755; Dr. John Averell, in 1770; Dr. William Gore, previously bishop of Elphin, in 1772; Dr. William Cecil Pery, previously bishop of Killalla and Achoury, in 1784; Dr. Thomas Barnard, previously bishop of Killaloe, in 1794; Dr. Charles Warburton, previously dean of Clonmacnoise, in 1806; Dr. Thomas Elrington, provost of Trinity college, Dublin, in 1820; Dr. John Jebb, previously archdeacon of Emly, in 1822; and Dr. Edmond Knox, soon after the death of Dr. Jebb.—The dio. of Limerick, as has already been incidentally noticed, had permanently annexed to it in 1663 the united diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe; and, preserving this great annexation, and consequently including a very large extent of territory, it is the only Irish diocese, excepting Meath, which was not affected by the Act of 1833.—The episcopal palace stands at the west end and on the north side of Henry-street, in close juxtaposition with the residence of the Earl of Limerick,—the two palatial mansions presenting one great but plain façade of brick masonry, and sending off a comparatively small conjoint demesne from their rear to the Shannon.

The episcopal incomes from the three sees of Limerick, Ardfert, and Aghadoe, are not distinguishable from one another, but exist in a state of consolidation; and, estimated on an average of three years ending on December 31, 1831, they amount to £5,368 13s. 5d. gross, and £4,973 9s. 1d. nett. The economy fund of the cathedral of Limerick yields a gross annual income of £1,384 4s. 10d.; and this is expended partly in the liquidation of old debts, partly in repairing and ornamenting the cathedral, and partly in the usual provisions for the choir. The dignitaries of the diocese of Limerick, together with the gross amount of income derived from the benefices which form the corps of their several dignities, are the dean, £1,568; the precentor, £1,050; the chancellor, £1,247 13s.; the treasurer, £752 17s. 8d.; the archdeacon, £620 17s. 8d.; the prebendary of St. Munchin, £455 13s. 8d.; the prebendary of Donaghmore, £92 6s. 1d.; the prebendary of Ballycabane, £173; the prebendary of Kilpeacon, £341 8s. 3d.; the prebendary of Tullybracky, £463; the prebendary of Killeedy, £529; the prebendary of Dysert, £75; the prebendary of Ardara, £200; the prebendary of Crough, £200;

16s. 11d.; the prebendary of Effin, £339; and the prebendary of Athnett, £35. The dignitaries of Ardfert constitute a separate chapter, and are noticed under the word ARDFERT: which see.

The diocese of Limerick, exclusive of the united diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, comprehends the greater part of the county of Limerick, and a small part of the county of Clare. Dr. Beaufort, estimating the whole to comprise 306,950 acres, and to contain 88 parishes and 26 churches, assigns 234,450 acres, 85 parishes, and 25 churches to co. Limerick, and 12,500 acres, 3 parishes, and 1 church to co. Clare. The portion of co. Limerick excluded is a belt of from 3½ to 10 miles broad along the whole of the extreme east; and the portion of co. Clare excluded is a district of 8 miles by 4 in the immediate vicinity of the city. The length of the diocese westward, is 27 Irish or 34 English miles; its breadth is 17 Irish or 21 English miles; and its area is 371,425 acres, 3 roods, 29½ perches. Pop. in 1831, 228,777. Parishes, 79; chapelry, 1; benefices, 57; sinecure benefice, 1; resident incumbents, 38; non-resident incumbents, 20. Total compositions belonging to the benefices, £16,904 5s. 2½d.; glebes, £1,642 4s. 4d. Gross income, £12,118 8s. 3d.; nett, £16,292 5s. 4½d. Patron of 2 benefices, the Crown; of 22, the diocesan; of 9, the incumbents; of 23, laymen and corporations; of 2, alternate parties. Appropriate tithes, £1,475 0s. 1d.; impropriate tithes, £4,969 8s. 1½d. Superintending curates, 30; gross amount of their salaries, including £100 for the discharge of occasional duties on the part of 16 of them, and excluding additional advantages enjoyed by 5, £1,204. Benefices with churches, 38; without churches, 20. Total of churches, 25; sittings, 8,330. Cost of building 24, and of enlarging and repairing 3 of these churches, £25,034 13s. 8d. of which £8,953 16s. 11d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £8,299 13s. 10d. was borrowed from that Board, £6,900 was given by private donations, and £881 2s. 9d. was raised by parochial assessments. Total of churches, according to the Report of the Commissioners on Public Instruction, 42; of other places of worship belonging to the Establishment, 2; of Presbyterian meeting-houses, 1; of meeting-houses of other Protestant dissenters, 9; of Roman Catholic chapels, 78. In 1834, the population consisted of 11,122 Churchmen, 85 Presbyterians, 101 other Protestant dissenters, and 246,302 Roman Catholics; 8 benefices contained no members of the Established church, each of 11 benefices not more than 20, each of 15 benefices not more than 50, each of 9 benefices not more than 100, each of 8 benefices not more than 200, each of 9 benefices not more than 500, each of 3 benefices not more than 1,000, and each of only 2 benefices upwards of 1,000. In the same year, 219 daily schools had on their books 7,788 boys, 4,904 girls, and 87 children whose sex was not specified; 12 other daily schools, which furnished no lists of their attendance, were computed to be attended by 696 children; 168 of the total of 231 schools were supported wholly by fees, and 6 partly or wholly by endowment or subscription; of the latter, 11 were in connection with the National Board, 3 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and 4 with the London Hibernian Society.

The Roman Catholic diocese of Limerick continues to be unannexed; and, in 1838, was divided into 40 parishes. The number of parochial clergy, 38, and of curates or coadjutor clergy 62. The bishop's parishes are St. John's and St. Patrick's. The only friaries or convents in the diocese seem to be those in the city. The names of the 40 parishes, together with the sites of their respective chapels, are, 1. St. John's, Limerick; 2. St. Jo-other just causes of complaint against the Common Council, and strongly demonstrate the impolicy of vesting the sole management of public concerns in a self-elected and irresponsible body. Although partially controlled by the Regulation Act, the Council has succeeded in still preserving a large share of its former power by the influence acquired in the court of D'Oyer Hundred, and the difficulties existing, under present arrangements, to the acquisition of the freedom."

Statistics.—On Jan. 1, 1843, the constabulary force of the city consisted of 1 first-rate sub-inspector, 1 second-rate head-constable, 8 constables, 31 first-rate sub-constables, 5 second-rate sub-constables, and 1 mounted policeman; and the cost of maintaining this force during 1842, was £3,764 11s. 8½d. The city sends two members to the imperial parliament. Constituency in 1841, 1,893; of whom 1,362 were £10 householders, 4 were £10 freeholders, 8 were £10 leaseholders, 71 were £20 freeholders, 131 were freemen, 172 were 40s. freeholders, 138 were £50 freeholders, 1 was a £20 rentcharger, and 6 were £20 leaseholders. During 1842, the number of persons committed on charges of felony was 99; the number of cases before magistrates and petty sessions was 336; and the number of persons committed for drunkenness was 249. Of the 99 persons committed on charges of felony, 12 were charged with offences against the person, 5 with offences against property committed with violence, 75 with offences against property committed without violence, 2 with offences against the currency, and 5 with offences not included in the above categories. Fifty-six of the 99 were convicted, and 43 were acquitted and discharged; 12 of the 56 were sentenced to transportation, 39 were sentenced to imprisonment, and 5 were not sentenced, or were discharged on sureties; 19 of the 43 were found not guilty on trial, 18 had no bill found against them, 5 were not prosecuted, and 1 was bailed and not tried.—Pop. of the city, in 1841, 48,391. History.—Limerick is supposed by some writers to have been the Regia of Ptolemy, and to have possessed comparative importance in the 5th century, and enjoyed the distinction of a visit from St. Patrick. The Danes, however, are the earliest natives whom really authentic record exhibits in connection with the place; and are admitted, at all events, to have been the first who fortified it. These enterprising people assailed it in 812, and in subsequent periods; they became masters of it about the middle of the 9th century; and they were conquered by Brian Boromh toward the close of the 10th century. The kings of Thomond now adopted Limerick as the seat, or at least as one of the seats of their government; and Donald O'Brien, the individual of them who reigned in the time of Henry II., made a prominent figure in the wars of the Anglo-Norman invasion, conquest, and settlement. See LIMERICK (COUNTY OF). In 1195, the first provost of the city, under the English administration, received his appointment. Early in the 13th century, King John gave the borough its first extant charter, visited the town, established a mint in it, and built the Castle and Thomond Bridge. The city now became the retreat of many English settlers, and began to experience a great and rapid increase of prosperity. In 1314, Edward Bruce burnt the suburbs; and in 1316, he made the city the rendezvous of his Irish allies. About 1318, a grant of murage was obtained for extending and strengthening the fortifications; soon afterwards, the new suburb of Irish-Town was walled round; in 1401, a tholsel or town-house was built; in 1495, John's Gate was erected, and the fortifying of Irish-Town completed; and in 1500, a vaulted pier was constructed to serve the double purpose of a bastion and a quay. During the reigns of Henry VII., Henry VIII., and Elizabeth, when the country was so much agitated, first with the rebellions of the Earl of Desmond, and next with the commotions which followed the Reformation, Limerick was strictly and uniformly loyal; and during the same reigns, it appears, from extant maps which were then made of it, to have been defended by King John's castle at the end of Thomond Bridge, by 24 towers upon the walls of English-Town, by towers at the several gates of Irish-Town, and by Dromore castle situated at the centre of Irish-Town, and consisting of 12 towers, lofty walls, and strong outworks.

At an early period of the civil wars which began in 1641, the Roman Catholics under Lord Mounsey and Ikerrin captured Limerick; in 1643, they erected towers and ramparts within St. John's Gate, and a consequence materially strengthened the fortifications of Irish-Town. In 1645, the city became the seat of the supreme councils of the Roman Catholics, and during several succeeding years, it was the scene of violent outrages and commotions. In 1651, the city to the General Assembly, and is in the Clogher Presbytery. The Roman Catholic chapel is in the Roman Catholic parish of Enniskillen. The dispensary is within the Enniskillen Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, received £97 18s., and expended £90 10s. 6d. Area of the village, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 242; in 1841, 260. Houses 43.

LISBUNNY, or LISBONEY, a parish in the barony of Upper Ormond, 1½ mile east of Nenagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, north-westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,393 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,442; in 1841, 1,141. Houses 184. The surface consists in general of good arable and pasture land. The seats are Woodbine-lodge, Watson-house, Rathnaleen-cottage, Islandbawn-house, and Knockalton-house; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of a church, a monastery, and two castles. The road from Nenagh to Roscrea traverses the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMORE [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £323 1s. 6d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 1,513; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

LISBURN, or BLARIS, a parish, partly in the barony of Upper Massarene, co. Antrim, and partly in the baronies of Upper Castlereagh and Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. The Massarene and Castlereagh sections contain the town of LISBURN: see next article. Length, west-south-westward, 5½ miles; extreme breadth, 3. Area of the Massarene section, 2,827 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches,—of which 28 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches are water. Area of the Castlereagh section, 3,064 acres, 7 perches,—of which 20 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches are water. Area of the Iveagh section, 4,805 acres, 3 roods, 22 perches,—of which 19 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 13,249; in 1841, 15,015. Pop. of the rural districts of the Massarene section, in 1831, 2,090; in 1841, 2,692. Pop. of the rural districts of the Castlereagh section, in 1831, 2,506; * in 1841, 2,368. Pop. of the Iveagh section, in 1831, 3,435; in 1841, 3,671. Houses, in 1841, in the rural districts of the Massarene section, 396; in the rural districts of the Castlereagh section, 409; in the whole of the Iveagh section, 595. The river Lagan traverses the interior of the parish, tracing the boundary between co. Antrim and co. Down; and the Ulster railway in one direction, and the great north road between Belfast and Dublin, also traverse the interior, combining with the Lagan navigation to afford unusual affluence in facilities of communication. The parochial surface presents, in the aggregate, a rich, well-cultivated, and opulent appearance; yet though consisting wholly of arable land, a considerable portion of it is of indifferent quality. Very many of the inhabitants are employed in the linen manufacture. The principal mansions and villas are Carnbane, Blaris-lodge, Wellington-lodge, Blundell-hill, Shamrockville, Sprucefield, Carlton-house, Myrtle-hill, Culcavy-cottage, and Orrfield.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £700. Gross income, £703; nett, £616 4s. 10d. Patron, the Marquis of Hertford. The incumbent holds also the vicar-generalship of Down and Connor. One curate has a salary of £75, and the surplice fees; and another has a salary of £50. The church was built upwards of a century ago. Sitzings 700; attendance, from 300 to 600. Two school-houses are used as places of worship in connection with the Establishment, and have each an attendance of from 150 to 200. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 300 to 600; the Quakers' meeting-house, by 100; the Old Connection Wesleyan meeting-house, by from 150 to 200; the New Connection Wesleyan meeting-house, by from 50 to 100; and the Roman Catholic chapel, by from 300 to 600. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 6,783 Churchmen, 4,466 Presbyterians, 160 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,468 Roman Catholics; and 17 daily schools—three of which were salaried with respectively £30, about £9, and about £70 from subscription, one with £5 from the Association for Discourteasing Vice, and one with £5 from that association and £30 from a local committee—had on their books 736 boys and 548 girls.

LISBURN,

A market and post town and a parliamentary borough partly in the Castlereagh section but chiefly in the Massarene section of the parish of Lisburn, counties Down and Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the river Lagan, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Belfast, 3½ miles north-north-east of Hillsborough, 6½ east-north-east of Moira, 6½ south-south-west of Belfast, and 73½ north by east of Dublin.

Environs.—The country immediately around Lisburn is one of the most lovely districts in the north of Ireland,—at once beautiful, ornate, and brilliant,—rich in softly picturesque foregrounds and close scenes, and grandly imposing in the tints and features of hill and mountain perspective. The environs in the direction of Hillsborough and Moira constitute one of the finest sections of fertile, undulating, villa-sprinkled surface of northern, western, and central Downshire; and those toward Belfast combine the foregrounds of the most luscious part of the valley of the Lagan with some of the best grouped backgrounds of the Massarene and Belfast mountains,—and have acquired so just and general a fame for their scenery as to be the favourite resort of the wealthier townspeople of Belfast, both in excursions of private pleasure, and on occasions of showing “the lions” of Ireland to strangers from Great Britain. “The country around Lisburn,” says Mr. Atkinson, “is highly improved; but, in the direction of Belfast, it is one continued chain of plantation beauty. We think it is scarcely possible to bring any country to a state of higher perfection than this district of Antrim. A minute description of all the works of art and nature which combine to produce this perfection would be incompatible with the limits of a sheet; but when the reader presents to his imagination a magnificent landscape, bounded in front by the Belfast mountains, watered by the river Lagan, besprinkled with beautiful villas, birch-yards upon the mountain sides, glistening in the dancing ray; cottages white as snow, with cropped hedges enclosing gardens bending under the weight of their productions; valleys teeming with the gifts of Ceres, and all in full view of the traveller, over a charming road, which passes through demesnes and villas of incomparable beauty; forming one continued chain of rich plantation from Lisburn to Belfast,—he will have formed some idea of the country, to whose natural and artificial history we are now introducing him.”

Interior.—The town extends, in its greatest length, from west to east; and flings its suburb, or eastern extremity, or co. Down section, on the left bank of the Lagan, at a point where the river is flowing toward the south-south-west. The west end of the town, over a distance of 750 yards, consists almost wholly of a range under the control of the rector and curates; but, together with ordinary donations and subscriptions, have usually been disbursed by a Voluntary Association called the Lisburn Philanthropic Society. In 1832, the income of that Association was £401 0s. 8½d.; of which £324 9s. 10½d. was from subscriptions, £20 from donations, £1 from fines, and £55 10s. 10d. from interest on legacies.

* The Castlereagh section does not exhibit any portion of the town as in this section, and the houses of 1841 exist in it as a part containing a population of 47.

Manufactures.—On an island in the Lagan, within the borough limits, are extensive vitriol works. The iron works so often alluded to in Capt. Lawson's History of the Rebellion of 1641, are now extinct. The linen manufacture appears to have been very early introduced to Lisburn; it received a strong impulse at the settlement of immigrants from France, on occasion of the repeal of the Edict of Nantes, in 1685; and it was established in a fine and now celebrated form, about 75 years ago, by the late William Coulson, the father of the present proprietors of the extensive and far-famed damask manufactory, situated within the precincts of the quondam gardens of Lisburn castle. "Many of the looms of Messrs. Coulson's establishment," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "are not inferior in capacity of single work, or in number of designs, to those of Germany; in some parts of which country, the manufacture has been in progress for centuries. The damask linen of Germany may have been considered as unrivalled, and certainly was so under its old draw-loom system. The Jacquard frames are, however, in many cases, more particularly common table-linen, becoming prevalent; but they ought not perhaps to supersede altogether the system of cordage, for the most comprehensive designs and heraldic bearings. The Jacquard frames are now in the course of adoption at the Lisburn manufactory for some of its patterns; and thus either species of machinery can be applied there, according as it may appear best suited to the work in contemplation. There is one particularity in the usage of this establishment which deserves attention,—that no yarn but hand-spun yarn is used in its superior fabrics. This increases the trouble of the manufacture, but is said to be conducive to its durability,—the continuity of the fibres rendering the texture strong, and the cloth of firmer body. In the composition of designs, the late Walter Coulson was peculiarly successful; and indeed his whole management of this establishment was as energetic and admirable as his private life was pure and beneficent." The principal manufacturing establishments, additional to Messrs. Coulson's factory and the vitriol work, are Messrs. Richardson and Co.'s extensive linen establishment, Mr. Barbour's extensive thread manufactory, the flax-spinning mills of respectively Messrs. Richardson and Co. and Messrs. Stewart and Savage; the flour-mills of respectively Messrs. Richardson and Co. and Mr. Samuel Kennedy; and the brewery of Mr. Graham. The bleachyards in the vicinity of Lisburn are among the most extensive in Ireland.

Trade.—Large quantities of agricultural produce, provisions, and manufactured goods, are sold at the weekly markets; and the general retail trade is very extensive. The weekly markets are held on Tuesday; and fairs are held on July 21, and Oct. 5. The chief inn is that of Mr. George Davies, and Mr. Richard Robinson. A branch office of the Northern Bank was established in 1835, and continued to be in operation in 1844. Railway trains start from the Lisburn station of the Ulster railway for Belfast, three times on Sunday, and five times every other day; and the fares of the three classes of each train are respectively 9d., 6d., and 4d. The other facilities of communication enjoyed by the town, are the Lagan navigation for goods, and the vehicles on the great north road for passengers.

Municipal Affairs.—A patent of 3 Charles I., created in favour of Viscount Conway, the manor of Kilulagh, within which Lisburn is situated; and a charter of 14 Charles II. granted to the inhabitants the right of sending two members to parliament. The ancient borough limits and those established by the Boundary Act are very nearly co-extensive. As no municipality was created by the town's charter, the borough has existed only for parliamentary purposes. Originally all the inhabitants, and in later times, the great body of them, subject to the restrictions from time to time prevailing, first under the popery laws, and afterwards under the several statutes in reference to pot-walloping boroughs, exercised the right of voting at elections of members of parliament; and the constituency is now composed of 45 (Irish currency) inhabitant householders, under the act of 35 George III., and £10 (British currency) householders, under the Reform Act of 2 and 3 William IV. The borough sends one member to the imperial parliament; and the number of voters registered up to Dec. 1834, was 91. The seneschal of the manor of Kilulagh is the returning officer. A manor-court is held every third Wednesday; a court-leet in May and October; a court of petty-sessions, every Tuesday; and the Consistorial Court of Down and Connor every second Monday. The manor-court has jurisdiction to £20, and for debts to 40s. The town is a constabulary station in the Belfast district.

Statistics.—Area of the co. Antrim section of the town, 204 acres; of the co. Down section, 27 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,218; in 1841, 6,284. Houses 921. Pop., in 1841, of the co. Antrim section, 5,807. Houses 828. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 239; in manufactures and trade, 761; in other pursuits, 170. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 65; on the directing of labour, 648; on their own manual labour, 444; on means not specified, 13. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,243; who could read but not write, 549; who could neither read nor write, 543. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,057; who could read but not write, 1,025; who could neither read nor write, 729. Pop. of the co. Down section, in 1841, 477. Houses 93. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 12; in manufactures and trade, 71; in other pursuits, 14. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 56; on their own manual labour, 38; on means not specified, 1.

History.—Lisburn was originally called Linsley-Garvin, probably from its founder; and continued to bear that name, in the corrupted form of Linsgarrey, till 1641. In consequence of its geographical position, on an important pass of the Lagan, it was regarded as a valuable station between the native Irish and the English of the Pale. Its proprietor in the later Irish times—or the proprietor at least of the territory of Kilulagh, in which it stands—was an O'Neill of the family of Tyrone. Lord Conway, who obtained a grant of Kilulagh from Charles I., was, however, the virtual founder of the modern town; and, though he induced a number of English and Welsh families to settle in it, and protected its population by the erection of his castle, he does not seem to have ever stimulated it to the size of more than a mere village. A map of it, believed to have been drawn after he had fairly settled it, and still or recently preserved in the Marquis of Hertford's office, exhibits it as consisting of the castle and 33 other tenements; and shows the nucleus of the town sieged by an Irish force under Lord Castlehaven; and probably through treachery rather than through cowardice, it surrendered without firing a shot; but in 1650, it was retaken by Sir Hardress Waller.—The village of Liscarrol is in itself a poor, dirty, obscure place. Fairs are held on March 25, May 1, May 31, Aug. 31, Oct. 21, and Nov. 19. Area, 36 acres. Pop., in 1831, 666; in 1841, 750. Houses 126. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 47; in manufactures and trade, 86; in other pursuits, 18. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 72; on their own manual labour, 70; on means not specified, 6.

LISCARTON, a parish in the barony of Lower Navan, 2 miles north-west of the town of Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, north-westward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 7 furlongs; area, 1,303 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch. Pop., in 1831, 229; in 1841, 318. Houses 52. The surface consists wholly of profitable land; and is, to a very large extent, included within Liscarton demesne. The seats are Bachelor's-lodge and Liscarton-castle,—the latter the fine residence of Thomas Gerrard, Esq. Liscarton-castle is partly a modern residence, and partly the remains of an ancient military strength; and is alleged to have originally been a monastery. An arched gateway, belonging to considerable outworks which defended it, stands about 60 yards from the main body of the building; and the foundation of the outworks themselves were not long ago traceable along the east. The parish is traversed from end to end by the road from Navan to Kells.—Liscarton is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ANDBRACCAN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The tithe composition is returned in cumulo with that of the other parishes of the benefice. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 222.

LISCLEARY, a parish in the barony of Kerrycurryhy, 6 miles south by east of Cork, co. Cork, Munster. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 3; area, 4,305 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,400; in 1841, 1,432. Houses 238. The surface consists of part of the valley and southern screen of the Annabuoy river.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate but suspended benefice in the dio. of Cork. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £93 6s. 8d.; nett, £88 13s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate performs the occasional duties for a salary of £10. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £116 13s. 4d., and are appropriated to the prebend of Liscleary. A licensed house was used in 1834 as the parochial place of worship, and had an attendance of 16. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 89, and the Roman Catholics to 2,820; and a hedge-school had on its books 45 boys and 25 girls.

LISCOLMAN, a parish on the western border of the barony of Shillelagh, and of the county of Wicklow, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Tullow, Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,483 acres, 3 perches. Pop., in 1831, 754; in 1841, 639. Houses 90. The Derreen rivulet traces the western boundary, and at the same time divides co. Wicklow from co. Carlow; and it leaves the parish at an elevation of 256 feet above sea-level. A small affluent of the Derreen has an elevation, very nearly at the centre of the parish, of 275 feet. The seats are Liscolman-house, Knockloe-house, and Rath-house.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of AGHOLD [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £50, and the rectorial for £100;

• The Ecclesiastical Authorities state the pop., in 1831, at 2,501.

and the latter are appropriated to the dean and chapter of Leighlin. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 56, and the Roman Catholics to 000, and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

LISCORMICK. See AGLISHCORMICK.

LISDEEN, a hamlet in the parish of Kilferagh, barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. Pop., in 1841, 45. Houses 7.

LISDOWNY, a village in the parish of Ahamey, barony of Galmoy, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on the road from Freshford to Durrow, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles west of Ballyragget, and $3\frac{1}{4}$ north of Freshford. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel, is a constabulary station, and gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ossory. The other chapels of the parish are at Clontubrid and Whitegate. Area of the village, 7 acres. Pop., in 1831, 162; in 1841, 134. Houses 23.

LISELTIN. See LISSELTIN.

LISFINNY, a demesne and an old castle, on the southern margin of the parish of Lismore and Mocollop, half-a-mile north of Tallow, barony of Coismore and Coshbride, co. Waterford, Munster. The demesne is the property of Captain Croker, and was not long ago tastefully improved. The castle stands on the side of a gentle declivity, which rises from the margin of the river Bride; it is supposed to have been built by the Earl of Desmond; it has undergone little change during the last 50 years, and is not very much dilapidated; it consists of a strong square tower, 84 feet in height; and its summit commands a delightful view of the valley of the Bride, upwards of 20 miles in length, gemmed with villas, sheeted with luxuriant crops, and dappled at intervals with freakish revealments of the river, looking like small silvery lakes amidst scenes of verdure and woodland.

LISGENAN, LISSQUINAN, or GRANGE, a parish in the barony of Decies-within-Drum, co. Waterford. $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by east of Youghal, Munster. It consists of a main body and a detached portion, the latter half-a-mile east of the former, and both resting their south end upon the sea. Length of the main body, south-south-westward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$. Length of the detached district, southward, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$. Area of the whole, 5,709 acres, 3 roods; of the detached district, 1,076 acres, 3 roods, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,195; in 1841, 2,527. Houses 363. The land averages in value from 20s. to 25s. per acre. The main body is drained across its north end by the rivulet Lickey, and rests a small part of its south end upon the head of Whiting bay. The broadest portion of the detached district expands upon the shore. The principal residences are Knocknageragh in the main body, and Paulsworth in the detached district.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KINSALABEG [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £200; glebe, £1 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £400, and are inappropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of between 900 and 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Ardmore and Ballymacart. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 34, and the Roman Catholics to 2,275; and 3 parochial schools were attended, on the average, by about 172 children.

LISGOOLD, a parish in the barony of Barrinmore, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Middleton, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,154 acres. Pop., in 1831, 893; in 1841, 929. Houses 145. The declivity is to the south-south-east. Fairs are held on May 1, June 25, Nov. 1, and Dec. 21.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio.

man Catholics of the parish to 1,503, and the Roman Catholics of the union to 1,675; a Protestant Sunday school had on its books 34 children; and 6 daily schools—one of which was aided with £2 a-year from Mrs. Leslie, and one with £5 from the vicar, and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice—were attended on the average by 336 children.

LISLIVANE, a village in the parish of Abbeymahon, barony of Ibane and Barryroe, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 121. Houses 22.

LISMACUE, a demesne, the old family-seat of W. Baker, Esq., in the parish of Templeneiry, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south east of Tipperary, barony of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary, Munster. The woods of the demesne blend with those of Bansha-castle and Spring-house to produce as rich a sylvan landscape as any in the county of Wicklow.

LISMAKEERY, a parish in the barony of Lower Connello, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Askaton, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,032 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,268; in 1841, 1,056. Houses 164. The surface is part of the ornate valley of the Deel; yet consists only of middle-rate land, with considerable interspersions of craggy-ground and bad pasture. Altavilla-house stands on the Deel.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ASKEATON [which see], in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £180; glebe, £13 16s. 11d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 5, and the Roman Catholics to 1,309; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

LISMALIN, or LISMULLEN, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Slieveardagh, and of the county of Tipperary, 5 miles north-north-east of Cloneen, Munster. Length, westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 4,241 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,392; in 1841, 1,417. Houses 209. The surface consists of excellent land; it is drained southward by head-streams of the Lingan; and its highest ground is at the church, and has an altitude of 414 feet above sea-level. The seats are Lismalin-castle, Gregaugh-house, and Mohober-house.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £394 7s. 2d. The rectories of Lismalin, CROHANE, MODESHILL, and MOWNEY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Lismalin and the corps of the archdeaconry of Cashel. Length, 7 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 4,683. Gross income, £1,046 13s. 4d.; nett, £979 2s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Thurles in the dio. of Cashel, and the sinecure treasurership of Christ-church, Dublin. A curate has a salary of £150. The church was built about 130 years ago. Sittings 100; attendance, from 30 to 40. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 31, and the Roman Catholics to 1,433; the Protestants of the union to 159, and the Roman Catholics to 4,767; and 2 daily schools in Crohane had on their books 75 boys and 50 girls.

LISMATEIGUE, a parish in the barony of Knocktopher, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of the town of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, north-north-westward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,643 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches. Pop., in 1841, 545. Houses 81. The surface declines to the south, and is traversed by the road from Callan to Waterford. The only hamlet is Monroe. Within the parish were formerly a church, a castle, and a moat.—This parish is ecclesiastically treated as a townland of the parish of Abbey-Jerpoint, in the benefice of Burnchurch and dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £100. But the ecclesiastical returns exhibit the population, in 1831, as amounting to 913, all Roman Catholics.

LISMORE AND MOCOLLOP, an united parish, partly in the barony of Condons and Clangibbon, co. Cork, but chiefly in that of Coshbride and Coshmore, co. Waterford, Munster. The Waterford section contains the towns of LISMORE and CAPPOQUIN, and the villages of BALLYDEFF and TALLOWBRIDGE: see these articles. Length of the parish, westward, 10 miles; breadth, from 4 to 8. Area of the Cork section, 1,293 acres; of the Waterford section, 62,743 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches,—of which 26 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches are udeway of the river Bride, and 196 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches are in the river Blackwater. The Census of 1831 exhibits the district as three parishes, Lismore, Mocollop, and Cappoquin; and the reports of the Commissioners of Public Instruction exhibit Lismore and Mocollop separately, and include Cappoquin in Lismore. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 18,441; in 1841, 21,552. Houses 2,996. Pop., in 1831, of Mocollop, 3,109; of Lismore in Cork, 384; of Lismore in Waterford, exclusive of the city of Lismore, 5,913; of Cappoquin, exclusive of the town of Cappoquin, 3,842. Pop., in 1841, of the Cork section of the whole, 637; of the rural districts of the Waterford section of the whole, 15,007. Houses in the Cork section, 96; in the rural districts of the Waterford section, 2,155. The summit-line of the Knockmeledown mountains constitutes the northern boundary: the river Bride, over all the lower part of its course to its confluence with the Blackwater, traces the southern boundary; and the Blackwater first passes eastward through the interior to Cappoquin, and then flows southward along the eastern boundary. The division of the united parish north of the Blackwater, constituting very considerably more than one-half of the whole area, commences with a narrow belt of valley-ground along the river, and then climbs steeply yet tumulatedly toward the northern boundary, forming a grand amasement or congeries of mountain-summits,—rather more than one-half of all which belong to the great Knockmeledown group. The principal heights in the lower part of the congeries, or within $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles of the Blackwater, are Knocknalough in the west, 1,028 feet of altitude above sea-level; a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Knocknalough, 1,066 feet; a height 2 miles south of Knocknalough, 777 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Knocknalough, 1,164; a height 3 miles north-west of Lismore, 732 feet; a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Lismore, 653 feet; and Crowhill, on the east border, 1,003 feet. The principal heights between the preceding and the summit-line have altitudes of 1,031, 1,088, 1,297, 1,096, and 1,668 feet; and the principal summits on or closely adjoining the northern boundary-line, have altitudes of 2,069, 2,084, 2,609, 2,149, 2,199, and 1,591 feet. A very large extent of the mountainous region has been brought into a state of high cultivation, by means of lime and georgy; and much of the remainder is available either as pasture or as turbary. All the land from the base of the mountains southward is profitable; and a large proportion of it, particularly along both sides of the Blackwater, is disposed in demesne-ground, and profusely clothed and decorated with wood. The Owbeg rivulet runs eastward, midway between the Blackwater and the Bride; and four heights south of the Owbeg have altitudes of respectively 494, 534, 594, and 432 feet. The scenery of the parish is superb; including the most luscious and beautiful combinations of valley, water, park, and woodland, along the Blackwater,—exquisite blendings of hill, undulation, wood, and open ground between the Blackwater and the Bride.

distance of about $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile from the shore. The political boundary-line with Antrim passes through Lough Beg, and that with Tyrone passes, in the parish of Lissan, through the small Lough Fea.—The river Bann receives from the interior of the county the tributary streams of the Moyola, the Clady, the Agivey, and the Macosquin; but, notwithstanding the magnitude of its volume, and the great extent of inland navigation which ramifies from Lough Neagh, it cannot be navigated above Coleraine, and is greatly impeded even thither by a bar across its entrance. The voluminous and majestic Foyle is navigable for large sea-borne vessels to the city of Londonderry, and for river-craft over the whole of its connection with the county. The 'muddy' Roe rises close on the southern boundary, and at a great elevation above sea-level; it flows northward to the east side of Lough Foyle; it cuts the county into two nearly equal parts; and it receives, as its chief tributaries, the Owenbeg, the Owenmore, the Gelvin, the Balteagh, the Castle, and the Curley. The grassy Faghan rises in a quagmire, under the rocks called the Eagle's Nest, at the base of Sawel mountain; it flows north-westward to the vicinity of the city of Londonderry, and thence parallel with the Foyle to the head of Lough Foyle; it receives, as its chief tributaries, the Glenrandle and the Gubbin rivulets; and it is navigable for small craft over scarcely one mile from its embouchure. All the other streams of the county are very inconsiderable.

Climate.—The mean temperature of the city of Londonderry, as indicated by the mean temperature of six wells in different parts, is 49, the extreme being 17 and 71. The range of the barometer is from 28.6 to 30.6. The medium number of fine days in the year, as ascertained upon an average of twelve years, is 126. The hygrometer of De Luc varies from $26\frac{1}{2}$ to $52\frac{1}{2}$. The mean annual depth of rain, according to the Rev. Mr. Sampson, in his Statistical Survey of the County, is 31 inches; but, according to the Memoir of the Ordnance Survey of the parish of Templemore, it is 34.2 inches. The ratio of winds during 9 years was north, 295; south, 398; east, 283; west, 1,005; north-west, 737; north-east, 265; south-west, 599; and south-east, 454.—A frost which commenced on Jan. 19, 1692, continued with great severity during 5 weeks. Another frost in the year 1739–40, commonly called throughout Ireland the year of the hard frost, was so intense at Londonderry that an ox was roasted on the Foyle opposite the Ship quay. A frost in 1802 was so strong as to cover the Foyle with ice where it is 1,000 feet broad, after only 6 days of uninterrupted freezing; and it was succeeded by a tremendous storm, which did considerable damage in the city and its neighbourhood. In 1814, the ice on the river was so strong that carriages were, in several places, driven over it; and, on Feb. 16, a part of the bridge was carried away by masses of ice, floated down the river by the ebb tides and a very high wind.

Geognostic Structure.—The surface rock of about 450 square miles in the western division of the county is mica-slate; and upwards of two-thirds of this is of the talcose variety. The boundary-line of the mica-slate is in general well-defined; but one mass forming the mountain of Coolcoscraban, and rising to the altitude of 1,300 feet above sea-level, occupies an isolated position, and is nearly surrounded by the basaltic heights of Craignashock and Benbradagh.—Primitive limestone occurs in frequent patches and nodules, throughout the mica-slate district; it occurs, in particular, in the glen of the Faghan, in the vicinity of Clady, in the vicinity of Dungiven, on the west bank of the Foyle, and at a height of 800 feet above sea-level on the north-west side of Carntogher mountains; and, in the last of these situations, it contains veins of coloured spar, quartz, and green chlorite.—A granular limestone, which contains quantities of crystallized hornblende, occurs on the east side of Slieve-Gallion.—Hornblende slate occurs in several places in the valley of the Roe; and a bed of it, 400 yards in extent, lies in the vicinity of the old church of Dungiven, parallel to a bed of primitive limestone.—Beds of sienite in connection with porphyry lie toward the base of Slieve-Gallion; and are surmounted by various members of the secondary series of sedimentary rocks crowned by a mass of basalt.—Crystalline greenstone glides off from the sienite on one side of Slieve-Gallion, and forms a small district to the west of that mountain, unconnected with any other trap rocks.—Yellow sandstone, and sandstone conglomerate, form a belt of from 1 mile to $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles in breadth, southward from the east side of Slieve-Gallion down the east side of the valley of the Roe on to Magilligan Point, and also westward from Newtownlimavaddy along the head of Lough Foyle to the northern environs of the city of Londonderry. A very narrow belt of new red sandstone and red marl extends along the east side of the yellow sandstone from Dungiven to the sea; and a broader belt commences a little south-east of Slieve-Gallion, and extends southward into the county of Tyrone. A field of carboniferous limestone, about 9 square miles in extent, lies on the east side of the yellow sandstone, a little south of Maghera; and is worked for burning. A narrow belt of lias greensand and chalk extends along the east side of the new red sandstone from the vicinity of Dungiven to the sea; and another and more irregular belt commences on the east side of the same formation a little north of Moneymore, and extends southward into the county of Tyrone. A great field of overlying trap occupies all the remainder of the county to the east, constituting part of the vast tabular trap or basalt district of Antrim and Down, and closely resembling the coast parts of that district round Antrim in the character and appearance of its terminating escarpments, over the underlying series of sedimentary rocks, greensand, chalk, lias limestone, and new red sandstone; but it differs from the most of the other parts of the district in subsiding down into low, regular, champaign-ground along the valley of the Bann; and differs also from the Antrim portion in having its dip toward the north-east; while the dip of the latter is nearly to the south-west, and it attains its greatest thickness at the north-western extremity of the field, the cap of Benyevenagh being upwards of 900 feet in depth.

Soils.—The parts of the valley of the Bann, and the shores of Lough Neagh, whose subsoil is hard basalt, have in general a rusty, loose grit soil, without sufficient cohesion or fertility for wheat crops; and they are encumbered with numerous bogs, interspersed with shallow pools, and often separated by craggy knolls of basalt. Yet the bottoms of vales, or the immediate banks of streams in these districts, are tracts of good land, and consist, in general, of gravelly diluvium; some clayey tracts occur in the neighbourhood of Coleraine; and a district of rich open country, constituting the most extensive tract of good ground in the county, lies west of Lough Neagh and the upper part of the Bann, extending between the basalt and the primary rocks, and southward into the county of Tyrone. The western parts of the great basaltic field have in general a better soil than the eastern and central parts; and, as in the sweet, rich pastures of Ben-was 114 tons, and at Moneymore 4; and the quantity of bere sold at Newtownlimavaddy was 1,113 tons, and at Dungiven 371. In 1835, the quantity of wheat sold at Newtownlimavaddy was 926 tons, at Dungiven 308, at Moneymore 68, at Kilrea 30, and at Magherafelt 1,000; the quantity of oats sold at Newtownlimavaddy was 1,853 tons, at Dungiven 617, at Garvagh 330, at Maghera 616, at Moneymore 251, at Kilrea 300, and at Magherafelt 700; the quantity of barley sold at Maghera was 17 tons, and at Moneymore 5½; and the quantity of bere sold at Newtownlimavaddy was 926 tons, and at Dungiven 308.—In 1841, there were within the rural districts of the county, 7,866 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 8,755 of from 5 to 15 acres, 2,675 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 1,143 of upwards of 30 acres; and within the civic districts of the county, 83 of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 51 of from 5 to 15 acres, 18 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 13 of upwards of 30 acres. In the same year, there were within the county at large, including both rural and civic districts, 15,688 farmers, 25,285 servants and labourers employed in agriculture, 89 ploughmen, 139 gardeners, 1 grazier, 1,398 herds, 35 caretakers, 6 land-agents, 74 land-stewards, 4 game-keepers, and 4 dairy-keepers.

Live Stock.—The native garron horse is used in the mountainous districts; it seldom stands higher than 14 hands, and often stands much lower; and it is thinly made up, has generally crooked hams, and has a gentle head and aspect, with nice shanks. The Scottish Highland horse is in great request in Magilligan and other light grounds; it is sometimes stout, and after two good winters swells to a good breadth; and when crossed with the sinewy draft, becomes still more valuable. A cross-breed between the bloodhorse and the stronger breed, was formerly a good deal appreciated, but has of late years been less in request. The horses of Myroe are superior to those of most other districts, not so much from any strict attention to breed, as because the stiff clay soil requires a stout horse, while the sporting disposition of the farmers requires it to be at the same time fleet. A sort of horses, usually obtained in the extreme south-east of the county,—broad behind, low before, generally black, with some white in the face and legs, very hairy on the fetlock,—are slow, but easily kept, and are not bad drudges.—One variety of native cow is light in the bone, small in size, black, reddish, or brindled in colour; extremely active, crooked in the ham, with a good eye and sharp nose, and nice thin neck, a crooked horn, frequently turned upward; and another variety is coarse boned, ill-shaped, with a swollen belly, heavy head, a very pendent dewlap, and a bull-like aspect. Among the cattle introduced to the county about half-a-century ago, are some large well-shaped cows, chiefly from Fermanagh and Roscommon. Cattle, on the whole, have been very little improved; and a prevailing and not unreasonable opinion is, that on the small farms where grazing cannot be much attended to, the common Irish breed is best suited to the indifferent food it obtains. Sheep-farming is discouraged in some districts; as the common breed of sheep are not easily restrained within the ordinary fences. Hogs, throughout at least the seaboard of the county, are not nearly so numerous in proportion to the extent of land as in most other parts of Ireland; as, in consequence of the comparatively high price of potatoes, and low price of pork, they cannot be profitably fed. Poultry, under the influence of the egg-trade, have become very numerous; and bee-hives are also a minor source of production.

In 1841, and within the rural districts of the county, the live stock, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, consisted of 691 horses and mules, 43 asses, 3,779 cattle, 651 sheep, 3,062 pigs, and 31,066 poultry; on farms of from 1 to 5 acres, 1,992 horses and mules, 12 asses, 6,557 cattle, 1,246 sheep, 3,726 pigs, and 25,938 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 7,442 horses and mules, 2 asses, 17,833 cattle, 5,005 sheep, 8,008 pigs, and 50,867 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 4,236 horses and mules, 2 asses, 11,874 cattle, 4,084 sheep, 4,303 pigs, and 29,368 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 3,057 horses and mules, 5 asses, 11,349 cattle, 6,477 sheep, 2,706 pigs, and 21,517 poultry. The totals of these classes, together with their respective estimated value, were 17,418 horses and mules, worth £139,344; 64 asses, £64; 51,392 cattle, £334,048; 18,063 sheep, £19,869; 21,895 pigs, £27,368; and 158,736 poultry, £3,969. Grand total of value of live stock in the rural districts, £524,662.—In the same year, and within the civic districts of the county, the live stock on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, consisted of 354 horses and mules, 1 ass, 390 cattle, 8 sheep, 828 pigs, and 1,695 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 49 horses and mules, 88 cattle, 2 sheep, 68 pigs, and 248 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 50 horses and mules, 53 cattle, 44 pigs, and 248 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 24 horses and mules, 98 cattle, 20 sheep, 5 pigs, and 76 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 21 horses and mules, 148 cattle, 9 pigs, and 48 poultry. The totals of these classes, together with their respective estimated value, were 507 horses and mules, £4,056; 1 ass, £1; 777 cattle, £5,050; 30 sheep, £33; 954 pigs, £1,192; and 2,315 poultry, £58. Grand total of value of live stock in the civic districts, £10,390.

Woods.—Of continuous woods planted within the county, previous to 1791, there existed in 1841, 525 acres of oak, 2 of ash, 1 of beech, 1,344 of mixed trees, and 189 of orchards. The total extent of continuous woods and total number of detached trees, in 1841, comprised 539 acres and 1,198 trees of oak, 6 acres and 27,366 trees of ash, 1 acre and 859 trees of elm, 6 acres and 10,501 trees of beech, 179 acres and 13,786 trees of fir, 6,328 acres and 512,967 trees of mixed plantations, and 659 acres and 5,965 trees of orchards,—in all, 7,718 acres and 572,663 detached trees,—the latter equivalent to 3,579 acres,—thus making a grand total of 11,297 acres of woods.

Manufactures and Trade.—The export and import trade may be estimated by reference to the articles LONDONDERRY (CITY OF), COLERAINE, and PORTRUSH; yet the exports and imports of Londonderry must be remembered to include a large proportion of the trade of both Tyrone and Donegal. The staple manufacture of the whole county, but emphatically of the valleys of the Roe and the Faghan, is the weaving and bleaching of linen; but the comparative extent of this and of all other manufactures will be best estimated by means of a summary of the personal statistics of productive industry in 1841,—exclusive, however, of farming and of the professions:—Fishermen, 89; millers, 137; maltsters, 2; brewers, 5; distillers, 13; bakers, 150; confectioners, 22; soda-water makers, 2; salt-manufacturer, 1; tobacco-twisters, 2; fishmongers, 21; egg-dealers, 60; fruiterer, 1; cattle-dealers, 21; pig-jobbers, 4; salesmasters, 2; corn-dealers, 15; seedsman, 1; butter-merchants, 6; huxters and provision-dealers, 46; butchers, 261; poultryer, 1; victuallers, 2; grocers, 205; tobacconists, 44; dressers, 402; carlers, 10; spinners of flax, 6,914; spinners of wool, 491; spinners of unspecified classes, 21,151; winders and warpers, 267; factory-workers, social condition. The native Irish have gradually returned and multiplied till they nearly equal the descendants of the Protestant colonists in number; but, though both a peaceable and an interesting people, they are still decidedly inferior to the others in habits of enterprise and comfort. Almost the only events of note since the Protestant colonization occurred during the wars of the revolution, and belong more properly to the history of the city than to that of the county.

LONDONDERRY, a barony in the extreme north-west of the county of Londonderry, Ulster. It comprises all the portion of the county which lies west of a line drawn down the middle of the river Foyle; and, in consequence of its being nearly identical in territory with the north-western half of the original borough limits of the city, it is usually called the North-west Liberties of Londonderry. The borough limits of Londonderry, as defined by charter of 14 Charles II., were a circle described upon a radius of three Irish miles from the centre of the city; but the practical limits of the corporations' jurisdiction came to exclude the portion on the east side of the Foyle, and to be identical with the parish of Templemore on the west side of the Foyle; and, in the course of the recent remodellings of territorial distribution, these limits were adopted as those of the barony of Londonderry, and are inclusive not only of all rural districts on the west side of the Foyle, but also of all the parts of the new municipal borough situated on that bank of the river. Excepting 1,063 acres, 2 roods, 27 perches of additional extent in the river Foyle, the barony is strictly identical with the parish of TEMPLEMORE: which see. Area, 13,678 acres, 35 perches,—of which 1,063 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches are water. Pop., in 1841, 20,379. Houses 3,017. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,224; in manufactures and trade, 1,849; in other pursuits, 625. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,443; who could read but not write, 1,801; who could neither read nor write, 1,989. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,965; who could read but not write, 3,579; who could neither read nor write, 3,237.—The barony of Londonderry lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Londonderry. The total number of valued tenements—exclusive of those within the parliamentary borough of Londonderry—is 500; and of these, 104 are valued under £5,—104, under £10,—71, under £15,—51, under £20,—34, under £25,—27, under £30,—39, under £40,—16, under £50,—and 54, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £25,522 8s.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, were respectively £1,740 9s. 4d. and £1,960 9s.

LONDONDERRY.

A post, market, and sea-port town, a borough, a city, the county town of Londonderry, and the capital of the extreme north of Ulster, partly in the parish of Clondermot and barony of Tyrkeeran, but chiefly in the parish of Templemore and barony of Londonderry, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands on the river Foyle, 11½ miles north by east of Strabane, 12½ west-south-west of Newtownlimavaddy, 22½ north-east by north of Stranorlar, 24½ west-south-west of Coleraine, 27 north of Omagh, 56 west-north-west of Antrim, 69 north-north-east of Sligo, 69 north-west by west of Belfast, and 113½ north-north-west of Dublin.

Site and Environs.—The site of ancient Derry, of even all the modern city down to a comparatively recent period, and of all the present city within the walls, or of Londonderry-proper, is an oval hill, usually called "the Island of Derry," 119 feet in altitude, 199 acres, 3 roods, and 30 perches in area, nearly insulated by a majestic sweep of the broad and voluminous Foyle, and commanding a panoramic view of a country rich in both natural and cultivated beauty. One suburb, called Waterside, stands on the opposite bank of the river; another suburb, called Edenballymore, and promising speedily to rival "the Island of Derry" in population, extends away from the base of the hill, down the flat valley of the river toward the Lough; and while the ancient part of the city rises tier above tier till it acuminates in the spire of the cathedral, and presents a museum of military strength and architectural romance, this principal suburb expands in a brilliant sheet of opulence, prosperity, and urban beauty and pretension. "If," says one writer, "historical recollections endear this place to every lover of liberty, its situation and time-worn walls must render it interesting to all admirers of picturesque scenery. Placed on an oval hill, encircled by its massive grey walls, and broken into all that irregularity of outline which the buildings of different heights along the steep acclivities present, the view of the old city from the approach to Waterside is very striking." "The situation of Londonderry," says another, "is the finest, I think, of any town or city in Ireland. Indeed, with the exception of Edinburgh, I do not know any town of the United Kingdom so well situated as Londonderry. The river Foyle, a fine broad river, makes a noble sweep on one side of the town, and expands immediately below it into a wide estuary, which terminates in the broad waters of Lough Foyle. On all sides of the town is seen a succession of deep valleys and corresponding heights, exhibiting every attraction which wood and cultivation can bestow. Up the river and down the estuary on both sides, the slopes and heights are adorned by handsome villas; and in fact, I do not know anything that is wanting to render the situation of Londonderry finer, or its environs more attractive." "It is impossible," says a third writer, "to approach the venerable and heroic city without being struck with its apparent 'fitness' for resisting the assaults of a besieger; its great natural strength is at once apparent; and as we advance nearer, and note the high and thick walls by which it is surrounded, we become convinced that the brave and earnest hearts by which it was defended, and who obtained for it and themselves imperishable names in history, might have scorned the attacks of any enemy but famine." "We approached Derry as the evening was closing in; nothing could be more imposing than the appearance of 'the Maiden city';—at first a few lights became visible near the Foyle, then they sparkled higher up, so as to display to great advantage the far-famed acropolis of the north. As we turned into the outward suburb—to the full as large as Derry within the walls—the reflection of the lights from the river gave a magic effect to the scene."

Fortifications.—The walls of Londonderry are now its most ancient remains. They were erected during several years commencing in Nov. 1609; and together with their gates, cost £8,357. A description of them in 1618-19, says, "The city of Londonderry is now compassed about with a very strong wall, excellently made, and neatly wrought, being all of good lime and stone; the circuit whereof is 284½ perches, at 18 feet to the perch; besides the 4 gates, which contain 84 feet, and in every place of the wall, it is 24 feet high, and 6 feet thick. The gates are all battlemented; but to two of them there is no going up, so that they serve to no great use."

gate, is called successively, Widows'-row, London-street, and Society-street; another street parallel to Ferry-quay-street, and Butcher's-street, and about mid-distance between them and Ferry-quay-gate, is called Richmond-street toward the east, and Castle-street toward the west; a street parallel to the east side of Bishop's-street and Ship-quay-street, is called successively Pump-street and Rosemary-lane; and the principal one-sided streets within the walls, and facing them, are called Artillery-lane, Meeting-house-lane, and Magazine-street. In 1818 and 1819, during the mayoralty of the late Dr. William Scott, the name of King William's Square was imposed upon the Diamond, and corresponding new names were given also to the principal streets; but, after two years, the old names were restored by the Irish Society. The principal streets of the portions of the town situated outside of the walls, but exclusive of Edenballymore, are the long continuation of Bishop's-street already noticed; Henrietta-street and Barrack-row, off the west side of Bishop's-street; Ferguson's-lane and Bennet's-lane, off the east side of Bishop's-street; Fountain-street, immediately below the walls, from Bishop's-gate round to Ferry-quay-gate; Wapping-lane and Cunningham-lane, off Fountain-street; Bridge-street, formerly called Wapping, from Ferry-quay-gate flexuously to the bridge across the Foyle; Foyle-street, defecting yet parallel with the river, and 550 yards in length, from the end of the bridge to the vicinity of Ship-quay-gate; and Cow-bog and Nailer's-row, immediately under the western walls. The airy, handsome, and spreading suburb of Edenballymore, is bounded on the east by Cow-bog and Nailer's-row, and occupies an area of about 700 yards by 500; and its principal streets and thoroughfares are William-street, Rossville-street, Abbey-street, Great James-street, Sackville-street, Strand-road, Waterloo-place, Faghan-street, Longbogside, Middle-road, and Cregan-street. The suburb of Waterside on the right bank of the Foyle, consists principally of one street, about 280 yards in length, and extending parallel with the river.—“The city,” say the writers of the Ordnance Memoir, “now boasts of a variety of important buildings and valuable institutions. The private residences, too, of every description, are now built in a superior style. Some of the shops are spacious and handsome; one, that of a draper in Bishop-street, measures 120 feet by 24, and is 12 feet high.—Of the original houses several still remain, particularly in the Diamond and contiguous streets. They may be distinguished by their high pyramidal gables, as represented in the old plans, but in other respects have been so modernized as to retain but little of their original character. The extension of Londonderry beyond the Hill, evinces the cessation of an ancient prejudice that to reside without the walls was not respectable. The most important additions have been made towards the north, where mud cabins have been gradually superseded by comfortable houses. Among these are several good streets, which contain merchants' residences, situated near the river; these contribute to the beauty of the city, while the adjoining warehouses attest its prosperity. The most recent addition is Great James-street, in which stands the new Presbyterian meeting-house. The suburb in which the above improvements have taken place is called Edenballymore from the townland in which it is situated. This suburb forms part of a remarkable valley, the level of which at low-water is only 24 feet above the sea; the names of Bogside, Longbog, and Cowbog, have references to the former state of the district.”

Ecclesiastical Buildings.]—The cathedral of Derry is also the parish-church of Templemore, and stands on the summit of the Hill of Derry. It has no transepts, and consists only of nave and chancel; it is divided into middle and lateral aisles, by ranges of pointed arches resting on hexagonal pillars; and over each aisle is a spacious gallery, connected at the west end with an organ loft. On the east gable is a cross, springing from the central battlement; and at the east end is a square tower, with circular turrets up two of its angles, and a handsome and well-proportioned spire soaring up from its summit, and terminating in a cross and gilt pole. The church, apart from the tower, measures 114 feet in length, 66 in breadth, and 46 in height; the tower measures about 32 feet on each side of its square, and 89½ feet to the top of its battlements; and the spire ascends to an altitude of 178½ feet from the ground. The structure was completed in 1633, under the superintendence of Sir John Vaughan, at the cost of £4,000; it was originally in the perpendicular or Tudor style of pointed architecture, but has lost much of its characteristic uniformity by modern fantastic decorations; and, in the absence of any economical fund belonging to it as a cathedral, it has hitherto been kept in repair by parochial assessments. The original tower was only 66 feet high; but in 1778, the Earl of Bristol, bishop of Derry, added 21 feet to its height, and erected upon it a spire of hewn stone, and of an octagonal pyramidal form, with open ornamented windows, and terminating in a ball and vane at the altitude of 238 feet from the ground. In 1802, in consequence of the tower being in an insecure state, the spire was taken down; and soon after, the present one, with the addition of Gothic pinnacles, was built at the expense of £400,—the one-half contributed by the Irish Society, and the other by bishop Knox and the citizens.—The episcopal palace situated on the west side of Bishop's-street, near Bishop's-gate, is a substantial and commodious but plain building, erected during the prelacy of Dr. Barnard, almost rebuilt by the Earl of Bristol, when bishop, used as a barrack and damaged in 1798, and subsequently repaired by Bishop Knox. It occupies the site of a manse which the corporation of London built at the cost of £500, immediately after the colonization of Derry; and the manse, in its turn, occupied the site of an old Augustinian convent. The bishop's gardens are nearly two acres in area, and extend backward from the palace to the city wall; and the bishop's demesne occupies a considerable area along the south-west side of Edenballymore.—The deanery is a large unadorned brick building, erected in 1833, at the cost of £3,421 16s. 8½d., and superseding a structure which was built in 1720, by Dr. Bolton. The chapel-of-ease is situated adjacent to the city wall on the west; it contains about 240 sittings; it is a plain rectangular building, with a semicircular eastern window; and it was erected at an unascertained cost, by Bishop Barnard.—The Free Church is situated on the north side of Edenballymore; contains about 340 sittings; and was built in 1830, by Bishop Knox, at an expense of £760; and enlarged in 1832, by the addition of a gallery, at the expense of £145.—The Presbyterian meeting-house, in Meeting-house-row, was built in 1780, at the cost of about 4,000, on the site of a former place of worship; it was repaired in 1828, at the cost of £700. It contains about 2,000 sittings; and it presents a chaste and handsome front, with pediment and cornices of Dungiven stone.—The Presbyterian meeting-house in Great James-street was founded on April 27, 1835; it was built after a design by Stewart Gordon, Esq., at an estimated expense of £2,000; it measures 80 feet by 50, and contains total number, including debtors, 704; the number of recommitments, 15; and the total cost of the prison, £1,846 2s. 1d.—The District Lunatic Asylum for the counties of Londonderry, Tyrone, and Donegal, stands in the northern environs of Edenballymore, about 270 feet from the high road to Greencastle; it was built, in 1827–9, at an expense of £25,678 2s. 4d.; it presents to the Foyle a façade, consisting of a central building with pavilions, from which extend wings, with airing-sheds, terminating in angular pavilions; it measures 364 feet along the front, and 190 feet from the front to the rear; above its centre rises a turret, furnished with a clock; and its upper part forms an octagonal cupola, with sides of regularly alternating lengths, and surmounted by a vane. The whole structure is uniform with the District Asylums at Belfast and Armagh. In front of it is some ornamental planting; around is a good garden; and in the rear, are several commodious airing-yards, separated by various ranges of buildings,—the total extent of the grounds being 12 acres. The Asylum was originally built to accommodate 104 patients; but was afterwards interiorly enlarged to admit 200; and the number of its single cells is 88. The total of patients confined, on Jan. 1, 1843, was 216; and of these, 69 were from the county of Londonderry, 62 from Tyrone, and 85 from Donegal; 9 were idiots, 10 were epileptic patients, 58 were afflicted with curable mania, and 139 were afflicted with incurable mania; 112 were males and 104 were females; 88 were employed at trades, 95 were employed at other works, and 33 were unemployed from inability to work. During 1842, the average cost of each patient was £15 1s. 2d.; and the total cost of the Asylum was £3,132 1s. 5d.—The Custom-House is situated in Ship-quay-lane; it was built, in 1808–9, as a store, rented for a number of years as a king's store by government, and converted partly into a Custom-House in 1826; it is now rented, on perpetual tenure, for £1,419 4s. 6d.; and it forms a hollow quadrangle, measuring 171½ feet along the front which faces the river, and 80 feet by 57 in the interior open area. The Linen-Hall occupies an obscure situation, in Rosemary-lane, adjacent to the Shambles; it is supposed to have been built in 1770; and it consists of small dilapidated houses, surrounding a court of 147 feet by 39. The new barrack is situated in the townland of Clooney, and parish of Clondermot, on the east side of the Foyle; and was built, in 1837, at an estimated expense of £6,000. The old barrack occupied a damp site in Foyle-street, and was inadequate in both extent and accommodation.—The Theatre is a pultry structure, in an obscure situation; and was, a number of years ago, disused for dramatic purposes.—The Diocesan and Free Grammar school, also called Foyle College, is situated near the river, in the northern environs of the city, and 100 yards south of the Lunatic Asylum; it was founded in 1814, and built at the cost of £12,079 18s. 1d.; it measures 135 feet along the front, 66 feet from the front to the rear, and 47 and 40 feet in the height of respectively its centre and its wings; and it forms a simple but handsome stone edifice, consisting of a centre, two wings, and two terminating pavilions. This academy or college was founded in 1617; its business is conducted by a head-master, a second master, two classical assistants, and a language master; and it has an annual income of about £870, inclusive of £270 from pupils.—The Parish School, Poor School, or School on the Foundation of Erasmus Smith, is situated without the city; measures 54 feet by 30; is two stories high; contains separate accommodation for the sexes; and was founded, in 1812, by Bishop Knox.

“The school denominated Gwyn's Charitable Institution,” says the Ordnance Memoir of 1837, “was opened in a hired house, formerly the City hotel; but the erection of a new schoolhouse at the rear of the Infirmary, is in contemplation, intended to accommodate 200 pupils. Ten acres of ground, statute measure, have accordingly been purchased in perpetuity for £200. For the present, however, the project is deferred, in the hope of obtaining the bishop's palace, should the ecclesiastical commissioners consent to its sale. The estimates state the probable expense of the building at £6,000. The plan presents a front of 193 feet, broken in the centre by an Ionic tetrastyle portico, above which rises a cupola.”—The Lower Liberty school stands in the centre of the race-course, 2½ miles north of the city; it was built after a design by Stewart Gordon, Esq.; and it presents a handsome front of cut-stone, and has a belfry.—The Public Library and News-room is situated at the junction of Ship-quay-street and Castle-street; it was built in 1825, at the cost of £1,800 Irish; it is a plain structure, faced with red Dungiven stone; and it measures 42 feet in length, 23 in breadth, and 35 in height.—The wooden bridge across the Foyle at Londonderry was commenced in 1789, and opened for foot-passengers in 1790, and for vehicles in the spring of 1791; it was constructed by Lemuel Cox, of the firm of Cox and Thompson of Boston, in America; it measures 1,068 feet in length, and 40 in breadth; and it cost, for its original erection, £16,294 6s. “The piles of which the piers are composed, are from 14 to 18 feet long. They are made of oak, and the head of each pile is tenoned into a cap piece, 17 inches square, and 40 feet long, supported by three sets of girths and braces. The piers, which are 16½ feet asunder, are bound together by 13 string pieces equally divided, and transversely bolted; on the string pieces is laid the flooring. On each side of the platform there is a railing 4½ feet high, and a broad foot way, provided with gas lamps. At one quarter of the length of the bridge, measured towards its western extremity, a turning-bridge has been constructed in place of the original draw-bridge; some contrivance of this kind is necessary, the inhabitants of Strabane having a right to the free navigation of the Foyle. There is a toll-house at the end next to the city. The city and its reservoirs being at opposite sides of the river, the water has to be conveyed across the bridge. As both the water and the gas pipes pass along the bridge, it is necessary that they should be separated whenever it is opened for the passage of barges. This is effected in the water pipes by compass-joints at the side of the draw-opening round which turn two moveable pieces of the pipes, being drawn up by a wheel and pinion, acting on a chain. Stop-cocks at each side cut off the communication of the water during the operation, and the pipes, when lowered, meeting in a ball or socket-joint, &c., must form an oblique angle, the vertex being upwards. In the gas pipes the separation is effected by a moveable piece bent at right angles at each end, and thus capping, as it were, the end of the stationary pipes, also bent at right angles in an opposite direction, being made air-tight by a screw tube. On the 6th of February, 1814, a portion of the bridge, extending to 350 feet, was carried away by the large masses of ice which had been floated down the river by the ebb-tide, and a very high wind. Before the corporation disposed of their interest in the bridge, they contemplated the erection of a new one. Plans and estimates were procured, and soundings of the river were taken. According to Sir John Rennie, the cost of a suspension-bridge would have been £56,900; of one of cast-iron, with three promoting religious, moral, and historical information, and possessing a library of about 500 works; the Londonderry Tract Depository, with receipts of between £40 and £50 a-year; the Religious, Moral, and Historical Library connected with one of the Presbyterian Congregations; the Depository of the Sunday School Society; the Londonderry Auxiliary Bible Society, with a gratuitous annual income of about £26, and a total amount of receipts of between £100 and £110; the Londonderry Ladies' Association, auxiliary to the London Missionary and the Irish Evangelical Societies, with receipts of about £30 a-year; the Londonderry City Mission, with an income of about £40, and employing one stated agent; the Londonderry Branch of the Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Home Missionary Society; the Londonderry Branch of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society; the Londonderry Auxiliary to the Western Australian Missionary Society; the Londonderry Auxiliary to the Irish Society for promoting the Education of the native Irish through the medium of their own language; the Temperance Society; the Tee-Total Temperance Society; and Londonderry Auxiliaries to the Association for Discouraging Vice, the London Hibernian Society, the Church Missionary Society, the Scottish Missionary Society, and the Howard Society.

Charitable Institutions.—Gwyn's Charitable Institution, already noticed both in the section on Civil Public Buildings, and in that on Instruction, was founded by will of Mr. John Gwyn, who died in 1829, and bequeathed property worth £40,000, for the feeding, clothing, and educating of the poorest male children in the city and precincts of Londonderry, with an uniform preference of orphans, and of such children as have lost one parent; and, in 1836, it lodged, clothed, and dieted 81 boys. The other charitable institutions and funds which existed in the city in 1836, were the Clergymen's Widows' Fund, instituted in 1729, supported by one per cent on the nett income of subscribers, and by the interest on the accumulated capital, and affording £35 a-year to each widow; the Savings' Bank, instituted in 1816; the Charitable Loan Fund, instituted in 1809, issuing loans to the amount of about £800 a-year, and supported by £10 a-year from the Irish Society, and £15 5s. from the members for the city and county; the Ladies' Penny Society, instituted in 1815, for the relief of the industrious poor, and of sick and indigent room-keepers, and supported by about £37 a-year from the Irish Society, by about £111 from subscriptions, donations, and legacies, and by occasional fines; the Flax Fund, or Spinning Fund, instituted in 1817, for the employment of the poor by giving 10d. a spangle for spinning yarn, and supported by about £24 a-year from the Irish Society, by about £75 from donations, legacies, balls, and sermons, and by occasional fines; the Poor Shop, instituted in 1821, for selling clothes and bedding to the poor at prime cost, and supported by about £15 a-year from the Irish Society, and £30 from subscription; the Mendicity Association, instituted in 1825, for employing street-beggars, and relieving the labouring poor, and supported by about £30 a-year from the Irish Society, by occasional fines, and by nearly £1000 a-year from other sources; the Penitentiary, instituted in 1829, for reforming penitent prostitutes, and supported by £10 a-year from the Irish Society, £10 10s. from the Drapers' Society, and about £100 from subscriptions, donations, and the produce of labour; Stanley's Charity, commenced in 1755, by bequest of Alderman Peter Stanley, now worth £60 a-year, and the interest of £150 in bank, and employed in the distribution of alms among 30 poor inhabitants of the city and its north-western liberties; Evory's Charity, commenced in 1831, by bequest of Miss Margaret Evory, worth £20 a-year, and employed in the distribution of alms among the poor of the parish; Riddall's Charity, commenced in 1836, by benefaction of Hans Riddall, Esq., of interest on £200 to be employed as alms to 4 poor persons of religious character; and various congregational collections, for the distribution of alms among the poor. In 1842, the Savings' Bank had 666 depositors. At the close of 1841, the Loan Fund had a capital of £3,111; and, during that year, it circulated £16,314 in 4,071 loans, cleared a nett profit of £302 4s. 2d., and expended for charitable purposes £50.

Poor-law Union.—The Londonderry Poor-law union ranks as the 8th; and was declared on Jan. 17, 1839. It lies partly in co. Londonderry, and partly in co. Donegal; and comprehends an area of 139,180 acres, which, in 1831, contained a pop. of 65,326. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are the City and Suburbs of Londonderry, 13,750; the Upper Liberties of Londonderry, 1,824; the Lower Liberties of Londonderry, 4,236; Waterside, 3,331; Lough Enagh, 2,648; Muff, 2,910; Tamnaherin, 3,094; Glendermot, 3,188; Ardmore, 1,975; Bond's Glen, 2,369; Clady, 2,202; Ballymullins, 2,767; Banagher, 2,435; Kilderry, 2,475; Three Trees, 1,275; Birdstown, 1,685; Faughan, 2,684; Inch Island, 1,068; Burt, 2,508; Newtown-Conyngham, 1,850; Castle-Forward, 2,258; and Killea, 2,974. The number of ex-officio guardians is 9; and of elected guardians, 27. The total number of tenements valued is 6,835; and of these, 2,208 are valued under £5,—500, under £6,—378, under £7,—287, under £8,—284, under £9,—230, under £10,—438, under £12,—335, under £14,—96, under £15,—167, under £16,—224, under £18,—161, under £20,—340, under £25,—250, under £30,—353, under £40,—205, under £50,—and 379, at and above £50. In the city of Londonderry section, the total nett annual value of the property rated is £36,262; the total number of persons rated is 2,522; and of these, 61 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—136, not exceeding £2,—249, not exceeding £3,—378, not exceeding £4,—and 273, not exceeding £5. In the country section, the total nett annual value of the property rated is £75,405, the total number of persons rated is 4,475; and of these, 112 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—218, not exceeding £2,—257, not exceeding £3,—303, not exceeding £4,—and 312, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on June 24, 1839,—to be completed in Sept. 1840,—to cost £6,780 for building and completion, and £1,157 14s. 2d. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 6 acres, 6 perches, purchased for £762 5s. 10d.,—and to accommodate 800 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Nov. 10, 1840; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £6,418 14s. 9d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,896 2s. 1d. The number of paupers in the workhouse, on Dec. 2, 1842, was 297. The guardians meet at the workhouse, at noon of every Saturday. The Medical Charities within the union are the County Infirmary and Fever Hospital at Londonderry, and dispensaries at Burt, Clady, Lower Cumber, Londonderry, Glendermot, St. Johnstown, Muff of Londonderry, and Muff of Donegal. In 1839, these charities received £100 1s. 6d. from subscription, £2,348 13s. 7d. from public grants, and £100 2s. 3d. from other sources,—all, £3,112 17s. 4d.; they expended £630 15s. 1d. in salaries to medical officers, £375 5s. for medicines, and £1,563 15s. 0d. for contingencies,—all, £2,539 18s. 11d.; and they administered to ture by extending still more the cultivation of flax." The average annual quantity of butter brought to market, during the 7 years preceding 1833, was 17,800 firkins; and the quantities in the years 1831 and 1832, were respectively 26,576 and 39,820 firkins. The number of sailing vessels belonging to the port in 1834, was 42, of aggregately 5,677 tons, and 338 men; and the number of steam-vessels in 1837, was 6, of aggregately 1,063 tons, and 74 men. In 1837, the number of vessels which entered the port from foreign places was 46, of aggregately 8,385 tons, and 397 men; and coastwise, 678, of aggregately 79,935 tons, and 5,345 men; the number of vessels which left the port for foreign places was 15, of aggregately 4,886 tons, and 216 men; and coastwise 543, of aggregately 66,260 tons, and 4,646 men. The vessels registered at the port on Dec. 31, 1843, were 8 sailing vessels, each under 50 tons, and aggregately of 206 tons; 18 sailing vessels, each upwards of 50 tons, and aggregately of 5,593 tons; and 7 steam-vessels, each upwards of 50 tons, and aggregately of 1,551 tons. During the year ending on Dec. 31, 1843, the vessels which entered coastwise were 462 sailing vessels of aggregately 32,069 tons; and 168 steam-vessels of 42,640 tons; those which cleared coastwise were 364 sailing vessels of 25,067 tons, and 165 steam-vessels of 39,475 tons; those which entered from the colonies were 18 sailing vessels of 5,363 tons; those which cleared for the colonies were 16 sailing vessels of 5,566 tons; those which entered from foreign ports were 22 British vessels of 2,938 tons, and 7 foreign vessels of 808 tons; and those which cleared for foreign ports were 12 British vessels of 6,417 tons, and 8 foreign vessels of 1,781 tons. The customs of Londonderry and Ballyraine amounted, in 1830, to £72,911 11s. 4½d.; and in 1836, to £99,652 3s. 7d.; and the excise duties of 1830, to £70,542 5s. 10½d.; and of 1836, to £79,775 0s. 7d. The estimated amount of inland carriage to the town is 7,950 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 5,350 tons of agricultural produce for the local use of brewers and distillers, 37,000 tons of agricultural produce for exportation, 150 tons of exciseable goods not received by direct importation, 7,950 tons of stone, lime, &c.; and of inland carriage from the town, 54,400 tons of imported goods, 4,800 tons of the produce of breweries and distilleries, and 8,300 tons of coals, manure, &c. Fairs are held on June 17, Sept. 4, and Oct. 17. A weekly market for grain, meal, cattle, and every description of farm produce except flax, is held on Wednesday; for flax, on Thursday; and for farm produce, except cattle and flax, on Saturday. The hotels and principal inns are the City Hotel, in Ship-quay-street; the Commercial Hotel, in Ship-quay; Floyd's Hotel, in Ship-quay-street; White Hart Hotel, in Foyle-street; Wilson's Hotel, in Foyle-street; and Tyrkeeran Arms Hotel, in Waterside. The public conveyances, at the close of 1843, were a steam-packet to Liverpool, every Tuesday; a steam-packet to Fleetwood-on-Wyre, on every Tuesday and Friday; and a steam-packet to Campbelltown, Greenock, and Glasgow, on every Tuesday and Thursday; a daily mail-coach to Dublin, by way of Strabane, Omagh, and Monaghan; a daily mail-coach to Belfast, by way of Newtownlimavaddy, Coleraine, and Antrim; a stage-coach to Belfast, thrice a week; a car to Belfast, thrice a week, but on alternate days with the stage-coach; a car to Sligo; a car to Omagh; a daily car to Strabane; and mail-cars to Dungiven, Newtownlimavaddy, Buncrana, Moville, and Carndonagh. The Banking Offices are branches of the Bank of Ireland, the Belfast Banking Company, and the Provincial Bank, in Ship-quay-street; the Northern Banking Company, in Magazine-street; and the Ulster Banking Company, in Foyle-street.

Municipal Affairs.]—Londonderry has charters of 2 James I., 11 James I., Oliver Cromwell, 14 Charles II., and 4 James II. The corporation is styled, "The Mayor and Commonalty and Citizens of the City of Londonderry;" and consisted, according to recent practice in the old borough, of 12 aldermen, including the mayor, 24 burgesses or chief burgesses, including a chamberlain, and an indefinite number of freemen; and the officers were the mayor, the aldermen, the burgesses, two sheriffs, a recorder, a chamberlain, who was always a burgess, a town-clerk, a prothonotary, a clerk of the peace, coroners, a sword-bearer, a mace-bearer, 4 sergeants-at-mace, and a weighmaster. The municipal government, since the recent date of municipal reform, is vested in a mayor elected by the corporation, 6 aldermen elected by the borough in the three districts, called the North, the East, and the South wards, 18 councillors elected by the borough in the three wards, 4 borough magistrates appointed by the Lord-lieutenant, and the magistrates for the county, whose jurisdiction extends over the city. The mayor is a magistrate for the county during his mayoralty; and holds a court of record, with pleas to an unlimited amount, and a court of conscience for pleas under £20. The city is the seat of the assizes for the county, and of courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions; and the head-quarters of a constabulary district, which comprises the three stations of Londonderry, Claudy, and Muff. The lighting, cleansing, and watching of the city, are managed by a police committee, constituted under the Act 2 and 3 William, c. 107, and consisting of the mayor and 12 other inhabitants, chosen by ballot. The streets are maintained in good order, and well lighted with gas; and the city is supplied with water from a tank or reservoir on the Quay-Brace Head, above the Waterside. The total rent roll of the corporate property in 1831, held by lease from the Irish Society for 61 years, at a chief rent of £600 11s. 5d., amounted to £2,019 3s. 2d. The revenues of the corporation, as exhibited in their accounts up to the close of 1833, were derived from pontage, tonnage, quayage, rents, town's customs, and market-tolls, and aggregately amounted, during the 20 years 1804—1833, to £174,027 1s. 2½d.; and their expenditure was classified under the words Bridge, Quays, Salaries, Charities, Contingencies, Rent, Pensions, and Interest, and aggregately amounted, during the 20 years 1804—1833, to £229,527 13s. 6½d. The city sends one member to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1841, 906; of whom 711 were £10 house-holders, and 195 were freemen, &c.

Statistics.]—Area of the Templemore section of the city, 406 acres; of the Clondermot section, 91 acres. Pop. of the Templemore section, in 1831, 10,130; in 1841, 14,530. Houses 2,005. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 503; in manufactures and trade, 1,612; in other pursuits, 330. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 162; on the directing of labour, 1,467; on their own manual labour, 804; on means not specified, 112. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,303; who could read but not write, 1,106; who could neither read nor write, 1,279. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,372; who could read but not write, 2,456; who could neither read nor write, 2,321. Pop. of the Clondermot section, in 1841, 686. Houses 105. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 30; in manufactures and trade, 73; in other pursuits, 15. the eagerness of a man inspired, they discovered three ships in the lake making way to the town. Kirk, who had abandoned them from the 13th day of June to the 30th of July, at length thought fit, in their extreme distress, to make a hazardous attempt to relieve them; an attempt which he might have made with less danger at the moment of his arrival, and which possibly might still have been deferred, had he not received some intimations of a treaty for surrendering. Two ships laden with provisions, and convoyed by the Dartmouth frigate, advanced in view both of the garrison and the besiegers. On this interesting object they fixed their eyes in all the earnestness of suspense and expectation. The enemy, from their batteries, from their musketry, thundered furiously on the ships, which returned their fire with spirit. The foremost of the victuallers struck rapidly against the boom and broke it, but, rebounding with violence, ran aground. The enemy burst instantly into shouts of joy, and prepared to board her; on the crowded walls the garrison stood stupified by despair. The vessel fired her guns, was extricated by the shock, and floated. She passed the boom, and was followed by her companions. The town was relieved, and the enemy retired.—Of seven thousand five hundred men regimented in Derry, four thousand three hundred only remained to be witnesses of this deliverance; and of these more than one thousand were incapable of service. The wretched spectres had scarcely tasted food when they had the hardiness to march in quest of the enemy; and some few men were lost by adventuring too boldly on their rear-guard. They retired in vexation to Strabane, having lost eight thousand men by the sword and by various disorders, in a siege of one hundred and five days."

Londonderry has given titles to the noble families of Ridgeway, Pitt, and Stewart. Sir Thomas Ridgeway, the descendant of a very ancient family in Devonshire, and the planter of the first Protestant colony in the county of Londonderry, was knighted by Queen Elizabeth in June 1600, created a Baronet in November 1612, made Baron of Gallin-Ridgeway in May 1616, and advanced to the dignity of Earl of Londonderry in August 1622. The Ladies Lucy and Frances Ridgeway, on the death of the fourth Earl in 1713, became his co-heirs, and were married to the Earl of Donegal and Mr. Pitt, subsequently Earl of Londonderry.—Thomas Pitt, Esq., the descendant of an ancient family in Dorsetshire, and governor of Fort-George in the East Indies, in the time of Queen Anne, was repeatedly urged by her Majesty to accept the peerage; and though both he and his eldest son declined the honour, his second son, Thomas, who married the daughter of the Earl of Londonderry, was created Baron of Londonderry in June 1719, and advanced to the dignities of Viscount of Gallin-Ridgeway and Earl of Londonderry in the following October. Thomas, the second Earl, was killed by a fall from his horse; and his brother, Ridgeway, succeeded him, and was the last Earl of his family.—Robert Stewart, Esq., the descendant of a common ancestor with the Earl of Galloway, and of John Stewart, Esq., of Ballylawn in co. Donegal, who settled in Ireland in the reign of Charles I., was created Baron Stewart of Londonderry in 1789, Viscount Castlereagh in 1795, Earl of Londonderry in 1796, and Marquis of Londonderry in 1816. Robert, the second Marquis of Londonderry, is better known as Lord Castlereagh; he figured prominently as a statesman during 26 years; he succeeded his father as Marquis of Londonderry in April 1821, and died by suicide in Aug. 1822; and he was succeeded by his half-brother, Charles William Vane, the third Earl of Londonderry.

LONGFORD.

AN inland county of Leinster. It is situated nearly in the centre of Ireland; and is bounded, on the north-west, by Leitrim; on the north, by Cavan; on the east and south, by Westmeath; and on the west, by Roscommon. Its length of contact with Leitrim, measured in a straight line, is 10 miles; with Cavan, 9½; with Westmeath, 24½; and with Roscommon, 16½. The whole of the boundary with Roscommon is formed by the Shannon, and its expansions of Lough Forbes and Lough Ree; part of the boundary with Cavan is formed by Loughs Gouna and Kinnail; three small and far-separate distances of the boundary with Westmeath are formed by the river Inny; the terminating part of that boundary is formed by Lough Ree's eastward arm of Lough Killymore; and most of the remaining boundaries are altogether artificial. The outline of the county is nearly oblong, extending from north-north-east to south-south-west. Its greatest length is 21 miles; its greatest breadth is 13; and its area comprises 191,823 acres of arable land, 58,937 of uncultivated land, 4,610 of continuous plantations, 364 of towns, and 13,675 of water,—in all, 269,409 acres.

Surface.—The Cairn-Clonhugh hills extend about 10 miles from north-east to south-west; occupy the greater part of the district between Lough Gouna and the Shannon; possess a prevailing tame and pastoral character; and have for their chief summits, Crott in the north-east, Edenmore in the centre, and Cairn-Clonhugh in the south-west,—the first 683, the second 768, and the third 912 feet of altitude above sea-level. The peninsular district between the Shannon and the rivulet Rinn, which flows southward out of Leitrim, is much encumbered with bog; the tract between the south-west end of the Cairn-Clonhugh hills and the Shannon, is an open and well-cultivated district; and the tract between the Cairn-Clonhugh hills and Lough Gouna forms part of the upper extremity of the great basin of the Erne, and is screened by the flanks of the Cairn-Clonhugh hills rising from 200 to 400 feet of altitude above the level of the lake. Excepting Slieve-Goldry, situated 1½ mile west-south-west of Ardagh, possessing an altitude of 650 feet above sea-level, and spreading away at both sides into a considerable extent of low table-land, all the remainder of the county has a low and comparatively level surface, much diversified in some places with ranges of small eskers, broadly and dingily patched, in others with bog, and lying at most at but a trivial elevation above the winter level of the Shannon. The part of the plain which is traversed by the Camlin is very flat and well improved; and, especially along the left bank of the stream, is beautified by numerous seats and well-wooded demesnes. The district in the south-west, along Loughs Ree and Killymore, is very flat and boggy, partly relieved by some handsome demesnes and good tracts of pasture land, yet so generally unproductive that even its arable portions are liable to extensive winter-floods, which submerge several large peninsulas, and convert others into islands. The south-east district of the county, particularly around Ballymahon, is a continuation, in both natural and artificial character, of the rich plain of Westmeath, and is aggregately brilliant with the results of cultivation.

Waters.—The Shannon, in consequence of the extent and intricacy of its lacustrine expansions, has a coast-line of contact with the county of not less than 50 miles; it contributes to the water-area of the new-comers, upwards of 13,000 acres to members of the O'Farrel family, and all the remainder in parcels among the old inhabitants,—the Crown reserving to itself a rent of 3d. per acre on the new grants. In 1641, the whole county, with the exception of the castles of Longford and Castle-Forbes, was seized by the O'Farrels; and, after the close of the rebellion, it was nearly confiscated, and distributed among new proprietors.

LONGFORD, a barony in the north-west of the county of Longford, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north and east, by the barony of Granard; on the south-east, by the barony of Ardagh; on the south, by the baronies of Ardagh and Moydoo; on the west, by the county of Roscommon; and on the north-west, by the county of Leitrim. Its length, south-westward, is 14½ miles; its breadth is from 1½ to 10½; and its area is 58,139 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches,—of which 1,225 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches are water. The surface includes the greater part of the Cairn-Clonhugh Hills, the greater part of the left side of the valley of the Camlin, the whole of the richly wooded grounds of Castle-Forbes, and the belt of low ground, alternately boggy and green, along the Shannon, from the point of the river's first contact with the county, to a point two miles below the mouth of the Camlin; and it, in consequence, presents great variety of appearance, and possesses great variety of character. The Act 6 and 7 William IV. c. 84, transferred two townlands of the parish of Mohill from the barony of Mohill co. Leitrim to this barony,—pop., in 1841, 14; 1 townland of Templemichael from Ardagh to this barony,—pop. 62; and three townlands of Mohill from this barony to the barony of Mohill in Leitrim,—pop. 137.—This barony, as at present constituted, contains the whole of the parish of Clongesh, and part of the parishes of Killashee, Killoe, Mohill, and Templemichael. Its towns and chief villages are Newtown-Forbes, Cloondara, Drumlish, and part of Longford. Pop., in 1831, 26,672; in 1841, 27,951. Houses 4,673. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,874; in manufactures and trade, 746; in other pursuits, 336. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,753; who could read but not write, 2,122; who could neither read nor write, 5,243. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,656; who could read but not write, 3,056; who could neither read nor write, 7,589.—The barony of Longford lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Longford. The total number of tenements valued is 4,966; and of these, 2,869 are valued under £5,—1,261, under £10,—375, under £15,—187, under £20,—85, under £25,—47, under £30,—51, under £40,—31, under £50,—and 60, at and above £50.

LONGFORD, a barony on the eastern border of co. Galway, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north-west, by the barony of Kilconnel; on the north, by the barony of Clonmacnoo; on the north-east, by the county of Roscommon and King's co.; on the south-east, by King's co. and the county of Tipperary; on the south, by the head of Lough Derg; and on the south-west and west, by the barony of Leitrim. Its length, westward, is 15½ miles; its breadth is from 3 to 14 miles; and its area is 99,504 acres, 7 perches,—of which 3,150 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches are water. The river Suck down to its confluence with the Shannon, and the river Shannon thence to Lough Derg, trace the whole of the boundary with co. Roscommon, King's co., and co. Tipperary. A very large proportion of the surface, particularly in the north, is bog; and though undulations and little ridges of the kind called eskers, afford some relief from the monotony of the general flatness, no ground has a greater altitude above sea-level than 348 feet. The whole or most of the great plain amidst which the barony lies, is panoramically seen from some rising grounds in the interior; and, in spite of its vast aggregate of bog, presents a not unpleasing appearance,—particularly in the south, where it is lusciously relieved by the woods of the noble demesne of Portumna, and grandly foiled by the picturesque and far-spreading expanse of Lough Derg.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Clonfert, Donanaghda, Fahy, Kilmallinoge, Kilquane, Kiltormer, Lickmahoy, Meelick, and Tiranasragh, and part of the parishes of Abbeygormacan, Clontuskert, Dunery, Killymorebullogue, Killoran, and Tynagh. Its towns and principal villages are Portumna, Eyrecoart, Laurencetown, Killymore, Kiltormer, and Clondra. Pop., in 1831, 33,648; in 1841, 33,069. Houses 5,365. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,536; in manufactures and trades, 859; in other pursuits, 526. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,284; who could read but not write, 1,958; who could neither read nor write, 8,138. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,814; who could read but not write, 2,197; who could neither read nor write, 10,662.—The barony of Longford lies partly within the Poor-law union of Ballinasloe, and partly within that of Loughrea. The total number of tenements valued is 5,459; and of these, 3,156 are valued under £5,—1,312, under £10,—449, under £15,—167, under £20,—87, under £25,—57, under £30,—59, under £40,—35, under £50,—and 135, at and above £50.

LONGFORD,

A post and market town, the capital of the county of Longford, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Templemichael, and partly in the barony of Longford, but chiefly in the barony of Ardagh, co. Longford, Leinster. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Sligo, 2½ miles south-south-east of Newtown-Forbes, 6½ west-north-west of Edgeworthstown, 8 north-east of Lanesborough, 10 north of Ballymahon, 11 west-south-west of Granard, 20½ north-west by west of Mullingar, 2½ north by east of Athlone, and 59½ west-north-west of Dublin.

General Description.—The town stands on the river Camlin, amidst a plain which exhibits a chequered series of demesnes, meadows, arable land, bogs, and swamps. The demesne of Carrickglass, in the vicinity, is a very fine residence, and displays a large amount of both diversity and beauty. The town is the most thriving and important seat of population between Dublin and Sligo; it owes much to the judgment and liberality of its late proprietor, the Earl of Longford; and it is well built, and has a cheerful and prosperous appearance. The Main-street is 850 yards in length, and extends south-west from the margin of the Camlin, and within the barony of Ardagh; a street of about 560 yards in length, extends parallel with the river, and on the same side as the Main-street; and three other streets, also on the same side, have a length of respectively 430, 320, and 300 yards. The portion of the town on the north bank of the river, and within the barony of Longford, contains the bow barrack, the artillery barrack, the gaol, and other public buildings.

Public Buildings.—The church of Longford is a handsome and spacious modern structure, built at a large cost, and serving for the benefice of Templemichael: which see.—The Presbyterian and the Roman IV., cap. 12. The corporate property of the town was never of much consequence. The corporation sent two members to the Irish parliament, but were disfranchised at the Legislative Union.

Statistics, &c.—Area of the barony of Longford section of the town, 95 acres; of the barony of Ardagh section, 121 acres. Pop. of the barony of Longford section, in 1831, 874; in 1841, 839. Houses 98. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 44; in manufactures and trade, 45; in other pursuits, 65. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 21; on the directing of labour, 52; on their own manual labour, 58; on means not specified, 23. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 185; who could read but not write, 71; who could neither read nor write, 117. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 119; who could read but not write, 103; who could neither read nor write, 170. Pop. of the barony of Ardagh section, in 1831, 3,642; in 1841, 4,127. Houses 613. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 265; in manufactures and trade, 414; in other pursuits, 176. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 62; on the directing of labour, 409; on their own manual labour, 344; on means not specified, 40. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 909; who could read but not write, 263; who could neither read nor write, 549. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 542; who could read but not write, 476; who could neither read nor write, 920.—Longford has given the title of Earl to the noble families of Aungier and Pakenham. The earldom, as possessed by the former of these families, became extinct at the death of Ambrose Aungier, the second Earl, in 1704. Thomas Pakenham, Esq., the nephew-in-law of that Earl, was created Baron Longford in 1756; his lady was advanced to the dignity of Viscountess in 1785; and their grandson, Thomas, the third Lord, inhabited the earldom of Longford at the death of his grandmother, the Countess Elizabeth, in 1794, and was made Baron Silchester in the peerage of Great Britain in 1821. The Hon. Catherine Pakenham, the daughter of Edward, second Lord Longford, married the Duke of Wellington in 1806, and died in 1831. The family-seats are Longford Castle in the county of Longford, and Pakenham Hall in the county of Westmeath.

LONG-ISLAND, an island in the parish of Skull, western division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It lies off the south-west side of the entrance of Skull Harbour; and extends in the direction of south-west by west, or nearly parallel with the coast, at a mean distance of about 3 furlongs from the coast, and, at its upper end, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of the village of Skull. Its length is 2 miles; and its extreme breadth is half-a-mile. It is tolerably well cultivated; and has a coast-guard station. Its former name was Inisfadda, or the Island of Dogs.

LONG ROCK, a cluster of rocks $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile in extent from north to south, and lying at an extreme distance of nearly a mile from the coast, opposite Ballywalter, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It has often been fatal to sailors.

LONGWOOD, a village in the parish of Clonard, barony of Upper Moyferagh, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the western margin of the parish, within $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile of the Royal Canal, and $1\frac{1}{4}$ of the mail-road from Dublin to Galway; but is not immediately touched by any great thoroughfare. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel and a post-office, and is a constabulary station. Fairs are held on February 2, April 28, July 12, and December 11. The Roman Catholic parish of Longwood is in the dio. of Meath, and has chapels at Longwood and Killyen. Area of the village, 45 acres. Pop., in 1831, 425; in 1841, 587. Houses 117. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 81; in manufactures and trade, 33; in other pursuits, 9. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 29; on their own manual labour, 86; on means not specified, 5.

LOOP-HEAD, a cape at the south-west extremity of the parish of Kilballyowen, barony of Moyferta, and county of Clare, Munster. It screens the north side of the mouth of the Shannon, and lifts its summit to the height of 232 feet above sea-level. A lighthouse on Loop-Head displays a fixed light, and cost, during the year 1840, the sum of £685 0s. 4d.

LORRHA, a parish in the extreme north-west of the barony of Lower Ormond, and of co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, westward, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles; extreme breadth, $5\frac{1}{4}$; area, 16,520 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches,—of which 542 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches are in Lough Derg, 10 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches in Lough Frier, and 298 acres, 10 perches are in the river Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 3,995; in 1841, 4,742. Houses 748. The surface has nearly the outline of an isosceles triangle, and is bounded along the whole of the west side by the Shannon and Lough Derg. The post-town is Portumna, on the Connaught bank of the Shannon. The parochial surface is low, flat, naturally featureless, and considerably encumbered with bog; yet it possesses a large amount of meadowy, arable, and sylvan dress. The seats are Sheseraghmore-house, Kilcorren-house, Firville, Ballyquirk-castle, Ashpark, Abbeyville, Somerset-house, Lackeen-house, Portland-house, Grange-house, Moatfield-house, Castleview, Ballymacreeghouse, and Peelish,—the last, an old place belonging to the noble family of Avonmore, and situated on a peninsula formed by an arm of Lough Derg. Among the antiquities are ruins of two churches and five old castles,—three of the latter called Cromwell's, Iretton's, and Derry. The villages are Lorrha, 3 miles east of Portumna; Ferry, on the Shannon, opposite Portumna; Bunnahautia, on the south border; Newtown, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-west of Lorrha; and Upper Kilcross and Lower Kilcross, in the north. Area of Lorrha village, 19 acres. Pop., in 1831, 195; in 1841, 312. Houses 52. Fairs are held on February 18, May 19, September 23, and November 19. This village was, about 16 years ago, a very poor hamlet; but has been lifted into comparative prosperity by the spirited exertions of its proprietor, Mr. Toone; yet, in consequence of the disadvantageousness of its situation, it can hardly be ever made a town of any great importance. Tradition says that the ancient or original Lorrha was a town of considerable size, situated on a rising ground not much more than a hundred perches south of the site of the present village; and this tradition is so far supported by facts, that the alleged locality was traversed by the direct road from Nenagh to Banagher, and still exhibits some traces of streets. Lorrha abbey, situated on the south-east side of the present village, is a tolerably well preserved ruin of an ecclesiastical edifice, about whose foundation history is silent, but whose style of architecture seems to belong to about the commencement of the 12th century. It is an oblong, uncompact pile, 120 feet by 24 within the walls, and about 26 feet high in the side walls. The windows are well-proportioned, and have stone mullions which fork or ramify at the top; and over most of them are partly flat arches, badly executed, yet capable of supporting a weight which would probably be too great for the graceful ones beneath.

dio. of Meath, wholly appropriated to the see of Meath, but forming part of the perpetual curacy of NOBBER: which see. Tithe composition, £111 11s. 7½d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 502; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

LOUGH BRAY. See BRAY.

LOUGHBRICKLAND, a post-town in the parish of Aghaderg, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Belfast, 2 miles south-south-west of Banbridge, 8½ north of Newry, 21½ south-south-west of Belfast, and 58½ north of Dublin. It consists principally of stone houses, neatly dashed and slated, and has a cheerful and prosperous appearance. The glebe of Aghaderg, Loughbrickland-lake, Loughbrickland-house, and two or three bleaching-greens, form a cordon of interesting objects round the town, and render the close views of it agreeable. Loughbrickland-lake lies on the south, and has an area of about 119 acres; and Loughbrickland-house is situated on the north, and is the seat of N. C. Whyte, Esq. The public buildings either in the town or in its immediate vicinity, are the parish-church of Aghaderg, a Presbyterian meeting-house, two school-houses, a Roman Catholic chapel, and the ruins of a monastery. Some associations connected with the town are noticed in the article AGHADERG: which see. Fairs are held on Nov. 12, and the third Tuesday of every other month. Area of the town, 42 acres. Pop., in 1831, 618; in 1841, 647. Houses 122. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 36; in manufactures and trade, 69; in other pursuits, 27. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 58; on their own manual labour, 61; on means not specified, 4.

LOUGH-CONN. See CONN (LOUGH).

LOUGHCOOTER, a lake, and a demesne, in the barony of Kiltartan, co. Galway, Connaught. It extends 2½ miles south-south-westward; has a surface elevation of 116 feet above sea-level; lies partly in the parish of Kilbeacounty, but chiefly in that of Beagh; and has an area of 247 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches in the former parish, and 742 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches in the latter. The demesne is the brilliant residence of Viscount Gort; it extends principally around the west and south shores of the lake; and it combines with the noble sheet of water, and its northern and eastern screens, to produce a series of alternately beautiful and magnificent scenes. Loughcooter-castle, the mansion of Lord Gort, rises grandly over the south-west margin of the lake, 3 miles south by east of the town of Gort. Though not remarkable for size, it possesses much of the boldness of feature and picturesqueness of outline which constitute the main charm of castellated architecture; it was erected only about 20 years ago; it commands a thrilling prospect across the circumjacent demesne and lake, away to the skyline of the Slieve-Baughta mountains; and both it and the entrance lodges—which harmonize with it in style—were built after designs by Mr. Nash.

LOUGHCREW, a parish in the barony of Demifore, 2½ miles south by east of Oldcastle, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, southward, 4½ miles; breadth, from 1 to 3½; area, 5,981 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches,—of which 15 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,394; in 1841, 1,412. Houses 256. The surface consists of good land; and is disposed, to the extent of about one-fourth of its whole area, in the richly wooded and superb demesne of Loughcrew, the property and residence of J. L. W. Naper, Esq. Lough Creevie, which gives name to the parish, lies like a gem in the southern part of the de-mesne; and has within its watery circle a small, wild, green island. A green level field in the vicinity of the venerable parish-church is alleged to have been the site of an ancient town; on a spot adjoining is a moat; and on Newtown-hill,—one of three heights which form a fine back-ground to the view from the church,—is a large sloping, reddish-coloured stone, which the peasantry assert to have been a Druidical altar. Newtown-hill commands an extensive prospect over portions of five counties; and lifts the eye, in particular, to the arresting though distant objects of the round tower near Kells, and the Ben or Bin of Fore. The mansion of Loughcrew is a magnificent edifice, erected at an enormous expense, since 1820; and the grounds around it are highly improved, and singularly beautiful. "Loughcrew," says Mr. Fraser, "is situated near the centre of the hilly district which forms so remarkable a feature in the country, and strikes the traveller so forcibly after the flat country lying between it and Dublin. The bold and finely varied surface contrast distinguishes this demesne from the numerous seats in the adjoining parts of Meath and Westmeath; and these fortuitous circumstances have been appreciated by the munificent proprietor. The splendid modern Grecian mansion, from designs by Cockerell of London, is situated on a fine natural terrace, and commands good views of many of the rising plantations which sweep around the adjacent hills."—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £83 1s. 6½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Edward Rotheram, Esq. The vicarages of LOUGHCREW and DIAMORE, and the rectories of CLONABRENY and MOYLLOUGH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Loughcrew. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 4,658. Gross income, £419 13s. 10d.; nett, £280 5s. 10d. Patron, the Crown. The church is a very old structure. Seats 250; attendance, about 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Oldcastle. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 155, and the Roman Catholics to 1,285; the Protestants of the union to 403, and the Roman Catholics to 4,407; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 50 children; 3 pay daily schools in the parish had on their books 118 boys and 40 girls; and 5 daily schools in the union had on their books 175 boys and 77 girls.

LOUGH DERG. See DERG.

LOUGH ESK. See ESK.

LOUGHFAY, a small lake, and a demesne, in the barony of Farney, co. Monaghan, Ulster. The lake is about 5 furlongs in length, and lies partly within the parish of Magheross, but chiefly within that of Magheraclone. The mansion—a new, handsome, Elizabethan structure, and the seat of E. J. Shirley, Esq.—stands at the north end of the lake, and within the parish of Magheraclone, 1½ mile south-south-west of Carrickmacross. Extensive improvements have been effected throughout not only the circumjacent demesne, but the attached estate.

LOUGHGALL, a parish partly in the barony of Armagh, but chiefly in that of West O'Neilland, co. Armagh, Ulster. The barony of Armagh section contains the town of CHARLEMONT [which see], and the O'Neilland section contains the village of Loughgall. Length of the parish, southward, 7½ miles; breadth, from 3 furlongs to 4½ miles. Area of the barony of Armagh section, 2,440 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches; of the O'Neilland section, 8,474 acres, 3 roods, 1 perch,—of which 59 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches are water. improvements made in a bog by Mr. Robinson, a surveyor, behind a pretty ornamental lodge which he occupied at the west end of the village, are an instructive specimen of what may, on even a small scale, be achieved in bog reclamation. The lake of Loughglynn is nearly an Irish mile in length, and has a surface elevation of 284 feet above sea-level. Its bosom is gemmed with a thickly wooded islet; and its margin is screened by smooth green banks, which slope softly down to the water, or are diversified with trees. The mansion of Loughglynn, the seat of Viscount Dillon, stands on the north side of the lake, in the midst of an extensive and richly wooded demesne. The edifice is massive, and, as seen from the south side of the lake, has a very grand appearance; but the roof is in the old French system, much elevated, with double slopes in different planes, and decidedly mars the otherwise pleasing effect of the building. The main entrance is on the north side; but a door opens on the south side, to a long flight of steps leading out to the lawn and the lake, and is flanked, both below and in the upper story, with angular bay windows. The remains of the old castle of Loughglynn, once a structure of considerable strength and extent, but carried largely away for the construction of the present mansion, stand among the woods on the south side of the lake. Loughglynn demesne has been "compared to an oasis in the desert, as the country around, as far as the eye can reach, though somewhat relieved on the south by the hilly ridge of Slievealun, is naked and boggy." The village of Loughglynn stands on the south side of the lake, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Castlereagh, and 6 south-west of Frenchpark. It contains some good houses, and one or two shops; but only 4 or 5 of the houses are higher than one story. Fairs are held on May 25, July 29, Sept. 12, Oct. 14, and Dec. 19. The Loughglynn dispensary is within the Poor-law union of Castlereagh, and serves for a district of 25,043 acres, with a pop. of 9,230; and, in 1839-40, it expended £121 12s. 04d., and made 2,998 dispensations of medicine. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1831, 254; in 1841, 302. Houses 55.—Loughglynn parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Elphin. Glebe, £12. Gross income, £96 4s. 6d.; nett £90 2s. 6d. Patron, the incumbent of Tibohine. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilnemanagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 119, and the Roman Catholics to 10,617; and there was no school.

LOUGHGUILLE, LOUGHGILL, or LOUGHGELL, a parish, partly in the barony of Kileonway, but chiefly in that of Upper Dunluce, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Ballymoney, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, southward, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $5\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Kileonway section, 6,466 acres, 32 perches; of the Dunluce section, 23,373 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches,—of which 59 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 6,889; * in 1841, 6,082. Houses 1,055. Pop. of the Dunluce section, in 1831, 6,264; in 1841, 5,499. Houses 945. Nearly one-third of the surface is wild and boggy pasture; and the arable land has a light gravelly soil. The lake which gives name to the parish lies a little west of the centre; and is surrounded with the romantic and wooded demesne of Lissanoure, the seat of G. Macartney, Esq., and formerly the residence of the late Earl Macartney. The other objects of interest are Love's Castle, and the mansion of Checker Hill. A dispensary at the hamlet of Loughguile is within the Ballymoney Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 42,029 acres, with a population of 11,001; and, in 1839-40, it expended £71 0s. 1d., and administered to 761 patients. Fairs are held on Feb. 19, Aug. 19, and Nov. 19. The road from Ballymena to Ballycastle passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition and gross income, £515; nett, £433 14s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built about 67 years ago, principally at the private expense of the late Earl Macartney. Sittings 250; attendance, from 50 to 140. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 750 to 800. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 412 Churchmen, 2,896 Presbyterians, and 3,245 Roman Catholics; 7 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 561 children; a pay daily school at Knockahollet was attended on the average by 40 children; and eight other daily schools—one of which was salaried with £3 from the rector—had on their books 277 boys and 95 girls. In 1840, the National Board had a school at Magherahowey, salaried with £12; one at Keraghrun, with £10; one at Clintynan, with £4; and one at Ballynagashill, with £4.

LOUGH GUR. See GUR (LOUGH).

LOUGHILL, a parish in the barony of Shamid, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Glinn, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 5,154 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,849; in 1841, 2,100. Houses 311. The surface is part of the seaboard of the Shannon's estuary, and is traversed westward by the present road and the projected railway from Limerick to Tarbert. The hills in the interior shake down the rivulet Oran toward the Shannon at the hamlet of Loughill. The views of the Shannon and its coasts are here magnificent. The culm of the Munster coal formation is supposed to have its northern outgoing in the interior of the parish. The principal mansion is Mount-Trenchard, the seat of Lord Monteagle, situated between Loughill and Shanagolden. The hamlet of Loughill stands on the Limerick and Tarbert road, and had, in 1831, a pop. of 277.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £95. The rectories of Loughill, NANTENAN, and KUFFENNY, and the vicarage of MORGANS [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Loughill, and form, with the sinecure rectories of Shanagolden, Knocknegaul, and Tomdeely, the corps of the precentorship of Limerick cathedral. Pop., in 1831, 3,455. Gross income, £754 10s. 9½d.; nett, £635 6s. 3½d.;—but these sums are exclusive of respectively £367 11s. 6d., and £349 3s. 11½d., arising from the sinecure rectories and the lands of the precentorship. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefices of Kill and Lyons in the dio. of Kildare, the sinecure rectories of Drumcliffe, Kilmaly, and Kilnemona in the dio. of Killaloe, a vicar-choralship of the cathedral of Cork, and a vicar-choralship of the Cathedral of Cloyne; and he is non-resident in Loughill. A curate has a salary and an allowance of jointly £65. The church was built in 1812, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, about 15. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killfergus. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 23, and the Roman Catholics to 1,922. A Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by from 60 to 70 children; and 2 daily schools were aided with £1 each a-year from the Roman Catholic clergyman, and had on their books 54 boys

* But the ecclesiastical returns state it at 6,579.

LOUGHRASK, a hamlet in the parish of Drumcreehy, barony of Burren, co. Clare, Munster. Pop., in 1831, 95. Houses 17.

LOUGHREA, a barony in the south of the county of Galway, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Athenry; on the east, by the barony of Leitrim; on the south, by the county of Clare; on the south-west, by the barony of Kiltartan; and on the west, by the barony of Dunkellin. Its length, southward, is 12½ miles; its breadth is from 3 to 7½ miles; and its area is 65,175 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches,—of which 784 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches are water. The northern district is low, consists in the aggregate of good land, and has, a little south of its centre, the town and lake of Loughrea. By far the greater part of the southern district is pastoral upland, consists of a portion of the Slieve-Baughta mountains, and lifts summits to the altitude of 799, 977, 1,080, and 1,207 feet above sea-level. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred 5 townlands of the parish of Killeely, one of Kilcolgan, and one of Kilconierin, from the barony of Loughrea to that of Dunkellin,—pop., in 1841, 126; 7 townlands of Ardrahan, and 2 of Kilchrist, from Dunkellin to Loughrea,—pop. 812; one of Leitrim, and one of Kilmeen, from Loughrea to Leitrim,—pop. 78; one of Kilconickny, from Athenry to Loughrea,—pop. 65; and 2 of Killinan, and one of Isertkelly, from Kiltartan to Loughrea,—pop. 150.—The barony of Loughrea, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Ardrahan, Grange, Kilchrist, Kilconickny, Kilconierin, Killoan, Killinan, Killogilleen, Kilmeen, Kilteskil, Kiltomas, and Lickerrig, and the whole of the parishes of Ballaun, Isertkelly, Killeenadeema, and Loughrea. The only town is Loughrea. Pop., in 1831, 18,503; in 1841, 18,797. Houses 3,168. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,307; in manufactures and trade, 729; in other pursuits, 414. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 107; on the directing of labour, 1,004; on their own manual labour, 2,196; on means not specified, 143. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,052; who could read but not write, 903; who could neither read nor write, 5,159. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,087; who could read but not write, 1,003; who could neither read nor write, 6,360.—The barony of Loughrea is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Loughrea, Gort, and Ballinasloe. The total number of tenements valued is 3,490; and of these, 2,406 are valued under £5,—505, under £10,—200, under £15,—126, under £20,—79, under £25,—35, under £30,—45, under £40,—31, under £50,—and 63, at and above £50.

LOUGHREA, a lake in the parishes of Loughrea and Killeenadeema, barony of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Its length, north-westward, is 1½ mile; its extreme breadth is 1 mile; its area within the two parishes is 479 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches in Loughrea, and 289 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches in Killeenadeema; and its surface elevation above sea-level is 270 feet. It is fed by various streamlets, principally from the Slieve-Baughta mountains; and it sends off its superfluous waters, in the Carnamar rivulet, toward the head of Galway bay at Kilcolgan. The lake is a bold and staring sheet of water. It contains no fish but pike; and its water is considered unfit for culinary purposes.

LOUGHREA, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, south-westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 6,436 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches,—of which 479 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches are in Loughrea lake. Pop., in 1831, 7,797; in 1841, 7,152. Houses 1,253. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,529; in 1841, 1,694. Houses 308. The surface consists, in a general view, of good arable and pasture land. The highest ground is on the east border, and has an altitude of 447 feet above sea-level. A streamlet in the north boundary has an elevation above sea-level of 232 feet; and the Carnamart, midway between the lake and the boundary, has an elevation of 253 feet. The principal residences in the country parts of the parish are Mount Pleasant, Woodmount, Summerhill, the Cottage, and Lisduff.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £131 10s. 7½d. A portion of the tithes, compounded for £23 1s. 6½d., is appropriated to the dean of Clonfert. The rectories of Loughrea and KILLEENADEEMA, and the vicarages of KILTESKILL and KILRICKILL [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Loughrea. Length, 11 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 14,333. Gross income, £517 16s. 9½d.; nett, £474 9s. 3½d. Patron, the Marquis of Clanricarde. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Santry, in the dio. of Dublin; and is non-resident in Loughrea. A curate has a salary of £150. The church was built in 1821, by means of a loan of £1,846 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance 300. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel has 3 officiates, and an attendance of 2,000; and the friary and Carmelite nunnery chapels have 5 officiates, and an attendance of respectively 1,200 and 270. There are two Roman Catholic chapels in Killeenadeema, one in Kilteskil and one in Kilrickill. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 306, and the Roman Catholics to 7,614; the Protestants of the union to 371, and the Roman Catholics to 14,011; a Protestant Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 55 children; 11 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £23 from the rector, one with £3 from the rector, £6 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, and two with respectively £20 and £40 from the National Board—had on their books 646 boys and 565 girls; and 17 daily schools in the union had on their books 852 boys and 684 girls.

LOUGHREA,

A market and post town in the parish and barony of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands at the foot of Loughrea lake, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Galway, 11 miles north-east of Gort, 13½ west-north-west of Portumna, 16½ south-west of Ballinasloe, 18 east-south-east of Galway, 27 west by south of Athlone, and 87 west of Dublin.

Environs.—“The country north of the town,” remarks Mr. Fraser, “presents a desolate and cheerless aspect. It appears like a vast plain blending with the distant sky; and the plantations connected with the different seats, though of considerable extent, appear as mere specks. Still the soil is good.

* Of this total 478 boys and 417 girls attended the two National schools.

barony of Ardee, south of the barony of Louth; the barony of Ferrard, along the south end of the county; and the barony and the town of Drogheda, upon part of the river Boyne. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred 1 townland of the parish of Ballymascanlan from Lower Dundalk to Upper Dundalk,—pop. 109; and 1 townland of the parish of Louth, from the barony of Louth to Upper Dundalk,—pop. 95; and the Act 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 108, dissolved the jurisdiction of the county of the town of Drogheda, and erected 2 townlands of the parish of Ballymakenny, and 9 whole townlands, and part of 2 other townlands of the parish of St. Peter, formerly within that jurisdiction, into the barony of Drogheda,—pop. 2,229; but it was mentioned as probable that when the Act 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 109, should be carried into effect, the barony of Drogheda so erected would be merged in the barony of Ferrard. The barony of Lower Dundalk contains 2 whole parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; the barony of Upper Dundalk, 10 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes; the barony of Louth, 5 whole parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; the barony of Ardee, 18 whole parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; the barony of Ferrard, 18 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; and the barony of Drogheda, part of 2 parishes. The towns and chief villages are, in Lower Dundalk, Carlingford, Rathcor, and Whitestown; in Upper Dundalk, Dundalk, and Blackrock; in Louth, Dromiskin, Lurgan-Green, Louth, Mullacrew, and Mansfieldstown; in Ardee, Ardee, Castle-Bellingham, Dromin, Annagassan, Greenmount, Dromgoolestown, and Staban-nan; and in Ferrard, Clogher, Collon, Dunleer, Port, Baltray, Termonfeckan, and part of Drogheda. Part of 2 parishes are in the diocese of Clogher; and all the other parishes—computed by Dr. Beaufort at 61, and said by him to contain 20 churches—are in the diocese of Armagh.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in the county was 169, of scholars 6,976, of male scholars 4,283, of female scholars 2,584, of scholars whose sex was not specified 101, of scholars connected with the Established church 1,181, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 94, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissenters 1, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 5,664, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 36;—and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 169, of scholars 7,207, of male scholars 4,377, of female scholars 2,701, of scholars whose sex was not specified 129, of scholars connected with the Established church 1,168, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 72, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissenters 1, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 5,944, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained, 22. The statistics of education and of ecclesiastical matters for 1834, are returned according to the diocesan divisions, and may be proximately estimated by reference to the article ARMAGH. At the close of 1842, there were connected with the National Board, and in full operation, 62 daily schools, conducted by 42 male and 23 female teachers, attended by 5,780 male and 4,408 female scholars, and aided during the year with £590 11s. 8d. in salaries, £99 9s. 2d. in free stock, and £133 13s. 7d. in school requisites at half-price.—In 1843, the number of committals on charges of felony, within the county, but exclusive of Drogheda, was 207; of cases before magistrates and petty-sessions, 104; and of persons committed for drunkenness under the Act 6 and 7

William IV., cap. 88, 76. Of the persons committed on charges of felony, 50 were charged with offences against the person, 65 with offences against property committed with violence, 74 with offences against property committed without violence, 3 with offences against the currency, and 15 with offences not included in these categories. Of 93, who were convicted, 6 were sentenced to transportation, 71 to imprisonment, and 3 to pay fines, and 13 were discharged on sureties or not sentenced; and of 114, who were acquitted and discharged, 84 were found not guilty on trial, 22 had no bill found against them, and 8 were not prosecuted.—On Jan. 1, 1844, the constabulary force consisted of 1 second-rate county inspector, 1 first-rate sub-inspector, 3 second-rate sub-inspectors, 1 third-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate head-constable, 5 second-rate head-constables, 28 constables, 119 first-rate sub-constables, 26 second-rate sub-constables, and 7 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining this force during the year 1843, was £8,417 5s. 0½d. A stipendiary magistrate resides at Dundalk. The assizes are held at Dundalk; quarter-sessions, at Dundalk and Ardee; and petty-sessions, at Ardee, Castle-Bellingham, Collon, Dundalk, Dunleer, Louth, Mell, Drogheda, Riverstown, and Termonfeckan. The county gaol and the infirmary are at Dundalk; the District Lunatic Asylum, to which Louth may send 21 patients, is at Dublin; a bridewell is at Ardee; dispensaries are at Ardee, Ballymascanlan, Carlingford, Castle-Bellingham, Collon, Dunleer, and Louth; workhouses are at Dundalk, Drogheda, and Ardee; savings' banks are at Dundalk and Ardee; and Loan Funds are at Ardee, Carlingford, Castle-Bellingham, and Drogheda. The annual amount of property valued for the poor-rate, including the town of Drogheda, is £325,867; and the annual amount of property valued under the Act 6 and 7 William, cap. 84, exclusive of the town of Drogheda, is £188,830. The total number of tenements valued in the county for the poor-law, but exclusive of the boroughs of Drogheda and Dundalk, is 10,648; of which 4,470 were valued under £5,—2,351, under £10,—1,234, under £15,—642, under £20,—493, under £25,—244, under £30,—330, under £40,—181, under £50,—and 703, at and above £50. The amount of grand jury presentments, in 1842, was £15,465. Twelve members were sent from the county to the Irish parliament, or two from the rural districts, and two from each of the boroughs of Drogheda, Dundalk, Carlingford, Ardee, and Dunleer; but only four are sent to the imperial parliament, or two from the rural districts, and one from each of the boroughs of Drogheda and Dundalk. The constituency of the rural districts in January, 1842, was 1,103; of whom 319 were £50 freeholders, 106 were £20 freeholders, 31 were £20 leaseholders, 458 were £10 freeholders, 120 were £10 leaseholders, and 69 were possessors of rent charges.

Pop., in 1792, 57,750; in 1821, 101,011; in 1831, 107,481; in 1841, 111,979. Houses, in 1792, 11,343; in 1821, 18,138; in 1831, 18,834; in 1841, 19,861. The following statistics are all of 1841; and they exclude the town but include the barony of Drogheda: Males, 54,651; females, 57,328; families, 21,029. Inhabited houses, 19,861; uninhabited complete houses, 890; houses in the course of erection, 60. First-class inhabited houses, 460; second-class, 3,312; third-class, 9,110; fourth-class, 6,979. Families residing in first-class houses, 538; in second-class houses, 3,684; in third-class houses, 9,494; in fourth-class houses, 7,293. Families dependent chiefly on agriculture, 13,099; on manufactures and trade, 5,633; on other pursuits, 2,297. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 42.

section contains the towns of LOUTH and MULLACREW: see these articles. Length, westward, 6 miles; breadth, from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 6. Area of the Ardee section, 2,081 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches; of the Upper Dundalk section, 1,654 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches; of the barony of Louth section, 14,106 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches,—of which 31 acres, 35 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 9,721; in 1841, 9,647. Houses 1,696. Pop. of the Ardee section, in 1831, 1,372; in 1841, 1,400. Houses 230. Pop. of the Upper Dundalk section, in 1831, 865; in 1841, 771. Houses 135. Pop. of the rural districts of the barony of Louth section, in 1831, 6,275; in 1841, 6,131. Houses 1,064. Gibstown townland, belonging to the barony of Louth section, and containing an area of 212 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches, lies detached half-a-mile to the east of the main body of the parish. The parochial surface consists, in an aggregate view, of prime land; and is watered partly across the interior by the Fane, and partly along the southern boundary by the Glyde. A small lake, called Ross, lies in the west. The seats are Corderry-house, Rathbrist-house, Glydemains-house, Glydefarm-house, and Stephenstown-house. The chief hamlets are Corkereghagh and Knockbridge. The road from Dundalk to Carrickmacross, and that from Ardee to Castle-Blayney, intersect each other in the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and constitutes the benefice of Louth or Knockfergus, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £1,988 1s. 9d.; glebe, £147 14s. 2d. Gross income, £2,135 15s. 11d.; nett, £1,623 16s. 4½d. Patron, the Crown twice and the diocesan once in every three times. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Dundalk and Castletown, in the dio. of Armagh; and divides his time between it and Louth. A curate has a salary of £100. The church was built about the year 1807, at the cost of £1,370 8s. 1d., and enlarged in 1828, at the cost of £142 8s. 3½d., both of which sums were raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 250; attendance 80. Three Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 430, from 600 to 671, and from 777 to 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Churchmen amounted to 261, and the Roman Catholics to 8,165; and 10 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from the rector, and £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, one with £20 from the rector, and £20 from subscription, one with £10 from the rector, one with £20 from the rector and £20 from Mr. Fortescue, and one with £8 from the National Board—had on their books 625 boys and 300 girls. At the close of 1842, the National Board had two schools at Louth, one at Knockbridge, and one at Stonetown.

LOUTH, an ancient but decayed town, in the parish, barony, and county of Louth, Leinster. It stands on the road from Ardee to Castle-Blayney, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Ardee, $5\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Dundalk, and $39\frac{1}{2}$ north by west of Dublin. An abbey is alleged to have been founded at the town by St. Patrick, and to have been presided over by a Briton of the name of St. Mocteus or Mochtalugh, who died in the year 534. A school is said to have been connected with this religious establishment, to have been one of the most celebrated of those academies which gave Ireland, for several generations, the fame of being the most learned country in Europe, and to have produced, among its scholars, no fewer than 300 presbyters, and 100 bishops. In the 9th century, the Danes repeatedly pillaged the town and the abbey; and in the 10th, they obtained a settlement at the town. In the 12th century, the abbey was thrice destroyed by fire; and in 1148, it was superseded by a priory for regular canons, founded by O'Carrol, prince of Oriel, and Edan, bishop of Clogher. In 1242, a chapter was held in the priory by the archbishop of Armagh, and attended by all the abbots and priors of regular canons in Ireland. Edward Bruce and his Scottish followers, during the period of their brief success in the invasion of Ireland, were several times entertained at the priory. In 1325, another general chapter was held here of the order of canons regular. The priory, in the course of its history, attained great distinction and affluence; and its prior was a lord of parliament. Its buildings and great possessions were granted, at the suppression, to the Plunket family; and its ruins still stand in the north-west outskirts of the town. A fair is held on March 28. The Louth dispensary is within the Dundalk Poor-law union; and, in 1839, it expended £97 12s., and administered to 1,481 patients. The town gives the title of Baron in the peerage of Ireland, to a branch of the Plunket family, other branches of whom are Barons Dunsany and Earls of Fingal. In 1541, Sir Oliver Plunket was created Baron Louth; in 1641, Oliver, the sixth Lord, was outlawed; and, in 1798, Thomas, lineally the eleventh Lord, was restored to his title. Area of the town, 66 acres. Pop., in 1831, 613; in 1841, 718. Houses 140. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 74; in manufactures and trade, 6; in other pursuits, 31. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 52; on their own manual labour, 88; on means not specified, 10.

LOUTH (MILLS OF), a hamlet on the river Glyde, and on the southern margin of the parish of Louth, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile south-west of the town of Louth, co. Louth, Leinster.

LOUTH-HALL, the demesne of Baron Louth, in the parish of Tallanstown, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of the town of Louth, barony of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. It is comparatively of great extent and well-wooded; and it blends with the demesnes of Arthurs-town, Lisrenny, Glydefarm, and Corballis, in rendering a grand expanse of rich country highly ornate with park and sylvan scenery.

LOVER'S LEAP. See DANGLE.

LOWESGREEN, or ROSEGREEN, a hamlet in the parish of Tullamain, barony of Middlethird, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-east by south of Cashel, on the road thence to Clonmel. Lowesgreen-house is situated a little to the east of it, and within the parish of Kilbragh. Pop. of the hamlet, in 1831, 62.

LOWEY. See LAVAT.

LOWTHERSTOWN, or IRVINESTOWN, a small town in the parish of Derryvullane, barony of Lurg, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The town has already been noticed under the word IRVINESTOWN [which see]; but a Poor-law union, which has the town for its seat, takes the name of Lowtherstown. This Poor-law union ranks as the 116th, and was declared on Sept. 14, 1840. It comprises portions of the counties of Fermanagh, Tyrone, and Donegal, amounting to 75,783 acres, and containing, in 1831, a pop. of 32,198. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in co. Tyrone, Trillick, 2,664;—in counties Tyrone and Fermanagh, Moorfield, 4,066;—in counties Fermanagh and Donegal, Clonelly, 3,606;—and in co. Fermanagh, Dromore, 2,180; Tubrid, 3,946; Lack, 2,053; Kesh, 3,355; Castle-Archdall, 2,951; and Lowtherstown, 6,377. The number of ex-officio guardians is 6, and of elected guardians 18; and of the latter, 4 are elected by the division of Lowtherstown, 1 by each of the divisions of Trillick and Dromore, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The union contains a National school, and was salaried with £14 from the Board, and £20 from a collection at a sermon in the Roman Catholic chapel.

LUCAN, a small post-town in the parish of Lucan, barony of Newcastle, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the right bank of the Liffey, adjacent to the transit of the mail-road from Dublin to Galway, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-south-east of Leixlip, and $6\frac{1}{2}$ west of Dublin. The Dublin and Galway road, in order to avoid a sudden descent into the hollow in which the town stands, keeps at a little distance from the river, and passes the town's skirts. The road along the left bank of the Liffey to Lucan is greatly more picturesque than even the agreeable mail-road along the right bank, and conducts through the richest series of close and soft landscapes within the whole circle of the exquisite environs of the metropolis. The Chevalier de Montmorency, as quoted by Mr. Brewer, observes, that "the ride from Chapel-Izod to Lucan reminds the traveller of the scenery in the vicinity of Heidelberg, in the Palatinate of the Rhine, except that instead of a steep and sloping chain of hills, overhanging the lovely Necker, covered with vines and fruit-trees, the swelling land is here clothed in a richly spangled dress of strawberries, peas, and flowers, ranging in variegated forms with the winding course of the gentle Liffey. The woodland scenery of Lutrellstown, and of the demesne attached to Lucan-house, assists in rendering this one of the most pleasing and luxuriant landscapes in nature." A handsome modern bridge spans the Liffey at the town. An iron-work is situated in the eastern environs. The Lucan dispensary is within the Celbridge Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 4,527; and, in 1839-40, it expended £90 16s., and administered to 975 patients. In 1841, the Lucan Loan Fund had a capital of £670, circulated £1,029 in 266 loans, and cleared a nett profit of 3s. 4d.—Warynde Peche was Lord of Lucan in 1220, and founded the monastery of St. Catherine near Leixlip. The manor was afterwards part of the estate of the Earl of Kildare; in the reign of Richard II., it was possessed by the Rockby family; and, in the 16th century, it belonged to the family of Sarsfield. In 1566, William Sarsfield, Esq., of Lucan, was knighted by Sir Henry Sydney, in guerdon of his services against Shane O'Neill; and during the wars of the Revolution, Patrick Sarsfield, the descendant of Sir William, and the most skilful general in the Jacobite army, was, by James II., created Earl of Lucan. William Sarsfield of Lucan, eldest brother of the General, left an only daughter: this lady became sole heir to the Lucan estate, and married Agmondisham Vesey, Esq., the ancestor of the present Veseys of Lucan; and her daughter Anne married Sir J. Brogham, Bart., whose descendants are now Earls of Lucan in the peerage of Ireland, and acquired their dignity in 1795.—Area of the town, 33 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,229; in 1841, 563. Houses 91. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 71; in manufactures and trade, 48; in other pursuits, 12. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 51; on their own manual labour, 65; on means not specified, 5.

LUDDEN, or LUDDENBEG, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 3 miles north-north-east of Six-mile-Bridge, co. Limerick, Munster. Length and breadth, each 1 mile; area, 1,954 acres. Pop., in 1831, 837; in 1841, 944. Houses 134. The surface lies to the east of the road from Limerick to Kilmallock; and consists of good land.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CARRINCORLISH [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Vicarial tithes composition, £54; glebe, £30. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £70; and are inappropriate in Viscount Southwell. In 1834, the parishioners, with the exception of 2, were all Roman Catholics, and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

LUGDUFF, a mountain on the mutual border of the parishes of Derralossory and Knockrath, barony of North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It forms part of the south screen of Glendalough, and part of the north screen of Glenmalur; and has an altitude of 2,148 feet above sea-level. Its name means 'the mountain of the Black Gulf;' and its north side is so precipitous, that a writer, who has no propensity to exaggerate, declares it possible to "take a somerset of fifteen hundred feet," from the top of it into the upper lake of Glendalough. The mountain presents a terribly grand aspect to the north, exhibits some phases closely similar to Turk mountain at the middle lake of Killarney, includes among its skirts a singularly interesting secluded little vale called the south prison, flings down from its side into Glendalough a romantic waterfall, and commands from its summit a mountain-prospect of not much variety, but of great power. "Nothing," says a highly tasteful writer whom we have often quoted, "can be more interesting than the view from the highest point: on one side you have the pleasant prison I have just spoken of,—on the other, the deep, gloomy, Glendalough, hundreds of feet below you, with all its lakes and ruins; and around on every side, the tops of gigantic mountains, now catching the clouds as they ranged along, and then flinging them off, and piercing the azure heavens in the grey distinctness that the western breeze brings along with it: there you see Douce and Thoralagee and Lugnaquilla; and sparkling beyond the lower and secondary ranges, to the east, was seen the silvered line of the sea." See GLENDALOUGH.

LUGGANURE, a lead mine in the parish of Derralossory, barony of north Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It occurs on the north side of Conaderry mountain, and in the glen between that mountain and Thoralagee. See CONADERY. The depth of the vein of lead ore is 180 fathoms; its ascertained course exceeds 900 fathoms; and, in the year 1837, it employed from 150 to 300 men, and annually produced from 1,200 to 3,600 tons, worth £15 per ton.

LUGGELAW, a sublimely beautiful glen, on the mutual border of the parishes of Cahiry and Derralossory, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-west by north of Roundwood, barony of North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Lough Tay, possessing a surface-elevation of 80 feet above sea-level, lies in the bottom of part of the glen; Luggelaw-lodge, the property of Mr. Latouche, is situated at the foot of the lake; and the enormous alpine mass of naked granite, which forms the mountain of Carrigemanne, climbs tumultuously up from one of the lake's sides. See TAY (Lough) and CARRIGEMANNE. The glen, as approached from Roundwood, bursts instantaneously upon the view, first disclosing the awfully sublime and precipitous mass of Carrigemanne, and then exhibiting in contrast a profusion of lawn and sylvan decorations; and as approached, in the opposite direction, it first seems a quite ordinary upland vale, and then discovers to the view almost a museum of mountain landscape. "As the bottom of the valley is concealed by the moorland declivity of the overhanging Douce," says the author of the Guide to Wicklow, in reference to the latter approach, "the eye is presented with a comparatively bare and uninteresting prospect over a wild but in no way striking vale. From this, as if by the stroke of an enchanter's wand, suddenly a scene of the highest order of the picturesque, and startlingly beautiful, emerges on the eye. Lough Tay, soft, calm, bright, and blue.

egal, Ulster. The bay is small and open. The hamlet stands at the head of the bay, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Dunglo; and boasts in its immediate vicinity the glebe-house of the parish. The lake is small, and lies a little north-east of the hamlet.

MAGHERABEG, an old abbey in the north-west corner of the parish of Drumhome, barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. The ruin stands at the head of Donegal bay, in the vicinity of St. Ernan's Island, the seat of John Hamilton, Esq.

MAGHERABOY, a barony in the north-west of the county of Fermanagh, Ulster. It is bounded, on the west, by the county of Leitrim; on the north-west, by the county of Donegal; on the north, by the barony of Lurg; on the east, by the baronies of Lurg and Tyrkenney; and on the south and south-west, by the barony of Glenawley. Its length, north-westward, is $18\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth is $7\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 94,171 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches,—of which 13,024 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches are water. It extends from a point $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile above Enniskillen, to the extremity of the county; and it includes part of Lough Melvin, and all the head and west side of Lower Lough Erne. The lakes in the interior are numerous; but, excepting Loughs Ross, Carran, Rossole, Carrick, Navar, Glencreawan, and Meenamen, they are all small. The surface is all identical with the western screen and a small portion of the eastern screen of Lower Lough Erne [see ERNE]; and the principal heights are Glenalong and North Shean, whose summits have an altitude of respectively 793 and 1,135 feet above sea-level. The Act 6 and 7 William, cap. 84, transferred the townland of Drumgarrow in the parish of Trory from the barony of Magheraboy to that of Tyrkenney,—pop., in 1841, 62.—The barony of Magheraboy contains the whole of the parish of Devenish, and part of the parishes of Bohoe, Cleenish, Enniskillen, Innismacshaint, Rosser, and Trory. Its only town is part of Enniskillen; and its chief villages are Churchhill and Derrygonnelly. Pop., in 1831, 24,932; in 1841, 25,774. Houses 4,331. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,318; in manufactures and trade, 1,067; in other pursuits, 410. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 147; on the directing of labour, 1,137; on their own manual labour, 3,419; on means not specified, 92. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,310; who could read but not write, 2,060; who could neither read nor write, 4,504. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,081; who could read but not write, 3,295; who could neither read nor write, 6,228.—This barony lies partly within the Poor-law union of Enniskillen, and partly within that of Ballyshannon. The total number of valued tenements, exclusive of those within the borough of Enniskillen, is 2,925; and of these, 1,003 were valued under £5,—952, under £10,—482, under £15,—210, under £20,—104, under £25,—57, under £30,—49, under £40,—29, under £50,—and 47, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £31,300 2s. 5d.; and the sum levied under the grand warrant of summer 1841, was £2,898 4s. 5d.

MAGHERABOY, a village in the parish of St. John, barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 144. Houses 31.

MAGHERACLOONEY, a parish in the extreme south of the barony of Farney, and of the county of Monaghan, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Carrickmacross, Ulster. Length, south-eastward, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 14,951 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches,—of which 336 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 8,443; in 1841, 9,012. Houses

1,577. The surface, in a general view, comprises very little waste ground, and prevaillingly consists of arable land, worth from £1 to £3 yearly per acre, and producing good crops of grass, potatoes, oats, barley, and wheat. Small isolated bogs are numerous in the centre and the south; but they are in the course of being all converted into good land. Loughs Rahans, Fea, and Ballyhoe, are comparatively large; and the other lakes, nine or ten in number, are small. The river Lagan traces the chief part of the south-western boundary. The seats are the Cottage, Loughfea-house, Drummond-cottage, Magheranaclich-castle, and Coolderry-house. The road from Carrickmacross to Kingscourt passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Vicarial tithe composition, £430; glebe, £60. Gross income, £490 nett, £430 8s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £686 13s. 4d.; and are impropriate in Col. Moore, who has demised them to Mr. Rernan. A curate has a salary of £19 4s. 7½d., and the use of the glebe-house. The church was built in 1825, by means of a loan of £700 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 200; attendance 45. The Roman Catholic chapels at Coolan and Rocks have an attendance of respectively 1,272 and 800. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 198 Churchmen, 59 Presbyterians, and 8,449 Roman Catholics; and 18 daily schools—each of two of which was salaried with £5 from subscription—had on their books 594 boys and 218 girls.

MAGHERACREGGAN, a hamlet in the parish of Ardstraw, barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the western border of the parish, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of Newtown-Stewart.

MAGHERACROSS, a parish 5 miles north-north-east of Enniskillen, and partly in the barony of Lurg, co. Fermanagh, partly in the barony of Omagh, co. Tyrone, but chiefly in the barony of Tyrkenney, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The Lurg and the Omagh sections lie a little detached; and the Tyrkenney section contains the village of BALLYAMALLARD: which see. Length of the main body, south-eastward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Lurg section, 170 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches; of the Omagh section, 343 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches; of the Tyrkenney section, 9,938 acres, 23 perches,—of which 71 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,313; in 1841, 5,203. Houses 943. Pop., in 1841, of the Lurg section, 53; of the Omagh section, 204; of the rural districts of the Tyrkenney section, 4,570. Houses in these, respectively 9, 31, and 838. The average annual value of the land is 26s. per acre. Lough Ballydoolough lies in the south-east corner; and Lough Drumgay lies on the south-west boundary. The principal seats are Jamestown and Crooknacreeve. The road from Enniskillen to Omagh passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £328 4s. 2d.; glebe, £171 13s. Gross income, £500 19s. 2d.; nett, £444 12s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built about 57 years ago, at an unascertained expense; and was enlarged, since 1837, by means of a gift of £300 2s. 3d. from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £40 contributed by private parties. Sitings, previous to enlargement, 500; attendance 176. The Knock, the Upper Ballinamallard, and the Lower Ballinamallard Wesleyan Methodist meeting-houses, have an attendance of respectively 60, 75, and 85. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 370; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Derryvullan and Trory.

The total number of tenements valued is 6,411; and of these, 3,265 were valued under £5,—999, under £10,—666, under £15,—478, under £20,—328, under £25,—161, under £30,—237, under £40,—116, under £50,—and 161, at and above £50.

MAGOURNEY, a parish in the barony of East Muskerry, 6 miles east of Macroom, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of COACHFORD [which see]; and lies mutually intersected with the parish of Kilcoleman. Length and breadth of the two parishes, each 2½ miles; area of Magourney, 5,869 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,392; in 1841, 2,664. Houses 449. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,303. Houses 381. The townlands of Deeshart, Fergus, Meeshal, Tulligbeg, and Tulligmore, were transferred by the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, from the barony of Barretts to that of East Muskerry. Pop. of these townlands, in 1831, 522. The surface forms part of the western or upper peninsula between the rivers Lee and Dripsey; and is traversed by the road from Cork to Macroom. Among the seats, is Leemount, the residence of Thomas Gollock, Esq. The Magourney dispensary is in the Macroom Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 5,892; and, in 1839-40, it expended £104 1s. 6d., and administered to 2,275 patients. In 1841, the Magourney Loan Fund had a capital of £1,881, circulated £6,727 in 1,830 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £83 13s. 3d.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, jointly with that of Kilcoleman, £684; glebe, £42. The rectories of Magourney and KILCOLEMAN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Magourney. Pop., in 1831, 2,397. Gross income, £726; nett, £560 12s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Carrigtohill, in the dio. of Cloyne, but is resident in Magourney. The church is of unknown date. Sitings 100; attendance 45. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Aghabullogue. In 1834, the Protestants of the union amounted to 126, and the Roman Catholics to 2,383; and 3 daily schools, one of which was salaried with £2 from the rector, and one with £18 from the National Board—had on their books 124 boys and 68 girls.

MAGUNIHY. See MAGONIHY.

MAGUIRE'S-BRIDGE, a small post and market town in the parish of Aghalurcher, barony of Magherastephana, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands on the eastern verge of the parish, on the Colebrook river, and on the road from Enniskillen to Clones, 2½ miles south-west of Brookborough, 2½ north by west of Lisnaska, and 7 south-east of Enniskillen. It acquires its name from a bridge across the Colebrook river; it presents a clean and comparatively neat appearance; and it has a Presbyterian meeting-house, a Methodist meeting-house, and a Roman Catholic chapel, and stands about a mile west of the parish-church of Aghavea. Fairs are held on the first Wednesday of every month, on the third Wednesday of May and Nov., and on Jan. 17, July 5, and Oct. 2. The Maguire's-Bridge dispensary is a branch of that of LISNASKA: which see. In 1841, the Maguire's-Bridge Loan Fund had a capital of £2,830, circulated £11,188 in 2,978 loans, and expended for charitable purposes £53 8s. In the vicinity of the town are the seats of Abbey-Lodge, Nutfield, Lisnaggle, Drumgoon, Corrad, Millwood, Mollymount, Littlemount, and Gola. Area of the town 50 acres. Pop., in 1831, 834; in 1841, 685. Houses 139. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 21; in manufactures and trade, 101; in other pursuits, 36. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 99; on their own manual labour, 33; on means not specified, 10. The Roman Catholic parish of Maguire's-Bridge is in the dio. of Clogher, and has chapels at Maguire's-Bridge and Moate.

MAHEE. See MAGHER.

MAHON (THE), a rivulet of the county of Waterford, Munster. It rises in the bog of Monavealagh, in the barony of Upperthird, and flows in the direction of south by east through the southern part of that barony, and the eastern part of Decies-without-Drum, to the sea, at the town and bay of Bonmahon. Its valley is deep; and the lower part of its basin is rich in copper ore. See BOHMAHON.

MAHON (LOUGH). See BLACKROCK, co. Cork.

MAHONAGH, MAHOONAGH, or MAHOUNAGH, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Glenquin, 1½ mile south-east of Newcastle, co. Limerick, Munster. Length and breadth, each 4 miles; area, 12,687 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,846; in 1841, 4,101. Houses 605. Within the parish is a village of its own name. Area, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 411. Houses 59. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 41; in manufactures and trade, 21; in other pursuits, 3. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 28; on their own manual labour, 38. The land is in general good. co. Kerry, Munster. It is situated midway between the mouth of the river and the village of Castle-maine. Area, 2,709 acres. "It extends under the level of spring tide, and by the channel of the river is in most places 15 feet deep, the bottom 16 feet under high-water mark; the part which is overflooded in springs and mixed with salt, has become firm, and in some places pasturable, but in general it affords nothing but rushes; much of this also has been embanked, and some of what has been last done is in good order, and found to be exceedingly productive, either in pasturage or agriculture; but the whole, when reported on in 1814, was in want of draining." Estimated cost of reclamation, £6,706 14s. 3d.

MAINE, or MAYNE, a parish in the barony of Ferrard, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Dunleer, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, westward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,060 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches. Pop., in 1831, 360; in 1841, 363. Houses 66. The surface touches the coast $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-north-west of Clogher Head; is traversed by the road from the village of Clogher to Dunleer; and consists, in general, of excellent land.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TERMON-RECKAN [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £90. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a hedge-school had on its books 42 boys and 13 girls.

MAINHAM, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Ikeathy and Oughterany, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north by west of Clane, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,823 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch. Pop., in 1831, 738; in 1841, 703. Houses 94. The land is, in general, of second-rate quality. The highest ground is on the south-west border, adjacent to the hamlet of Mainham, and has an altitude of 294 feet above sea-level. Within the parish is the Jesuit College of CLONGOWES: which see. The seats are Mount Windsor and Mount Armstrong. The road from Prosperous to Maynooth passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CLANE [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £124 4s. 1½d.; glebe, £12 12s. The Clongowes College chapel is served by 5 Jesuits, but is attended only by the inhabitants of the college. In 1834, the Protestants in the parish amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 735; and the Clongowes College was the only school, and had 120 pupils, those of whom under 12 years of age paid £42 each per annum, while those above 12 years paid £47 5s.

MAJOR (LOUGH), a lake on the east side of the town of Ballybay, parish of Ballybay, barony of Cremorne, co. Monaghan, Ulster.

MALAHIDE, a parish containing a village of the same name, in the extreme north-east of the barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, westward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,125 acres, 3 roods, 2 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,255; in 1841, 1,339. Houses 223. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 931; in 1841, 675. Houses 122. Excepting about 20 acres of sandy banks, all the land is of excellent quality. The highest ground is on the western boundary, and has an altitude of only 45 feet above sea-level. The estuary of the Broadmeadow Water, commonly called the bay of Malahide, bounds the north side of the parish; it measures 3 miles in length eastward, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in terminating breadth; but it is nearly all dry at low water. Malahide Point, which projects into the north side of the estuary to a termination $3\frac{1}{4}$ furlongs north-east of the village, has an altitude of 35 feet above sea-level. An extensive oyster-bed exists in the estuary, directly opposite the village, and furnishes considerable supplies of oysters to the market of Dublin. The Dublin and Drogheda railway bisects the parish, touches the west side of the village, and crosses the estuary at the oyster-bed. The principal seats are MALAHIDE and SEAPARK: which see. The other seats are Millview, Gaybrook, La Mancha, Broomfield, and Seamount-cottage. Limestone is quarried, of black, grey, and yellow hues; and a profusion of interesting shells covers the strand.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. The tithes are nominally appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's cathedral; but have all been attached as an endowment to the perpetual curacy. Tithe composition, £110 15s. 4½d.; glebe, £24. Gross income, £134 15s. 4½d.; nett, £68 0s. 7½d. Patron, the dean of St. Patrick's. The church was built in 1832, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, a loan of £276 18s. 3½d. from that Board, and a donation of £92 6s. 1½d. from Col. Talbot. Sittings 200; attendance 200. The Roman Catholic chapel is parochially united to the chapel of Swords; but the attendance upon it is not reported. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 228, and the Roman Catholics to 968; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 from the National Board, and one with £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and the proceeds of a collection at a charity sermon—had on their books 67 boys and 78 girls.

MALAHIDE, a village in the parish of Malahide, barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the shore of the Broadmeadow Water estuary, and closely adjacent to the transit of the Dublin and Drogheda railway, 3 miles east by south of Swords, and 7 north-north-east of Dublin. It is well-built, and beautifully situated, but much exposed to the winds. Its buildings of special interest are the parish-church, the Roman Catholic chapel, and a small silk factory. In its centre is a well of very clear and wholesome water, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and covered with an arched enclosure. Malahide is a lordship and manor, including the lands of Feltrim, Hamonstown, and Balvinstown, and having courts leet and baron. The castle of Malahide, the seat of Lord Talbot de Malahide, stands amidst a rich demesne, half-a-mile south-west by south of the village. The original pile is said to have been built in the reign of Henry II.; considerable repairs and additions were made in the reign of Edward IV.; and such extensive renovations, modifications, and enlargements have been effected within the last half century, as have rendered it, not only a highly ornamental specimen of architecture, but one of the most interesting private buildings in the county. It stands on a comparatively lofty limestone rock, and commands a fine view of the village and bay of Malahide. The structure, as it existed in the early part of the last century, was of contracted dimensions, and, though surrounded by a moat, was not castellated. The present pile is a large, irregular, and hollow quadrangle of unequal height, and flanked with massive, battlemented, circular towers. A fine Gothic porch serves as the chief entrance, and greatly contributes to both external ornament and interior convenience. The original moat has been softened into an ornamental, grassy slope. The gardens are disposed with much taste; and the demesne is embellished with numerous plantations, including some old and very fine trees. The interior of the castle has a sumptuous character, and presents many gratifying objects. The lower story, disposed chiefly in servants' apartments and offices, is vaulted, and is entered by a low Gothic doorway; while the rooms of general merchandise from London, and who supply many small dealers on terms as advantageous as if they went to Cork or Dublin. Yet in spite of the general goodness of trade, and of the comfortable condition of a considerable proportion of the inhabitants, about 75 per cent. of the working classes are supposed to be not in constant employment, and the wages of labourers scarcely ever exceed 8d. a-day without diet. Within the town is a brewery; and in its vicinity are salt works. A weekly market is held on Saturday; and fairs are held on Jan. 1, Feb. 10, Monday before Shrove-Tuesday, May 11, July 25, and Oct. 28. The town has a savings' bank, a loan fund, and a branch office of the Provincial Bank; and, in 1842, the first of these had 180 depositors. The town will be touched by the proposed railway from Dublin to Cork: see CORK. The public conveyances at the close of 1843, were a mail-car and two stage-cars to Mitchellstown, a car to Doneraile, a car to Kanturk, a stage-coach to Cork, a mail-coach in transit between Cork and Dublin, two cars and a mail-coach in transit between Cork and Limerick, and two stage-coaches in transit between Cork and Charleville. The hotels are the Queen's Arms and the Commercial, both in Main-street. The news-rooms are the Club-house in Main-street, the Temperance room in Spa-walk, and the Temperance room in Upper Bridge-street. The Mallow Union Agricultural Association holds an annual ploughing-match and cattle-show.

Poor-law Union.—The Poor-law union of Mallow ranks as the 21st, and was declared on March 5, 1839. It lies wholly in co. Cork, and comprehends an area of 151,050 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 59,076. Its electoral divisions, together with the number of valued tenements in each, are Mallow, 1,378; Rahau, 547; Monanimy, 302; Glenor, 192; Cahirduggan, 210; Doneraile, 1,176; Ballinamona, 422; Imphrick, 156; Buttevant, 492; Liscarrol, 284; Churchtown, 371; Ballyclough, 408; and Kilshanie, 867. The number of elected guardians is 25, and of ex-officio guardians 8; and the Board meet at the workhouse on every Friday. The political districts which are wholly or partially included in the union are the borough of Mallow, and the baronies of Fermoy, Barretts, East Muskerry, Condons and Clangibbon, Orrery and Kilmore, and Duhallow. The number of valued tenements in these districts, and within the union, are 1,034 in the borough of Mallow, 2,962 in Fermoy, 233 in Barretts, 31 in Condons and Clangibbon, 1,427 in Orrery and Kilmore, 113 in East Muskerry, and 1,003 in Duhallow,—in all, 6,805; and of this total 3,147 were valued under £5,—905, under £10,—554, under £15,—385, under £20,—267, under £25,—222, under £30,—296, under £40,—250, under £50,—and 779, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £143,019; the total number of persons rated is 6,812; and of these, 872 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,195, not exceeding £2,—534, not exceeding £3,—329, not exceeding £4,—and 261, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Feb. 4, 1840,—to be completed in June 1841,—to cost £6,090 for building and completion, and £1,160 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 6 acres, obtained for £50 of compensation to occupying tenant, and an annual rent of £3, and to contain accommodation for 700 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Aug. 2, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £803 4s. 5d., and the total previous expenditure was £670 15s. 5d. The medical charities within the union are the county infirmary at Mallow, fever hospitals at Mallow and Buttevant, and dispensaries at Ballyclough, Buttevant, Churchtown, Doneraile, and Glountaine; and, in 1839-40, they received £49 10s. 10d. from subscription, £987 16s. 6½d. from public grants, and £21 7s. 9d. from other sources, and expended £660 12s. 10½d. in salaries to medical officers, £204 15s. 8½d. for medicines, and £662 6s. 8½d. for contingencies. The county infirmary at Mallow, though capable of containing 36 beds, actually contains only 16; it receives less support from public grants, and affords a less amount of medical relief, than any other county infirmary in Ireland; and, in 1839-40, it received £84 11s. from subscription, £409 1s. 10½d. from public grants, and £5 from other sources, expended £139 1s. 10½d. in salaries to medical officers, £75 18s. 10d. for medicines, and £337 5s. 9½d. for contingencies, and administered to 307 intern and 6,061 extern patients. The Mallow fever hospital, though capable of containing 24 beds, actually contains only 16; it is intended for the town and suburbs of Mallow, and refuses such patients as reside a mile or more distant, unless they pay 10s. each; and, in 1839-40, it received £354 7s. 9d., expended £314 3s. 4½d., and admitted 334 patients.

Municipal Affairs.—The manor of Mallow formed a distinct seignory, which belonged successively to the Earls of Desmond, to Sir John Norris, and to the family of Jephson. A charter of 10 James I. grants that the town and environs of Mallow shall be a borough,—that it shall have a corporation, consisting of a provost, 12 free burgesses, and a commonalty,—and that the provost and free burgesses shall have the power to send two members to parliament. The corporation, however, soon became extinct, or possibly never existed; and the power of returning members to parliament was transferred to the freeholders of the manor. Two court leets in the year, and a court for debts under 40s., are held by the seneschal; a court of quarter-sessions, by the assistant barrister of the county; and a court of petty-sessions, by the county magistrates. Mallow is the head-quarters of a constabulary district, which comprises the nine stations of Mallow, Ballyhooly, Ballynocken, Ballymagooley, Castletownroche, Clogher, Doneraile, and Killavullane. Market tolls are levied to the amount of about £390 a-year; and they belong to Mr. Jephson, but are let by him for a rent of £250. The streets are lighted and cleaned under the direction of 21 commissioners, under the Act of 9 Geo. IV., cap. 82. The manor-borough returns one member to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1842, 350; of whom 78 were freeholders, and 272 were £10 householders.

Statistics.—The number of tenements valued for the Poor-law within the parliamentary borough of Mallow, is 1,034; and of these, 657 were valued under £5,—104, under £10,—57, under £15,—53, under £20,—43, under £25,—27, under £30,—30, under £40,—26, under £50,—and 37 at and above £50. The number of houses rated within the town, for police purposes, of the annual value of from £3 to £10, and rated at 6d., is 177; of those from £10 to £20, and rated at 9d., is 127; and of those from £20 and upwards, and rated at 1s., is 150. Total number of houses rated, 454; total annual value of these, £8,470; annual amount of rate, £178. Area of the town, 378 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,178; in 1841, 6,851. Houses 942. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 418; in manufactures and trade, 636; in other pursuits, 357. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 73; on the directing of labour, 603; on their own manual labour, 585; on means not specified, 89. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,478; who could read but not write, 277; who MASSARENE (UPPER), a barony in the extreme south-west of the county of Antrim, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by Lower Massarene; on the east, by Upper Belfast; on the south, by co. Down; and on the west, by Lough Neagh. Its length, westward, exclusive of its portion of Lough Neagh, is 11½ miles; its extreme breadth is 8; and its area is 68,837 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches,—of which 13,036 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches are water. The surface includes part of the valley of the Lagan, part of the terminating uplands of Antrim, and part of the rich plain which extends along the east side of Lough Neagh. The last of these districts, to adopt the words of the Rev. Mr. Dubourdieu, "for cultivation, soil, planting and hedgerows, habitations and orchards, has the appearance of the best parts of England. The vicinity of Lough Neagh gives a cheerfulness to the whole; and though many situations might be pointed out as deserving of notice, that particular part which extends from Crumlin to Longford Lodge by Glendarrogh, must attract the admiration of every person whose eye is gratified with pictures of rural prosperity."—This barony contains part of the parishes of Lisburn, Derryaghy, and Lambeg, and the whole of the parishes of Aghagallon, Aghalee, Ballinderry, Camlin, Glenavy, Magheragall, Magheramesk, and Tullyrusk. The only town is the principal part of Lisburn; and the chief villages are Aghalee, Glenavy, and Crumlin. Pop., in 1831, 32,505; in 1841, 35,111. Houses 6,087. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,120; in manufactures and trade, 3,101; in other pursuits, 405. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 148; on the directing of labour, 3,100; on their own manual labour, 3,388; on means not specified, 50. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 7,276; who could read but not write, 3,434; who could neither read nor write, 4,184. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,578; who could read but not write, 5,783; who could neither read nor write, 5,438.—Upper Massarene is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Antrim, Lisburn, and Lurgan. The total number of tenements valued, exclusive of those in the borough of Lisburn, is 5,472; and of these, 3,118 were valued under £5,—878, under £10,—493, under £15,—310, under £20,—164, under £25,—112, under £30,—132, under £40,—97, under £50,—and 168, at and above £50. The annual valuation is £47,260 3s. 1d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, were £3,847 13s. 8d. and £3,073 7s. 8d.

MASSARENE, a village in the grange of Muckamore, barony of Lower Massarene, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the left bank of the Six-mile-Water, and is a suburb of the town of Antrim. In the 15th century, a small monastery for Franciscans of the third order was founded at Massarene by O'Neill; and on Nov. 20, 1621, it was granted to Sir A. Chichester, Baron of Belfast. In Nov. 1660, Sir John Clotworthy, who made a conspicuous figure in promoting the restoration of Charles II., was created Viscount Massarene and Baron Loughneagh, with remainder to the person and offspring of Sir John Skelington, his son-in-law; and, in 1756, Clotworthy Skelington, the fifth Viscount, was made Earl of Massarene. In 1816, at the death of Chichester, the fourth Earl, the earldom became extinct; but the previous titles were inherited by Harriot, the only daughter and heiress of the last Earl, and the wife of Viscount Ferrard; and, in 1831, John, the eldest son of the Viscountess, succeeded to the titles and became the 10th Viscount Massarene. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1831, 319; in 1841, 252. Houses 59. See ANTRIM (TOWN OF).

MASSYTOWN, a part of the town of Macroom, parish of Macroom, barony of West Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. The Census of 1841 does not notice it by name, but treats it as strictly an integral part of Macroom. Pop., in 1831, 547. Houses 64.

MATTEHY, a parish in the barony of East Muskerry, 8 miles east of Cork, co. Cork, Munster. Length and breadth, each 4 miles; area, 7,097 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,156; in 1841, 2,320. Houses 353. The surface is a chief part of the vale of the Dripsey, and consists, in the aggregate, of middle-rate land worth about 20s. per acre.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of INNISCARRA [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £513 14s. 3d.; glebe, £8. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 850; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Benring and Clohroe, in Inniscarra. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 45, and the Roman Catholics to 2,204; and a pay daily school had on its books 80 boys and 40 girls.

MATTOCK (THE), a rivulet of the counties of Louth and Meath, Leinster. It rises in the vicinity of Newtown-Monasterboice, and has a southerly run of about 7 miles, partly within Louth, but chiefly on the boundary between Louth and Meath, to the Boyne, at the point where that river comes first into contact with Louth. On the banks of the rivulet is MELLIFONT: which see.

MAUDLINTOWN, a parish in the barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. It contains part of the town of WEXFORD: which see. Length, south-westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 241 acres, 5 perches. Pop., in 1841, 723. Houses 142. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 416. Houses 76. The Census of 1831 does not notice it; and the Ecclesiastical returns amass its population with that of Kerlogue and St. Michael. The surface is washed on the east by Wexford Harbour, and traversed southward by the roads from Wexford to Broadway and Kilmore; and contains the ruins of Cromwell's Fort, Rockland, and Mulgammon.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Patrick's of Wexford, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £90 7s. 1½d. The other statistics are mixed up with those of Kerlogue and St. Michael.

MAURHIN. See MARNY.

MAULBAUN, a village in the parish of Muckstown, barony of Kericurrihy, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 38 acres. Pop., in 1841, 424. Houses 36. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 8; in manufactures and trade, 35; in other pursuits, 44. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 42; on their own manual labour, 21; on means not specified, 18.

MAYNE, a parish in the barony of Farnham, 4½ miles north by west of Kilkenny, co. Wick, Leinster. Length, west-south-westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,940 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 633; in 1841, 463. Houses 71. The river Dinane runs across the east wing.

learning, how and where they could, in their own country. Towards the close of the eighteenth century, however, the war with the continent in which Great Britain was engaged, rendered the transmission of students dangerous as well as difficult; and, the more liberal spirit of the age favouring the project, application was made to the Irish Parliament, by several leading members of the Roman Catholic church, for leave to establish a college, under charter, for their education at home. Permission was granted, and, with it a vote of money to aid in providing suitable premises; the act for its incorporation receiving the royal assent on the 5th of June, 1795. The site was not fortunately chosen; it was selected chiefly in consequence of the offer of the then Duke of Leinster, to grant, upon a lease of lives renewable for ever, 54 acres of land at the annual rent of £72; but the prospect of his grace's 'patronage' had no doubt considerable weight; for the land is not 'a bargain.' The house which originally stood there had to be purchased, and to be added to, from time to time, until the cost has amounted to perhaps £40,000. The neighbourhood is by no means healthy; and the distance from any city or town, by effectually preventing the occasional mingling of the students with society, is an evil against which no advantage could have been a sufficient set-off. In the October following, the college was opened for the reception of fifty students—the Rev. Dr. Hussey, (through whose exertions, chiefly, the object was attained) being appointed the first president. Since that period, candidates for orders in the Roman Catholic church have been educated chiefly at Maynooth; but there are other colleges from which they have also been ordained—at Kilkenny, Carlow, Tuam, Wexford, and Waterford; and many youths, the sons of persons of comparatively higher stations, continue to graduate at Continental universities. The number of students at Maynooth is now about 450. The number of free students is 250; they are supplied gratuitously with lodging, commons, and instruction. The free presentations are made by the four ecclesiastical provinces—by Armagh and Cashel, each 75, and by Dublin and Tuam, each 50. They are admissible at the age of 17, and are selected after examination by the bishops of the respective dioceses. Besides the free students, there are pensioners and half-pensioners—the former paying £21 and the latter £10 10s. annually; each free student pays an entrance fee of £8 8s., and each pensioner an entrance fee of £4 4s. The sums thus raised are insufficient for the maintenance of the establishment. Its principal means of support are derived from annual parliamentary grants. During the first 21 years of its existence they averaged £8,000 annually; the sum was subsequently raised to £8,928,—the present amount of the grant. The income has been augmented by various donations and bequests; the principal of which, £500 per annum, is derived from an arrangement entered into with the representatives of the late Lord Dunboyne, Roman Catholic bishop of Cork; but this sum is appropriated to the maintenance of an order of senior students, to the number of 20, taken from the four provinces in the same proportion as the free students. An allowance of £60 per annum is granted to each; but the half of that sum is deducted for their board. They are educated with a view to their becoming professors of the college, as vacancies occur; and assist in the business of the schools. Thirty bursaries have been founded, of different annual amounts, from £30 downwards. A sum of £1,000 was bequeathed by Mr. Keenan (a person in humble circumstances), for the foundation of a professorship of the Irish language—for which, strange to say, no provision was originally made. There are, consequently, three orders of students—senior students, pensioners, and free students. They wear caps and gowns. There are two months of recess in the summer; and a recess for a few days at Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost: these recesses are, however, but nominal; for permission to take advantage of them must be specially given by the bishop of the diocese from which the student has been selected. Very few of the students, therefore, ever leave the college for a single day from the time they enter it till their final departure from its walls. They are permitted once a-week to walk without the gates; but on such occasions are always accompanied by the dean. The college is placed under the direction of a board of trustees, consisting of 17 Roman Catholics, of whom the four archbishops are members ex-officio; of the 13, seven are of the church and six are laymen. The laymen are the Earl of Fingal, the Earl of Kenmore, Viscount Gormanstown, Lord Ffrench, Sir Patrick Bellew, Bart., and A. S. Hussey, Esq. In 1800, a board of control, under the name of 'visitors,' was appointed by act of parliament, consisting of the Lord-chancellor, the chief justices of the King's bench and Common Pleas, the chief baron of the Exchequer, two Roman Catholic archbishops, and the Earl of Fingal. They are directed to hold visitations triennially, or whenever the Lord-lieutenant shall direct them so to do; and are empowered to examine upon oath, 'touching the management, government, and discipline;' all matters connected with doctrine being subjected to the decision of the Roman Catholic members only. The officers charged with the superintendence of the institution, are the president, the vice-president, and the senior and junior deans. They must be natives of Great Britain. The professors rank in the following order:—1. Dogmatic Theology; 2. Moral Theology; 3. Hebrew and Sacred Scripture (divinity professors); 4. Natural Philosophy and Mathematics; 5. Logic, Ethics, and Metaphysics; 6. Greek and Latin; 7. French and English; 8. Irish. The president is the Rev. Michael Montague, D.D., the vice-president, the Rev. Lawrence Reacher. The triennial visitations are, and always have been, mere matters of form; the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry, in their 8th Report (1827), inform us that 'the business does not appear generally to occupy more than an hour.' The Lord-chancellor inquires of the president whether any thing irregular has occurred to call for the intervention of the visitors; and of the students whether they have any complaints to make against their superiors; and the ceremony terminates." The Maynooth dispensary is within the Celbridge Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 12,164 acres, with a pop. of 3,188; and, in 1839-40, it expended £153, and administered to 2,000 patients. Fairs are held at Maynooth on May 4, and Sept. 19. Area of the town, 91 acres. Pop. in 1831, 2,053; in 1841, 2,129. Houses 234. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 6; in manufactures and trade, 93; in other pursuits, 272. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 15; on the directing of labour, 112; on their own manual labour, 221; on means not specified, 21.

lee, at a point $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile below the mouth of the Trimogue; and the Lough Conn river, at a point $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile above Foxford. The principal streams which enter Loughs Conn and Cullen are the Deel, at the north end; the Castlehill on the west side; and the Clydagh or Castlebar, on the south end. The Cloonaghmore river, swollen by the tributaries of the Rathroe, the Bregbery, the Duvowen, and the Owenmore rivulets, enters the head of the small bay of Rathfran, on the west side of Killalla bay. The Cloonalaghan flows into the head of the bay of Lacken. The Heathfeels and the Ballinglen rivulets, the latter augmented by the tributaries of the Keerglen and the Glenedagh, enter the head of Bunatranah bay. The Glenultra, the Glenglassara, and the Belderg, enter the Atlantic between Bunatranah bay and Benwee Head; but all have singularly brief runs; and in fact so very near the coast is the watershed of that portion of the sea-board which they traverse, that several of the head-waters of the streams which flow westward to Broadhaven, rise within 5 furlongs of the margin of the northern sea. The Glenamoy, receiving near its embouchure the tribute of the Muingnabo, flows into the east side of Broadhaven. The Owenmore, 18 miles in length, traversing a long gap or defile through the centre of the north-west highlands, and carrying with it the tributaries of the Altderg, the Inagh, the Feddaunmuingeery, the Oweniny, and the Munhin, or superfluent stream from Lough Carrowmore, flows into the head of Tullaghan bay. The Owenduff, swollen by the tribute of the Tersaghnamore, flows into the head of the eastward offshoot of Tullaghan bay. The Owengarve flows into the middle of the north side of Clew bay. The Glennamony, the Srahmore, and the Srahrevagh flow into Lough Feagh; and the superfluent stream from that lake and Lough Furnace, makes a brief run to Clew bay. The Boghadoon, the Crumpan, and the Glendorrage flow into Lough Beltra; and the Newport river carries off the superfluency of that lake, receives the tribute of the Skerdagh and the Glenlura, and flows into the north-east corner of Clew bay at Newportpratt. The Owenabrockagh flows into the middle of the head of Clew bay. The Owenen flows into the south-east corner of Clew bay, at a point $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Westport. The Bunowen or Lewisburgh river, receives the tribute of the Owenasallagh, and enters Clew bay at Lewisburgh. The Carrownisky and the Owenadornaun enter the Atlantic on the west coast of Morisk. The Bundorra river receives the tributaries of the Glennumma and the Owenaglouh, and enters the north side of Killery Harbour at Bundorra. The Errive receives the tributaries of the Glendarrock, the Glenlaur, the Owenmore, the Derryraff, the Cross, the Glenacally, the Glenaglevagh, and the Glenfree, and enters the head of Killery Harbour. The Ayle flows northward, eastward, and southward, chiefly in the barony of Carra, but partly within that of Burrishoole; it flows, for some distance, in a subterranean channel; it receives the tribute of the Cammogue and the Claureen; and it flows through Lough Cloon into the head of Lough Mask. The Robe drains a large portion of the baronies of Clannorris and Kilmaine, washes the towns of Hollymount and Ballinrobe, and flows into the east side of Lough Mask. The Corrib river carries off the superfluency of Lough Mask to Lough Corrib; but, excepting over a brief distance from Cong to the latter lake, it is wholly a subterranean stream. The Black river is also, in part, a subterranean stream; and it flows along the south-eastern boundary of the county to Lough Corrib. The eastern wing is drained partly toward Killalla bay by the affluents of the Moy, partly toward the Shannon by the Lung river into Lough Gara, and partly toward the foot of Lough Corrib by the headstreams of the Clare.

Climate.—The environment of the county on two sides by the Atlantic, the intersection of it by great arms of the sea, the existence along its sea-board of vast broad tracts of lofty mountain, and the expansion within its interior of enormous tracts of bog and moorland, occasion a very large aggregate amount of fogs, rains, and cold; yet, "not so much," says Dr. MacParlan, "as to cause any endemic disorders, or to require any peculiar warmth of dress."

Minerals.—Granite, surmounted by a cap of quartz rock, forms the body of Croaghpatrick. Gneiss, passing into granite and mica slate, constitutes the Slieve-Gamph mountains, the small district westward thence past Foxford to Lough Conn, a tiny district on the opposite or west bank of that lake, several of the loftier and bulkier mountain masses of Erris, and from one-third to one-half of the double peninsula of the Mullet. Quartz rock constitutes part of Nephin mountain, a considerable part of the lofty sea-board over 11 miles east of Broadhaven, the northern part of the peninsula of the Mullet, and several mountains in the interior of Erris. Mica slate forms the immediate skirts of the gneiss district of Slieve-Gamph and Lough Conn, the greater part of the north-western highland region not occupied by gneiss and quartz rock, a considerable portion of the Mullet, the greater part of Achill, of Corraun-Achill, and of the smaller islands, and most of the northern half of the barony of Morisk. The clay-slate and greywacke members of the transition series of rocks occupy all the southern half of Morisk, and most of the district thence to Lough Mask. Old red sandstone and conglomerate form the exterior skirts of the gneiss district around Foxford, the whole of the Croagh-Moy mountains, the southern sea-board of the barony of Burrishoole, the eastern part of Clare Island, a small patch on the north-west corner of the barony of Morisk, and a narrow belt along the northern half of the east end of the district of transition rocks. Yellow sandstone and conglomerate form a district of 11 miles by 6 immediately west of the entrance of Killalla bay, a district of about 16 or 18 square miles commencing 6 miles west by south of Castlebar, and a district of 16 miles by $3\frac{1}{2}$ commencing about 2 miles east of the preceding district, and extending eastward to the boundary of the county at Ballaghaderreen and Lough Gara, there to pass a short way into the county of Roscommon. Excepting two tiny districts, or rather pendicles of the coal and millstone grit formations, all the remainder of Mayo, corresponding pretty nearly with its champaign territory, consists of carboniferous limestone. The remark, made in the geological section of our General Introduction, that the bottom of many a marine inlet of the west of Ireland consists of floetz limestone, while the screens and protecting headlands are formed of primitive or transition rocks, is strikingly exemplified in Clew bay, where the sea comes far and freely in between several formations of old rocks, and eventually forms an intricate archipelago of limestone islands, closely interwoven with low limestone peninsulas, and overlooked by a low limestone sea-board which lies connected with the vast floetz limestone plain of the kingdom. Eakers variegate the flat limestone region of Mayo, in a similar manner to central portions of the kindred regions in the west of Limerick; and while those which occur in the vicinity of Westport exhibit traces of a current toward Clew bay, those in the vicinity of Lough Conn and Killalla indicate a northward current in the line of the Moy—low ore abounds in the districts of the primitive rocks,

The ground, to be cultivated by the pupils as a model farm, showing a rotation of crops, and the practical operations of improved husbandry. The site of the school is near the centre of the province, at Hollymount, in the county of Mayo. The land is cropped and stocked, proper agricultural implements have been provided, and the house will be ready for the reception of pupils of both sexes on the 1st day of November ensuing. The local management of the institution is confided to a committee of subscribers." An official report of the institution published in 1836, says,—“The agricultural school at Hollymount was visited on the 11th of August. Mr. MacChlery, the agriculturalist, stated that he was master of a similar establishment at Templemore for 7 years previous to his taking this situation. The farm at Hollymount consists of 94 English acres,—roads, buildings, and plantations, included. He was to pay £100 a-year rent, and was to receive 40 pupils (30 males and 10 females), who were to pay at the rate of £10 annually, for which he was to provide them board, lodging, and instruction, and was to have the benefit of their labour. He was offered, by Mr. Spencer Lindsay, as one of the managing committee, a lease of three terms of 19 years each. He agreed to take only one; but was, at the end of that, to have the option of two more from the committee. He took the cattle and implements at a valuation, which was to be paid by instalments, the first instalment to be due at the end of three years. He wished to make sure of some pupils, thinking, perhaps, they might not come very readily; the committee, therefore, agreed to pay him for 10, and when they came that money was to be deducted. Four pupils only (three male and one female) have been admitted. The buildings form three sides of a hollow square, the front being occupied by the house and apartments, and the wings by the agricultural buildings. The ground-floor of the house consists of managers' rooms, on one side of which are placed the kitchen and laundry; on the other side, the dining-room of the male pupils, and, adjoining to this, the dairy and cleaning-room. The upper story consists of bed-rooms. One wing contains stalls for feeding cattle, and cart-lodge, &c., with lofts over; the other wing, stables, harness-house, and barn, with provision for the subsequent erection of a threshing-mill. The cattle consist of an Ayrshire bull, 8 cows, and 3 yearlings of an excellent description, and 4 or 5 horses. The implements are very good; and, among them, were observed Scotch carts, with broad and narrow wheels, ploughs, rhomboidal harrows, &c. The crops consist of oats on an old bog; wheat, about 10 English acres, the first crop on a reclaimed bog, drained, part of it burned, and part covered with lime compost by Mr. Patteson, who had the management previous to Mr. MacChlery. Some of it was sown so late as the 15th of December. It is a very fine crop, and affords a striking example of what may be done under improved management. Potatoes, mangel-wurzel, Swedish and white turnips, as planted in drills; and a large compost heap of bog-earth and lime is in preparation for farther improvements.”

Live Stock.—“The cattle of the barony of Morisk,” says the authority whom we quoted in the preceding section, “are of an inferior description; and but little care being taken to provide them with food in the winter season, they seldom attain a large size. In cold weather the store cattle are generally housed, and the cows obtain a place in the cabin, on account of the greater warmth, the farmer also thinking that they in turn increase the warmth of the inmates. Some ‘Kyloes’ or ‘west highlands’ have been introduced by Lord Sligo on a mountain farm, and, from their hardy constitution, appear to thrive well in their exposed situation. The introduction of the Cheviot sheep by the same nobleman is another interesting experiment, of the success of which there can be now no doubt. Stealing of sheep, lambs, and wool, are crimes of frequent occurrence, and, on that account, the number kept in the barony, although peculiarly adapted to the purpose, is decreasing fast, the farmers evincing a disinclination to keep a species of stock which is liable to such depredations. Of horses a much greater number is kept than necessary, considering that they are employed but little in tillage, the land being chiefly cultivated by the loy and spade; and these implements are far inferior to those in use in England.”—The index which this passage affords to the condition of live stock in the other baronies of the county, may probably be well seen through the medium of a vidimus of the state of live stock in the several baronies, as reported on by Dr. MacParlan in 1802. The breed of cattle in Morisk seemed to have become improved up to the full amount of the capacity of the moorish and mountainous nature of the pasture, by the importation of English breeds by the Marquis of Sligo and his father; and the improvement which they experienced, had spread into the neighbouring baronies. The breed in Tyrrawley, except in a few instances, were not at all improved. The prevailing cattle of Burrisboole were the common, old, bad breed. The cattle of Carra had been improved by the introduction, 40 years before, of the English bull, called Johnny Ghant, and by the subsequent introduction of several good English breeds; and the sheep of the same barony had become highly improved in consequence of the importation of English rams. The cattle of Clanmorris had become very much improved. Both the cattle and the sheep of Gallen were unimproved; nor, except in a few places, did they enjoy any facility or even capacity for improvement in the character of the soil. Live stock of all kinds, in Kilmain, were in a state of high improvement, and were continuing to experience the appliances of still higher improvement. The live stock of Costello were only beginning to improve. The cattle of Erris were poor and bad.

In 1841, there were, within the rural districts of the county, on holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 2,134 horses and mules, 1,821 asses, 5,945 cattle, 8,630 sheep, 9,738 pigs, and 58,517 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 11,406 horses and mules, 7,132 asses, 35,379 cattle, 45,757 sheep, 27,925 pigs, and 174,913 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 6,422 horses and mules, 1,865 asses, 20,460 cattle, 30,481 sheep, 10,674 pigs, and 79,383 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 1,044 horses and mules, 97 asses, 4,616 cattle, 10,344 sheep, 1,236 pigs, and 10,757 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 1,710 horses and mules, 71 asses, 14,458 cattle, 45,755 sheep, 965 pigs, and 10,704 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with the amount of their respective estimated value, were 22,716 horses and mules, £181,728; 10,986 asses, £10,986; 80,856 cattle, £523,577; 141,167 sheep, £155,283; 50,538 pigs, £63,173; and 334,274 poultry, £8,375. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the rural districts, £945,104. In the same year, the totals of the several classes of live stock within the civic districts of the county, together with the amount of the estimated value of each class, were 500 horses and mules, £4,000; 21 asses, £21; 399 cattle, £3,898; 1,096 sheep, £1,128; 1,748 pigs, £2,185; and 3,994 poultry, £160. Total estimated value of live stock within the civic districts, £11,328.

Antiquities.—Pillar-towers exist at Killalla, at Ballagh, at Turlough, near Castlebar, and at Meelick, 3 miles from Swineford. The principal old castles, most in various states of preservation, and some traceable only in their foundations, but remarkable for either their site or their associations, are the castles of Portnahally, a mile west of Downpatrick Head; of Ballycastle, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of the preceding, but razed to a level with the ground; of Ballinglen, in the glen of that name in Tyrawley, about 2 miles from the sea; of Corrickanass, about a mile west of Castleria; of Castleria, on the Rathfrán rivulet, nearly 2 miles from the sea, but razed to the ground; of Deel, on the demesne of Deel-Castle, at the head of Lough Conn; of Crossmolina, at the village of that name; of Knockglass, razed to the foundation; of Cloghans, on the east shore of Lough Conn; of Castle-Island, on an islet of Lough Conn; of Rockfleet, on the shore of Clew bay, 3 miles west of Newport, and said to have been built by Grace O'Malley; of Corrickaneady, 1 mile south-east of Newport; of Derowil, 2 miles from Ballagh; of Castlemore, within a mile of Ballaghadireen; of Breizea, about 3 miles from Ballagh; of Castlema-garret, within a mile of Ballindine; of Marneen, within 2 miles of Claremorris; of Ballylahan, the chief of thirteen in the barony of Gallen; of Inver, on the east shore of Broadhaven; of Knocknalinn, on the west shore of Broadhaven, opposite Inver; of Tarren, in Erris, 6 miles west of the Mullet; of Barnagh, on Blacksod bay, 4 miles from the Mullet; of Corelogh, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of the Mullet; of Dunagh, on the west side of Blacksod bay; and of Lough-Mask, Ballinrobe, Turin, Shruel, Ballybacca, Cloongashel, and many others, all square structures, and mostly built by the families of Burke, Barret, and Jennings. The old monastic structures, within the county, either extinct or standing, are the monasteries of Aghagower, 5 miles from Ballinrobe; of Aghamore, in Costello; of Annagh, in Kilmaine; of Ballagh; of Ballentally; of Ballyhaunis; of Ballina; of Ballinasmaill; of Ballinrobe; of Ballintobber, in Carra; of Boghnoyen; of Innisboffin; of Barriscarra; of Bowfinan; of Burishoole; of Clare; of Cong, celebrated for its architecture, and for accompanying small antiquities; of Cross; of Crossmolina; of Donnacmore; of Erew, on Lough Conn; of Inchmean, in Lough Mask; of Innistormen; of Killycraw; of Killeden; of Killetrynode, nobody knows where; of Kilfinan; of Kilmoremoy; of Kilnegarvan, in Gallen; of Kilroe, in Tyrawley; of Killyn, in Tyrawley; of Leannamaneh; of Mayo, at the village of that name; of Morish, near Westport Quay; of Moyne, on the river Moy; of Rathfrán, in Tyrawley; of Rathcolp, nobody knows where; of Rosark, on the river Moy; of Tarmoncarra, in Erris; and of Urlare, in Costello. Some curious pieces of old masonry occur at DOWNPATRICK: which see. One Druidical altar occurs about a mile south-west of Ballinrobe; and another about half-a-mile west of Ballina.

History.—Mayo was included in the grant which Henry II. made, in 1180, to William Fitz-Adelin de Burgho; and it was so soon colonized by the English that, in the reign of Henry III., a strenuous but vain effort was made to dispossess them. In the early part of the 14th century, Mayo figures in record as county ground; but soon after the assassination of William de Burgho, Earl of Ulster, in 1333, some of the younger branches of the Burke family seized the counties of Mayo and Galway, appropriated these territories to their own use, renounced English names, laws, and alliances, identified themselves and their followers with the native Irish, and successfully established a sort of rude political independence. At this great revolution, the two leading De Burghos, who mastered Mayo and Galway, assumed the names of respectively, MacWilliam Oughter and MacWilliam Eigher, the D'Exeter or D'Exons took the name of MacJordan, the Nungles took that of MacCostello, and other families took the names of MacHubbard, MacDavid, MacPhilben, &c.; from this time till the reign of Elizabeth, the MacWilliams exercised sovereign or mildly despotic authority; and during their administration, the Blakes, the Brownes, the Kirwans, the MacDonnells, and other families from Ulster and the south of Galway, settled within their territories. In 1575, the reigning MacWilliam, accompanied by the heads of the clans of O'Malley and O'Donnell, made his submission to the English government at Galway, and agreed to pay 250 marks a-year for his country, and to hold his possessions by English tenure. But though Mayo was now a second time made a county, and placed under the laws of England, the Burkes first repined, next complained, and next rebelled; and, along with the O'Donnells, the Joyces, and other clans, they rose in arms to reassert their independence, and speedily plunged their country in the horrors of general tumult and anarchy. In July, 1586, however, Sir Richard Bingham marched at the head of a sufficient force to subdue and enslave them, razed several castles of the Burkes and the O'Donnells, scoured the whole county from south to north, and overwhelmed the rebel army in a pitched battle at Ardarae. The rebellion of 1641 was actively promoted by most of the old families of the county, and occasioned an enormous amount of forfeitures; and the wars of the Revolution drew the Burkes, the Brownes, the Dillons, and other families into the Jacobite vortex, and led to the forfeiture of 19,294 acres of land, of the total estimated value of £37,508 3s. In 1796, the small invading French force under General Humbert, landed at one of the lower and westward ramifications of Killalla bay, took possession of the towns of Killalla, Ballina, and Foxford, accumulated around them a large force of discontented Irish, totally defeated a British army of 6,000 under General Lake at Castlebar, spread general alarm and confusion through not only Mayo but Connaught, and were speedily obliged to make a complete and final surrender at Ballinacorney in co. Leitrim. See KILLALLA, BALLINA, CASTLEBAR, and BALLINAMUCK.

MAYO, a parish 3 miles south by east of Ballagh, and partly in the barony of Kilmain, but chiefly in that of Clannorris, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, south-westward, 6 miles; extreme breadth, 3. Area of the Kilmain section, 2,079 acres, 1 road, 19 perches,—of which 12 acres, 2 roads, 24 perches are water. Area of the Clannorris section, 9,769 acres, 3 roads, 24 perches,—of which 102 acres, 9 perches are water, and 604 acres, 38 perches lie detached a brief distance to the west. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,121; in 1841, 4,179. Houses 735. Pop. of the Clannorris section, in 1831, 2,563; in 1841, 3,411. Houses 597. The bishop of Meath is styled Most Reverend, and ranks next the archbishops, taking precedence of all the bishops. The only dignitaries are the archdeacon of Meath and the dean of Clonsilla; and a synod, composed of all the incumbents in the diocese, and presided over by the archdeacon of Meath, supplies the place of a chapter. The diocese is divided into 12 rural deaneries. The gross and the nett income of the bishop, upon an average of three years ending in Dec. 1831, was respectively £5,220 10s. 6d., and £4,068 10s. 7d.

The diocese of Meath comprehends nearly the whole of the counties of Meath and Westmeath, a large part of King's county, and small parts of the counties of Cavan, Longford, and Kildare. Dr. Beaufort estimated it to comprise an area of 663,000 acres, to be divided into 224 parishes, and to contain 77 churches; and he assigned to the county of Meath 324,400 acres, 147 parishes, and 44 churches,—to Cavan, 9,400 acres, 1 parish, and 1 church,—to Longford, 4,300 acres, 1 parish, and 1 church,—to Westmeath, 222,750 acres, 59 parishes, and 20 churches,—to King's county, 102,000 acres, 16 parishes, and 11 churches,—and to Kildare, 750 acres, and part of 1 parish. The length of the diocese is 80 statute miles; its breadth is 20 statute miles; and its area, according to ecclesiastical returns, made a little previous to the Ordnance Survey, is 992,957 acres, 4 perches. Pop., in 1831, 377,859. Number of parishes, 206; of benefices with cure, 102; of sinecure benefices, 1; of benefices consisting of single parishes, 59; of resident incumbents, 89; of non-resident incumbents, 14. Tithe compositions belonging to the benefices, £27,416 1s. 10½d.; glebes, £7,251 4s. 2½d. Gross income, £36,480 6s. 10½d.; nett, £30,291 2s. 2½d. Patrons of 29 benefices, the crown; of 34, the diocesan; of 6, incumbents; of 23, laymen and corporations; of 11, alternate parties. Composition of appropriate tithes, £4,727 14s. 3½d.; of impropriate tithes, £12,076 13s. 2½d. Number of stipendiary curates, 38; gross amount of their salaries, £2,788 16s. 11½d., besides additional advantages enjoyed by 9. Number of benefices without churches, 9; with churches, 94. Total of churches, 99; sittings, 20,727. Cost of building 56, building and enlarging 4, enlarging 4, and repairing 4 of the churches, £79,850 19s. 4½d.; of which £16,507 13s. 9½d. were gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £32,173 5s. 7½d. were lent by that Board, £20,684 5s. 8d. were private donations, and £10,301 2s. 0½d. were raised by parochial assessment. Since the appointment of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, 3 churches have been rebuilt and 4 enlarged, chiefly by means of funds which they have supplied. Number of Presbyterian meeting-houses, 3; of meeting-houses belonging to other bodies of Protestant dissenters, 18; of Roman Catholic chapels, 156. In 1834, the population consisted of 25,626 Churchmen, 672 Presbyterians, 199 Protestant dissenters, and 377,562 Roman Catholics; and 2 benefices contained no member of the Established Church, each of 5 contained not more than 20 members of the Established Church, each of 11 not more than 50, each of 20 not more than 100, each of 25 not more than 200, each of 28 not more than 500, each of 11 not more than 1,000, and each of 3 not more than 2,000. In the same year, 456 daily schools, which made returns of their attendance, had on their books 17,701 males and 11,184 females; and 122 daily schools, which made no returns of their attendance, were estimated to be attended by 7,686 children. Of the total of daily schools, 373 were supported wholly by fees, and 205 wholly or partially by endowment or subscription; and of the latter, 45 were in connection with the National Board, 21 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 2 with the Board of Erasmus Smith, 3 with the Kildare Place Society, and 18 with the London Hibernian Society.

The Roman Catholic diocese of Meath is divided into 64 parishes, and has 62 parochial clergy, and 69 coadjutor clergy or curates. The bishop's parishes are Mullingar and Kells; and the cathedral chapel is at Mullingar. The principal existing monastic establishments are Lovett-house at Navan, and the new convent of the Sisters of Mercy at Tullamore. The names of the 64 parishes, and of the sites of the chapels in each, are as follow:—1. Mullingar. —Mullingar, Walshestown, Gainstown, and private chapels in the gaol and convent; 2. Kells. —Kells and Girty; 3. Clara. —Clara and Horse-leap; 4. Kinnegad. —Kinnegad, Caralstown, and Clonard; 5. Castlepollard. —Castlepollard, Rock, Millbrook, and Tullystown; 6. Castletown. —Castletown, Geoghagan, and Raheenmore; 7. Ratoath. —Ratoath and Ashbourne; 8. Castletown. —Castletown, Kilpatrick, and Fletcherstown; 9. Ballymore. —Ballymore and Boher; 10. Rathcondra. —Milton and Empor; 11. Raham. —Killins, Lynally, and Island; 12. Kilbride. —Mount-Nugent and Ballinacree; 13. Multifarnham. —Multifarnham, Laney, Portmashangan, and Lacken; 14. Grangegeate. —Grangeamount and Newton; 15. Broughilnebracney. —Broughilnebracney and Castlejordan; 16. Kilmessan. —Kilmessan and Dunsany; 17. Drumrany. —Drumrany; 18. Moynalty. —Moynalty and Newcastle; 19. Castletowndelvin. —Castletowndelvin and Killua; 20. Longwood. —Longwood and Killyon; 21. Moyvore. —Moyvore and Ballyburra; 22. Lobinstown. —Lobinstown, Siddan, and Newton; 23. Curraha. —Curraha and Greenogue; 24. Dunboyne. —Dunboyne and Kilbride; 25. Nobber. —Nobber and Cruiston; 26. part of the present King's county; and the final arrangement, or that which now exists, was made in the reign of Elizabeth.

MEATH,

A large county of the province of Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the province of Ulster and the county of Louth; on the east, by the Irish sea and the county of Dublin; on the south, by the county of Kildare; on the south-west, by King's county; and on the west, by the county of Westmeath. Its length of contact with the county of Cavan, measured in a series of straight lines, is 29 miles; with co. Monaghan, 3; with co. Louth, 21; with the Irish sea, 5½; with co. Dublin, 23; with co. Kildare, 23; with King's co., 4½; and with co. Westmeath, 30. The landward boundary-line is formed for a few miles with co. Louth by the Boyne, and with Kildare by the Boyne and the Blackwater; and it passes, at remote intervals, through lakes, along watersheds, and down the course of small streams; but, in a general view, it is strictly artificial. The greatest length of the county, in the direction of east-south-east by east, from Lough Sheelin to the Irish sea, at the boundary with co. Dublin, is 36½ miles; and the greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 32 miles; but, exclusive of their comparatively small wings, which project toward respectively the east, the south-west, and the west-north-west, the greatest length is 33 miles from north to south, and the breadth is from 10½ to 22½. The area comprehends 347,391 acres of arable land, 16,033 of uncultivated land, 12,767 of continuous plantations, 464 of towns, and 3,244 of water,—in all, 579,899 acres.

Surface.—The brief extent of coast extends in the direction of south by east, has nearly a quite straight sea-line, and consists of a low beach, skirted by sand banks and low hills. The whole county may, in a general view, be regarded as a chief and very characteristic part of the great central plain of Ireland; all of an aggregately champaign character; prevaillingly fertile, verdant, and an eminent portion of "the Emerald Isle;" hilly over a small district in the west, and variegated by hills and swells in many districts of the north and the interior, but nowhere mountainous, or rugged, or lifted away from its proud, rich character of a grand expanse of the very finest champaign country. Most of such hills as exist are detached or isolated in position, soft in outline, green or golden in dress, and skirted off into undulations or little tableaus; and, with few exceptions, they possess a bare sufficiency of height and character to relieve the circumjacent plain from a tone of monotony. The principal, together with the altitudes of their summits above sea-level, are Mount-Iver, 563 feet, on the northern border, and connected with the south-western heights of co. Louth; Red Mountain, 402, on the right bank of the Boyne, between Slane and Drogheda; four heights, 462, 530, 550, and 366, in the central district of the barony of Upper Duleek, and from east-south-east to south-south-east of the village of Duleek; twelve heights, 467, 380, 361, 258, 334, 558, 320, 475, 251, 384, 322, and 304, within a circuit of 4½ miles around the village of Dunshaughlin; three heights, 376, 393, and 406, between Garadice and Rathcor; the Hill of Ward, 390, immediately north-east of Athboy; Corrickleek, 509, on the north border, immediately north of Nobber; Scribogue, 618, 3 miles west of Nobber; a height, 629, on the northern boundary, due north-west of Scribogue; and Shelve-Nacallagh, 904, between Crossakeel and Oldcastle.

Waters.—The river Boyne begins to touch the county of Meath not far below its origin in the county of Kildare; traces the boundary between these counties, down to the north-east district of Upper Moyfenragh; flows north-eastward through the interior of Meath, dividing it into two nearly equal parts; and then turning eastward, separates the barony of Lower Duleek from the county of Louth and the borough of Drogheda. It traverses some of the most fertile and best improved districts of Meath; and constitutes a boundary to every barony of this county which touches its banks. It washes the towns of Trim, Navan, and Slane; and is navigable, in part naturally, and in part with artificial aid, from the sea to Navan. The Yellow river traces the south boundary of Upper Moyfenragh with King's co., a brief distance above its embouchure on the left bank of the Boyne. The Upper Blackwater comes sluggishly in from Kildare, and flows along part of the boundary with that county and across a wing of Moyfenragh, to the right bank of the Boyne, 2 miles above Scariff-bridge. The Deel comes in from Westmeath, and flows eastward across the north-west wing of Upper Moyfenragh, to the left side of the Boyne, near the mouth of the Blackwater. The Stonyford river rises on the west border of Meath, and flows south-eastward across a wing of Westmeath, and through the barony of Lune, to the Boyne at Scariff-bridge. The Lower Blackwater comes in from co. Cavan, and flows south-eastward past the town of Kells to the Boyne at the town of Navan. The Moynalty river comes in from co. Cavan, and flows south-south-eastward, and past the village of Moynalty, to the Blackwater, 2 miles below Kells. The Mattock traces the boundary several miles with co. Louth to the left bank of the Boyne. The Nanny Water rises 3 or 4 miles east-south-east of Navan, and flows east-north-eastward, and past the village of Duleek, to the Irish sea, midway between the mouth of the Boyne and the boundary with co. Dublin. A rivulet, of brief length of course, flows along the boundary with co. Dublin to the sea. The headstreams of the Tolka river, and two or three tiny affluents of the other Dublin rivulets and of the Liffey, drain a small band of country on the east border and in the south-east corner of Meath.—A portion of Lough Sheelin, amounting to 1,161 acres, 26 perches, lies within the barony of Fore, at the western extremity of the west-north-westward wing of the county. All the other lakes of both the boundaries and the interior of Meath are small: the principal on the boundaries are Loughs Glass, Bane, Annagh, and Nanagh, on the south-west boundary of the barony of Fore,—Lough Ervey, on the north boundary of Lower Kells,—and Lough Ballyboe, on the north boundary of Lower Slane; and the principal in the interior are Loughs Whitewood, Breaky, and Newcastle, in Lower Kells,—Loughs Brackan and Rahans in Lower Slane,—and Lough Croboy in Upper Moyfenragh.

Climate.—Meath has a lower temperature than the western counties of Ireland, and less rain than the upland counties of even the north and the south. A frosty and comparatively dry winter is usually succeeded by a season of good crops; and an open or wet winter is usually followed by a season of comparatively indifferent crops. North and north-east winds prevail from the first of March till the middle or near the end of May; south and south-west winds prevail during another third of the year; and winds from all quarters blow in succession or rotation during the remaining third of the year. A season of poor crops rarely follows a drought, but often succeeds a long continuance of rain. The farmers look for rain and wind in May and June, and are of opinion

7,467 pigs, and 58,049 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with the estimated value of each, were 22,346 horses and mules, £178,768; 1,850 asses, £1,850; 83,154 cattle, £540,501; 119,394, sheep, £131,333; 33,393 pigs, £41,741; and 300,090 poultry, £7,502. Grand total of estimated value of live stock within the rural districts, £901,695. In the same year, the total of the classes of live stock, and of their estimated value, within the civic districts of the county, were, 360 horses and mules, £2,880; 40 asses, £40; 317 cattle, £2,061; 14 sheep, £15; 1,214 pigs, £1,517; and 2,540 poultry, £64. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the civic districts, £6,577.

Woods.—“The quantity of wood within this county,” said Mr. Thompson, the statist of Meath, in 1802, “is so very small, that it is not worth consideration under a separate head. The plantations, however, are very extensive about the different noblemen and gentlemen’s seats; some arrived at, others approaching fast to maturity, and many in a state of infancy. Full grown plantations consist, for the most part, of groves immediately surrounding old mansions and modern houses. They are chiefly composed of ash, elm, oak, sycamore, and lime, and, in a few instances, Scottish and spruce fir. Those that are coming to maturity, are generally hedgerows or skirting plantations, and are chiefly composed of ash and elm, in the former; beech, fir, and different kinds of forest trees, in the latter; and those in their infancy are situated in extensive ranges on the sides of hills, or large clumps within the view of gentlemen’s seats. Planting precipices and crags, and turning into profit ground, hitherto considered unprofitable, seems to be viewed in its proper light; and every spot of such ground which heretofore was left waste, is now fenced in and planted.” The principal plantations at the time when this passage was written, were those of Allentown, Headfort, the Fingal estate, Dangan, Summerhill, Slane, and Beaupark. In 1841, there were within the county 119 continuous acres, and 37,398 detached trees of oak, 229 acres and 401,008 detached trees of ash, 48 acres and 44,768 detached trees of elm, 99 acres and 40,857 detached trees of beech, 517 acres and 30,450 detached trees of fir, 10,749 acres and 865,236 detached trees of mixed plantations, and 1,006 acres and 2,527 detached trees of orchards,—in all, 12,767 acres of continuous plantations, and 1,422,244 detached trees, the latter equivalent to 8,889 acres, and the two making a grand total of 21,656 acres of wood. Of the continuous plantations, there were planted previous to 1791, 54 acres of oak, 76 of ash, 27 of elm, 30 of beech, 52 of fir, 2,781 of mixed trees, and 464 of orchards.

Manufactures and Trade.—A vidimus of the manufactures of the county in 1802, shows that, at that time, from 200 to 300 looms were employed in weaving sackcloth in the town of Navan,—that a number of looms were employed upon the same fabric in various other parts of the county,—that Dowlas and three-quarters wide coarse linens were manufactured for exportation, principally in the baronies of Slane and Duleek,—that linen of a finer texture was made in the baronies of Demifore and Lower Kells, and sold in the market of Oldcastle,—that some coarse friezes, for home-consumption, were made in the baronies of Dunboyne and Ratoath,—that whiskey was distilled in large quantities at Navan,—that both writing paper and coarse kinds of paper were made at Navan,—that a cotton-mill was in the course of erection on the Boyne below Navan,—that an extensive bleach-green existed on the Nanny Water,—that the straw-hat manufacture was extensively carried on in the town and neighbourhood of Dunboyne, and at Galtrim in the barony of Deesee,—that coarse pottery was manufactured at Knock, in the barony of Morgallion,—that large quantities of nails were made near Garristown,—and that tanneries existed in almost every town of the county. The best complete view, though only an indirect one, of the recent state of manufactures and trade, is afforded by the personal statistics of productive industry, exhibited in the Census of 1841; and we therefore condense and subjoin them:—Fishermen, 20; millers, 198; maltsters, 2; brewers, 3; distiller, 1; barm-maker, 1; bakers, 190; confectioners, 23; salt-manufacturer, 1; fishmongers, 7; egg-dealers, 50; fruiterers, 9; cattle-dealers, 90; horse-dealers, 15; pig-jobbers, 97; salicemasters, 2; corn-dealers, 15; seedsmen, 5; butter-merchants, 4; huxters and provision-dealers, 54; butchers, 92; poultryers, 4; victuallers, 40; grocers, 68; wares-merchants, 2; factory-workers, 68; flax-dressers, 85; carders, 65; spinners of flax, 1,456; spinner of cotton, 1; spinners of wool, 1,484; spinners of unspecified classes, 4,596; winders and warpers, 40; wool-dressers, 7; weavers of cotton, 42; weavers of linen, 249; weavers of woollen, 43; weavers of lace, 88; weavers of unspecified classes, 1,031; manufacturers of lace, 2; manufacturers of woollen, 2; bleachers, 8; dyers, 18; cloth-finishers, 4; curriers, 13; tanners, 19; leather-dresser, 1; breeches-makers, 149; boot and shoe makers, 828; tailors, 700; sempstresses, 573; dress-makers, 600; milliners, 56; stay-makers, 2; knitters, 713; hatters, 36; bonnet-makers, 30; straw-workers, 6; gloves, 2; hair-dressers and barbers, 4; leather-dealer, 1; tax-dealer, 1; hosiers, 3; haberdashers, 2; linen-draper, 1; woollen-draper, 11; pedler, 1; vendors of soft goods, 40; rag and bone dealers, 30; architects, 2; builders, 13; brick-makers, 11; potters, 9; stone-cutters, 90; lime-burners, 12; bricklayers, 10; stone-masons, 408; slaters, 50; thatchers, 32; plasterers, 29; sawyers, 58; carpenters, 1,198; cart-makers, 15; cabinet-makers, 10; coopers, 160; turners, 33; millwrights, 20; wheelwrights, 24; shipwrights, 2; pump-borers, 19; reed-maker, 1; brush-maker, 1; basket-makers, 36; broom-makers, 7; miners, 2; iron-founders, 6; blacksmiths, 708; whitesmiths, 31; nailers, 118; cutlers, 2; gunsmiths, 3; braziers and coppersmiths, 3; wire-workers, 2; bell-hanger, 1; plumbers, 2; tinplate-workers, 15; tinkers, 31; machine-makers, 9; optician and mathematical instrument-maker, 1; watchmakers, 3; coach and car makers, 7; currier and gilder, 1; saddlers, 19; harness-makers, 60; whip-makers, 2; rope-makers, 4; paper-makers, 15; paper-stainers, 2; chandlers and soap-boilers, 22; mat-makers, 18; painters and glaziers, 90; net-maker, 1; sieve-makers, 14; upholsterer, 1; furniture-dressers, 5; delph-dealers, 2; booksellers and stationers, 4; timber-merchant, 1; coal-merchants, 2; ironmongers, 9; merchants of unspecified classes, 27; dealers of unspecified classes, 700; shop-keepers of unspecified classes, 230; shop-assistants, 136; tradesmen of unspecified classes, 12; and apprentices of unspecified classes, 10.

Fairs.—The following are the principal fairs held within the county:—Ashbourne, Jan. 6, June 6, July 29, Oct. 31; Athboy, Jan. 9, March 12, May 4, Aug. 4, Sept. 24, Nov. 9; Ardara, May 7; Armalbeg, May 19, July 19, Oct. 24, and Dec. 7; Ballybogan, Sept. 25; Bective, May 16 and Nov. 1; Carlanstown-Bridge, March 12, May 1, Aug. 6, and Nov. 19; Clonard, May 23 and Nov. 13; Crossakeel, May 9, Aug. 16, and Dec. 15; Drogheda, March 11, April 14, May 12, June 21, Aug. 28, Oct. 30, Nov. 17, and Dec. 15; Drumcondra, April Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools within the county was 572, of scholars 10,407, of male scholars 6,460, of female scholars 3,611, of scholars whose sex was not specified 336, of scholars connected with the Established church 1,280, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 5, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissenters 0, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community, 8,817, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 305;—and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 272, of scholars 10,722, of male scholars 6,797, of female scholars 3,739, of scholars whose sex was not specified 186, of scholars connected with the Established church 1,249, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 4, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissenters 0, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 9,326, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 143. The statistics of education and of ecclesiastical matters for 1834 are given under the diocesan divisions, and may be estimated for the county of Meath by reference to our article on the diocese of Meath. At the close of 1842, the National Board had in full operation within the county 96 daily schools, conducted by 69 male and 34 female teachers, attended by 6,278 male and 4,904 female scholars, and aided during the year with £852 10s. in salaries, £123 10s. in free stock, and £182 17s. 14d. in school requisites at half-price.—During 1843, the number of committals on charges of felony was 329, of cases before magistrates and petty-sessions 184, and of persons committed for drunkenness 9. Of the 329 persons committed on charges of felony, 53 were charged with offences against the person, 19 with offences against property committed with violence, 107 with offences against property committed without violence, 2 with malicious offences against property, and 148 with offences not included in the above classes; 7 were sentenced to transportation, 88 to imprisonment, and 22 to pay fines, 14 were discharged on sureties or were convicted but not sentenced, 4 were found insane on arraignment, 90 were found not guilty on trial, 75 had no bill found against them, 27 were not prosecuted, and 2 were bailed and not tried. The constabulary force consisted, on January 1, 1844, of 1 third-rate county inspector, 1 first-rate sub-inspector, 3 second-rate sub-inspectors, 3 third-rate sub-inspectors, 1 first-rate head-constable, 7 second-rate head-constables, 52 constables, 220 first-rate sub-constables, 43 second-rate sub-constables, and 9 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining this force during 1843 was £13,696 1s. 74d. The constabulary force has its head-quarters at Navan, and is distributed through 46 stations, in the 8 districts of Navan, Trim, Athboy, Kells, Slane, Duleek, Dunshaughlin, and Drogheda. The staff of the county militia is stationed at Kells. A stipendiary magistrate resides at Summerhill. The county gaol is at Trim; bride-wells are at Trim, Navan, and Kells; and the district Lunatic asylum, to which Meath may send 31 patients, is at Dublin. The assizes are held at Trim; quarter-sessions, at Trim, Navan, Kells, Drogheda, Duleek, and Dunshaughlin; and petty-sessions, at Athboy, Crossakeel, Drumcondra, Duleek, Dunboyne, Dunshaughlin, George's Cross, Juliastown, Kells, Longwood, Moynalty, Navan, Oldcastle, Slane, Summerhill, and Trim. An infirmary and a fever hospital are at Navan; workhouses, at Dunshaughlin, Kells, Navan, Oldcastle, and Trim; savings' banks, at Kells, Navan, and Oldcastle; loan funds, at Athboy, Castletown, Duleek, Kells, Navan, Rathmoylan, and Skreen; and dispensaries, at Athboy, Castletown, Crossakeel, Drumcondra, Duleek, Dunboyne, Dunshaughlin, Enfield, Juliastown, Kells, Kentstown, Kilmainham, Moynalty, Navan, Nobber, Oldcastle, Raddanstown, Ratoath, Skreen, Slane, Stamullen, Summerhill, Syddan, and Trim. The annual amount of property valued for the poor-rate is £573,670; the annual amount of property valued under the Act 6 and 7 William IV. is £527,594; and the amount of grand-jury presentments for 1842, was £30,341. The number of tenements valued for the poor-rate is 25,760; and of these, 14,436 were valued under £5,—3,336, under £10,—1,825, under £15,—1,104, under £20,—784, under £25,—520, under £30,—700, under £40,—437, under £50,—and 2,619 at and above £50. Two members were sent to the Irish parliament from the county at large, and two from each of the boroughs of Ratoath, Duleek, Navan, Trim, Kells, and Athboy. Only the two members for the county at large are sent to the imperial parliament. Constituency. in 1841, 1,226; of whom 385 were £50 freeholders, 141 were £20 freeholders, 515 were £10 freeholders, 1 was a £50 leaseholder, 36 were £20 leaseholders, 128 were £10 leaseholders, 2 were £50 rent-chargers, 26 were £20 rent-chargers, and 2 were £10 copyholders.

Population. in 1792, 69,000; in 1821, 128,042; in 1831, 136,872; in 1841, 183,828. Houses. in 1792, 13,693; in 1821, 23,478; in 1831, 23,803; in 1841, 30,785. The following statistics are all of the year 1841. Males, 92,494; females, 91,334; families, 32,737. Inhabited houses, 30,785; complete uninhabited houses, 877; houses in the course of erection, 98. First-class inhabited houses, 694; second-class, 3,793; third-class, 15,575; fourth-class, 10,723. Families residing in first-class houses, 745; in second-class houses, 4,212; in third-class houses, 16,416; in fourth-class houses, 11,364. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 23,978; in manufactures and trade, 6,043; in other pursuits, 2,716. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 584; on the directing of labour, 10,023; on their own manual labour, 21,325; on means not specified, 805. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 41,325; to clothing, 3,193; to lodging, 3,559; to health, 73; to charity, 4; to justice, 404; to education, 253; to religion, 155; unclassified, 3,430; without any specified occupations, 4,836. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 2,512; to clothing, 9,378; to lodging, 16; to health, 46; to charity, 1; to justice, 1; to education, 125; to religion, 10; unclassified, 7,711; without any specified occupation, 37,591. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 28,659; who could read but not write, 14,656; who could neither read nor write, 37,949. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 13,367; who could read but not write, 16,866; who could neither read nor write, 50,273. Males above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 5,591; attending superior schools, 66. Females above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 4,488; attending superior schools, 43. Per-centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 49; married, 46; widowed, 5. Per-centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 40; married, 46; widowed, 14. Physicians, 20; surgeons, 18; apothecaries, 25; midwives, 11; nurses-tenders, 35. Barristers, 8; coroner, 1; attorneys, 15; petty-sessions clerks, 4; excise-officers, 37; bailiffs, 22; gaol-keepers, 10; inspector of weights and measures, 1; school-teachers, 220 males and 71 females; ushers and tutors, 27 males and 8 females; governesses, 46; music and dancing masters, 6. Clergymen of the Established church, 49; Methodist ministers, 2; Presbyterian ministers, 3; Roman

MEELICK, a hamlet in the parish of Killeely, barony of Lower Bunnraty, co. Clare, Munster. It is situated south of the centre of the parish, and 3½ miles north-west of Limerick; and it has a constabulary station, and a branch of the Cratloe dispensary. Adjacent to it is the seat of Meelick-house.

MEELICK, a parish in the barony of Longford, 2 miles south-east of Eyrecourt, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,292 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches,—of which 178 acres, 6 perches are in the river Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 1,511; in 1841, 1,710. Houses 293. The surface is bounded on the east by the Shannon; lies opposite the junction point of King's county and the county of Tipperary; consists of low, flat, and aggregately second-rate land; and includes three isles in the Shannon, called Cromwell's, Friar's, and Big Islands. The hamlet of Meelick stands on the Shannon; and the hamlet of Reaskmore stands in the west. The only seat is Prospect. One constabulary station is at the hamlet of Meelick, and another a short distance east of Reaskmore. The abbey of Meelick, situated on the Shannon, was founded for Franciscans in 1474, by one of the dynasts of Silkenia; it was endowed with a considerable portion of the rich lowlands along the Shannon in its vicinity; and, at the dissolution, it was granted to Sir John King, who assigned it to the Earl of Clanricarde. The monastic building was at one time a sumptuous structure, but is now a roofless and mouldering ruin; and a beautiful pillar, which formerly separated and supported the arches on its south side, has been torn away to supply headstones for the graves in the cemetery. The church contains many curious Latin epitaphs, and an elegant modern monument to the memory of a son of Mr. Martin of Eyrecourt. A small dwelling-house attached to the old abbey, serves as the conventual residence of two monks; a chapel has been erected adjacent to the dwelling-house; and a few acres of land are held on lease by the monks from the Earl of Clanricarde. The Munster annals state, "that, in the year 1203, William de Burgho marched at the head of a great army into Connaught, and so to Meelick, and did there profanely convert the church into a stable, round which he erected a castle of a circular form, wherein he was seen to eat flesh-meat during the whole time of Lent." In consequence of obstructions from islands and rapids to the navigation of the Shannon at Meelick, the Commissioners for improving that navigation proposed to widen the river here, to clear away shoals, to cut away isles and projecting banks, to construct a weir, and to cut a canal of about 1,000 yards in length, at the estimated aggregate cost of £40,000.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DONONAUGHTA [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £36 18s. 5½d., and the rectorial for £60 18s. 5½d.; and the latter are appropriated to the bishop and the archdeacon of Clonfert. The Roman Catholic Convent chapel has an attendance of 100. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 76, and the Roman Catholics to 1,722.

MEELICK, a parish in the barony of Gallen, 3 miles south-west by west of Swineford, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, south by westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 8,062 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches,—of which 99 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,491; in 1841, 3,915. Houses 677. The surface consists, in the aggregate, of good arable and pasture land; and is traversed by both the Moy and the Spaddagh,—the latter falling into the former on the west border. The seats are Newcastle and Oldcastle. The church is in ruins; and a pillar-tower in its vicinity is roofless, yet otherwise in good preservation. The roads from Swineford to Ballina and Castlebar, pass across respectively the northern and the southern extremities of the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILCONDUFF [which see], in the dio. of Achonry. Both the vicarial and the rectorial tithes are compounded for £123 7s. 3½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Walter J. Burke, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilconduff. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 3,741; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 90 boys and 28 girls.

MEELMANE, a village in the parish of Lislee, barony of Ibane and Barryroe, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 269. Houses 55.

MEETING-OF-THE-WATERS. See OVOC.

MEIGH, a quoad sacra parish in the quoad civilia parish of Killeely, barony of Upper Orior, 3½ miles south-west by south of Newry, co. Armagh, Ulster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4½. Pop., in 1831, 7,164. About one-third of the surface is mountains and bog; and the remainder is arable land of the average annual value of 30s. per acre. Slievegullion, 1,893 feet in altitude, lifts its summit on the western boundary. The principal seats are Heath-hall, Hawthorn-hill, Killeely-lodge, and Chelms-cottage. The roads from Newry to Forkhill, and from Camlough to Dundalk, intersect each other in the interior; and have, at their point of intersection, the village of Meigh. The church is situated a little to the south-west of the village, and a cromlech a little to the north-west. The Meigh and Jonesborough dispensary is within the Newry Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 9,185 acres, with a pop. of 6,000; and, in 1839, it expended £44, and administered to 796 patient.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Gross income, £75; nett, £65. Patron, the incumbent of Killeely. The church was built in 1831, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits, and a contribution of £300 from the primate and from the landowners of the district. Sittings 300; attendance 65. The Roman Catholic chapel of Meigh has an attendance of 898; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Forkhill. The Roman Catholic chapels of Ballyliss and Cloghob have an attendance of respectively 700 and 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 212 Churchmen, 18 Presbyterians, and 6,741 Roman Catholics; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from Mr. Chambre, and each of two with £10 from the National Board—had on their books 292 boys and 171 girls.

MELAN, an uninhabited isle at the mouth of the Kenmare estuary, between the mainland of co. Kerry and that of co. Cork, Munster. It has a craggy shore and surface, and is dreaded by the fishermen and the peasantry of the adjacent coasts, both for its rugged and stern character, and especially for its superstitious associations of apparition and malignant spirit.

are three windows and two arched recesses; the windows are also groined and pillared at the angles, the bases of the pillars representing grotesque heads, apparently pressed flat by the superincumbent weight. The mullions are all destroyed, but some portions of the tracery of the tops remain, and a handsome lozenge or nail-headed moulding is continued round the interior of each. A projecting basement runs round the interior of the chapel, about a foot high, and eight inches broad; the bases of the centre member of each column descend to the floor, but those of the parallel members only descend to and rest upon this basement. The upper apartment possesses no particular interest, being plain and devoid of ornament, and having a chimney and recessed closet, was evidently intended as a residence. This beautiful specimen of ancient Irish art was converted by the Moore family into a banqueting-room, and having once echoed to the voices of the monks hymning their matins, next resounded with the orgies of Bacchanals, but now only answers to the noise of swine, being, when last visited by the writer, occupied as a pig-sty!!

'Sic transit gloria mundi.'

A little to the right of this is a small arch penetrating under the hill, said to be the entrance of a subterranean communication with Monasterboice; but this is scarcely possible.—The next object claiming our attention is the baptistery. This building has been an octagon, only four sides of which remain at present; each side was perforated by an arch-doorway, and the exterior angles were ornamented by a reeded pilaster; a projecting cornice is continued round at half the elevation. The doorways are arched and pillared; the arches are semicircular or Saxon, and together with the pillars are a perfect model of exquisite workmanship; they appear as if actually moulded in stone, not cut, and although they are uniform in their general appearance, no two are exactly alike in their details; and certainly, if the productions of a native artist, are highly valuable as a specimen of the state of the fine arts in Ireland, prior to the English invasion. The ornamental parts are composed of a red granite, and were formerly painted and partly gilt. The roof of this building is gone, but the corbels of the groins are still attached to the walls inside. Within a few feet of this temple, on the left, are the vaults or dungeons, horribly dark and dismal; they are two in number, have one small aperture in each for the admission of light, and small recesses in the walls apparently for holding the bread and water of affliction, doled out to the unhappy inmates. Over these vaults, and scattered around, are several massive fragments of masonry, evidently thrown down by violence; and a little removed is a well, an inscription over which informs us, that our Lady's well, after being lost for many years, was rediscovered and re-opened in the year 1826. Beyond this and removed to the left, are the foundations of a large quadrangular building, of which I have not been able to ascertain the original intention. Nestling among the ruins, and apparently trusting for protection to its very solitude and desolation, are several humble cottages, inhabited by still humbler inmates, who still fondly cling to a spot, halloved by the traditional recollections of 700 years, and dear to their hearts, as identified with the ancient glories of Ireland.—The parish of Mellifont is an unendowed or tithe-free curacy, and part of the benefice of TULLYVALEN, in the dio. of Armagh. All the statistics are mixed up with those of Tullyallen.

MELVIN (LOUGH), a lake, partly in the parish of Rossinver, barony of Roslogher, co. Leitrim, Connaught, and partly in the parish of Innismacsaint, barony of Magheraboy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It extends 6 miles north-westward to within 2½ miles of Donegal bay, has an extreme breadth of 1½ mile, and comprehends an area of 4,400 acres, 3 roads, 10 perches in co. Leitrim, and 1,080 acres, 1 road, 1 perch in co. Fermanagh. Its chief feeding streams are the Kilcoo, the Bullagh, and the Glenaniff rivulets; and its superfluous waters are carried off north-westward by the Drowes river to Donegal bay. Its principal islands are Bilberry Island, Gorminish, Roskit Island, Inniskeen, Innismean, Innistemple, and Inisicher. Its Leitrim shore is immediately overhung by the Dartree hills, whose chief summit soars to an altitude of 1,712 feet above sea-level; its lower end, about the base of these hills, presents some very interesting scenery, and its northern shores and screens, though low, rocky, boggy, and tame, are considerably relieved by the wooded surface and the relative positions of the principal islands.

MENLOUGH, a village in the parish of Oromore, barony and county of Galway, Connaught. It stands on the left bank of the Corrib river, amidst low, flat, morassy grounds, 2½ miles north by west of the town of Galway. It is a wretched segregation of wretched cabins,—a specimen on a large scale, of the grouping of huts which constitutes a Connaught hamlet. A quarry of black marble in its vicinity, annually produced, during several years ending in 1837, about 1,000 tons of marble, which was shipped at the port of Galway, and sold at from £7 to £8 per ton in the markets of London and New York. A little south of the village, and immediately overhanging the Corrib river, stands Menlough Castle, the plain but somewhat romantically situated residence of Sir Valentine Blake, Bart. Area of the village, 53 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,100. Houses 220. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 201; in manufactures and trade, 12; in other pursuits, 10. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 0; on the directing of labour, 14; on their own manual labour, 203; on means not specified, 6.

MERRION, a village in the parish of Donnybrook, barony and county of Dublin, Leinster. It stands in the south-east corner of the parish, on the south side of Dublin bay, closely adjacent to the transit of the Dublin and Kingstown railway, 3 miles south-east of the Castle of Dublin. Adjoining it are the localities of Merrion Parade, Merrion Hall, Merrion Castle, a profusion of villas, and several villages. Area, 197 acres. Pop., in 1841, 533. Houses 72. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 22; in manufactures and trade, 26; in other pursuits, 34. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 38; on their own manual labour, 22; on means not specified, 6.

METHILL. See MOTHILL.

MEVAGH, a parish in the barony of Kilmacrenan, 7 miles north-west of Millford, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains the villages of CARRICKART and GLEN: which see. Length, south-south-westward, 6 miles; breadth, from 2 to 3½; area, 24,036 acres, 2 roads, 4 perches,—of which 376 acres, 2 roads, 20 perches are in lakes, and 5 acres, 3 roads, 22 perches are tideway in the river Larkagh. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 6,048, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 4,794. In 1841, 5,937. Houses 1,075. Pop., in 1841, exclusive of Carrickart, 5,620. Houses 1,011. The surface forms a chief part of the peninsula between Sheephaven and Mulroy bay; and, though comprising some good soil, consists in general of poor land. Lough Salt mountain is situated on the southern boundary, and lifts its summit to the alti-

of an active, light-boned variety, very useful for all farming purposes, and for drawing light loads in single-horse carts. The pigs are of an improved sort; and, though not equal to the variety which is common in England, they are very useful animals, and are continuing to improve. Tenants generally hold at will; and such leases as were daily expiring 7 or 8 years ago, were not renewed.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Dangandargan, Donaghmore, Cloneen, Graystown, Holycross, Relick-murry and Athassel, and St. John Baptist, and the whole of the parishes of Ardmayle, Ballysheehan, Baptist-Grange, Barret's-Grange, Boytonrath, Brickendown, Colman, Coolcagh, Coolmundry, Dogstown, Drangan, Erry, Fethard, Gaile, Hoare-Abbey, Kilbragh, Kilconnel, Killeenaleena, Kiltinan, Knockgraffon, Magorban, Magowry, Mora, Outeragh, Peppardstown, Kailstown, Rathcool, Red-City, St. Johnstown, St. Patrick's Rock, and Tullamain. The towns and chief villages are Cashel, Fethard, Drangan, Holycross, and New-Inn. Pop., in 1831, 44,103; in 1841, 45,731. Houses 6,895. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 5,290; in manufactures and trade, 1,324; in other pursuits, 1,012. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 165; on the directing of labour, 3,237; on their own manual labour, 4,077; on means not specified, 117. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 8,423; who could read but not write, 3,308; who could neither read nor write, 8,073. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,324; who could read but not write, 4,785; who could neither read nor write, 11,203. Middlethird lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Cashel. The total number of tenements valued, exclusive of the borough of Cashel, is 5,986; and of these, 3,094 were valued under £5,—823, under £10,—516, under £15,—340, under £20,—270, under £25,—156, under £30,—243, under £40,—133, under £50,—and 411, at and above £50.

MIDDLETHIRD, a barony of the county of Waterford, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Uppertthird, the county of Kilkenny, and the city of Waterford; on the east, by the barony of Gualtier; on the south, by the Atlantic ocean; and, on the west, by the barony of Decies-without-Drum. Its length, either westward or southward, is 8 miles; and its area is 45,120 acres, 1 perch,—of which 534 acres, 15 perches are water, and 510 acres, 17 perches are tideway in the river Suir. Part of the golden valley of the Suir enriches the northern border; and the greater part of the bleak and dangerous bay of Tramore, with its comparatively huge expanse of back strand, stamps repugnant features on the south-east districts. "A large part of the barony," says an official document of 1836, "consists of low stony hills of a second-rate quality of land. The greater portion is kept in grass, and pastured by dairy cows. Some of the highest and most rocky ground is much covered with gorse, and is stocked principally with store cattle; a few sheep are kept, but dairy farmers object to them on the same land with their milk beasts. The latter ground, which is of the first quality, is principally in pasture, and held by dairy farmers. The barony is occupied in farms of a moderate size, and there are fewer very small holdings than in many other districts. It is very usual to find dairies of 20 cows and upwards, and several farmers milk between 50 and 100 beasts. From 40 to 60 Irish acres is a very commonly-sized farm. There is no large quantity of old pasture-ground that has not been broken up in its turn, except on the largest farms and in meadow-ground; but the finest pastures are those that have been in grass for many years. In general farmers plough their pastures after they have been laid down a few years, and as soon as the sod begins to get mossy. They do not attempt to assist and thicken it by top-dressing, all their composts being reserved for their potatoe fields. The pastures are very full of thistles, and no pains are taken by common farmers to destroy them either by pulling up or by mowing, but the common yellow rag-weed does not infest this so much as other districts. The soil willingly produces a good sod, and there would be no difficulty in keeping the land perpetually in grass by proper top-dressing, if it was desirable. The tops of the low hills are so stony, that it would be difficult to do any thing to them that would improve the rough pasturage they afford young cattle: good meadow-ground is scarce, except on the richest land. Dairy cows are consequently kept very much on straw whilst they are dry in the water."—This barony contains part of the parishes of Drumcannon, Kilmeeden, Newcastle, and Trinity-Without, and the whole of the parishes of Dunhill, Island-Icane, Kilbride, Kilburn, Killoteran, Kilranan, Lisnaskill, and Reisk. The only town is Tramore; and the chief village is Annewstown. Pop., in 1831, 14,034; in 1841, 17,151. Houses 2,652. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,130; in manufactures and trade, 475; in other pursuits, 258. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 60; on the directing of labour, 954; on their own manual labour, 1,749; on means not specified, 100. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,361; who could read but not write, 1,079; who could neither read nor write, 3,843. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,081; who could read but not write, 1,161; who could neither read nor write, 5,726.—Middlethird lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Waterford. The total number of tenements valued is 1,345; and of these, 339 were valued under £5,—250, under £10,—165, under £15,—85, under £20,—65, under £25,—57, under £30,—101, under £40,—68, under £50,—and 203, at and above £50.

MIDDLETON, a quoad sacra parish, containing a village of the same name, in the quoad civilia parish of Tynan, barony of Turaney, co. Armagh, Ulster. Length and breadth, each 3 miles. Pop., in 1831, 5,145. Some of the land is good; and some is of middle-rate quality. The principal seat is Ashford, the residence of R. Harris, Esq. The ruins of Ardgonnel Castle stand about a mile south-south-west of the village of Middleton, and about the same distance west-south-west of Ashford. The Ulster Canal passes southward through the interior of the parish, and on the western outskirts of the village. The road from Armagh to Monaghan impinges on the south. The village of Middleton stands 2½ miles south by west of Tynan, and 7 south-west of Armagh. A fair is held on the first Tuesday of every month. Area of the village, 19 acres. Pop., in 1831, 735; in 1841, 708. Houses 152. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 41; in manufactures and trade, 96; in other pursuits, 29. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 83; on their own manual labour, 69; on means not specified, 5.—Middleton parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Glebe, £56 5s. 3d. Gross income, £106 5s. 3d.; nett, £92 3s. 8½d. Patron, the incumbent of Tynan. The church is situated in the village, and was built in 1793, by private subscription. Sittings 250; attendance 200. The Presbyterian meeting-houses in Middleton and Drumhillary have an attendance of respectively 50 and 255. The Roman Catholic chapel, a little south-ticularly that along the shores of Mulroy bay, presents no very interesting scenic or economic feature; yet its frequent expanses of reclaimed hill and valley, its comparatively profuse chequering of waste lands with cultivated fields, and its intertexture of land and water along the margins of the bay, render it unspeakably less dreary than the many and extensive solitudes of other districts of Donegal. Fairs are held on the 23d of every month.—The Millford Poor-law union ranks as the 128th, and was not declared till after April 17, 1841. It lies wholly in the barony of Kilmacrenan, and comprehends an area of 112,748 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 29,230. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are Ramelton, 3,688; Carn, 5,214; Rathmullen, 2,199; Oughterlin, 1,593; Millford, 2,490; Carrickart, 2,205; Mevagh, 1,463; Glinsk, 1,984; Carrowkeel, 2,736; Greenfort, 2,176; Kilmacrenan, 1,473; and Doon, 1,919. The number of elected guardians is 21, and of ex-officio guardians, 5; and of the former, 3 are chosen by each of the divisions of Rathmullen, Carn, and Millford, 2 by each of the divisions of Rathmullen, Carrickart, and Carrowkeel, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The workhouse is to contain accommodation for 400 paupers; but is not yet opened. The medical charities are dispensaries at Clondevadock, Kilmacrenan, Moragh, Ramelton, and Rathmullen; and, in 1839-40, they received £241 6s. from subscription, £241 6s. from public grants, and £18 6s. 9d. from other sources, and expended £370 13s. in salaries to medical officers, £99 9s. 7½d. for medicines, and £15 3s. 8d. for contingencies.—Area of the town, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 406. Houses 66. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 15; in manufactures and trade, 53; in other pursuits, 3. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 47; on their own manual labour, 20.

MILLFORD, a village in the parish of Kilbolane, 5 miles south-west by west of Charleville, barony of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 27 acres. Pop., in 1831, 181; in 1841, 310. Houses 53. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 28; in manufactures and trade, 25; in other pursuits, 3. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 21; on their own manual labour, 32; on means not specified, 2.

MILLFORD AND DALGAN, a bog of two denominations, around the source of the Black river, on the mutual border of the counties of Galway and Mayo, Connaught. Its area is 5,502 acres; its depth is from 15 to 36 feet; and its maximum height above the level of high water in Galway bay is 113 feet. Its exterior parts are firm; but its central parts are brown wet bog, diversified with deries. About 30 or 40 years ago, a small part of it was improved by crops of rape, and another small part was laid down in meadow. Estimated cost of total reclamation, £8,480.

MILLISLE, a village in the parish of Donaghadee, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the coast, and on the road from Donaghadee to Ballywalter, 2½ miles south of Donaghadee. Here is a Presbyterian meeting-house. Area, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 274. Houses 54.

MILLMOUNT, or MILLTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Clontibret, barony of Cremorne, co. Monaghan, Ulster. It stands on the road from Monaghan to Dublin, 5½ miles south-east of Monaghan, and 6 north-west by north of Castleblayney. It is the site of Clontibret church and of a Methodist meeting-house; and immediately adjacent to it is the mansion of Millmount. Pop. not specially returned.

MILL-OF-LOUTH. See LOUTH (MILL OF).

MILLSTREET, a small market and post town, in the parish of Drishane, barony of West Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on a small tributary of the Blackwater, and on the road from Mallow to Killarney, 1½ mile south of the nearest part of the Blackwater, 4½ east-south-east of the nearest part of the boundary with co. Kerry, 8½ south-west by south of Kanturk, 10½ north-north-west of Macroom, 14½ west-south-west of Mallow, 17½ east of Killarney, and 157 south-west of Dublin. The surrounding country is part of a vast congeries of hills and mountains, here intersected by numerous glens and vales, and relieved by several tracts of rich land, and a comparatively large aggregate of arable ground. In the vicinity are the seats of Dromagh, Mr. Leader; Mount Leader, H. Leader, Esq.; Coomlagane, Mr. MacCarthy; and Drishane, Henry Wallis, Esq.;—and within 5 miles is the principal colliery of the Munster coalfield. The town is the only stage between Killarney and either Macroom or Mallow; and it contains a few shops, a small inn, a bridewell, and an infantry barrack. The bridewell is not sufficiently capacious; and, during the year 1843, it cost £20 18s. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Monday of every month. Fairs are held on Jan. 6, March 1 and 12, June 1, Sept. 1, and Dec. 1 and 26. The Millstreet dispensary is within the Kanturk Poor-law union, and serves for a pop. of about 13,789; and, in 1839-40, it expended £114, and administered to 1,362 patients. Another dispensary, also within the Kanturk Poor-law union, is called the Millstreet and Cullen dispensary; and, in 1839-40, it received £55 12s. from subscription. A Roman Catholic parish, in the dio. of Kerry, takes name from Millstreet, and has chapels here and at Cullen. O'Leary, the descendant of a long line of chieftains, and the last conspicuous head of his clan, rendered Millstreet famous by such a singular and obtrusive hospitality as endeavoured to arrest every passing traveller. "This gentleman, who possessed a competent fortune, and was a justice of peace for the county, resided in a small, low house, in the vicinity of the village. His residence was more recommended by the contents of its larder and cellar, and the kind and courtly manners of its owner, than by its external appearance. No door required the protection of a lock, as he said it was useless to secure the contents of his cellar in that way, when any person might partake of them who sought it; and that any one would intrude from without was improbable, as well from the respect in which he was held, as from the reception which it was likely an impertinent intruder would experience. O'Leary, as well by virtue of his magisterial authority as his local and personal influence, maintained the peace at the neighbouring fairs and markets. No constabulary or military assistance was in those days necessary to enforce his behests; his commands, in most cases, were sufficient; but if any proved refractory, obedience was promptly obtained by the vigorous application of the long and weighty pole which he ever carried. His figure was lady, athletic, and commanding; in his latter days, extremely venerable and patriarchal. He generally stationed himself in Millstreet in the morning of each succeeding day, his long pole supporting his steps, and ready, if necessary, to maintain his authority. There he introduced himself to every passing traveller of respectability, and invited him to enter his ever open door, and partake of his unbounded hospitality." Area of the town, 56 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,335; in 1841, 2,162. Houses 280. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 157; in manufactures and trade, 207; in other pursuits, 77.

of the benefice of Dunlavan, in the dio. of Dublin. Pop., in 1831, 712. Houses 116. The pop. of 1831 consisted of 121 Churchmen, and 591 Roman Catholics.

MILLTOWN-MALBAY, a small town in the parish of Kilfurboy, barony of Ibrickane, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the road from Ennistymon to Kilkee, 1½ mile east of the head of a cove of Malbay, 6 south-south-west of Leihinch, 8 south-west by south of Ennistymon, 8½ north-north-east of Doonbeg, 14 north-north-east of Kilkee, 15 west of Ennis, and 127 west-south-west of Dublin. The neighbouring sweep of coast, though not so bold and so continuously bluff as the stretch from Doonbeg to Loop Head, presents several ranges of lofty cliffs screened by low reefs of rocks, intersected or discovered by sandy coves, and often sublimely at war with the infuriated billows of the Atlantic. The surrounding country is bleak and desolate, and consists of land of very diversified quality, all susceptible of much improvement. The roads also are bad; and the general economical interests of the district are broadly marred with the mischiefs of absenteeism. Yet in spite of so many and great disadvantages, Milltown-Malbay has become a favourite resort for summer sea-bathers, and is in a highly prosperous condition. Previous to the close of 1837, no fewer than 204 very fine lodges had been built for the accommodation of visitors. A large portion of the increase to the town, however,—including the main group of the lodges, and what is called the Atlantic hotel,—really constitute a new town, 1½ mile west of the old one, and situated closely adjacent to the shore; and a race-course has been laid out immediately south-east of the new town. The principal villas and lodges within 1½ mile of either the old town or the new, are Prospect-lodge, Victoria-cottage, Millford-house, Knockatanally-house, Ballinphonta, Ilhaun-house, Berry-lodge, Emagh-house, Quilty-house, Kildeema-house, Cahirrush-house, Cassino-lodge, Emmaville, Carraghduff-house, Sandhurst-cottage, Loo-cottage, Sandfield-cottage, Seaview, Billowville, Eyreville, Eller's-lodge, Baker's-lodge, Fara-house, Littleton-lodge, Milltown-house, Woodbine-cottage, Goodland-cottage, Wellington-cottage, Shepherd-hill-house, Westpark-house, Greenlawn, Cloonbony-house, Merville-house, Carrickpatrick-house, Bellmount, Mount-prospect, and Freagh-castle. Mr. Hely Dutton said, respecting Milltown-Malbay in 1808, "Milltown, through the exertions of the proprietor, Mr. Morony, is likely to become one of the best inhabited parts of the county. A few years since there was scarcely a house but his own; but now there may be seen in every direction a great number of neat lodges. Mr. Morony's gardens are amongst the best in the county; though close to the shore of the Atlantic, they produce the greatest abundance of the choicest kinds of fruits and vegetables; but any part of a tree, that rises above the wall, is immediately destroyed. A very handsome church has been lately built at Milltown; but, though it was ridiculed at first as too large, it is found now to be much too small for the great accession of genteel inhabitants. Mr. Morony is now building at Spanish-point elegant and commodious hot and cold baths, and a hotel, capable of containing upwards of sixty single beds, with spacious assembly rooms, &c., &c. Races are often run here, as another amusement for the lodgers. A great natural curiosity may be seen near Mr. Hare's house, called the Puffing Hole; it spouts the water to a considerable height with great force, and, when the sun shines, forms at each emission of the water a beautiful iris." The church and the Roman Catholic chapel are situated at respectively the south end and the north end of the old town. Fairs are held on Feb. 1, March 9, May 4, June 30, Aug. 11, Sep. 10, Oct. 18, and Dec. 9. Courts of petty-sessions are held on Thursdays. The Milltown-Malbay dispensary is within the Ennistymon Poor-law union, serves for a district of 29,591 acres, with a pop. of 14,822; and, in 1839-40, it expended £98 4s., and made 3,543 dispensations of medicine. In 1841, the Milltown-Malbay Loan Fund had a capital of £668, circulated £3,413 in 1,564 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £21 9s. 6d. Area of the town, 32 acres. Pop., in 1831, 726; in 1841, 1,266. Houses 213. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 70; in manufactures and trade, 164; in other pursuits, 40. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 15; on the directing of labour, 148; on their own manual labour, 99; on means not specified, 12.

MILLTOWN-PASS, a hamlet in the parish of Kiltloom, barony of Athlone, 5 miles north-west of the town of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught.

MILLVALE. See BESSBROOK.

MILLOCHMORE, a bog at the south-east extremity of the barony of Dunmore, 3½ miles north-west of Newtown-Bellew, co. Galway, Connaught. Area, 1,218 acres; height above the level of high water in Galway bay, 209 feet; average depth, about 12 feet. It is a firm brown bog, with several deries of gravel, and a sufficient declination for drainage into the Castlemoyle rivulet. Estimated cost of reclamation, £1,504.

MILTOWN. See MILLTOWN.

MINANE, a village in the parish of Tracton, barony of Kimmalee, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 217. Houses 36.

MINARD, a parish in the barony of Corkaguiney, 5½ miles east-south-east of Dingle, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 6,056 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,474; in 1841, 1,686. Houses 281. The surface descends southward from the acclivities of Benbro to the north shore of Dingle bay; it possesses an agreeable variety of contour and coast-line; and it is traversed eastward by the road from Dingle to Castlemaine. Minard Castle is a rather conspicuous feature of the coast; and it was built by the Knights of Kerry, and made some figure in the wars of 1641. See CASTLE-GRAGOORY. A quarry of good brown sandstone was long ago worked in the vicinity of the castle, and seems to have furnished the coigne-stones of several of the old buildings of the county.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILFLY [which see], in the dio. of Ardferret and Aghadoe. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £76 9s. 2½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Cork. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 1,565.

MINEGAHANE, a seat and a small headland on the coast of the barony of Clannaurice, 5 miles north-east by east of Kerry Head, co. Kerry, Munster. "The most remarkable curiosity of this place," says Dr. Smith, "is a prodigious noise made at certain seasons by the sea, somewhat like the firing of cannon, which may be heard at a great distance; this generally precedes a change of the wind, and frequently happens towards the approach of a storm. The same kind of roaring is also heard on the county of Clare side of the Shannon, the sound of which extends a great way round the country. It was probably such a roaring of the sea as this at Minega-hane, that gave rise to the fable of Scylla mentioned by the poets."

MINE-HEAD, a cape in the parish of Ardmore, barony of Decies-within-Drum, 4 miles south-west by south of Helwick-Head, co. Waterford, Munster.

MINISH, a quondam island in Clew bay, co. Mayo, Connaught. In the reign of Charles I. it comprised an area of 12 acres; in 1814, it measured only 420 feet by 30; and, in 1816, it entirely disappeared.

MINISH, or MWEENISH, an island in the parish of Moyrus, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It covers Ard bay, lies 2½ miles west of the west side of the entrance of Kilkerran bay, extends south-south-eastward, measures 2 miles in length and 1 mile in extreme breadth, and lies within half-a-mile of Tynish on the south-east, Mason Island on the west, and the mainland on the north-west, the north, and the east. In its interior are Minish-lodge and Lough Ovan. The sound between it and Tynish bears the name of Minish bay. A cove on the east side of the island, and ramifying from this bay, affords shelter to small vessels, and is much frequented during the season of the herring fishery. The inhabitants of the island amount to about 500, and are employed chiefly in the fisheries.

MINOLA, a parish and a village. See MANILLA.

MINTIAGHS. See CURNORILL.

MISKISK, or SLIEVE-MISKISK, a range of mountains in the barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. They extend south-westward between the Kenmare estuary and Bantry bay; and form a continuation within co. Cork of the Cahra mountains in co. Kerry. The road from Castletown-Berehaven passes across them; and the mines of Allihies are situated at their south-west base.

MITCHELLSTOWN, a post and market town in the parish of Brigown, barony of Condons and Clangibbon, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Cork by way of Cashel, and on a small tributary of the Funcheon, about 1 mile from the latter stream and from the boundary with co. Limerick, 2½ miles from the boundary with co. Tipperary, 3½ east-north-east of Kildorrery, 8 north by east of Fermoy, 11 west of Clogheen, 13½ south-west by west of Cahir, 25 north-north-east of Cork, and 101 south-west by south of Dublin. The immediate environs of the town, on the west and the north, exult in the beauties and embellishments of the noble demesne of Mitchellstown; and the more distant environs to the north-east and to the south are identical with most picturesque portions of respectively the Galtee mountains and the valley of the Blackwater; but the medium environs, or those which may be designated environs in the common and strictly proper sense of the word, are a widely extended series of undulated grounds, very various in soil, and generally destitute of any considerable scenic character. The Mitchellstown estate, the property of the Earl of Kingstown, comprises about 120,000 acres; includes large portions of both the Galtee mountains and the southward plain; and, as to both the rents and the comforts of its agricultural tenantry, may be pronounced to be, on the whole, in good condition; yet it contains a very large proportion of lofty mountainous ground, and thousands of acres which, though now in a state of total or comparative waste, might easily be reclaimed. "A great part," said Mr. Inglis, in 1834, "is held directly from Lord Kingston; and it may be fairly said, that there are no rack-rents. The average rent of land to the occupier, may be stated at about 25s. The mountain farms are yet very low, as low as 5s. an acre; and it was no unusual thing with Lord Kingston to remit altogether the rent of a man who was active and of improving habits. Few thatched farm-houses are to be seen. They are mostly stone slated houses, built in the English mode. Land is generally under a fair state of husbandry, though nowhere in the condition of which it is susceptible." The celebrated caves of Mitchellstown are not in the near neighbourhood of the town, and must be noticed in a separate article.

Mitchellstown demesne comprises not less than 1,300 acres, is enclosed with a wall 10 feet high, and has offices, plantations, gardens, pleasure-grounds, and water-scenes upon the Funcheon river, in a style of the finest taste combined with gorgeous display; and, with a liberality which is honourable alike to the noble proprietor and to his tenantry, it is freely open, in its gravel roads, its grassy walks, its forest paths, and its garden-grounds, to all respectable persons, whether inhabitants of the town or their visitors. The mansion which preceded the present pile, was a spacious but comparatively plain edifice, situated on an eminence, commanding a far-spreading prospect of plain and mountain, and erected, about the year 1778, by Robert Lord Kingsborough, afterwards second Earl of Kingston. The present mansion is a castellated structure, judiciously built on the site of the former edifice, proudly yet justly claiming to be both the largest and the best modern castellated residence in Ireland, erected by the Earl of Kingston in 1823, after designs by the Messrs. Paine of Cork. The towers and battlements of the massive fabric are seen, from many parts of the circumjacent country, rising over and mingling with the surrounding woods; and both its grand character and its majestic position are in bold keeping with the great extent and the imposing style of the surrounding landscape. The front-elevation is magnificently beautiful, yet has the fault of too freely mixing the ecclesiastical with the strictly castellated and palatial style. The towers are seen to the best advantage on the north side; appearing there to rise from a thickly-planted rock, which stretches down to a broad and miry sheet of water. The elevations are of cut stone, lined with brick; and notwithstanding the depth and solidity of the walls, the extreme beauty and finish of all the architecture, and the ornaments of elegantly sculptured armorial bearings of the noble families of Fitzgerald, Fenton, and King, the whole structure was completed in three years. The interior fully accords, in taste and splendour, with the exterior; and the library, in the centre of the principal suite of rooms, contains Lord Viscount Kingsborough's interesting work on Mexican Antiquities; and is, in general, well stored with rare and valuable books. Sir John King, Bart., the ancestor of the Kingston and the Lorton families, married Catherine, the daughter and heiress of Sir William Fenton; and, on the death of Sir William in 1666, he succeeded to the fine and extensive lordship of Mitchellstown. The presence and patronage of the Kingston family were long the chief support of the town, as their demesne and mansion were the chief scenic attraction; but "Mitchellstown and its neighbourhood," said Mr. Inglis in 1834, "have suffered grievously by the late affliction which has fallen upon the Kingston family. The deprivation of an expenditure of £40,000 per annum has been most seriously felt in the country; and the deterioration of Mitchellstown and its neighbourhood has fast followed the misfortune to which I have alluded. If I were to search Ireland throughout I could not find a better illustration of the difference between residence and non-residence, than in the present situation of Mitchellstown."

The town, before being improved within the last 70 years by the Kingston family, had few claims on consideration; but it now wears, in its principal parts, an air of comfort and respectability. A chief feature is a square, as large as some of the smaller of the London squares, and edified with good and almost pretending houses. The entrance-gateway of the Mitchellstown demesne is on one side of this square; an excellent inn, called the Kingston Arms Hotel, is on the opposite side; and about 17 houses of Mitchellstown College occupy a large portion of the remainder. The part of the town which extends along the Cork road presents a very dilapidated appearance, but is intended to be removed, and its site added to the demesne, on the expiration of the existing leases. The College is a square of neat houses, with attached chapel and chaplaincy, for the comfortable maintenance of 12 decayed gentlemen and 16 decayed gentlewomen. It was originally intended for the decayed Protestant tenantry on the Kingston estates; but it now embraces a much more extensive scope. Each of the eleemosynary inmates has a small house and garden, and an allowance of £40 a-year, paid quarterly; and the chaplain has a good house and garden, and a salary of £120 a-year. Several schools, a village library, public shops for the sale of the necessaries of life at cash wholesale prices, and some other judicious establishments for ameliorating the condition of the poor, have at various periods been established by the Kingston family. The church of Brigown, in the town, is a handsome structure, erected in 1800 at the private cost of the Countess of Kingston, and enlarged in 1830 at the cost of £1,800,—of which £500 were a donation from the Earl of Kingston; and a fine service of doubly-gilt silver, for the use of the communion-table, was gifted to it by Lady Kingston. The Roman Catholic chapel is also a handsome edifice, built partly with aid from the late Earl of Kingston, and upon ground which he granted free. A pillar-tower is said by Dr. Smith to have stood 30 yards from the south-west angle of the former church, and to have fallen to the ground in the early part of the 18th century.

The town has well-attended markets and fairs, and conducts a considerable amount of retail business; but it possesses little trade in comparison to the amount of its population and the importance of its aspect and situation. Mr. Inglis, after noticing, in a passage already quoted, the disaster which had fallen upon the town and its proprietor, says, "The evils which have resulted from the misfortune of the Kingston family, affect the whole of the lower classes in the town and its vicinity. When I was in Mitchellstown, the distress was so urgent, that, in order to prevent the actual starvation of hundreds, a public meeting was held, and a subscription was entered into; and the scenes, which the investigation that followed, for the distribution of meal, &c., laid open, were of the most aggravated misery. Will it be believed that in a town containing about 5,000 inhabitants, 1,800 persons were found in a state of starvation? at least 1,200 of these were unemployed labourers and their families; the remaining 600 consisting of the aged, the infirm, widows and their children."—In 1841, the Mitchellstown Loan Fund had a capital of £1,275, circulated £5,968 in 3,203 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £33 11s. 3d. The Mitchellstown fever hospital is within the Fermoy Poor-law union, is a good house, well-adapted to hospital purposes, contains 20 beds, but can accommodate 30 patients, and, by order of Lord Kingston, who liberally subscribes to it, admits every case immediately on application, and, in 1839-40, received £229 13s., and expended £229 19s. 2d. The Mitchellstown dispensary is also within the Fermoy union; and, in 1839-40, it received £85 1s., and expended £97 12s. 7d. The Mitchellstown bride-well contains the usual accommodation; and, in 1843, it cost £30 10s. The town is the residence of the stipendiary magistrate for the East Riding of Cork, and the head-quarters of one of the 9 districts through which the constabulary force of that Riding is distributed. A court of petty-sessions is held on every alternate Friday. The town has a branch-office of the National Bank of Ireland. Fairs are held on Jan. 10, March 25, May 23, July 30, Nov. 12, and Dec. 2 and 6. The town is touched by the Dublin and Cork railway, as projected by the Public Commissioners.—Area of the town, 138 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,543; in 1841, 4,181. Houses 439. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 197; in manufactures and trade, 425; in other pursuits, 304. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 42; on the directing of labour, 453; on their own manual labour, 265; on means not specified, 66.

MITCHELLSTOWN, or STROKESTOWN, a parish in the barony of Lower Slane, 3 miles south-east of Nobber, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, southward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 5 furlongs; area, 973 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 306; in 1841, 248. Houses 41. The surface consists of good land, and is crossed by the road from Kells to Ardee.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of SYDDAN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £46 3s. 1d.; glebe, £12 3s. 9d. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

MITCHELLSTOWN CAVES, a very extensive and exquisitely beautiful series of stalactitic caverns, in the barony of West Ilfa and Offa, co. Tipperary, Munster. They are situated about a mile south of the transit of the Dublin and Cork mail-road, and immediately south of the Public Commissioners' projected line of Dublin and Cork railway, midway between Cahir and Mitchellstown, and 6½ miles north-west by west of Clogheen. They bear the name of Mitchellstown, not from being in the vicinity of that town, for they are seven miles distant from it, but from being situated within the Mitchellstown estate; and, for the same reason, they are sometimes called the Kingston caves. One series, now known as the old caves, but formerly called the cavern of Skeehewrinky, long ago attracted notice, and is sufficiently wonderful to reward the labours of even very distant visitors; but another series, discovered only in 1833 by a person of the name of Condon, and known as the new caves, or, par excellence, the Caves of Mitchellstown, are so very extensive, ramified, and superb, as to have astonished every person who has seen them, and provoked the incredulity of some savans who have heard them described. Two small and mutually adjacent hills of compact grey limestone are the sites of the two series of caves; and the more easterly hill, which contains the new caves, rises about 100 feet above the level of the neighbouring mail-road. Visitors require to be provided with a coarse cap, a coarse overall dress, and a few candles; and they may arrange their dress, before and after their visit, either at Skilly's public house on the nearest part of the public road, or at the house of Gorman, the guardian and cicerone of the caves, in the immediate vicinity of their entrance. Any visitor must spend at least two hours in taking even the most cursory view of the caves; a tasteful admirer of subterranean scenery must spend at least a day; and a curious geologist or an enthusiastic painter or poet may spend as many months as he pleases.

The entrance to the new caves is through an iron grating at the bottom of a quarry, about 60 feet from the summit of the hill. "Upon getting within the grating," says Dr. Apjohn, in an able description of the caves published in the Dublin Geological Journal, "a narrow passage of about four feet in height and thirty-three feet in length, and sloping or of such beauty, as in the upper middle cave. From this statement, however, I should except the eastern extremity of the largest of them, where several specimens of singular beauty are found, and where, upon the sides of the gallery, the spar exhibits the graceful and brilliant undulations of the richest drawing-room hangings. The dimensions assigned to these galleries must not be received as representing their actual extent: to none of them did we find an absolute termination; and the accompanying chart merely gives the limits at which, in consequence of the difficulties opposed to our progress, further investigation was abandoned.

"We shall now, returning to the lower middle cave, examine the outlets of its north-east extremity. From this quarter of it a branch is set off to the south 40 feet in length and six in breadth, from the centre point of which there is an offset of about the same dimensions, which takes a north-east direction, and is crossed at the termination by another gallery parallel to the first, and which has probably, as shall hereafter be shown, a subterranean connection with that prolongation of the upper middle cave in which the river is found. The cross passage just described is incrustated on both sides with sparry productions; fewer in number, and of inferior beauty to those which occur in the galleries it connects. The second outlet of the upper end of the lower middle cave expands, in a north-north-west direction, into a cavity of an elliptical shape, 90 feet in length and 45 in breadth, its south-south-east half being divided into two by a wall of limestone, 45 feet in length and about 15 in breadth. On the western side of this wall, and between it and the side of the cave, occur four or five magnificent pillars, and at the south angle a small cavity composed entirely of spar, which was described to us under the name of the bed-chamber; it is entered on the north side, through a narrow hole; and from it, but through a smaller and more difficult passage, it is possible to return into the lower middle cave.

The portion of the bed-chamber cave to the east side of the stony partition, exhibits nothing remarkable until we reach the north-east extremity; here three magnificent stalagmites are encountered, and a pillar of unusual magnitude extending from the floor to the ceiling, and which has received from the guides the name of Lot's wife. This huge stalactitic production occurs at the commencement of an avenue 20 feet long, and about 10 wide, at the termination of which three distinct adits present themselves. One of these faces directly the avenue just described, and leads to the Garret cave; the other two, which are on the left hand, and distant from each other about 7 feet, constitute the respective entrances to the grand Kingston gallery and Sand cave. The Garret cave extends 235 feet in an easterly direction, with a sweep to the south; its breadth at the commencement being 15, and augmenting gradually until, at its widest part, it becomes 55 feet. The floor, which is everywhere covered with blocks of limestone scattered in the greatest disorder, is not horizontal, but ascends by a considerable angle, so as, at its remote extremity, to come within a few feet of the ceiling: there is no department of the entire cavern in which pillars, stalactites, and stalagmites of spar are more numerous or more beautiful. The more remote or upper portion, also, of this chamber, is distinguished by the enormous number of small stalactites of from 6 inches to a foot in length, depending from the ceiling, and studding it almost at every point. The ceiling also, in one part of the cave, would appear to have recently fallen, the floor being covered with a confused pile of fragmented rocks, and the corresponding portion of the roof being destitute of stalactitic productions. Upon returning to the entrance to the Garret cave, and ascending by a steep and rugged passage into the most westerly of the two adits already mentioned, we find ourselves within the grand Kingston gallery—the most remarkable compartment of the entire excavation. It is a perfectly straight hall, 175 feet in length and 7 in breadth, with a direction about one point to the west of north. The arching of this gallery is in the Gothic style, and its walls are everywhere glazed with spar, in some places red, in others mottled, but nowhere of a perfectly white colour. This gallery, at the distance of about 126 feet from its entrance, was originally blocked up by a thin diaphragm or sheet of spar, but it is now perfectly continuous throughout, a passage having been some time ago broken in the partition, through which one individual at a time can pass. Immediately beyond this partition, a large pillar is met with in the centre of the gallery,—about 15 feet farther on, another of the same magnitude,—and some distance beyond this, and in a line, 4 others of inferior size. The grand gallery terminates in a rectangular cave, 52 feet wide and 50 long, from the north of which there is a passage in the same line with the grand gallery, and which admitted of being explored to the extent of 87 feet. From the rectangular cave just described, and which is situated about 12 feet lower than the floor of the Kingston gallery, there is a passage leading back to the entrance to the Garret cave. This passage, which is called the Sand cave, from the quantity of this material which covers its floor, is, for two-thirds of its length, 12, and for the remainder 3 feet wide; it is perfectly parallel to, and of the same length with the Kingston gallery, but placed at a somewhat lower level. On the east side of the rectangular cave in which the Sand cave and the gallery terminate, there are two long and narrow entrances, which pass directly east-north-east, the northern one bending at the distance of about 13 feet to the south, so as to meet the other. From this point they constitute one passage, which proceeds directly south, and then, bending westward, opens into the Sand cave at about 40 feet from its northern point of commencement. This winding channel expands and contracts in its progress, so as to form a string of small cells called closets, amounting, as we were informed, to about 20 in number; these closets, however, though laid down in the map, we did not personally examine. In the Sand cave there are no sparry formations, and, indeed, nothing of any interest which has not been mentioned, save a collection of water in a calcareous basin, within a few feet of its southern termination.

"From the preceding brief description, the newly discovered cavern, it will be seen, is not a single excavation, but is composed of a number of chambers, some of greater, some of less magnitude, connected by rugged and narrow passages, the floor of these being generally covered with prismatic blocks of limestone, and the sides and ceiling loaded with calcareous incrustations. Pillars also of the same material, as has been already described, often connect the floor and ceiling; and the masses of limestone on the floor are, in many places, covered with spar, giving rise to stalactitic productions of the most varied and fantastic appearance. The length of the entire cavern from the entrance to the extremity of the long cave, is 700 feet; but a line passing through the grand gallery, and extending to the northern and southern limits of the entire series of cavities, would measure 870 feet. Another line, drawn from the entrance to the furthest extremity of the Garret cave, has an east and west direction, measuring 572 feet, which may be considered as giving the greatest breadth of the cavern, or as in 1831, of 158,—yet, with ludicrous inconsistency, they, in the very same page, report that the situation of Rathbin is unknown to the incumbent.

MOCOLLOP, a parish in the barony of Coshbride and Coshmere, co. Waterford, Munster. It is now consolidated with the parish of LISMORE; which see. Mocollop church and castle are situated on the left bank of the Blackwater, and on the road from Lismore to Fernoy, 5½ miles west of Lismore. The ancient ruin of Mocollop Castle consists of a large round tower, and several small square towers flanking its intermediate base; and, as seen in almost any direction, but especially from the spot on the opposite side of the river whence the cannon of Cromwell in 1640 reduced it to its present dilapidated condition, it presents, in combination with several adjacent improvements, a decidedly picturesque appearance. The situation of the modern mansion, the residence of Francis Drew, Esq., is plain and rather low, and seems to have been selected with the view of affording the best foil to the old castle; and the two piles, with the church which fills up the chasm between them, a well-planted hill on the immediate background, and the more distant mountains of Clogheen and Arraglin making a dimmed perspective and cutting a lofty sky-line, compose one of the prettiest landscapes on which any ordinary imagination would choose to expatiate. The park and the adjacent grounds are well planted; and the orchard is distinguished for the cider of its apples. A neat timber bridge, subject to a small postage, spans the Blackwater a little west of the castle, and was built at the cost of Mr. Drew.

MOCURRY, or TOMACURRY, a hamlet in the parish of Monart, barony of Scarewalsh, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the right bank of the Slaney, and on the road from Enniscorthy to Newtownbary, 3¼ miles north of Enniscorthy. Fairs are held on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday, and on Oct. 26, and Nov. 27. Pop. not specially returned.

MODELIGO, a parish in the barony of Decies-without-Drum, 3¼ miles east of Cappoquin, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, southward, 5¼ miles; breadth, from a few perches in the north to 3¼ miles in the centre; area, 7,518 acres, 1 road, 32 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 2,645, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 2,116; in 1841, 2,466. Houses 343. The surface descends from the summit-line of the Knockmeledown mountains to the place where the vale of the Phinisk begins to open upon the valley of the Blackwater; and it consists of very various land, from wild and waste mountain to tolerably good valley ground, but in an aggregate view may be pronounced of third-rate quality. One summit in the extreme north, one 2 miles to the south, and one on the eastern border, have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 1,418, 689, and 681 feet. The Magaha rivulet traces a large part of the western boundary; and the Phinisk first traces part of the eastern boundary, next runs across the interior, and next runs along the southern boundary, descending, while in contact with the parish, from an elevation of 474 to one of between 50 and 43 feet above sea-level. The hamlets are Modeligo, Newtown, Redgate, and Ballykerin. The chief seats are Brook-lodge and Rockfield-house. The principal antiquities are the ruins of a church and of various old secular buildings,—the chief of which is Sledy Castle, built in 1628 by Philip MacGrath, and belonging to the MacGrath family, who were extensive proprietors of the surrounding country. The mail-road from Waterford to Cork passes across the extreme south of the parish; and the road from Youghal to Clonmel by way of Ballinacult passes up the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £90, and the rectorial for £180; and the latter are appropriated to the prebend of Modeligo. The vicarages of Modeligo and KILGOBINET [see that article], constitute the benefice of Modeligo. Gross income, £150; nett, £141 8s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the stipendiary curacy of a small benefice in the city of Waterford; and is non-resident in Modeligo. A curate receives £5 a-year for performing the occasional duties. There is no church. The Modeligo, the Kilgobinet, and the Graunbawn, Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,700, 400, and 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the second and the third of these chapels are united to the chapel of Colligan, while the first is united to the chapel of Affane. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and the union amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to respectively 2,150 and 4,961; 3 daily schools in the parish—one of which was aided with £1 a-year from Mr. Murgave, and one with £2 from Mr. Murgave and £3 from Sir Leonard Holmes—had on their books 183 boys and 105 girls; and 6 daily schools in the union had on their books 380 boys and 190 girls.

MODESHILL, a parish in the barony of Slieveardagh, 24 miles north-north-east of Mullinahone, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, 2¼ miles; extreme breadth, 2¼; area, 2,100 acres, 2 roads, 33 perches. Pop., in 1831, 998; in 1841, 1,033. Houses 161. The surface is situated on the eastern margin of the county; consists of excellent land; and is drained eastward by one of the head-streams of the King's river. Within it are ruins of a church and a castle.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LISNULTEN [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £260. In 1834, the parishioners, with two exceptions, were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

MODREENY, a parish in the barony of Lower Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. It contains the town of CLOUGHJORDAN; which see. Length, westward, 5 miles; breadth, from 2¼ to 3¼; area, 12,165½ acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,506; in 1841, 5,286. Houses 875. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,682; in 1841, 4,122. Houses 690. But the ecclesiastical parish is exclusive of the perpetual curacy of Cloughjordan, and had, in 1831, a pop. of only 1,736. The land, though generally light, is of good quality for both tillage and pasturage; and it possesses a large aggregate of embellishment from woods, demesnes, and villa-grounds. The hamlets are Modreeny and Garraun. The principal seats are Cloughjordan, Deer-Park-house, Wood-house, Knockanacree, Coolanamumna, Ballyrapple, Tennessee, Elysum-house, Fort-William, Northland, Martin-hall, Kylebeg-house, Ballynavin-castle, Cloughkeatny-castle, Ballyrickard-house, Behamore, and Modreeny-house,—the last the residence of Sir Amyrald Danser, Bart. The road from Bert to Nenagh passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of KILMALOE. Tithe composition, £533 10s. 9½d.; glebe, £38 4s. 8½d. Gross income, £571 15s. 5½d.; nett, £445 18s. 4½d. Patron, the diocesan. The following statistics are exclusive of the perpetual curacy of Cloughjordan. The church was built in 1828, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits.ittings 200; attendance 70. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Arderony and Kilruane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 210, and the MOHILL, a barony in the south of the county of Leitrim, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the baronies of Leitrim and Carrigallen; on the east, by the barony of Carrigallen and the county of Longford; on the south, by the county of Longford; and on the west, by the county of Roscommon and the barony of Leitrim. Its length, south by eastward, is 13½ miles; its greatest breadth is 8½; and its area is 64,033 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches,—of which 3,235 acres, 22 perches are water. The surface is low and little diversified, compared to that of most other districts of the county; and it contains a large proportion of strong wet land, upon a substratum of retentive yellow clay. The Shannon, with its lacustrine expansions of Boderg and Boffin, defines much of the western boundary; the river Eslin flows partly on the western boundary, and partly through the western interior; and the river Rinn drains a large proportion of the central and the eastern districts. The chief of numerous lakes, both in the interior and on the boundaries, are Loughs Rinn, Cloonbonagh, Cloonfinnan, Cloonbo, Lakeview, Bog, Sallagh, Lakefield, Greenagh, Adoon, Keeldra, Mahanagh, Seltan, Rowan, Drumcollop, Castlefore, Drumlaheen, Nacarriga, Loughtown, Aghakilconnell, Annagheary, Kilmaddaroe, Drumgila, and Adaff. The practice of husbandry—especially as to exhausting series of cereal cropping, the absence of draining on wet lands, and the careless permission of the overgrowth of grass-lands by weeds—is generally in a very wretched condition; but, laudable and judicious efforts have been made on the property of the Earl of Leitrim, under the superintendence of his intelligent agricultural agent, Mr. William Bruce, to correct existing evils, and to exhibit to the tenantry the methods and the advantages of good cereal cropping, and of the growth of clover, turnips, and mangel-wurzel. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred 3 townlands of the parish of Mohill, containing, in 1841, a pop. of 157, from the barony and county of Longford to the barony of Mohill.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Annaduff, Cloone, Fenagh, and Mohill; and its towns and chief villages are Mohill, Drumod, Cloone, and part of Roskey. Pop., in 1831, 32,749; in 1841, 35,714. Houses 6,053. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 5,056; in manufactures and trade, 948; in other pursuits, 376. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 141; on the directing of labour, 1,427; on their own manual labour, 4,699; on means not specified, 113. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,779; who could read but not write, 2,828; who could neither read nor write, 6,812. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,791; who could read but not write, 3,586; who could neither read nor write, 10,203.—Mohill barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Mohill. The total number of tenements valued is 5,958; and of these, 4,049 were valued under £5,—1,469, under £10,—257, under £15,—86, under £20,—27, under £25,—20, under £30,—20, under £40,—12, under £50,—and 18, at and above £50.

MOHILL, a parish, partly in the barony and county of Longford, Leinster, but chiefly in the baronies of Leitrim and Mohill, co. Leitrim, Connaught. The barony of Mohill section contains the town of MOHILL, and part of the village of ROSKERY: see these articles. Length, southward, 13 miles; breadth, from 2 to 4½. Area of the Longford section, 3,715 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches,—of which 392 acres, 23 perches are in Lough Forbes and the Shannon. Area of the barony of Leitrim section, 3,373 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches,—of which 41 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches are in Lough Mac-

Hugh. Area of the barony of Mohill section, 23,432 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches,—of which 25 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches are in the Shannon, and 512 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch are in lakes. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred the townlands of Aghamore, Killineker, and Knockmacrory, from the Longford section to the barony of Mohill section. Pop. of the entire parish, in 1831, 16,664; in 1841, 17,918. Houses 3,038. Pop. of the Longford section, in 1831, 1,291; in 1841, 1,337. Houses 228. Pop. of the barony of Leitrim section, in 1831, 1,868; in 1841, 1,752. Houses 304. Pop. of the barony of Mohill section, exclusive of the town of Mohill, in 1831, 11,899; in 1841, 13,303. Houses 2,313. "The entire parish of Mohill, containing 16,664 inhabitants," says an official report published in 1836, "consists of 11,595 Irish acres of titheable land, 942 of abbey-land and glebe-tithe free, and 6,793 of bog and roads untitheable. In the tithe applotment book, these titheable lands are divided into 1,640 holdings; but as the addition of 'Co.' or 'company,' is attached to the name of the occupier in 168 cases, and as the 'Co.' cannot be taken to consist of less than 2 persons, 336 must be added to this number, and 20 deducted for the same persons' name appearing more than once on the list, and this will give 1,956 as the number of occupiers of the titheable land (11,595 Irish acres), and the average size of the holding may therefore be taken as under 6 acres. Allowing the same, and the entire number in the parish will be 2,125. It appears from the Population Returns in 1831, that the number of families employed chiefly in agriculture were 2,541; there will be, therefore, at least 400 heads of families, besides the single men, who are not occupiers of land. This circumstance, combined with that of the small size of the farm not allowing sufficient land to be kept in tillage to occupy the whole labour of the farmer, will, in some degree, account for the numbers which yearly seek work elsewhere. The enumerator of the population states, that at the time of taking the Census 321 persons were absent in Leinster and England, and some of these were farmers occupying nearly six acres of land." The Shannon traces the western boundary, from the foot of Lough Boffin to the middle of Lough Forbes; the Eslin flows principally in the interior, and partly on the western boundary, to the Shannon at the foot of Lough Boffin; and the Rinn flows on the eastern boundary of the Mohill section, and through the middle of the Longford section, to Lough Forbes. The principal seats are Aghamore, Drumard, Lakeview, Cloonahir, Springfield, Drumrahan, Drummagan, and Bunybeg. The hamlets are Aghamore, Milltown, Upper Drumeilvy, Lower Drumeilvy, and Drumdoo.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £436 6s. 9d.; glebe, £380. Gross income, £816 6s. 9d.; nett, £695 14s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure precentorship of Ross cathedral; and he is resident in Mohill. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £218 3s. 4d.; and are impropriate in Sir Hugh Crofton, Bart. A curate receives a salary of £70. The church is an old building; and was enlarged in 1815, by means of a loan of £249 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance 400. The Methodist chapel has an attendance of 90. Five Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of severally 700, 700, 500, about 1,190, and about 150. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 1,560, and the Roman Catholics to 15,721; and 23 daily schools had on their books 1,007 boys and 362 girls. Two of the schools were salaried with £8 each from the Ardagh

Society; two, with £12 each from the National Board; one, with £12 and other advantages from subscription; one, with £8 from subscription; one, with £7 12s. from the London Hibernian Society, and £1 10s. from the Rev. Mr. Trench; and one, with about £10 10s. from the London Hibernian Society.

MOHILL, a small market and post town, in the parish and barony of Mohill, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It stands at the intersection of the road from Carrick-on-Shannon to Granard with that from Drumod to Ballinamore, 4 miles north-north-east of Drumod, $4\frac{1}{2}$ east of Dromsna, 8 east by south of Carrick-on-Shannon, 8 south-west by west of Carrigallen, and 71 north-west of Dublin. An ancient abbey, which stood at the town, is alleged to have been founded, for canons regular, in the year 608; and it possessed many glebe-lands, vassals' fees, tithes, and other items of property. The present parish-church stands on part of the abbey's site, and is said to have been built of the materials of its walls. An old castle also stood on the east side of the town. Mohill is the residence of a stipendiary magistrate, and the head-quarters of one of the 5 districts through which the county constabulary are distributed. A court of petty-sessions is held on every alternate Tuesday. Pairs are held on Jan. 12, Feb. 2 and 25, March 16, April 13, May 8, June 1, July 6 and 31, Aug. 17, Sept. 14, Oct. 19, Nov. 9, and Dec. 7.—The Mohill Poor-law union ranks as the 70th, and was declared on Sept. 5, 1839. It lies wholly within co. Leitrim, and comprehends an area of 137,768 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 63,715. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are Mohill, 7,672; Ealin, 3,188; Annaduff, 5,738; Armaghveagh, 4,595; Rinn, 6,242; Cloone, 6,006; Aghavas, 4,425; Carrigallen, 3,439; Newtownmore, 4,370; Drumreilly, 2,954; Ballinamore, 6,747; Oughtteragh, 4,147; and Fenagh, 4,172. The number of ex-officio guardians is 7, and of elected guardians 22; and of the latter, 3 are chosen by the division of Mohill, 2 by each of the divisions of Annaduff, Armaghveagh, Rinn, Cloone, Aghavas, Newtownmore, and Ballinamore, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The union comprehends the whole of the baronies of Mohill and Carrigallen, and a small part of the barony of Leitrim. The total number of tenements valued is 11,592; and of these, 7,687 were valued under £5,—2,840, under £10,—621, under £15,—190, under £20,—81, under £25,—57, under £30,—35, under £40,—31, under £50,—and 50, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £57,777 12s. 3d.; the total number of persons rated is 11,592; and of these, 1,988 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,249, not exceeding £2,—1,457, not exceeding £3,—1,512, not exceeding £4,—and 1,266, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on June 29, 1840,—to be completed in Oct. 1841,—to cost £6,700 for building and completion, and £1,280 12s. 6d. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 6 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches, obtained for £19 7s. 6d. of compensation to occupying tenant, and an annual rent of £15 10s.—and to contain accommodation for 700 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was June 8, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £1,294 1s. 6d.; and the total previous expenditure was £407 8s. 6d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 129. The only medical charities are dispensaries at Mohill, Ballinamore, and Carrigallen. The Mohill dispensary serves for a district of 62,985 acres, with a pop. of 36,172; and, in 1839-40, it expended £128 6s. 10d., and made 5,765 dispensations of medicine.—

Area of the town, 47 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,606; in 1841, 1,626. Houses 264. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 98; in manufactures and trade, 146; in other pursuits, 75. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 31; on the directing of labour, 159; on their own manual labour, 113; on means not specified, 16.

MOIRA, or ST. INNS-OF-MOIRA, a parish, containing a town of the same name, on the north border of the barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. Length, north-west by westward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{3}{4}$ to $2\frac{1}{4}$; area, 6,096 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches,—of which 26 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,801; in 1841, 4,148. Houses 668. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,014; in 1841, 3,325. Houses 547. The surface lies near the north-west extremity of the county; reaches to within $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles of the south-east corner of Lough Neagh; is traversed by the Lagan Navigation, the Ulster railway, and the great west road from Lisburn to Belfast; consists wholly of profitable land; and presents a warm, fertile, well-cultivated, and agreeably diversified appearance. The whole parish, but particularly the immediate vicinity of the town, is rife with the activities of the linen manufacture. The remains of the quondam demesne of the Earls of Moira adjoining the town, now form part of the estate of Sir Robert Bateson, Bart. The principal rural residences are Tullyard-house, Fort-William, Maryvale, Nuthill, Mill-house, Trustone-quarry-house, Bohier-house, Warringfield, Magherahinch-house, Berwick-house, Drumbane-house, Legamore-house, and Old Hermitage. The mineral wealth of the parish, particularly in an esteemed sort of white limestone, has long been considerable.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Drogheda. Tithe composition, £351 15s. 7d.; glebe, £51. Gross income, £204 15s. 7d.; nett, £138 8s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church, though in good repair, is an old building of unknown date. Sittings 500; attendance, from 250 to 400. The Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly of the Synod of Ulster, is attended by from 70 to 100; the Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly of the Secession Synod, by 200; the Methodist meeting-house, by 100; and the Roman Catholic chapel, by 236; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the last is united to the chapel of Magheralin. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,073 Churchmen, 683 Presbyterians, 55 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,064 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 80 children; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from Lady Bateson, one with £8 from the National Board, and one with £2 from the rector and £3 from Sir R. Bateson—had on their books 129 boys and 137 girls. In 1842, the National Board had schools at Lurganville and Ballygowan.

MOIRA, a small market and post town, in the parish of Moira, barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the road from Belfast to Armagh, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Magheralin, 4 east-north-east of Lurgan, $4\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Drogheda, 7 west-south-west of Lisburn, 13 south-west of Belfast, 17 north-east of Armagh, and 71 north of Dublin. It consists principally of a long, spacious, clean street along the Belfast and Armagh highway; and possesses such appearances of comfort and prosperity as are common to the best class of the small linen-manufacturing towns of Ulster. A court of petty-sessions is held on every alternate Monday. Fairs are held on the first Thursday of Feb., May, Aug., and Nov. The town was anciently called Moyrath; and is said to have been the scene of a sanguinary battle between two Irish clans in the 7th century. The chorographist of the county, in 1774, expatiates, with luxurious fancy, upon the vegetable wealth, the horticultural beauty, the botanical attractions, and the tasteful and intricate disposition of the gardens and parks of Sir John Rawdon's demesne, now included in the property of Sir Robert Bateson. The town gives the title of Earl in the peerage of Ireland to the noble family of Campbell-Rawdon-Hastings, Earls of Loudon in the peerage of Scotland, and Marquises of Hastings in the peerage of the United Kingdom. Sir John Rawdon was created Baron Rawdon in 1750, and advanced to the dignity of Earl of Moira in 1761; and his son, Francis, who succeeded to his titles in 1793, and who is well known to history as both a soldier and a statesman, married Flora, Countess of Loudon, in her own right. Area of the town, 30 acres. Pop., in 1831, 787; in 1841, 823. Houses 121. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 67; in manufactures and trade, 70; in other pursuits, 15. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 70; on their own manual labour, 74; on means not specified, 2.

MOIRUS. See MOYRUS.

MOISTA SOUND, a romantic feature of the extreme north-east coast of the parish of Kilcommon, and barony of Erris, 4 miles west-north-west of Balderg, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is a chasm of about a cable's length in extent, of perpendicular sides of rock at least 500 feet in height, and of so narrow a sea-path or bottom that a boat's oars must be reefed in passing through it.

MOIVORE. See MOYVORE.

MOLAHIFFE, or MULLAHIFFE, a parish on the north border of the barony of Trughenackny, 4½ miles north-east of Milltown, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area 9,808 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,706; in 1841, 3,635. Houses 506. The surface lies along the left bank of the river Maíne; is traversed southward by the road from Tralee to Killarney; and consists of about equal proportions of good and bad land—very much of the latter being bog. The old castles of Molahiffe, Clonmellane, and Castle-Fiery, belonged anciently to the Mac-Canthies, and afterwards became the property of Lord Kenmare.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoe. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £160; and the latter are inappropriate in Shea Lalor, Esq. The vicarages of Molahiffe, KILBONANE, and KILCRE-
DANE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Molahiffe. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3½. Pop., in 1831, 7,795. Gross income, £381 10s. 5d.; nett, £358 8s. 11d. Patron, William Crosbie, Esq. of Ardfert Abbey. The incumbent is also master of the royal school of Cavan, and does not reside in Molahiffe. A curate receives a salary of £150. The church was built in 1818, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 110; attendance 13. A private house is used as a parochial place of worship in Kilbonane. The Molahiffe, Kilbonane, and Kilcredane, Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,500, 1,200, and 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 3,956; the Protestants of the union to 70, and the Roman Catholics to 8,157; 2 pay daily schools in the parish had on their books 93 boys and 27 girls; 5 hedge-schools previously existed in the parish, but were temporarily suspended; and 8 daily schools in the union had on their books 205 boys and 63 girls. In 1842, the National Board had a boys' school and a girls' school at Fieries.—The hamlet of Molahiffe had, in 1831, a pop. of 48. A fair is held on May 26. The Molahiffe dispensary is within the Killarney Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £48, and administered to 2,420 patients.

MOLANA, a pendicle of land, formerly an island, and called Der-Innis, in the parish of Templemichael, barony of Coshmore and Coshbride, co. Waterford, Munster. It is situated on the Blackwater, 2 miles north-north-west of Youghal. An old abbey, which stands here, is alleged to have been founded in the 6th century, by a St. Molanside, for canons regular of the order of St. Augustine; and, at the dissolution, it was granted to Sir Walter Raleigh, who assigned it to the Earl of Cork. The building was Gothic, and seemingly very ancient; and the nave and choir of the church were, not very long ago, entire, but now exist in the form of ivied, amorphous, unpicturesque walls. Molana is traditionally asserted to have been the burial-place of Richmond Le Gros; and a tablet has been placed within the ruin to his memory.

MOLOGGA. See TEMPLENOLOGGA.

MOLOUGH, MULLOUGH, or MOYLACH, a parish in the barony of West Iffa and Offa, 7 miles south-east by south of Cahir, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,625 acres, 2 roads, 2 perches,—of which 36 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches are in the Suir. Pop., in 1831, 746; in 1841, 703. Houses 106. The surface lies along the left bank of the Suir, and consists of good land. The seats are Greenmount and Bargesland. A convent for Augustinian nuns formerly stood in Molough, and was granted, at the dissolution, to Sir Henry Radcliffe.—This parish is a particle of the benefice of NEWCASTLE [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. The tithes are wholly inappropriate in Henry P. Garde, Esq. of Youghal. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics, and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

MOLUSK, or MOBLUSK, a parish in the barony of Lower Belfast, 2 miles south-west of Carrumoney, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, south-south-westward, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 928 acres, 3 roads, 31 perches. Pop., in 1831, 766; in 1841, 506. Houses 103. Two-thirds of the surface are good land; and one-third is light and poor land. Hyde-Park prest-field within the limits comprises 54 Irish acres of ground; cost, in the course of a few years, £25,000 for buildings, machinery, and utensils; and is capable of annually printing 50,000 pieces of calico. The road from Belfast to Ballymena passes along the northern border.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CARRICKFERGUS [which see], in the dio. of Connor. But the tithe composition, if there be any, is not reported; and the Ordnance Survey exhibits the parish as merely a grange within the parish of Templepatrick. The Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of 130. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 50 Churchmen, 440 Presbyterians, 234 other Protestant dissenters, and 79 Roman Catholics; and a daily school was salaried with £10 from the National Board, and had on its books 55 boys and 29 girls.

MOLYRANY, a hamlet in the parish and barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the north shore of Clew bay, 8½ miles west by north of Newportpratt, at the forking of the road thence toward respectively Achill and Belmullet. Here are a police barrack and a national school. Pop. not specially returned.

Lough Muckno is by much the largest of the lakes, lies partly in Cremourne, and partly in Farney, and has an area of 1,013 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches, and a surface-elevation above sea-level of 302 feet.

Climate.—North-west winds prevail during more than one-half of the year; and they bring up from the Atlantic, and along the wide, low natural funnel of the valley of the Erne, such masses of dense clouds as break with violence around Slieve-Begagh, and drench the surrounding country with almost constant rains. The county, therefore, has an exceedingly moist atmosphere; yet it is nearly free from such noxious exhalations as might probably be expected to arise from its bogs and lakes; it possesses a thorough and pervading ventilation through its innumerable vales and hollows; and though not of very pleasant climate, it cannot be pronounced unwholesome.

Minerals.—Rocks of the transition series, consisting principally of greywacke slate, fossil clay slate, flint slate, and chlorite slate, and subordinatedly of hornblende slate, porphyritic schist, and some other metamorphic and schistose rocks, occupy all the central and southern portions of the county, excepting a district of about 28 square miles in the extreme south. Yellow sandstone and sandstone conglomerate occupy a district of about 7 square miles in the extreme north-west of the county, and a tiny pendicle or two on the western border in the vicinity of Clones. Rocks of the calp series of the secondary limestone formation constitute the greater portion of the Slieve-Begagh mountains, and were long, with equal fondness, erroneous, and mischievousness, thought to belong to the coal formation. Rocks of the carboniferous limestone series, which prevail throughout the vast floots limestone field of Ireland, occupy all the remaining parts of the county north of the transition districts, or of a line which nearly coincides with that of the Ulster Canal; and they also constitute about two-thirds of the district of 28 square miles, not of transition formation, and situated in the extreme south. A small coal-field—part of the Ulster coal-district lying round the junction point of the counties of Monaghan, Meath, and Cavan—occurs south-west of Carrickmacross; but, though known to contain one bed of 14 inches, one of 12 inches, and several of still inferior thickness, it has not, as yet, yielded to research any beds of coal sufficiently thick to compensate the cost of mining. Rocks of the new red sandstone or red marl formation, constitute a narrow and short band of country along the west side of the small coal-district; and are known to include a valuable, but hitherto unworked, deposit of gypsum. Easers, or low steep ridges of diluvial clay and gravel, occur in several districts; and some in the vicinity of Tyhallow consist wholly of Jasper, quartz, agate, and argillaceous sand. Brick clay is plentiful in most districts; and potter's clay is found in some. Lead mines were at one time worked, but have been relinquished. Ironstone, though of inferior quality, is found. Slates or flagstones are raised in several quarries. A fine white sandstone, much approved and much used for architectural purposes, is quarried in the north-west side of the Slieve-Begagh mountains. Limestone is raised of sufficient fineness and beauty to be used as marble, and of great variety and excellent quality for use as manure.

Soils.—The soil of most of the barony of Monaghan is a good loam, upon a firm subsoil of clay, mixed with lime, gravel, or sand; and that of the elevated lands of the barony is generally peaty or moorish, on a retentive bottom of clay. The soil which prevails in the county at large is a strong, deep, cold, clayey loam, well-adapted to the cultivation of flax, not unsuited to the cultivation of potatoes and oats, but too spouty and inclined to rushes to be adapted to the finer departments of husbandry, without a large amount of georgic labour and improving treatment. The soil of a great part of the barony of Dartry, and of various uplands in the other baronies, is gravelly and unfit for tillage. The soils of all the arable lands of the county, though very varied from one another, are aggregately so favourable to oats and potatoes as to render the cultivation of these crops decidedly the most compensating.

Agriculture.—Liming is plentifully practised; but marling is little approved. Pasture land is, in many instances, excessively weedy; and, as to its grass, is very generally sheer spontaneous production, after years of exhausting grain crops, seeded with ragweed and other rubbish. The use of the roller is very little appreciated or even known. Burning the surface of the land, as a preparation for potatoe crops, is very extensively practised, but has, for a good number of years past, been opposed and reprobated by the landlords. One course or rotation of crops very common on farms of about 8 acres, is, first year, two acres of potatoes; next year, wheat or barley; third year, oats, partly sown with clover; fourth year, clover;—and another is, first year, potatoes; second year, flax; third year, wheat or barley; fourth year, oats with clover. Flax is, aggregately, a very large and productive crop; and it secures to itself much attention; but its quality is not so fine as that raised in the county of Armagh. Most of the grain raised, in consequence partly of the foulness of the land, and partly of the want of winnowing machines, is of inferior quality. Thrashing in the field, and winnowing in the open air with the aid merely of the wind, are not uncommon. An Agricultural Society has been established during a good number of years, and gives premiums for the neatest cottages and gardens, for clover and vetches, for summer manuring and for ploughing.—In 1841 there were within the rural districts of the county, 12,273 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 9,702 of from 5 to 15 acres, 1,216 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 317 of upwards of 30 acres.

Fairs.—The principal fairs held within the county are at Ballybay, on the third Saturday of every month; Ballinode, Feb. 1, May 2, Aug. 1, and Nov. 1; Ballytrain, Feb. 1, March 17, May 1, June 11, Aug. 1, Sept. 29, Nov. 1, and Dec. 23; Castle-Blaney, the first Wednesday of every month; Carrickmacross, May 27, July 10, Sept. 27, Nov. 9, and Dec. 10; Castle-Shane, May 21; Clones, the last Thursday of every month; Drum, the first Tuesday of every month; Emyvale, Jan. 1, Feb. 3, March 17, April 14, May 12, June 13, July 1, Aug. 4, Sept. 4, Oct. 6, Nov. 10, and Dec. 8; Glasslough, the third Friday of every month; Knockboy, June 1, and Dec. 2; Monaghan, the first Monday of every month; Newbliss, the last Saturday of every month; Rockcorry, the last Wednesday of every month; Scotstown, the 17th of every month; Smithsborough, April 7, May 17, June 2, Aug. 8, and Nov. 7; and Tydavnet, Jan. 20, Feb. 8, March 31, June 24, and Sept. 28.

Communications.—The Ulster Canal, noticed in the section on "Waters," is of great value to the northern and central districts of the county. The line of railway proposed by the Public Commissioners to connect Armagh with Dublin, was surveyed to traverse the south-east of Monaghan, past the towns of Castle-Blaney and Carrickmacross. The principal roads which traverse the county are the Dublin and Londonderry mail-road, through Castle-Blaney, Monaghan, and Emyvale, and the Belfast and Enniskillen mail-road through Monaghan and Clones. The county surveyor was appointed in the spring of 1833; he had under his charge, at the close of 1841, 1,142 miles of public roads, and about 200 miles of parish roads; and, between the date of his appointment and the close of 1841, he superintended the formation of 37 miles of new road.

Divisions and Towns.—The county of Monaghan is divided into the five baronies of Trough in the north, Dartry in the west, Farney in the south, Monaghan in the north of the centre, and Cremourne in the south of the centre. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred one townland of the parish of Drummully from Dartry, co. Monaghan, to Coole, co. Fermanagh; and two townlands of the parish of Killeevan from the barony of Monaghan to that of Dartry. The barony of Trough contains one whole parish, and part of another parish; the barony of Dartry, 3 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; the barony of Farney, 3 whole parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; the barony of Monaghan, 4 whole parishes, and part of 4 other parishes; and the barony of Cremourne, 3 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes. The towns and principal villages, are, in Trough, Emyvale and Glasslough; in Dartry, Clones, Newbliss, Rockcorry, and Drum; in Farney, Carrickmacross; in Monaghan, Monaghan, Smithsborough, Ballinode, and Scotstown; and in Cremourne, Ballybay, Castle-Blaney, and Ballytrain. The whole county is within the diocese of Clogher.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools was 281, of scholars 11,219, of male scholars 6,604, of female scholars 4,205, of scholars whose sex was not specified 320, of scholars connected with the Established Church 2,471, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 2,113, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissenters 53, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 6,468, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 174;—and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 281, of scholars 11,218, of male scholars 6,731, of female scholars 4,155, of scholars whose sex was not specified 332, of scholars connected with the Established Church 2,205, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 1,909, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissenters 236, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 6,538, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 330. The statistics of education and of ecclesiastical matters for 1834, are returned according to the diocesan divisions, and may be estimated for Monaghan by reference to the article CLOGHER: which see. At the close of 1842, the National Board had in full operation within the county 84 schools, conducted by 74 male and 10 female teachers, attended by 5,578 male and 3,733 female scholars, and aided during the year with £855 4s. 1d. in salaries, £72 5s. 2d. in free stock, and £115 16s. 11d. in school requisites at half-price.—In 1843, the number of committals on charges of felony was 489; the number of cases before magistrates and petty-sessions was 155; the number of persons committed for drunkenness, under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 38, was 25. Of the 489 persons committed on charges of felony, 120 were charged with offences against the person, 17 with offences against property committed with violence, 135 with offences against property committed without violence, 5 with malicious offences against property, 3 with offences against the currency, and 209 with offences not included in the above categories; 1 was sentenced to death, 30 to transportation, 126 to imprisonment, 28 to pay fines, 65 were discharged on sureties, or were convicted but not sentenced, 177 were found not guilty on trial, 61 had no bill found against them, 19 were not prosecuted, and 3 were bailed and not tried.—The constabulary force of the county in Jan. 1844, consisted of 1 third-rate county inspector, 2 second-rate sub-inspectors, 2 third-rate sub-inspectors, 1 first-rate head-constable, 4 second-rate head-constables, 24 constables, 110 first-rate sub-constables, 14 second-rate sub-constables, and 6 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining this force during 1843 was £7,233 2s. 14d. The constabulary force has its head-quarters at Monaghan, and is distributed into 23 stations throughout the 4 districts of Ballybay, Clones, Carrickmacross, and Glasslough. A stipendiary magistrate resides at Ballybay. The county gaol is at Monaghan; and bridewells are at Carrickmacross and Castle-Blaney. The assizes are held at Monaghan; quarter-sessions, at Monaghan, Castle-Blaney, Carrickmacross, and Clones; and petty-sessions, at Ballybay, Carrickmacross, Castle-Blaney, Clones, Emyvale, Monaghan, Newbliss, and Rockcorry. The district lunatic asylum, to which Monaghan is entitled to send 31 patients, is at Armagh. The county infirmary is at Monaghan; fever hospitals are at Castle-Blaney, Carrickmacross, Clones, and Glasslough; and dispensaries are at Ballybay, Ballinode, Ballytrain, Carrickmacross, Castle-Shane, Clones, Drum, Farney, Glasslough, Kilmaree, Monaghan, Newbliss, Rockcorry, and Smithsborough. The workhouses are at Carrickmacross, Castle-Blaney, Clones, and Monaghan; savings' banks are long known as MacMahon's country. In 1177, John De Courcey, after having received from Henry II. a grant of as much of Ulster as he could conquer, overran the district which now forms the southern part of the county of Monaghan, built two castles for its protection, and delivered these into the keeping of the chieftain MacMahon, whom he supposed to be worthy of his confidence. But MacMahon proving faithless, and destroying the castles, De Courcey a second time overran the district, sustained a defeat from about 11,000 of the natives, made a sanguinary reprisal upon them in the course of the following night, and drove away as booty a great multitude of their cattle. The MacMahons seem to have, for some time, retained in the district a nearly independent authority; they received, from Thomas of Lancaster, the son of Henry IV., a nominal grant, or rather a confirmation of the territory at a certain rent; and, in the reign of Henry V., they seem to have become insurgent, or, at all events, are noticed in record as one of the septs, whom Talbot, Lord Furnival, the lord-lieutenant, brought under the authority of the Crown. In the reign of Elizabeth, the district was made county ground, and reduced to a better social condition than in former periods; yet in 1575 or 1576 MacMahon seems to have been insubordinate, and made submission to Sir Henry Sydney, the lord-deputy,—shortly after, MacMahon's country was overrun and judicially wasted by the lord-deputy,—in 1584, MacMahon again made submission to the representative of royalty,—and in 1589, Hugh Roe MacMahon, on a charge of unlawfully raising an armed force, was tried and executed at Monaghan, and his lands bestowed upon some subordinate families of the MacMahon sept, and upon some other persons. In the wars of the Earl of Tyrone, some of the MacMahons followed the standard of rebellion, and some of their ancient lands were the theatre of hostilities. During these wars the English had a fort in Monaghan; and at the settlement of Ulster in 1808, the corporation of that town was one of those created to strengthen the English interest. In the civil wars of 1641, the county of Monaghan was early seized by the rebels, and was the scene of various disturbances; and in the war of the Revolution, the Protestants fought and won a smart battle, though with the loss of their leader, Mr. Anketell, at Glasslough.

MONAGHAN, a barony in the county of Monaghan, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Trough; on the north-east, by the county of Armagh; on the east and south, by the barony of Cremourne; on the south-west, by the barony of Dartry; on the west, by the county of Fermanagh; and on the north-west, by the county of Tyrone. Its length, south-eastward, is 14 miles; its greatest breadth is 7; and its area is 70,161 acres, 20 perches,—of which 432 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches are water. Slieve-Begagh summit, 1,254 feet in altitude, is on the north-west boundary, and a portion of the Slieve-Begagh mountains occupies the north-west corner. The remainder of the surface is of the hilly, hilly, ridgy, and undulated character, which prevails through the greater part of the county. The soil, the lakes, and the agricultural condition of the barony have been exhibited in the preceding article. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the townlands of Cloghernagh and Coghon, in the parish of Keleevan, containing, in 1841, a pop. of 157, from the barony of Monaghan to that of Dartry.—Monaghan barony contains the whole of the parishes of Drumsnat, Kilmore, Monaghan, and Tydavnet, and part of the parishes of Ballybay, Clones, Teahallon, and Tullycorbet. Its towns and chief villages are Monaghan, Smithborough, Ballynode, and Scotstown. Pop., in 1831, 42,728; in 1841, 43,463. Houses 7,657. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 5,808; in manufactures and trade, 1,803; in other pursuits, 500. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 143; on the directing of labour, 2,223; on their own manual labour, 5,672; on means not specified, 163. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 7,716; who could read but not write, 4,268; who could neither read nor write, 6,754. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,088; who could read but not write, 7,024; who could neither read nor write, 9,492.—This barony lies partly in the Poor-law union of Monaghan, and partly in that of Castle Blaney. The total number of tenements valued is 6,627; and of these, 2,389 were valued under £5,—2,430, under £10,—929, under £15,—424, under £20,—177, under £25,—82, under £30,—91, under £40,—37, under £50,—and 68, at and above £50. The annual valuation for the poor-rate is £42,950 19s. 6d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, were £2,517 5s. 6d., and £1,757 4s. 7d.

MONAGHAN, or ROCKWALLIS, a parish, containing the town of the same name, in the barony and county of Monaghan, Ulster. Length, south-eastward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 4½; area, 13,547½ acres,—of which 26 acres, 2 roods, 6 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 11,875; in 1841, 12,160. Houses 2,055. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 8,027; in 1841, 8,030. Houses 1,479. The whole surface, with the exception of a small aggregate of bog, is arable or park land; yet it varies in quality from the finest loam to very coarse, improved upland. The northern district, or that around the town of Monaghan, consists of very fine limestone land; the north-east corner is embellished with the rich demesne of Castle-Shane; and the central and southern districts are much higher than the northern district, and consist of inferior land. The principal seats are Castle-Shane, E. Lucas, Esq.; Camla; Willville; Cookmount; Coolmain; Mount-Orange; Gallanagh-house; Cornacassa, James Hamilton, Esq.; Milltown; Beech-hill; and Rossmore Park, Lord Rossmore. The interior is traversed by the Ulster canal, the Dublin and Londonderry mail-road, and the Belfast and Enniskillen mail-road.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £553 16s. 11d.; glebe, £114; gross income, £667 16s. 11d.; nett, £629 6s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £49 4s. 8d. The church was built a few years ago, at the estimated cost of £4,000 for the body and aisle, and £1,070 for the galleries and the steeple; and, toward the cost, £1,000 were contributed by bequest of the late Dowager Lady Rossmore, and £2,000 by loan from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 1,100; attendance 500. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses are attended by respectively 600 and 400; the Wesleyan meeting-house, by 120; the Primitive Wesleyan meeting-house, by 80; and three Roman Catholic chapels, by respectively 1,650, 1,625, and 830. In 1834, the parish consisted of 1,821 Churchmen, 2,504 Presbyterians, and 7,550 Roman Catholics; and 21 day-schools had on their books 1,147 boys and 555 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £150 a year from endowment; one, with £8 from the Society for Discourteasing Vice; one, with £8 from subscription; one, with £20 from subscription; one, with £25 from the county; two, with graduated allowances from the London Education Society; two, with respectively £23 3s. and £10 3s. 6d. from endowment; and five, with respectively £8, £10, £10, £12, and £15 from the National Board.

Sheskin, 1,792; Seotstown, 3,594; Ballinode, 3,515; Drumanat, 3,152; Kilmore, 2,635; Caddagh, 1,946; Drumhillery, 3,912; Clones, 2,969; and Tullycorbet, 4,156. The number of ex-officio guardians is 9, and of elected guardians, 27; and of the latter, 3 are chosen by the division of Monaghan, 2 by each of the divisions of Glasslough, Seotstown, Drumhillery, and Tullycorbet, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The number of tenements valued, within the union, in the barony of Cremorne, is 1,156, in the barony of Darry 573, in the barony of Monaghan 6,601, in the barony of Trough, 2,255,—in all, 10,585; and of this total, 3,810 were valued under £5,—3,823, under £10,—1,553, under £15,—651, under £20,—278, under £25,—131, under £30,—155, under £40,—61, under £50,—and 125, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £94,855 16s.; the total number of persons rated is 10,537; and of these, 395 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—757, not exceeding £2,—676, not exceeding £3,—1,081, not exceeding £4,—and 1,166, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on May 4, 1840,—to be completed in July 1841,—to cost £6,350 for building and completion, and £1,457 9s. 9d. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 7 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches, obtained for £824 10s. 11d. of purchase money, and £67 19s. 4d. of compensation to occupying tenant,—and to contain accommodation for 900 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was May 25, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £1,603 7s. 8d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,429 7s. 11d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 190. The Board of Guardians meet every Wednesday. The Medical charities within the union, are the County infirmary at Monaghan, a fever hospital at Glasslough, and dispensaries at Castle-Shane, Glasslough, and Seotstown; and, in 1839, they received £288 8s. from subscription, £1,307 9s. 10d. from public grants, and £289 11s. 2d. from other sources, and expended £367 16s. in salaries to medical officers, £231 16s. 1d. for medicines, and £869 7s. 2½d. for contingencies. The infirmary is capable of containing 40 beds; and, in 1839, it received £1,143 15s., expended £1,019 17s. 3½d.; and admitted 399 intern patients, and administered 1,807 extern patients.

Municipal Affairs.—Monaghan was incorporated by charter of 11 James I. The borough, as defined by this charter, "comprises the town of Monaghan, and all and every castles, messuages, tofts, mills, houses, edifices, structures, curtilages, gardens, orchards, wastes, ponds, lands, tenements, and hereditaments whatsoever lying and being within the aforesaid town of Monaghan." A district known by the name of the Corporation, extends nearly ½ of a mile in every direction around the town, and includes the townlands of Mullagh-Monaghan, Rooskey, Tyrkeenan, Annaghagh, Killygoing, Letterean, Mullagh-Croghy, Coolshanagh, Mullagh-Adawn, and Kilnacloy. This district is a portion of the estate of Lord Rossmore, and is kept apart and accounted for separately to the proprietor, in both the ancient and the present rentals, under the denomination of "the Corporation." The borough boundaries proposed by the Commissioners in 1837, include between twice and thrice the extent of the edificed area; they pass behind the barracks, behind the goal, behind the diocesan school, past the north-east margin of Spark's Lough, behind Beech-hill-house, behind the infirmary, along Rooskey-lane, and past the extremity of Glasslough-street, and they comprise part of the townlands of Kilnacloy on the north, Rooskey on the east, Tyrkeenan on the south, and Mullagh-

Monaghan on the west. The corporation, according to charter, is styled "The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty, of the Borough of Monaghan," consists of a provost, 12 free burgesses and freemen; and has for its officers two sergeants-at-mace, a recorder, a clock-keeper, a pump-keeper, and a bellman. The corporation—probably according to the intention of the charter—soon passed under the entire control of the proprietor of the surrounding manor of Monaghan; the provosts have uniformly been either the proprietors of that manor or their nominees, and have changed only with the land-agents of the Rossmore family; the free burgesses and the freemen are the relatives, dependents, and tenants of Lord Rossmore, and act in every respect as he desires them; and the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union, was wholly awarded to the then Lord Rossmore, as proprietor of the borough. The corporation do not appear, on tolerable evidence, to have ever possessed any landed property. The town is lighted under the management of a committee of inhabitants, at an annual expense of about £70. The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary. The assizes are held twice a-year; quarter-sessions, four times a-year; and petty-sessions, every Tuesday.

Statistics.—Area of the town, 170 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,848; in 1841, 4,130. Houses 576. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 199; in manufactures and trade, 479; in other pursuits, 188. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 40; on the directing of labour, 479; on their own manual labour, 308; on means not specified, 44. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 967; who could read but not write, 307; who could neither read nor write, 481. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 560; who could read but not write, 679; who could neither read nor write, 762.

MONAINCHA, or MOANACHINCH, a bog environing a celebrated abbey, and lying on the mutual border of Queen's co., Leinster, and co. Tipperary, Munster, but chiefly within the parish of Corbally and barony of Ikerrin, and from ½ to ¾ miles south-east of Roscrea, co. Tipperary, Munster. The bog is bounded, on the north, by the lands of Roscrea; on the east, by Ballaghmore; on the south, by Rockforest and Timoney; and on the west, by Derrymore. It measures 4,000 acres in area; lies from 326 to 360 feet above the level of the sea; has an average and a maximum depth of respectively 16 and 32 feet; is traversed by the nascent river Nore; and, even when officially reported on in 1814, was to a considerable extent improved. Estimated cost of total reclamation, £5,698 8s. 8d. A lake near the centre of the bog, and covering about 90 acres, was drained about the year 1798; another lake, upwards of 100 acres in extent, and containing in its centre the island on which the monastic ruin now called "the Men's Church" stood, was drained about a year after the former; and the quondam bottom of both lakes, but especially that of the larger one, has ever since been productive land. The quondam island is now a low gravel hill, and was originally the smaller, but eventually the larger, of two islands in the lake, called respectively the Men's and the Women's Islands, and both celebrated in connection with the monastic institutions of Monaincha. The Men's Island contained an abbey and an oratory; the Women's Island contained a small chapel; and a locality on the firm land, exterior to the bog, contains a second abbey. Both of the abbeys were originally Culdean; and that on the Island eventually became Augustinian. The Men's Island is, per antiquitatem,

The benefice of Monamintra, the sinecure rectories of Kilmaclague, and Kilmacomb, and part of the sinecure rectories of Kilmeaden and Riesk, constitute the corps of the chancellorship of Waterford cathedral. Gross income of the sinecure rectories and parts of rectories, £446 8s. 5d.; nett, £423 9s. 5d. The incumbent holds also the office of surrogate of the diocese; and resides sometimes in Monamintra, and sometimes in Waterford. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

MONANIMY, a parish in the barony of Fermoy, 3½ miles east-north-east of Mallow, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of KILLAWILLIN: which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 8,831 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,751; in 1841, 3,135. Houses 487. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,741. Houses 430. The surface lies along the left bank of the Blackwater; is traversed by the road from Mallow to Castletownroche; and consists, over more than one-third of its area, of good land,—and, over the remainder, of mountain, most of which is improvable. “Below Ballygriffin,” says Dr. Smith, “is the ruined church of Monanimy, with a large chancel; and in it is a modern tomb of the Nagles. Adjacent to it is a castle that, in former times, was a preceptory belonging to St. John of Jerusalem; round the castle are traces of very large buildings, the whole augustly situated on an high bank, over the Blackwater. As there is no other mention of this house than in the king’s quit-rent books, the founder and time of the foundation is uncertain.”—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition and gross income, £400; nett, £320 10s. Patron, the diocesan. The present church was built in 1811, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d., from the late Board of First Fruits; and was new-roofed and repaired in 1837, by means of contributions to the amount of £264 from the parishioners. Sittings 100; attendance, from 30 to 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Clonore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 39, and the Roman Catholics to 2,816; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £36 a-year from the rector, and one with £18 from an endowment by Joseph Nagle, Esq.—had on their books 141 boys and 120 girls.

MONART, a parish in the barony of Scarewalsh, 3 miles north-west of Enniscorthy, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-westward, 5½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 4½; area, 13,029 acres, 1 rood, 39 perches,—of which 11 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches are in the river Slaney. Pop., in 1831, 3,384; in 1841, 3,712. Houses 641. The Slaney runs for about 1½ mile on the eastern boundary; and three eventually confluent tributaries of that river run in the interior. Except small portions in the extreme south-east corner, and on the banks of the Slaney, most of the land has a light shingly soil, and is of a very inferior quality. The forest of Kilmoughrim occupies a space of about 1½ mile by 1½ in the west. The principal seats are Kiltren-house, Urrinfort, Monart-house, Ocaul-house, and Kilmoughrim-house. The chief hamlet is Mcurry. The road from Enniscorthy to Borris passes right across the interior; and that from Enniscorthy to Newtownbarry passes up the banks of the Slaney.—This parish was originally a part of the huge parish of Templehambo, and is now a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Farns. Tithe composition of 4 townlands assigned to the curacy, £101 10s. 9½d.; glebe, £24. Gross income, £125 10s. 9½d.; nett, £114 0s. 1½d. Patron, the incumbent of Templehambo. The church was enlarged in 1831, by means of a loan of £500 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 270; attendance 150. The Roman Catholic chapels of Cain and Newtown have an attendance of respectively 500 and 250; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Ballindagga and Kiltaly. The Roman Catholic chapels of Marshallstown and Castle-Dockrell have an attendance of respectively 300 and 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to a chapel in Newtownbarry. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 594, and the Roman Catholics to 2,848; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 from subscription, and £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 93 boys and 73 girls.

MONASTERBOICE, a parish in the barony of Ferrard, 2½ miles east of Collon, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, west by northward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,316 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 705; in 1841, 801. Houses 131. The land averages in annual value from 18s. to 30s. per plantation acre. The road from Drogheda to Ardee passes through the interior. The hamlet of Newtown-Monasterboice is in the east; the mansion of Monasterboice, the seat of W. Draxmond Delap, Esq., is in the south; and the ancient ruins of Monasterboice, consisting of the tombstones of a small cemetery, the broken walls of two chapels, two large stone crosses, and an ancient pillar-tower, are in the midst of a rough and solitary pastoral tract in the centre. The chapels are very ancient,—the larger probably of the 12th century, and the smaller of a period considerably earlier; and they are of simple and massive construction, and present few features of artistic interest. The crosses are large, perfect, and curious; the one 18, and the other about 16 feet high, and both elaborately and beautifully sculptured. The larger cross is situated between the two chapels, and bears the name of St. Boyce’s cross; it has been termed, but without any feasible reason, the most ancient ecclesiastical relic now in Ireland; and it exhibits, among its profusion of compartmented sculpture, representations of the Saviour, of St. Boyce, of Adam and Eve, and of St. Patrick, with an angel and a pair of scales at his feet. The smaller cross is on the south side of the cemetery, and though inferior to the other cross in height, is equal to it in sculptural decoration. The pillar-tower lost its cap and its upper part some years ago, by lightning; but it still measures 110 feet in height, and lifts its shattered summit into the view of a district several miles around; it is 9 feet in diameter within the walls, and is divided into 5 stories by bands of stone; and its doorway is arched, and is 5½ feet in height, 22 inches in width, and 6 feet from the present level of the ground. “The solitude of this assemblage of picturesque ruins is in fine keeping with the associations it cannot fail to arouse; the narrow churchyard is crowded with graves, among which the ‘fat weeds’ grow in great luxuriance; a single blasted tree speaks of death more emphatically than even the broken head-stones, and the surrounding mountains seem to throw an eternal shadow over the solemn and impressive scene.” An abbey is said to have been founded at Monasterboice by St. Boyce or Boetius, who died in 521; but it figures obscurely in history, and is quite lost to record after the year 1117. This parish is a rectory, and part of the bene-

MONEYGALL, a small post and market town, in the parish of Cullenwaine, barony of Clonlisk, King's co., Leinster. It stands on the Dublin and Limerick mail-road, and near the extremity of the great south-south-western projection of the county, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by north of Toomavara, $6\frac{1}{2}$ south-west by south of Roscrea, and $6\frac{1}{4}$ south-west by west of Dublin. In the north-eastern vicinity are the pleasant seats of Bushstown and Greenhills, the residences of Messrs. Minchin; and in the south-western vicinity are Larchvale and Loughton,—the latter the well-wooded and beautifully situated demesne of Lord Bloomfield. Fairs are held in the town on Aug. 3, and Nov. 24. The Moneygall dispensary is within the Poor-law union of Roscrea, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 5,556; and, in 1839, it received £165 18s., and expended £110. Area of the town, 31 acres. Pop., in 1831, 379; in 1841, 764. Houses 124. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 68; in manufactures and trade, 41; in other pursuits, 53. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 57; on their own manual labour, 83; on means not specified, 12.

MONEYMORE, a small market and post town, in the parishes of Artrea and Desertlyn, barony of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands on the mail-road from Armagh to Coleraine, 3 miles north-west by north of Coagh, $3\frac{1}{2}$ north-east of Cookstown, 4 south-south-west of Magherafelt, $4\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of Ballyronan, 7 north of Stewartstown, $24\frac{1}{2}$ north of Armagh, $27\frac{1}{2}$ south of Coleraine, 68 west-north-west of Belfast, and $86\frac{1}{2}$ north by west of Dublin. The town and a large tract of adjacent country are the property of the Drapers' Company of London. Though the district eastward to Lough Neagh is bleak and boggy, and those northward and westward to the interior uplands of the county are wild and mountainous, yet improvements by georgy, by road-making, and by general encouragement, under the auspices and the stimulating policy of the Drapers' Company, are so great, minute, and judicious as to produce a pervading appearance of prosperity and pleasantness. The parsonage-house of the local benefice, the house of R. Millar, Esq., the agent of the Drapers' Company, and various other private houses, are ornamental to the town itself; and several villas, particularly Springhill, the old mansion and well-wooded demesne of W. L. Conyngham, Esq., are ornamental to the vicinity. The town possesses a character of neatness and comfort; and its various places of worship, its court and market-houses, its linen-hall, and its hotel, exhibit a style and an elegance which would do credit to a trading town of ten times the population. The linen manufacture is extensively carried on in both the town and the circumjacent country. Weekly markets and monthly fairs are held; and are the scene of a large trade in linen, corn, and butter. Goods are sent to Ballyronan, and shipped there for conveyance up Lough Neagh, and along its connected lines of navigation. The Moneymore dispensary is within the Magherafelt Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £75 13s. 9d., and administered to 1,058 patients. Though Moneymore is one of the oldest seats of population in the south-eastern districts of the county, yet its castle, the principal monument of its antiquity, and the scene of many a feudal fray, was erased in 1760. Area of the Artrea section of the town, 31 acres; of the Desertlyn section, 14 acres. Pop. of the Artrea section, in 1831, 602, in 1841, 546. Houses 82. Pop. of the Desertlyn section, in 1831, 423; in 1841, 396. Houses 55. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,025; in 1841, 942. Houses 136. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 46; in manufactures and trade, 90; in other pursuits, 28. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 15; on the directing of labour, 83; on their own manual labour, 63; on means not specified, 3.

MONEYMORE, a hamlet in the parish of Tullaghobegly, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the north bank of Lough Dulewy, at the south base of Errigal mountain, and on the road from Clady-Bridge to Ramelton, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Clady-Bridge. Pop. not specially returned.

MONEYMORE, a hamlet in the parish of Oranmore, 2 miles east-south-east of the town of Oranmore, barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. Pop. not specially returned.

MONEYPOINT, a headland in the parish of Killimer, barony of Clonderalaw, 4 miles south-east by east of Kilrush, co. Clare, Munster. The face of both the headland itself and the immediately adjacent sweep of coast is a cliff, overhanging the Shannon; and it yields to the quarrier a fine hard, closed-grained, gritty flag, varying from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 inches in thickness, and measuring from 10 to 12 superficial feet. The produce of the quarry, as reported on in 1838, amounted to about 60,000 yards, worth, on the spot, £2,250.

MONFAN, a bog in the parish of Clonmacnoise, barony of Garrycastle, King's co., Leinster. It extends about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles eastward, from the vicinity of the Seven Churches, on the north side of Lough Fin, and between two ridges of limestone gravel; but it is very narrow in proportion to its length, and comprises an area of only 1,509 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches. Its west end lies 18 feet, and its east end 47, above the level of the Shannon. It is a soft red bog; its depth is from 15 to 35 feet; and the estimated cost of reclaiming it is £4 2s. 11d. per acre.

MONGEVLIN, an old castle in the parish of Taughboyne, barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the east verge of the county, and on the left bank of the Foyle, 2 miles south of St. Johnstown. It was built by Sir John Stewart at the plantation of Ulster; and was a very strong pile, flanked with towers at the corners. James II. stopped here for a short time during the siege of Derry; and he sent hence, by his host, Archdeacon Hamilton, proposals to the garrison for surrender.

MONIVAE, a parish in the baronies of Tyaquin, Kilconnel, and Clare, co. Galway, Connaught. The Tyaquin section contains the village of Monivae. Length, southward, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $1\frac{1}{4}$ to $5\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Tyaquin section, 18,157 acres, 27 perches,—of which 52 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches are water. Area of the Kilconnel section, 2,121 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches; of the Clare section, 1,633 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,117; in 1841, 4,810. Houses 806. Pop., in 1841, of the Kilconnel section, 382; of the Clare section, 322; of the rural districts of the Tyaquin section, 3,801. Houses in these respectively 34, 36, and 652. About one-third of the surface is good land; and about two-thirds are indifferent land, and inclusive of large tracts of bog. gorge of a deep glen, and its newer parts extend along the shore, and down the face of a verdant northerly slope; and its whole character, though straggling and diversified, is romantic and delightful. Above the glen rise the ruins of a large old castle, built in 1638, by the family of Archdeacon, flanked by four square towers, used as a barrack during the French war, and still so much in preservation as to retain its roof. The views from this castle are superb. To the west of it are the ruins of the old church or rather chapel of Monkstown; and on the ascent of a hill behind the modern part of the village, is the present parish-church, a neat edifice in the pointed style of architecture, with a light and graceful tower and spire in the same style. "The parish and village of Monkstown," said a recent periodical writer, "derive their value from a monastery of Benedictine monks belonging to the Priory of St. John's, Waterford, who laid the first foundation of their small residence in the 14th century, upon a grant of land made by the MacCarthys to their parent establishment. Three or four of these cloistered inhabitants remained on the then wild and lonely hills of the parish. But from causes now concealed beneath the incessant flow of past years, but which we may conjecture from the traditions of the peasantry arose out of the solitude that surrounded them, the little Benedictine settlement was deserted, and soon became a ruin. Its patronage and possession passed from Waterford to the monks of the original monastery in Bath, and some of their members voluntarily left the magic land of England, to plant anew the symbols of their order in the crumbling monastery of Monkstown. They changed its site, by removing to the brow of the hill, immediately overlooking the sea, and a precipitous and romantic glen. Again, after the changeful passage of some years, it became deserted, and a ruin. In 1636, the castle of Monkstown was erected by the Archdeacon family, who then held the estate." During the residence of this family, the Benedictine walls were repaired, and converted into a chapel. But in the Revolution, under William, the Archdeacons were attainted, the estate was forfeited, it changed hands, and is now, by the marriage of the two heiresses, the joint property of the Lords Longford De Vesce. The parish is tithe and cess free, and unconnected with any neighbouring church or chapelry. In 1831, these noblemen, with a spirit worthy of remembrance, and much to be emulated, endowed Monkstown as a vicarage, and assisted by their contributions in the erection of the new and chastely designed church. "Of late years, the woods planted by Mr. Shaw have added many beauties to the naturally picturesque situation of this retreat. Its convenient distance from Cork, the peaceful character of its scenery, the moving picture of the river and the tides, the roads of Ballybricken, fringing its shores with foliage to the water's edge, the incessant variety of the views of Cove Harbour from every point, the changeful hues of the sunsets, the numerous shores and rising grounds studded with cottages and houses, and the picturesque repose which invests its romantic and undulating hills, have made it the favourite retreat during the summer months of numbers of the gentry of Cork and the surrounding country." A delightful road was lately formed along the shore, from Monkstown to Passage, by cutting away the rock which descended abruptly to the river. "The depth of water here," says Hall's Ireland, "is very great; and it is pointed out to the stranger's notice as a place where several ships have foundered, particularly one commanded by Capt. Cole, in 1758. The formation of this road has, however, much injured a singular freak of nature called the Giant's Stairs, some of which it has entirely displaced. Fifteen or sixteen huge knolls of rock, each many tons in weight, rose from the water's edge, one above the other, up the face of a very steep rocky ascent, with nearly the regularity of a flight of steps; and it required no effort of fancy to perceive the resemblance, especially when this extraordinary cliff chanced to be viewed in profile. Sufficient still remains to satisfy a stranger's curiosity, notwithstanding the dismemberment; but they can be no longer appealed to by the credulous boatmen as the undoubted stairs which the Giant O'Mahony made for himself, and used every night at twelve o'clock when he descended to his bathing-place." A hotel, baths, and other conveniences and appliances suited to a fashionable watering-place, have been provided at Monkstown. A dispensary here is within the Cork Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 3,906; and, in 1839-40, it expended £119, and administered to 2,156 patients. Area of the village, 33 acres. Pop., in 1841, 538. Houses 76. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 12; in manufactures and trade, 16; in other pursuits, 66. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 23; on their own manual labour, 30; on means not specified, 25.—Monkstown parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Gross income, £95 8s. 6d.; nett, £69 18s. 10d. Patron, Lord De Vesce. The church was built in 1832, at the cost of about £1,500 raised by subscription. Sittings 270; attendance, from 100 to 300. A school-house is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 50. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 242, and the Roman Catholics to 1,667; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £24 from subscriptions and collections—had on their books 58 boys and 39 girls.

MONKSTOWN, a parish, partly in the barony of Dublin, but chiefly in that of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It contains the hamlets of Mountpelier, Monkstown, Kill-of-the-Grange, and Glenagarey, or Sally Noggin, the villages of BULLOCK, GLASTHULE, and HONEYHILL, and the towns of BLACKROCK and KINGSTOWN: see these articles. Length, south-eastward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 1½. Area of the barony of Dublin section, 3 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch; of the Rathdown section, 2,049½ acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 9,815; in 1841, 13,143. Houses 1,925. Pop., in 1841, of the barony of Dublin section, which is identical with part of the town of Blackrock, 146. Houses 19. Pop., in 1841, of the Rathdown section, exclusive of the towns and villages, but not of the hamlets, 1,470. Houses 215. The whole district is one of the most luscious and lively portions of the southern sea-board of the bay of Dublin; and is principally disposed in towns, villages, gay hamlets, clusters of villas, and the gardens and mimic demesnes of a profusion of neat and fashionable residences. The shore extends from the north-west end of Blackrock to within 3 furlongs of the village of Dalkey; and is richly variegated with Blackrock, Kingstown, and Bullock, the harbour of Kingstown, the Dublin and Kingstown railway, the creeks of Scotchbay and Sandycove, three martello towers, and a great number and diversity of both small natural features of beauty, and tasteful touches of artificial decoration. The principal part of the atmospheric railway is within the limits. Some of the most noticeable of the numerous seats, villas, and cottages ornées, are Maretime, Seapoint-house, Salthill-house, Templehill, Rockfield-house, Stradbroke-house, Melfield, Monkstown-house, Monkstown-castle, Ashton-park, Bloombury, Longford-lodge, Highborn, Corrig-house, Avondale, Glenagarey-house, Burnfield, Asglew, MONSEA, or MOUNTSEA, a parish 2½ miles north-west of Nenagh, and partly in the barony of Owney and Arra, but chiefly in that of Lower Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, north-westward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Area of the Owney and Arra section, 721 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches; of the Lower Ormond section, 5,160 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches,—of which 837 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches are in Lough Derg, and 532 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch are adjacent to Lough Derg, and slightly detached from the main body of the parish by the intervention of Dromineer. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,753; in 1841, 1,744. Houses 277. The surface consists of good land, and descends slowly down the south side of the Nenagh river to the north side of Youghal bay. The sites of the church and the Roman Catholic chapel are probably the highest grounds, and have altitudes of respectively 182 and 204 feet above sea-level. The seats are Richmond-house, Moyroe-house, Tullamore-park, Millview, Rockford-house, and Ballyanny-house; and the principal antiquities are the ruins of two castles.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £138 9s. 2½d.; glebe, £12. Patron, the diocesan. The rectory forms also a separate but sinecure benefice. Tithe composition and gross income, £276 18s. 5½d.; nett, £262 3s. 6½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate for the vicarage, receives a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1807, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and repaired in 1821, by means of a loan of £46 3s. 1d. from that Board. Sittings 120; attendance, from 30 to 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 500; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killadiernan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 83, and the Roman Catholics to 1,762; and a pay daily school had on its books 27 boys and 18 girls.

It stands on the left bank of the Shannon, directly opposite the village of O'Brien's Bridge, and 2½ miles north of the town of Castle-Connell. Fairs are held on May 8, July 8, Sept. 7, and Dec. 8. Area, 26 acres. Pop., in 1841, 305. Houses 73. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 58; in manufactures and trade, 27; in other pursuits, 10. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 38; on their own manual labour, 49; on means not specified, 4.

MONYSEED, or MONASEED, a hamlet in the parish of Kilnabue, barony of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the road from Carnw to Arklow, 5 miles west-north-west of Gorey. In its vicinity are Monyseed-house, Mountain-cottage, and Jackstown-house. Pop. not specially returned.

MOONCOIN. See MOUNT-COIN.

MOONE, a parish in the baronies of Kilkea and Moone, East Narragh and Rheban, and East Ophaly, co. Kildare, Leinster. The Kilkea and Moone section contains the village of Moone. Length, west by northward, 5½ miles; extreme breadth, 3. Area of the Kilkea and Moone section, 4,617 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches; of the East Narragh and Rheban section, 2,497 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches; of the East Ophaly section, 166 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 1,591; of the East Narragh and Rheban section, 541; of the East Ophaly section, 97; of the rural districts of the Kilkea and Moone section, 719. Houses in the East Narragh and Rheban section, 96; in the East Ophaly section, 20; in the rural districts of Kilkea and Moone section, 115. The surface consists of light arable land, of the average yearly value of about 26s. per plantation acre; and it is drained south-westward by the rivulet Griese, and other small affluents of the river Barrow. The seats are Powersgrove-house, Bloomfield-house, Ardculhouse, and Moone-Abbey-house,—the last the residence of B. A. Yates, Esq. The principal antiquities are the ruins of Whitechurch, Moone Abbey, Moone-castle, and Inch-castle; the moat of Ardsakill, 389 feet of altitude above sea-level; and the site of the old, extinct town of Ardsakill: See ARDSAKILL. The mail-road from Dublin to Carlow and Kilkenny passes through the interior. The neat and pleasing village of Moone stands near the eastern extremity of the parish, ¼ mile south-south-west of Timolin. Fairs are held on May 1, June 19, Aug. 13, and Oct. 28. A Franciscan friary of unknown date stood at the village, and was inhabited by monastic inmates subsequent to the Reformation. The church was a long and narrow structure, and partly survives in ruin. A very ancient stone-cross which stood here—but only a fragment of which now remains—was probably one of the oldest erections of its class in Ireland, and was sculptured all over with grotesque and most monstrous figures. A castle was built at Moone by some of the earliest Anglo-Norman settlers, soon after the year 1175, and it still exists in comparatively good preservation. Area of the village, 23 acres. Pop., in 1841, 234. Houses 44.—Moone parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TIMOLIN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £126, and the rectorial for £252; and the latter are appropriated to the economy estate of St. Patrick's, Dublin. The other statistics are all mixed up with those of Timolin.

MOORE, a parish in the barony of Moycressa, 4½ miles east-north-east of Ballinaloe, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, west-north-westward, 6½ miles; extreme breadth, 5; area, 21,013 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches,—of which 265 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches are in the Shannon, 100 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches are in the Suck, and 14 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches are in Lough Cranberry. Pop., in 1831, 4,379; in 1841, 4,638. Houses 829. The surface is bounded on the east by the Shannon, and on the south by the Suck; is traversed by the mail-road from Ballinaloe to Dublin; and consists, in a general view, of poor tillage land, worth from 13s. 3s.

from 1½ to 3½; and its area is 31,492 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches,—of which 95 acres, 2 roods, 21 perches are water. The northern district is hilly; and has its greatest altitude, of 508 feet above sea-level, at the hamlet of Carricklock. The central and southern districts are part of the great rich plain of the county. Part of the drainage is within the basin of the Boyne; but most belongs to the head-streams of the Dee and the Glyde. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred 5 townlands of the parish of Inniskeen, and one of Nobber, from Lower Slane to Morgallion,—pop., in 1841, 500; one townland of Nobber from Morgallion to Lower Kells,—pop. 384; the whole parish of Dunnloe from Morgallion to Lower Navan,—pop. 111.—Morgallion, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Ardagh, Inniskeen, and Nobber, and the whole of the parishes of Castle-town, Clongill, Drakestown, Kilberry, Kilshine, and Knock. The towns and chief villages are Nobber, Wilkinstown, Ballinee, Castletown, and Kilberry. Pop., in 1831, 11,900; in 1841, 11,555. Houses 2,046. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,644; in manufactures and trade, 356; in other pursuits, 128. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 28; on the directing of labour, 523; on their own manual labour, 1,545; on means not specified, 32. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,735; who could read but not write, 833; who could neither read nor write, 2,422. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 642; who could read but not write, 1,008; who could neither read nor write, 3,525.—This barony is distributed among the three Poor-law unions of Bailieborough, Kells, and Navan. The total number of tenements valued is 1,771; and of these, 1,212 were valued under £5,—202, under £10,—81, under £15,—59, under £20,—32, under £25,—19, under £30,—22, under £40,—15, under £50,—and 129, at and above £50. The annual value of the property rated is £28,362 0s. 7d.; and the sum levied under the grand warrant of summer, 1841, was £1,039 18s. 2d.

MORGANS, a parish in the barony of Lower Connello, 14 mile west-north-west of Askeaton, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 1,228 acres. Pop., in 1831, 470; in 1841, 564. Houses 74. The surface is part of the rich low ground upon the Shannon.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LOUGHILL [which see], in the dio. of Limerick. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £18, and the rectorial for £36; and the latter are impropriate in the vicars choral of Limerick cathedral. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 5, and the Roman Catholics to 482; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

MORISK, or MURRISK, a barony in the extreme south-west of the county of Mayo, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by Clew bay; on the north-east, by the barony of Burrishoole; on the east, by the baronies of Burrishoole and Carra; on the south-east and south, by the county of Galway; and on the west, by the Atlantic ocean. It includes many isles and islets, and the islands of Clare, Innisturk, Cahir, Innisboffin, and Innishark. The length of the mainland, westward, is 15 miles; and its extreme breadth is 1½. The area of the whole barony is 137,061 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches,—of which 1,789 acres, 2 roods are water. Most objects of interest in Morisk are noticed in the articles AVGH-AVAL, KILGEEVER, AGHAGOWER, CLEW, CROUGH-PATRICK, KILLERY, WESTPORT, LEWISBURGH, CLARE, INNISTURK, INNISBOFFIN, and DELPHI: which see. "The mountain groups lying south of Clew bay," says the article MAYO, in the Penny Cyclopædia, "cover the entire barony of Murrisk, and stretch beyond the entire bounds of the county into the highlands of Joyce-Country and Connemara: the area which they cover within the limits of Mayo is about 15 miles by 20, and is bounded on the north by the level land about Westport and Clew bay, on the west by the Atlantic ocean, on the south by the long narrow inlet of the great Killery Harbour and the Joyce-Country mountains, and on the east by the flat country constituting the basin of Lough Mask and Carra. The most easterly of the various mountain groups comprised within these limits is constituted by the Funnamore and Partry mountains, which, extending in a north-easterly direction from the head of the Killery, form a continuous range of 15 miles in length, rising abruptly over the shores of the above-mentioned lakes. The elevation of Funnamore rising about midway between the Killery Harbour and Lough Mask, is 2,210 feet; the other chief summits of the range are Bengoriff, near its southern extremity, 2,030 feet, and Slieve Bolawa, terminating it on the north, 1,224 feet. On both sides of the chain are bold ravines, traversed by streams descending on the one hand into Lough Mask, and on the other into the valley of the Owen-Errive river, which runs southward into the head of Killery Harbour, and also into the valley of the Ayle. The Ayle, running northward through the first part of its course, dips under ground immediately on emerging from the mountain district, and passing eastward round the terminus of the range for two miles under the limestone rock of the plain, rises again and flows southward along the opposite side of the mountain into the head of Lough Mask. One of the sources of the Owen-Errive is the lake of Glenauagh, which lies in what is locally termed a prison, being a bowl-shaped hollow on the northern side of Funnamore, surrounded by perpendicular precipices 1,500 feet high. West of the valley of the Owen-Errive lies the group of Muilrea, skirting the northern shore of the Killery, and extending inland in a direction generally parallel to that of the range of Slieve-Partry. Muilrea mountain, which rises immediately over the northern entrance to the harbour, is the highest ground in the county, 2,692 feet in altitude. Next in the range, eastward, a Bealberry, 2,610 feet; between which and Bengoriff, 2,224 feet, lie the romantic lakes of Doolagh and Delphi, with the shooting lodge of the Marquis of Sligo. These heights, as they trend eastward, are broken into numerous lateral valleys, of which the most considerable is Glen Laure, watered by the main branch of Owen-Errive. Above Glen Laure the highest point of the range is 2,422 feet. Northward from the immediate group of Muilrea, the centre of the district of Murrisk rises into undulating hills of from 900 to 1,200 feet in height, the general slope of the country being towards the north-west, in which direction most of the streams rising in the interior make their way through openings in the hilly country to the sea. The northern verge of Murrisk bordering on Clew bay, is occupied for a length of ten miles by the range of Crough Patrick, running parallel to the shore. Crough Patrick, locally called the Reek, rises immediately from the water's edge in the centre of the range to an altitude of 2,610 feet, presenting a very conical outline on every side, and forming by much the most conspicuous feature in the surrounding scenery. The general character of this district is sterile, though among the undulating hills of the central part there are extensive tracts of coarse pasture." The Act 6 and 7 William IV. transferred two townlands of the parish of Aghagower from Morisk to Burrishoole,—pop. in 1841, 40; and 12 townlands of Aghagower from Burrishoole to Morisk,—pop. 1,064.—Morisk har-

573. Houses 86. The surface consists of good tillage land. The antiquities are the ruins of the church, and of Short, Coyne, and Kedrah castles.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of OUTERAGH [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £150. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 594; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

MOSSIDE, a village in the grange of Drumtullagh, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. Here is a Presbyterian meeting-house. Fairs are held on Feb. 13, May 21, July 21, and Nov. 21. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 231; in 1841, 173. Houses 36.

MOSSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Ardee, 2½ miles west-south-west of Dunleer, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, west-south-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 3,817 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches,—of which 13 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,229; in 1841, 1,437. Houses 238. The surface consists wholly of profitable land; and is drained by the White river, and traversed by the road from Dunleer to Collon. The principal seat is Rathescar, the residence of the Hon. Baron Foster; and the woods of the attached demesne are a pleasant and prominent feature of the landscape.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of COLLON [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £248 14s. 11d.; glebe, £5 10s. 9d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 270 to 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Dunleer and Dromyn. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 148, and the Roman Catholics to 1,285; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 a-year from Baron Foster—had on their books 116 boys and 47 girls.

MOSTRIM. See EDGEWORTHSTOWN.

MOTHEL, a parish, partly in the barony of Gowran, but chiefly in that of Fassadining, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It consists of a main body on the east border of the county, and a detached district on both sides of the river Dinane; and the south-west corner of the main body constitutes the Gowran section. The main body lies 4 miles south-east of Castlecomer; and the detached district lies 2½ miles south-south-west of Castlecomer, and 4½ west of the main body. Length of the main body, south-south-eastward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Length of the detached district, south-south-westward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½. Area of the Fassadining section, 6,846 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches,—of which 2,478 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches constitute the detached district. Area of the Gowran section, 245 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the ecclesiastical authorities 2,427; but according to the Census, 2,530. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 2,586; of the Fassadining section, 2,547. Houses in the whole, 384; in the Fassadining section, 380. The main body often bears the name of Coolcullen. The land, in both districts, is good; and averages, in annual value, about 25s. per acre. A height in the main body, and near the church, has an altitude above sea-level of 850 feet. The Dinane river traces the eastern and northern boundaries of the main body, and descends, while there, from an elevation of 640 to one of about 430 feet above sea-level; and, while afterwards pursuing a southerly course, it cuts the detached district into nearly equal parts, and has, at about midway through it, an elevation of about 302 feet. The principal seats in the main body, are Mill-fall-house and Nursery-cottage; and the principal in the detached district, are Webbeshorough-house and Somerton-house. Closely adjacent to the southern boundary of the detached district, yet not within it, is the celebrated cave of DUNMOCK: see that article.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £369 4s. 7½d.; glebe, £59 10s. The rectories of Mothell, KILMODUMOCK, and KILDARRY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Mothell. Pop., in 1831, 3,764. Gross income, £746 8s. 7½d.; nett, £669 4s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates have the use of the glebe-house, and salaries of respectively £138 9s. 2½d. and £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1794, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and was enlarged in 1814, by means of a loan of £184 12s. 3½d. from that Board; and was new-roofed in 1828, by means of a loan of £92 6s. 1½d. from the incumbent. Sittings 300; attendance, from 150 to 300. The Roman Catholic chapel at Lisnafunchin, in the detached district, has an attendance of from 600 to 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Muckalee, Coome, Smithstown, and Ballyfoyle, in the parishes of Muckalee, Dysert, and Kilmodum. In 1834, the Protestants of Mothell parish amounted to 413, and the Roman Catholics to 2,074; the Protestants of the union to 451, and the Roman Catholics to 3,408; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 90 children; 5 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and a sum of unreported amount from the rector—were usually attended by about 200 children; and there was also a daily school in Kilmodumogue.

MOTHELL, a parish in the barony of Uppercor, 2½ miles south of Carrickbeg, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, south-west by southward, 7 miles; extreme breadth, 5½; area, 20,740 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches,—of which 36 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches are in Lough Coumshingaun, and 11 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches are in Lough Crotty. Pop., in 1831, 3,709; in 1841, 3,723. Houses 475. The south-western district contains some of the loftiest and most characteristic summits of the Comeragh mountains; the northern district descends to within ½ of a mile of the Suir; and the central district consists of the upper and middle portions of the vale of the Clodagh. Much of the surface is alpine waste ground, and rough mountainous pasture; and much, also, is fertile arable land. Three summits of the Comeragh mountains, of 2,031, 2,203, and 2,507 feet of altitude above sea-level, are situated in the extreme south-west; the lakes Coumshingaun and Crotty, with superficial elevations of respectively 1,254 and 396 feet above sea-level, lie a brief distance south-east of these summits; a mountain of 908 feet of altitude, is situated 1½ mile east of Lough Crotty; two mountains of 1,285 and 641 feet of altitude, are situated on the southern border of the parish; and a hill of 423 feet of altitude occurs about ½ of a mile north of the church. The road from Carrick-on-Suir to Kilmacthomas and Dungarvan pass through the interior. The principal seats are Old-Grange-house, Whitestown-house, and Ballyneahouse. The hamlets are Mothell and Cloona, the latter 1½ mile south-south-west of the former, and both on the road to Kilmacthomas. The church at Mothell is a neat building, ornamented with a tower. The abbey of Mothell is alleged to have been founded about the 6th century; but so little is known of its origin or early history, that disputes are high as to whether it was Augustinian or Cistercian. The abbots of it were long engaged in contests about their property; and Edward Power, who was the last abbot, and who surrendered the abbey in 1540, was found to be possessed of upwards of and featureless, it acquires interest from its extent, and possesses beauty in its disposition; and it may be quoted as an example of what perseverance and good taste can achieve upon the most disadvantageous grounds. The mansion, as to both its architecture and its interior character, is an elegant residence.

MOUNT-STEWART, the demesne of the Marquis of Londonderry, in the parish of Greyabbey, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated on Lough Strangford, 2 miles north-west of the village of Greyabbey; comprises about 500 acres; possesses great beauty in its home-views; is highly enriched by the shore-line and the watery expanse of Lough Strangford; and commands superb prospects toward the hill of Scrabo and the mountains of Mourne. The mansion combines some old masonry with comparatively modern architecture, and exhibits a style more Grecian than Roman, yet not strictly classical; and its apartments are numerous and splendid. A model of the Temple of the Winds is situated on the demesne, considerably south of the mansion, was erected under the superintendence of the distinguished architect, Mr. James Stewart, and sends aloft a spire which figures conspicuously in the exterior views of the demesne. For a notice of the family of the noble owner of Mount-Stewart, see article LONDONDERRY.

MOUNT-TALBOT, a village in the parish of Tisrara, barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands on the river Suck, on the west verge of the county, and on the road from Athleague to Ballinamore, 2½ miles south-south-west of Athleague. It has a post-office, a church, and a Roman Catholic chapel, and is a pleasant little village; but, in consequence of the disinclination of the proprietor to have a seat of trade adjacent to his demesne, it is prevented from increasing in extent. The Suck is here about 240 feet broad, and is spanned by a rather lofty bridge of 12 arches. Fairs are held on May 19, June 14, Nov. 1, and Dec. 21. Mount-Talbot-house, the fine old seat of William Talbot, Esq., stands adjacent to the village, on an elevated bank over the Suck, with a slope in front descending to the water; but it is so surrounded by dense masses of wood as to be invisible from a distance, and to be destitute of an open prospect even down the slope to the river. The edifice was, not many years ago, enlarged and castellated, under the direction of Mr. Richards of Roscommon; and it has now a very pleasing front; its towers are square and massive; and an arcade, with open arches, extends from one side of the building, and discovers views of the pleasure-grounds and the gardens. Pop. of the village not specially returned.

MOUNT-TEMPLE, a hamlet in the parish of Ballyloughloe, barony of Clonlonan, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands 3 miles north-west by west of Moate, on the road thence to Glassan; and it has a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a constabulary barrack. In its vicinity are Mount-Temple-house, Whitehall-house, and Carn-Park. Pop. not specially returned.

MOUNT-VENUS, a hamlet and a demesne in the parish of Cruagh, barony of Uppercross, 5 miles south by west of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster.

MOURNE (THE), a river of the barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It is formed by the confluence of the Moyle and the Strule, ¼ of a mile above Newtown-Stewart; and it runs 8 miles north-north-westward to unite with the Finn in forming the Foyle at Lifford. It receives the Derg on its left bank, 2 miles below Newtown-Stewart; and over its whole course, it flows along one of the most beautiful and most pleasantly diversified valleys in Ireland.

On the river, about 3 miles above Strabane, is an extensive and very interesting manufacturing establishment. See STON MILLS.

MOURNE, a grand congeries of mountains in the baronies of Mourne and Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. They fill the whole of the barony of Mourne, excepting a narrow band of low country around the coast; and they extend considerably into Lower Iveagh, but are there sometimes called the Iveagh mountains, and sometimes the Hen and Chickens. They occupy an area of 11½ miles from east to west by 9½ from north to south; and they, on the east side, immediately and stupendously overhang the Irish sea, and on the south sublimely screen the north side of Lough Strangford. They form a grandly picturesque background to multitudes of views from the bosom of the Irish sea, from the shores of Lough Strangford, from the interior of the county of Down, and from the sea-board districts of the counties of Louth and Dublin; and several of their summits, particularly on the south margin of the congeries, command panoramic views of extent and brilliancy unsurpassed by any in the three kingdoms. One road runs round their sea-base from Rostrevor to Newcastle, a distance of 18 miles; and two run across them from Hilltown to respectively Kilkeel and Rostrevor; so that easy access is enjoyed to interior views of their superb and very varied Highland magnificence. Their principal summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are, in an order from north to south, Slievenaman, 1,053; Hen Mountain, 1,187; Cock Mountain, 1,667; Butter Mountain, 2,137; Slievebeg, 2,384; Shrevemore, 2,443; Slieve-Donard, 2,796; Pigeon Rock, 1,735; Slievemuck, 2,198; Slievenaglogh, 1,450; Slieve-Bingan, 2,449; Eagle Mountain, 2,081; Finlieve, 1,868; a height immediately behind Kilkeel, 1,013; and Slievebane, 1,595. Some of the most interesting features or circumstances of the congeries will be found noticed in the articles CLOGHMORE, TOLLYMORE, KILKEEL, ROSTREVOR, CARLINGFORD, and DOWN.

MOURNE, a barony in the extreme south of co. Down, Ulster. It is bounded, on the west and north, by Upper Iveagh; on the east and south-east, by the Irish sea; and on the south-west, by Lough Carlingford. It is strictly identical with the parish of KILKEEL: which see. Area, 47,882 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches,—of which 36 acres, 3 roods are water. Pop., in 1831, 14,806; in 1841, 16,269. Houses 2,845. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,718; in manufactures and trade, 1,103; in other pursuits, 187. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 48; on the directing of labour, 958; on their own manual labour, 1,914; on means not specified, 90. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,536; who could read but not write, 1,635; who could neither read nor write, 2,625. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,262; who could read but not write, 2,331; who could neither read nor write, 3,763.—This barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Kilkeel. The total number of tenements valued is 3,171; and of these, 1,940 were valued under £5,—745, under £10,—264, under £15,—82, under £20,—48, under £25,—12, under £30,—25, under £40,—16, under £50,—and 13 at and above £50. The annual value of the property rated is £13,490 18s. 3d., and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, were £692 6s. 1d. and £573 4s. 9d.

MOURNE, a lake in the parish and county of Carrickfergus, 3 miles north of the town of Carrickfergus, co. Antrim, Ulster. "This sheet of water," says the Guide to the Giant's Causeway, "occupies runs across the southern district. The road from Dublin to Bailieborough, and that from Kells to Kingscourt, pass through the interior. The small but beautiful demesnes of Donore, Westland, Cherry-mount, and Kingsfort, are situated immediately south of the village, and in consecutive juxtaposition; and they completely fill a district of $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile by 1, with wood and decoration. Moynalty-lodge, the neat villa of John Farrell, Esq., stands closely adjacent to the upper end of the village. The seats in the other parts of the parish are Curraghtown-house, Shangarnon-house, Shangarnon-cottage, Walterstown-house, Rathmanoo, Rathstephen, Rathbane, Petersville-house, Petersville-cottage, and Amesbrook. The village of Moynalty stands on the Moynalty river, and at the intersection of the two great roads of the parish, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Kells, 8 south-south-east of Bailieborough, and $34\frac{1}{2}$ north-west by north of Dublin. It is a neat and handsome collection of pleasant cottages, nearly embowered in wood, greatly improved of late years by its proprietor, John Farrell, Esq., and presenting a delightful contrast to the poverty and disorder which characterize so large a number of the villages of Ireland. A court of petty-sessions is held on every alternate Thursday. The Moynalty dispensary is within the Kells Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 9,303 acres, with a pop. of 2,417; and, in 1839-40, it expended £72 4s. 10d., and administered to 1,359 patients. Area of the village, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 220; in 1841, 130. Houses 21.—Moynalty parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £550; glebe, £26. Gross income, £576; nett, £472 2s. 11d. Patron, the Crown. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built in 1819, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 90. The Moynalty and the Newcastle Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively about 1,100, and from 850 to 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 182, and the Roman Catholics to 5,925; and 8 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £5 a-year from the rector, one with £1 from the Roman Catholic clergyman, and two with respectively £8 and £12 from the National Board—had on their books 354 boys and 256 girls. In 1842, the National Board had two schools at Moynalty, and two at Cormeen.

MOYNALVY, a village in the parish of Kilmore, barony of Upper Deece, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the road from Kilcock to Kilmessan, 2 miles east of Summerhill. A brook which flows through the village, and falls into a tributary of the Boyatown river, within the basin of the Boyne, bears the name of the Moynalvy river. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Meath, takes name from Moynalvy, and has chapels here and at Galtrim. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 76. Houses 13.

MOYNART. See MONART.

MOYNE, a district and an abbey, in the barony of Tyrrawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. The district lies along the lower part of the Moy, and along part of the west side of Killalla bay; but its limits do not seem to be well-defined. The abbey stands in the south-east corner of the parish of Killalla, and on the shore of the estuary of the Moy, 2 miles south-east of the town of Killalla. The ground around it falls gently on every side till it forms a flat of about 4 or 5 acres, bounded on the east by the rocky and shelving banks of the Moy, and on either sides by the remains of a wall which defined the abbey's precincts. Only the battlements of the tower are high enough to command a view to the west; but the site toward the river conveys the eye over all the bay of Killalla, the Sligo shores of that bay, the east side of the lower part of the basin of the Moy, the church and castle of Inniscrone, and the whole expanse of undulated and eventually acclivitous country away to the sky-line of the Ox mountains. The abbey, though long unroofed, and now crumbling rapidly to ruin, is still nearly entire in its parts, and presents at once a picturesque object to the painter, and various features of artistic interest to the architect. "The church," says Dr. Mac-Parlan, "is 135 feet long by 20 feet broad; in some places 40 and 50 feet broad; this increase of breadth is opened by high and broad arches of magnificent size and workmanship. Off the top of the centre of the church rises the steeple, not less than an hundred feet high; it is supported by an arch, which makes part of the nave of the church; the eastern window is very handsome; all the walls and gables are entire; it is a charming ruin." "Here," says Archdall, "is a remarkable square tower, on one of the two gable ends, which form the choir and the body of the church, hexagon arches, being turned on consoles, from east to west fixed in the gable ends, which is a bold execution. There is some much admired stone-work about the church, convent, and cloister; the latter is built on plain pillars, in couplets, as at Sligo." The abbey belonged to Franciscan friars; and probably was founded, in 1460, by MacWilliam Bourke. Provincial chapters of the Franciscan order were held here in 1464, 1498, 1512, 1541, and 1550. The abbey and its possessions were granted, in the reign of Elizabeth, to Edmund Barrett.

MOYNE, a demesne, a rivulet, and a bog, in the barony of Tyaquin, co. Galway, Connaught. The demesne belongs to M. J. Brown, Esq., adorns the extreme north of the parish of Abbeyknockmoy, and is situated 5 miles north of Monivae, and the same distance south-west of Newtown-Bellew.—The rivulet is formed by the confluence of the Abbert river with other streams, in the vicinity of Moyne demesne, and a little above the celebrated ruin of Abbeyknockmoy; it is noted for performing part of its course below ground; and it runs about 4 miles westward to Turloughmore, or the great periodical expansion of the Clare river, at a point 5 miles south of Tuam.—The bog is one of a series of three bogs, situated on the east side of the Abbert river between Moyne demesne and Monivae; the other two are the bogs of Abbert and Windfield; and all three are dry, firm bogs, surrounded by a limestone gravel soil. Area of the three bogs, 4,449 acres; height above high-water level of Galway bay, 173½ feet; estimated cost of reclamation, £5,494. A constabulary station occurs in the vicinity of Moyne demesne.

MOYNE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Eliogurty, 4½ north-east of Thurles, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, south-eastward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 9,514 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,224; in 1841, 2,584. Houses 415. The whole of the southern and eastern borders, and large pendicles of the other districts, are bog; but the remainder of the surface consists, in a general view, of good land. The drainage is effected south-south-westward by two small affluents of the Suir. A height at the church, and Carrick-hill, on the northern boundary, have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 430 and 452 feet. The seats are Lisheen-castle, Fortfield-house, Killeran-house, and Eyremount-cottage. The principal antiquities are ruins of a church and two castles. The roads from Templetoohy to Thurles and Littleton, pass through the interior; and the village of Moyne stands on the latter, near the centre of the parish, and about a mile west of the church. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 150. Houses 26. One constabulary station is situated in the vicinity of the church; and another, in the vicinity of Lisheen-castle. In 1841, the Moyne Loan Fund had a capital of £500, circulated £2,199 in 957 loans, realized £7 2s. 8d. of nett profit, and expended £10 10s. for charitable purposes.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £479 17s. 6d.; glebe, £48 6s. 8d. The rectories of Moyne and KILCLONAGH [see that article], constitute the benefice of Moyne. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3¼. Pop., in 1831, 2,419. Gross income, £573 4s. 2d.; nett, £439 18s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £788 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 20 to 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Templetoohy. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and the union amounted to 63, the Roman Catholics of the parish to 2,277, and the Roman Catholics of the union to 2,482; and 4 daily schools in the union—three of which were in the parish—had on their books 251 boys and 183 girls. Each of two of the schools in the parish was aided with a free school-house from local contribution, and a salary of £10 a-year from the National Board. In 1842, there were two National schools at the village of Moyne, and one at Boulabeha.

MOYNE, a parish in the barony of South Balinacor, co. Wicklow, 4 miles east of Hacketstown, Leinster. Length, southward, 8 miles; breadth, from a few perches to 2½ miles; area, 8,401 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,175; in 1841, 1,100. Houses 175. Excepting a few fields on the southern and south-eastern borders, and in a tiny district round the church, the whole surface consists of upland bog and mountain, either very poor in soil or altogether sterile. The stupendous monarch-mountain, Lugnaquilla, lifts its soaring summit on the northern boundary; and two summits of respectively 1,754 and 1,186 feet of altitude above sea-level, are situated in the interior. The Slaney and the Little Slaney rise on the north-west boundary; and a large head-stream of the Aughrim rises on the east side of Lugnaquilla, and traces a large portion of the eastern boundary. Two mountain roads, from the interior of Wicklow to the county of Carlow, pass across Moyne; and two cross-roads traverse the southern part of the eastern and western borders; but all the northern district of the parish is totally destitute of roads. In 1841, the Moyne Loan Fund had a capital of £400, circulated £2,328 in 725 loans, realized a nett profit of £34 13s. 4d., and expended for charitable purposes £25.—This parish was formerly a part of the rectory of Hacketstown, but is now a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £184 12s. 4d.; glebe, £20 7s. 8d. Gross income, £205; nett, £190 1s. Patron, the incumbent of Hacketstown. The church was built in 1814. Sittings 140; attendance 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Hacketstown, Knockamara, and Killamote, within the benefice of Hacketstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 299, and the Roman Catholics to 747; and 2 daily schools—one of which was aided with £2 a-year from the Rev. Mr. Wright, and some advantages from Earl Fitzwilliam—were usually attended by about 85 children.

MOYNENE. See KILLAGE.

MOYNOE, a parish in the barony of Upper Talla, 1½ mile east by north of Scariff, co. Clare, Munster. Length, southward, 7 miles; breadth, from 1½ to 2½; area, 9,848 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches,—of which 388 acres are in Lough Derg, and 132 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches are in Lough Atorick. Pop., in 1831, 1,268; in 1841, 1,475. Houses 237. Part of Scariff bay is within the southern boundary; Lough Atorick, with a surface-elevation of 450 feet above sea-level, lies on the northern boundary; the Carr river rises on the east boundary at an altitude of 837 feet above sea-level, and runs westward through the interior; and the Bow river rises in the interior at an altitude of upwards of 608 feet above sea-level, and trots and tumbles partly in the interior, but chiefly along the eastern boundary, down to Scariff bay. A district of about 2½ miles northward from Scariff bay is champaign and principally arable; but all the remainder of the parish is an averagely lofty portion of the Slieve-Banghta mountains. The chief mountain-summits have altitudes above sea-level of 1,028, 1,126, and 765 feet. The only seat is Moynoe-house; and the chief hamlet is Cael-coosau.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of INNISCALTRA [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £36 18s. 5½d., and the rectorial for £46 3s. 1d.; and the latter are appropriated to the dean and chapter of Killaloe. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 1,353; and a daily school in Scariff, which is reported on as if it served for Moynoe, had on its books 70 boys and 40 girls.

MOYNRATH. See MOUNTRATH.

MOYNTAGHS, MOINTAGHS, or MONTAGHS-AND-ISLANDS, a parish in the barony of East O'Neill, 4½ miles north-west of Lurgan, co. Armagh, Ulster. It contains the village of CHARLESTOWN [which see], and includes a very large section of the southern part of Lough Neagh. Length, inclusive of the Lough Neagh section, 5½ miles; extreme breadth, 4½; area, 18,098 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches,—of which 12,178 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches are in Lough Neagh, 305 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches are in Lough Gullion, and 83 acres, 9 perches are in the river Bann. Length, east-south-eastward, and exclusive of Lough Neagh, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 2,891; in 1841, 3,480. Houses 559. The surface is all low and flat, and requires to be protected by an embankment from the overflowing of the Bann. About one-half is bog; and the remainder lets, on the average, for 25s. per plantation acre. The substrata possess much interest, both on account of their intrinsic value, and because they constitute a prominent part of the small tertiary geognostic district of Ireland. Lough Gullion lies nearly in the centre; the river creeps along the southern and the western boundaries; and the rivulet Close traces part of the eastern boundary. The islets of Little Scawdy and Rathlin in Lough Neagh belong to Moyntags. The village of Charlestown and the hamlet of Derryerow stand on the shore of Lough Neagh. The demesne of Rockland occupies the extreme east. The road from Lurgan by Banfoot-ferry to Maghery and Stewartstown, passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £54 2s. 6d.; glebe, £16 5s. Gross income, £141 9s. 6d.; nett, £124 17s. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1783, partly by means of a gift of £276 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 250. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 903 Churchmen, 104 Presbyterians, 5 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,895 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 150 children; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 112 boys and 93 girls.

MOYOLA, or MOYOWLA. See MATOWLA.

MOYRAGH. See MOIRA.

MOYRATH-CASTLE, a demesne, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south of the village of Kildalkey, parish of KILDALKEY, barony of Lunc, co. Meath, Leinster. The immediate pile whence it has its name, was, according to the annals of Innisfallen, built in 1219, by Viceroy Lord Geoffrey Morres, Baron de Montemariaco; and the castle and manor of Moyrath were purchased by William-Oge Nugent, second son of William, first Baron Delvin, and from that time became the seat of the purchaser and his descendants, who hence took the name of Nugents of Moyrath.

MOYRUS, a parish in the barony of Ballinahinch, immediately east of Clifden, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the village of ROUNDSTONE: which sec. Length, southward, 14 miles; breadth, from 7 to 13; area, 101,510 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches,—of which 528 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches are in Lough Ina, and 5,942 acres, 1 rood, 27 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 9,942, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 9,792; in 1841, 11,969. Houses 1,997. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 11,573. Houses 1,834. Both the interior and the coast contain the larger portion of the most characteristic districts of Cunnemara, and may be very accurately imaged by reference to our articles on CUNNEMARA, BINABOLA, and BALLINAHINCH; and even most of their minuter features may be seen by consulting the articles INA, ROUNDSTONE, BIRTERBUY, and KILKERRAN, and the articles on the most prominent of the mountains, lakes, islands, headlands, and harbours. All the summits, and most of the declivities of the alpine group of Binabola or the Twelve Pins, are within the northern district; and the principal heights in the other districts are one of 987 feet of altitude a little west of Roundstone, two of 428 and 1,024 feet of altitude at the head of Birterbuy bay, and two of 741 and 1,164 feet of altitude between Birterbuy bay and Kilkerran bay. Loughs Ina, Derryclare, and Ballinahinch unitedly form a demicircular sweep of lacustrine water round the east and south sides of Binabola; Lough Garoman, with a surface-elevation of 63 feet above sea-level, lies a little south-east of Lough Derryclare; and almost innumerable lakes chequer and cloud the other districts of the parish—the chief of which are Loughs Lehanaghbeg, Cloonacarta, Nagasser, Illion, Derryneem, Shanagheloottippon, Oorid, Mongaun, Agay, Aumelagh, Cuskamatiny, Owengarve, Anillaun, Annany, Park, 196 feet of elevation, Aunathan, Nasoun, Yvangan, Aumelaghbeack, Athry, Nubreck, Needhans, Anessundoo, Felin, East Nasoodery, Faddanagraigue, Cam, Nawelaun, Doon, Bolland, Namanawun, West Nasoodery, Ruffaunavoutheen, Derryemlaghbeg, Agaddy, Cloonagadda, Conga, Knocknafarderg, Anillaun, Fadda, Island, Derrylee, Enlagh, Cahireeshal, Curreeel, Aliggan, Avely, Aroneera, Maumeemaunragh, Awee, Nagraigue, Bola, Shallow, Mill, Bunnaciffa, Atrodanderg, Killa, Skannive, Sheedagh, Ieria, Aunore, and Truskan. The coast is considerably cut by Ard bay, and very deeply intersected, as well as intricately outlined by the main body and the ramifications of Birterbuy bay; but, with these exceptions, it is comparatively regular. The principal headlands are Gorteen Point, Earawalla Point, Muce Head, and Ardmore Point; and the principal islands, exclusive of those in Kilkerran bay, are Innismus-kerry, Birmore, Birbag, Horse-rocks, Finish, Malnish, Mason-Island, Innistraghonmore, Wherroon, Illanamorlaght, St. Macdarrn's-Island, Croaghna-keela, Illaunmacroghmore, Illaunmacroghbeg, Innisbigger, Freaghillaun, Innislacken, Illaungorn, Illaunagraghnut, Seal-Island, Innisnee, Mutton-Island, and Smotaun. The only seat is Ballinahinch Castle. The road from Galway to Clifden passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLINAKILL [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £50 15s. 4d. A church was recently erected by means quite independent of any public fund; but neither its cost, its capacity, nor the attendance upon it, is reported. A private house was previously used as the parochial place of worship, and had an attendance of about 28. The Roman Catholic chapels at Ballinufad, at Carna, and at Roundstone, have an attendance of respectively from 300 to 400, from 300 to 400, and from 200 to 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants, inclusive of two Presbyterians, amounted to 108, and the Roman Catholics to 10,381; 3 daily schools at Ballinufad, Roundstone, and Moyrus were in connection with the National Board, and had on their books 196 boys and 69 girls; and a hedge-school at Timbole-bridge was attended by about 12 or 15 children.

MOYS, a village in the parish of Tamlaghtfinlagan, barony of Kenought, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Area, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 161. Houses 31.

MOYSTOWN, the demesne of Col. L'Estrange, in the parish of Tisara, barony of Garrycastle, 2½ miles west-north-west of Cloughan, King's co., Leinster. Closely adjacent to it are Hunstanton-house, a police-barrack, a school, and the church of Tisara. "Though Moystown," says Mr. Fraser, "has neither varied nor park scenery, and is environed by deep brown bogs, there is, in the style of the old house, in the arrangement of the plantations, and in the beautiful old evergreen oaks, and other ornamental trees which adorn the lawn, a character which carries us back to the gentlemen's seats of the olden time."

MOYVIDDY. See MOYDDY.

MOYVILLY (THE), a rivulet of the county of Galway, Connaught. It rises 2 or 3 miles south of Monivea, and runs 12 miles south-eastward past Clareenbridge, to the middle of the head of Galway bay, near the mouth of the Carnamart river. In its course, about midway between Craughwell and Oranmore, are the ruins and the lake of Moyvilly.

MOYVORE, or TEMPLEPATRICK, a parish in the barony of Rathconrath, 3½ miles north-north-east of Ballymore, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, north-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,151 acres, 31 perches. Pop., in 1831, 763; in 1841, 827. Houses 107. The north-western district is all bog; but the other districts consist of averagely good land. The road from Ballymore to Ballinacerry, and that from Mullingar to Ballymahon intersect each other in the interior; and the village of Moyvore stands on the latter of these, the hamlet of Templepatrick on the former. Moyvore is a wretched village, but has a police-barrack. Fairs are held on May 4, Aug. 20, and Dec. 5. Area of the village, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 213; in 1841, 190. Houses 31.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Meath. The Protestants attend the church of Almoritia; and the Roman Catholics have a chapel, though not within Moyvore, yet almost on its northern boundary. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 763; and a daily school was timber, coal, slate, and other articles, commanding the navigation of the Blackwater by barges of considerable burden, and communicating facily with the east end of the Ulster Canal, the whole of the brief Canal to the Tyrone coal-field, and all the inland navigations of the eastern division of Ulster. The weaving of linen employs a fair proportion of the inhabitants; and the bleaching of linen is carried on, in the neighbourhood, in several large bleach-grounds. A fair is held on the first Friday of every month. A court of petty-sessions is held on every alternate Monday. Area of the town, 43 acres. Pop., in 1831, 902; in 1841, 857. Houses 151. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 37; in manufactures and trade, 97; in other pursuits, 39. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 18; on the directing of labour, 96; on their own manual labour, 50; on means not specified, 9.

MOYACOMB, or CLONEGAL, a parish, partly in the barony of Upper St. Mullins, co. Carlow, partly in the barony of Scarawalsh, co. Wexford, and partly in the barony of Shillelagh, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The Carlow section contains the village of CLONEGAL; and the Wexford section contains the village of WARCH-HOUSE: see these articles. Length of the Carlow section, southward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 5,945 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches. Length of the Wexford section, south-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 5,810 acres, 32 perches,—of which 24 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches are in the river Slaney. Length of the Wicklow section, east-south-eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 5,678 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,877; in 1841, 4,933. Houses 796. Pop. of the Wicklow section, in 1831, 1,398; in 1841, 1,324. Houses 192. Pop. of the rural districts of the Carlow section, in 1831, 1,708; in 1841, 1,752. Houses 291. Pop. of the rural districts of the Wexford section, in 1831, 1,091; in 1841, 1,115. Houses 181. The surface has a very diversified appearance, yet possesses a comparatively large amount of pleasant scenery and artificial embellishment; it consists of land worth not more, on the average, than about £1 per plantation acre per annum; and it is drained partly by the main stream of the Slaney, and to a still greater extent by that river's affluent, the Derry. The principal seats in the Carlow section are Clonogan-house, Kilcarrycottage, Ballyredmond-house, Woodlands-house, Patrick-street-house, and Huntingdon-castle,—the last the residence of Dr. Durdin; the principal in the Wexford section are Ramsfort-lodge, Woodfield-house, Ballinastraw-house, Ballinastraw-cottage, Drumderry-lodge, Bowfield-house, and Prospect-house,—the last the residence of George Bradwell, Esq.; and the principal in the Wicklow section are Ballinawortha-house, Urelands-house, Springfield, Raheenraney-house, Balisland-house, Sew-tree-house, Park-house, and Park-lodge. The hill of Knockfath, a mile south of the centre of the Carlow section, has an altitude above sea-level of 626 feet.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition and gross income, £830; nett, £795 6s. 8d. Patron, Edward Tickell, Esq. The incumbent holds also the adjoining benefice of Newtownbarry, in the dio. of Ferns, and resides in that benefice. A curate for Moyacomb receives a salary of £138 9s. 2½d. The church was built in 1819, by means of a loan of £1,292 6s. 1½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance 300. The Methodist meeting-house was built in 1833; and the attendance upon it is not reported. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kildain. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 829, and the Roman Catholics to 3,881. and 4 daily schools—each of two of which was salaried with £10 from the National Board—had on their books 161 boys and 176 girls.

MOYADDABEG, a bog in the barony of Moyarta, 2½ miles north-east of Kilrush, co. Clare, Munster. Area, 1,451 acres. It is of very irregular and branching outline; and though in some places very wet, is not a deep bog. It sends off its superfluous waters to Poolanishary Harbour; and is traversed across nearly its narrowest part, by the road from Kilrush to Cooraclare. Estimated cost of reclamation, £1,158 5s.

MOYAGHER, a parish in the barony of Luns, 3 miles north-east of Athboy, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, ½; area, 1,362 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches. Pop., in 1831, 565. It is politically regarded as part of the parish of RATHMORE (which see); and it consists of very good land, and contains the seat of Moyagher-house.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ATHBOY (which see), in the dio. of Meath. The tithe composition is returned in cumulo with that of Rathmore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 570; and a daily school was salaried with £25 from Lord Daraley and £25 from General Blighe, and had on its books 123 boys and 107 girls.

MOYALIFFE, MEALIFFE, or MIDLIFF, a parish in the barony of Upper Kilmannagh, 5 miles west-south-west of Thurles, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, westward, 5½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 3¼; area, 8,021 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches,—of which 13 acres lie detached. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 3,513, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 2,928; in 1841, 3,372. Houses 500. One-third of the surface is very good land; and the remainder is prevalently coarse, and to a large extent waste. The Clodiagh and the Owenbeg make their confluence nearly in the centre of the parish. The altitude of the site of the church above sea-level is 296 feet. The seats are Ballynara-house, Roskeen-house, and Moyallife-house; and the chief antiquities are ruins of three churches and two castles. The road from Templemore to Tipperary passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £300; glebe, £84. Gross income, £384; nett, £332 6s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1790, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and repaired in 1812, by means of a loan of £276 18s. 5½d. from that Board. Sittings 120; attendance 26. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Upperchurch or Templeouragh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 53, and the Roman Catholics to 3,036; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by from 20 to 30 children; and 7 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £20 a-year from the Board of Erasmus Smith—had on their books 263 boys and 180 girls. In 1842, there was a National school at Clareen.

MULLAGH, a village in the parish of Kilmurry, barony of Ibrickane, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Milltown-Malbay, co. Clare, Munster. Fairs are held on New-year's day, St. Patrick's day, Easter Monday, and Whitmonday. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 96; in 1841, 131. Houses 23.

MULLAGH, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Castleraghan, 5 miles east-south-east of Virginia, co. Cavan, Ulster. Length, south-south-eastward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 3; area, 12,872 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches,—of which 140 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,960; in 1841, 6,526. Houses 1,079. The surface includes some tracts of bog and mountain, but consists, for the most part, of good land. A pleasant and thoroughly wooded lake in the south, round the banks of which are the church, the glebe-house, and two seats, has a surface-elevation of 395 feet above sea-level; and 4 other lakes, or rather loughlets, occur in the north, the larger two of which bear the names of Lennasvrough and Corratinner. The seats are Rantavan-house, Cornakill-house, Lakeview-house, Mullagh-cottage, Palmyra-house, Cornaglee-house, and Greenwood-cottage. The village of Mullagh is situated in the south-east corner of the parish, on the road from Virginia to Moynalty. Fairs are held on the last Friday of Jan., March, May, July, Sept., and Nov. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 108; in 1841, 368. Houses 68.—This parish was formerly part of the vicarage and benefice of Killinkere, but is now a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Glebe, £20. Gross income, £98 2s.; nett, £91 9s. 8d. Patron, the incumbent of Killinkere. The vicarial tithes belong to the vicar of Killinkere, who pays the perpetual curate £55 a-year; and the rectorial tithes are inappropriate. The church was built in 1819, by means of a loan of £1,107 13s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 160; attendance 80. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 850 and 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 239 Churchmen, 26 Presbyterians, and 5,695 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 164 children; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 190 boys and 107 girls. In 1842, there were two National schools at Killecter.

MULLAGHBRACK, a parish in the baronies of Lower Fews and West O'Neilland, co. Armagh, Ulster. The Fews section contains the village of HAMILTON'S-BAWN, and part of the town of MARKET-HILL: see these articles. Length, south-eastward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Lower Fews section, 7,900 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches,—of which 40 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches are water. Area of the O'Neilland section, 3,656 acres, 8 perches,—of which 53 acres, 19 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 8,490; in 1841, 8,570. Houses 1,572. Pop., in 1841, of the O'Neilland section, 2,827; of the rural districts of the Fews section, 4,904. Houses in these, respectively 526 and 884. The surface presents, in general, the undulated and beautifully tumulated character which prevails throughout the central districts of the county; and it consists, for the most part, of good, improved, and well-cultivated land. A principal group of decorative features, and a general notice of georgic improvements, are exhibited in the article GOSFORD: which see. Lough Marlacoo lies in the O'Neilland section; Lough Ballynewry, in the Fews section; and Lough Moyrourkan, on the boundary between the sections. The seats in the O'Neilland section are Marlacoo-house, Prospect-house, Mount-Pleasant, Walkingshaw, Grove-house, Bloomfield, Drumart-house, and Willmount; and those in the Fews section are Gosford-castle, Mullard-cottage, Bryandrum-cottage, Dogherly-house, Ballynewry-house, Turner's-grove, Ashvale, Johnston-house, and Derrynaught-house. The roads from Armagh to Newry, from Rich-hill to Dundalk, from Tanderagee to Keady, and from Portadown to Newtown-Hamilton, pass through the interior. A large proportion of the parishioners are employed in the linen manufacture.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £671 4s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; glebe, £810 2s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The rectories of Mullaghbrack and KILCLUNY [see that article] constitute the benefice of Mullaghbrack, and the corps of Mullaghbrack prebend. Gross income, £2,208 13s. 2d.; nett, £1,829 18s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £100. The church is situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north by west of Markethill, and was built in 1830, at the cost of £1,760,—of which £400 was raised by parochial assessment, £1,035 was subscribed by the incumbent, £200 by Lord Gosford, £100 from the diocesan, and £25 from other persons. Sittings 1,000; attendance 500. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, the one formerly of the Synod of Ulster, and the other of the Secession Synod, have an attendance of respectively from 200 to 300 and 400. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in Ballymore and Acton. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,382 Churchmen, 2,983 Presbyterians, 116 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,330 Roman Catholics; 9 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 660 children; and 14 daily schools had on their books 551 boys and 396 girls. One of the daily schools in Hamilton's-Bawn was salaried with £6 from the London Hibernian Society; one at Tannaghmore, with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and £5 10s. and other advantages from the incumbent; one at Drumahee, with £11; one at Gosford, with £40 from Lady Gosford; one at Bullinero, with £12; one at Cabra, with £40 by the late Rev. Henry MacCraight; and the Mullaghbrack parochial school, with £20 from the incumbent. In 1842, there were two National schools at Market-hill; and a respectable classical school. A small agricultural males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 747; who could read but not write, 1,745; who could neither read nor write, 3,278.—Moydoe lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Longford. The total number of valued tenements is 2,369; and of these, 1,400 were valued under £5,—368, under £10,—229, under £15,—101, under £20,—71, under £25,—35, under £30,—40, under £40,—18, under £50,—and 47, at and above £50.

MOYDOE, or MORDOW, a parish in the barony of Moydoe, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles west of Ardagh, co. Longford, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{2}{4}$; area, 4,626 acres, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,776; in 1841, 1,919. Houses 310. The land is, in general, good; and yields an average rental of 30s. per plantation acre. The seats are Castleres, Bawn, Meeltanagh, Toneen, and Mount-Jessop. The hamlets are Moydoe and Lenaghans. Archdall says that there was an early abbey at Kilmoidan or Moydoe; and he connects with it a St. Modan or Modiu, and an alleged disciple of St. Patrick of the name of Erleacus. A police-barrack is situated a little north-east of Moydoe hamlet. The road from Keenagh to Ardagh, and that from Abbeyshrule to Longford, intersect each other in the parochial interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Ardagh. Tithe composition, £190 18s. 3d.; glebe, £117 2s. 6d. The rectories of Moydoe and TEIGHSHINOD [see that article], constitute the benefice of Moydoe. A small portion of the tithes compounded for £2 14s. 10d., is inappropriate in Messrs. Ponsoby and Palliser. Length, 6 miles; breadth, $\frac{2}{4}$. Pop., in 1831, 4,329. Gross income, £530 12s.; nett, £443 9s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built about 77 years ago, and repaired about 19 years ago, and in 1831. Sittings 180; attendance 80. The Moydoe Roman Catholic chapel has three officiates, and an attendance of 1,000. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Teighshinod. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 127, and the Roman Catholics to 1,675; the Protestants of the union to 322, and the Roman Catholics to 4,016; and 7 daily schools in the union—five of which were in the parish, and two of these five salaried wick respectively £7 and £9 from the Ardagh Association—had on their books 205 boys and 130 girls.

MOYDRUM-CASTLE, the seat of Viscount Castlemaine, on the west border of the parish of Ballyloughloe and barony of Clonlunan, 3 miles east of Athlone, co. Westmeath, Leinster. The ancient mansion had no pretensions to architectural beauty, and was very ill suited to be the residence of a distinguished family; but the present edifice is a handsome and commodious structure, in the modern pointed style, built after designs by Mr. Morrison. The demesne abounds with inequalities of surface, possesses much wood and water, and presents a large amount of very beautiful park scenery.

MOYFENRAGH (LOWNA), a barony of the county of Meath, Leinster. It is bounded on the north-west, by Lunc; on the north, by Upper Navan; on the east, by Lower and Upper Dece; on the south, and south-east, by co. Kildare; and on the west, by Upper Moyfenragh and Lunc. Its length, south-south-westward, is 9 miles; its extreme breadth is $7\frac{1}{4}$; and its area is 40,313 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches,—of which 121 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches are in the river Boyne. The surface is low, flat, limestone land, closely similar, both in richness of natural character and in grossness of agricultural maltreatment, to the rest of the fertile champaign ground of the county. A considerable extent of land, which might be profitably reclaimed by draining and liming, either lies entirely waste or yields an almost nominal produce; and at least 1,000 acres of exhausted bog, quite capable of remunerating improvement, is allowed to remain in neglect. Yet limestone, marl, and calcareous gravel or sand are found in almost every part of the barony, so that only capital and enterprise are required to bring the waste lands into immediate cultivation.—This barony contains part of the parish of Trim, and the whole of the parishes of Lanesor, Rathcor, and Rathmolyon. The only town is part of Trim; and the chief villages are Summerhill, Esfield, and Rathmolyon. Pop., in 1831, 11,806; in 1841, 12,859. Houses 2,062. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,578; in manufactures and trade, 406; in other pursuits, 231. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 57; on the directing of labour, 677; on their own manual labour, 1,431; on means not specified, 50. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,161; who could read but not write, 1,170; who could neither read nor write, 2,491. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,177; who could read but not write, 1,333; who could neither read nor write, 2,949.—Lower Moyfenragh lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Trim. The total number of tenements valued is 1,991; and of these, 1,230 were valued under £5,—216, under £10,—124, under £15,—72, under £20,—46, under £25,—30, under £30,—54, under £40,—35, under £50,—and 184, at and above £50. The annual value of the property rated is £35,007 14s. 3d.; and the sum levied under the grand warrant of summer 1841, was £1,053 1s. 10d.

MOYFENRAGH (UPPER), a barony of the county of Meath, Leinster. The greater part of it constitutes the south-westward wing or projection of the county. It is bounded, on the north-east, by Lunc and Lower Moyfenragh; on the south-east, by Lower Moyfenragh and co. Kildare; on the south-west, by King's county; and on the north-west, by co. Westmeath. Its length, south-westward, is $10\frac{1}{4}$ miles; its greatest breadth is $5\frac{1}{4}$; and its area is 31,600 acres, 10 perches,—of which 70 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches are in the river Boyne and Lough Crobry. The surface is low and champaign, and contains a large aggregate of bog and morass. The highest ground, Toor Hill, is situated in the south, and has an altitude above sea-level of 318 feet. The Boyne flows chiefly along the boundary with Kildare, and partly across the north-eastern district; and the Castlejordan, Clonard, Deel, and Blackwater rivulets are the chief draining streams of the interior to the Boyne. The Royal Canal passes across the interior.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Castlejordan and Castlerickard, and the whole of the parishes of Ballyboggan, Clonard, and Killyon. The chief village is Longwood. Pop., in 1831, 8,631; in 1841, 8,915. Houses 1,482. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,178; in manufactures and trade, 300; in other pursuits, 64. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 28; on the directing of labour, 503; on their own manual labour, 992; on means not specified, 19. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,338; who could read but not write, 679; who could neither read nor write, 1,961. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 619; who could read but not write, 915; who could neither read nor write, 2,309.—Upper Moyfenragh lies partly within the Poor-law union of Trim, and partly within that of Edenderry. The total number of tenements valued is 1,591; and of these, 1,036 were valued under £5,—154, under £10,—111, under £15,—69, under £20,—47, under £25,—29, under £30,—29, under £40,—19, under £50,—and 100, at and above £50. and ENNEL. The chief antiquities are the ruins of a mansion and a castle. The road from Mullingar to Tyrrel's-Pass traverses the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £65. The rectories of Moylisker, LYNN, and CARRICK [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Moylisker. Length and breadth, each $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Pop., in 1831, 2,058. Gross income, £306 3s. 1d.; nett, £265 8s. 5d. Patron, the Crown. A curate receives a salary of £80. The church is very old, and was enlarged in 1807, at the cost of £394 3s. 1d. raised by subscription, parochial assessment, and the sale of pews. Sittings 200; attendance, about 80. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Lynn. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 90, and the Roman Catholics to 167; the Protestants of the union to 248, and the Roman Catholics to 1,903; a daily school in the parish was aided with £4 a-year from the rector, and had on its books 6 boys and 5 girls; and 3 daily schools in the union had on their books 57 boys and 30 girls.

MOYLLOUGH, a parish, partly in the barony of Killian, but chiefly in that of Tyaquin, co. Galway, Connaught. The Killian section contains the village of MOUNT-BELLEW; and the Tyaquin section contains the village of NEWTOWN-BELLEW: see these articles. Length of the parish, south-south-westward, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $7\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Killian section, 2,647 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres,—of which 60 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches are water. Area of the Tyaquin section, 20,739 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches,—of which 86 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 6,794, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 5,870; in 1841, 7,248. Houses 1,215. Pop. of the Killian section, in 1831, 924; in 1841, 919. Houses 134. Pop. of the rural districts of the Tyaquin section, in 1831, 5,811; in 1841, 6,080. Houses 1,041. The Killian section forms a wing or projection from the east side of the main body or of the other section, and is very nearly detached; and while containing a broad belt of bog round most of its periphery, it is beautiful and ornate athwart all the interior in identity with the demesne of Mount-Bellew. The stage-coach road from Ballinasloe to Westport passes through both the villages of the parish, and reveals to the passing traveller most of the features of interest in the district. Newtown-Bellew, is more commonly called Moylough, and is the site of the church, the parochial Roman Catholic chapel, and a constabulary barrack. Some uncommonly fine pasture-lands lie around this village; yet a large proportion of the Tyaquin section of the parish is bog. The whole surface is flat and naturally tame, lying on a basis of probably 180 feet of mean elevation above sea-level, and nowhere possessing a height of greater altitude than 305 feet above sea-level. A curious lake called LASAROE [which see], occurs in the vicinity of Newton-Bellew; and other lakes are Nalarsagh, Horse-Leap, Annagh, Coolderg, Creggouns, and Derrymurick. The seats, additional to Mount-Bellew, are Broommill-lodge, Ballybann, Summerhill, Elmhill-house, Monthill-lodge, Summerville, Cooloo-cottage, and Windfield,—the two last the residence of Edward Brown and John Jameson, Esqrs. The principal antiquities are ruins of Garbally-castle, Clooncurreen-castle, Castle-Bellew, Moylough-castle, Stephen's-church, and a Roman Catholic chapel.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £700; glebe, £5. The rectories of Moylough, ACHARY, BALLINAKILTY, and KILMAURILAN, and the vicarage of KILMOYLAN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Moylough. Length, 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $7\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 11,195. Gross income, £1,287

5s. 8d.; nett, £1,185 16s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure prebend of Kilmoylan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built in 1808, partly by means of a loan of £184 12s. 34d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and partly by means of an unrecorded sum raised by private subscription. Sittings 150; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapels of Moylough, Trigan, and Skehana, have an attendance of respectively 2,500, 1,800, and 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Menlough in the parish of Killoscobe. The Roman Catholic chapel of Corrofin has an attendance of from 800 to 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Belclare-Tuam. There are two Roman Catholic chapels in Mount-Bellew, the one connected with the Patrician Monastery, and the other with Mount-Bellew mansion. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 66, and the Roman Catholics to 6,226; the Protestants of the union to 76, and the Roman Catholics to 11,923; 7 daily schools in the parish were usually attended by about 309 children; and there were 5 daily schools in the other parts of the union. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £10 a-year from the rector; one with £20 from Mrs. Bellew; and one was conducted by the monks of Mount-Bellew.

MOYMET, a parish in the barony of Upper Navan, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Trim, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, west by northward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,255 acres, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, 634; in 1841, 554. Houses 89. The land is of a good quality for both tillage and pasture, and yields an annual rent of about 38s. per plantation acre. The only seat is Kilbride; and the only hamlet is Lamboy. The road from Trim to Kells passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £238 15s. 44d.; glebe, £15 15s. Gross income, £254 10s. 44d.; nett, £204 6s. 84d. Patron, the Crown. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Churchtown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 646; and a daily school was salaried with £5 from Lord Sherborne, and £2 from the rector, and had on its books 26 boys and 28 girls.

MOYNALTY, or OWENROE (THE), a rivulet of co. Cavan, Ulster, and of co. Meath, Leinster. It rises in the vicinity of the town of Bailieborough, and flows through the barony of Clonkee, between the barony of Castleraghan on the right, and the barony of Clonkee and the county of Meath on the left, and through the baronies of Lower Kells and Upper Kells, to the Blackwater at a point 3 miles below the town of Kells. Its direction is south-easterly; and its length of course is about 13 miles.

MOYNALTY, a parish, containing a post village of the same name, in the barony of Lower Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 12,678 acres, 3 roods, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 5,917; in 1841, 6,279. Houses 1,034. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,697; in 1841, 6,148. Houses 1,013. One-third of the surface is good land, one-third is middle-rate, and one-third is very poor; and these three districts pretty nearly correspond with respectively the southern, the central, and the northern sections of the parish. The Moyalty river traces most of the western boundary, and then village of Moyne stands on the latter, near the centre of the parish, and about a mile west of the church. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 156. Houses 26. One constabulary station is situated in the vicinity of the church; and another, in the vicinity of Lisheen-castle. In 1841, the Moyne Loan Fund had a capital of £500, circulated £2,199 in 957 loans, realized £7 2s. 8d. of nett profit, and expended £10 10s. for charitable purposes.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £479 17s. 6d.; glebe, £48 6s. 8d. The rectories of Moyne and KILCLOUGH [see that article], constitute the benefice of Moyne. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3¼. Pop., in 1831, 2,419. Gross income, £573 4s. 2d.; nett, £439 18s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 20 to 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Templetoohy. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and the union amounted to 63, the Roman Catholics of the parish to 2,277, and the Roman Catholics of the union to 2,482; and 4 daily schools in the union—three of which were in the parish—had on their books 251 boys and 183 girls. Each of two of the schools in the parish was aided with a free school-house from local contribution, and a salary of £10 a-year from the National Board. In 1842, there were two National schools at the village of Moyne, and one at Boulabehn.

MOYNE, a parish in the barony of South Ballynacore, co. Wicklow, 4 miles east of Hacketstown, Leinster. Length, southward, 8 miles; breadth, from a few perches to 2½ miles; area, 8,461 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,175; in 1841, 1,100. Houses 175. Excepting a few fields on the southern and south-eastern borders, and in a tiny district round the church, the whole surface consists of upland bog and mountain, either very poor in soil or altogether sterile. The stupendous monarch-mountain, Lugnaquilla, lifts its soaring summit on the northern boundary; and two summits of respectively 1,754 and 1,186 feet of altitude above sea-level, are situated in the interior. The Slaney and the Little Slaney rise on the north-west boundary; and a large head-stream of the Aughrim rises on the east side of Lugnaquilla, and traces a large portion of the eastern boundary. Two mountain roads, from the interior of Wicklow to the county of Carlow, pass across Moyne; and two cross-roads traverse the southern part of the eastern and western borders; but all the northern district of the parish is totally destitute of roads. In 1841, the Moyne Loan Fund had a capital of £400, circulated £2,328 in 725 loans, realized a nett profit of £34 13s. 4d., and expended for charitable purposes £25.—This parish was formerly a part of the rectory of Hacketstown, but is now a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £184 12s. 4d.; glebe, £20 7s. 8d. Gross income, £205; nett, £190 1s. Patron, the incumbent of Hacketstown. The church was built in 1814. Sittings 140; attendance 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Hacketstown, Knockananna, and Killamote, within the benefice of Hacketstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 293, and the Roman Catholics to 747; and 2 daily schools—one of which was aided with £2 a-year from the Rev. Mr. Wright, and some advantages from Earl Fitzwilliam—were usually attended by about 85 children.

MOYNEENE. See KILLAGE.

MOYNOE, a parish in the barony of Upper Tulla, 1½ mile east by north of Scariff, co. Clare, Munster. Length, southward, 7 miles; breadth, from 1½ to 2½; area, 9,848 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches,—of which 388 acres are in Lough Derg, and 132 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches are in Lough Atorick. Pop., in 1831, 1,208; in 1841, 1,475. Houses 237. Part of Scariff bay is within the southern boundary; Lough Atorick, with a surface-elevation of 450 feet above sea-level, lies on the northern boundary; the Corra river rises on the east boundary at an altitude of 837 feet above sea-level, and runs westward through the interior; and the Bow river rises in the interior at an altitude of upwards of 608 feet above sea-level, and trots and tumbles partly in the interior, but chiefly along the eastern boundary, down to Scariff bay. A district of about 2½ miles northward from Scariff bay is champaign and principally arable; but all the remainder of the parish is an averagely lofty portion of the Slieve-Baughta mountains. The chief mountain-summits have altitudes above sea-level of 1,028, 1,126, and 765 feet. The only seat is Moynoe-house; and the chief hamlet is Coolcoosun.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of IXXISCALTHRA [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £36 18s. 5½d., and the rectorial for £46 3s. 1d.; and the latter are appropriated to the dean and chapter of Killaloe. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 1,353; and a daily school in Scariff, which is reported on as if it served for Moynoe, had on its books 70 boys and 40 girls.

MOYNRATH. See MOUNTRATH.

MOYNTAGHS, MOINTAGHS, or MONTAGHS-AND-ISLANDS, a parish in the barony of East O'Neill, 4½ miles north-west of Lurgan, co. Armagh, Ulster. It contains the village of CHARLESTOWN [which see], and includes a very large section of the southern part of Lough Neagh. Length, inclusive of the Lough Neagh section, 5½ miles; extreme breadth, 4½; area, 18,066 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches,—of which 12,178 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches are in Lough Neagh, 305 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches are in Lough Gullion, and 83 acres, 9 perches are in the river Bann. Length, east-south-eastward, and exclusive of Lough Neagh, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 2,801; in 1841, 3,480. Houses 539. The surface is all low and flat, and requires to be protected by an embankment from the overflowing of the Bann. About one-half is bog; and the remainder lets, on the average, for 25s. per plantation acre. The substrata possess much interest, both on account of their intrinsic value, and because they constitute a prominent part of the small tertiary geognostic district of Ireland. Lough Gullion lies nearly in the centre; the river creeps along the southern and the western boundaries; and the rivulet Close traces part of the eastern boundary. The islets of Little Seawdy and Rathlin in Lough Neagh belong to Moynaghs. The village of Charlestown and the hamlet of Derrycrow stand on the shore of Lough Neagh. The demesne of Rockliff occupies the extreme east. The road from Lurgan by Banfoot-ferry to Maghera and Stewartstown, passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £54 2s. 6d.; glebe, £16 3s. Gross income, £141 9s. 6d.; nett, £124 17s. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1783, partly by means of a gift of £276 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 250. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 90 Churchmen, 104 Presbyterians, 5 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,895 Roman Catholics; a Survey school was usually attended by about 150 children; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 112 boys and 93 girls.

MOYRATH-CASTLE, a demesne, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south of the village of Kildalkey, parish of KILDALKEY, barony of Lune, co. Meath, Leinster. The original pile whence it has its name, was, according to the annals of Innisfallen, built in 1219, by Viceroy Lord Geoffrey Morres, Baron de Montemarisco; and the castle and manor of Moyrath were purchased by William-Oge Nugent, second son of William, first Baron Delvin, and from that time became the seat of the purchaser and his descendants, who hence took the name of Nugents of Moyrath.

MOYRUS, a parish in the barony of Ballinahinch, immediately east of Clifden, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the village of ROUNDSTONE: which see. Length, southward, 14 miles; breadth, from 7 to 13; area, 101,510 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches,—of which 528 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches are in Lough Ina, and 5,942 acres, 1 rood, 27 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 9,942, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 9,792; in 1841, 11,969. Houses 1,997. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 11,573. Houses 1,934. Both the interior and the coast contain the larger portion of the most characteristic districts of Cunnamara, and may be very accurately imaged by reference to our articles on CUNNAMARA, BINABOLA, and BALLINAHINCH; and even most of their minuter features may be seen by consulting the articles INA, ROUNDSTONE, BIRTERBUY, and KILKERRAN, and the articles on the most prominent of the mountains, lakes, islands, headlands, and harbours. All the summits, and most of the declivities of the alpine group of Binabola or the Twelve Pins, are within the northern district; and the principal heights in the other districts are one of 987 feet of altitude a little west of Roundstone, two of 428 and 1,024 feet of altitude at the head of Birterbuy bay, and two of 741 and 1,164 feet of altitude between Birterbuy bay and Kilkerran bay. Loughs Ina, Derryclare, and Ballinahinch unitedly form a demisemicircular sweep of lacustrine water round the east and south sides of Binabola; Lough Garoman, with a surface-elevation of 63 feet above sea-level, lies a little south-east of Lough Derryclare; and almost innumerable lakes chequer and cloud the other districts of the parish—the chief of which are Loughs Lehanagh 176 feet of elevation above sea-level, Lehanaghbeg, Cloonaacarta, Nagasser, Illion, Derryneen, Shannogheloontippon, Ooid, Mongaun, Agay, Aunemlagh, Cuskamatinny, Owengarve, Anillaun, Aunanny, Park, 196 feet of elevation, Aunathin, Nasoun, Yvangan, Aunemlagheask, Athry, Nubrick, Needhans, Anessaundoo, Felin, East Nasoodery, Faddanagraigue, Cam, Naweelaun, Doon, Bollard, Namanawaun, West Nasoodery, Ruffaunavoughbeen, Derryeunlaghbeg, Agaddy, Cloonaagadda, Conga, Knocknafarderg, Anillaun, Fadda, Island, Derrylee, Emlagh, Cahireeshal, Curree, Aliggan, Avally, Aconeera, Maameenmaunragh, Awee, Nagraigue, Bola, Shallow, Mill, Bunnacliffa, Atrodaunderg, Killa, Skannive, Sheedagh, Ieria, Aunore, and Truskan. The coast is considerably cut by Ard bay, and very deeply intersected, as well as intricately outlined by the main body and the ramifications of Birterbuy bay; but, with these exceptions, it is comparatively regular. The principal headlands are Gorteen Point, Easawalla Point, Mace Head, and Ardmore Point; and the principal islands, exclusive of those in Kilkerran bay, are Innis- kerri, Birmore, Birbeg, Horse-rocks, Finish, Mulnish, Mason-Island, Innistraghmore, Wherroon, Illanamorlaght, St. Maedarra's-Island, Croaghna-keela, Illanunacroaghmore, Illanunacroaghbeg, Innisbigger, Freaghillaun, Innislackan, Illaugorn, Illanunagrathnut, Seal-Island, Innisnee, Mutton-Island, and Smotaun. The only seat is Ballinahinch Castle. The road from Galway to Clifden passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLINAKILL [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £50 15s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. A church was recently erected by means quite independent of any public fund; but neither its cost, its capacity, nor the attendance upon it, is reported. A private house was previously used as the parochial place of worship, and had an attendance of about 28. The Roman Catholic chapels at Ballinadad, at Carna, and at Roundstone, have an attendance of respectively from 300 to 400, from 300 to 400, and from 200 to 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants, inclusive of two Presbyterians, amounted to 108, and the Roman Catholics to 10,381; 3 daily schools at Ballinadad, Roundstone, and Moyrus were in connection with the National Board, and had on their books 196 boys and 69 girls; and a hedge-school at Timbole-bridge was attended by about 12 or 15 children.

MOYS, a village in the parish of Tamlaghtfinlagan, barony of Kenought, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Area, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 161. Houses 31.

MOYSTOWN, the demesne of Col. L'Estrange, in the parish of Tisara, barony of Garrycastle, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Cloghan, King's co., Leinster. Closely adjacent to it are Hunstanton-house, a police-barrack, a school, and the church of Tisara. "Though Moystown," says Mr. Fraser, "has neither varied nor park scenery, and is environed by deep brown bogs, there is, in the style of the old house, in the arrangement of the plantations, and in the beautiful old evergreen oaks, and other ornamental trees which adorn the lawn, a character which carries us back to the gentlemen's seats of the olden time."

MOYVIDDY. See MOVIDDY.

MOYVILLY (THE), a rivulet of the county of Galway, Connaught. It rises 2 or 3 miles south of Monivea, and runs 12 miles south-eastward past Clareenbridge, to the middle of the head of Galway bay, near the mouth of the Carnamart river. In its course, about midway between Craughwell and Oranmore, are the ruins and the lake of Moyvilly.

MOYVORE, or TEMPLEPATRICK, a parish in the barony of Rathconrath, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Ballymore, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, north-westward, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,151 acres, 31 perches. Pop., in 1831, 765; in 1841, 627. Houses 107. The north-western district is all bog; but the other districts consist of averagely good land. The road from Ballymore to Ballinacargy, and that from Mullingar to Ballymahon intersect each other in the interior; and the village of Moyvore stands on the latter of these, the hamlet of Templepatrick on the former. Moyvore is a wretched village, but has a police-barrack. Fairs are held on May 4, Aug. 20, and Dec. 5. Area of the village, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 213; in 1841, 190. Houses 31.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Meath. The Protestants attend the church of Almoritia; and the Roman Catholics have a chapel, though not within Moyvore, yet almost on its northern boundary. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 765; and a daily school was salaried with £30 from the National Board, and had on its books 208 boys and 153 girls.

MOYVOUGHILY, a bog about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Moate, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It lies from 133 to 171 feet higher than the Shannon; declines on three different sides toward respectively Lough Ree, the Inny, and the Brosna; is traversed by the road from Moate to Mullingar; and has an area of 426 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches. Estimated cost of reclamation, £3 7s. 2½d. per plantation acre.

MUCK, an islet in the parish of Island-Magee, barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. It lies $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile off the nearest part of Island-Magee, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ south-east of Point Skeenaghan; and measures about 3 furlongs in length.

MUCKALEE, baronies of Iverk and Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny. See MACULLA.

MUCKALEE, a parish in the barony of Fassadining, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Castlecomer, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,706 acres, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 885; in 1841, 1,101. Houses 160. The surface is of prevalently upland height and character, yet contains a fair proportion of good land. The highest ground is on the east, and has an altitude of 960 feet above sea-level. The Dinane river traces part of the northern boundary westward, and, after passing away for some distance, returns to trace part of the western boundary southward. A tiny tributary of the Dinane has a chief part of its course in the southern district of Muckalee, and is called the Muckalee river. The only seat is Rockbrook; and the other objects of interest are a woollen manufactory, and the ruins of Muckalee church and Cloghninka-castle.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DRUMONE [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £50, and the rectorial for £100; and the latter are inappropriate in the corporation of Kilkenny. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 30, and the Roman Catholics to 873; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 107 boys and 53 girls.

MUCKAMORE, a grange in the barony of Lower Massarene, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east of Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. It contains the village of MASSARENE; which see. Length, westward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 5,440 acres, 36 perches,—of which 1,518 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches are in Lough Neagh. Pop., in 1831, 1,798; in 1841, 1,740. Houses 339. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,479; in 1841, 1,488. Houses 280. The surface is an ornate part of the basin of Lough Neagh; and is bounded along the whole of the north by Six-mile-Water. The seats are Muckamore-abbey, New-lodge, Summerhill, and Greenmount. The whole of Antrim bay is within the limits. Muckamore-abbey, the demesne of S. Thompson, Esq., comprehends several hundred acres of finely elevated land, lightly and ornamentally planted, and commanding a rich and extensive landscape. Its soil is a fertile mould, particularly favourable to the production of wheat and oats; and the grazing-grounds of the surrounding country are famous for both the quantity and the quality of their cheese. Muckamore mills are situated on Six-mile-Water, and on a pleasant farm of about 60 Conyngham acres, and are employed in the grinding of wheat, barley, and oats. A very small and ivy-grown remnant exists of the ancient and once celebrated monastery of Muckamore; and a cemetery also exists in its vicinity, and has yielded some curious minor antiquities to the inspection of the antiquarian. The monastery is alleged to have been originally built in 550, by St. Columba. Its prior in 1183 was a subscribing witness to the charter granted by Sir John de Courcy to the abbey of Downpatrick; Bryn, its last prior, surrendered it and being to it, in the 32d year of Henry 2d, the family of Langford obtained a grant of Elizabeth.—This grange lies within the parish of Antrim. In 1834, the abbot of 367 Churchmen, 1,171 other Protestant dissenters, and 3 lies; 2 Sunday schools were on about 125 children; and 2 daily which was salaried with £100. Thompson—had on their books 107 boys and 53 girls.

MUCKISH, a mountain in the horky, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Dunfermline, co. Donegal, Ulster, appears, at a distance, to be acute, seems to have suggested the name means 'a swine's back'; but it is a tableau of several acres, situated 2,190 feet above sea-level, and with that species of saxifrage w. cottage-florists as London-pride. The mountain is so steep that a tourist hold of the heath and the rock to may amuse himself, while ascending pieces of stone to the bottom, a noise, velocity, smoke, and flashes elicited in the momentum of their descent prospect is obtained from the weather of many parts of Donegal long marine inlets of Sheephaven Lough-Swilly, and even of some derry and Tyrone. The white which the upper portion of the mountain is in some places disintegrated by elements into fine sand; and large sand were, some years ago, rolled in canvass bags, and exported of Dumbarton, in Scotland, then tured into the purest crown and p.

MUCKLAGH ROCKS, a close lybeigue bay, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Kerry, Munster.

MUCKNO, a lake in the parish Muckno, and Donaghmoyne, barony and Farney, co. Monaghan, Ulster, adjacent to the east side of Castleblaney already been partially noticed in that town: see CASTLE-BLANEY lake, south-eastward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; $1\frac{1}{2}$. Area, within Clontibret parishes, 28 perches; within Muckno 3 roods; within Donaghmoyne 32 perches. Surface-elevation above feet. Its softly swelling shores richly wooded; and their numerous with pretty isles and islets, disfigure water into an intricate texture landscape. The principal islets are Blind Island, North Otter Island, White Island, Garman Island, Whittie's Island, and Tor.

MUCKNO, a parish in the barony of Monaghan, Ulster. It contains CASTLE-BLANEY; which see. eastward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 17,194 acres, 8 perches,—of w. woods are in Lough Muckno, and there are in other lakes. Pop., in 1831, 9,902. Houses 1,702. Pop. of in 1831, 7,888; in 1841, 7,708. The eastern and north-eastern districts are in various qualities, Mungrett were dressed in women's attire, used in the manner of female peasantry in parts of the road by which the monks were to approach, and made such replies and tions in Greek and Latin to the Cashel monks as he read as appalled them from entering the aged contest with the monastic teachers of rett, when, as they supposed, the very peasant around the locality were nearly a match for in learning.—This parish is a vicarage, and a te benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial composition, £241 13s. 4d.; glebe, £8 15s. income, £250 8s. 4d.; nett, £213 17s. 11d.; the dean of Limerick. The rectorial tithes apportioned for £483 6s. 8d.; and are appropriate patron. The church was built in 1824, as of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, 10. The Roman Catholic chapel has an atre of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman le parochial arrangement, is united to the of Crecora. In 1834, the Protestants ed to 35, and the Roman Catholics to 3,572; ay daily schools had on their book 74 boys girls.

SHIN (THE), a rivulet of the parish of Kiln, and barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. Issues off the superfluous waters of Lough Carre south-westward to the river Owenmore; as a run of only 2 miles. It is crossed by the from Belmullet to Ballina.

MUNSTER,

southern one of the four provinces of Ireland, bounded, on the north, by Connaught; on the by Leinster; and on the south and west, by the Atlantic ocean. Its northern and eastern bounes, though partly natural, are in general artiand not a little capricious. Its greatest length, rd, in a straight line from Credan Head in ord Harbour to Dunmore Head at the ex-of Corkaguiney peninsula, is 112½ miles; its breadth, southward, in a straight line from head on Galway bay to the east side of the of Baltimore Harbour, is 103½ miles; its length, south-westward, from the furthest f the Little Brosna river to Mizen Head, is les; its greatest breadth, south-eastward, ek Head to Ballycotton Head, is 83 miles; length, westward, in a straight line over the head of Liscaunor bay, is 42½ miles; its th, southward, across nearly the extrem-eastward wing of the county of Watermiles; and its least breadth, southward, main body to Youghal Harbour, is 49 ese measurements, however, are all exlands. The area of the whole province 874,613 acres of arable land, 1,803,477 ed land, 130,415 of plantations, 14,683 1 151,381 of water,—in all, 6,064,579

The surface of Munster is much more that of any of the other three pro- v only exhibits great variety of very frequent intermixture of fea- rapid and constant transitions ous phases of plain, valley, glen, tableau, soft hill, lumpy mound savage or sublime highland, and broken limestone hills, curi- que in character, fills the sea- way, and the adjacent part of the ling, moorish, chaotic mass of low hills, soaring at one place into mountain, and at several places into considerable hill-summits, occu- pies all the rest of the sea-board of the Atlantic down to the Shannon, and considerably across the country. A rich valley, at first narrow and of fitful character, but afterwards broad and surpassingly luxuriant, descends southward with the river Fergus along the east flank of these moorlands. A con- geries of mountains, continuous with the south- eastern mountains of Connaught, and sharing with them the name of the Slieve-Baughta mountains, fills nearly all the eastern parts of Clare, and presses upon the southerly course of the Shannon. A con- geries of mountains, nearly opposite the former, but much loftier, and presided over by the grand sum- mit of the Keeper mountain, rises up on the east screen of the Shannon, and sends off spreading masses under various names northward, eastward, and southward. The Devil's Bit range of mountains is almost connected with the nucleus or central part of the Keeper congeries, and passes away north-east- ward, mainly on the boundary with Leinster. A low country, occasionally boggy, but in general meadowy or arable, forms the small wing of the province, above these mountains and along the Shannon. A territory, which may be summarily described as bog and moorland in the north-east, mountain in the south-east and the south-west, and singularly rich and beautiful champaign ground throughout the large centre and along the south, constitutes the main body of Tipperary south of Keeper and Devil's Bit. A country, variously luxuriant valley, low, bleak tableau, and wooded or pastoral upland, constitutes the eastward wing of the province, or eastern dis- trict of Waterford. The great lumpy mass of Drum mountain, extending parallel with the coast, the grand and picturesque forms of the Cummeragh or Monavoulagh mountains, extending northward al- most quite across the county, and the imposing range of the Knockmeleadow mountains, extending west- ward along the mutual border with Tipperary, fill most of the remainder of Waterford, excepting the opulent and beautiful valleys of the Blackwater and the Bride. The sublime and exquisitely out- lined range of the Galtees extends parallel with the Knockmeleadow mountains at a short distance to the north, and is, with scarcely an intermission, but with much diminished altitudes, prolonged a considerable distance to the west. Successive stretches of moun- tain, taking the names of Kilworth, Nagles, and other names, and dissevered into sections only by depressions and river courses, extend westward from the Knockmeleadow mountains to the vast western congeries of mountain, and form a sort of backbone to the whole of the county of Cork. A champaign territory of very deep and unparalleledly opulent soil constitutes all the central and the northern districts of the county of Limerick. A territory, variously hilly, undulated, and flat, and containing great ex- panses of both valuable ground and charming land- scape, constitutes the west skirt of the county of Waterford, and most of the great section of the county of Cork lying south of the backbone range, and east of the vast western congeries. A country of bogs, moors, bleak hills, and poor arable grounds, constitutes the north-western corner of Limerick, and the great northern section of Kerry. A vast highland territory, embosoming some rich valleys and fruitful glens, as well as diversified with nearly every feature of morass, moorland, and sea-board, but pre- vailing an irregular and enormous amassment of mountains of the most varied character, constitutes the great south-western district of the province, or two-thirds of Kerry, all the west and south-west of Cork, and the small south-west corner of Limerick.

Coasts and Islands.—The coast of all the south-west of the province, or of the greater part of both Cork and Kerry, is exceedingly disaffected and rendered intricate by a multiplicity of aggregately long and ramified sea-loughs and bays; and, in a general view, this great and characteristic portion of coast is either romantically bluff and rocky, or sublimely lofty and mountainous. The coast of the other portions of the province is, for the most part, little indented, and very free from curvature, but bold, occasionally dangerous, and, in some places, particularly in Clare, imposingly romantic. The principal headlands are Creden Point, Red Point, Swiney Head, Brownstown Head, Newtown Head, Boonahon Head, Ballyvoil Head, Helwick Head, Mine Head, Ballymacart Head, Ardmore Head, Ram Head, Ardigna Head, and East Point, in the county of Waterford; Ballycotton Point, Poor Head, Roches Point, Cork Head, Robert's Head, Reany's Point, Barry Point, Black Head, Old Head of Kinsale, Rinhernshy Point, Barry's Point, the Seven Heads, Galley Head, Fort Point, Toe Head, Gacaun Head, Cape Clear, Alderman's Head, Mizen Head, Three-Castle Head, Sheep's Head, Eagle's Point, Rush Head, Blackball Head, Crow Head, Cod's Head, and Cannadoona Point, in the county of Cork; Rosdohan Point, Lamb Head, Hog Head, Bolus Head, Bray Head, Kinnadrulan Point, Ringlass Point, Rinard Point, Dowlas Head, Cawnglass Point, Rossbeghy Point, Inch Point, Cronane Point, Ventry Head, Dunmore Head, Cape Sybil, Dunorlin Head, Ballydavid Head, Brandon Head, Carrowren Head, Kerry Head, Kileouny Point, Beal Point, Crookeen Head, and Ardmore Point, in the county of Kerry; Pollatollon Point, Aghenish Point, Ringmoyle Head, and Rinchilky Point, in the county of Limerick, and on the Shannon; Durinish Point, Rinnae Point, Burrinaba Point, Ing Point, Kinallen Point, Kilkerran Point, Money Point, Bernaherna Point, Corless Point, Kileadrane Point, Kilelogher Head, and Dunmore Head, in the county of Clare, and on the Shannon; and Loop Head, Killard Point, Spanish Point, Faugh Point, Hag's Head, Fanore Point, Black Head, and Finavara Point, in the county of Clare, and on the Atlantic ocean or on Galway bay. The principal indentations of the sea, whether creeks, coves, bays, sea-loughs, or large estuaries, are Waterford Harbour between Munster and Leinster; Woodstown bay, Dunmore bay, Alland's bay, Tramore bay, Ballydowan bay, Blind cove, Clonea bay, Dungarvan harbour, Muggort's bay, Ardmore bay, and Whiting bay, in the county of Waterford; Youghal bay between the county of Waterford and the county of Cork; Ballycotton bay, Croncen bay, Cork Harbour, White bay, Ringabella creek, Robert's cove, Rocky bay, Oyster haven, Kinsale harbour, Saddy cove, Hole-open bay, Courtmasherry bay, Dunworly bay, Clonakilty bay, Dony cove, Dirk cove, Ross harbour, Milk cove, Fair cove, Glapdore harbour, Toe bay, Barlog bay, Balfinore harbour, Roaring Water bay, Skull harbour, Ballydelvin bay, Crookhaven, Galley cove, Barley cove, Dunmanus bay, Bantry bay, Glengariff harbour, Adrigole harbour, Berehaven, Kilkenny bay, Ballydonagan bay, Quolagh bay, and Ardgroven harbour in the county of Cork; the Kenmare estuary between the county of Cork and the county of Kerry; Kilnichalogue harbour, Ballinskelligs bay, St. Finian bay, Valentia harbour, Lough Kay, Dingle bay, Castlemain haven, Dingle harbour, Ventry harbour, Ferriter's cove, Smerwick harbour, Brandon bay, Trulee bay, Tralee harbour, Ballyheigue bay, and Tarbert bay, in the county of Kerry; the estuary of the Shannon, between the counties of Kerry and Limerick on the south and the county of Clare on the north; and the Fergus estuary, Labasheeda bay, Clonderalaw bay, Rollanishark harbour, Carrigaholt bay, Reenvella bay, Kilbaha bay, Kilkee bay, Dumbeg bay, Lisacnor bay, and Black Head bay, in the county of Clare. The principal islands are Iew, Carrickapane and Goat-Island, in the county of Waterford; Cable, Ballycotton, Great, Foaty, Little, Hawlbowlie, Spike, Adam's, Squire, Low, High, Ragged, Skiddy, Horse, Ridge, Sharkin, Cape Clear, Calf, Innisdriscoll, Long, Carty's, Mutton, Scheme, Castle, Goat, Moan's, Fur's, Mamin, Gabery, Whiddy, Stuke, Gorinish, Bere, the Calf, the Cow, the Bull, Dursey, and Innisemard, in the county of Cork; Cappanacush, Dunkerrin, Rosmore, Sheep, Elansharkey, Skellig, Elnaleagh, Elnaslane, Two-Head, Scars, Hog, Puffin's, Long, Valentia, Innisbeg, Blasquets, Fenil, and Carrigafyle, in the county of Kerry; Foynes, Aghinish, Tramore, and Whelps, in the county of Limerick; and the Fergus islands, Scatterry, Hog, Bishop, Mutton, and Inniskerry, in the county of Clare.

Waters.—Munster possesses a large proportion of both the natural inland navigation, and the river and lake beauty of Ireland. It shares the navigation of the Suir with Leinster; commands the navigation of the Barrow, possesses all the navigation of the Blackwater, the Bride, the Lee, the Banon, the Ilan, and the lower Shannon, partly possesses and partly commands the navigation of the middle Shannon, and commands the navigation of both the upper Shannon and its far-extending, artificial, ramifications. Such portions of the province as do not lie strictly within the basins of these rivers, or of their tributaries, are drained to the Atlantic chiefly by mere rills and rivulets, and partly by the comparatively considerable streams of the Colligae to Dungarvan Harbour, the Annabuooy or Carrigaholt to the lower part of the west side of Cork Harbour, the Arrigadeen to Courtmasherry bay, the Roughy to the Kenmare estuary, the Lane and the Maisto Castlemaine harbour, the Cashen to the mouth of the Shannon, and the Forsett to Lisacnor bay. The principal lakes are Loughs Carra, Currane, the Devil's Punch-Bowl, and especially the far-famed lakes of Killarney, in co. Kerry; Loughs Gur and Coolapish, in co. Limerick; Loughs Inchebegagh, and Gougane-Barra, in co. Cork; Loughs Cunnshingaun, Crotty, and Cummeragh, in co. Waterford; Loughs Clareen, Poulavea, Avon, and Fuar, in co. Tipperary; and Loughs Doo, Inchiquin, Grane, O'Grady, Doon, and Clonlee, in co. Clare.

Minerals.—A formation of clay slate, greywacke, and greywacke slate constitutes the surface rock of all the south-west of co. Cork, the eastern district of co. Waterford, a small district on the eastern border of co. Tipperary, a portion of the Galtee mountains, the most of the Keeper mountains and their ramifications, a district immediately north of Killaloe and on both sides of the Shannon, and a district in the north-west of co. Clare. A formation of old conglomerate, with red, purple, green, and grey clay-slate, constitutes the surface-rock of a broad and long band of country extending from west to east quite across the counties of Kerry and Cork, the eastern district of co. Waterford, a district in the south-east of co. Tipperary, the greater part of the Galtee mountains, and the western part of the peninsula of Corkaguiney. A formation of old red sandstone and sand-stone conglomerate constitutes the surface-rock of the eastern part of the peninsula of Corkaguiney, a small district on the south side of Castlemaine harbour, a small district north-east of Miltstreet, and various peninsules of the counties of Limerick and Tipperary. A formation of yellow sandstone and sandstone conglomerate constitutes counties of Tipperary and Limerick, Munster. It rises among the Keeper mountains; pursues a course successively westerly, southerly, and west-north-westerly; washes the village of Newport-Tip; receives at Barrington Bridge, from the east-south-east, the large tribute of the Dead river; and falls into the Shannon, under the ruins of Castle-Troy, midway between Castle-Cornell and Limerick. It makes a very great aggregate descent; and, in consequence, is very rapid, and has much water-power.

MULLAGH, a village in the parish of Kilmurry, barony of Ibrickane, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Milltown-Malbay, co. Clare, Munster. Fairs are held on New-year's day, St. Patrick's day, Easter Monday, and Whitmonday. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 96; in 1841, 131. Houses 23.

MULLAGH, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Castleragban, 5 miles east-south-east of Virginia, co. Cavan, Ulster. Length, south-south-eastward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $1\frac{1}{4}$ to 3; area, 12,872 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches,—of which 140 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,960; in 1841, 6,526. Houses 1,079. The surface includes some tracts of bog and mountain, but consists, for the most part, of good land. A pleasant and thoroughly wooded lake in the south, round the banks of which are the church, the glebe-house, and two seats, has a surface-elevation of 395 feet above sea-level; and 4 other lakes, or rather loughlets, occur in the north, the larger two of which bear the names of Lenanavrogh and Corratinner. The seats are Rantavan-house, Cornakill-house, Lakeview-house, Mullagh-cottage, Palmyra-house, Cornaglee-house, and Greenwood-cottage. The village of Mullagh is situated in the south-east corner of the parish, on the road from Virginia to Moynalty. Fairs are held on the last Friday of Jan., March, May, July, Sept., and Nov. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 108; in 1841, 368. Houses 68.—This parish was formerly part of the vicarage and benefice of Killinkere, but is now a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Glebe, £20. Gross income, £98 2s.; nett, £91 9s. 8d. Patron, the incumbent of Killinkere. The vicarial tithes belong to the vicar of Killinkere, who pays the perpetual curate £55 a-year; and the rectorial tithes are inappropriate. The church was built in 1819, by means of a loan of £1,107 13s. 10½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 160; attendance 80. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 850 and 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 239 Churchmen, 26 Presbyterians, and 5,635 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 164 children; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 190 boys and 107 girls. In 1842, there were two National schools at Killeeter.

MULLAGHERACK, a parish in the baronies of Lower Fews and West O'Neilland, co. Armagh, Ulster. The Fews section contains the village of HAMILTON'S-BAWN, and part of the town of MARKET-HILL: see these articles. Length, south-eastward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 4½. Area of the Lower Fews section, 7,900 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches,—of which 40 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches are water. Area of the O'Neilland section, 3,656 acres, 8 perches,—of which 53 acres, 19 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 8,490; in 1841, 8,570. Houses 1,572. Pop., in 1841, of the O'Neilland section, 2,827; of the rural districts of the Fews section, 4,904. Houses in these, respectively 526 and 884. The surface presents, in general, the undulated and beautifully tumulated character which prevails throughout the central districts of the county; and it consists, for the most part, of good, improved, and well-cultivated land. A principal group of decorative features, and a general notice of georgic improvements, are exhibited in the article GOSFORD: which see. Lough Marlacoo lies in the O'Neilland section; Lough Ballynewry, in the Fews section; and Lough Moyroukan, on the boundary between the sections. The seats in the O'Neilland section are Marlacoo-house, Prospect-house, Mount-Pleasant, Walkingshaw, Grove-house, Bloomfield, Drumart-house, and Willmount; and those in the Fews section are Gosford-castle, Mullard-cottage, Bryandrum-cottage, Dogherty-house, Ballynewry-house, Turner's-grove, Ashvale, Johnston-house, and Derrynaught-house. The roads from Armagh to Newry, from Rich-hill to Dundalk, from Tanderagee to Keady, and from Portadown to Newtown-Hamilton, pass through the interior. A large proportion of the parishioners are employed in the linen manufacture.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £671 4s. 6½d.; glebe, £810 2s. 5½d. The rectories of Mullagherack and KILCLUNKY [see that article] constitute the benefice of Mullagherack, and the corps of Mullagherack prebend. Gross income, £2,268 13s. 2d.; nett, £1,829 18s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £100. The church is situated $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile north by west of Market-hill, and was built in 1830, at the cost of £1,760,—of which £400 was raised by parochial assessment, £1,035 was subscribed by the incumbent, £200 by Lord Gosford, £100 from the diocesan, and £25 from other persons. Sittings 1,000; attendance 500. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, the one formerly of the Synod of Ulster, and the other of the Secession Synod, have an attendance of respectively from 200 to 300 and 400. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in Ballymore and Acton. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,382 Churchmen, 2,983 Presbyterians, 116 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,330 Roman Catholics; 9 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 660 children; and 14 daily schools had on their books 551 boys and 396 girls. One of the daily schools in Hamilton's-Bawn was salaried with £8 from the London Hibernian Society; one at Tannaghmore, with £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, and £5 10s. and other advantages from the incumbent; one at Drumahoe, with £11; one at Gosford, with £40 from Lady Gosford; one at Ballynewry, with £12; one at Cabra, with £40 by the late Rev. Henry MacCraight; and the Mullagherack parochial school, with £20 from the incumbent. In 1842, there were two National schools at Market-hill; and a respectable classical school. A small agricultural school, with about 5 acres of land, has been attached to the boys' National school by Lord Gosford.

MULLAGHCARN, a mountain on the mutual border of the parishes of Cappagh and Lower Badoney, barony of Strabane, 5½ miles north-east by north of Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It has an altitude of 1,778 feet above sea-level; and is one of the southern frontier heights of the great alpine region of Tyrone, Londonderry, and Donegal.

MULLAGHCREW. See MULLACREW.

MULLAGHDERG, a lake, a headland, and a tower, in the parish of Templecrone, from 4 to 5½ miles north of Dunglo, barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. The lake is about 1¼ mile in length, from east to west; and lies very near the sea-shore. The headland screens the south side of Inisfree bay. The tower stands upon the headland, on a basis of 170 feet above sea-level.

MULLAGHDRUM, or CORNACKEE, a chapelry in the parish of Cleenish, barony of Glenawley, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The chapel was built in 1817, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £295 7s. 8½d. raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 380; attendance 150. The chaplain is appointed by the incumbent of Cleenish. The Roman Catholic chapel of Mullaghdrum has an attendance of 508; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Mullaghmesker,—which also is in the civil parish of Cleenish.

MULLAGHGLASS, an electoral division of the Poor-law union of Newry, situated partly in the barony of Lower Orior, but chiefly in that of Upper Orior, and about 3 miles north-north-west of the town of Newry, co. Armagh, Ulster. The dispensary here serves for a district of 18,000 acres, with a pop. of 8,000; and, in 1839, it expended £126 18s., and administered to 1,046 patients.

MULLAGHMAST. See CARMEN.

MULLAGHMORE, a lake about 3 furlongs in length, and 1½ mile north of Mount-Norris, parish of Loughgilly, barony of Lower Orior, co. Armagh, Ulster.

MULLAGHMORE, a peninsula of 1¼ mile in length, and about ¼ in mean breadth, projecting northward into Donegal bay, at the northern extremity of the parish of Abamplish, the barony of Carberry, the county of Sligo, and the province of Connaught. Its northern part has an extreme altitude above sea-level of 209 feet; and, while itself profitable land, is separated from the rest of the arable ground of the barony by a band of sandy and utterly sterile waste, upwards of 1½ mile in breadth; yet it is connected with the interior by a good road, and has been much improved, and made the site of a small village and a fishing-harbour, by its proprietor, Lord Palmerston. The coast is prevalently bluff and rocky; and is, in one place, perforated with a cavern called the Pigeon's Cave. Two islets, called Dunleavy's, and Hugh's Islands, lie nearly adjacent to the termination of the peninsula. The harbour is on the east side; it was commenced jointly by Lord Palmerston and the Fishery Board, but was completed, and has been maintained solely, by his lordship; and it has been found of great utility to the fisheries. Here is a coast-guard station.

MULLAGHORAN, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ardagh, Leinster. Its post-town is Granard; and it has chapels at Mullaghoran and Loughdlu.

MULLAHA, a mountain on the west side of Upper Lough Macnean, 4 miles east by north of Manor-Hamilton, co. Leitrim, Connaught.

MULLAHIDDART, MULHEDDART, MAHAHIDERT, or MULLAHITHART, a parish in the barony of Castleknock, 5½ miles north-west by north of co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½ miles, 34 perches. Pop., in 1831, 595. Houses 94. The surface consists of a mean elevation of 100 feet above sea-level. The highest ground of the church, and has an altitude of 100 feet above sea-level. The seats are Tyrrelstown-town-house, Hollywood Bay-house, Irish Larch-grove, Belgreen-house, Kilmartin-house, Macetown-house, Damastown-house, Lower-Huntstown-town, and Pacefield. The mail-road to Enniskillen passes through the southern parish; and on this road, and on the south-east corner of the parish, a let of Mullahiddart, 1¼ mile north-westward.—This parish is nominally practically a vicarage, and part of the CASTLEKNOCK (which see), in the civil parish. The vicarial tithes are compounded the rectorial for £70; and the latter added to the prebend of Mullahiddart in cathedral. In 1834, the parishioners were 36 Churchmen, 10 Protestant dissenters, Roman Catholics; and a daily school with £10 a-year from the National Endowment on its books 62 boys and 16 girls.

MULLAHIFFE. See MOLAHIFFE.

MULLANGORE, a beautiful bay around the head and along the eastern shore of the romantic Lough Veagh, in the parish of barony of Kilmacrenn, 9 miles west of Letterkenny, co. Donegal, Ulster.

MULLARY. See MOYLARY.

MULLAVILLY, a quoad sacra parochial civilia parish of Kilmore, barony of Orior and East O'Neilland, and 1¼ mile west of Tanderagee, co. Armagh, Ulster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 5; area, about 8,000 acres, in 1831, 6,593. The surface consists of a rich, well-cultivated, and fertile appearance. The seats are Mullavilly-villy-cottage, Mount-pleasant, Eyre Mandeville-hall, Brackagh-house, and Mandeville-house. The roads from Tanderagee and Lurgan pass through the interior of the parish, and is a perpetual curacy, and a separate dio. of Armagh. Glebe, £12 8s. 5d.; tithes, £106 13s. 1d.; nett, £95 8s. The incumbent of Kilmore. The church was built in 1736, at an unknown cost; and enlarged by means of a loan of £738 9s. 2½d. Board of First Fruits. Sittings 564. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 140 to 250; and by 200. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 460; and, in the Roman Catholic arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmore. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of men, 1,242 Presbyterians, 317 other dissenters, and 1,352 Roman Catholics. The schools were usually attended by a schoolmaster and 10 daily schools had on the books 232 boys and 232 girls. Two of the schools were at Derryhall, and one in Ballyloughan, and by Miss Richardson and by small fees. The school was supported by the Misses and small fees; one at Mullaherd was supported by Lord Mandeville, and by small fees from tenants; one for boys was salaried with £10 conditional from the Board of Education, and one for girls was salaried with £7 conditional from the Board of Education.

principal mail-roads within the province are, the road from Limerick to Galway, the road from Limerick to Dublin, the road from Limerick to Waterford, the road from Limerick to Cork, the road from Limerick to Tralee, the road from Cork to Dublin by way of Cahir and Cashel, the road from Cork to Dublin by way of Clogheen and Clonmel, the road from Cork to Waterford, the road from Cork to Skibbereen, the road from Cork to Tralee, the road from Ennis to Milltown-Malbay, the road from Ennis to Kilrush, the road from Tralee to Dingle, the road from Killarney to Cahirciveen, the road from Bandon to Bantry and Berehaven, the road from Mallow to Mitchellstown, the road from Cashel to Roscrea, and the road from Roscrea to Borris-okenane.

Divisions.—Munster is divided into the counties of Clare, in the north-west; Tipperary, in the north-east and east; Waterford, in the south-east; Cork, in the south; Kerry, in the south-west; and Limerick, in the centre;—and Clare is subdivided into 11 baronies; Tipperary, into 2 ridings and 12 baronies; Waterford, into a city and 7 baronies; Cork, into two ridings and into a city and 23 baronies; Kerry, into 8 baronies; and Limerick, into a city and 13 baronies.—The political province of Munster is nearly identical with the ecclesiastical province of Cashel, now included within the archiepiscopal jurisdiction of Dublin; and Clare is in the dioceses of Killaloe, Kilfenora, and Limerick.—Tipperary is in those of Cashel, Emly, Lismore, and Killaloe.—Waterford is in those of Waterford and Lismore.—Cork is in those of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross.—Kerry is in that of Adfert and Aghadoe,—and Limerick, is in those of Limerick, Emly, Killaloe, and Cashel. The ecclesiastical province of Cashel, therefore, comprehends the whole of the political province of Munster; and also includes some peninsules of Connaught and Leinster.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in Munster was 3,359, of scholars 188,206, of male scholars 120,878, of female scholars 64,022, of scholars whose sex was not specified 3,306, of scholars connected with the Established church 17,518, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 119, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 451, of scholars belonging to the Roman Catholic community 168,209, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 1,909; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 3,359, of scholars 191,093, of male scholars 123,766, of female scholars 65,342, of scholars whose sex was not specified 1,985, of scholars connected with the Established church 17,297, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 136, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 456, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 171,754, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 1,450. The statistics of schools and of ecclesiastical matters for 1834, are returned according to the ecclesiastical divisions of the kingdom, and may be ascertained for Munster by reference to the article CASHEL: which see.—At the close of 1842, the National Board of Education had in full operation within Munster 564 schools, conducted by 441 male and 220 female teachers, attended by 48,212 male and 37,764 female scholars, and aided during the preceding year with £6,413 15s. 10d. in salaries, £792 0s. 2d. in free stock, and £864 11s. 2½d. in school requisites at half-price.—The constabulary force of the province, on Jan. 1, 1844, consisted of 1 first-rate county inspector, 4 second-rate county inspectors, 3 third-rate county inspectors, 1 extra-rate sub-inspector, 17 first-rate sub-inspectors, 26 second-rate sub-inspectors, 13 third-rate sub-inspectors, 9 first-rate head-constables, 59 second-rate head-constables, 450 constables, 2,063 first-rate sub-constables, 146 second-rate sub-constables, and 79 mounted police.

History.—The aboriginal tribes who inhabited the various parts of what now constitutes Munster, were the Velabri, the Uterini, the Vodini, the Coriandi, the Ibernii, and the Luceni. The Irish kingdoms or principalities which existed within the province prior to the Anglo-Norman conquest, were Hy-Breoghan, the present county of Waterford; Orragil, or Ossory, chiefly in Leinster, but including part of the present county of Tipperary; Ormond, Oir-Mumham, or East Munster, the present baronies of Ownney and Arra, Upper Ormond, and Lower Ormond in the county of Tipperary; Thomond, Tuath-Mumham, or North Munster, the present county of Clare; Aine-Cliaich, or Eoganach-Áinecliaich, the present county of Limerick; Cerrigia, or Ciarr, the present county of Kerry; Aoibh-Liathain, the northern and eastern parts of the present county of Cork; and Corcaluighe, or ancient Cork, the western and southern parts of the present county of Cork. These principalities, however, were of fluctuating extent and uncertain stability; and a considerable time previous to the actual descent of the Anglo-Normans, all became consolidated into the two kingdoms of North Munster and South Munster,—the former not much extended beyond its former limits or the present county of Clare, and the latter including the greater part of the other five counties of the present province of Munster. interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £385; glebe, £30. Gross income, £415; nett, £327 16s. 8d. Patron, the Crown. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £415, and are impropriate in the Blue Coat Hospital of Oxmantown; but they have been demised during a term of 21 years, for £323 1s. 6½d., reduced to £274. The church was built in 1813, at the cost of £3,553 16s. 11½d.; of which £2,261 10s. 9½d. were raised by parochial assessment, £184 12s. 3½d. were a donation from the Blue Coat Hospital, and £1,107 13s. 10½d. were a loan from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance, exclusive of the military, about 350. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 70 to 80, and the Methodist meeting-house, by about 30. The Roman Catholic Chapels at Mullingar and Walshestown have an attendance of respectively 3,000 and about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Gainstown, in the parish of Lynn. Mullingar is one of the bishop's parishes; and its chapel is the titular cathedral of the Roman Catholic dio. of Meath. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 768 Churchmen, 74 Presbyterians, and 9,228 Roman Catholics; 8 daily schools had on their books 407 boys and 424 girls; and 4 other daily schools were usually attended by about 92 children. One of the schools was a free school for boys, and salaried with £35 from the National Board; one was a free school for girls, conducted by nuns of the Presentation order, and salaried with £30 from the National Board; one was a diocesan school, salaried with between £70 and £80, levied by applotment from the beneficed clergy; one was a parochial school, salaried with £5 from the vicar, £7 from local subscription, £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and school requisites and other advantages from the London Hibernian Society; one was a private classical school; one was a private superior girls' school; one was a private superior daily school; and all the others were hedge-schools.

MULLINGAR,

A post and market town, the capital of Westmeath, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Mullingar, barony of Moyashel and Magheradernon, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands on the river Brosna, on the summit-line of the Royal Canal, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Sligo, 6½ miles west by north of Killucan, 8½ north of Tyrrel's-Pass, 9 north-west by west of Kinnegad, 9½ south-west of Castletown-Delvin, 10 south-east of Rathowen, 10½ south of Castlepollard, 11½ east-north-east of Ballymore, 20½ south-east of Longford, and 39 west-north-west of Dublin.

General Description.—The country around Mullingar, though high in basis, flat in surface, and various in soil, equals in quiet beauty and harmonious loveliness some of the finest tracts in England; and in minglement of land and water,—in the possession of "beautiful lakes, whose transparent waters sleep in unruffled calmness in their own sunny valleys, or reflect the majesty of their woody hills,"—it greatly excels the environs of three-fourths of all the pretty inland towns of the united kingdom. An eminence about two miles from the town commands charming views of Loughs Owel and Ennel, of the latter's lusciously ornate shores, and of all the lovely expanse of circumjacent country. The Royal Canal sweeps so closely round the town on all sides except the south, as to form a very distinctive boundary-line,—excluding only the fair-green and the barracks on the north-west, a poor suburban street of 40 yards in length along the road to Athlone on the west, and a very few houses on the roads to Longford and to Dublin on respectively the north and the east. The town, within the sweep of the canal, consists principally of a main street 1,130 yards in length, running east and west,—two streets parallel to the main street, the one on the north side, the other on the south, and the two measuring respectively 610 and 510 yards in length,—two divergent and irregular streets, the one northward along the thoroughfare toward Longford, and the other southward along the thoroughfare toward Kilbeggan,—and a number of cross streets connected with the main street at various angles, and generally so short and narrow as to be properly designated lanes. A considerable proportion of the houses in the northern outskirts, and a few in the east and the south-west, are cabins and abodes of poverty; but most of the houses in all other parts of the main body of the town are built of stone and covered with slate, and indicate the people's possession of a comparatively large amount of social prosperity and comfort.

Extinct Public Buildings.—Some antiquarian topographers suppose that a religious or monastic establishment was founded at Mullingar in the 7th century by St. Mollin or Molling,—that a similar establishment was founded by the same person at the place since called, in honour of him, St. Mullins, in the county of Carlow,—and that the site of the Westmeath establishment was designated St. Mollin-jar or Molling-jar, corrupted into Mullingar, and signifying St. Mullin's-west, to distinguish it from the St. Mullin's of the south. A priory of canons regular of the order of St. Augustine, popularly termed "the house of God of Mullingar," was founded here in 1227, by Ralph Le Petit, bishop of Meath; and, along with its possessions, was given, at the general dissolution, to the family of Tuile. The ruins of this pile, though not extensive, were an interesting specimen of the early pointed style of architecture; but were removed, a number of years ago, to make room for extensions of the Roman Catholic chapel-cathedral. A Dominican friary was founded at Mullingar in 1237, by the family of Nugent; it became one of the most celebrated places of its class in Ireland, and was, at four periods, the meeting-place of general chapters of the Dominican order; and, along with its possessions, it was given, at the suppression, to Walter Hope, Esq.; but it was not vacated by the friars till 1620, when the town was entered by the army of King William. At the time of Archdall's visiting the place, only the bell-tower and some other unimportant ruins remained; and at a later period, only some crumbling walls existed in a garden at the town's outskirts. Both the Dominican friary and the Augustinian priory were forfeited by their lay owners in 1641, and were, with their appurtenances, and various castles, meadows, gardens, and other property in and around the town of Mullingar, granted, in 1661, to Sir Arthur Forbes, first Earl of Granard; and, about 30 or 40 years ago, the Rev. Lawrence Fitzgerald, a Dominican friar, obtained from the Earl of Granard a lease of the site of the Dominican friary, and constructed upon it a modern conventual church and dwelling-houses. A Franciscan monastery was founded at Mullingar in 1622, by the rich Franciscan friars of Multifarnham; but it never was completed. A castle was built by the Le Petits on the ground now occupied by the county gaol; and fortifications, sufficient to render the town formidable, were constructed by General De Ginckle, but at the conclusion of the war of the Revolution they were demolished.

MURROUGH. See MORRAGE.

MUSKERRY (EAST), a barony in the county of Cork, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by Duhallow; on the east, by Barretts, Barrymore, and Cork; on the south, by Kinnalmeaky; and, on the west, by West Muskerry. Length, southward, 12 miles; extreme breadth, 9; area, 122,875 acres. The northern district is bleakly and wildly mountainous; the southern district is hilly; and the central district is part of the valley and the lower screens of the Lee. The Boggra and the Muskerry mountains jointly constitute the northern uplands of both East Muskerry and West Muskerry. The former of these are separately noticed [see BOGGRA]; and the latter are noticed as follows by Dr. Smith: "To the west of the Boggra, are the mountains of Mushry, as they are commonly called, but rather of Muskerry; and are distinguished into Muskerry more and beg, that is, the larger and the lesser mountains. These range partly north and south, high at both extremes, and hollow in the middle; and are esteemed the highest in the county. The upper part is covered with sedgey grass and bog, the rocks with London-pride. The torrents have worn several deep furrows into their sides, which display no other soil but slaty pebbles, of a red, white, and dark colour; but nothing of any metallic substance." The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred six townlands of the parish of Mourne-Abbey from East Muskerry to Barretts,—pop., in 1841, 1,070; fourteen townlands of Duhallow and three of Whitechurch, from East Muskerry to Barrymore,—pop. 2,664; the whole of the parishes of Inniscarra and Corbally, five townlands of Donaghmore, five of Magourney, three of Aglish, five of Carrigrohanebeg, four of Carrigrohane, one of St. Nicholas, four of Athnowen, twelve of Kilnaglorry, three of Inniskenny, and one of Desertmore, from Barretts to East Muskerry,—pop. 9,811; and one townland of Knockavilly from Kinnalea to East Muskerry,—pop. 94.—East Muskerry, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Ballinaboy, Carrigrohane, Donaghmore, Dunderraw, Garrycloyne, Grenagh, Inniskenny, Kilmurry, Kilnaglorry, Knockavilly, St. Finbarr's, and St. Nicholas, and the whole of the parishes of Aghabullogue, Aglish, Aglish, Athnowen, Cunnaway, Carrigrohanebeg, Corbally, Desertmore, Inniscarra, Kilbonane, Magourney, Matehy, and Moviddy. The towns and chief villages are South Ballincollig, Ballytrooleen, North Ballincollig, Blarney, Lower Dripsey, Upper Dripsey, and Coachfort. Pop., in 1831, 35,254; in 1841, 43,526. Houses 6,853. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 5,762; in manufactures and trade, 846; in other pursuits, 444. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 6,970; who could read but not write, 2,051; who could neither read nor write, 10,234. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,642; who could read but not write, 2,206; who could neither read nor write, 12,936.—This barony lies partly in the East Riding and partly in the West Riding of Cork; and is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Bandon, Cork, Macroom, and Mallow. The total number of tenements valued is 3,603; and of these, 1,433 were valued under £5, —468, under £10, —349, under £15, —203, under £20, —199, under £25, —146, under £30, —225 under £40, —162, under £50, —and 355, at and above £50. In 1781, Sir Robert Tilson Deane, Bart., was created Lord Muskerry in the peerage of Ireland.

MUSKERRY (WEST), a barony of the county of Cork, Munster. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by Duhallow; on the east, by East Muskerry; on the south-east, by Kinnalmeaky; on the south, by Kinnalmeaky and East Carbery; on the south-west, by Bantry; and on the west, by the county of Kerry. Its length, south-south-westward, is 13½ miles; its extreme breadth is 11½; and its area is 188,487 acres. Almost the whole surface is a region of lofty uplands, intersected and diversified with glens and narrow vales. The Boggra and Muskerry mountains occupy the north, and have their loftiest ground in Cahirbarna, whose summit attains an altitude above sea-level of 2,234 feet; the Sheehy mountains have their summit-line along the southern boundary, and possess an extreme altitude of 1,796 feet above sea-level; and the Derrynassagart mountains, very lofty in summit, though spreading in base, extend their summit-line along the western boundary, and send off their eastern offsets or continuations into the interior. The principal glens and vales are those of the Lee, Fohara, Sulane, Finnan, Glashyduff, Oubaun, and Owenscartar. Loughs Allua and Gougane-Barra, the principal lakes of the county, and singularly replete with character, lie respectively on the course and near the origin of the Lee. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred two townlands of the parish of Drishane with a pop., in 1841, of 380, from Magonihy, in co. Kerry, to West Muskerry, co. Cork.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ballinadee, Drishane, Inchegeelagh, Kilmichael, and Kilmurry, and the whole of the parishes of Ballyvourney, Clondrohid, Dunisky, Kilcorney, Kilnamartery, Macdonleigh, and Macroom. The towns and chief villages are Macroom, Mill-street, Inchegeelagh, Gurteenroe, and Massytown. Pop., in 1831, 41,113; in 1841, 46,985. Houses 7,262. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 6,314; in manufactures and trade, 1,127; in other pursuits, 630. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 6,013; who could read but not write, 1,605; who could neither read nor write, 13,065. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,603; who could read but not write, 1,651; who could neither read nor write, 15,574.—West Muskerry is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Kanturk, Dummaway, and Macroom. The total number of tenements valued is 3,726; and of these, 1,258 were valued under £5, —526, under £10, —415, under £15, —303, under £20, —287, under £25, —224, under £30, —285, under £40, —136, under £50, —and 292, at and above £50.

MUTTON-ISLAND, co. Clare. See ENNIS-KERRY.

MUTTON-ISLAND, an islet in the parish of Moyrus, 3 miles south-west of Roundstone, barony of Ballinabinch, co. Galway, Connaught.

MUTTON-ISLAND, an islet in Galway bay, ½ of a mile south of the town of Galway, co. Galway, Connaught. It was at one time used as commonage by the townspeople of Galway; but figured early as the site of a fort, and as a natural strength, in the wars of the country. It surrendered to the parliamentary forces; and it was re-fortified with a castle and other works, both immediately after the Revolutionary settlement of Ireland, and at the commencement of the reign of Queen Anna. A lighthouse, with a fixed light, stands upon the islet; and the maintaining of it during 1840 cost £354 12s. 4d.

MWEENISH. See MINISH.

MYLERSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Carbery, 1½ mile north-north-east of the town of Carbery, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, east-south-eastward, 4½ miles; breadth, from a few yards to 3 miles; area, 3,846 acres, 26 perches. Pop., in 1831, 874; in 1841, 925. Houses 146. The surface is flat and tame; comprises a considerable extent of bog; and consists, in the aggregate, of land worth a manor of Mullingar, vests its superiority in Sir Arthur Forbes, the ancestor of the Earl of Granard, and appoints its limits to extend 5 or 6 miles to the west, and less considerable but not very definite distances in other directions. The charter authorized a court-leet to be held twice a-year,—a court-baron to be held every three weeks, with jurisdiction to the amount of 40s.,—and a court of record, to be held as occasion might require, with jurisdiction to the amount of £100. The assizes for Westmeath are held in the town twice a-year; a court of quarter-sessions is regularly held; and a court of petty-sessions is held on every Saturday. The town is the residence of a stipendiary magistrate, and the head-quarters of the Westmeath constabulary.

Statistics.—Area of the town, 229 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,295; in 1841, 4,569. Houses 752. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 240; in manufactures and trade, 492; in other pursuits, 237. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 44; on the directing of labour, 502; on their own manual labour, 346; on means not specified, 77. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 997; who could read but not write, 312; who could neither read nor write, 643. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 666; who could read but not write, 495; who could neither read nor write, 974.

History.—In 1329, MacGeoghegan, dynast of Kynaliagh or Moycashel, fought and won an action near Mullingar with an English force, under Lord Thomas le Botiller, who fell in the battle. In the war of the Revolution, Mullingar was a principal rendezvous of the army of King William, and was sufficiently fortified by General de Ginckle to be made tenable. In August, 1783, a very brilliant meteor was visible during 10 or 15 seconds at Mullingar,—appearing to be about one-third of the moon in diameter, and moving from the north, with an equable velocity, at an elevation of about 10 or 12 degrees, and in a line parallel to the horizon. In 1779, during a peal of thunder, a flat cake-like stone, rather more than 4½ ounces in weight, warm, and covered with a whitish-brown coat, fell from the air upon a meadow at Pettiswood, near Mullingar, and at the instant of its fall, the village became enveloped with sulphureous fumes, which continued during about 6 minutes.—The ancient family of Le Petit formerly bore the title of Barons of Mullingar, in the palatinate of Meath; and Count Mainhard de Schomberg was created by William III. Duke of Leinster and Baron of Mullingar.—“We must not conclude our notice of this town,” says Mr. Brewer, “without offering some remarks on the old and well-known saying, ‘When the king comes to Mullingar,’—a circumstance believed, according to the meaning of the saying, to be so very improbable, that any boon may be safely promised, the performance of which depends on the actual occurrence of a royal visit. By degrees, this mode of expressing a thing improbable beyond all rational calculation, has grown into very general use in the town and neighbourhood; and has even been adopted in some instances as a legal method of stating a contingency. Thus, several leases of lands and houses are granted in supposed actual perpetuity; that is, until the king should come to Mullingar. Persons holding under this whimsical tenure were naturally much alarmed on the visit made to Ireland by King George IV. The origin of the saying is not decidedly known, and we leave it for the reader to determine which of the two following traditions is the more worthy of acceptance. By some persons it is said that, previous to the battle at the Boyne, the Catholic inhabitants of Mullingar boasted that, if James succeeded, he would, on arriving at this town, withdraw the corporation’s franchises from the Protestants, and vest the same in Catholic freemen. When William III. prevailed, the Protestants retaliated on their disappointed neighbours, and tauntingly rebuked any extravagant expectations, by remarking, that probably such an anticipated event might take place—‘when the king should come to Mullingar!’ Other oral and traditionary historians assert, that a person having a disputed account to settle with one of the ancestors of Lord Westmeath, and a claim on his estate, which the latter could not be induced to settle amicably, the complainant appealed to the king, (but to what king is not told,) who answered, that he should shortly visit Ireland, and that on his arrival at Mullingar he would compel the refractory lord to do justice to the plaintiff. This declaration of the sovereign being made public, his arrival was anxiously expected. But much time elapsing without his majesty’s appearance, the man renewed his applications to the baron; who, as usual as a settlement was demanded, uniformly replied, ‘Yes, my friend, you shall have satisfaction—when the king shall come to Mullingar.’ This reiterated answer, say our informants, soon grew into a proverb.”

MULLINS (ST.), a parish, partly in the barony of Bantry, co. Wexford, but chiefly in the barony of Lower St. Mullins, co. Carlow, Leinster. The Carlow section contains the villages of TINNAMAGH and BALLYMURPHY: see these articles. Length of the Carlow section, south-south-westward, 7½ miles; extreme breadth, 4½; area, 17,853 acres, 1 rood, 37 perches,—of which 90 acres, 18 perches are in the river Barrow. Length of the Wexford section, south-south-westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,347 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 6,432; but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 5,895; in 1841, 6,769. Houses 1,062. Pop. in 1841, of the Wexford section, 864; of the rural districts of the Carlow section, 5,526. Houses in these, respectively 131 and 866. The Carlow section constitutes the southern extremity of that county; and the Wexford section is a strictly contiguous district on the east. A large portion of the surface consists of summits and masses of the Blackstairs mountains; and even other parts of the parish are hilly and either pastoral or waste. The principal Blackstairs summits belonging to the parish are all on the county boundary-line; and, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are Blackstairs proper, 2,409 feet,—a height 1½ mile south-south-west of the former, 1,520,—White mountain, 1,679 feet,—and Carriglead, 1,053. The other principal summits within the parish are Coolyhune-hill, in the north-west of the Carlow section, 441 feet of altitude above sea-level, and a height nearly in the centre of the Wexford section, 592 feet. The produce is only of middle-rate quality. The river Barrow flows along the western boundary; and the Ballymurphy, the St. Mullins, the Drummis, and the Pollmounty rivulets drain the interior. The principal antiquities are the ruins of St. Michael’s, St. Mullins’-abbey, St. Mullins’-temple, two small churches, and Tinnahinch-castle. The chief towns are Ballyliegh-Grove and Knockaduff-hill. The principal hamlets are St. Mullins, Ballybeg, Glenties, Old-Gowlin, Barracka-village in Wexford, Carriglead-village in Carlow, Coolyhune, Knockaduff, Knockshawn, Cummar, Drummis, and Glynn; and the two last are the sites of Roman Catholic churches, while Glynn is the site also of a National school and a constabulary barrack. The hamlet of St. Mullins is romantically situated on the banks of the Barrow, and on the road from Dublin to New Ross, 3 miles west, and Ballyroosky-Point on the east; it penetrates the land in three successive sweeps, first $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles southward to Carrickart, next $4\frac{1}{2}$ south-eastward to Carrowkeel, and next $2\frac{1}{2}$ southward to the vicinity of Millford; it sends off, about midway between Carrickart and Carrowkeel, an arm $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles northward to within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of the Atlantic; and, while possessing sinuous shore-lines, numerous coves and anchoring grounds, and a great variety of coast-character, it nowhere has a breadth of more than $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, and repeatedly contracts to the breadth of a mere British river. The parishes on its east coast are Clondevaddock and Tullyfern, and those on its west coast are Meragh and Kilmacrenn; the large peninsula between it and Lough Swilly on the west bears the name of FANNAT (which see); the small peninsula between it and Sheephaven on the west bears the name of Rosguil, and descends to so low a flat at the isthmus as very nearly to render the peninsula an island; and the most conspicuous grounds which belong to its screens are the hills of Knockalla and Mass-Hill, overhanging the bay near the head of its east side, and possessing an altitude of respectively 1,190 and 1,132 feet above sea-level. The graphic writer of 'Sketches in Ireland,' says respecting Mulroy bay,—"Nothing can equal the variety that this water presents—here, like a beautiful and placid lake, winding through mountains, and without any apparent outlet—there, like a broad and magnificent river, and again opening into a fine harbour in which navies might ride in safety. Formerly the hills and shores of the bay were covered with timber. The oak, ash, and hazel, in stunted copsewood, still cover the declivities. If these beautiful shores were in any other country, they would be improved, cherished, and resorted to; but here no one comes."

MULTIFARNHAM, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Corkaree, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, west by southward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,895 acres, 12 perches,—of which 922 acres, 39 perches are in Lough Dereveragh. Pop., in 1831, 1,473; in 1841, 1,366. Houses 228. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,260; in 1841, 1,091. Houses 181. Lough Dereveragh lies on the northern and along the north-eastern boundaries. The territorial surface is, in a general view, a boggy and infertile plain, diversified with Crookmore-hill, whose summit has an altitude of 491 feet above sea-level; yet it acquires relief from cultivation, and possesses some beauty along the shores of the lake, and around the village of Multifarnham, and the seats of Ballinamona, Ballinacloonagh, Monninglin, Sobho, and Donore. The demesne of Donore, in particular, the residence of Sir Percy Nugent, Bart., boasts much beauty of both situation and character, extends a considerable way along the shores of the lake, and possesses a handsome, substantial, Grecian mansion. The hamlet of Rathbrack stands on the east. The village of Multifarnham is situated in the south-west, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Lough Dereveragh, $2\frac{1}{2}$ east of Ballinalack, and 6 north-north-west of Mullingar. Area, 33 acres. Pop., in 1831, 213; in 1841, 275. Houses 47. Fairs are held on March 4, May 13, Sept. 1, and Dec. 2. An abbey for Franciscan friars was founded at Multifarnham in 1236, by William Delamore, lord of Delamore's country. In 1529, this abbey was the meeting-place of a provincial chapter of the Franciscan order; at and after the general dissolution of monasteries, it was allowed, by some connivance, to remain in the possession of the friars; and, in 1641, the great rebellion of the 17th century—according, at least, to the rather questionable assertion of Sir Henry Piers—was concocted within its walls. The buildings are described by Sir Henry Piers, who saw them in tolerably good conservation, as "of a frame or fabric rather neat or compact than sumptuous or towering, having in the midst, between the body of the church and the chancel, an handsome, straight, but very narrow steeple." "This abbey," says Archdall, "we learn from the tradition of the place, was committed to the flames by the Rochforts, a powerful family in this country; but some ruins which remain evince its extent and extraordinary workmanship, the whole being built of a blackish slate; the east window, totally devoid of ornament, is still entire." The ruins had, till of late years, a not unimposing appearance; but they have lost much of their picturesque quality, in consequence of being shelled to serve as a chapel, under the superintendence of Franciscan friars, who occupy a small modern monastery in the vicinity.—Multifarnham parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Taghmon, and also part of the perpetual curacy of Stonehall, in the dio. of Meath. See TAGHMON and STONEHALL. Tithe composition, £170; glebe £12 8s. 4½d. The parochial Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Lacken. The friary chapel is usually served by three friars, and has an attendance of about 200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 41 and the Roman Catholics to 1,452; and a pay day school had on its books 42 boys and 20 girls.

MUNGRETT, a parish in the barony of Pobbie brien, 3 miles south-west of Limerick, co. Limerick Munster. It contains part of the village of St. Patrick's-Well: see PATRICK'S-Well (St.). Length, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2; area, 6,149 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,475; in 1841, 3,293. Houses 523. A section, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 3,180, formerly belonged to the quondam county of the city of Limerick, and was transferred to Pobbie brien by the Act 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 108 and 109. The parochial surface consists of good land; and is traversed by the road from Limerick to Rathkeale. Some ruins exist, close by the roadside, of an abbey which figures famously in tradition, and for the foundation of which a high antiquity is claimed, but which seems to owe not a little of its celebrity to fiction. "The Psalter of Cashel," says Archdall, "gives an incredible account of this abbey; that it had within its walls 6 churches, which contained, exclusive of scholars, 1,500 religious, 500 of whom were learned preachers, 500 psalmists, and the remaining 500 applied themselves wholly to spiritual exercises. The ruins of this abbey may still be seen, consisting of the walls of a church which by its means bespeak either antiquity, or its former splendour; the east end is 47 feet long by 16 feet broad with a plain narrow window; the centre or nave 33 feet by 28½, and the communication from it with the east end is by a small arch; on the north side of the nave is a small porch or entrance. The west end is 12 feet by 22, on the north side where is a small square tower, with ruined battlements there are no old tombs to be found here, but a small distance north-east are the walls of an house, which probably made a part of the abbey. A current proverbial saying—"As wise as women of Mungrett"—is said to have arisen from the circumstances of a challenged contest for superiority in erudition between the monks of Mun and those of Cashel,—when a number of the p-

Mungrett were dressed in women's attire, and in the manner of female peasantry in parts of the road by which the monks of were to approach, and made such replies and tions in Greek and Latin to the Cashel monks he read as appalled them from entering the aged contest with the monastic teachers of rett, when, as they supposed, the very peasant n around the locality were nearly a match for in learning.—This parish is a vicarage, and a te benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial composition, £241 13s. 4d.; glebe, £8 15s. income, £250 8s. 4d.; nett, £213 17s. 11d. ; the dean of Limerick. The rectorial tithes npounded for £483 6s. 8d.; and are appropri- the patron. The church was built in 1824, as of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, 10. The Roman Catholic chapel has an at- ce of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman ic parochial arrangement, is united to the of Crecora. In 1834, the Protestants ed to 33, and the Roman Catholics to 3,572; ay daily schools had on their book 74 boys girls.

NHIN (THE), a rivulet of the parish of Kil- m, and barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught, ies off the superfluous waters of Lough Car- re south-westward to the river Owenmore; as a run of only 2 miles. It is crossed by the rom Belmullet to Ballina.

MUNSTER,

southern one of the four provinces of Ireland. ounded, on the north, by Connaught; on the y Leinster; and on the south and west, by hantie ocean. Its northern and eastern bound- nes, though partly natural, are in general arti- nd not a little capricious. Its greatest length, rd, in a straight line from Credan Head in ord Harbour to Dunmore Head at the ex- of Corkaguiney peninsula, is 112½ miles; its breadth, southward, in a straight line from ead on Galway bay to the east side of the t of Baltimore Harbour, is 103½ miles; its length, south-westward, from the furthest f the Little Brosna river to Mizen Head, is les; its greatest breadth, south-eastward, ck Head to Ballycotton Head, is 83 miles; length, westward, in a straight line over the head of Liscannor bay, is 42½ miles; its lth, southward, across nearly the extrem- eastward wing of the county of Water- miles; and its least breadth, southward, main body to Youghal Harbour, is 49 ve measurements, however, are all ex- lants. The area of the whole province 874,613 acres of arable land, 1,893,477 ed land, 130,415 of plantations, 14,693 1 151,381 of water,—in all, 6,064,579

The surface of Munster is much more t that of any of the other three pro- st only exhibits great variety of very frequent intermixture of fea- rapid and constant transitions ous phases of plain, valley, glen, tableau, soft hill, lumpish moun- nd savage or sublime highland. and broken limestone hills, curi- que in character, fills the sea- y, and the adjacent part of the ling, moorish, chaotic mass of

low hills, soaring at one place into mountain, and at several places into considerable hill-summits, occu- pies all the rest of the sea-board of the Atlantic down to the Shannon, and considerably across the country. A rich valley, at first narrow and of fitful character, but afterwards broad and surpassingly luxuriant, descends southward with the river Fergus along the east flank of these moorlands. A con- geries of mountains, continuous with the south- eastern mountains of Connaught, and sharing with them the name of the Slieve-Baughta mountains, fills nearly all the eastern parts of Clare, and presses upon the southerly course of the Shannon. A con- geries of mountains, nearly opposite the former, but much loftier, and presided over by the grand sum- mit of the Keeper mountain, rises up on the east screen of the Shannon, and sends off spreading masses under various names northward, eastward, and southward. The Devil's Bit range of mountains is almost connected with the nucleus or central part of the Keeper congeries, and passes away north-east- ward, mainly on the boundary with Leinster. A low country, occasionally boggy, but in general meadowy or arable, forms the small wing of the province, above these mountains and along the Shannon. A territory, which may be summarily described as bog and moorland in the north-east, mountain in the south-east and the south-west, and singularly rich and beautiful champaign ground throughout the large centre and along the south, constitutes the main body of Tipperary south of Keeper and Devil's Bit. A country, variously luxuriant valley, low, bleak tableau, and wooded or pastoral upland, constitutes the eastward wing of the province, or eastern district of Waterford. The great lumpish mass of Drum mountain, extending parallel with the coast, the grand and picturesque forms of the Cummeragh or Monavoulagh mountains, extending northward al- most quite across the county, and the imposing range of the Knockmeledown mountains, extending west- ward along the mutual border with Tipperary, fill most of the remainder of Waterford, excepting the opulent and beautiful valleys of the Blackwater and the Bride. The sublime and exquisitely out- lined range of the Galtees extends parallel with the Knockmeledown mountains at a short distance to the north, and is, with scarcely an intermission, but with much diminished altitudes, prolonged a considerable distance to the west. Successive stretches of moun- tain, taking the names of Kilworth, Nagles, and other names, and dissevered into sections only by depressions and river courses, extend westward from the Knockmeledown mountains to the vast western congeries of mountain, and form a sort of backbone to the whole of the county of Cork. A champaign territory of very deep and unparallelly opulent soil constitutes all the central and the northern districts of the county of Limerick. A territory, variously hilly, undulated, and flat, and containing great ex- panses of both valuable ground and charming land- scape, constitutes the west skirt of the county of Waterford, and most of the great section of the county of Cork lying south of the backbone range, and east of the vast western congeries. A country of bogs, moors, bleak hills, and poor arable grounds, constitutes the north-western corner of Limerick, and the great northern section of Kerry. A vast highland territory, embosoming some rich valleys and fruitful glens, as well as diversified with nearly every feature of morass, moorland, and sea-board, but pre- vailingly an irregular and enormous amassment of mountains of the most varied character, constitutes the great south-western district of the province, or two-thirds of Kerry, all the west and south-west of Cork, and the small south-west corner of Limerick.

Coasts and Islands.—The coast of all the south-west of the province, or of the greater part of both Cork and Kerry, is exceedingly discovered and rendered intricate by a multiplicity of aggregately long and ramified sea-loughs and bays; and, in a general view, this great and characteristic portion of coast is either romantically bluff and rocky, or sublimely lofty and mountainous. The coast of the other portions of the province is, for the most part, little indented, and very free from curvature, but bold, occasionally dangerous, and, in some places, particularly in Clare, imposingly romantic. The principal headlands are Creden Point, Red Point, Swiney Head, Brownstown Head, Newtown Head, Bonmahon Head, Ballyvoil Head, Helwick Head, Mine Head, Ballymacart Head, Ardmore Head, Ram Head, Ardigna Head, and East Point, in the county of Waterford; Ballycotton Point, Poor Head, Roches Point, Cork Head, Robert's Head, Reany's Point, Barry Point, Black Head, Old Head of Kinsale, Rinahernshy Point, Barry's Point, the Seven Heads, Galley Head, Fort Point, Toe Head, Gacau Head, Cape Clear, Alderman's Head, Mizen Head, Three-Castle Head, Sheep's Head, Eagle's Point, Rush Head, Blackball Head, Crow Head, Cod's Head, and Cannadoona Point, in the county of Cork; Rosshoban Point, Lamb Head, Hog Head, Bolus Head, Bray Head, Kinnadrolan Point, Ringlass Point, Rinard Point, Dowlas Head, Cawnglass Point, Rossbeghy Point, Inch Point, Cronane Point, Ventry Head, Dunmore Head, Cape Sybil, Dunorlin Head, Ballydavid Head, Brandon Head, Carrowrea Head, Kerry Head, Kilcock Point, Beal Point, Crookeen Point, and Ardmore Point, in the county of Kerry; Pollatollon Point, Aghinish Point, Ringmoyland Point, and Rinchilky Point, in the county of Limerick, and on the Shannon; Durinish Point, Rinnse Point, Burrinaba Point, Ing Point, Kinallen Point, Kilkerran Point, Money Point, Barnaherna Point, Corless Point, Kilcudraue Point, Kilclogher Head, and Dunmore Head, in the county of Clare, and on the Shannon; and Loop Head, Killard Point, Spanish Point, Faugh Point, Hagg's Head, Fanore Point, Black Head, and Finavara Point, in the county of Clare, and on the Atlantic ocean or on Galway bay. The principal indentations of the sea, whether creeks, coves, bays, sea-loughs, or large estuaries, are Waterford Harbour between Munster and Leinster; Woodstown bay, Dunmore bay, Alland's bay, Tramore bay, Ballydowan bay, Blind cove, Clonsa bay, Dungarvan harbour, Muggort's bay, Ardmore bay, and Whiting bay, in the county of Waterford; Youghal bay between the county of Waterford and the county of Cork; Ballycotton bay, Croncen bay, Cork Harbour, White bay, Ringabella creek, Robert's cove, Rocky bay, Oyster haven, Kinsale harbour, Sady cove, Hole-open bay, Courtmaesherry bay, Dunworly bay, Clonakilly bay, Dony cove, Dirk cove, Ross harbour, Milk cove, Fair cove, Gladdore harbour, Toe bay, Barlog bay, Baltimore harbour, Roaring Water bay, Skull harbour, Ballydelvin bay, Crookhaven, Galley cove, Barley cove, Dunmanus bay, Bantry bay, Glengarriff harbour, Adrigole harbour, Berehaven, Kilkinminy bay, Ballydodagan bay, Quolagh bay, and Ardgroven harbour in the county of Cork; the Kenmare estuary between the county of Cork and the county of Kerry; Kilmichaeloge harbour, Ballinskelligs bay, St. Finnan bay, Valentia harbour, Lough Kay, Dingle bay, Castlemain haven, Dingle harbour, Ventry harbour, Ferriter's cove, Smerwick harbour, Brandon bay, Tralee bay, Tralee harbour, Ballyheigue bay, and Tarbert bay, in the county of Kerry; the estuary of the Shannon, between the counties of Kerry and Limerick on the south and the county of Clare on the north; and the Fergus estuary, Labasheeda bay, Clonderalaw bay, Rollanishark harbour, Carrigabolt bay, Reenvella bay, Kilbaha bay, Kilkee bay, Doonbeg bay, Liscannor bay, and Black Head bay, in the county of Clare. The principal islands are Iow, Carrickapane and Goat-Island, in the county of Waterford; Cable, Ballycotton, Great, Foaty, Little, Hawlbowlie, Spike, Adam's, Squire, Low, High, Ragged, Skiddy, Horse, Ridge, Sharkin, Cape Clear, Calf, Innisdriscoll, Long, Carty's, Mutus, Scheme, Castle, Goat, Moan's, Fur's, Mannin, Gebery, Whiddy, Stuke, Gorinish, Bere, the Calf, the Cow, the Bull, Dursey, and Innisfennard, in the county of Cork; Cappanacush, Dunkerrin, Rosmore, Sheep, Elansharkey, Skellig, Elanleagh, Elanslane, Two-Head, Scarra, Hog, Puffin's, Long, Valentia, Innisbeg, Blasquets, Fenil, and Carrigafoyle, in the county of Kerry; Foynes, Aghinish, Tramore, and Whelms, in the county of Limerick; and the Fergus islands, Scatterry, Hog, Bishop, Mutton, and Inniskerry, in the county of Clare.

Waters.—Munster possesses a large proportion of both the natural inland navigation, and the river and lake beauty of Ireland. It shares the navigation of the Suir with Leinster; commands the navigation of the Barrow, possesses all the navigation of the Blackwater, the Bride, the Lee, the Brandon, the Ilan, and the lower Shannon, partly possesses and partly commands the navigation of the middle Shannon, and commands the navigation of both the upper Shannon and its far-extending, artificial, ramifications. Such portions of the province as do not lie strictly within the basins of these rivers, or of their tributaries, are drained to the Atlantic chiefly by mere rills and rivulets, and partly by the comparatively considerable streams of the Colligan to Dungarvan Harbour, the Annabuooy or Carrigish to the lower part of the west side of Cork Harbour, the Arrigadeen to Courtmaesherry bay, the Roynity to the Kenmare estuary, the Lane and the Maize to Castlemaine harbour, the Cashen to the mouth of the Shannon, and the Forsett to Liscannor bay. The principal lakes are Loughs Carra, Currane, the Devil's Punch-Bowl, and especially the far-famed lakes of Killarney, in co. Kerry; Loughs Gur and Coolapish, in co. Limerick; Loughs Inchebeghly, and Gougane-Barra, in co. Cork; Loughs Cumsingaun, Crotty, and Cummeragh, in co. Waterford; Loughs Clareen, Poulavea, Avan, and Pnaw, in co. Tipperary; and Loughs Doo, Inchiquin, Grane, O'Grady, Doon, and Clonlee, in co. Clare.

Minerals.—A formation of clay slate, greywacke, and greywacke slate constitutes the surface rock of all the south-west of co. Cork, the eastern district of co. Waterford, a small district on the eastern border of co. Tipperary, a portion of the Galtee mountains, the most of the Keeper mountains and their ramifications, a district immediately north of Killaloe and on both sides of the Shannon, and a district in the north-west of co. Clare. A formation of old conglomerate, with red, purple, green, and grey clay-slate, constitutes the surface-rock of a broad and long band of country extending from west to east quite across the counties of Kerry and Cork, the eastern district of co. Waterford, a district in the south-east of co. Tipperary, the greater part of the Galtee mountains, and the western part of the peninsula of Corkaguiney. A formation of old red sandstone and sandstone conglomerate constitutes the surface-rock of the eastern part of the peninsula of Corkaguiney, a small district on the south side of Castlemaine harbour, a small district north-east of Miltstreet, and various pendicles of the counties of Limerick and Tipperary. A formation of yellow sandstone and sandstone conglomerate constitutes the surface-rock of a district in the north-west of Kerry, the flanks of the Keeper mountains, the body of the Devil-Bit mountains, and various pendants in the counties of Cork, Kerry, Limerick, and Clare. A formation of carboniferous limestone, but various in geognostic character, and partly isolated but partly belonging to the great Moets limestone plain of Ireland, constitutes the surface-rock of the north and the centre of co. Clare, most of the middle and the eastern third of co. Limerick, about one-half of co. Tipperary, a considerable district of the north-east of co. Cork, and the low grounds of the principal plains and valleys, as well as of several of the seaward glens, among the several congeries of mountains. One coal-formation, containing workable beds of coal, lies on the eastern border of co. Tipperary; and another and very large coal-formation occupies great districts in the north-east of Kerry, the north-west of Cork, the west of Limerick, and the west of Clare. Protrusions of crystalline greenstone occur in the rich limestone district of Limerick; and pendants of primary limestone, of the hardness and other qualities of marble, occur in various districts, particularly in the south of Cork. The known mineral wealth of Munster is both varied and comparatively great, but will be found sufficiently noticed, in a general manner, in the chapter of our Introduction which treats of the minerals of Ireland.

Farms and Live Stock.—A general and also a somewhat detailed view of the agriculture of Munster may be obtained by reference to respectively the agricultural chapter of our Introduction and the articles on the several counties. In 1841, there were, within the rural districts of the province, 57,028 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 61,320 of from 5 to 15 acres, 27,481 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 16,557 of upwards of 30 acres; and within the civic districts 829 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 433 of from 5 to 15 acres, 130 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 108 of upwards of 30 acres. The live stock, within the rural districts, were, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 9,897 horses and mules, 8,200 asses, 16,853 cattle, 71,273 sheep, 127,673 pigs, and 758,146 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 17,876 horses and mules, 6,085 asses, 43,206 cattle, 72,313 sheep, 63,622 pigs, and 421,734 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 44,586 horses and mules, 3,634 asses, 124,506 cattle, 157,950 sheep, 109,782 pigs, and 713,416 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 33,747 horses and mules, 2,310 asses, 117,036 cattle, 123,549 sheep, 93,138 pigs, and 471,117 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 52,272 horses and mules, 3,741 asses, 228,672 cattle, 270,537 sheep, 128,680 pigs, and 470,339 poultry. The live stock within the civic districts, were, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 3,242 horses and mules, 717 asses, 1,768 cattle, 963 sheep, 21,294 pigs, and 41,991 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 496 horses and mules, 42 asses, 597 cattle, 224 sheep, 719 pigs, and 3,209 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 511 horses and mules, 34 asses, 881 cattle, 351 sheep, 543 pigs, and 2,274 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 270 horses and mules, 12 asses, 617 cattle, 291 sheep, 181 pigs, and 760 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 312 horses and mules, 5 asses, 1,392 cattle, 1,519 sheep, 445 pigs, and 1,006 poultry. The total of the classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, in the rural districts, were 160,378 horses and mules, £1,283,024; 23,970 asses, £23,970; 530,273 cattle, £3,446,774; 695,622 sheep, £765,184; 522,895 pigs, £653,619; and 2,834,752 poultry, £70,867. The total of the classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, in the civic districts, were, 6,831 horses and mules, £54,648; 810 asses, £810; 5,253 cattle, £34,145; 3,348 sheep, £3,683; 23,182 pigs, £28,977; and 49,840 poultry, £1,246. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the rural districts, £8,243,438; in the civic districts, £123,509.

Woods.—In 1841, the plantations within the province consisted of 13,772 continuous acres and 194,429 detached trees of oak, 1,777 acres and 835,343 detached trees of ash, 372 acres and 357,685 detached trees of elm, 1,425 acres and 324,785 detached trees of beech, 10,131 acres and 836,306 detached trees of fir, 92,540 acres and 289,647 detached trees of mixed plantations, and 10,398 acres and 106,336 detached trees of orchards,—in all, 130,415 acres and 4,744,531 detached trees,—the latter equivalent to 29,654 acres, and making a grand total of 160,069 acres of woods. Of the continuous woods, 10,369 acres of oak, 702 of ash, 121 of elm, 242 of beech, 442 of fir, 21,090 of mixed plantations, and 3,210 of orchards, were planted previous to 1791; 654 acres of oak, 306 of ash, 28 of elm, 57 of beech, 298 of fir, 6,120 of mixed plantations, and 894 of orchards, were planted from 1791 till 1800; 292 acres of oak, 199 of ash, 46 of elm, 125 of beech, 1,182 of fir, 10,671 of mixed plantations, and 1,303 of orchards, were planted from 1801 till 1810; 995 acres of oak, 185 of ash, 56 of elm, 86 of beech, 2,190 of fir, 13,935 of mixed plantations, and 1,454 of orchards, were planted from 1811 till 1820; 756 acres of oak, 162 of ash, 79 of elm, 585 of beech, 3,112 of fir, 19,701 of mixed plantations, and 1,933 of orchards, were planted from 1821 till 1830; and 706 acres of oak, 223 of ash, 42 of elm, 330 of beech, 2,907 of fir, 20,423 of mixed plantations, and 1,604 of orchards, were planted from 1831 till 1840.

Occupations.—The occupations of the population, as ascertained, enumerated, and classified by the Census Commissioners of 1841, very fully exhibit the personal statistics of all kinds of productive industry; and, therefore, they are here condensed and exhibited:—Farmers, 130,876; servants and labourers, 427,677; ploughmen, 1,550; gardeners, 2,031; graziers, 23; herds, 7,902; caretakers, 483; land-agents, 38; land-stewards, 1,930; game-keepers, 102; dairy-keepers, 2,017; fishermen, 3,569; millers, 700; maltsters, 28; brewers, 108; distillers, 41; cider-makers, 9; barn-makers, 3; bakers, 1,864; confectioners, 330; soda-water makers, 6; cordial-makers, 2; saltsters, 174; salt-manufacturers, 28; tobacco-twisters, 193; snuff-grinders, 16; fish-mongers, 169; egg-dealers, 261; fruiterers, 141; cattle-dealers, 238; horse-dealers, 25; pig-jobbers, 375; sales-masters, 7; corn-dealers, 376; seedsmen, 28; flour-merchants, 5; butter-merchants, 26; butter-inspectors, 3; bacon-factors, 7; huxters and provision-dealers, 2,041; butchers, 1,106; poulterers, 35; victuallers, 1,983; grocers, 395; tea-dealers, 5; tobacconists, 155; wine-merchants, 71; tavern-keepers and vintners, 2,137; hotel and inn keepers, 172; lodging-house keepers, 405; water-carriers, 105; hotel and tavern waiters, 11; flax-dressers, 251; carders, 1,147; spinners of flax, 12,902; spinners of cotton, 142; spinners of wool, 26,325; spinners of unspecified classes, 39,334; factory workers, 508; winders and warpers, 294; wool-dressers, 313; weavers of cotton, 591; weavers of corduroy, 11; weavers of linen, 1,355; weavers of woollen, 1,045; weavers of lace, 20; weavers of tape, 2; weavers of unspecified classes, 6,867; manufacturers of cotton, 2; manufacturers of lace, 218; manufacturers of thread, 15; manufacturers of woollen, 9; manufacturers of worsted, 6; bleachers, 44; dyers, 220; clothiers, 155; cloth-finishers, 70;

Communications.—The only canals in Munster are the brief one from Tralee harbour to the town of Tralee, and the various short stretches upon the line of the Middle-Shannon navigation. The railways projected for Munster, or for the rest of Ireland as connected with Munster, by the Public Commissioners, are a line from the southern main-trunk, past Thurles, Holycross, and Cahirconlish, to Limerick; a line from the preceding in the vicinity of Holycross, past Cashel, Cahir, Kildorrery, and Mallow, to Cork; a line from the preceding a little above Blarney, past Ballincollig and Inchegeelagh, to Berehaven; a line from the Dublin and Limerick line in the vicinity of Cappagh, past Golden-bridge, Clonmel, and Carrick-on-Suir, to Waterford; and a line from Limerick past Pallas-Kerry, Shamgolden, and Glynn, to Tarbert. The lines of railways projected by other parties than the Public Commissioners are, a line from Dublin, past Roscrea and Nenagh, to Limerick; a line from Limerick, past Croom, Charleville, and Doneraile, to Mallow; a line from Mallow, up the valley of the Blackwater, and past Killarney, to Cahirciveen; and a line from the city of Cork to West- Passage. The extent of roads in Munster under the care of county surveyors, in 1842—exclusive, however, of the county of Waterford—was 9,151 miles; and of this total, 1,170 miles were in Clare, 1,904 in the East Riding of Cork, 971 in the West Riding of Cork, 336 in the East Division of Limerick, 575 in the West Division of Limerick, 959 in Kerry, 927 in the North Riding of Tipperary, and 2,089 in the South Riding of Tipperary. The extent of roads in Clare and Kerry, under the care of the Board of Public Works, in the same year, was respectively 90 and 43 miles. The principal mail-roads within the province are, the road from Limerick to Galway, the road from Limerick to Dublin, the road from Limerick to Waterford, the road from Limerick to Cork, the road from Limerick to Tralee, the road from Cork to Dublin by way of Cahir and Cashel, the road from Cork to Dublin by way of Clogheen and Clonmel, the road from Cork to Waterford, the road from Cork to Skibbereen, the road from Cork to Tralee, the road from Ennis to Milltown-Malbay, the road from Ennis to Kilrush, the road from Tralee to Dingle, the road from Killarney to Cahirciveen, the road from Bandon to Bantry and Berehaven, the road from Mallow to Mitchellstown, the road from Cashel to Roscrea, and the road from Roscrea to Borris-o'-kane.

Divisions.—Munster is divided into the counties of Clare, in the north-west; Tipperary, in the north-east and east; Waterford, in the south-east; Cork, in the south; Kerry, in the south-west; and Limerick, in the centre;—and Clare is subdivided into 11 baronies; Tipperary, into 2 ridings and 12 baronies; Waterford, into a city and 7 baronies; Cork, into two ridings and into a city and 23 baronies; Kerry, into 8 baronies; and Limerick, into a city and 13 baronies.—The political province of Munster is nearly identical with the ecclesiastical province of Cashel, now included within the archiepiscopal jurisdiction of Dublin; and Clare is in the dioceses of Killaloe, Kilfenora, and Limerick.—Tipperary is in those of Cashel, Emly, Lismore, and Killaloe.—Waterford is in those of Waterford and Lismore.—Cork is in those of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross.—Kerry is in that of Adfert and Aghadoe.—and Limerick, is in those of Limerick, Emly, Killaloe, and Cashel. The ecclesiastical province of Cashel, therefore, comprehends the whole of the political province of Munster; and also includes some peninsules of Connaught and Leinster.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in Munster was 3,359, of scholars 188,203, of male scholars 120,878, of female scholars 64,022, of scholars whose sex was not specified 3,306, of scholars connected with the Established church 17,518, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 119, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 451, of scholars belonging to the Roman Catholic community 168,209, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 1,909; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 3,359, of scholars 191,093, of male scholars 123,766, of female scholars 65,342, of scholars whose sex was not specified 1,985, of scholars connected with the Established church 17,297, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 136, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 456, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 171,754, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 1,450. The statistics of schools and of ecclesiastical matters for 1834, are returned according to the ecclesiastical divisions of the kingdom, and may be ascertained for Munster by reference to the article CASHEL: which see.—At the close of 1842, the National Board of Education had in full operation within Munster 564 schools, conducted by 441 male and 220 female teachers, attended by 48,212 male and 37,764 female scholars, and aided during the preceding year with £6,413 15s. 10d. in salaries, £792 0s. 2d. in free stock, and £864 11s. 2½d. in school requisites at half-price.—The constabulary force of the province, on Jan. 1, 1844, consisted of 1 first-rate county inspector, 4 second-rate county inspectors, 3 third-rate county inspectors, 1 extra-rate sub-inspector, 17 first-rate sub-

History.—The aboriginal tribes who inhabited the various parts of what now constitutes Munster, were the Velabri, the Uterini, the Vodini, the Coriundi, the Ibernii, and the Luceni. The Irish kingdoms or principalities which existed within the province prior to the Anglo-Norman conquest, were Hy-Breoghan, the present county of Waterford; Orra-gil, or Ossory, chiefly in Leinster, but including part of the present county of Tipperary; Ormond, Oir-Mumham, or East Munster, the present baronies of Ownney and Arna, Upper Ormond, and Lower Ormond in the county of Tipperary; Thomond, Tuath-Mumham, or North Munster, the present county of Clare; Aine-Cliach, or Eoganach-Ainecliach, the present county of Limerick; Cerrigia, or Ciar, the present county of Kerry; Aoibh-Liathain, the northern and eastern parts of the present county of Cork; and Corcaluighe, or ancient Cork, the western and southern parts of the present county of Cork. These principalities, however, were of fluctuating extent and uncertain stability; and a considerable time previous to the actual descent of the Anglo-Normans, all became consolidated into the two kingdoms of North Munster and South Munster,—the former not much extended beyond its former limits or the present county of Clare, and the latter including the greater part of the other five counties of the present province of Munster. During several centuries, beginning in the eighth, the Daves or Osthmen, with various fortune, harassed the most fertile parts of Munster, but were often encountered by the natives with distinguished bravery. In the 11th century, the celebrated Brian Boromh, king of North Munster, seized the sovereignty of Ireland, which had been previously possessed by the kings of Meath; but both Brian Boromh's descendants, and the MacCarthys, kings of South Munster, acknowledged the sovereign ascendancy of Roderic O'Connor, king of Connaught. In 1171, the prince of North Munster joined the party of the Anglo-Norman invaders; and, in the following year, the prince of South Munster made personal submission to Henry II., on occasion of the latter's landing at Waterford. Brief notices of subsequent history will be found in the articles CLARE, CORK, KERRY, LIMERICK, WATERFORD, DESMOND, and KILMALLOCK: which see. In the reign of Elizabeth, upwards of 574,000 acres of Munster were forfeited to the Crown by rebellion, a special governor was appointed over the province, subordinate to the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and called the President of Munster, and a strenuous but futile attempt was made to alter the social tone of the province, and to ameliorate its condition, by an extensive scheme of English colonization.—Munster gives the title of Earl, in the peerage of the United Kingdom, to the eldest son of William IV., by the celebrated actress Mrs. Jordan. This nobleman bears the surname of Fitzclarence, and was created Earl of Munster in 1831; and, in default of his own male issue, the peerage is inheritable by his brothers in the order of primogeniture.—The synod of Munster, one of the three non-subscribing or Unitarian Presbyterian bodies of Ireland, are understood to exercise inspection over chiefly the descendants of immigrant Presbyterian families from England; but they have congregations only at Bandon, Clonmel, Cork, Dublin, Fermoy, Fethard, Limerick, Summerhill, Waterford, Tipperary, and Portlaw.

MUNTER-CONNAUGHT, a parish in the barony of Castlerraghan, co. Cavan, Ulster. It lies 4½ miles south-west of Virginia by the road, but only 1½ in a straight line, and across Lough Ramor. Length, south-eastward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 7,432 acres, 2 roads, 34 perches,—of which 965 acres, 2 roads, 8 perches are in Lough Ramor. Pop., in 1831, 2,909; in 1841, 3,167. Houses 493. The surface lies on the west side of Lough Ramor and the Blackwater, and is bounded on the south by the Cross Water; it consists of land which lets, on the average, for about 26s. per plantation acre; and it is traversed by the road from Ballyjamesduff to Kells. The seats are Ryefield-house, Lakeview, and Eighter.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LUGGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £148. The church was built in 1832, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 140. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in Castlerraghan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 424 Churchmen, 41 Presbyterians, and 2,534 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £6 6s. a-year from subscription—had on their books 206 boys and 100 girls.

MUNTERLONY. See MONTERLONY.

MURDERING-GLEN, a glen in the western border of the barony of West Carbery, 3 miles east of Bantry, co. Cork, Munster.

MURHANE, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio.

of Ardagh. Its post town is Drumsambo, and its only chapel is at Murhane.

MURHIR, a parish in the barony of Fraghticconnor, 3½ miles north-east by north of Listowel, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the village of NEWTOWNARDS: which see. Length, south-westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 10,609 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,978; in 1841, 3,293. Houses 532. Pop., of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,603; in 1841, 2,979. Houses 478. A large part of the surface, especially in the north, is bog; and much of even the remainder is coarse land, either wholly unprofitable or of very little value. The river Gale describes the southern boundary; the artificial line of separation from co. Limerick, forms the eastern boundary; and the road from Listowel to Tarbert passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LISTOWEL [which see], in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £47 13s. 11d., and the rectorial for £95 7s. 10d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Thomas Stoughton, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilnaughton and Aghavallin. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £12 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 142 boys and 80 girls.

MURLOCH BAY, a small open bay, mid-distance between Tor Point and Fair Head, parish of Cuffeightrin, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster.

MURRAGH, or MORAGH, a parish, partly in the western division of the barony of East Carbery, but chiefly in the barony of Kinnalmeaky, 3½ miles west-north-west of Bandon, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, ¾. Area of the Carbery section, 1,519 acres; of the Kinnalmeaky section, 7,226 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,969; in 1841, 3,175. Houses 504. Pop. of the Kinnalmeaky section, in 1831, 2,720; in 1841, 2,712. Houses 431. The surface is part of the north side of the valley and hill screens of the Bandon river; and comprises almost every variety of land, from meadow-ground to bog.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £851; glebe, £33 7s. 9½d. Gross income, £884 7s. 9½d.; nett, £750 7s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the trusteeship of Ross cathedral; but is usually resident at Murragh. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built in 1810, by means of a loan of £207 13s. 10½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tomplemartin. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 374, and the Roman Catholics to 2,905; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 90 children; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £7 a-year from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £10 10s. from subscription—were usually attended in summer by about 152 children. In 1842, a daily school at Newceston was salaried with £17 16s. 8d. from the National Board, and had on its books 164 boys and 71 girls.

about 28s. per plantation acre. The seats are Mylerstown-house, Clonkeeran-house, Knokeor-house, and Ballinderry-house. The chief antiquities are the ruins of Mylerstown church and castle. The road from Carbery to Clonard passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CASTLE-CARBERY [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £26 11s. 3d.; and the rectorial for £53 2s. 7d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Marquis of Downshire. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 34, and the Roman Catholics to 840; and a pay daily school at Calfstown had on its books 27 boys and 14 girls.

MYNISHBEG, an islet in the parish and barony of Burrisboole, 5½ miles west of Newportpratt, co. Mayo, Connaught.

MYNISHMORE, a small inland in the parish and barony of Burrisboole, 5½ miles west of Newportpratt, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies in Clew bay, immediately north of Mynishbeg, and about half-a-mile south of the nearest part of the mainland; and it measures about half-a-mile in length, and is a coast-guard and a fishing station.

MYROSS, a parish in the east division of the barony of West Carbery, 1½ mile east of Castle-townsend, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the villages of UNIONHALL and CARRIGILLIHY: which see. Length and breadth, each 2½ miles; area, 4,119 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,459; in 1841, 3,741. Houses 686. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,237. Houses 595. The surface is nearly identical with the peninsula between Castlehaven and Glandore Harbour; and it contains very little waste ground, but consists, in the aggregate, of good arable land. A considerable number of the inhabitants take part in the fisheries. The scenery, both of the parish itself and of the neighbouring coast and districts which blend with it into a general landscape, singularly rich, varied, and romantic. At Carrigillihy are the foundations of a large building, which is supposed to have been the abbey of Maure or the Clear Spring, founded in 1172, by Dermot MacCormac MacCarthy, prince of Desmond, and supplied with Cistercian monks from the abbey of Baltinglass; and adjacent to the foundations, is a cemetery in which were discovered large quantities of human bones.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ross. Tithe composition and gross income, £500; nett, £447 17s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1826, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance 55. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Castlehaven. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 162, and the Roman Catholics to 3,447; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 28 children; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board—had on its books 112 boys and 179 girls. In 1841, the Myross Loan Fund had a capital of £104, circulated £263 in 901 loans, cleared a nett profit of MYRTLE-GROVE, a seat in the immediate vicinity of Youghal, barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. The mansion is now occupied by Col. Faunt, but was originally the residence of the celebrated Sir Walter Raleigh, the grantee of the site of Youghal, and a large extent of circumjacent land.

MYSHALL, a parish, partly in the barony of East Idrone, but chiefly in that of Forth, five miles west by south of Clonegall, co. Carlow, Leinster. The Forth section contains the village of Myshall. Length, southward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 3½. Area of the East Idrone section, 565 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches; of the Forth section, 8,863 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,874; in 1841, 2,825. Houses 400. Pop. of the East Idrone section, in 1831, 147; in 1841, 103. Houses 17. Pop. of the rural districts of the Forth section, in 1831, 2,604; in 1841, 2,562. Houses 443. A considerable portion of the surface is mountain; another considerable portion is bog; and the remainder or larger part is aggregately good land. Kilbransh mountain, and two other heights on the southern boundary, have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 1,335, 1,499, and 1,300 feet; a height in the centre has an altitude of 874 feet; and the size of the church has an altitude of 343 feet. The Burren rivulet runs along the western boundary as a mean elevation of about 300 feet above sea-level; and an affluent of the Slaney rises in the east at an elevation of 751 feet. The seats are Holybrook-house and Myshall-lodge,—the latter the residence of Mr. Cornwall. The road from Leighlin-Bridge to Newtownbarr passes through the interior; and departs, on the east, through the pass of Cornabes. The village of Myshall stands on this road at a point whence branch-lines go off to Clonegall and Tulloh. 7½ miles south-east by east of Leighlin-Bridge. Fairs are held on May 10, and Sept. 14. A dispensary here is within the Carlow Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 39,089 acres, with a pop. of 10,481, and, in 1839–40, it expended £87 4s. 10d., and made 3,839 dispensations of medicine. In 1841, the Myshall Loan Fund had a capital of £973, circulated £2,428 in 1,033 loans, and expended for charitable purposes £4. Area of the village, 30 acres. Pop. in 1831, 123; in 1841, 158. Houses 30.—The parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £400; glebe, £7 10s. Gross income, £407 10s.; nett, £328 1s. 2½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1811, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance 90. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Fenagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 221, and the Roman Catholics to 2,700; and two daily schools—one of which was salaried with £15 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 83 boys and 96 girls. In 1842, the National Board had two schools at the village of Myshall.
